"The People leave the issues of command and campaigns to the Senate without ratifying them because they don't really care about issues like that," she proceeded. "At least, usually, they don't. But in Shizuru-san's case, the Centuries representing the People in the Centuriate Assembly would actually care because they expect commissions in the Mentulaean lands she intends to open up during the campaign. So they're far more likely than not to give Shizuru-san the command. And the House, for all it would shrill outrage at that, would have to give in because a ratified decree yet supersedes a mere consultum ." She laughed and clapped her hands in delight. "As you can see, it's terrifically legal and the conservatives shan't be able to do a thing about it!"

Her auditor was still brooding over the irregularity of the notion, however, and faced their host.

"But this is neverdone," Shizuma objected. "It has never been done. Shizuru, tell me you are not serious!"

Crimson eyes flashed at her.

"What, cousin, not got the stomach for rebellion?" the younger woman baited.

Shizuma's beautiful face, already so marmoreal, hardened even further at the provocation.

"That's not my concern," she drawled. "I was thinking of the precedent it would set, to remind you of a term that just recently worked in your favour! If you do manage to get such a law tabled-

"I shall."

" When you do get such a law tabled," Shizuma amended, growing even cooler. "It would stay there as a model for others in the future. Not even so much through the Centuriate Assembly, I'd think, as it's too unwieldy and generally fractious for most to even have a hope. The only reason it would work for you now is that everything has come together at the right time to pitch the equestrian lots in your favour-and you are you, besides, which no one else in the future can become."

She glared at the three women before her.

"What if someone does it through the Assembly of the Plebs next time?" she demanded. "Once an assembly begins to legislate who gets commands, it creates a precedent for the rest to do the same, which means others can also seek command through the Plebeian Assembly. And you know how the Plebs are, damn it all. Give them a demagogue with a golden voice and a silver tongue, and they run riot!"

"They do do that, don't they?" Urumi chuckled, ignoring Shizuma's irritated glance.

Shizuru answered.

"I hardly think it shall ever be taken that far," she told Shizuma. "The Centuriate Assembly has powers not given to the other assemblies, after all, not least being the election of the curule magistrates. Which is the reason I can take up the question in the comitia centuriata. The People in their Centuries-or rather, let us be honest- the First Class was given the right to elect the consuls and the praetors because most of those who govern Rome, be it politically or economically, are already in the First Class, thus concentrating control over imperium and governance in the hands of those already at the top. The Centuriate Assembly is far more elite in its constitution and powers than the other assemblies, particularly due to the fact that it elects all but one of the imperium-owning magistracies."

She raised a thin eyebrow.

"So one might argue the Centuriate Assembly can legislate a military command," she said. "Because a military command is essentially an extra-metropolitan curule magistracy, and an office whose entire existence relies on imperium. I disagree with your supposition that the Plebeian Assembly can ever use the same argument because-as you know!-the Plebeian Assembly has never handled questions of imperium, nor does it even have the power to elect any offices bearing imperium. It does not even serve the interests of the whole People, technically. All it serves would be the interests of the plebeian members of our citizenry. So no, cousin: I must say I cannot see the justice of your inference. Such a matter as I intend to take to the Centuries could never be justifiably taken to the Plebs. At least, not with the legal virtue what I intend to do shall have."

Shizuma responded by looking her cousin up and down, changeable eyes shifting to a hue best described as acidic.

"Granted," she grated out from between her teeth. "Yet it remains dangerous. I see your argument and agree with it. To some extent! Very well, so it would remain in the province of the Centuries in the future, should you do it... Most likely it would remain there, that is. But not certainly, because all it would take is some bit of political deftness to extend it to the Plebeian Assembly, and you know that! But for now I shall let you have your assertion and we shall assume it shall likely remain with the Centuries. But it's not supposed to be in the province of the Centuries, is the point! It is meant to be in the province of the Senate and our fellow and future senators!"

"Why should it remain there forever?" Shizuru asked, lifting her other brow. "Do our peers always choose the best candidates for such missions? Have they always chosen the best generals for military commands until now?"

"Would the Centuries do any better?" Shizuma shot back.

The younger woman rested her head against the edge of the chair's back, and closed her eyes.

"Sometimes and sometimes not, I suspect," she admitted. "There is nothing to recommend either body over the other if the question is about an overall-historical, that is-performance in such a matter. Both are made up of mere mortals, and mortals are intrinsically flawed. So too their decisions."

"If you confess the lack of recommendation for either one, what is there to recommend your proposal?"

"A great deal," Shizuru said. "You are missing my point."

She lifted her head and met the green-gold glare head-on.

"It is not about the general performance in this case," she said. "It is about the specific. In this case, it is obvious that the Centuries stand a better chance of picking the right candidate for the job in question. That would be me! The Senate, on the other hand, obviously has a worse candidate in mind. That would be Kikukawa-han! And I am certain I do not merely flatter myself in saying that surely everyone would agree such a choice is one between a greenhorn and a veteran!"

She continued to talk, face dark with lingering anger.

"Remember that a fair number of the members of the Senate are also in or belong to families in the First Class. Which means the composition of either body does not really vary so much from the other's. Simply that it is business that speaks stronger in the Centuriate Assembly, whereas it is politics that speaks stronger in the Senate. And gods know which one currently disgusts me near the point of vomiting from its stupidity. How can one defend the Senate's exclusive privilege when it abuses it this way, I ask? The matter at hand is too vital, Shizuma, to let the inanity of one body take precedence over the other, simply because it is the body that has always decided on this. The matter is too important."

Shizuma twisted at the last part of this speech.

"You mean, cousin," she said deliberately, "that it is too important to you."

The other woman paused.

"I shall not deny that," she finally admitted.

"Then you shall be doing this simply to privilege yourself."

"You seem to be forgetting I am making it to save Hime's Northern territories as well," Shizuru said dangerously, rising to the challenge with a hiss of air through her nose. "Or do you really think Kikukawahan can do the job just as well?"

For answer, Shizuma whipped her head to the senior consul, who had been listening to all this unperturbed.

"And you, Chikane?" she demanded of the woman. "All those other reasons aside, do you really think you cannot do the job as well as she can?"

But Chikane smiled one of her maddeningly slow smiles and looked languorous.

"As well as someone who has been in those territories and has fought the same enemy already?" the senior consul chuckled. "Hardly, Shizuma!"

The thwarted woman snorted in disgust.

"Why do I even bother?" she said, slamming her goblet on the console table with a clink. Some of her wine spilled a bloody mark on the polished surface. "Shizuru, please reconsider. I am saying this out of concern, I assure you! Setting this precedent will not just get you that command: it will also make more enemies than you already have now. Cousin, they shall hate you for this!"

"Let them," Shizuru said. "I understand that and accept it."

"And the future?" asked a despairing Shizuma, seeing that nothing she could say would change the woman's mind. "Can you accept the future as well? Can you accept it if one of them tries to use the very same precedent you are making against you-or against some other general, down the line? With less than your reasons, cousin, and far less than your right to such a command, far less than your skill?"

"I shall deal with that when it comes."

And having disposed of her cousin's objections, Shizuru turned to the two Himemiya. They were nursing their goblets with differing expressions: one looked serene as was her wont, seemingly engrossed in the lovely crimson world swishing in her cup; the other looked like she was suffused with some electric and inner light, and held her cup in quivering fingers.

"Are you with me?" she asked gently. "My cousin has put forward a contrary argument, and though my mind is made up, I shall admit that what Shizuma has said is not without its own reason. I have already discussed this with the two of you before, but I would prefer to be certain now, because I would need your help to do it. I can do it with others still, but not even half as well or as easily as I would with the two of you. So I ask you... my good friends, most precious allies... would you give me your help now? Or must I seek the others of which I spoke?"

"Seek no one else," said Chikane.

"We're with you," Urumi added.

Shizuru smiled at them and at her dejected relative, who dealt with total defeat by picking up her goblet again and draining its contents like a woman perishing of thirst.

Sometimes, Shizuma Hanazono reflected during her second cup. Sometimes I feel as though I'm the most prudish person with this company, which is saying a great deal for the company's composition. Even I can use up my quota of irony for a day, thank you very much! My cousin is hell-bent on throwing more people against her, and our senior consul is hell-bent on helping her do that. As for this other queer fish my cousin seems to like so much, all I think she's hell-bent on doing is making a hell out of the Forum. Oh, what quirk ever prompted chance to put these three together? And what in the world am I doing in the middle?

"You're all mad," she said to Shizuru later, once the Himemiya cousins had left. It was already well into the evening and Shizuru would have invited them for dinner had they not already made plans elsewhere.

Shizuru bade her be seated again, this time on a couch in the atrium so the two of them could be served dinner. The elder woman did as requested and pulled up her feet so as to stretch on the cushions.

"I wonder what I have done to bring me into such a gaggle of madwomen," she groaned, head on a comfy pillow.

Shizuru smiled. She knew her cousin was now past the point of contestation and was just venting.

"I do love it," she teased, "when you are the one to defend the conservative policies."

The older woman rolled her eyes.

"Your facetiousness must be a thing of legend," she told her host, before her mouth twisted in a sudden motion. "This is serious. I swear that by the time all this is over, Shizuru, Hime shall no longer be Hime as we know it."

"If you mean that it shall be vastly improved, certainly that would be the aim."

A deep frown. "You did not even bother to ask me earlier if I am with you on this."

Shizuru's eyes lost their mirth, trained upon her cousin as though the older woman were some prey she had long been hunting.

"Does that mean..." she said slowly. "I must?"

Shizuma was unaffected.

"No, when it comes to the root of it," she admitted irritably, one white brow up. "And do not think that works on me, cousin, for I have known you too long to suffer such menace from you now-or ever! Do not dare do that to me."

The poison in the bloody eyes was diluted, although Shizuru's expression did not relax.

"I know you are displeased with me," she told the older woman all of a sudden, her voice going very quiet. "You made it clear with your protests. I am only asking that you try to see it from my perspective, even so. You said it earlier: I shall be turning most of our peers against me once I go ahead. I know that, of course. I planned with it in mind because I know I can bear it! But if you too turn against me, I would..." She stopped long enough for it to be considered a pause, though not long enough to be considered a silence. "I would not bear it as well as I would for all the rest of our fellows, Shizuma."

She was staring at her feet the whole time, so she did not see Shizuma's face soften at the profession.

"I do not make decisions lightly-you know me," she continued pleadingly. "You know that is so. If I willingly incur the wrath of my peers, it is because the alternative to that is one that is worse. Did I let this pass now, I would be seen as beaten. And I would sink so far so quickly that it would take me a long time to recover. Indeed, given how much I have staked on this, it might even be that I would never recover again. I would prefer to be hated by all the world before that, cousin! I do this only because there is simply no other way. At least, no better one."

"Oh, I know that !"

Shizuru looked up.

"I'm not a complete fool, Shizuru," her cousin said, seemingly talking to the air above her head. "Acquit me of that class of density, please. I do see that this is the only way you can get all that you want in time for it to matter. I also know that, even if I did manage to talk you out of it, some other enterprising senator would eventually come up with the same idea, ten or twenty years into the future. And would act on it, perhaps, in which case all these protests might well be moot, even did they work."

She turned her head so she could face the younger woman, who looked a compound of relief, surprise, and interest.

"I said those things earlier because someone had to," Shizuma went on slowly. "And I'm not averse to acting my role in the production sometimes, I suppose. It's not as though I claim you shall collapse the Republic with all the things you're doing. No, doomsayer, I... and people have always been claiming the end of the Republic with every little thing, anyway. Yet our Republic exists to this day. Certainly people prophesied an apocalypse the last time you came up with another such scheme, but again I note the Republic yet exists. You're a mad sort of woman, Shizuru. But that takes nothing away from your brilliance or the sincerity of your feelings for Hime the city, or Hime the idea. I highly doubt you'd rush into one of your mad schemes without considering the costs to our world first."

She looked at her cousin, who gave her one of the smiles Shizuma remembered of old. I am still not immune to it, she thought. Even when they had been children, and Shizuru had just been a tot left under her watch. Every time the younger girl had managed to slip from her sight only to be found after a panicked search, there would be that beautiful smile. And Shizuma would succumb, forget about the scolding she had prepared, promise not to tell Aunt and Uncle Fujino.

"All these protests, then," said the troublemaking woman who had been that troublemaking girl. "Are only for the production?"

"In a way." A careless shrug. "And in another way, they were because I was thinking of the depth of the changes you make as you go, and had to admit to some concern."

Shizuma let a small smile pull at the corners of her lips: her form of apology.

"You must grant me a little latitude sometimes, cousin," she told Shizuru. "I've not your capacity to look change straight in the eye so equably, although I can come to live with it given sufficient time. Whereas you would chat it up and get into bed with it upon first encounter."

The two shared a laugh at the image.

"But at the end of the day, I walk with it and with you," she went on, turning her head as the servants entered bearing dishes. "Worry not, cousin, about my displeasure. I truly see that what you shall be doing is the only way for you to get there. I couldn't be angry with you for walking the path you must. My anger is all for your enemies, who are blocking all the other roads."

---

The day after Takeda Masashi's half of the Seventh came within sight of Sosia, the messengers they had sent to Otomeia reached destination, having made better time than expected. There these found they were actually the second Himean-sent dispatch to request urgent reinforcements of Otomeia within the month, for another auxiliary summons had preceded them by about two weeks: the summons coming from the governor of Argus.

When this worthy had first been informed that the legate she had been hosting, Seigo Ushida, had been requested by Suou Himemiya to bring up the rest of the Seventh, she had offered to recall the auxiliaries from Otomeia. Ushida had not known yet of the Mentulaean army going to Sosia and had all his xenophobia unmitigated by martial exigency at the time, so he had declined the offer. To which the Argus governor had responded by nodding cheerily, then going off and sending a dispatch to Otomeia anyway. With the result that the Otomeian units sent home by Takeda and used by Takeda's predecessor had found themselves travelling back to Argus again, their arrival in that province predicted around August's end.

This meant, however, that the messengers bearing Takeda Masashi's request for auxiliaries-actually Suou Himemiya's request, as the letters were in her seal and writing-found an Otomeia without any ready and available military, for all those armed and equipped for battle had already gone to Argus. An enlistment and equipment of fresh units had to be carried out. It could and would be done: but in time to meet the request's urgency?

Still, luck had not run out yet for the Himeans. The arrival of Natsuki's men in Otomeia coincided with the return of an eminent personage in the citadel, one who had been away for over a year and had been due home for some time. It was one of the royal princesses: the third daughter of King Kruger, also his fifth child. With this princess had come one part of the royal armies, and it was this part that the king decided would answer for now, buying time to muster more troops from both the dwellers of the citadel and their other provinces. This available army would meet the Himean request under command of his daughter, who took the royal directive with a mixture of reprieve and resentment.

"Ever since my return," she told him plaintively, "I've been greeted with news only of these Himeans and their quarrel with the Mentulae, and how this quarrel has had our military running up and down aimlessly. Those that recently headed for Argus were sent away from there only some time ago, and now they want them back. Who do these foreigners think they are that they can order us so freely?"

"They think they are the most powerful people in the world-or our world, at least," the king responded, not taking umbrage. He was a patient man, King Kruger, and did not hold with most kings who controlled their people under a constant thrill of fear. Indeed, most Otomeian kings and queens had been noted to hold the same forbearance in their rule: some said it was because of the political structure, where ascension to the throne was gained through electoral politics. Whatever the reason, it meant that his daughter could safely speak her mind to him... within relative boundaries of diplomacy, naturally.

"What you call their quarrel with the Mentulae is also ours," he told this daughter, who was his favourite. "Be you reminded that their territories rest between ours and those of Obsidian, which means we have every interest in assisting the Himeans. They have long been our allies. In exchange they have always been the buffer between us and the Mentulae, Alyssa."

The Princess Alyssa shut her blue eyes away and breathed deep.

"Yes, Your Majesty," she said. "But I would rather we had more competent allies and buffers than them."

A rumble from the throne.

"I agree their newest general does not have much of my confidence," the king conceded, shifting on the Tyrian purple cushion atop his elevated golden seat. "Nor does he have much of our men's confidence. What letters we have received from our people serving with them has spoken of discontent under his command, so Hyodo has said."

"Then is it wise to send more of our people under his command?"

"Is it wise not to do so?" He watched her walk the floor of the chamber back and forth, a prowling movement more than a pacing one. "The lesser of two evils, daughter. They do not say he is a complete buffoon. Simply that he is far less inspiring than his predecessor. Who was a very great general, all are in agreement. Perhaps the problem is that she was too great." A thoughtful look came to his face. "A woman said to be descended from the gods, her lineage traceable to both Ares and Aphrodite."

He paused and stroked his snowy beard.

"It is only natural," he said philosophically, "that anyone appears less inspiring when compared to divinity."

She stopped her walk.

"I've heard of her," she said slowly. "This Shizuru Fujino."

He noted her care. "You do not like what you have heard?"

"I would prefer to hear your opinion of her, Your Majesty. I trust your perceptions better than anyone else's."

"A very strong woman," he said instantly. "As intelligent as she was powerful, and she was-no, I mean that she is -very powerful. Yet I did not find her abrasive as most creatures of power are. Of all the Himeans I have met in the past, I would even say I liked her best, for all that she was also the most imposing. The men agree."

She had resumed her walk.

"They told me what she did at Argentum," she said.

"Argentum, yes." His face lit with respect, whereas hers darkened. "Was it not inspired?"

She stopped her prowling again, turned to fix bright blue eyes on his faded blue ones.

"Why did you send Natsuki with them, father?" she asked all of a sudden. "Why did you send her to be that Himean general's apprentice or attendant, whichever one might be more appropriate?"

The king exhaled, shoulders coming very close to falling. So he regrets it, his daughter guessed, her own hackles rising. Or almost regrets it.

"To learn," he answered. "There is much to learn from them, Alyssa. They have such learning and power. And organisation. Such organisation! Not for nothing have they become as great as they are now, to the point that they could defeat-as at Argentum-an army outnumbering them by the thousands upon thousands."

Again he stroked his beard, a natural habit that came when he was deep in thought.

"The woman who did that is the other reason."

"The woman?" she said quietly, urging him to say more.

"Shizuru Fujino." He said the name in a peculiar tone, fingers dropping from the mass of white hair on his chin. "I say it again: a great woman. She shall continue to become greater. I would have hesitated had it not been she to whom I was entrusting Natsuki's well-being, but it was she. And I could see nothing but advantage in having Natsuki learn from such a person."

He looked at her and the sharpness of old returned to his washed-out irises, reminding her for an instant why it was he and not the other eligibles in his time to have become ruler of all Otomeia.

"Natsuki is not of our line, not directly," he said. "But she is part of our House now. She has much talent, as you have noted several times before, even when she was a child come to us from the Great Forest. She is different in that she has..."

He paused, seemed to think for a while before setting upon the word.

"Broadness. Yes, she has a broadness of intellect. It permits her to learn more than most of our kind can from these foreigners, Alyssa, and she has the youth to learn better than those of us who are more set in our ways and thoughts. It stands that we would do well to keep our alliance and relations with Hime if Otomeia is to continue prospering, and Natsuki's learning shall become an asset to that."

Alyssa digested this with reserved agreement, the worry never leaving her expression.

"Your Majesty's far-thinking ways are admired by all of us," she bowed. "It's true she does have such intellectual broadness, as you say. But her life now may be imperilled right now, and it gives me cause for unrest."

She shifted her weight to one leg and looked at her father beseechingly.

"I intend no impudence, father," she said, holding out her hand. "Truly, I do not. But I think you too would grieve should something happen to my cousin, in the course of the lesson she is learning-or has already learned, perhaps. It would grieve all of us deeply. Natsuki is... special."

"Of course she is, else why would the gods intervene to preserve only her when all her kinsmen were slaughtered? That aside, it remains she has made her home with us and been adopted by us. She is an Otomeian princess now. And even you, Princess Alyssa, were subjected to such as you would call peril at that age."

A level look from her. How wonderfully stern was her face, thought the approving father, whose own features were actually far less attractive, yet also less forbidding.

"I meant," said his daughter, "that she is special because I intend her for my wife."

That actually made him blink twice.

"You intended to marry Natsuki?" he asked.

"I intend to marry Natsuki, Your Majesty," she corrected smoothly. "I intend it still."

The king sat back, amazed. He wondered how long Alyssa had been planning this. The look in her eyes said for very long time. Marriage to Natsuki? Oh, what an idea! To think he had been wondering for a while to whom of his available children he should marry that young woman, so as to keep her in his family-and here Alyssa had stepped up and said he should have thought of her first. But Alyssa had always been the royal child whose life he did not manage, for she was the one who had lived it early on by her own decisions, never showing him she needed it managed. At some point he recalled he had hinted Natsuki's availability to her, but she had brushed it away at the time, as though she had not cared for the idea.

Now it had come out. She had brushed it away so quickly then because she had not needed the hint at all. She had been planning this for an age-and his mind flickered briefly over the possible evidence that detailed some parts of that plan. He put it away for the moment, deciding he would think on that later. At the fore of his attention was still Alyssa's purpose in the notion, for he knew his daughter was not the sort to take up notions without great purpose to them.

Her purpose here did not escape him. How could it, when it was so very political? Alyssa wanted Natsuki's political value as a lever. Such a good lever too! It was true Natsuki could not become elected Otomeia's sovereign, being an Ortygian by birth, but there would be no objections to her being the wife of the elected sovereign. For that was what Alyssa wanted to become, perhaps even needed to become. And Alyssa would use marriage to the final member of the Ortygian Royal House to get what she wanted, use the prestige of Natsuki's blood and lineage to increase theirs...

He had always known Alyssa to be the most ambitious of his offspring, and in fact liked her the more for it, instead of liking her less. Yet he saw now that he must have underestimated her ambition, if he had not seen the extent of her planning for this. Was it all her doing that every noble to have dropped hints about proposing for Natsuki's hand had withdrawn eventually, sometimes even executing the withdrawal by expiring on some battlefield? Ye gods, how deft she must be, that even he had not noticed until now!

"I see," he said, and did.

She nodded, glad to see the idea-and his realisations, whatever they were-did not displease him.

"Then, may I ask that you endorse my proposal?" she followed keenly.

But the king hesitated, realising from her words that she did not know something very important yet. Alyssa checked her elation, guard rising again.

"Before that, there are some things you should know about Natsuki," he said to her. "You have been away a while, daughter. Some things have changed."

She stared at him blankly.

"What things, father?" she asked.

He told her. The only thing he did not tell her was about the letter he had received some time ago from Shizuru Fujino, who had requested-formally she had requested, although the underlying tone had been one of direction -that the Princess Natsuki not be married or betrothed to anyone in anyway. There was a missive that had seen him sitting up in his seat!

He had been astounded to receive such a letter from that Himean. It was not from anger at the highhandedness of the missive, for Kruger knew his Himeans and knew they were a highhanded people to deal with. He also had sufficient knowledge to guess that any other Himean would have been far more abrasive in writing than letter than Shizuru Fujino had been. No, Himean highhandedness was water off the royal hide. What had really titillated him was the implication beneath it: Shizuru Fujino, the Red-Eyed Conqueror herself, wanted their Natsuki!

He had hardly been able to believe his good luck there, for the result had been better than what he had expected from his gamble. He had noticed, even before assigning Natsuki as the woman's attendant, that Shizuru Fujino's famous eyes had been drawn to Natsuki. A normal thing, had been his thought then; Natsuki was attractive and had always been attention-getting, even in Otomeia. His own people had stared at the orphaned Ortygian all her life, for she was so exotic and interesting-looking-dark-haired and green-eyed amongst a people never dark-haired or green-eyed, whether the traits were taken separately or together. So it did not occur to him to ascribe anything immediately sexual in Shizuru's interest. Had he not caught himself staring at those green eyes too, many times in the past? That he had always seen Natsuki as an adopted granddaughter skewed his perceptions, for he did not fully appreciate how many of his people who stared at the girl had done it with thoughts of devouring.

The king had also done his research. He had learned from his intelligencers that Shizuru Fujino was considered by most of her people asexual, endowed with an immaculately clean reputation when it came to affairs of bed or heart. Contributing this to his observations, he had thus failed to expect anything beyond Shizuru Fujino liking Natsuki as a capable attendant or a faithful foreign protégé. Yet Shizuru Fujino had apparently liked Natsuki so well she wanted the princess reserved especially for her sake. Amazing!

King Kruger was a thinking sovereign. And it did not take long for him to think over the development and determine it to be advantageous. After all, his first thought upon seeing Shizuru Fujino in Otomeia had been that she was a woman who would eventually rule her people. Oh, not as a queen : he knew Himeans did not believe in kings or queens. But something much, much greater. The woman had greatness oozing out of every pore! His eyes turning to the future, he had known it wise to make of her a good ally. Otomeia needed staunch and strong friends to perpetually remind Hime of the alliance between the two nations. For the thinker in Kruger understood that even the longest-standing alliances could crumble at a moment's notice, if not attended to properly.

He had decided his course that very moment, flapping the Himean's letter on his luxuriantly gold-entwined beard. For so long as Shizuru Fujino fancied Natsuki, Shizuru Fujino would be given Natsuki. While ever Natsuki's spell over the woman lasted, Otomeia could at least rest easy on where it stood with Hime. He imagined Natsuki would not fare too badly either, for Shizuru Fujino did not strike him as the sort to be cruel to a mistress. It did not enter his wildest dreams to think that Shizuru Fujino was actually thinking of making his charge more than a mistress. The king of Otomeia was realistic, and understood that Himeans did not think an Otomeian-royal or not-worth even their meanest beggar's little finger; a mistress was all someone in Natsuki's position could hope to be. In the same mode of hard realism did he ignore the possibility that Natsuki might not want to be Shizuru Fujino's mistress. He might be a kind surrogate grandfather, but he was still the supreme ruler of Otomeia, and had all the autocracy of those with supreme power.

All of this meant, unfortunately, that he could not yet endorse Alyssa's plan to marry Natsuki. No doubt he would have done it before, but Shizuru Fujino had indeed changed a lot of things. And famously doting a father as he was, he had not stayed king of all Otomeia simply by privileging his children's wishes above greater interests. It was more important for now to secure Shizuru Fujino than to secure Alyssa's claim to Natsuki.

When he had finished speaking, Alyssa stared at him with a face gone unusually slack. So that, she was thinking to herself, was what people have been hinting to me ever since I returned! Why had no one written of this to her while she had been away? Why had no one said it to her face until now, when she had to hear of it direct from her father? Oh, someone would pay for this, damn them!

She shook her head with fervour.

"Natsuki?" she said incredulously. "Natsuki with a foreigner?"

"A Himean," he said, reminding her that it was not just any foreigner. "And a member of their high aristocracy."

"A foreigner."

She exhaled a growl, hardly able to tamp down the outrage; her fists clenched against her thighs and beat on them once, a reflexive action.

"Forgive me, father," she cried. "Again I mean no disrespect. But this is - this is - insupportable! Not to mention unbelievable! Natsuki has never once shown interest in romance or sentimentality, never mind anything so tawdry as fleshly passion! Not in all the years I've known her, and I've known her since she was a child."

"As have I," he said. "You said it, Alyssa. She was a child."

She shook her head again, bewildered.

"Father, how can we know if it's true? I refuse to believe it," she said, though she already did.

"Then perhaps you should speak to Natsuki's troopers. They will tell you what everybody else will."

He exhaled heavily and smiled-with some ruefulness, she believed.

"Gather your men and set out today, Alyssa," he commanded. "We have sufficient food for you to take as provision, along with what you brought with you. We shall gather more troops now and send to your brothers and sisters as well. You and your men will have to hold for now. And not just for the Himeans' sakes, you understand?"

She bowed and left her father's audience chamber upon obtaining permission. Having already sent messengers to her officers, she tarried in the palace a while longer to speak to Natsuki's men. They were commanded to recount their story for her benefit. Afterwards, she demanded to know exactly what had become of her cousin.

"She is attendant now to the woman who wrote the request we carried," said one of them. "The Himean known as Suou Himemiya. She was well when we left her." An uncomfortable shift of the eyes from him. "Although she was injured-but it was healing."

The addendum had the princess looking severe, the note about imminent recovery notwithstanding. Otomeians, like any other warlike people, brushed over injuries regularly. If an Otomeian said another was injured, the injury had to be significant. And that did not bode well for Alyssa's Ortygian cousin.

"She was injured?" Alyssa seemed to be asking them silently how they could have permitted the princess to be injured if they themselves seemed relatively unscathed. "How badly and where?"

"The gravest would be on the leg," said the most senior of the group, a baron who was also one of the subcommanders in the Lupine division. "An arrow went through her calf. But the foreign surgeons saw her and she was well enough to walk with a staff when we left."

The princess hissed.

"That suggests to me there was a time where she was not well enough to walk with a staff, Shura-while I note all of you in front of me don't need anything to help you shuffle along. Was the bone spared, at least?"

"By the grace of the gods, yes."

"She could still mount her horse? She was surely kept out of the fight afterwards to heal?"

The men and women before her shifted uneasily again.

"She seemed able to ride still, for a while," Shura said, taking the role as the official spokesman. "Although she had stopped by the time we left. And she was still fighting."

She glared the question at him.

"We were outnumbered," Shura told her.

"And you left Natsuki there in such straits?" The blue eyes were very cold, disparaging. "Forced to fight although she was wounded, and on behalf too of those incompetents we call our allies?"

"We had to," he said defensively. "It was under her order that we were sent."

"I thought it was under those foreigners' orders?"

"So it was, but it was directly under her order, else we wouldn't have gone," said Shura, persevering. "Had she been well enough to ride so far and in such perilous stealth, we would have persuaded the Capt-the Princess -to come with us. But she would have been in danger, and she herself chose which of us should be sent for this mission."

She exhaled slowly, understanding what he was saying yet immensely frustrated by it.

"That I can see," she told him. "But it's still a travesty that she should be so injured and placed in such hapless circumstances. In case it bears reminding, Shura, Natsuki's blood alone is worth a hundred of yours. And lest you think I make exception for myself, I know it may be worth a dozen of mine too."

She sighed with great feeling, though with less displeasure than before. What she had just said was no embarrassment to admit, for everyone knew the Ortygians had never resorted to election of their sovereigns, unlike the Otomeians; the Ortygian Royal House was a less watered-down, more concentrated aristocracy by virtue of a strict and unyielding line perfectly traceable throughout the ages. Besides, the Ortygian House had also been founded by a member of the ruling family on that ancient island the two nations shared in their histories... unlike the Otomeian Houses, whose founders had only been minor aristocrats from that long-ago place.

"All of you here know better than most, all of you being related to the aristocracy, that the noble Houses of Otomeia have it as our duty to preserve the last of Natsuki's line," dictated Alyssa, reciting the old lecture. "We can't keep her from the field. It would be an affront to both her talents and her lineage. So we watch over her even in battle. It's true all of us have to fall sometime, and that an honourable and glorious end in battle is never a disgrace... but if her bloodline is extinguished so easily under our watch that it cannot be called honourable, we have failed in our duties to her and may be accursed by the old gods and the gods of her dead people. You know this."

The warriors before her shuddered and murmured apologies. They were familiar with all she said but took the rebuke with reverence nonetheless.

"I know she's obstinate and has great courage," Alyssa continued wearily, indicating that she would no longer belabour the question of Natsuki's injuries and how they could have permitted them. She could imagine how they had come about, as it was a constant source of both vexation and pride to her that the woman she would marry was so courageous in battle. She might be enough of an Otomeian to revere Natsuki's martial daring, but she also had a very strong and very real interest in having the girl live long enough to come of age.

"So it's this - er - Himemiya that she's attending now?" she said. "This woman they call-what do they call her again, her position in their military?"

" Legate . She's the one Natsuki is now attending, yes."

"And she's the one who wrote the instructions, not their present general." She looked thoughtful. "Her instructions make sense. But what can you tell me about their general?"

"Takeda Masashi," said Shura, with a curl of the lip that fascinated Alyssa. Oh, they did dislike him! And as Shura expounded on the reasons for that dislike, she found that she shared it.

She patted a hand over her shaggy long hair. It was a very bright yellow and braided away from her face, a style in favour among many of the Otomeian warriors. A low growl crawled up her throat after Shura had finished.

"I see why he's considered an idiot," she spat. "A good thing it's this legate who wrote to us, then, instead of him. Who knows what he'd have asked us to do?"

They spoke agreement.

"Shizuru Fujino," was what she said next, and in a tone that had them quieting instantly. Alyssa asked it. "Is it true that she has been living with my cousin?"

"Yes," the baron said, looking uneasy again. He could see that the idea displeased her, though for what reason he was not entirely certain-though he could guess at it. "She was the Himean's attendant, by order of His Majesty."

The blue eyes narrowed until they were slits. "Don't pretend to misunderstand me, Shura. Are my cousin and that Himean really having an affair?"

He did not bother dissimulating any longer.

"Yes," he said. "And Shizuru Fujino returned to Hime."

"I know. It was the inevitable conclusion."

But he looked troubled, as did the rest of them.

"Is it not a conclusion?" she asked, staring at him with suspicion. "There's something else?"

"Well," said Shura, rolling a muscular shoulder. "It's true Shizuru Fujino is not here, but I'd hesitate to call it a finished thing."

"Obviously you do, else I wouldn't have asked what I just did," she snapped. "What is the reason you'd hesitate? And tell me everything succinctly, because I don't have the time to pull it slowly from your mouth. I have work to do, Shura. So do all of you, as you're coming with me."

Thus Shura told her what he and every other member of their delegation knew, having been around Natsuki ever since the beginning of Natsuki's acquaintance with the Himean, and privy to the changes in that relation. And more importantly, privy to the changes the foreigner had caused in their captain.

Not one member of the Lupine division was unaware of what had caused their leader's silent grief. Did they have feelings about it? Of course, for all of them held the princess in high esteem, especially as many of them were actually related to the aristocracy, which had a keen sensitivity for their leader's station. Natsuki was also the youngest of their group, which meant that, while she was their captain, she was also their child.

So even from the beginning of the liaison with Shizuru Fujino, the Lupine troopers' feelings had run high. Most were simply shocked. There were also many who had very negative opinions. Of these, the common reason was that it should not have been a foreigner to claim their captain-especially given who their captain was-but there were also those who simply admitted that it might have been anyone of any race, and they would still hate the idea. That none of these displeased warriors had voiced their qualms within Natsuki's hearing was due both to their unwillingness to risk their captain's hurt and their own hides: their captain might be famously kind, but she was also famously stern at times... And there was something in her eyes that dried out the throats of all those who intended to take up the matter with her even before they began. Moreover, there had also been a highly believable rumour going around that the affair was part of the king's intention in assigning the princess to the foreign general, an act definitely unusual enough in itself to lend strength to the rumour. Thus it contributed more to the impossibility of speaking to the captain about the topic. One did not question one's superiors about high political matters! And an affair with a Himean like Shizuru Fujino, if it had indeed been under the king's order, was definitely a high political matter.

"Putting it bluntly," Alyssa said once Shura had done. "My cousin had an affair with a foreigner. They my cousin pined after that foreigner enough to take ill, only to recover when that foreigner exchanged letters with her-seeming to say they intend to continue the affair. My cousin then got injured soon after, while remaining ill and pining still for that foreigner's return. That's about it, I believe?"

Shura said nothing this time and hung his head in a show of shame. Alyssa dug her nails into her palms.

"Today," she told him, "is the Princess Natsuki's birthday."

She said it as though pronouncing another damning criticism, then turned on her heel and stalked off.

The gods, she thought, must have been indulging in a laugh at her expense. So many things gone wrong, and all because of an irregular extension in her absences from the capital. One time she stayed away from Otomeia Citadel longer than usual-just one time! And see how it had turned out.

She had planned to marry Natsuki this year. For this reason had come with her and her army so many unnecessary burdens, so many fanciful gifts. There were twenty new horses, ten of them breeding stallions and mares, all of the finest and most gigantic Otomeian stock. There was a cart of expensive spices and perfumes, some of them mixed with the finest gold dust, with which to gild and powder the skin. There was even a beautiful, dauntingly heavy necklace of genuine emeralds from Scythia, the largest stone the size of a small chicken egg and coloured the most unearthly, uncorrupted green.

She had expected to come to the capital, seek her cousin and present the gifts, then come out of that conference with a bride. It would have been, she thought ruefully, so expedient. That it was expediency that she used to characterise it was since love did not figure highly in Alyssa's reasons for wanting the marriage. She did not love Natsuki, even if she did like Natsuki quite well. She set the issue of love aside because she knew she could not force herself to love Natsuki on a wish to do it, and did not think she needed to love Natsuki either for them to get married. She believed her distant cousin was the kind one could eventually come to love, and so merely expected that to solve itself after they were married. Her primary reasons for the marriage were far more immediate and had naught to do with that foreign concept called 'romanticism'.

Of all Kruger's children, Alyssa was the one who wanted most to be the next ruler of Otomeia, and that meant being crowned queen of the capital. Her other siblings, she knew, were either not as eager to assume the mantle of responsibility or had not the strength and the skill to have a chance anyway. As luck would have it, the only siblings she did consider capable of rivalling her claim were already ruling over the other regions of the crown: kings and queens in their own rights and subordinate only to whoever ruled the capital. These minor rulers did not often feel their inferior status because it was the practice for the capital to leave be the other regions' administrators, issuing instructions or intervening only now and then. So for these siblings ruling over their respective cities, to be a sort of suzerain over the whole was unnecessary. They were satisfied with their lot, and Alyssa had spent most of her life checking that they remained that way.

So she knew she would be in the lead when the next ruler of the capital was elected. Most of the nobles liked her and even those who did not had to admit that she was by far the most capable of the eligibles-even with her province-ruling siblings included. Alyssa was both mentally and physically impressive, and radiated the just the right blend of cool sophistication and throwback-nerviness to appeal to most parties. Strong as her position already was, however, she understood that there were things she could do to further strengthen it. Among these things was a strategic marriage, and none would be more strategic in her case than a marriage to Natsuki.

The first reason for it would be that it was a nice reconsolidation of lineage, especially as Natsuki hailed from a dynasty admittedly better than her own. Alyssa knew that her cousin's ancestral pre-eminence would automatically be credited to her too were they married, and that was of even greater significance now that there were no other royal Ortygians to represent that line. The closest alternative would be Natsuki's cousin, Nina, but she was Natsuki's cousin twice-removed and that weakened her claim to the blood royal. The blueness of Natsuki's blood, Alyssa thought, made her cousin Nina's look like water. So Natsuki it had to be. A pity one could not get a child off of her but what mattered was the lustre of her lineage supporting Alyssa's claim. And of that, there was sufficient to overlook the matter of producing offspring. There was always adoption of a royal nephew or niece, after all, to keep the blood dynastically pure.

The second reason for Alyssa's eagerness to marry her cousin was no less important. Indeed, it was far more tangible. Having Natsuki for a wife would give Alyssa access to one of the most closely-kept secrets of the Otomeians, courtesy of Natsuki's exterminated people: namely, the fabled lost gold of Ortygia. Which was, Alyssa knew, neither fabled nor lost. It was still very much in existence.

The story had it thus: not long after the Ortygians settled in their forest, they had pondered the security of their royal treasures, which included both the treasures they had taken from the vaults of the ancestors they had in common with the Otomeians as well as the treasures they had taken on their wanderings. The forest was a fine place to finally settle, all agreed. But was it so fine a place for hiding wealth? There was too much of the stuff to place in one hiding spot, and breaking it up rendered it vulnerable to whatever dolt-be it man or beast or otherwise-might chance upon one of the caches. Oh, so much mammon! But where to put it?

The one to solve the vexed question was one of Natsuki's ancestors. Instead of rooting deeper and deeper in their forest for the perfect hiding place, like his forbears, he turned the other way and started looking outwards... and saw the newly-built citadel capital of his people's mountain-dwelling cousins. It was a fortress on a peak, sheltered by towering walls built upon a naturally defensive geography. Easily one of the most secure locations in the world, that Ortygian ruler assessed admiringly. Thus it passed that the Ortygian wealth was transferred- banked, one might say-in the vaults of Otomeia.

The arrangement would have undoubtedly befuddled most other peoples, not least the Himeans who, had they known of it, would have wondered what madness would drive anyone to put his wealth in another's keeping so trustingly. But the Otomeians and Ortygians were of a culture that permitted the agreement. Indeed, no Otomeian-from the kings down to the commoners-would ever have entertained the idea of laying hands on that Ortygian treasure with anything but a shudder. Not because no Otomeians were greedy! For every people had its share of greed and more than enough representatives of the trait.

No, rather, the wealth of the Ortygians was safe because the Otomeians believed that they could not touch it. Entrusted to their kings under the most terrible of oaths, its protection was a hallowed duty. Should it ever pass that they failed it, should they ever permit anyone to secrete the wealth of the Ortygians from the vaults dedicated to it, the consequences would be catastrophic. It would entail the most profound curse on them and their offspring-if they even had any offspring to be spared after the consequences of their failure, it was said. It was a nonnegotiable belief and was fed to every Otomeian who ever lived, right along with his mother's milk.

Thus not even the greediest of the Otomeian rulers past had done more than contemplate the bitterness of the Ortygian treasure in his vaults, never to be his for the using. The treasure belonged to the Ortygians as a people, but only the members of the Ortygian royal family had access to it. And, with the final chapter of Ortygia's history written in the Great Massacre by Mithrii, only one person now had access to it.

Shizuru Fujino, lover of this sole inheritor, had often guessed at her lover's legacy. Taking into account what she knew of the Ortygian people's wanderings, the many plunders of towns and temples they had encountered on their way to the wintry north, she came up with an estimate approaching her own immense fortune. Yet even her estimate would come short, were she given the opportunity to verify it: the fortune of the Ortygians, by the time it was moved into the Otomeian vaults, was so large and contained so many "lost" works of art that its worth might eclipse even the present contents of Otomeia's Treasury. Or the immediate contents of Hime's, for that matter. That sulky princess currently in a ratty and weather-worn tent in Takeda Masashi's camp actually had fortune enough to buy and sell Hime's Sosia and Argus Provinces. Several times over.

To make her my wife, thought Alyssa again, would secure so much for me. Natsuki would, of course, retain her exclusive rights to the Ortygian treasures if she wished to keep them; however, she would also have an active interest in supporting Alyssa's aims and ventures upon their marriage. And though Alyssa knew her distant cousin would not touch-indeed, had never touched-the contents of those secret vaults for herself, Alyssa knew too that her distant cousin was the sort of young woman who would do it for whomever she loved or whomever she saw it her duty to love. That is, the one she eventually married.

Though I've no intent of forcing her spending it for me, naturally, Alyssa added wistfully to herself. At least, not as far as the circumstances would allow it. Natsuki's wealth would simply be there to add very strong security. It's an idiot who doesn't take every opportunity to raise securities, and I'm no idiot.

She did seem, however, to be unlucky. Now the plan was thwarted, with her prospective bride stuck somewhere in some military debacle and pining for a continuation of what had apparently been a famous liaison with some outsider. Shizuru Fujino. The name was interesting-Alyssa had read enough Himean texts to get a sense of it being unusual. Supposedly a very powerful woman in that country across the sea, as well as a gifted general. And, so it was said, very beautiful.

With red eyes, she thought with a shudder, adding that detail at the last. How could they claim anything with red eyes to be beautiful? Some of the old ones said that there were demons that visited the earth in the shape of animals, the only clue being in their red eyes. Perhaps the same could be said for humans? But no, her father said the woman was a demigod, related to the gods Ares and - and - Aphrodite, was it? Well then, perhaps it was the same for people descended from them.

Damn, damn and double-damn. Divinity-descended or not, the woman deserved Alyssa's curses. Who would have thought that it would be a foreigner to beat Alyssa to it? If the rumours were true, which they most likely were, then that foreigner had already taken Natsuki. An appalling thought! Alyssa would be willing to take her cousin even then but it remained that she did not like the idea of someone else having initiated Natsuki into the marital bed: that had figured in her plans because she knew that doing that would have strengthened their bond, and she preferred to have a queen whom she could claim to own completely. Their people liked that, and she herself would rather have it than the other way. Especially when the other way involved a foreigner doing the bedding.

In this she concocted an argument even she would eventually have to admit was not too pressing, save for the concern over the foreign element. Famously abstemious as Otomeian nobles were when it came to sex and sensuality, they would not actually balk at a royal consort who would not enter her marriage a virgin. Otomeian prescriptions on abstinence qualified more on age than relations; they did not actually expect marriages to be made between virgins because, they admitted, that very rarely happened and you had to allow for human nature. And to add to the notes against her own contention: Alyssa herself was no virgin either.

No, Alyssa's opposition to the specific idea of Natsuki having been bedded was from something else. Not the jealousy of unconscious love: she truly was not in love with her distant cousin. But in place of that love had sprung a different feeling. She had spent thirteen years waiting for Natsuki to come to the earliest proper age for marrying: thirteen years of securing her own standing, of travelling and fighting, of working to make her reputation all that it needed to be. In all that time, not once had she failed to check on Natsuki at least once a year, visiting the capital's palace and marvelling each time at how her cousin had grown-inch by inch in height, face turning from gauntly, hauntingly elfin to fine-boned, hauntingly pretty. And frowning too each time at how this beauty would encourage complications to bud.

She always pruned them before they got out of hand.

So it had been thirteen years of dealing with any nobles who also showed an interest in her cousin, either deflecting them with some manipulation or sending them to termination, the latter by angling them into positions in battle where they were likely to fall under attack. How many deaths had she arranged that way? How many had she put off from approaching the girl by either negotiation or threat? At least thirteen years' worth of opponents! Thirteen years was a long time to wait. Yet Alyssa had waited, and worked while waiting.

Now the wait had apparently been extended and the plan fractured, all due to some bored foreigner eager to experience the Otomeian flavour. It would be different, she reflected, if Shizuru Fujino hadn't been Himean. But she was, and that made all the difference. She was also a powerful aristocrat, an important politician, and that added yet another dimension of differences. Damn the Himeans and their greedy eyes! Thus Alyssa's vexation over Shizuru Fujino's intervention: it was that of a woman interrupted, delayed, stolen from by someone she could not call out for it. She had spent thirteen years planning for this day and her plans were thorough enough to justify all thirteen years of waiting; she had even planned to detail what would have been the rupture of her cousin's hymen.

Despite all this, however, the cool part of Alyssa generally ruled her. It did that now. Setting aside the anger with the aid of a few choice curses, she settled down to ponder. One had to admit, she thought, that this was partly her fault: she had been away far too long this time, actually going a little over a year before returning to the capital and checking on Natsuki. One had to admit too that her father's intent was sound, especially if Natsuki's lover was as influential as rumoured. Otomeia's alliance with Hime did indeed bear watching.

She knew there was nothing else for it but to leave be for now. She was sure Shizuru Fujino would eventually let Natsuki go anyway. The woman would find someone from her own people, start one of those heated romances-such a foreign notion!-and release Natsuki. Then Alyssa could return to her plan, which would have to be revised after the blow Natsuki's affair with the Himean had dealt it. Her cousin's potential prestige as the royal consort had been ruined, but the claim to the Ortygian fortune remained, as did the claim to the Ortygian bloodline. Perhaps she could take Natsuki as a minor wife instead? Surely that could bear well even under the strain of Shizuru Fujino's taint. But would Natsuki herself agree to suffer that lowered estimation? In the end, it still boiled down to Natsuki agreeing to it. And the girl was so very proud, Alyssa thought, especially as she carried the burden of her dynasty and tribe on her lonely shoulders...

Well, time enough to ponder what to do with Natsuki. Alyssa had other prey to fix. What was important now was that she deal with the goddamned Mentulae.

"I'm splitting off Otanara's group," she told her officers. "That's the five thousand that will answer for reinforcements to Sosia. They will have to do until my father's people manage to summon and arm fresh warriors. The ones that went to Argus last month should help with that. They're close by."

"And the rest of us?" the commander of one of her cavalry brigades asked.

"The rest come with me," she said. "The Himean who wrote us-her name is Suou Himemiya, remember that-asked that we send the bulk of whatever we can send to the bridge west of Argentum, the big one on the boundaries. Right where the River Atinu and Holmys run into each other."

"The one the Mentulae are likely using for their crossings," someone said in comprehension, driving the rest to nod and grunt in satisfaction. "Good plan!"

"Yes-which means not all these Himeans are incompetent, thank the gods!" said Alyssa. "We'll drop that and garrison the river line as soon as we can. Which means we're wasting time talking here. All is prepared?"

"Yes."

"Let's go and kill some Mentulae."

Her army rolled out of Otomeia with equipment shining, every man and woman fresh and ready for a good battle. To Sosia headed five thousand foot with Otanara, there to reinforce the Himean city and Takeda. To Argentum headed ten thousand foot and two thousand horse with Alyssa, to do what they could by cutting off Mentulaean access to the bridge on the river-borders. Alyssa's task was more important, which was why she was pleased to be the one doing it despite the urge in her to be the one going to Sosia. At least, she assured herself, a success on her part would contribute to her cousin's safety. She was also looking forward to cutting down some Mentulaeans, for Alyssa loathed them, viewed them with distrust as did every other Otomeian old enough to understand how the Mentulaean rulers had always slavered over the prospect of invading Otomeia. Alyssa could not say she thought very much better of the Himeans by comparison-especially with everything that she had just heard and found out that day-but she retained sufficient objectivity to know her father was right: Hime was still a better neighbour than the Mentulae. So she would do her part and exert every effort to help Hime win now, because such a victory would also be one for her people and would mean one dangerous neighbour less for Otomeia.

"But all these blasted foreigners," she muttered to her second-in-command later, "have surely taken the art of bad timing to perfection."

Chapter 54

Very tardy, one knows. My apologies to all for the delay.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Comitia centuriata (L.) - A Iso Centuriate Assembly ; one of the assemblies of the Roman people, it marshalled them in their classes and was convened for several purposes, including the drafting and approval of legislation as well as the elections for curule magistracies (s.v.). It held its meetings outside the pomerium, on the Campus Martius.

2. Crossroad college - O rganisations dedicated to the upkeep and protection of the crossroads in Rome, which were holy places and thus had shrines. The crossroad colleges' headquarters generally had bars where the members of the college (often lower-class) met and drank with each other.

3. The Head Count - In Latin, "capite censi". Socially the lowest of all Romans, they did not even deserve a rung on the class ladder. The poorest class was technically the Fifth Class, but these were still a notch above the Head Count, who were classless, property-less, vote-less, yet also the most numerous in Ancient Rome.

4. Lamia – A mythological monster who might have been the equivalent of today's bogeyman, used by parents in Rome to frighten youngsters into better behaviour.

5. Octet – One of the many divisions/groups in the Roman army. As taken from the name, it was composed of eight soldiers.

6. Tribune (military) - O fficers within a Roman army who often generaled cavalry; also known as prefects. They did other duties besides that, of course, and often served as part of the general's or legatal staff.

7. Tribunii aerarii (pl.), tribunus aerarius (s.) - Tribune/s of the Treasury.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Otanara's relief force reached Sosia towards the end of August and worked their way into the Himean camp-an easier thing for them than it had been for Takeda's contingent of the Seventh because they approached from the east, on the side opposite the Mentulaean base. First to detect them were their fellows with Takeda, who identified the false wolf-howls some nights before the reinforcements actually showed from the forest fringes. They might have been prevented from joining the beleaguered Himeans had it not been for the timely action of the Sosia garrison, which threatened the Mentulaean camp while Takeda's men fended off attacks around their site. Thus enemy attentions were divided, preventing them from swarming Takeda and the newcomers. This small success was heralded with much joy by the defenders, particularly since the appearance of this buffer force, no matter how small, at least helped with the mismatch of numbers and also freed up more units for forage.

The auxiliary's leaders gave a report in council as to how matters stood in Otomeia. Cheering news, it was generally agreed, that the Otomeians were fully dedicated to their old alliance. The only damper was that there were not yet more auxiliary troops to be had, but at least those that could be sent had already been deployed to Argus-from where, no doubt, they would be marching soon to relieve Sosia-or sent to stem Mentulaean traffic by working the bridges on the river boundary. Added to which, the Otomeians were also in the process of marshalling more forces and promised more reinforcements presently. Finally things were looking up!

"Of course it's still Himean legions we'll need to do the job," Takeda's senior legate noted in the council. "But Sugiura-san has already sent for more. The Otomeians will have to do for now."

Takeda sighed at the comment. He agreed with Ushida, of course, but thought it slightly impolitic to openly disparage their allies' military worth when their leaders were present. They did not seem to mind overmuch, but Natsuki was present, and he did not care to offend her.

"They'll do fine," he insisted, rapping his knuckles on the table for attention. "If there's any auxiliary force I trust these days, by god it's the Otomeians!"

Suou grinned at him from across the table, but he ignored her.

"Anyway, we now have to provide for more people," he said. "Sosia's legion supplies itself. Until they look to be starving we don't worry about them. Our numbers?"

"One legion, understrength, Himean," the tribune he pointed to recited. "If we count with it the militia units picked up by Ushida-san, that brings it to a full-strength legion."

"Absorb the militia in it. Better to have it full-strength than leave the militia dangling separate."

"Noncombatants at appropriate number," the tribune went on. "Cavalry-thirteen hundred and fifty horse, Otomeian, half archery units and the other half Lupine division. Their noncombatants are at an appropriate number, but a hundred troopers have reported loss of one horse and eight both horses. The eight have been provided with horses from those with both horses remaining."

"I was thinking," Suou spoke up, "that I would like to round out the cavalry numbers to fifteen hundred, if not seventeen hundred. The Mentulae have four thousand horse out there, judging from what I've seen and the size of their cavalry camp, so it would be better to increase our cavalry where we can."

Ushida turned to Takeda. "I like it."

"So how do you plan to do this?" Takeda asked Suou. "I'm guessing you're getting the added troopers from the Otomeians who just arrived, converting them from foot units to horse. Will that work?"

Suou nodded. "Natsuki-san assures me it will."

Takeda let his eyes stray to the source of that assurance, who did not return the glance.

"Well..." he said uncertainly. "That's good. But I'm just not sure the Otomeian troopers would take kindly to sharing out more of their reserve horses, especially since the numbers we're looking at put them at a risk of losing the ones they're using right now. We could end in deficit."

"We shall have to ask those who are willing to share, of course," Suou replied. "But my plan actually rests too upon our fellow officers and minor tribunes and the like."

Eyebrows went up all around the table.

"We all know many of the officers here do not actually get around to using their horses in battle," she explained, aware of Natsuki's very slight smirk beside her: she had discussed this option with the Otomeian princess beforehand and obtained the girl's approval for her scheme.

"And this is significant because all our officers have horses. Even quite a lot of the centurions have horses granted to them for awards or valour, and are carrying them on the march. But how often does a centurion really get on his steed? Or a junior tribune, or a quaestor, or a clerk? The horses stay in the stables for parades or public appearances, not so much for actual use in warfare, and that seems odd when we fund them from the war chest-not from any such thing as a parade chest, you would note."

Apprehensive looks dawned as they realised where she was going.

"It should only be considered a step towards our collective survival if these people give up their horses for the added troopers' use," she concluded. "Much good it would do them, anyway, if they just kept their horses for parade and did not live to see another parade afterwards. If this could be managed efficiently, I believe we should be able to raise the cavalry numbers without too much grief, and spend our resources more efficiently besides."

There was silence after she finished, with some people looking darkly away from her.

"The men won't be happy," Takeda said, voicing the general Himean opinion.

"But they'll be alive," Suou countered, unknowingly voicing the general Otomeian opinion.

They looked at each other.

"Well," the commander finally grunted, looking a little unhappy as well. "Since this is a war council, better know what the rest think. Does anyone have a complaint with it?"

As no one could genuinely fault the logic of the proposition, no one spoke up but everyone looked sulky. Takeda's shoulders sagged.

"I'll ask you to work on it, Suou, since you're in charge of the cavalry," Takeda said in surrender, twisting at the thought of how his officers would be carping to him in the days to come. Damn Suou for putting him in this position! No, that's not right, he argued to himself, too fair to put the blame on her for coming up with such a scheme: she was only speaking good sense, after all, even if it came in the guise of a radical proposition. Damn the Mentulae instead!

"Oh, I shit on the Mentulae!" he burst out, face a picture of annoyance. "You're right, Suou-at least the bastards'll live, even if they're unhappy about it. What's the price of a parade horse against a chance to come out of this fuck-up?"

He spat the last so positively that those who had looked sulky nodded.

"So we aim to have fifteen hundred to seventeen hundred horse," Ushida reminded. "The current number of Otomeian foot is five thousand, though that'll be going down after we redistribute horses and cavalry gear."

The tribune who had been reciting the logistics all meeting said it was so.

"And how are the supplies against that?" Ushida asked her.

"Since the Otomeians brought supplies with them, the whole camp is set for two more weeks at most," the tribune answered. "If food is taken on spare commons."

"We'll have to start forage now," Ushida told Takeda. "The Otomeians can be sent to do it."

The commander agreed.

"Can you put together a team for that?" he asked Suou. "I think they'd better go under heavy arms."

"Of course. I shall talk to you later, Otanara-san," she said to the man concerned, who - naturally! - towered over the Himeans beside whom he stood.

Otanara nodded.

"Well, that about puts us right," the commander announced, tapping a finger on the table for each figure he stated. "One Himean legion, one Otomeian legion foot, and about thirteen hundred Otomeian horse. Our horse, at present numbers, looks outnumbered by three-to-one. Our foot..."

He looked around enquiringly.

"I estimate it to be some forty thousand out there. So at four-to-one," Suou suggested.

Several people swore along with the commander.

"There it is," he said. "So no playing heroes yet. Our main goal is to hold out for reinforcements-which will come, we know that now. We'll hold out and work skirmishes if they try anything daring in their siege but unless it comes to a full-blow thing, no full battles. I'm not willing to risk it."

And if those who had been present at the Battle of Argentum remembered what his precursor had dared to risk and won, they kept quiet.

"Hrm," growled the senior legate, nodding to himself. "Argus should be sending us more soldiers soon-and Hime too, since it's probably got the news by now. All that's left is to hold out a little more, and everything will be fine. We'll all get through this good and well."

Which rather put Takeda in a bad mood after that meeting broke up.

It was all very well for Ushida to say that, thought the careworn commander of the Himean defence of in the Northlands. Ushida could say all would be fine did they live through this because Ushida did not have to worry about the censure of Senate cracking down on his head. Takeda, however, had strong concerns about how his present senatorial allies would evaluate his performance. How could he explain having let this happen? No matter that it could not be attributed to any slacking off on his part, he reflected: the fact was, events would be read as things he had allowed to take place.

A very small voice in his head whispered that the only way out would be to argue that this travesty should be blamed on his predecessor's dispositions. Certainly any political advisor would counsel it. But the better part of him argued strongly against that track, as did the rational part that reminded him of the woman he now recognised as Fujino's agent, Suou Himemiya. Any spin he might produce would be very easily spun around by her. So no, unfortunately, nothing for it but to brazen it out when the time came for accounting. If only he could come up with some counterweight, some virtue fished up from this muddle...

A great victory would do it .

Yes, that was a thought, was it not? The more Takeda mulled it over, the more he knew it would be the saving of him, perhaps even bringing more reward in its train. Only, how to manage it before Hime sent more legions? For Hime would send another to replace him, that much he knew, and he would be sent home in disgrace after that, as impotent, as flaccid as a boy of tragic inexperience beaten off by a better man. Painful!

"How long would it take, you think, for more of your people to arrive?" he asked one of the Otomeians before him, who were some of the leaders of the new arrivals. "And how many?"

The female he was facing directly squinted-an act he marked because Natsuki did it often. Perhaps it was their people's habit?

"Some weeks, a month at most," she answered. "Apologies, but I am less certain of the numbers. If the King summons the nearest army in Sura-"

"Sura?"

"Our sister citadel to the northeast," she explained. "We came from there when we reached Otomeia and received the summons to join you."

"And how large is the army there?"

She exchanged a look with one of her confederates.

"In itself, only ten thousand," she said. "But the neighbouring valleys and plains under its administration also have soldiers. So the existing total would be somewhere around thirty."

Takeda's dark face lit up, was transformed by a wide smile. Ushida had walked up by now and was listening.

"Oh, good!" Takeda told them. "Well, we'll be in good state as soon as those get here. That thirty thousand will do until we can get more. There are more in your other territories, right?"

The woman blinked.

"Commander," she said, seeming reluctant. "I do not think our King can send all of those thirty thousand. Sura is surrounded by certain bands and tribes who constantly assault and raid parts of it. The most the King would send is maybe half the total number."

The smile left Takeda.

" The King had better do better than that," Ushida growled beside him, upper lip curling. "If he doesn't send them all, then he might end up pissing himself over your main citadel, which will be lost to the Mentulae!"

The general stopped him with a hand, displeased too but afraid they would lose their only allies in this war if this conversation kept up in the same vein.

"What my senior legate is saying is that we need all the men we can get right now," Takeda told the Otomeian nobles, whose faces were no longer as open as before, nor half as warm. "For the sake of Otomeia as well as Hime. It's both our interests threatened, I'd hope you to know. King Kruger seems to understand that-he sent you so quickly."

He cast his eyes wildly about and spotted Suou, to his relief. He called her over.

She walked up with Otanara and Natsuki in tow, then addressed the female Otomeian to whom Takeda had been speaking.

"Otanara-san tells me I should speak to you about choosing people for the added troopers," she told the rather crusty-looking woman-now what had Takeda or Ushida said to make her so distrustful? "Might I have a word after you finish your talk here?"

The Otomeian shot a glance flat as ice at Takeda, who sighed.

"We're done," he told Suou.

"Excellent!"

She began to explain what she wanted to the woman as the commander and senior legate headed back into the tent. Meanwhile, behind Suou, Otanara had sidled up to Natsuki and was requesting to speak with her.

"Go ahead, please," said Suou when informed, guessing this was to be a private dialogue. "I shall meet you in our quarters, Natsuki."

The two Otomeians walked away. Their pace was restrained as they moved through the camp because the place was choked with activity from the newcomers settling in. Only when they were outside Natsuki's billet did Otanara open his mouth, as well as his bag, from which he retrieved a scroll cylinder.

"Alyssa entrusted me to give this to you," said Otanara, handing his companion the light tube. A very short letter was inside, Natsuki thought, fingers taking a tactile measure of the object.

"She regrets she could not give you her regards in person," the man said. "Your health, Natsuki?"

His eyes were on the staff she was using as a prop; they strayed to her leg, still conspicuously bandaged.

"Well," she said curtly. "My cousin?"

He tried to stifle his smile. "Well. And worried."

She had to stifle her smile too. Of course Alyssa would worry about her. The woman was almost an older sister where Natsuki was concerned. No doubt that related to why Otanara had asked to speak with her today, she mused, wondering what message Alyssa had deemed worthy of sending him to convey. Otanara was one of her cousin's most trusted subordinates, and whenever her cousin sent those on a personal errand, Natsuki knew there was something of great significance to be done. Curious that Alyssa had not been content to just put the message in the letter just handed to her.

She shifted a little more weight onto her staff and cocked her head.

"The King?" she enquired.

"The same."

"Hm."

A brief pause. Otanara grunted deep in his throat, uncomfortable with the next task he had to discharge. Natsuki knew his mannerisms, and thus bade him take a seat inside the tented structure she occupied with Suou.

His eyes flashed very quickly over the living arrangements first, and her lips tightened as she understood the reason for his survey.

"His Majesty and the Princess Alyssa both asked that I enquire after you," he began.

"You have," she snapped, still irked.

His breath dragged. The prominent thyroid cartilage on his neck bobbed as she watched it with childish interest, looking but not intending to look like an animal about to lunge for his jugular.

"And they are both... distraught over your situation," Otanara told this innocent predator. "A bad situation, Natsuki, if you'll pardon me saying it. This isn't how they imagined you spending your stay with the foreigners. Your injury too added to their worries when they learned of it. The circumstances don't look very well."

She said nothing.

"If it were possible to recall you to the safety of the capital, it would've been done," he proceeded. "But it isn't right now, as you know. So I've been tasked to ensure your health as far as possible in this position we're occupying. I'm to tell you too not to enter any battles for now," he said, sounding sorry even as he spoke the chief point of his communication. "Of course, you're still the head of your division. Nothing can change that. But you're asked not to lead it into battle, for the time being. That is, until the situation proves better, and your own health has recovered. This is to keep you safe until such time as the circumstances improve, naturally, and not to demote you or remove your leadership over your men. They would undoubtedly rest easier too if they knew their leader was safe-just as His Highness and the Princess Alyssa would feel easier if they knew your health was being cared for."

Her eyes moved off to the side as she cut him off.

"My health is being seen to satisfactorily," she enunciated, sounding annoyed.

"I was only ordered, Princess," Otanara apologised. Her weird gaze returned at the plea in his voice and he found his guard rising because of it. Otanara was like the rest of the Otomeians, used to the yellows and blues of their kind. So he had always found Natsuki disturbing because, though her skin was as white as theirs, she just seemed so dark .

"The origin of the order?" the dark one probed.

Now was that not the key question, Otanara grimaced. He should have known better than to pray she would not ask it: Natsuki was very far from dumb, and no amount of prayer or wordplay on his part could push her into assuming what he would have wanted her to assume. How much easier this would be had she been thicker! Alyssa would be displeased with him if he did not lie now, he knew, but she would still understand: whereas there would be hell to pay from other quarters if he did make up some fiction for the purpose. So he winced while answering, but did not lie.

"The Princess Alyssa."

"Not," she said, "His Majesty?"

"No," he admitted.

Her lips tugged upwards. Which he took to mean that the order was practically moot where she was concerned. Loyalty to his commander asserted itself as Otanara attempted to persuade Natsuki to heed the order-which, he said slyly, was actually a gentle plea, a concerned request from her royal cousin.

"It's only that she's so worried," he said to the girl before him, who listened to his arguments in that way she had made her own: unmoving yet crackling with caution, fantastic eyes translucent yet unreadable. "Even more when she found out from Shura that, despite your injury, you had to go to battle because of the low manpower. She said that His Majesty voiced worry too over you. You've the King's and your cousin's love, Natsuki. So also their concern."

She stirred.

"They have mine," she said with faint dismissal, flicking her hair with one hand. "I know what you say. There is no need to say it."

"For the sake of my hide, I thought it better to," he countered, looking wistful. "I was entrusted to convey the message. But you know what that means with Alyssa."

She nodded. With Alyssa, carrying a message meant seeing it carried out too.

"So I hope you can understand my position as a mere messenger," he told her.

Her head moved very slightly; the nostrils on either side of the small nose flared.

"I said before," she snarled. "I know what you say. You think me thoughtless?"

He got to his feet.

"Please forgive my rudeness," he said, beginning a genuflection.

She asked him to return to his seat before he could complete the gesture, shaking her head. He acquiesced smoothly, though his brow remained pleated with tension as he eyed her.

"You too," she said to him once he was seated, "are worried, Otanara."

She had the small smile about her lips as she said it, and it helped Otanara relax. He held his peace, however, as she held up her hand to indicate she was thinking.

Finally she decided.

"Done," she told him.

His features lightened. "You agree?"

"Mm," she murmured. "Insofar as circumstances permit it."

Otanara knew that was the most he could hope to get and got up again.

"Thank you very much, Princess," he said, bowing before walking out of the tent. "Your cousin would be relieved if she knew it. And if I can say so, I'm pleased that I will be fighting with you again."

She threw him a twisted smile, her eyes full of defiance.

"Fight with me?" she repeated. "Not so what you asked of me, Otanara."

She dismissed him before he could apologise again.

The letter from Alyssa, she discovered, was also much as she had expected: a promise to reunite with her soon, combined with an injunction to keep herself in good health and do as Otanara had requested. Short and precise, every word printed out in that clear, sharp hand she knew to be Alyssa's. A little sharper than usual, she assessed, guessing that it was because the older woman had been in a rush while writing it. That was one more reason to appreciate the note, in fact, since Alyssa had obviously taken what little time she had to spare to write it.

Natsuki nodded to herself and rolled up the paper to return to its canister.

Thoughtless.

She frowned and repeated the word in her mind: a rebuke. Why had she not thought of Alyssa, she wondered. It might be because it had been so long since last she had seen her cousin-and so many things had happened during that time that had stripped most other considerations from Natsuki's mind. Still, she should have thought of Alyssa. It was not like her to fail in such considerations and Alyssa was important enough to her to merit consideration. Again she berated herself, wondering if her cousin had heard the news of her affair yet. Yes, chances were tilted very heavily to the affirmative. The soldiers would have talked and Alyssa would have heard. In the absence of further information, it was safer to continue her thoughts under the premise Alyssa knew already. And what had she thought of it, that fiercely Otomeian, wildly patriotic woman? Ah, the chances tilted heavily one way too, here. Natsuki could take an intelligent guess.

She got up from her seat with a huff and walked to her bed, irritated by the sound of the staff but not diverted by it. Her teeth rounded on one lip as she lowered herself to sit on the edge of her cot.

Another judge.

But what was another one of those, even so? Best resign herself to the fact: her people would talk about her liaison with Shizuru for a long time; neither of them had done much to keep it secret. Human nature that tongues would wag. Still, Alyssa was not just another human. She was a relative who happened to be a friend. And her disapproval, while not something that could sway Natsuki from a decision, was nonetheless another bruise on Natsuki's already overloaded back.

Not many things were going very well for Natsuki these days. She was part of what she considered a germinating military debacle, she had to put up with people's judgments over her unlikely affair with Shizuru, and she did not feel very well. The traitor in her belly was still refusing to cooperate completely, although she did fare better than before because of the prescribed regimen she had taken to eating. As for her leg, it was still sore-the surgeons swore they could find no rot in it, yet it refused to fully heal. Thus the reason Alyssa had not really needed to charge Otanara with ensuring she not enter battle: she was forbidden entry to it already by the Himean surgeons, with the connivance of her Himean friend. If she stops moving about so much, it should heal perfectly, they said. If she stops forcing the blood by riding her horse, it should heal perfectly, they said. If she stops eating anything sweet for a while, it should heal perfectly- and so on, and so forth, they said. Had she been inclined to disputing with them in their speciality, she might have told them that the only things she could begin to taste or keep down these days were all sweet, so that last injunction might actually make her worse by leaving her starved. As it was, someone kindly argued the point for her and they conceded that a bit of honey in her food would not do too much harm.

"I should say it can't do too much harm," Suou had told them, drawling the way Natsuki learned she did whenever she was disgusted. "Although it certainly is a thought that death by starvation would dry out that thing faster than anything else that seems to have been presented. A most progressive style of medicine."

Suou was amusing whenever she turned sarcastic, Natsuki assessed.

Still, she found amusements were growing increasingly rare. All she seemed to hear of late was a litany of ill events, and people always going on about them. There was always so much talk, and very little of it pleasant or reassuring. Always a voice saying this was going wrong, someone saying this was not working fine. How could that not make her wish just a little to hear the one voice that made anything better, the one that used to tell her everything would be all right?

"You look a storm," said a voice, not the voice she needed.

Natsuki blinked, hastened to shutter her heart.

"Suou," she said, greeting her friend by name. The screw of her lips loosened as she thought on the woman's words. "I... look a storm?"

The Himean drew up a stool to face her.

"You generally do, Natsuki," she said, smiling an apology for having voiced the observation. "With varying degrees of thunder. What happened for you to be so bothered, though?" She indicated Natsuki's leg, hanging over the edge of the bed. "And wouldn't it be better to put that up?"

She threw an arm behind her and dragged a chair close. Natsuki put her leg on it with a sigh.

"That bad?" Suou asked, still giving her that disarmingly attractive smile. "Or is it something about which you would rather not talk? Gods forbid I intrude upon Otomeian politics, lest I have to suffer more of that !"

The younger woman was intrigued by the remark.

"It hasn't escaped me that quite a few of the newcomers are giving me long looks," Suou explained, seeming very tickled. "Rather as though I were suspected of some transgression or other-and though I'm certainly no paragon of virtue, neither am I guilty of anything yet so large that half of your Otomeian fellows seem to know of it. What in the world did I do, you think?"

And then she saw that Natsuki had the answer. No part of the girl moved, but it was there in the half-lidded eyes: a shot of shame, secret and sensitive.

"Nothing," Natsuki admitted heavily, after some seconds. "You did... nothing."

"I'm definitely relieved to hear that." The Himean paused. "But you know what gnat is flying in their minds, don't you?"

It took a while, but she eventually got a nod.

"May I know what it is?" she prodded. "Or is it something you would rather not tell?"

Natsuki drew a breath and raised a hand, waving it in that masterfully spare, faintly tired way Suou imagined she did whenever she was dismissing someone in her noble function. An aristocrat down to the marrow, the snooty imp! She and Shizuru were made for each other.

"Better I tell," Natsuki ruled.

Suou waited.

"You did nothing," the girl said once more. "But it is that they..."

She trailed off as though she would not continue, but disproved the impression the next instant.

"They wonder," she concluded.

The Himean's brow creased as she thought about that.

"They wonder?" she echoed. "About what?"

Natsuki dropped her eyes.

"That we - we stay together."

Suou's eyebrows shot up as she caught it.

"Malicious old villains!" she blew out, mixing the exclamation with a laugh. "Do they actually wonder about that ? Ye gods, Natsuki, but your own people must not know you very well!"

Natsuki was grim.

"They know," she started, face turning red as she tried to finish it.
"By now they know oh-oh-of-hhh-"

Suou waited for her to clear the obstacle, face betraying nothing at all. Just another reason Natsuki liked the Himean: she actually waited without making it seem like she was waiting whenever Natsuki's tongue seized up.

She finally pushed through it: "Of Shizuru!"

Natsuki gasped at the effort that had taken, both ears flying scarlet flags.

"I think because of that," she went on slowly. "So... they wonder."

Suou shook her head.

"This shows they don't know Shizuru-san either," she mused. "Had they met her, they would know exactly where I and all others are compelled to draw the line."

She wriggled both her eyebrows at the girl.

"Don't take this the wrong way, I beg," she grinned. "I like you very much for what you are, dear Natsuki, but I also happen to very much like living."

Finally the pink lips trembled into a smile.

"You always..." Natsuki frowned and searched her mind for the words. "Always you make it seem she is so lethal, Suou."

Suou accepted that with a nod.

"Because she is," she affirmed. "The only reason you have leeway to doubt that is your impunity. The rest of us, however, are not blessed with the same exemption. Needs must tread carefully. You should be aware of this, your impunity notwithstanding."

The girl lifted an eyebrow.

"I take the warning," she said archly, drawing a laugh.

Suou asked if she could see the bindings on both sides of Natsuki's leg and the girl acquiesced. For a while no more words were spoken as the Himean did her inspection.

"Shall it trouble you?" she asked while signalling that the girl could put her leg back.

Natsuki took her meaning perfectly.

"No," she said with decision. "They only wonder."

"The imagination paired with the whisper may breed troublesome things sometimes," Suou retorted. "Witness how many innocuous and perfectly earthbound things crop up as the new Lamia! Can nothing be done? I would rather you stay here with me, of course, since I'd not have anyone to complain to when the rest get on my nerves-" The two of them laughed. "-but I wouldn't have you uncomfortable either."

But the Otomeian smiled and denied the offer.

"All right," she said, her voice telling Suou she wished to have an end of the subject. The Himean thanked her and dutifully broached a new topic.

"The one who has gone to perform interceptions at the bridge," she started.

Natsuki said the name. "Princess Alyssa."

"Just so. Tell me about her."

But the cut-glass eyes squinted sharply, as if to say that was too general a question. Suou sighed inwardly and supposed Natsuki was right.

"What is she like?" she elaborated. "As far as our purposes would go, would you call her capable? This is just between us, so please bring out your excellent objectivity here, Natsuki. I need to know where we stand with that woman, especially as she is the one carrying out a task so vital to our survival. Is she competent enough to hold that place with the numbers Otanara-san quoted to us earlier?"

Natsuki's brows drew together.

"Competent?" she snorted mildly, seeming amused. "She is competent. Very."

She continued in Greek.

"My cousin is a skilled warrior... but there is more to that, if such is what you ask. She is a warrior with a mind. And a tongue."

"Ah. A leader?"

Natsuki answered positively.

"And," she added, "she is most ambitious."

Again the tiny narrowing of the eyes, relaxing to their normal width in a flash. No doubt that mind processes at the same pace, if not faster! Suou thought to herself, enjoying the wisely calculating expression on the young countenance. She did not know yet why Natsuki saw fit to mention the Princess Alyssa's ambition, but she trusted there was a reason to it, so she did not interrupt.

"Many will say she is dangerously ambitious," Natsuki was saying very quietly. "I say she has the - ah - the right to be so. Such people are often found dangerous."

"Does that trouble her?"

"No. She provides for it always. She is such a person."

Suou hummed, hearing the faint note of admiration in the girl's words and filing it away in her mind.

"It is so in my mind, but it is also so that I may be wrong," Natsuki disclaimed.

The icy eyes stared at her with great interest.

"A little like Shizuru-san, then?" Suou suggested.

Natsuki hissed a sharp breath.

"A little like," Natsuki granted, seeming disturbed by that comparison. "And also unlike."

Suou urged her to say more.

The Otomeian frowned. "Shizuru is - she is not such as one thinks a naive person, yes?"

"Hardly!"

"But one does not call her suspicious either."

"Aah, now I understand."

Suou uncrossed and recrossed her legs, drumming the fingers of one hand on the edge of her seat.

"One would call the Princess Alyssa suspicious, then?" she asked.

"Mmm." Natsuki's eyes slid away for an instant. "Especially of - um - that she considers external."

The patrician smiled.

"You mean of the foreign," she clarified, drawing the tiniest of wincing from the girl.

"That is one such thing, yes." Natsuki caught herself and amended: "There are many things one would call foreign. So, yes."

She scowled all of a sudden, apparently finding something requiring a qualifier in her own words.

"She is not a fool," she insisted, looking Suou in the eyes to show her certainty in the evaluation. "Not blind, her suspicion. You asked if she is like Shizuru and I spoke of her suspicion. But it is so that her wariness is obligatory. For her aims and in our world, as well as the greater world, which is also yours."

Suou said she understood that pertinent circumstances could develop and reinforce such attitudes.

"So it may be that she is more like - like Shizuru, considered so," Natsuki determined. "But she is not, in my mind, as... provisional on her knowledge."

The Himean smiled and asked precisely she meant by that.

"Precisely," Natsuki said, "that Princess Alyssa does not revise her foundations as often as Shizuru does."

Suou succumbed to a chuckle, intensely amused by the scholarship of that answer.

"I see," she said, once she was sure the chuckle could not mutate into a laugh. "And she has a great deal of clout amongst your people, it was implied?"

"More and more, yes."

"And how does the King feel about her?"

"He favours her."

"Dear, dear. That rather puts the point on it, does it not?"

Suou hummed and swayed a little on her stool, looking nothing but her usual self: a woman cool as the most perfect ice. The Otomeian knew Suou, however, and knew Suou would soon voice the question that was most significant.

"Shall we find her difficult, Natsuki?"

The girl did not hesitate: "Yes."

Suou smiled.

"Interesting," she murmured. She got to her feet languidly and walked towards her desk, the green eyes trailing curiously after her.

"I take your warning too, Natsuki," she said, reaching for some paper.

---

Shizuru went to the comitia centuriata the morning after the Senate gave her its refusals. To her pleasure, the Centuries repaid her trust: from the first meeting to the last, the knights made it clear they were willing to grant Shizuru all that she asked. Comitia to comitia, through the requisite seventeen days between a law's introduction and its passage, the House could do little but watch with horror as the equestrian powers tweaked senatorial noses. At the end, it was the Senate who was the loser and Shizuru Fujino taking the prize.

The bill returning her northern command was exhaustive, having been officially drafted to exquisite precision by Chikane Himemiya and, unofficially, by herself. Two of the greatest legal minds ever seen in Hime made for watertight legislation, so much was acknowledged. The pair included Sergay Wang's recommendations—much to Sergay Wang's annoyance—along with the amendments suggested by Chikane in that same session. Shizuru would have her proconsular imperium, giving her the highest authority of all the officials present in the Himean North. She had a mandate for annexing the current Mentulaean Empire, and it would extend for five years from the date of ratification, to be reviewed after that deadline and extended if needed. Most importantly of all, the bill included a clause that forbade discussion of her governorship prior to the expiration of the five-year term. Thus Shizuru would have at least five years of perfectly secure command in the north, without fear of anyone trying to introduce a contrary law stripping it from her all over again.

Ten legions would be the official minimum, with the Ninth, Eleventh, and Fourteenth included in the count. That the Eighth and Seventh were not counted, although they were already in the northlands, was because they were technically still under the generalship of Takeda Masashi, who would have the option of turning them over to Shizuru once she arrived. Shizuru intended to make that option nonnegotiable for him, of course, since she wanted both legions back. She and everyone else in Fuuka did not yet know what had happened to the Eighth.

The Treasury was directed to pay out the stipulated funds for ten legions for ten months immediately, which meant as soon as the concerned commander managed to hound the ever-reluctant clerks of the Treasury enough into digging into the state coffers for the portion. This commander proved the worst thus far, at least where the Treasury was concerned. She actually showed up in their offices in the basement of the Temple of Saturn the same afternoon that she got her mandate.

"Shizuru Fujino, formerly praetor urbanus elect, currently acting praetor and now proconsular governor-general of the North Territories," she announced, breezing into the room in her usual style. "Good day to everyone. May I know who is in charge?"

The surprised clerks gaped, stared at her with the eyes of those used to being in the gloom all their lives and suddenly visited by a star no dimmer than the sun. Shizuru scanned the room swiftly and noted the smells first of all: dust and old paper and that distinctive metallic tang that meant gold and silver. Smaller than I expected, she thought, inwardly sighing at the staleness of the odours. The Treasury clerks were cooped up, and Shizuru could see that the bar-grilled openings on the walls were hardly sufficient for light. Day it was, outside, but every table's lamp was already lit. And oh- that was so familiar-witness the regulation accountant's clutter!

"I am," said a grey-haired woman, getting up from her seat at a table nearby. "Sumire Hisaka at your service, Fujino-san."

Shizuru unfurled the fat scroll in her hand and explained briefly the terms of her command.

"You shall be receiving notification presently," she said. "As for my purpose here, it is to inform you that I shall be leaving presently as well. Therefore, I shall expect the papers to be done by tomorrow at the latest. The sum should be in the usual scrip, save for ten percent in cash, also by tomorrow. The ten percent should be in golden and silver denarii or talent sows, all stamped by Treasury seal. I shall accept no foreign coin," she stipulated, knowing that, even if weight and metal value were technically equivalent, the utility value was actually lower on foreign moneys given that a random shift in the political sphere could make a foreign coin harder to move all of a sudden. "Take note that part of the bill legislating my command included a pay raise for the legions. The raise was fixed today in the ratified bill as exactly double the present one."

Sumire choked. " Double ?"

"Exactly double."

"Ecastor!"

Shizuru went on.

"Hence the total should be costed out with that in mind. As I said, the notification should be here any moment." The corners of her lips turned up faintly as she thought of how the wage hike provision had seen the senators practically apoplectic. Now that had been nice !

"Please expect a visit tomorrow morning from my senior legate, Shizuma Hanazono, accompanied by my praefectus fabrum, Takumi Tokiha. My thanks for your work and good day again to all of you."

She left the tribunii aerarii all a little short of breath after that.

The clerks of the Treasury were not the only ones gasping. Most of the Senate was in a daze after Shizuru's victory in the comitia, feeling an outrage so strong it held them paralysed. A couple of the more daring plebeians (though no tribunes of the plebs: all of those pleaded ill that day) had even run to the rostra and tried to call a meeting. These were ignored, which was just as well for their bodily health given the current strength of Urumi's gangs. Other archconservatives met for the eighteenth consecutive time in a council, but were all so depressed that they did little save hurl aspersions on their foes and wine down their gullets, compounding their depression with roaring hangovers. By far the most miserable, however, was the one member of the Traditionalists who never drank enough to get drunk. As she tried to explain to her boon companion, who had taken this latest defeat terribly as well: Haruka Armitage had gone to the bottle.

"I know, Haruka-chan," Yukino told the half-insensible woman mumbling on the other couch. Only the two of them were in Haruka's dingy old atrium, so no one else could tattle about the champion of Stoic restraint getting dead-drunk. This was Haruka's best-kept secret, and one she shared only with Yukino: on all the worst occasions in Haruka's life, the famed teetotaler emulated her late, alcoholic father and drowned the sorrows in liquor. Yukino had been present to see it all four times before, so she knew exactly how to handle the woman in such a state. Though that did not make it any less painful for her to watch whenever Haruka took these headlong dives off the wagon.

"The worst of it," Yukino groaned, "is that we had the choice. That's what she was trying to prove, I think."

A senseless mutter from Haruka.

"I mean she was showing that she offered us the choice of giving her that command first before she took it to the Centuries-that we could've kept the senatorial power over commands instead of losing a little more of our power to the comitia," Yukino explained, even while knowing the other was not actually listening to her. "I think - I think she was saying we could have stopped that by just letting her have what she wanted, Haruka-chan. Do you think that's what it was? I have this awful feeling we made a mistake there. Tell me we didn't, Haruka-chan. Tell me we couldn't have given in to her, no matter what."

But Haruka had no comfort to give, floating away as she was in her private sea. In other Traditionalist homes, similar scenes of misery were present, from a drained Sergay obsessively reading the newly-passed bill for the fifth time in an attempt to find a loophole that did not exist, to a prostrate Nakao weeping tears of frustration into his exquisite bed-sheet of Egyptian linen. And many of the other senators, including those not allied to the conservatives as well as some who had been on Shizuru's side, shivered in indignation that a fellow senator had actively conspired to take away yet another from the diminishing number of exclusively senatorial powers, therefore betraying all of their kind.

The triumphant Shizuru did not stay to gloat at any of this, however. The same day the Centuries granted her the command, she announced that she would depart two days after, because no time could be wasted. True to her word, she mustered the Fourteenth in the Campus Martius right on schedule.

"Make your own departure two weeks from now, Shizuma-earlier if possible," she said to her cousin, who would handle all offices and further recruitment in Fuuka on her behalf. "Head for Argus and set up base there. I know not when I shall call on you, but ensure you are there within two weeks of my passage. The next two legions you can equip, send them ahead under Kenji-han."

"To Argus too?"

"Yes."

Shizuma was quick. "You wish me to do that for every two legions I put together afterwards, I suppose, with me heading the last pair?"

"With the choice of subsequent commanding legates up to your discretion." She did a swift scan of the scrolls on Shizuma's desk and purred. "Given how recruitment is proceeding, I imagine you should have all seven legions far ahead of the deadline."

"This keeps up, I might have the whole ten," Shizuma smiled.

"If they come, take them."

Up shot a silvery eyebrow.

"Ten was just the minimum, was it not?" said the younger woman.

"You'll have a time squeezing the Senate for funds if you do get more, you know," Shizuma warned.

"So let us send King Obsidian the bill instead." She nodded and whipped to leave before her legate could say any more. "I need you in two weeks, cousin! If not earlier."

And then she was gone, leaving Shizuma to turn a wry smile to her new assistant.

"Our general, the slave-driver," she sighed.

The young lady sitting at the other desk-also cluttered with work-leaned both elbows on a sheet of paper and laughed.

"I like her," the tribune avowed.

Shizuma rolled her eyes humorously.

"Youth is irrepressible!" she returned. "I suppose I should just be glad it doesn't daunt you to know what kind of work she expects."

The other woman gave her a shy smile.

"I was warned," she reminded Shizuma.

"True," Shizuma replied, deadpan. "You were."

This young woman Shizuma had taken as her assistant had been thoroughly informed by the senior legate as to what duties would be expected of her, as well as the quality of work required in the execution of those duties. Shizuma herself had made the appointment... and if it had to be admitted that she had not made her choice out of actual assessment in terms of competence, it was nonetheless a fact that the girl she chose proved surprisingly easy to work with: keen to learn because she cared about pleasing her superior, endowed with an unquenchable good humour that had Shizuma smiling most of the time. Of course, Shizuma had other reasons for smiling in her assistant's presence. After all, said assistant happened to be the name Shizuma's cousin had put on her tribunician list just to gratify Shizuma's urge for retribution.

"Still, I find it a little, well, a kind of surprise," the young woman was telling her.

Shizuma smirked at the redhead, beloved niece of the despised Noboru. Little red fox, caught in the trap. A second glance prompted her to amend the thought: little auburn fox, rather.

"A kind of surprise that Shizuru's so efficient, Nagisa-chan?" she baited.

"No!" A hand came up to cover the tribune's mouth; Nagisa flushed brightly. "I'm so sorry-I wasn't thinking. That's really not what I meant at all!"

"I understand," Shizuma said, to stop the flutters. "My cousin is very debonair socially, but to see her suddenly be so crisp is usually a shock to those who have never campaigned with her. That includes myself, take note."

The younger woman looked relieved at this explanation.

"I've never seen anyone go so fast," she eventually confessed, sounding awed. "Like the other day, when she was talking about the arrangements she wanted for the groups of-no, sorry, I mean cohorts." There was embarrassed laughter. "Sorry. I hope I get used to these terms soon!"

Shizuma grinned.

"A little more time here and you shall," she told the young woman. "Go on, what were you saying?"

"Well," Nagisa said, resting an elbow on the table and propping up her chin on one hand. "Fujino-san just sort of... breezed through it all, didn't she? It was all so detailed, I know-I can't even remember half of everything she specified then. But she just rattled it out like it had always been there, in her head."

"Most of the time, it is that."

"Mm-hm." The tribune nodded fervently. "But most of it seems so new, I think, that it's still amazing." She seemed to remember something and hurriedly added: "The other tribunes tell me too that they're new... a lot of the things Fujino-san wants to be done, I mean."

The senior legate only hummed, knowing that her enthusiastic young assistant would run on by herself if permitted.

"I think they do make sense," Nagisa admitted, her brow creasing in thought. "Most of them are really practical changes, and I see why Fujino-san would want them. Although, well..."

Shizuma put on her curious face.

"What is it?" she prodded. "If there is aught that troubles, you know you may and should ask me, Nagisa." Her voice softened, flowed into its most swaying register: "You should ask me anytime."

It worked.

"Well, I get most of the other things," said the younger woman. "But... but why does the commander want the, um, octets to be fixed like that?"

"You mean, ensuring that there is at least one member of each who can read, write, and do figures?"

"Yes. I mean, it's so much work added on and for wha-"

A sudden stop, as she had just realised to whom she was speaking. Another dangerous woman, her uncle and aunt had warned, and all the more dangerous because Shizuma Hanazono and her cousin liked each other. Nagisa slapped herself several times in her mind, distraught at her own recklessness. But it was so hard to remember all those injunctions of caution when she faced the senior legate, who proved far nicer and more likeable than she had thought to prepare for. And so unbelievably attractive! The senior legate's looks played havoc with the tongue, sometimes tying Nagisa's into knots, sometimes loosening it until it spilled all sorts of things it should not. As in the present situation.

"Oh, say it already, Nagisa!" the older woman abruptly chuckled, interrupting her thoughts. "It shall do you more good than keeping it in your head to fester."

Nagisa sighed and knew she was caught.

"Sorry..." she said, looking sheepish. "It's just a thought, Shizuma-sama."

"Shizuma- san ."

Nagisa shrank.

"I'm probably wrong," she uttered.

"Say it and let us find out if you are."

Nagisa gave up.

"Won't it be too troublesome having to find out who can do that and then distributing them across the octets in every century?" she asked, looking very awkward and unsure.

The senior legate stretched her legs under the table so that they poked out through the front. Nagisa looked and noted how far beyond the edge they stretched out. What legs the senior legate had! But she reminded herself she had no call to be surprised, given that the commander too was of an amazing height. The cousins were impressive women.

"As it turns out, you are not wrong," the senior legate was telling her wryly. "That directive shall be a headache to implement. But I have to admit it also has Shizuru's usual good sense speaking in its favour. As you heard earlier, we expect to have a great more recruits signing up soon, which will include not just those who have already been in the legions, but also those who have come from other walks of life. Including many members of the Head Count. And though many of the old-style generals in Hime still disdain to use Head Count recruits-they could afford it back then, being that we haven't had a war requiring an army this size in ages-my cousin does not. Not just because refusing them would mean fewer soldiers, but because she has always been one of the strongest voices in the House when it comes to using the Head Count in the legions. And why not? Only a fool would fail to see that the army is one of the only ways the Head Count can be useful to Hime, which gives them free grain and games for nothing. This way, the exchange is more balanced. Besides, the Head Count soldiers might even make enough money from a good campaign to get out of their Head Count status. And can anyone rightly argue against such an opportunity for the people, when supporting it can only be positive and patriotic?"

Nagisa flushed, having heard many a speech from her relatives to the opposite effect. Both her mother's and father's families were heavily conservative and looked on the Head Count as an utterly worthless-if inescapable-leech upon Hime's body.

"So, it is to be expected that a huge part of the legions we put together shall be Head Count recruits," Shizuma continued. "My cousin and I actually discussed this beforehand, and this was when she told me of her scheme for the selection of octets. There is at least one literate and numerate man in each octet because he shall be tasked with teaching all the other members of the group basic letters and numbers. In exchange, the other members of the octet carry his things for him and take over some of his chores. Seniority privileges, in other words, shall be the payment for his tuition of the others."

The tribune blinked in astonishment.

"I guess I'm going to sound stupid here, Shizuma-san," she said with only a bit of reluctance. "But what does literacy and numeracy matter to the soldiers? I'd have thought they only needed to listen to their officers and fight."

She stopped abruptly again and looked frantically apologetic.

"I'm sorry, but I thought I'd better ask now because I don't understand," she added. "I'm so sorry I'm so dull!"

There was a low, rather thrillingly throaty laugh from the senior legate's desk.

"It argues against that self-indictment that you had sufficient gumption to ask, actually," Shizuma told the younger woman. "The answer is quite practical. Our general dislikes the idea of having troops who cannot read a simple note for themselves because, in a pinch, that could spell the difference between victory and defeat by miscommunication. As for numeracy, she also believes that every soldier should be able to calculate his booty share and wage sums himself, so that he can not only avoid being cheated, but also know that he is not being cheated. Part of the skill in keeping the legionaries happy is ensuring they have the ability to see for themselves that they are being treated well, Nagisa."

Nagisa's mouth was open by the time she finished.

"I didn't think of that!" the young woman gasped. "That's amazing!"

Shizuma chuckled into her hand.

"Many of the things Shizuru thinks of are," she agreed. "So even though I predict we shall end up going demented in the process of acting out her orders, I find her commands are yet for the best, no matter how difficult or downright mad they sound. My cousin doesn't ask us to move mountains without knowing what she's about."

"She's so... so amazing," the tribune repeated, still dwelling on the earlier discussion. "And I think - I think she's actually very kind."

"But still an autocrat when wearing the general's cape." Which she actually wears all the time, little though people know it!

At least her cousin was the best kind of autocrat, Shizuma mused, having identified Shizuru's style now. Unwilling to brook dissent, as all autocrats, but undeniably brilliant enough to justify that dictatorship. And she delegated you into a job while making you feel you were the only one capable of doing it, which was why she was making you-and no one else-do it in the first place. Applying the smooth pressure of trust instead of rough authority on your head. If Shizuru was not the best kind of autocrat, she was at least the most bearable one.

She was just so efficient, marvelled the cousin who had known her to be so, but had never seen that efficiency in full swing before. It had been a long time since Shizuma's last stint in the military, but she knew she had never been in a campaign where everything was done with such speed and decision. Shizuru's ruthless competence was clearly what made her such a prized general. No wonder the volunteers kept signing up in droves! Even those officials with ties to the conservatives were trying to angle a position for some relative or other-under pretext of keeping an eye on Shizuru, the cynical senior legate thought, but really just so they could be in on the rewards when her cousin had done. On that score no one could doubt: with Shizuru Fujino in the command tent, there would be rewards. And no matter how opposed the conservatives were to Shizuru on principle, they would not let that get in the way of getting a piece of the pie.

It serves my purposes fair enough, she thought with a furtive glance at her assistant-who, she knew with enjoyment, often shot her furtive glances as well. She knew that Nagisa Aoi was one of those who had been permitted by their parents, despite political inclinations to the contrary, to serve in the campaign in search of career and financial advancement. Shizuru Fujino's second northern campaign was already becoming known as the most hotly-contested posting in years, and those not asked for by name were already doing the asking. With the commander already off to the north and finished with her list, all those remaining positions were now Shizuma's to hand out... which made the new senior legate feel like the cat about to plunge in a lake of cream.

Her assistant would come first of all, however. Revenge was higher on Shizuma's list than petty diversions.

"Have you the contracts from the artificers there?" she asked, making sure to keep her eyes on her own table.

"Artificers, artificers... let me see. Yes, I do." Nagisa was already up from her seat, brandishing the papers in question. So eager! "Would you like them?"

"Yes, please."

She waited for Nagisa to approach her before looking up, then stared straight into eyes the colour of aged leather. How glad she had been to see her cousin's assurances truthful, the first time she had seen Nagisa: this conservative bud was no visual embarrassment at all! The girl had a mess of lovely brown hair that turned a rusty red under the sun, a pair of eyes the same colour, and naturally fair skin just recently tanned-not quite bronze, but getting there. A beauty wrapped up in a fur pelt, Shizuma called it, actually terrifically attracted because she had always liked beauties of rich colours, and reddish-brown was one of the richest colours in her estimation. Not for her the classical blondes of their world, particularly when she was so far into the blonde end of the spectrum herself.

She took the sheets from Nagisa and let her mouth spread into a smile, her perfect teeth showing-as the rest of her-impeccably white.

"Thank you, my dear."

Only when she looked away again did Nagisa seem to bestir herself and bow, fluttering back to her own table. Shizuma pretended not to notice, although she was already laughing inside: she had heard the girl's breath hitch audibly when they had looked each other in the eyes.

"Try to finish that stack today, Nagisa-chan," she said.

The tribune almost jumped. "Yes, I will."

Some hours went more or less this way, with the regular interruptions from other officers, when a clamour at the entrance alerted them that there was someone trying to brush past the soldier on guard.

"Oh, step aside, man!" came a familiar male voice, accompanied by an also-familiar female giggle. "They know me well enough, and so should you. I am the Princeps Senatus, for gods' sakes, not some unknown entity here to make trouble!"

Shizuma looked up. It was not the Princeps's head she saw first, however, but that of the female with him, whose giggle she had identified.

"Greetings, Shizuma-san," the President of the Plebeian Tribunate sang out. And seeing the other woman in the room, rushed into the room and towards her. "And Nagisa-san too! My, my!"

"Let them in!" Shizuma called to the guard, some country lad probably out of his depth. The Princeps seemed to be bearding him good-naturedly, from what she could hear. She returned her attention to the newcomer. "I didn't know you knew Nagisa-chan, Urumi-san."

"We met a few times in some social gatherings, back then," Urumi shrugged, already comfortably ensconced in the chair before Nagisa's desk. "Ages and ages back!"

"Just like everyone else in our world, I suppose," Shizuma replied. "Everyone has met everyone else... oh, once upon a time. But few remember."

"I would," Urumi smiled.

"Urumi-san is a genius," Nagisa giggled.

Urumi winked at her just as the Princeps walked into the room.

"Dear me," he said to them, his handsome face assuming an expression of mock-sadness. "I do believe that chap you have outside really had no idea who I am, Shizuma-san. It does humble the pride a little."

The silver-haired woman puffed.

"The reason I chose him," she explained. "Excellent judge of character."

"How cruel of you." Reito's eyebrows, thick and darkly lush, lifted in query. "I expected one particular character to be here, however. Shizuru-san?"

"I fear you missed her. She departed with the Fourteenth some hours ago."

The two visitors exchanged bewildered looks.

"Departed?" Urumi echoed.

"Without any announcement?" Reito demanded.

"As I recall, she announced it to all at the conclusion of the comitia two days ago," Shizuru's cousin reminded them.

"Ye gods!" Reito exclaimed, erupting into a laugh of sheer amazement. Inside, he was applauding. The woman really knew how to make good on her words, he thought, and had such a sly way of going about it too! No one had sent any notices at all that the legion in the Campus Martius had already departed, probably thinking their general was only moving them somewhere nearby or putting them through a few drills. No fuss, no public send-offs or hurrahs-the woman had just told them to pack up and march off. Oh, how this would have the senators standing stiff in shock again, once he put the word out!

"She actually did it," he murmured, looking over to his cousin. "How I love her!"

Shizuma tipped her head at them. "Was it urgent business that brought you two here? You might send a courier to ride after her if so."

But the Princeps waved a hand, his senatorial ring flashing a golden streak in the air.

"Ah, there is no need for the trouble, thank you. I merely wished to bid her goodbye before she left, as it seems we shall not see her for quite a while. What a pity I missed her! And what a pity that they shall not go by sea!"

Shizuma was puzzled. "Why?"

"It would have been such a neat reference." He looked wistful. "Shizuru Fujino going after a foreign Helen, the new face to launch a thousand ships."

His cousin laughed.

"And what else?" she said. "Shizuru-san and the Mentulaean king have a duel as the paragon of beauty perches atop the battlements, her golden hair aflame?"

Reito turned to her and frowned.

"What?" he said distractedly. "No, no-Helen must be dark-haired, Urumi."

" Dark ? Everyone imagines Helen as a blonde."

"Not I! Dark is better."

"Well! What is the girl, anyway?"

"How should I know?"

Shizuma stared at the two in amusement, now fully committed to setting down her quill. Regular comics they certainly were, but the Kanzaki Cousins were not too bad a diversion when it came down to it.

Not that she would ever tell them that, of course.

"It says a great deal about you two that you would choose your respective hair colours as the better," she told the pair. "Shizuru never told either of you?"

They repeated that they did not know; Nagisa admitted to ignorance as well. Urumi stopped Shizuma before she could tell them the answer, however, and suggested a wager first.

"A wager? What's the reward?" the Princess asked in good humour.

The mismatched eyes twinkled. "Satisfaction."

"Done!"

Urumi nodded to Shizuma. "Now play."

"Reito wins," Shizuma said, eliciting a whoop from the Princess..

"Well, Urumi?" Reito was saying to his young cousin, who did not look too daunted by her loss. "One for me. Shall we say satisfaction lies in you buying me an excellent cup of wine at the first tavern we pass on our way back?"

"Why not?" his cousin said equably, jumping to her feet. "I have to stop by one of the crossroad colleges, anyway."

Reito winced.

"I seem to recall you telling me that the usual wine for such places tastes like vinegar," he remarked, handsome face quite sour.

Urumi smiled.

"It does," she shrugged. "But I am the one buying, am I not?"

She jumped up and swept both Shizuma and Nagisa with one of her theatrical bows.

"I've already told Shizuru-san," she said aloud. "But allow me to wish you well too for your war. May your enterprise and Hime's prosper!"

She leaned over Nagisa's table and pressed her lips to the tribune's cheek, then went over to do the same for an intrigued Shizuma, who had never received such a gesture from the woman before.

Urumi only brushed her cheek, however, and whispered something quickly in her ear.

"I've evidence the Mentulae paid for Marguerite's fraud."

They pulled apart and smiled sweetly at each other.

"The birds are chirping more loudly these days," Shizuma said with nonchalance, angling her head as if to listen to the animals outside. Reito and Nagisa frowned, and instantly emulated her.

"Are they?" the Princeps asked. "I daresay I didn't notice. And it's rather late for birds to be chirping, isn't it?"

"They are-I heard them," Urumi confirmed. "I find it a good omen."

"I suppose..." Reito shrugged, his beautiful eyes crinkling in a smile. "The more there are, the better, then."

"Provided no vultures join," said his cousin. She turned and made for the exit, throwing over her shoulder, "See you at Chikane's for dinner later, Shizuma-san."

"Indeed," answered Shizuma, grinning at the sound of Reito hectoring his cousin as to why he had neither been informed nor invited to dinner by the senior consul. Shizuma lowered her head to the last paper she had to sign and muttered under her breath: "Looks like you missed an interesting dinner, cousin."

At the moment, her cousin and the Fourteenth were making good time on the via Flaminia, marching at an urgent pace to cover the many hundreds of miles to the North. Typical of the commander and consonant with circumstances, there was no official baggage train to slow them down: whatever carts existed were drawn by mules instead of oxen. The general herself started out mounted on Albinus, because she needed to do the rounds of each cohort in the Fourteenth before she could dismount. Only once she had spoken to all of them would she march alongside the men.

"Innit the way it should be, general?" one of the centurions called to her as she reached his group. "Finally got a good march to toughen them up! These babies'll be proper veterans before they know it!"

Shizuru rode up beside him.

"Why, Jinnai-han, they already look like they are!" she exclaimed. She kept her steed trotting beside them, moving back and forth as she addressed the soldiers. "Soon they'll be showing even the Eighth how to soldier! Going forty miles a day until the blisters on their feet grow blisters! That's what my Eighth did! And they tore three forts down in a month! That's what the Ninth did too! And they snatched one of the greatest citadels in the world, brimming with gold and booty, right from under the enemy's nose! You've heard of those things, boys and girls? You've heard of that war, I hope?"

They shouted back their answers near-enough to unison.

"Everyone has heard of that war!" she confirmed. "Because it was a war to remember-full of the bravest and best legions Hime and Fuuka ever birthed!"

She tossed her head, very fierce and very proud.

"Because of that war, everyone has heard of my Eighth! Because of that war, everyone has heard of my Ninth! Well, this is another war everyone shall hear about again! This is a war to be remembered! So show me your mettle-show me that you are worthy of being my Fourteenth! Get me to Argus in time and we'll give them another legion worth hearing about!"

They cheered madly again, saying that she would get her forty miles a day, even if it wore down their feet to leather. Shizuru flashed her most winning smile. Her mount nickered at the excitement and she put a hand on his neck, urging him to move her to the next cohort in the line.

"Good boy," she murmured to him as he followed her body's orders, as soft and smooth a horse as she had ever ridden. He had a wonderfully calm feel to him for all his power, she thought, and she liked that.

"Such a good boy, Albinus." Another stroke on his neck. "She trained you well, did she not?"

His nostrils frugged and he nickered again, enjoying the attention.

Really very soft, she thought, bringing him up shortly to a lope and back without any effort. Albinus looked made of ice, but his movement was all water: flowing and cool, ever with the potential to surge if needed. The undercurrent was not restrained, as it was with other horses of his size, but relaxed. She believed it had everything to do with the horse's master.

There was something different about Natsuki's steeds, she had noticed. She could tell it when she first rode Albinus and confirmed it after riding Niger too. Compared to other horses she had ridden—including other Otomeian war-chargers—the two stallions felt like steeds out of a dream, graceful despite their bulk and uncannily attentive to their riders. She had meditated on it for a while before finally asking Natsuki if the pair of stallions were siblings, or perhaps from the same breeding stock.

"No, not the same," Natsuki had answered. "Why? They are like?"

"Somewhat. Were you the one who trained both of them?"

"Yes." A frown. "Something is wrong?"

She had laughed at the girl's concern.

"Oh no," was her reply. "Rather, something is right."

To which Natsuki had responded with a dark look of suspicion, driving Shizuru to reflect on the irony that it was the horses' mistress who felt more like a raw animal: bizarre and nervous, a highly-strung filly constantly watching you from one eye, always ready to rear up in your face. All that stormy, sinewy power, straining under a layer of perilous ice.

Even now I feel that I have only begun to plumb the lake beneath it, she reflected, feeling heat spread through her chest at the thought that she was finally returning to the girl's side. High up on Albinus and addressing the next cohort, she took a moment to revel in her recent triumphs, and in the pleasure of her own puissance, her capacity now to do what she needed and had sworn.

I have come so far, she told herself, admiring the orderly sight of the ranks, their armour silver in the sun. I have come so far and know there is yet further to go, and revel in that fact. I shall go further than anyone else ever has-I shall carve out Hime's name in new empires, conquer and plant my feet upon ground that no other Himean has ever trod upon. What are all those triumphs that went before but honours for old wars, for foes and fellows who won battles on the same pieces of land over and over? They have all ploughed the same country for too long. Even Chikane, most excellent Chikane, has been content to work the same old furrows. Not so my future. Where I go, no one ever has. What I do from now on shall eclipse all that has gone before. My foes tried to stop me and failed, and hate me the more for that. But I take nothing more than my birthright, the opportunities that I deserve, which they would not accord to me out of petty spite. Because they were afraid of being shown up for how little they are.

She regretted nothing, she decided. Not the loathing she had incurred, nor even the wound she had dealt to all others of her kind.

She had done no more than what her being had demanded. Now she was going to her fate, and to the woman who bore her fate in a pair of haunted eyes. She could not be shaken, could no longer be stopped.

---

When Shohei and Nao reached Argus, they saw a Mentulæan camp looming ominously nearby, but hardly batted an eyelash at it. For one thing, there was obviously no siege being attempted by the Mentulæans. Had such an attempt been launched, the new arrivals knew, it would have been largely futile anyway. Argus was a port province, which made it impossible to starve out or block from reinforcements unless a naval blockade of epic proportions was launched. It was also one of the largest cities in the North, the space enclosed by its walls on par with that of the famed walls of Otomeia, and chock-full of immigrants from the warlike nations of the south: Arabs and Syrians and peoples from Judæa. Although only one understrength legion was officially billeted as its guard, Argus actually had enough mercenary residents available to call up and form several buffer cohorts. And it happened to have a brilliant primipilus in charge of its guard and militia.

"The Mentulæans in that camp we saw are just a block," Shohei said to his primipilus as they walked through the Argus billets. They had slipped the Ninth and Eleventh into camp as soon as they arrived and found no opposition from the hovering Mentulæans, who merely settled for parading near their own base.

"Of course they're a block," Nao grunted, scuffing up some soil with her boot. "That's the way up to Sosia, and that's all they really care about, fuck them. Not that it'll do any good."

"Ushida-san must have left far ahead of them getting here," Shohei said, turning to the other centurion walking ahead of them: she was their escort to the chief primipilus of Argus's garrison. "I guess you haven't been able to send him messages?"

The woman nodded.

"Just recently, legate," she answered. "We could for a while, and he sent messages back, is how we know what we know about Sosia. But then we got interference when those cunni showed up-pardon the language, legate, centurion."

"We're all soldiers, soldier-you can talk any way you like," Shohei said. "They'll get called worse than that by me soon enough. When did they show up?"

He was indicating the Otomeians mingling with the troops everywhere. Shohei noted that he recognised some faces, even.

"They're the ones we had at Argentum!" he said with pleasure.

"Yes, legate," their escort answered. "Good men. Got here quick, before the Mentulae even arrived."

Nao seemed to be searching for something.

"No archers?" she asked. "I know the black ones-I mean the Lupine unit-is out with Masashi but where're the archers? All I've seen are the skirmishers. The light cavalry, looks like."

Their companion answered positively.

"The archers went with Ushida-san," she explained. "We have sixteen hundred horse here, equal parts light cavalry and heavy ones. Cataphracti. But those're not out unless we need them."

The other two Himeans nodded.

"And there's the primipilus now."

The Argus primipilus was in conference with some soldiers-centurions, judged the newcomers by the helmets-and all of them were bent over a map set on a large oak table outside the military headquarters.

"Beating off the buggers, Sakaki?" Nao said to her fellow first-spear centurion. "Looks like we got here just in time to cover your arse for you."

The very tall female towering over her smiled.

"We're fine," Sakaki said.

"Cocky and cold. Didn't even come to meet us."

Sakaki smiled.

"I thought," she said, "you could handle yourself."

Nao and Shohei laughed.

"I handle myself fine, all right," the redhead grinned, chucking the woman lightly on one arm. She scanned the faces surrounding them. "What, no bureaucrats or anything here? Sugiura gives you a free rein, don't she?"

"The governor was here earlier," Sakaki told them. "She's gone with the quaestors to calm the civilians."

Shohei's forehead wrinkled. "Is there unrest yet? I don't seem to have noticed any."

Sakaki did not answer him, however, and waved to a man approaching from the road. Shohei recognised him as the Argus governor's new quaestor and performed an introduction for Nao, who saluted very briefly.

The man explained what the governor was dealing with internally.

"Sugiura-san is often pretty loose on the collars," he said. "Or so I gather from the accounts of my predecessor. Since this is a war situation, thought, it calls for some tightening, which she's instituted by putting heavy regulations on all residents not actually of pure Himean or Fuukan descent. The curfew affects everyone, though."

"It's natural, so I don't think they ought to whinge much," Shohei commented. "We can't risk information being fed to the enemy by spies, after all. The non-Himean residents should see that."

"So we hope, though it's a thought that about half of the residents are non-Himean and three-quarters of the half that's left are Fuukan, not Himean," the quaestor grinned. "We've a few long-time residents who are Mentulaean, too. Got clout and not very happy about the monitors Sugiura-san put on them. Personally, I think they're being stupid to complain-it's not that Sugiura-san really does distrust them all that much. She's just put those guards on to reassure other quarters that might actually distrust them enough to act on it, you know."

Shohei grinned back. "That's so. I'm thinking if I should go see her. Or is she too busy with that?"

"She'll come back here soon, she said."

"Then I can wait here." He nodded to the rest. "Go on with your meeting, please. I'd like to hear what your plans are."

Sakaki took over again and explained that they were working on a plan to get the Otomeians out of the city and past the Mentulaeans outside. The problem, she said, was that they did want to have to fight a general engagement for this because it would take too much time. The priority was to get the Otomeians to Sosia in order to relieve the siege there while keeping the Mentulae currently outside pinned by the Argus force.

"True, they'd serve us better parading out there," Shohei agreed. "Better they keep trying to break us than rejoin their comrades at Sosia."

Nao grunted. "We'll have to go with the Otomeians to Sosia, though. Let me see that map."

The tribune slid the large sheepskin toward her.

"East," she immediately decided.

"But how? The city's within sight of them so they'll see us anyway."

"Night transport," Sakaki suggested. "Load into ships and work east of the coast, then drop them off at this point to march north."

Nao frowned at the squiggle of the coastline on the map.

"Will it work?" she asked. "I don't know the waters here. It might take too long or the coast could be too dangerous for fuck-all to get past, in which case it'd be better to chance slipping by the cunni outside."

"It should be fine," the Argus quaestor offered. "A little hard going, but we've good pilots and transports. They know every nook and cranny of this coast, and they'll do what they've got to."

Shohei folded both arms over his cuirass, thinking. "Then we just need a diversion to keep them from being detected."

Sakaki said she could orchestrate several skirmishes concluding in a false march to the west.

"A feint with a lot of noise-horses and stomping to make them think we're trying to sneak that way," she told them. "We've got some good Syrian militia. Quick and fast. They'll do the job."

"I like it," Nao said. "And I've got something that'll make sure it works, s'matter of fact."

They all looked at her.

"What?" Shohei demanded, as curious as all the rest.

"Later," she said tersely, shaking her head with a frown.

Everyone looked bemused, with the exception of Sakaki, who guessed that what Nao had in mind was one of those pieces of subterfuge in which Nao specialised, and which should not be put at risk of espionage by being spoken in public.

"Once that works out, I'm betting you're putting up more shows to convince them to stay," Nao said to her friend. "You'll have to keep them busy to pin them here, Sakaki, or this won't work. We don't want those Mentulae outside following us to Sosia."

Sakaki nodded.

"I know," she said.

"Let's talk about when to do it, then," Shohei said. "And pray we don't get any more of these assholes coming any time soon."

---

More were actually on the way: an armed cavalcade was about then attempting to cross the natural boundary of the Mentulaean Empire. The third wave of the Mentulaean invasion, it was composed primarily of supplies intended to revictual the prior two waves of armies, guarded by a squadron of cavalry and a larger infantry contingent, roughly three cohorts in number.

The plan had been to cross the river on the largest bridge, which the two armies before them had also used and left guarded. They cavalcade found the bridge collapsed, however, and its guard absent. Disturbing, especially when they had actually received missives from the commanders of the armies ahead of them that everything had gone to plan and it was their turn to move out. Thus, the sight of the missing bridge and guard was an unexpected one. And an ill omen, thought the uneasy soldiers, whose suspicions began to rise.

Nonetheless, it was necessary to rejoin and deliver their supplies to their comrades on the other side. So scouts were sent out to find a usable bridge for crossing, and an advance party sent through it to scour the area for potential threats. This took some time, as it seemed that the two nearest bridges had also been demolished. Where was the enemy doing this? And who was it?

Finally, some weeks into the exercise, the scouts produced the answers. The destroyers of the bridges, they said, were Otomeians set up in a camp by the bridge far to the north, currently the largest existing bridge on the river. Not a large camp, the scouts reported, and small enough to tuck away from sight from the riverside-though not from the vantage point of a far hilltop that the scouts had used as their lookout. Obviously the Otomeians in that camp were setting a trap. How lucky that the fools had not thought to consider that hilltop on the Mentulaean side! Their hair would turn grey before they sprung that trap now, laughed the Mentulae.

The Mentulaeans moved south very quickly, in the opposite direction. There, they knew from their other scouting party, was a small and very old bridge that had fallen into disuse after the larger bridges had been built. Be that as it may, it had not fallen into such disrepair as would prohibit a crossing, and the scouts reported it clear of enemies on the other side. They could cross through that and give the slip to the Otomeian hounds waiting up the headwaters, then march off to rejoin their fellows at Sosia and Argus.

They made it to the southern bridge and crossed without any problems save for a few scares owing to the old structure's awful creaking. Nothing was lost, nonetheless, and all of them made it over safely, reorganising into marching line and starting towards their destination.

This side of the river, the Mentulaeans noted, was unlike the ones up north: far craggier, shot with abrupt and unexpected ridges in the landscape and jagged little outcrops. It was when they had passed the first of these cliff-cut hills that it happened. A horde of Otomeian cavalry exploded from behind another ridge and screamed the insanely ululating cry that had every Mentulaean shivering in his boots. Taken off-guard, the Mentulaean party crumbled. Those in the back attempted to reverse, which proved a futile exercise for two reasons: first, slow-trundling wagons loaded with food and supplies could hardly move swiftly enough for a retreat; second, another group of Otomeians had materialised to their rear.

The camp to the north and near the river's headwaters had been a decoy, manned only by noncombatants and a very tiny unit of cavalry tasked with ensuring that the camp looked populated-as far as any Mentulaean lookouts on that hill on the other side were concerned. Should the Mentulae have hazarded that bridge instead, they would have found no trap ready to spring on them, since the trap was actually set up for that bridge down to the south. Having obliged the Otomeians by walking right into it, the Mentulae were so shocked by the surprise that they hardly put up a fight. Thus the supplies intended for the Mentulaean armies fell into the hands of the Princess Alyssa's troops, who showed their commander the nice cache of gold and silver coin they found amidst the food and army materials.

"Gaudy," was all the princess said when she saw the coins, each one stamped with the elaborate insignia and profile of the Mentulaean Emperor, Obsidian. Her blue eyes flicked away and onto the corpses of the Mentulae strewn all over the riverbank. She pointed to the bridge with one blood-encrusted hand.

"Tear that down and haul these for the fire. I don't want this trash contaminating the river."

Chapter 55

My apologies for the tardiness. At the very least, you have two chapters' worth (in Microsoft Word, past 60 pages) here, to try and make up for the lack of an update last month. You see what class of excellent person I am: not only have I made you wait to know what happens next, I now inundate you with so many words that you shall be cross-eyed by the time you finish.

At this point it is perhaps necessary to explain one of the main reasons delays occur. No doubt some have noted that I am often citing illness as the cause. For clarity, it has generally been only one illness: I have a most intrusive ailment of the heart. Said ailment was in fine form the past few months, which naturally had my own form in opposite state. Please do not misunderstand this as an appeal to either pity or sympathy since I require neither. It is merely an explanation, as well as a request for the readers to understand any irregularities in updating, in the future.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.) , alae (pl.) - A cavalry unit; the estimates on the number of horsemen per ala differ, but for this story, the number shall be set at five hundred. The Lupine division, for instance, has approximately 700 horsemen, and is thus just a little shy of being an ala and a half.

2. Calends - The first of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The Calends is always the first day of each month (e.g. the Calends of January January 1). Along with the other two fixed points (the Nones and the Ides ), it was considered a sacred day. Note that dates were reckoned backwards from the three fixed points. For example, if you wished to say "December 25," you would say "six days before the Calends of January," and not "ten days after the Ides (the 15th) of December."

3. Contubernalis - The Ancient Roman equivalent of a military cadet. These were nobles or members of the Famous Families, so they were often kept out of the battle and seconded to staff work for the general's office.

4. Falx - A polearm weapon, like the rhomphaia. The falx's blade is slightly more curved in shape than the rhomphaia's, which means it is designed specifically for slashing moves.

5. Gerrae! - Latin for "Rubbish!"

6. Gladius - The short sword used by Roman legionaries. It was very sharp and used primarily for thrusting moves.

7. Nagayama - The legate Shohei's surname; for surety, it is included in this list.

8. Paludamentum - The long, scarlet cloak worn by full generals in the Roman army

9. Pontifex Maximus - The head of the state religion.

10. Rhomphaia - Polearm similar to a falx (see note above) but with a slight curve in the blade.

11. Tribune (military) - Not an elected tribune of the soldiers; ranked below legates and above cadets, the military tribunes often performed staff duties for the general and were sometimes given command over soldiers as cavalry officers.

12. Triumph - The military parade of honours, achievements, and booty that an army often performed upon return to Rome (if the soldiers had hailed the commander with the accolade of "imperator" in battle, and the Senate sanctioned the petition for triumph). The triumph was of great import to Roman politicians, as many considered it the height of their careers. In the text below, the reference Shizuru makes to Prince Artaxi's extended confinement is owing to the fact that the prince was the enemy commander at the battle (at Argentum) for which she is supposed to have a triumph. As such, he would only be brought out of his incarceration-which, by the way, is actually quite a comfortable imprisonment, all things considered-for her triumphal parade.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

It was well into the tenth month of the year by the time Shizuru marched the Fourteenth into Argus. She entered to the cheers of the locals, herself mightily pleased by the welcome as she admitted to herself-it was a nice change from what she had been experiencing at home with her peers. Those happy faces might well change once they got news from their friends in Hime, and she knew it. But it was her privilege to enjoy this unmarred joy at her advent for now, fleeting though it might be.

"How long have they been sitting out there?" she asked the local officials, referring to the Mentulae parked outside the city. "What have they been doing?"

"They're well past a month now, General," one man answered, his toga in disarray from having run to participate in her reception. He tried to rearrange it and ended in making it look even more floppy. "They don't do anything. All they do is parade."

"Battle - skirmishes?"

"No, the cowardly lot! Never mind giving battle, though they'll take skirmishes on."

"Ah," she said, smiling reflectively: it was a pinning manoeuvre, of course. "So you have tried to give battle, then?"

"Not actually, Fujino-san. The governor thought it wiser to pin them down here until reinforcements-"

"Shizuru Fujino, by all the gods!"

Shizuru had just enough time to lift her arms. The meteor slammed into her and flared, putting hands upon her shoulders and kisses aplenty on her cheeks.

"Ave, Midori-han," she said, returning the hug as firmly as it had been given. "I am returned."

"And we are saved. We got your missive. The day before the Calends, to be precise. Oh Jupiter, it's good to see your face!"

She held Shizuru's cheeks as though forgetting that the latter was no longer a child to be so treated. A pause to drink in that reassuringly impressive countenance, followed by an oath.

Midori gasped: "Why-Shizuru, you're brown !"

The younger woman nodded once freed.

"Marching along the coast at the end-height of summer," she explained nonchalantly, masking her own pride at her appearance. Her skin browned evenly and retained its natural translucence while taking colour, leaving her limned, as a result, in an amber flush. Against this pale bronze shade, her teeth when she smiled were even more splendid than before.

"Ecaster !" Midori tried to get over the amazement; her eyes kept roaming the young goddess before her, despite all efforts to the contrary. "What about you? You got our note?"

"We met the courier on the march," Shizuru said. "Do we know the whereabouts of Shohei-han at the moment? And what must a woman do to get some water in these parts?"

Midori yelled for someone to bring water. A citizen carrying an amphora was ordered over and made to fill a ready beaker for Shizuru, who drained the contents in one gulp.

"We've nothing from Shohei-san, I'm afraid," Midori told her. "There will likely be no messages coming soon since their march is-"

"Incognito," Shizuru finished, licking her lips. "Quite so; I was only making sure."

Her paludamentum swished as she turned and addressed one of her tribunes.

"Where is the legate?"

The tribune indicated the officer to Shizuru, who waved her over.

"Midori-han, this is my legate, Miyuki Rokujou," she told the Argus governor, bringing forward at the introduction another tanned, rather elegantly-built lady in legatal trappings. "Miyuki-han, the governor of this province, Midori Sugiura."

The two Himeans exchanged greetings.

"I knew your father, Rokujou-san," Midori told Shizuru's new legate. "You're Chie Harada's replacement?"

The officer smiled demurely. "No, Sugiura-san. That honour belongs to my friend, Shizuma Hanazono."

Olive eyes sparkled at Shizuru after this disclosure.

"Your cousin, your senior legate?" Midori said.

"My cousin, my senior legate," Shizuru said.

Her other legate coughed gently.

"Shizuru-san, the Ninth and Eleventh's old pitching ground is still clear," Miyuki informed the commander while darting a crushing look at a fidgety tribune. "I'm having the Fourteenth set up camp there, if you have no objections to it."

"None at all. But a marching camp only, mind," Shizuru replied.

"Have the noncombatants start the work, in fact, and tell the legionaries to water themselves and take a breather. Have them do so in their centuries. I see no need for them to disperse just yet."

Her companions blinked.

"You don't plan to get on the move again?" the governor demanded.

"You only just got here!"

"We shall see," Shizuru said cryptically. "By the way, Midori-han, would you happen to know how many Otomeians are here and who is their commander?"

Midori told her.

"Very good," she said, turning again to her legate. "Miyuki-han, seek out that man, if you please, as we shall need him."

Shizuru took a moment to scrutinise her officer's expression, wondering how Miyuki Rokujou would function with foreign auxiliaries. She could detect no disdain on the woman's face for the task being assigned, but she had to be certain that this promising new legate was not the kind to antagonise their allies... or vice versa.

"I am giving you charge of the Otomeians," she decided. Miyuki's performance here would determine what sort of tasks Shizuru would allot to her in the future and how far Shizuru would go in helping to advance her career. "This means you shall be the primary liaison for their officers in my staff, from this moment onwards. You may delegate some of the junior tribunes to actual leadership in the battle, of course, but all of them shall report directly to you. Questions?"

"Only if you have any orders for them right now," Miyuki replied, pleased by the added duties.

"Only to have their troops prepared this instant."

"Armed and sorted for engagement?"

"Yes, and the same for the Fourteenth. The central drill field should serve to hold both our men and theirs."

The head of thick and waving hair was thrown back: Shizuru considered the sky.

"The sun is yet hidden, but it shall continue to get warmer," she said, the pupils of her eyes overtaken by crimson as she maintained her survey. "Midori-han, do you recall the games you had last year, the time we first passed through on our way to Otomeia?"

A confused expression from the Argus governor. "Yes, why?"

"I would borrow those large sheets of canvas you used to erect shades over the theatres, if you still have them."

"Oh! We put them into storage, don't worry," the governor said eagerly, beckoning one of her men to listen. "Hold on, my man can fetch them to the field, if you like. You want to use them to tent the area where your men will be resting, right?"

"My very thoughts," Shizuru smiled.

"I'll have some slaves do the work too so your people can continue setting up camp."

"Yes, thank you." Shizuru faced her legate again. "I trust you can handle everything else. Would you see to the depositions? I must talk to the governor for a moment."

"We have the command tent close by," Midori volunteered at this. "Let's talk there, Shizuru. Easier than going all the way to the mansion."

"Very well," Shizuru said. "One of the locals should be able to direct you to it, Miyuki-han. Come join us as soon as you have finished delegating the tasks, please, and bring the staff with you."

Miyuki looked at the tribunes that had been trailing behind the commander, her face pleasant enough but at odds with the brutal assessment in her eyes. The tribunes stiffened and a pale tension crackled from the least seasoned of them.

"All of you with me," came the succinct order.

Off Miyuki went to march the tribunes into whatever assignments she could find—the execution of which, the commander ruminated, Miyuki would examine so critically that a misclassified scroll would precipitate formal indictment. Miyuki was satisfyingly exacting in every duty, which meant that results produced under her aegis were more reliable than otherwise. What Shizuru liked best about her was that, aside from her natural capabilities, she had one of those wonderfully Himean minds that admitted of flexibility yet stuck to the absolute limits: the kind of attitude that best described the true

Himean way, which depended on working within the rules even while exploring the loopholes for benefits. Known to Shizuru's staff as Rokujou, the legate bearing this characteristic was already gaining a reputation for her dependably methodical nature, which meant that she was often cast as a foil to their equally dependable but wildly unpredictable general. The contrast was assisted by the respective women's appearances and attitudes: Miyuki Rokujou was dark of hair, calm of eye, and while unfailingly courteous-generally sombre; Shizuru Fujino was light of hair, red of eye, and generally cheerful.

Shizuru seemed ignorant of this contrast being drawn by her men; however, as with nearly all other occasions where she displayed a lack of knowledge, the ignorance was pretence. Truth be told, it tickled her to be offset so well. She had even given Miyuki a task in keeping with their supposed roles: to bake the new tribunes into the bricks the army needed. The need for this attention came from the fact that half of Shizuru's staff was new and a good number of them even came from conservative-inclined families. As such, Shizuru explained to her new legate, she wanted to weed out possible problems before they blew up in their faces.

"I chose this crop to take with me because I thought I saw both a promise of capability as well as a capacity for open-mindedness in them," she told Miyuki, not bothering to explain why she had even taken them for her campaign if she knew they belonged more naturally to the opposition: both of them knew the answer to that already. "But a promise of capability and a capacity for open-mindedness still fall within mere potential. They need proper tending to fully develop. Better that both be tended at the same time."

"Especially," Miyuki said shrewdly, "the capacity for open-mindedness."

"Especially that. All the same, I have no time for potential that remains a theory. If it turns out that any of them is more resistant or more disobedient, I shall send him or her off the moment it is discovered. The same for any of them who turns out to have less skill than I wagered."

"You would send them home at the very start of the campaign?" the other asked, a touch surprised because she had not thought the ever-sympathetic Shizuru to have such steel.

"Why not? If they perform disgracefully, I see no reason not to send them packing in like manner. Besides, I am like any other gambler: I do not much enjoy it when my wagers fail." Shizuru's stern expression vanished and was replaced by something softer, more trusting. "I shall leave the culling to you, Miyuki-han, because I believe you best-suited for their assessment and training. Your name and senatorial record is such that even these budding little conservatives respect you and have at the same time the necessary portion of fear supplementing that respect... whereas I am more likely to raise their wariness from the very start once I begin to tighten my hold: there is no conservative home out there, after all, which utters my name with great liking. I suspect many of them might even have burnt an effigy after me."

Miyuki said nothing to that because there was nothing to say. When a person was as popular, as patrician, as absolutely maddening as Shizuru Hanazono Fujino, who was to say bonfires and curses were not in play?

"Keep an eye on them," Shizuru finished. "Who curries favour without performance deserving reward? More importantly, who can be critical of command and who can be disloyal to it? I find no difficulty at all in keeping the former, but I would dispose of the latter."

"An elimination."

"Quite so, although that would be phrasing it negatively. I shall have the final word on the... hmm... selection, of course, but not just yet. It behoves me to apply the fur mitten for now."

"While I," agreed Miyuki, "shall apply the hammer."

Which the woman did so efficiently, Shizuru thought, that there had yet to be any snags. Thus far, all operations had run almost as smoothly as with her old personnel, although she did admit that the true test would come later, in the thick of the campaign. Until that arrived, she would let Miyuki march her staff as hard and fast as Miyuki liked. Which was very hard, very fast .

In the meantime, she needed a word with Midori. The governor of Argus was already ushering Shizuru into a large tent from which the older woman ejected some other people. Only one of those originally in the tent did Midori keep: an effete and rather pretty youth who minced around them in a way that tickled Shizuru terribly, defeating as it did some of the more practiced minces she had seen from the girls of Hime.

"We can trust him-Tessaros is one of my personal servants," Midori said. Upon seeing Shizuru's impassive face, she changed her mind. "Although I can send him off after if you'd rather we spoke alone."

"Yes, thank you," said Shizuru. "I think that would be best."

Midori addressed her slave, who lowered his gaze with a most engaging flutter of the lashes. Well done, Tessaros! thought an entertained Shizuru, wondering if her boy-loving steward would find this creature even more interesting than she did.

"Tessaros," the governor said. "Leave us after you've poured our wine."

Shizuru asked for water.

"For certainty's sake," she explained to her astonished host. "I must be sure that I have all my senses perfect for later. Shame on me if I walked onto the field a bacchanal."

"You'll pardon me if I take the liquor, as I'm in need of it from all the excitement-though I'll have it diluted, in honour of your caution," Midori said, asking the slave to water her own drink and holding up her hand with admirable haste when the young man poured the portion of wine. She let him pour the water as well, then sent Tessaros off. "So you are planning to fight them."

"Fighting them is what I came here to do," Shizuru said when their attendant had left. She lifted her cup to her lips but changed her mind at the last moment and spoke instead: "There is no denying it would be the wiser course to destroy them while I have them here. If the Ninth and Eleventh are already en route to joining the Seventh, I believe I can spare a day or so to put paid to that lot outside first. It would mean one less reserve army with which to contend when we do go to break the Sosia siege." She lifted an eyebrow, looked indolently content. "Besides, it would be a nice way to blood my not-quite-veteran boys and girls further."

"But this very day, Shizuru?"

"The days are still long enough, summer not being over. There is enough time for one manoeuvre."

"But..." Midori flapped a hand and looked distraught. "Right after a hell of a rushed march from Hime and outnumbered again?"

"You are lending me some of your units for this one battle, yes?" Shizuru responded with eyes downcast, a light playing beneath the heavy fringe of her lashes as she destroyed yet another of the counterarguments. "There is the single legion of Otomeian foot Shohei-han left here too. That would help make up for the numbers."

"True, though you'd have nothing in reserve then," was the snorted retort. "Bugger these Mentulae! The bastards must fornicate something fierce to get numbers like this!"

Shizuru raised her chin and treated Midori to a smirk.

"I am," she said, "most firmly resigned to that fact, Midori-han. This entire war shall proceed with us being outnumbered as a general rule, I think. It does not trouble me because I have never relied too heavily on numbers to win. Himean quality shall win at the end of the day, not quantity. They could field twice that number there and I would trounce them with two of my old legions."

Oh, was there nothing that could dent that incredible confidence?

"I'll drink to that," the governor said, smiling helplessly at the inimitable creature sitting in her tent. Why was it that being with Shizuru Fujino made one feel so reduced, she wondered. It was not just the confidence: Midori had known hundreds of others with similar self-assurance, yet absent the same intimidation. Was it the fire, then, that did it? Was it that the justification for that confidence was so real it lent near-tactile weight to the issue?

Taking a second to regain her bearings, she set her chalice on the near table and stared at the younger woman, her olive eyes probing.

"You've a proconsular imperium, your note said?"

Shizuru confirmed it. "For five years."

"A hell of a mandate." Midori cast her mind back to the contents of the younger woman's letter, which she had received not too long ago and which had introduced some of the formal details pertaining to Shizuru's second northern mission. "And a hell of a job too, to annex Obsidian's lands."

"I wanted it."

"Yes, of course."

She pursed her lips, wondered if she should ask how Shizuru had managed to twist the Senate's arm into giving in to her desires. No, best not to ask yet. There was just one little detail she wanted to clarify, though.

"I remember what Masashi-san told me about their delegation to Hime, as well as the delegation he went off to meet before all this mayhem. I hope, Shizuru, that given the repetitive bad faith the Mentulaeans have shown, the Senate agrees all talks are off the table now?"

"Quite so." Shizuru smiled darkly. "Not that I would be inclined to talking, even were our fellows of a gentler mind. I assure you, Midori-han, that my mandate is to either put the beast down or cripple it into uselessness. If five years are not enough, I shall seek five more. Even if the Senate gets cold feet again in the future, I and our allies at home shall do all we can to finish the annexation of all of the Mentulaeon Empire into the New Northern Territories."

Midori's breath whooshed out audibly. "That eases the mind! But I can't help but get worried when I think of that mawkish bunch calling the shots in Hime. Is your mandate watertight this time?"

"The five years bar discussion. It was stipulated in the bill of command. My scribes brought a copy for you."

"I'll get it later," Midori said, relieved. "I'm guessing it means you didn't have your triumph? That's the old Fourteenth you brought with you, yes?"

"Yes. I - er - postponed my triumph indefinitely."

"I'm sorry about that, Shizuru-chan."

"I am not." Shizuru suddenly grinned. "Poor, afflicted Prince Artaxi-whom we caught at Argentum, you recall-may suffer the indignity of being confined in a backwoods town a little longer. The cur was indignant over not being able to move outside of the walls of his villa, and was demanding to be held in Hime instead, with freedom to move where he wished about the city. As though he were not a prisoner of war!"

"An arrogant pup. He takes after the father."

"Who shall eventually share a fate similar." The striking eyes, so engaging and intelligent, seemed to blaze. "If I may change the subject, Midori-han, I have some questions pertaining to my mission that I would ask before the others arrive."

"Yes, we'd best get to it. Ask anything and I'll speak answers."

"I noticed cavalry among the Mentulaeans outside. Would you be able to tell me how many there are?"

"We're not sure exactly. They've not a lot of horse out there, though it's still more than you can find among my militia. Two alae, maybe?" A distracted frown as Midori noted the harshness of the younger woman's cheekbones, which had always been high but not this austere. A closer assessment reassured her it was not an effect of the darker skin: Shizuru was thinner. "Have you eaten, by the way? We've a lot of grub-is there anything you want in particular?"

She grabbed a bowl of eggs from the table and thrust it towards the blonde, who declined the offering. Midori threw it back on the table with a clatter.

"What is the most you can give me for horse, Midori-han?"

"Oh, Juno..." The governor slapped her thighs with her palms. "I'd say just an ala or about that number. No more than that and you'd best mind that most of them aren't even real cavalry workers: we'd just be pressing them into it. Decent, but not brilliant. So you'd not be expecting anything like the Otomeians that've gone to Sosia." She emitted a rueful groan in recollection, wondering now if she should have held those back a while longer so Shizuru could have used them. "Now those were cavalry!"

"An ala," Shizuru was murmuring to herself, her head tilted so that the fringe above her eyes angled to one side. The visible eye twinkled at Midori. "Spare, but more than enough."

"An ala, more than enough?" the other snorted, staring at her. "Gerrae!"

"Really."

"Reveal intent, then!"

"Only a good battle." Shizuru bent over to inspect the laces of her footwear, tugging lightly at each knot as she checked the fastenings. "How good are your scouts?"

"Excellent," Midori returned impatiently, dissatisfied with Shizuru's deflection. "They're all locals, all Himean."

"You would trust them?"

The governor almost bristled at the question, even if she understood why Shizuru had to ask it.

"Most of them have been working for me for nearly four years," she said. "And I've yet to find anything worth complaint. So, yes, I trust them deeply. Not a caitiff piece in the lot, if you're worried the Mentulae've informers among us. If they do, which I don't think to be true, it certainly isn't among my scouts, Shizuru."

The younger woman responded by asking for a summary of scouting reports on the Mentulae.

"I see," she said, when Midori had finished giving her answer.
"According to your men, then, the Mentulae outside have no units hiding in reserve?"

"None, and I've had them scouring and peeking from every bugged lookout nearby. We ferry or sneak out the scouts on the coast, by the way-that's how we've been getting around. It's so they have to travel through the east, looping far and up towards the north."

Shizuru's face changed subtly at this intelligence, her mind already sending tendrils of hypothesis up and down the map of the North she kept in her head.

"Then you've sent some on to Sosia," she spoke, sensing and hoping Midori had more to tell on this vein. She might be on a formal mission to run the Mentulae out of Hime's provinces but she was also on a personal mission to find someone. Would Sosia see her lucky in the latter aim, this early?

"Of course we sent some there, Shizuru-chan," the other woman was saying. "At first it was hard going. They had scouts of their own looking over the decent passes and I wasn't keen on the idea of risking couriers with information falling into their hands, whether it was information from our fellows at Sosia or from us."

A nod, very small because Shizuru was trying to mask its swiftness.

"Understandable," she told Midori.

"Then we got that idea of skirting by boat far to the east of the coast and dropping them there, just like what Nagayama's doing with your Ninth and Eleventh right now. We sent some just ahead of those legions' departure, in fact, so as to scout ahead and inform Sosia help was coming... and to return with news from Sosia."

Midori inhaled and was mortified when it staggered, severely aware that Shizuru had noticed. Well, why should she not be nervous, the governor asked herself, given the things she had to tell? Being of a straightforward nature, she wished she could just speak the chief points without preamble, but she knew it was better to explain the circumstances first: Shizuru would demand them later anyway.

"Took a while since it's a hard track, to be honest. There aren't even any paths there, so they had to make their own. But it's much safer than going the easier or even just moderately tough ways if you're after avoiding trouble with the enemy. The return groups were arranged to go by separate routes too: one for those coming back here, and another for those joining your former legate's-or is he your legate again, then, since you've regained your command?-another route for those joining Nagayama's group, as I was saying."

She added, somewhat inconsequentially: "It's good to be safe."

"And," Shizuru said, "did the precaution bear returns?"

"It did, as a matter of fact."

Shizuru said nothing this time and chose to wait instead. The governor decided to come out with it quickly, for she was eager to see how Shizuru would take this first bit of news she had to impart.

"The ones who came from Sosia confirmed Masashi and Himemiya Minor's group joined Ushida there with the rest of Seventh," she announced. "And yes, with them is the cavalry division led by your Otomeian."

"Alive, then?"

The words had left Shizuru even before Midori finished the word "Otomeian". Shizuru seemed to realise the obviousness of her haste and frowned.

"Alive?" she repeated, more gently this time. "Is Na-"

She seemed to catch herself once more. The rest of the name's syllables dangled and did not drop, and her jaw underwent a flicker of a contraction, which her companion noted in amazement as a flashing ridge upon the brown cheek.

"The girl?" Shizuru finally managed, somehow unable to say the name for now.

"Yes, she's alive," Midori answered sternly, for she did not want to show how moved she was by how the younger woman was acting. "My men saw her in Sosia."

Shizuru had to mentally scream at herself not to leap from the chair. Her own words trumpeted in her ears, the question they had been now a paroxysm of certainty. Alive, then! She had known the girl was alive, of course, but only because she could not choose to know anything else at the time. But to have it confirmed by others... Oh, the reprieve! How good to feel as though she could breathe again!

"When-?" she started, cutting off the query because she needed to give her throat some time before she could speak normally.

"Just recently," was Midori's reply. "My men came back some days ago."

Some days ago. Shizuru thought about that. Allowing for the extended travel over untracked land due to the looping, she knew that meant significant time had passed since Midori's men made the contact. Time in which so much could have happened-and Sosia was such a precarious location. Oh, for the fleet sandals of Mercury! She would have stolen them from him were he present and did she think gods to exist as the Greeks thought them. At the moment she could comfort herself only in the knowledge that this was a good beginning to the end of her search, that Shohei Nagayama and Nao Yuuki were already bringing two legions to Sosia to aid the Seventh, and that Suou Himemiya was yet present in the game. She had to place her faith in those things and those people, lest she go mad from concern.

But I must get to Sosia immediately!

She needed to compose herself. But more than that, she needed The Girl. Ye gods, how she needed The Girl!

"And?" she said, knowing that what had been said was not enough yet. "Was she well?"

"They said she was well when I pressed," Midori said reluctantly. "But my men aren't physicians and they didn't go under orders to enquire after her, you have to remember. They didn't even know she was there with Masashi and Himemiya until they got there."

The governor paused and inhaled: carefully this time, because she did not wish to embarrass herself again.

"They said she looked well enough, Shizuru-chan, though you'd have to talk to them later for details. I'll have them waiting at the mansion for when you might want them."

"Thank you." Shizuru looked as if she wanted to interview them that very moment. "Thank you, Midori-han. For everything."

"You'd better know something else."

Her tone dulled the smile that had been coming to Shizuru's face.

"What is it?" the young woman enquired, wary. "Has it to do with her?"

"Yes. Do you know she wasn't dealing with your absence well?"

Shizuru frowned. "If you mean the illness, Suou-han wrote me a letter."

"Ahhh." Midori sighed. "That's fine, then. Just as long as you were aware of it already."

The older woman cleared her throat and was disgusted by the falseness of the sound. She was fidgety because she wanted to get on with the rest but was also too polite to break upon what was clearly a private thanksgiving in Shizuru's head.

"Well, now... there's a bit more to say, Shizuru-chan," she said, feeling awkward and intrusive. "It's to do with business and some other things you left when you were recalled to Hime. I hate to have to bring them up so abruptly now, but--"

"No, not at all."

And just like that, younger woman was her usual self again: eyes understanding but detached, manner cool but inviting confidence.

As if, Midori thought wonderingly, that shudder had never happened.

"We should indeed be getting on," Shizuru said. "What is the rest, Midori-han?"

"Right, let me see now." She frowned as she thought over the notes. "For a start, you should know that there's a little over two alae of Otomeian cavalry in Masashi-san's camp outside the Sosia walls. There's also a full legion of Otomeian infantry that just joined them, sent over from Otomeia."

The fine eyebrows went up; Shizuru's smile had returned.

"Otomeia has been properly informed?" she asked. "By whom?"

"I requested the auxiliary you used in your first run here but it was Himemiya Minor who sent messages requesting reinforcements to Sosia and warning them that war has broken out. The Otomeians who joined Masashi at Sosia are just the first and most available troops they could send while they're marshalling. Not a lot, but..." She shrugged.

"But at least they are on the way to getting more. Right, please go on."

"There's also apparently a group that's been sent from Otomeia citadel with the purpose of tearing down the bridges on the river."

"Suou!" Shizuru exclaimed, guessing that last bit had been part of her friend's message to the Otomeians. "Was that her doing too?"

At Midori's nod, she laughed: "How I love her!"

"Himemiya Major would be pleased-as would have been their father," Midori agreed. "A good thing she stayed, Shizuru, as she's probably been the only legate of real worth Masashi has had on his campaign. Oh, Ushida's definitely a worthwhile investment where fighting's concerned. He's no military dunce, that one! But I suspect a touch of avarice in him. Any conscientious commander would have to keep an eye on him most of the time and it may be a bit more work than you'd like. But that's neither here nor there. I'm telling you this so you know what we know of Sosia and also to answer something you brought up earlier. On our way here, you said you wanted to know what had happened to your Eighth, which was stationed at Argentum."

"And my other former legate in charge of them, Aidou Yuji," Shizuru replied, although it was clear from her tone that she cared far less about Aidou Yuji's fate compared to that of the Eighth. "Quite. I expect our fellows at Sosia filled up this lacuna with information, then?"

Midori's face was dark: the answer before the answer.

"Argentum was besieged again," she said, grim because she was angry about what had happened and also because she did not want to show Shizuru her own sadness, knowing it could not compare to the sadness Shizuru would feel. She knew the significance the Eighth had held for the young general, and knew that this would hurt Shizuru as few things could.

"This time, Argentum fell," she continued. "And the legion that was stationed in it, the Eighth, is gone."

A pause to take that in.

"Gone?" Shizuru repeated, her calm unimpaired. "Do you mean slain or..."

"Slain."

"Were there bodies?"

"Yes, apparently."

" All of the Eighth ?"

Midori nodded and compounded the gesture with a wince.

"The Otomeian scouts of the Seventh claimed no survivors," she explained. "They're the ones from whom we have this intelligence, so Masashi and the officers of the Seventh told my couriers at Sosia."

"And Argentum?"

"Razed to the ground."

"Ah."

No part of Shizuru's face moved save for her eyes, which were shut away from Midori.

Gone... Razed to the ground...

How capricious fate could be, Shizuru was thinking. One moment she had been suffused with joy at the news of Natsuki, the next she had practically felt herself emptied, thrust into a vale of mourning. A part of her mourned the people of Argentum but a far greater part of her was devoted to the unconscionable loss of the Eighth. Her Eighth. While she had prepared herself for countless undesirable scenarios as to that beloved legion's fate, she could never have prepared herself for this. That there would be many deaths among her old legions she had expected and understood. But to have an entire legion dead, down the last man? It taxed even credulity. Oh, she believed it: had there been any who fled-which she doubted-they would have turned up or been heard about by now. Had there been any who were captured by the Mentulae-and that was possible-they would have been tortured to death. So yes, her Eighth was indeed dead.

A tragedy on too many levels, she described to herself, heart weeping at the loss of five thousand soldiers she had known by name. And their centurions! Hime was poorer by sixty centurions, a staggering sixty gone of those officers who were the true backbones of the army. She remembered each of the Eighth's to detail. There was Aoshima, that hoary primipilus, who had both mouth and skill to rival Nao. Tiny Kuroki, who was thrice as vicious as her dwarf-like body looked. Kuwabara, who was always spending his money on dice and bones, always in trouble with the provost marshals... Oh, who gave a fig now about Senator Aidou Yuji? Those sixty centurions alone had been worth a thousand of him, so precious were they to the woman who was locking her grief behind her eyelids.

The Eighth had been her favourite legion along with the Ninth because of sheer length of acquaintance as well as quality of performance. Both the Ninth and the Eighth had been with her on her first campaign as a full general, themselves on their first war then. Blooded under her direct leadership and turned veteran in her hands, the Eighth had been with her during some of her most renowned battles. It had been one of the legions she had used at Argentum. Extinct now, both the Eighth and that city.

What a setback . The first point of contention, Argentum Citadel, was already lost. And her beloved Eighth was dead to the last man. Fickle Fortuna! She had favoured Shizuru enough to grant her wish to return here, favoured her enough too to guide her closer to Natsuki. Why this fate for the Eighth, then? Was it that the goddess had not favoured the men and women of the Eighth, to permit such a fate to happen? Or was it the doing of the man who had stationed the Eighth so perilously alone in Argentum - that blasted, murdering incompetent who had practically commissioned those soldiers into a dying duty? How could anyone do that to such excellent men and women? How could he live with himself knowing what he had done to them?

How could she have lent them to him, in the first place?

Part of this should fall upon her, she acknowledged. Takeda Masashi had genuinely disbelieved the possibility of the Mentulae attacking, and was at fault only for his ineptitude. It was she, the one who had known and could have done better, who richly deserved the blame for having been unable to provide for this. For she could have, she convinced herself: she could have, with only a little more foresight and effort! Oh, how she wished she could bring back the Eighth for just a day and apologise to them for her failure. And oh, how she wished that accursed knot in her throat would leave, would spend itself lavishly in the muggy air.

But not yet, she berated herself, slaying the urge to weep where it was stuck between mouth and chest. She could not possibly weep when there was no berth in her life yet for it. This was not the occasion to mourn: the Eighth deserved her tears and would get them, but this war also deserved her attention. For now she had to be hard, she reminded herself, and Dis and the Mentulae take the sorrow!

She opened her eyes.

"This is most likely reliable information-Otomeians would have no reason to lie about that," she said simply, her tone even. "The probability too is that there truly are no survivors. A new Eighth shall have to be made, and very quickly."

Midori listened to that smoothly spreading voice, wondering at how much more preserved Shizuru was with this than she had been with the news of her girl. She did not know the workings of Shizuru's armour, which deemed relief and joy permissible to show. True grief to Shizuru, on the other hand, was necessarily private. Only its sublimations would she show to others, a pale and pink showing compared to the bloodier wound within.

"I shall send a message to Shizuma presently to that end," the young woman continued. "I am a legion down, it appears; I had hoped to have the Eighth with me again. What a pity." Her brow crumpled for an instant, but very weakly. "And Aidou Yuuji, Midori-han? What of the man?"

The governor swallowed, wanting to cry for the young woman who would not allow it of herself. "Of Aidou Yuuji, they had no news. We presume he's fallen as well."

"I see. You said it was the Otomeian scouts attached to the Seventh to report this. The Eighth was given no obsequies, then, and left at the site?"

"I'd think so... Those few scouts couldn't have done much."

"True," the general returned. "If indeed a full legion has perished-ye gods, the number!-it would take a full legion too to see to all the rites necessary for them. The bodies would have been left there, as I understand the Mentulaeans to be unconcerned with clearing out their battlefields. I shall write a letter to the Pontifex Maximus interceding for their shades' passage, in case something happens to the remains before I get to Argentum. A contract shall have to be drawn up, the necessary coin for Charon paid in lump. That should see the Eighth safely across the river."

She stopped and indulged in another, shorter silence. She had to clear her mind, which was fogged with the shades of the Eighth. They seemed to return to her as translucencies, yet ones choked with detail from the intimacy her association with them had once held. How many such people had she known, anyway, and lost in some battle or other? Beyond the Eighth, beyond her Northern Campaigns, beyond even her campaigns as a general? Hundreds upon thousands, perhaps. Some she had known as their general, some she had known when she had been a mere contubernalis. And so many of those people's deaths had been unnecessary-casualties that she believed could have been prevented easily had some bungler or other been endowed with either more foresight or less authority relative to hers.

I am old, she thought with bitterness, to have seen so many deaths. I know not how many there have been, but certainly enough to last a lifetime. Yet my enemies in the House apostrophise me as 'too young' when I stand among them. Their condescension of me is laughable when I think of it. How many of those couch generals of our Senate have also seen the bereavement I have? How many of them have known their soldiers as I knew mine, and lost them?

Midori's voice reached out and slipped through her musings: "I'm sorry, Shizuru. Gods damn it, I was cursing Masashi when I found out. It's a bloody shame and..." A harsh rasp of breath. "Fuck Jupiter, but I'm really am sorry about it all."

Shizuru shook her head, ignoring the uncharacteristic blasphemy Midori had just uttered.

"No," said the young woman. "It was not your doing, after all."

She smiled at Midori even as something in her eyes reared its head for a dangerous moment.

"Another shall pay tenfold for this horror," Shizuru vowed. "I swear it."

Midori nodded, feeling the words more ominous because they were said so quietly and with that strange light in Shizuru's eyes.

"Please proceed with what you were saying. The sooner I know everything, the sooner I may take action," Shizuru went on. "Sosia is holding out, then, with the Seventh encamped outside?"

"That's right," replied Midori, very glad to be given a different subject. "The Seventh's complete, thank the gods! A little whittled down due to recent battles, it seems, but faring well. The garrison in Sosia's walls is—oh, you know it already, yes? And your other old legate's there as well."

"Toshi-han, yes. I recall." Shizuru's brows drew down slightly. "The Ninth and Eleventh had not arrived at Sosia yet when your men entered Masashi's camp?"

"Correct. My couriers couldn't get into Sosia's walls, unfortunately. The enemy was a little tighter on the security there."

"And your men just returned recently, you said?"

"Right about the time I got your note telling me to prepare."

"Have you sent word to Hime of this information, Midori-han?"

"Not yet, as I wanted to know what you would prefer to do first."

Shizuru's smile appeared.

"I thank you for that consideration," she said with great sincerity. "Let us discuss that later, please. For now, let us move on to the details of Argus's situation itself. I began, before our detour, by asking if there were enemy reserves nearby and you said there were none."

"Yes. The lay of the land isn't cooperative for concealment, if you've noticed: no ravines, no big-enough groves, no hills for a good mile or so. And even after that mile, my scouts say there's nothing still." The governor snorted hot derision. "Typical of the Mentulae, isn't it? All numbers, all brute display."

"It does stand to reason if their primary intent is to threaten off reinforcements to Sosia by merely looming out there."

"A ridiculous bluff! They've managed to pin us for a while, though, and I'll admit that." A small smile as she thought about it. "Even if there isn't that much to pin."

"Indeed. I shall pull out that pin today."

Midori leaned forward, not bothering to hide her excitement at the promise.

"How?" she demanded. "How do you plan to do it?"

"With your help."

Midori nodded and tried to enquire again, but Shizuru beat her to it.

"You are putting all your resources at my disposal, Midori-han?"

"You're the one with proconsular imperium. Of course I am."

"And the Otomeian legion here is uniform in composition? All work with the rhomphaia?"

"All of them, yes."

"And your militia is ready for marshalling, your officers said?"

"Yes!"

Shizuru looked satisfied.

"Then it is settled," she said. "I would borrow your troops for the battle later, Midori-han. How kind of the Mentulae not to burden the plan with reserves! Still, I shall provide for the outside possibility too, to be certain. This shall be interesting."

The other woman had been sitting on her exasperation, and these words finally caused it to escape.

"Interesting?" Midori said. "I've been trying to tell you that I'm right here and I'm interested! You've yet to shed light on your plan, Shizuru, for all you've been waving the damned lantern in my face."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow with lordly sloth, as if Midori were some interloper she had forgotten to be present. For a second the governor of Argus felt like an intruder in her own command tent.

"I beg your pardon for my atrocious behaviour," the younger woman told her placidly. "I promise I shall explain shortly, Midori-han, although I would prefer to say it in conference with the officers of your garrison present. We should be sending for them now."

The older woman suddenly got to her feet and dashed out of the tent. Shizuru heard her calling someone outside. There were words, more patters of feet.

The governor reappeared through the flap, her red hair dishevelled.

"It's done," she told Shizuru, who was amused by the swiftness with which Midori had taken action. Easier to believe, seeing the woman so, that the governor was as young as she liked to claim!

"Thank you," Shizuru said. "Now all that is left is to wait for them."

Her gaze strayed to the table upon which Midori had perched her goblet, taking in the various foodstuffs upon it.

"You are not suffering much as far as food goes," she observed. "Those skulkers out there have not depressed rations yet?"

"I piss on their skulking!" Midori cried, her chest puffing with pride. "The advantage to having a port province like this, Shizuru-chan, is that it's near impossible to depress its rations unless you attack two fronts at once, which they haven't. Besides, I make it a point to keep our silos-you've seen them-packed full to the ceiling."

"You managed to get the harvest in."

"All of it! I remember-before all this broke out-that we even sent the first crops to Sosia when it started coming. I think Sosia should be set for food too, despite their share of Mentulaeans. Those cunni outside might've stopped most of the land traffic but all Argus's seagoing commerce is still up and running. Given that most of the trades here are dependent on the waters, in fact, there's been less abatement of business than might be the case for other places."

"A fortunate state of affairs," the younger woman said appreciatively. "Argus shall have to be my supply base for the first part of the campaign, then, since I did instruct my cousin to put in at your province once ready."

"I'll inform my people."

"My gratitude. As an initial repayment of the favour, I promise to keep the Mentulae more or less out of your hair." A swift wink. "And I promise to explain shortly, so pray do not try to drag it out of me over-early!"

Midori's nod to this was slow.

"Say now, Shizuru-chan, are you really sure you can't put it off for a day so your men can rest?" she enquired all of a sudden, her earlier worry resurfacing. "I'm just wondering if a day's delay would cause your mission such harm... and a night's rest wouldn't, in my opinion. The men might prefer it too."

Shizuru breathed out a chuckle.

"Did I not have so much regard for you I would make wager over that," she smirked. "And promptly strip you of your purse. My men have spent several months of nothing but drills and construction work in Fuuka-and while that has served to keep them fit, it has also served to whet their appetite for a return to what they truly do best: fighting. I assure you the Fourteenth is so worked up for a taste of blood that they would beg me to give battle now if I so much as hesitated."

More to the point, you've made sure they reached that state, Midori replied in her mind. She was not deceived by the coolness of the younger woman in front of her, guessing that there were even more troubles on Shizuru besides the ones she knew. Why, one only had to imagine what she had done to snatch this latest command off the Senate! No doubt something that also bought her enmity, and even more enemies. Well, whatever it had been, that tranquil confidence was all the more impressive for it. How could one look like that when weighted down by such burdens, by the knowledge of an entire legion's death, by twenty pounds of armour? Midori still remembered her time in the habiliments and knew how uncomfortable that scarf padded around the neck of the cuirass could be in summer. Add the thick shirt underneath and you came up with a kind of persecution. In spite of all this, however, Shizuru continued to look nothing but languid. The governor, who knew another would just have languished, applauded such masterly control. She always had.

Which was why that earlier slip regarding that foreign girl had her so intrigued.

"Well, if you can end that charade they've got going out there, we'd be much obliged," she sighed, turning thoughts to the matter before them. "Our garrison, most of all."

Shizuru quizzed her with an eyebrow. "I was given to understand you have not actually had many casualties from your skirmishes with them."

"True, we haven't. But it's been hard having to orchestrate enough skirmishes and pretend-patrols to make it look like we've three Himean legions still in here... when we really only have one. The parades are easy enough-but ye gods, orchestrating several of these productions at the same time has been a headache!"

"Midori-han, you are woman after my own heart," Shizuru said, smiling a little. "Thank the gods you were able to go to that much trouble. I was about to ask after it just now."

"Keep the query: I've answered."

"I move to another. They believe it, you think?"

"Every indication of doing so. Take my word for it when I say I've been thorough. I've taken the precaution, too, of having the men throw talk at each other reinforcing the tale, when in sorties." Midori threw a devious glance at her former pupil. "Did you think I'd fail to do that?"

Shizuru let her face communicate the apology first.

"I was uncertain as to the breadth of the deception," she replied. "My apologies for that."

"It's no matter." Midori grinned. "Just let it remind you that I'm not a dried-up old sandal yet, young lady. There are some marches left yet in this military boot."

---

So the Mentulaeans at Argus were treated later to the sight of a Himean army massing in front of their camp, blatantly readying for a general engagement. The Himean front had the form one would expect of an outnumbered army led by an inexperienced general: very stretched to match the Mentulaeen line as best as it could, with a thinned centre owing to the necessity of protecting the flanks. The heavier wings sprawled ahead of that thin middle, with a small complement of cavalry on each side-which complements were barely an ala strong and rather a disorganised bunch, at that. The Mentulaeen general looked and had to look again.

"They're trying," she hooted to her subalterns, who shared in the laughter. "Too bad they don't have more to fill out that paper centre."

"Surprised they'd give battle now," someone remarked.

"It's not surprising at all," the commander said to that. "They just got more soldiers in, so they probably think they have enough to fight us this time. You heard them cheering in there earlier, right? Someone in that new group's stiffened their balls."

"It's long overdue, General."

"True, it is." She eyed the Himean line again and paused as the thought niggled. "Now what could've pushed them to it this time?"

One of her advisors spoke up. "It must be that they think they have the numbers now. Maybe they're eager to make a break for it."

Another officer snorted aloud.

"Desperation, I'd call it," he said.

"To break this standstill?" said the commander, her brown eyes still fixed on that desperate front. "The truth is they should've done this long ago. How many more soldiers did they get in there for them to feel daring enough for battle?"

She frowned, confused why there seemed to be less than she had expected. There was another group that had entered this city too, about a month ago. Could it really just be that they had been waiting for more soldiers?

"They're still far outnumbered," she followed. "And they know it, by the judging. Look at that formation."

"It's Sosia," her second-in-command volunteered. All eyes turned to him. "We know they already know about Sosia, given the number of times they've tried to sneak some of their troops past us and on the route to that city. My bet is that they've realised we're just a pinning force and want to see if they can break us now, so they can finally open the route to succouring Sosia."

"That's what I just said to the general: that they're going to try and make a break for it."

The commander quieted for a moment and let her subordinates argue it out. She herself only continued scanning that worried-looking assortment being pitted against her troops. What a rude presentation!

She put both hands on her hips and drew herself up.

"By Esus! What are you all still doing here?" she demanded of her officers. "You jackals think this is the time for gabbling with each other?"

They shut their mouths and stood at the ready, a ripple of expectancy passing through them all.

"Then we give battle?" one said, so eager was he to get a piece of the fighting. Though he spoke out of turn, no one marked it. Every face in the group communicated nothing but an electric hope that the answer to the query would be positive, so long had they gone now without battle in this thus-far-dull war. In there was also an unspoken but equally electric menace: that if the commander failed to take the initiative now and happened to miss out on what seemed a plush opportunity, there was no telling what the costs might turn out to be later, once the higher-ups decided on an accounting. The Mentulaeen king's favour was as labile as the sky itself, one moment raining gifts, the next hurling bolts and thunder.

There's that delay too, thought the Mentulaeen commander, herself more concerned about the tardiness of the next supply caravan and of the army supposed to be joining them. Argus was actually supposed to suffer a siege soon after Sosia did, and another of the royal armies, very large and packed with veterans, had been arranged to come hard on their heels to that end. Even if the Mentulaeen notion of 'coming hard on the heel' was laughable by Himean standards, the delay for said army's coming was already long enough to trouble even Mentulaeen sensibilities. The only thing the general could think of to explain it was that something had happened to block off the passes, most probably at the river. Which meant an enemy force had managed to elude the first wave, which was theirs.

Worrisome, thought the general, chipping at the haft of her sword with a yellow nail. What were the chances of receiving no aid for this venture? Even if the army destined for Argus never arrived, there was still the one at Sosia, was there not? She weighed the conditions again and decided that this sudden surge of Himean nerve might be a godsend. If she could clear out this paltry foe from Argus, the city would be deprived of its prime military strength even before the arrival of another, larger army to siege it. Accolades would be high for the achievement if she played it right in court, and she could see her station being raised by the king. She would also know better what to do about the delays if she could completely eliminate this force she was currently pinning under the princes' orders.

In the end, however, none of these arguments had as much effect on her decision as the sound of the Himean buglers calling orders. The Himeans meant business, it seemed, and there was nothing to do but enter the transaction. Just her luck they were unwise enough to press devoid advantage.

"It would be uncouth not to oblige that," she told her men, pointing to the still overcompensating Himean line. "Get on, then. We might finally get to finish this shit duty today."

The keen Mentulaeans massed and waded into the field barely a turn of the glass later. Just as the Mentulae wanted, the forward-straggling wings of the Himeans were first to engage them, striking the ends of the Mentulaean line. The Mentulae saw the opportunity and seized it: they took a charge into the middle, intending to punch out that fragile Himean centre.

There they met a nasty surprise. Shizuru Fujino had tucked her best soldiers into the wings and some of them suddenly ran inwards to thicken the Himean curve, abruptly reinforcing what had been a flimsy middle. Those who remained at the wings simply turned to fight the Mentulae from the flanks, being already in a prime position for envelopment.

The Mentulaean cavalry managed to get their bearings in that first confusion and tried to break the manoeuvre by harassing from outside. However, they found themselves repelled by line after line of rhomphaia put there as a guard. Meanwhile, the Himeans' straggling cavalry had abandoned their act of incompetence and reformed into proper units, starting to raid the Mentulaean rear. Caught off-guard by the unexpected reorganisations, the Mentulae panicked and lost the battle.

"Brilliantly won," Shizuru's legate told her afterwards, as the two of them rode to have a look at the enemy camp. The legate turned and realised she had to pull her chin far up to meet her commander's eyes because Shizuru was still astride her monster of a stallion. She pulled her horse back.

Though Miyuki was not a horse person, her first sight of the commander's Otomeian steed had taken away her breath. The animal was gargantuan! It suited Shizuru, yes, and definitely had a certain style to its appearance, but was also notorious for provoking some of the less-horse-loving officers and scribes to back off when they saw it. As well men would run from the creature, Miyuki thought: earlier, she had seen Shizuru use it to introduce some brains to the sand.

The commander had not been reckless enough to literally lead the charge today-as legend had it she did on occasion-but she had still been on the field, and had still been part of the fighting. Mounted on her white beast and easily visible with her scarlet cape, the woman had been everywhere at once, rallying and ordering and doing a hundred other things to keep the battle in their favour. When Miyuki considered what one usually knew of generalship and its normal practice, Shizuru Fujino was as mind-boggling as she was extraordinary. She seemed to always know where to go next and what to do, and never turned a hair in the doing of it. What a woman!

"I thank you," the woman was saying, in response to Miyuki's praise of her triumph. "But I would not number it among my better fights, to tell the truth. Most of what led us to victory had to do with the enemy's faults."

"Which would be?"

"They were bored to death, thirsty for an end to this fruitless business of pinning down the Argus military. Boredom is fine if it has soldiers eager for blood, but it does not wed well the other traits they possessed."

Shizuru paused to free a water-skin from her saddle, offering a drink to her legate before taking one herself.

"Complacency, for instance. They had that too, since they knew they outnumbered us. Lack of imagination, as they did not find suspicious the front we showed to them..."

There was a group of legionaries herding some weeping Mentulæan slaves out of the camp, and the tiny parade stopped when one of the captives suddenly fell to his knees. He retched copiously on the path and Shizuru gave a tiny sigh as she watched him.

"And haste," she added after the unfortunate collection was out of sight. "Only a dead-bored, overly hasty idiot would charge straight into a line with the makings of a horseshoe, Miyuki-han. Certainly you would not see me do so."

"Even if you were leading cavalry?"

A puff of air blew from the handsome nose.

"Perhaps," Shizuru allowed. "And perhaps not. It is easy to say it takes the horse to trample the shoe..."

Miyuki finished it. "But it takes the noose to capture the horse?"

"Precisely. I would be wary even with cavalry. A little too obvious, you know. That the Mentulae bit what I dangled in front of them attests to the carelessness in their command. Eight times out of ten, that which presents as desperate presents a deception."

"It makes sense. Good generalship seems to go with a general wariness of the foe. Yet we did force them into the engagement, since we made it clear we would attack their camp whether they met us on the field or not. What would you have done in such a situation, were you in their shoes?"

"I would come out for battle, naturally. But I would not have charged the line as they did ours. And, of course, I would have deployed quite differently."

"I see."

Shizuru hummed, the sound starting deep in her neck as she flexed it from one side to the other. She felt the rub where the fine chain of her necklace- Natsuki's necklace -rested beneath her scarf. A reassuring weight, as always, and now more than ever.

"Is that the sum of your questions?" she said aloud.

Next to her, Miyuki frowned.

"What?" said the legate.

"You have not asked why I held no troops in reserve for pursuance of the Mentulae who would flee the battle." Shizuru let slip a tiny grin at her companion's astonishment. "You seemed to wonder when I rejected that proposal during our council."

The dark-haired woman managed an ashamed smile.

"I'm sorry it was so obvious," she owned.

"Not at all. I wondered that you left it at that, absent protest or enquiry for my judgment," was the reply. "Yet I think-and forgive me if my observation is short of the mark here-there is yet some doubt remaining. I thought, therefore, that I should explain it to you now."

She paused to exchange friendly words with a passing soldier.

"As I was saying," she continued, "I thought there was no need to keep news of us from Sosia. I preferred, you see, that the Mentulae besieging that city actually hear news of reinforcements coming from Argus, or the south. This would be such that any possible defensive measures they take would be concentrated towards our direction. If any of those who fled battle today head there to warn of us, they would be there fairly soon, if I am right and the road is open to them. They would get there sooner, say, than any improbable but still possible informant coming in from the eastern paths-

Miyuki's head jerked; her lips uttered a muffled sound.

"Thus giving a distraction in favour of the group that ought to be closing upon Sosia now, the legions under the command of Nagayama-san," she said for her general. "I see it, Shizuru-san. You want to throw sand in their eyes."

"Quite so. Or, if by chance word has indeed reached them of Shohei-han's march, at least force them into splitting their defensive resources by virtue of multiple considerations. Let them sweat a little."

"I'm glad you had enough forbearance with me to explain."

"And I am glad that you had enough forbearance with me to trust the order even before that." She fixed Miyuki with a serious eye despite the words. "In future, however, I would prefer you ask me earlier. Should it come to pass that I ever make the error of concocting questionable plans, I would have those I trust to be the ones widening my perspective. We must not forget that every person needs checks upon him. I also prefer my officers to understand as many details as possible when it comes to strategies and tactics. If I forget to explain sometimes, I would consider it a help to be reminded so."

She added with a smile: "Although there may be times when I shall consciously withhold details, Miyuki-han. When such cases arise, I ask only that you retain your trust in me, as I am your commander. Other than those occasions, make free with your tongue. It actually reassures me when my officers do not simply act like mindless puppets whose strings I pull."

Miyuki accepted the mild reprimand. They then busied themselves for a while with their inspection of the enemy camp, which they found irregularly-planned and unbearably cluttered. It was such a difference, they told each other, from their own always-neat, precisely-surveyed bases. In passing what seemed to have been one of the untidier areas, the legate slowed her horse to point out something to the commander.

"You were right in calling them dead-bored," Miyuki said, indicating yet another of the many dice and gambling tables they had found thus far. Some empty cups were stacked haphazardly on one of the stools, and Shizuru could see, on the ground, some tiny bones and refuse she guessed to have been from old meals. Her belly registered complaint and she remembered she had yet to eat anything since breaking her fast in the morning.

"Even our troops do not play this often when given vacations," the legate was saying. Shizuru hid a smile, knowing Miyuki was contemptuous because she considered gambling a degenerate pastime. "Nor do our men erect such areas solely dedicated to the activity."

The commander laughed. "Oh, you would be surprised."

Miyuki eyed her thoughtfully.

"Would you have planned our battle differently had you not thought our foes dead-bored?" she demanded.

"I might have planned differently according to any given change in the situation," Shizuru replied honestly enough. "Up to and including my mood."

A line built on Miyuki's brow. She could not say she liked that answer, as it went far against her own obsessively systematic nature. However, she also knew enough about her commander to understand that latitude had to be given where genius of Shizuru's type was concerned. So she took her time evaluating that reply, aware that her young commander was aware of what was going on in her mind, and aware too that said young commander had probably given that reply partly to provoke her.

"Spoken," she finally said, "like Shizuma's kin."

Shizuru chuckled.

"Miyuki Rokujou has never approved much of caprice, as I recall," was her response.

The corners of Miyuki's lips turned up of their own volition.

"I knew Shizuma told you about my lectures to her," the legate sighed with a flick of her jaw-length mane. "I'm guessing I've been portrayed the stick in the mud often where that tongue is concerned."

The younger woman shook her head in response and removed one hand from the reins to lift her own hair from her nape. The sticky-soiled feeling of her flesh was an irritation to Shizuru, especially with the souring concoction of old sweat being thickened by dust and blood. The climate of the North was milder than what she had just left at home, but it was still summer by the seasons and she had just gone through a forced march followed by a battle, with no intervening bath. The padded shirt she wore under her armour was moist; already she could feel a fresh drop of sweat between her breasts rolling to the slick board of her belly. Her only consolation was that she had washed both face and hands after the fight, but that still did little for the rest of her.

She left the reins for a second to unsheathe her gladius, the scrape of the weapon drawing her legate's glance. Passing a tent with a cord swaying from one pole, Shizuru grabbed the rope and cut off a section that she could use to tie up her mane. The bead of chalcedony on her necklace pressed against her skin as she stretched, and she thought again-as always-of her girl and what her girl might think of her if they met while she was in this state. Hair clumping with dirt, torso smelling of the cuirass's cavern. Would Natsuki wince at the thought of touching someone so soiled? Shizuru could already imagine that perfect little nose wrinkling, its hauteur marred on account of the smells. She knew that her girl was also a soldier, but that girl had never soldiered in climes that could really be called warm. Natsuki would not know the particular tang of a battlefield ripened by true heat, the tart bouquet made up of sun and sweat as it died.

So close now, so close to her!

"My cousin only ever spoke of you with affection, as far as I remember," she told her legate, who noted that the commander looked oddly anxious for an instant, as though there were something she absolutely needed to do and would do that very moment. The expression fled like a dream, however, and Shizuru was quickly smiling again. "That one note on whim stuck more than the rest, so I wondered if you would also subject me to the same well-meaning homily on the dangers of being so capricious."

"No, as you're my superior officer."

"I am hardly as strict as that."

"True. In that case, if you wouldn't be opposed to a note, I would think you should call it 'instinct' and not 'caprice' in your situation," Miyuki told Shizuru above the sound of their clomping horses. "For my peace of mind, at least."

Shizuru swallowed a chuckle. They had reached a small clearing bounded by a row of tall structures, and here they encountered another group of legionaries, this time led by a junior tribune.

"Oomichi-san," Miyuki called to the tribune. She eyed the items the men were carrying out of the tents before them. "Wheat? Are we to understand that you've found their rations?"

Oomichi approached his superiors at a trot.

"Yes Rokujou-san, General," he said, standing stiffly before them.
"There's not a lot of it, though."

"Ara?" Shizuru brought Albinus beside Miyuki's smaller steed. She pulled back a little when she realised her height required the tribune to tilt his head back at an angle that could be none too comfortable.
"How much, then?"

"Well, we're not sure this is where they kept it all," Oomichi conceded, a fresh streak furrowed in the dirt of his brow. "But if we're right and this is it, they'd have eaten themselves out in five more days or so, if they didn't go to find more."

Shizuru exchanged a glance with her legate.

"Five days?" Miyuki echoed. "Why would they have only that much? No wonder the Argus officers said they had been getting quite a number of skirmishes in on the forage troops."

"Quite," replied Shizuru. "That could mean that they were expecting another group of their people to arrive bearing a consignment of supplies-or, given how close that time-frame is, had been expecting such a group for a while now and without success. It would have to be a third party, since it would make no sense for the second-I mean the Mentulaean army at Sosia-to be the one revictualling our Mentulae here."

"Delayed, then?"

"Or blockaded. If it is the latter, then our Otomeian allies must already be up in the passes."

"General!"

The shout had all three officers looking to one direction: two legionaries approached, bearing a kicking and squealing woman between them. The soldiers saluted their superiors as best they could with the Fury they were holding, and thrust the woman forward even as she continued to shrill.

"We found her hiding behind some of the stock," said the elder of the two men bringing her. "She don't look like a slave to me, General."

Shizuru slid off her stallion and approached the trio.

"Well, well, what have we here?" she said softly, towering over the cowering Mentulaean. "An officer of some kind, are you? Or some official, perhaps?"

The woman regarded her with blue eyes overtaken by fear.

"I'm not an official!" she declared in that odd form of Himean the Mentulae used. "You have it wrong! I'm just a slave!"

Shizuru exchanged a look with Miyuki and grinned. If the woman's well-kept appearance were not enough to show the lie, the gold on her fingers certainly sufficed.

"Such rich dress for a slave," the general said, motioning to the finery. "And here I thought your people were exceeding cruel to their human property."

The terrified eyes darted about in wild panic.

"What, no alibis, even?" Shizuru smiled, having recognised the look on the woman's face as that many liars showed before producing a tale. "I am disappointed."

"I stole them!" the woman burst out. "I stole them!"

"Still disappointed. How unconvincing."

"Please, I'm just a slave! I don't know anything!"

"That may well be." Shizuru nodded to the legionaries. "We shall test the assertion later. Take her away for questioning."

The Mentulaean exploded into a frenzy of resistance, thrashing and shouting so hard the men were hard-put to restrain her. Shizuru, who had been on the verge of mounting her steed again, turned back and faced the captive.

"Please stop that," she said, voice full of command.

But the woman continued with her furore. The watching Miyuki reflected that she had probably not even heard Shizuru.

"Very well."

Shizuru's arm pulled back and struck the Mentulæan a blow that silenced her instantly. The woman's eyes rolled up as though seeking something in the back of her head - and then she was gone.

"That should make it easier to carry her," she told the awed legionaries, who gazed at their commander with worship in their faces. The commander was cool as ever, slipping onto Albinus again and glancing at her stunned legate.

"I tapped her but lightly, Miyuki-han," she told the woman with a tiny smile. "In case you fear me indulging in undue brutality. Had she gone on any longer, she would have embarrassed herself further as well as enhanced the quality of her nuisance to Kamijou-han and Nishino-han. And given me a migraine."

The legionaries holding the limp Mentulæan beamed further at her referral to their names. As for Miyuki, she nodded very slowly.

"Er... yes," she said, watching as the delighted legionaries bore away the captive like a sack of wheat. "Some people have no sense of dignity."

"Quite."

Shizuru eyed the remaining man on the ground. The commander studied the trickle of blood from the tribune's ear, a small displeasure communicated by her brow when she apprehended that the earlobe had been lopped off.

"How came you by that injury, soldier?" she asked Oomichi, who dabbed at the wound reflexively.

"A falx, General," he answered. "Nipped me while we were moving the Otomeians into the outer lines. The bastard was faster than his fellows."

"I pray the scoundrel was similarly speedy in finding his end."

"I helped him to it myself," the tribune said with a broad grin, very proud of his accomplishment. "He was stupid enough to wade right into us so I just dipped under his falx and caught him clean."

"I wish I could have seen it, Oomichi-han," the general said with her warmest smile. It floored the man, the still-watching legate thought, and she rather understood why. Even browned by the sun and tarnished with a patina of battlefield grime, Shizuru looked divine. What blasted strong charm these mercurial Hanazono had!

A pity, thought the legate, that it seems to come married to mischief.

"If you have a decent cloth on you, Oomichi-han, keep it pressed to the cut and stanch the flow. I would prefer you have your injury tended to as soon as possible."

"Yes, General!"

"Keep up the good work."

She dismissed him and set off with a fulsome explosion of hooves, Miyuki following.

"They needed this victory," the legate said from nowhere. "After news of the Eighth."

The general glanced her way.

"I am pleased spirits have lifted somewhat," Shizuru eventually replied. "Although I do think a touch of bereavement shall still be called to order in private moments. In public, I would like the Eighth to be celebrated in each victory. They were a great legion, and did not deserve so bitter an end."

"It's a tragedy," Miyuki said.

"To be rectified presently," Shizuru answered.

Her eyes swivelled around and found the next path to take: she turned Albinus's white head that way, her own to Miyuki again.

"I require a bath," she said, evincing no discomfort at the admission. "Between the battle and the heat, I reek close to a latrine. Tell the men to go to their barracks after these inspections and then get some rest. I have asked Midori-han to have the Argus legion clean up. This means I shall suffer no whining from our men in the morning."

"What happens in the morning?"

"We march for Sosia."

---

In the camp of the Himean relief army at Sosia, Suou Himemiya was contemplating her current general.

He had changed, she thought, especially in countenance. Naturally angular, his face had grown even more so owing to the worsening emaciation they all now shared. This reduction was also showing in his formerly regular features a tendency to be pinched, the set of his thin mouth both nervous and negative. Although he had troubled enough to have his mane freshly cropped-an attention, Suou guessed, that was due to the stiffness of his hair-his facial hair had not been equally maintained. That handsome jaw was now obscured, the area overrun with dark stubble. When she enquired after it, he explained that he had told his servants to trim it as best as they could for now, being that he was saving the little oil left for purposes other than his daily shave.

Suou listened to the explanation with a disapproving ear. Her opposition arose from a worry that the men would misinterpret the commander's appearance, and in none-too-useful a manner. In a world where men contrived to be clean-shaven unless prevented by some unfortunate condition hindering the razor-as, say, a rabid case of acne-the growth of facial hair was often taken to be evidence of a fast, or of mourning. Not a very inspiring thought for the soldiers, in Suou's opinion, and not very considerate of their general.

She supposed it was wiser to advise him of that before she pressed to more troubling things.

"Don't say it, let me guess," Takeda pre-empted before her words could leave. "You don't like the plan."

Suou's lazy smile manifested. Might as well move on to my true purpose, she decided, and leave him to his preferences in fashion.

"You read minds now, Takeda-kun?" she said.

The commander rubbed a hand over his eyes.

"I've been suffering from your contrariness this whole time," he told her, the words lent more poignancy by his miserable appearance. "Doesn't take a mind-reader to guess what you came here for."

"Does it take one to guess the reason behind the disagreement on this occasion?"

Their eyes met, and a cold and resigned expression could be read in his.

"Maybe," he said. "But I don't need one because you came here to tell me, right?"

"Another good guess! You should look into a secondary career option if this streak of good guesses goes on." She grinned in spite of his obvious vexation with her flippancy. "Before you worry that I'm putting down the plan you've formulated out of a congenital tendency to pessimism, let me say this first: I do agree that we need to attenuate Mentulaeen power for Sosia to have a chance, especially given how strongly they have been in attacking recently. Our skirmishes in aid of preventing their assaults have not been as effectual as we'd like since-and this is only one of the possible reasons, I must say-we're still so grossly outnumbered. Even counting the Sosia legion, our current foot stands at a disadvantage of roughly three-to-one. As for our cavalry, it's down by about two-to-one, likely more. In light of this, no one can genuinely blame any of us for having had so much difficulty."

Takeda grunted, suspecting that she actually blamed him despite those words.

"I agree too that we might have better effect on the Mentulaeen forces were we stronger," she went on. "Even only one more legion at our disposal would make a difference. To which end I understand that eyes would gravitate first to the nearest available resource, the legion that serves as garrison of Sosia citadel. Being able to command that legion or liaise with it directly instead of trying to time our attacks together as we've been doing would be a definite improvement. Furthermore, I understand the temptation to transfer base inside Sosia's walls, since we know to it be well-stocked. We, on the other hand, are running very low on resources. All of this I see."

Takeda nodded at the summary, his expression circumspect.

"That having been admitted, I see some parts in tomorrow's plan that beg me to take pause," Suou followed. "First of all, I don't think attempting to move the men inside the walls is wise. Even, say, if it does work out that we get the men in, it's still a sketchy situation."

He shifted a shoulder uncomfortably and frowned.

"And right now isn't?" he asked her. "You said it yourself, Suou! The grain's almost out, and the scraps your foraging troops are bringing in aren't near enough. We're on half-rations already, damn it, and the men can't keep fighting on that." Seeing the beginnings of a reply forming on her mouth, he cut her off: "Don't tell me you think we should stick it out and let the men starve? It's not like we can all just escape in search of resources and abandon Sosia to its fate either, because honour would go against that."

Suou resisted the urge to roll her eyes and kept the smile glued to her mouth. Those who knew her better would have noticed the anger she was masking, for Suou's smile stayed near-static when she was displeased: it neither grew nor lessened, but fixed itself like an icicle dangling threateningly overhead.

"And honour would agree with us adding to Sosia's dependents?" she replied, rankled by his insinuation that the forage units-which were under her supervision-were not performing their job properly. "We would just be adding to those feeding off of Sosia's siege supplies, which should be reserved for their people. Some relief army we'd be if we entered their walls with the purpose of their defence and ended eating them out!"

A glint in his eye; he threw her the challenge: "Fujino did it when you went to succour Argentum."

"What goes for a Fujino does not go for a Masashi too."

That had him on his feet faster than a prick to the rear. Then again, Suou thought, it might have been a prick to the rear.

"What the hell does that mean?" he spat, jaw thrust forward. Suou looked up at him from where she was seated and somehow managed to convey with her look that his display had her unimpressed.

"Sit down, please, Takeda-kun," she said in what he found to be an irritatingly reasonable tone. "You know what it means, even if you don't like it. Shizuru Fujino is just not a good point of comparison for this issue. I campaigned with her, so please trust me when I say her reputation isn't exaggerated. Hate her you can-some have made a career of doing so-but have enough sense to admit that she's beyond us where military strategies and tactics are concerned."

A bark of laughter was his reply, harsh and derisive.

"I admit nothing," he growled, showing her his teeth. "So you can spare me the honour of lumping me with you in that confession, Suou!"

She looked, in his eyes, infuriatingly patient.

"Then never mind the admission," she persevered. "If you can't stomach it, cast it off for now. But consider the circumstances, I beg of you! Argentum and Sosia are two different animals. We can't apply what happened in Argentum to our situation. For one thing, the forces available are different. Part of what made Argentum possible was the presence of a very large cavalry party. Which brings me to my next point-"

He snorted, "I don't think I even want to hear it."

"-regarding the way you intend to use the Otomeians," she continued anyway, undeterred. And, seeing that he was on the verge of ordering her out of the tent, she quelled him with a scowl.

"Don't turn me away, I ask you, because this needs to be heard!" she snapped. "If I'm the only one willing to put it to your ears, I'll not miss the opportunity. Choose now if you want me to tell you here, in the privacy of your tent, or outside, within the men's hearing as well as the auxiliaries'. Do you really want them knowing what I have to say like that? You don't have to like my criticism to use it to your advantage. But I ask you to extend me the courtesy to listen, at least, before you pronounce it useless."

A silence followed her request. Takeda studied her for a moment before suddenly dropping back into his chair, his slumped posture communicating a huge fatigue. Seizing the chance, Suou launched into her piece before he could get a second wind.

"I have some concerns about the plan's details regarding the auxiliaries," she informed him as he studied the top of his desk in an insidious scrutiny. "See, I'll grant you that using the cavalry to protect infantry is normal, as is using auxiliary infantry the same way. Foreign auxiliaries are always subordinated in import, and I've no issue with that at all."

One jaundiced eye peeked at her: he was waiting for the bad parts.

"Using them with blatant disregard for their value, however—that I have a problem with," she told him, ignoring his scoff of disagreement for her phrasing. "Because that is how the plan looks to them, Takeda-kun. It's not very palatable, this scheme to have their cavalry draw away attacks while having their infantry lined up as a buffer between ours and the foe. There's an obvious split between our forces and theirs and they look like bait and know it."

He held out both hands and cast her an exasperated stare.

"But you just said it yourself!" he cried. "This is normal as far as our procedures go, Suou. Auxiliaries are always used as a buffer to protect our troops."

"Yes, I said I knew that," she soothed. "But this is a special case, Takeda-kun. Given the sheer strength of our foe and our own thinness of people, any buffer here isn't just being put at statistical risk: it's being statistically condemned. If you go through with the plan tomorrow, you know as well as I do that a hitch in the stratagem will lead to the Otomeian foot being nigh-annihilated. Their horse stand with marginally better chances, but I predict heavy losses there as well. Too much could go wrong, and we have too little by way of actual bumper forces to absorb losses. And don't tell me the losses you plan to absorb are the ones the Otomeians shall be getting, because making it into Sosia with that large a drop in numbers would hardly be a success, by any terms. At the risk of overstep, I must remind you the Seventh is the only legion you yet have, and the Otomeians make the rest. Without immediate reinforcement, to lose even just a third of these would see us all dead!"

Takeda sucked on his teeth, indicating he already knew that.

"Thus my request for you to reconsider this," Suou concluded. "If something goes awry, it shall be damned hard to recoup from it. And I tell you now, with every ounce of instinct I may claim to have, that something shall go awry."

"I thought you said it wasn't sheer pessimism," he said to that, crossing both arms over his chest and looking defensive. "You're planning on hitches, Suou, is your problem."

The silvery eyebrows lifted as she listened to him.

"I understand you're worried," he continued. "So am I. But you can't go around this way, predicting doom all the time. It speaks to the men, you know."

She cast him a disbelieving smile.

"Do you mean to indicate," she said, "that I am now the cause of our misfortunes?"

He grimaced.

"No, no, damn it," he said hurriedly. "Look, that's not what I meant to say. I'm not blaming you for anything." A wild head-shake as he tried to think of what to say next. "I'm not saying that at all, Suou."

Her pale eyes flashed.

"And I, for my part," she drawled, "am not saying I'm an enemy. I am here to advise a reconsideration, as any good legate would do if she thought her general tempting mutiny."

That had his heart plummeting to his gut, his face overtaken by shock.

"Mutiny?" he gasped, as though not quite understanding what the word meant. "Suou-kun, you should be careful with that word!"

"You think me not? I use it with utmost care, I assure you."

He rocked back like a man taking a blow.

He whispered: "Are you saying the Seventh is disaffected?"

Suou conferred him a calming smile.

"I would not say that so lightly," Suou said. "But even they understand their chances with the plan tomorrow and they're not very happy, see. They too are at risk if we do what you want tomorrow, Takeda-kun. It's not just the Otomeians in danger with such a split-army strategy: breaking up our already-small contingent into even smaller contingents is suicide, precisely because it makes them so much easier to swallow for that monster from the Underworld we have waiting outside. Even if the enemy takes the Otomeian bait you want to use for diversion, they shall still have enough mass to form a second head for the rest of us. Do you see now why I insisted on coming to you with this?"

"Do you mean that... you came here to warn me?" A sudden scowl. "Did you hear something? Or did they depute you?"

"I came to advise you. Let us put it that way."

Takeda's mouth twisted as he felt another jet of fear through his spine. Mutiny! Most hated of all words to a general, most abominable of all movements. He could not afford to have a mutiny, on top of everything else, on his hands. His career was already on the way to the pyre, but there was yet something he could do to save it, and he hoped that. A mutiny, however, would kill his hopes more conclusively than even than these Mentulaean cunni could. Nothing could save him if the Seventh chose to act on their unhappiness, as Suou had described it.

Were they really so unhappy with his plan, he wondered. For a second he toyed with the idea of Suou saying all of this only to frighten him away from his intentions, but then he realised not even she would drop so fearsome a word without anything to back it. He was aware the soldiers regarded Suou very highly too, and that she was on friendly terms with the centurions. Therefore, if she warned him of something like this in the wind, he had little choice but to take the pause she was begging of him. He also had to reconsider his strategies now, since she was citing them as possible motivations for revolt. The introduction of mutiny to their conversation had put him at disadvantage, with no choice but to yield.

Which they both knew, he thought irately.

"The auxiliary's even more discontent than our legionaries," she said, knowing she had already won the battle-or part of it, anyway. "Understandably so. How do you think it looks to them?"

He shot her a glower, thinking that she was gloating.

"So that's it, eh?" he demanded. "If they're the real discontents in this story, that's not really my concern as long as they follow orders. If they just do as commanded the whole time, all would go well."

"Strong words, but vain." Suou puffed out a sigh. "Takeda-kun, listen to yourself. No plan-no plan!-ever goes perfectly right! And this one won't see all of them going well, even if they follow it to the letter."

"You can't be asking me to figure out a battle strategy without casualties."

"Well, a minimum of them would be appreciated!"

"Would you rather I put our legionaries in the front instead?"

Suou hissed, nearly at the end of her very long tether. Even if she had cornered him into reconsidering his stratagem, she had to make him see why and how it needed to be reformulated, and her first point of order was explaining to him the importance of keeping their auxiliary working with their legionaries instead of acting as a separate bait or buffer for it.

"Let me put it this way," she said. "Since what seems to be blocking your sight here is the fact that they're just auxiliaries or foreigners, I ask you now to remember that Natsuki-san is one of them. No, no - do not protest that she has nothing to do with it! Both of us are old enough to be frank here and say we understand what I mean by using her as an example. Now, what would you do with her were you to go ahead with your original plan? She would be placed in the heavy-risk areas owing to what and who she is, and can you tell me with a straight face that you'd countenance that?"

He blushed at the barb and retorted: "She's injured! Naturally, she'll not be among the fighters tomorrow."

"So you planned to put her with the noncombatants?"

"Yes, with the rest of the injured."

"A brilliant consolation," she said wearily. "To spare one Otomeian among the hundreds."

A hand slammed on the desk.

"I don't understand what the hell you want!" he said, not up from his seat but perched on its very edge. "Do you want her safe, or don't you? If it'll make you so happy, I'll order her to the front line myself!"

Suddenly her face was level with his, her light eyes a mere foot away.

"You try that and see if the woman you hate so much doesn't hunt you down," she told him, articulating every word with portentous lack of expression. "As I've been telling you all this time, one look at that field says that anyone on the front lines tomorrow will die. And I vow to you now, by all the gods, I myself shall bring you to a reckoning if you so much as utter that order."

Then she was back in her seat again, the slight stirring of her hair the only testament to that rapid lunge.

"I hope that settles that," she said to him. "Cast it from your mind, Takeda, or see me break it out myself. I'll not break any laws where the army is concerned, but say that again and I shall."

Takeda sat stunned in his chair.

"Suou," he stammered. "Gods' sakes, Suou... See here, I wouldn't do that to her!"

"No?" she asked coldly.

"I didn't mean that, by Jupiter. I didn't!"

"Then don't say it again."

He wheezed out a groan, squeezed both eyes shut as if in pain, and held out the palms of hands.

"Look," he said. "What do you want me to do? I can't let this go on for much longer-our men are going to either starve to death at this rate or fall in battle from weakness. We have to move! I know you're insistent that we wait it out here, in this camp, but we don't know when the promised reinforcements from Otomeia or from Argus will arrive. It could be tomorrow, next week, or the next fucking year. We don't know when!"

A deep breath from him.

"I'm worried even if our men don't die from hunger, we're still sitting ducks out here," he told her, speaking slowly in an effort to make her understand. "We can't hold this place much longer, especially with weakening men. There's too many mouths too feed and not enough to go around, especially now that we have the Otomeians with us too. I'm not about to rely on the Sosia legion either, especially after that fiasco last time."

He was talking about a particularly gruelling engagement against the walls where the Mentulae had brought to bear every single piece of artillery on Sosia citadel, along with every soldier they could spare. Part of the walls had been severely damaged, and the foe had taken heart from that, making attack after attack with unusual vigour. It had taken all of Takeda's forces as well as every able fighting man and woman in Sosia to drive them away. Though the end of that day saw Sosia still in Himean hands, there were grievous losses.

"I don't know how much they lost then, but I'd bet no less than three cohorts," Takeda said disgustedly, not bothering to state their own losses, both from the Seventh and the auxiliary. "Those cunni saw us retire with fewer men than we brought, and they know we suffered more than they did in that fight. They're not crazy about coming up here yet, thank the gods, but one day they will. And if the Mentulae get the idea of falling on this camp, the whole pack of them... Well, fuck it all, but we're finished. You know we're finished."

Suou sighed, because she did know it. The choice she was rooting for-to wait out the arrival of reinforcements and keep eking out survival through the little the foraging troops were finding-was a big gamble too, resting upon the promptness of the Ninth and Eleventh, upon the inability of the Mentulae to decide to take out their little camp in one full attack, wary as the heathens were of the Himean fortifications. Nearly as many conditionals as Takeda's plan, she admitted, even while hiding her discomfort from the man whose scheme she was trying to overturn.

She wondered what Shizuru would do in such a situation. Would that I had her mind now, she thought sadly, feeling just the slightest twinge of self-disappointment. Ambition could not cause her to envy Shizuru's talent, but the welfare of people under her care did. She had to do all in her power to preserve what was left of the Seventh, as well as the Otomeians with them. And though she was doing all she could, she was yet acutely conscious of the same weariness in Takeda infecting her, tainting her with its malaise. Why did she feel as though she was only making a horrid situation just a little better, but not getting any closer to solving it? And what could she do to solve it, anyway, short of conjuring a miracle?

I am empty, she admitted. What a pity for all concerned that I haven't the spirit of Ulysses that possesses Shizuru-san: that one's cup runneth over with guile. In some inarticulate place nestled deeper than logic, Suou knew Shizuru would be able to figure out something in this situation, would somehow prevail. Because she was the darling of the gods, Fortuna's favourite. And why was she the darling of the gods and Fortuna, anyway? Probably because the gods and Fortune loved people who were, even absent divine aid, so inhumanly excellent in all they did.

"I think there's only one thing for it if you're not willing to wait it out here," she finally replied. "We have to fight our way to Sosia in square formation, on defence the whole way. The first third or even half of the way can be marched, but we would be kidding ourselves to think the Mentulae wouldn't engage us once they are able to muster. They have no intention of letting us enter the citadel, so much we've seen from past manoeuvres. So the best way to Sosia shall be the tough one, probably a tortoise creep-fighting most of the time."

He seemed to think about it.

"It's not a bad idea, as far as protection goes," he said after some moments. He stared grimly at her. "What do you think of trying it at night? It might allow us to get further on before they give a fight."

"I advise against it, unless you feel confident enough to fight in the dark."

"No, you're right-I don't," he admitted. "The men might actually do worse then. I shit on this place! I wish we could do another distraction like the last time."

"Given that we shall be traversing a plain this time, I would hardly expect any misdirection on our parts to matter much."

There passed a silence long enough to indicate he was considering her suggestions. Suou waited, preparing additional arguments in case he had yet to be convinced by her words.

Finally he stirred.

"All right," he settled brusquely. "I'll go with your suggestions. But no more talk of staying here. We have to get inside Sosia tomorrow and that's it, Suou. Do I make myself clear?"

Suou shrugged.

"You make yourself clear," she said. "I'm not perfectly happy, but you make yourself clear. You'll announce the changes now?"

He got to his feet. "I'll send for the others."

"And I'll help you."

The assembly of the officers was fast and they were soon apprised of the modifications. It was dark by the time they finished spreading the word to the rankers and auxiliaries, however, and Suou retired to a late dinner with her tent-mate.

"A pity he would not concede more," she told Natsuki at their table, over a sorry meal of bread and dried meat. The bread was stale and weevilly, and the meat headed for shoe leather. Concerned for her charge, Suou had replaced Natsuki's portion with some boiled fowl the foragers had hunted. The birds were small and lean but still softer than what she herself was eating. Although Natsuki's stomach was in better state than before and the surgeons had pronounced her able to eat tougher solids again, Suou had still quailed at the thought of reintroducing the girl to them with such poor fare. This, even though the army doctors said that it would do no harm now.

"It might do no harm, yet do no good either," she had responded to this. "As I see it, the girl doesn't need to eat such rude-tasting food to regain weight. If a bit of hunting's worth shall suit her better and add to the encouragement to finish her meal, then I see no reason not to take the trouble."

She watched Natsuki test the cooked birds now, satisfied when the girl seemed quite happy with them.

"Thus goes the pathetic tale of my attempt to preserve all our lives," she said, continuing with what she had been saying before. "Ye gods, why am I now feeling the concessions so paltry? I felt better about them before, but now even my belly seems to be telling me I've not done nearly enough to make a difference. Strange: I do not feel this often." She grimaced at her plate. "Why do we even have to risk slipping into Sosia citadel, anyway? I confess I still see it presenting little better chances for us than what we'd have if we took the risk of staying put instead."

Her companion was staring down a hunk of bread and picking out baked weevils from it.

"I do not... like it," the girl grumbled, teeth on her bottom lip from concentration.

"Neither do I, but we've no choice."

"Still, I do not like it. Stupid. It - it is-" Natsuki searched her lexicon for the appropriate word before finally coming up with one she had just employed: "It is very much of the stupid."

Suou gnawed on the inside of one cheek.

"I know," she muttered. "The best part of it is that our commander thinks himself subject to some jape by the gods and his enemies, but he's the real editor and we the casualties in the farce. Did he only have sense enough to rise beyond this dream of persecution, he would see that he has never needed to play victim."

She rocked her stool and fell into a dark reverie, woken from it only when Natsuki uttered one of her Otomeian exclamations.

"Never seen so many," the girl told Suou, showing off yet another insect's carcass between her fingers. "They do not properly..." A shake of her head as she searched for the word she wanted again. "Anikmao?"

"Ah, you mean 'sift'," Suou responded. "Yes, they're not sifting it as much as they could. Then again, considering the quality of what remains of our flour at this point, they would probably halve it by sifting it that strictly, mind you. Perhaps you should eat that weevil after all-gods know the bread already tastes like dust anyway. Why not supplement it with whatever else there is?"

She ripped a piece of bread from her own roll and stared at it resentfully.

"Because the foraging troops are bringing in scraps, eh?" she spoke on, recalling one of Takeda's remarks to her. "Well, why should it be otherwise? We're but peddlers in this case, praying to the gods for scraps of good fortune. I wish he would try to remember who beggared us into this, all the same."

She threw the bread into her mouth and chewed as though she bore a grudge against the food. Natsuki watched her silently, ears tracking the sound of Suou's teeth grinding.

Suddenly the Himean looked up. Their eyes met.

"Your silent calm mocks me, Natsuki," Suou said.

Natsuki frowned.

"I learn," the girl said in her usual truncated style, leaving Suou to wonder what exactly she had learned. "But you are troubled."

Suou laughed. "I am that indeed!"

"More than ever."

"This seems as good a time as any to test my boundaries for worry, yes," the legate said with more dark humour, popping another morsel of bread between her teeth.

"You changed some things."

Suou hummed deep in her throat and pushed the sawdust in her mouth to one cheek.

"Precious little," she said, careful not to open her lips too much. She swallowed. "Scanty."

"But still some things. It is not good yet, but it is better."

"Little better."

"Suou!"

Suou looked up again and found Natsuki's gaze searing into hers. The girl's eyes were darker in the dimness of the tent and Suou's expression softened as she saw again the odd familiarity of her sister's strength somehow refracted in this foreign and frail being.

"Little is also a difference, Suou," the young woman told her. "And difference, it matters. Suddenly you are harsh to yourself."

"Am I?" Suou sighed. "Perhaps I'm trying to keep myself on my toes, is all."

"You tread on your toes, rather," the girl replied, dead-earnest.

"Unlike you and unwarranted. This is something great patricians do sometimes, maybe? There are times like now... times you are like Shizuru."

The Himean froze mid-chew.

"You are troubled by how little you see the changes," Natsuki told her. "But you said earlier: all you could change was changed. What more does one do besides that? I am grateful for this much you call little. My men will remember this well. As will yours, I think. But mine, even more."

Suou was a little stunned by this unexpected solace.

"We are grateful for all you do for us," Natsuki repeated, returning immediately after to her food as though nothing of consequence had passed between them.

"My pleasure, Natsuki," Suou said after a quick gulp of the food in her mouth. "It was my pleasure to convince him to make such alterations. I only apologise that I couldn't convince him to do more, really."

Natsuki shook her head to show the apology was unnecessary.

"Although, to be honest, I'm not entirely certain either that my recommendation would have been so much better than his."

Natsuki said that she thought it was.

"Well, I thank you for that, although I must admit it doesn't exactly lift the spirits considering I failed to bring him around to the proposal." Suou finally grinned, and it relieved Natsuki to see it. "Still, there's little for it now but to hope the gods favour us tomorrow. And to take the small successes where we find them, as you say."

They both partook of some food before continuing their conversation, their faces wan.

Suou tried to explain what was the matter with their commander.

"He wasn't so unhinged before," she told Natsuki. "I think it's the strain that's responsible for this deterioration. The anxiety has been pushing him down lower than I've ever seen before. Perhaps he'd not even be this labile a leader if not for everything that's been going against his case ever since this started."

"This is the lowest you know of him?" Natsuki asked, tearing off a shred of meat from a bird wing. "He was different before?"

"Rather. I did like him well enough before all of this happened, you know, on more or less friendly terms. He didn't strike me then as staggeringly incapable. Maybe it's just that he is one of those who can't stand this degree of pressure."

Natsuki mulled this over while tearing the meat in her hands into smaller shreds. Suou eventually had to stop her when she apprehended that Natsuki was doing it unthinkingly, a kind of fiddle while musing. By the time Suou intervened, the scrap of meat had been frayed into several pathetic wisps, stringy as the unravelled ends of twine. Natsuki pouted at her own doing.

"I wonder," the girl began, switching to their other language. "You think he approaches his nadir because of so many problems or you think he does so because of so many responsibilities?"

Suou's brow creased as she attempted to think of the answer.

"Fair enough," she said, answering Natsuki's Greek with Himean. "Maybe I am just trying to justify my past association with the man."

In the end, I don't know which it is."

"Either way, my esteem of him does not grow." Natsuki's face, so thin yet still thick with character, peered closely at Suou's classically fair face. "Worth is, to me, measured in... ah, consistency . "

Suou saw the justice in the concept.

"I worry too about the morrow," Natsuki added. "But I know too there is no choice but his. I - no, we - will follow the order. But we will do all we can to improve it where there is - is latitude, no?"

"Well said," Suou replied, giving an approving dip of the chin.

"You're right, of course. There's nothing more for it than to see what can be done once we get there." An explosive exhale, strong and filled with the concerns that had been so heavy on her spirit. "No use moping about it here. Pardon my rudeness over our dinner, Natsuki. I've no idea what came over me."

Natsuki nodded and returned to her fare. Suou called her attention to something.

"This is the last of the honey." The Himean pushed towards her a saucer of the syrup, which was yet untouched. "I suggest you eat it with your bread to make it more bearable, Natsuki."

Natsuki nodded and gingerly touched the tip of one finger to the honey's surface. She sucked on the digit afterwards and the sweetness fluttered her lashes.

"You too?" she offered, sliding the saucer closer to the other woman-who was smiling at the thought that, had she been a certain someone, Natsuki would have likely offered the finger instead.

"No, it's all right." Suou tore off a crust of the stale bread and dipped it in her goblet. "I have a bit of wine left. It macerates well, for all that it's swill."

The green eyes were on hers, shining and alert. "Mass-"

Suou's confusion was transient.

"Oh, macerate," she said to the Otomeian. "To soften something by soaking it in a fluid. A verb."

Natsuki nodded rapidly several times, silently mouthing the word. She shot up and towards Suou's desk, grabbing writing implements. The Himean, for her part, had been well-habituated to Natsuki's eccentricities by now. She waited without looking.

"There," she said, after having written the word on the used parchment Natsuki had brought. "That is how you spell it."

Natsuki purred over the letters Suou had written, still mouthing the word. Eventually she repeated it to her own satisfaction, and she thanked her companion for the lesson.

"You're welcome," Suou answered, still a little distracted by thoughts of the next day. She surfaced from her considerations long enough, however, to ask the girl to eat already.

"Those look like the kind to toughen as they cool," she said, pointing to chick-sized fowls in Natsuki's bowl. "Let us not waste the cooks' trouble, please, for I had them boil those to softness for you especially. Your belly may not take as well to them if you ingest them when they have turned stiff."

Natsuki finally drew away from her parchment.

"I will... macerate first," she murmured, more to herself than to Suou. "The bread."

"You go to it, Natsuki. You go to it."

Suou got a dirty look for that, but paid it no notice. Once they had finished with their repast and were just finishing their cups-both of which they had refilled with water, the wine stores having been near-depleted-Suou got up and headed to her desk for the regular ritual.

Natsuki reached over to her cot for a dagger she had been polishing.

"Suou," she said, as the older woman sat to her correspondence. "Those letters you write are again for..."

Suou concluded the name. "Shizuru-san, yes."

Natsuki hummed and slipped her dagger from its damascened sheath: it was the one Shizuru had given her and she treasured it with a vehemence requiring its maintenance each evening. She picked up the cloth she used to clean it and took it to the blade, her green eyes fixed on the wicked blue edge.

"What is it?" Suou followed. "Why do you ask that?"

Natsuki took her time to reply.

"Always, you write them," she observed after a while.

"Not every night. But yes, I suppose it seems I'm always at it."

"Always," Natsuki went on, "you do not send them."

"True, I don't do that."

"Even when... when the messenger from Argus was sent back."

"True, even then."

A silence passed as Natsuki finally parted her gaze from her blade, directed it to the back of Suou's flaxen head.

"But why?" she asked. "Why write, if you will not send?"

Suou stopped what she was doing. Her chair scraped and she turned to face the girl.

"Is this about my cautioning you not to send any letters to Shizuru-san either, when Midori-san's messengers slipped in?" she asked, her pale eyes twinkling. "You didn't question me then, so I thought you understood."

Natsuki's frown deepened. Her reasons for agreeing with that injunction at the time were not equal to Suou's and she had suspected it. She had refrained from sending a letter to Shizuru only because she had never had any intention of doing so in the first place. Why burden Shizuru with inconsequential words now, after all, when Shizuru would undoubtedly have dozens of other problems to deal with upon returning here? Besides that, Natsuki was quite resigned to her reality: given everything that was happening, she doubted her chances of coming out of all of this as one of the living. If she lived, the words she wished to write would be another matter, and probably expressed somehow, some way. But if the worst happened, as was a distinct possibility, she had to consider the welfare of those left behind. And Natsuki had had enough experience in the subject to know that the most destructive words were always those last spoken by the dead.

"Speak your reason, Suou," she said simply. "Then we see if I understand."

"I forbade your sending any letters to her in particular," Suou explained. "Because I was afraid of what might happen were our couriers unfortunate enough to be waylaid by Mentulæan scouts-or bandits, even, who might be in their pay."

Natsuki cocked her head at the apparent disparity she had found, looking like a pup trying to identify a foreign scent.

"But you took the risk," she pointed out. "For the formal letters to the governor of Argus."

"Yes, I did," Suou told her. "But that was a calculated risk. The information there about our strength means little to the Mentulæ, even if they do intercept it. Any information to be gleaned from-well, pardon me if I am indelicate here-from Shizuru Fujino's lover, however, is too sensitive for that gamble."

The other made no secret of either her confusion or her embarrassment.

"I dare not risk the Mentulæ suspecting what you are to Shizuru-san," Suou said. "Not just for Shizuru-san's sake or yours, but for everyone else's too. If the foe knew who you are to her, they would be likely to actually go with our worst fears and attack our little camp in full cry, just to bear you off as a prize. Even were Shizuru-san not returning to battle with them and inspire the wretches to such symbolic attacks, the fact remains that she once practically spat on the dust where their Emperor stood, then rubbed his face in the resulting mud. Do you think he'd not remember her forever for that? I daresay he might have even informed all his underlings and officers at court to bring him Shizuru-san, did any of them luck out and encounter the woman. The same for anyone who is proven to have so deep a relation to her. They would make you a trophy, dear-of the kind that you subject to indignities, then mount as a disembodied skull on a pike. I shall not be accomplice to that."

She turned back to her writing and spoke on in that easy way she had, which she had noticed to also set Natsuki at better ease.

"What I write so regularly are accounts," she disclosed. "Full, detailed accounts of all that has happened and is happening to us. My servants actually know about these because I told them what to do, should anything happen to me that prevents these records from reaching Shizuru-san once she returns. She should know all of this, Natsuki: the incompetence that led us to these straits, the bravery of heroes like you, the full tale with nothing spared. All people must be held accountable for their actions, just as much as their words." She paused for the briefest of moments. "These words I set down shall substitute for my voice, should anything happen to bring me to the silence of the pyre."

Natsuki began to protest immediately.

"Oh, for Juno' sake-I'm not planning on dying," Suou said, throwing the girl a lazy grin over one shoulder. "But I am planning for all possibilities. If my sister ever taught me anything, it would be to have insurance against even the worst outcome. So set mind at ease. Just think of this as surety."

She had turned back to her writing, so she did not see the look on Natsuki's face.

Suou had disturbed Natsuki deeply in her little surety, for her expression of it rather dropped the girl's low hopes even lower. It was true Natsuki had been calm for most of the fiascos during this awful war, but that was only Natsuki being Natsuki, even at her most worried: that stolidity of character in the girl was due to her fluency when it came to the desperate. Being so used to seeing the worst-and, in a way, often expecting the worst-Natsuki spared little time for either panic or plaintiveness because she accepted the worst automatically and got on by focusing on making the best of it.

That Suou had troubled her was due to the implication of Suou's disclosure, which was that Natsuki had failed to evaluate the desperation of their case. The girl had actually been planning to be in the battle-without Suou's knowledge, of course-so that she could help in it. Natsuki needed no conceit to appraise her own military talents, and knew she had to be in the fray to make a difference with her leadership. When Takeda Masashi had first announced the original version of his plan, she had seen immediately what was going to happen to her fellows-and she could not let that happen to them without attempting counter to it, that was for certain. Thus what she had been turning about her mind all day was how to save her men from certain death while discharging their piteous duty as bait, how to work within that bungling battle strategy so that she could yet salvage as many of hers as the gods permitted.

In this framework within Natsuki's mind, one assumption was that the Himeans would be generally safe. She would not need to go to such exertions as she expected to have to do for her men just to save them. Their safety was the entire point of the strategy, after all, and it was left to Otomeians like her to consider death on the morrow. But to hear Suou, a Himean, a legate and patrician of the first order, considering the same? Well, what that told Natsuki was that, even with the improvements in the strategy, Suou thought no one safe, either generally or otherwise. And if a Himean of such status could think that-here Natsuki felt a violent shiver-what should she and all the other Otomeians think? That absolutely no hope remained?

She began to speak to herself under her breath, which she only did when in a transport of deliberation.

Suou could hear it from her desk. Slow slip of a soft sound somewhere - sibilant hiss intervening - then more rolling, throaty notes. The woman sat through it for a while and pretended not to notice, keeping her quill busy and her hand gliding. Once she had had enough of the background noise, though, she pushed her chair from the table and cast her friend a frown.

Natsuki felt herself interrupted and lifted a raven-black eyebrow.

"You should not mutter to yourself so," the Himean said, obviously disparaging.

Natsuki glared the way she did whenever she thought Suou was putting more restrictions on her.

"Why?" the girl demanded, on edge from her thoughts. "I am not permitted? Why should I not mutter to myself?"

"Because there are some among the men who find it disturbingly sexy, I hear," the Himean replied levelly. "And I do not want you providing additional temptation to my peers. You keep trying to make my job harder than it has to be."

That slammed the Otomeian's mouth shut, she was gratified to see.

"Shizuru-san would agree with me on this, I think," she smiled at the mortified-looking Natsuki. "One more thing to explain to her if I have to maim someone to keep them away from you."

Natsuki's brow furrowed. Suou nodded to her leg and in doing so prompted a cry from the girl.

"Not your fault!" the Otomeian gasped, shocked. "You know this, Suou. It was nuh-nuh- not your fault!"

Suou laughed gently.

"True," the Himean answered. "But it was my responsibility. There lies a difference between the two, Natsuki."

Natsuki's face loosened further.

"No more argument on that, I ask of you," Suou went on. "Trust me to know where my duties lie as well as where my performance is, relative to those lines."

It took some deep deliberation, but Natsuki ultimately acquiesced. The other woman could see she was still unnerved, however, so she decided to put her writing on hold temporarily and chat with the girl for a while.

"Wait, I remembered just now," she said with immense nonchalance. "Takeda said something to you earlier, when we were leaving the command tent. That was your language, wasn't it? You did not tell me what he said."

The diversion had effect: Natsuki made a face. "He said good night, I think."

"You think?"

"He mutilated the words," the girl sneered in her purest Attic. "Difficult to identify corpses so distorted."

Suou doubled over in her chair.

"I apologise on his behalf, then," she giggled. "And on behalf of all other Himeans who might unknowingly slaughter your tongue with their accents, in coming days. No doubt others have already tried similar greetings on you, from among the men?"

The green eyes responded to the query with a searching gaze.

"Oh, I do know about it," Suou chuckled. "And I do respect your ability to hold them at bay-provided you know to come to me if someone oversteps the advance. How have you been holding up against your admirers and well-wishers, then? You must grant some of them are just genuinely moved by your injury and illness, you know, so they don't all deserve one of your famously chill turns."

"I know," Natsuki told her unenthusiastically. "You think me unkind?"

"Not at all!"

"Then I know."

"Fair enough," Suou said with a smile. "Since we are already talking about this, has anyone been so bold as to actually make an indelicate proposition to you?" Upon seeing the wariness in the girl's face, she quickly added a disclaimer: "I need not know the name, although I would like to know the rank. And I promise not to do anything untoward to the person should I discover who it is, unless he or she does anything untoward in the future, of course."

Natsuki admitted it. "One."

"Rank?"

"Officer."

"What kind?"

"Officer," Natsuki repeated.

Suou smirked at the girl's care.

"You'd think me a villain," she said. "An officer, then. And how did you respond to the proposition?"

"I said no," Natsuki told her, squinting. "Very simple."

"It worked?"

"Mm-hm." The younger woman exhaled. "I think the person does - does not even remember."

"How could that be?"

A shrug. "Drunk."

"Dear me."

Suou contemplated the collected young woman with rising esteem. She had heard nothing of this or of any of the officers putting such a fool proposition to Natsuki, which only indicated how close the girl's nature was. How many were the things she held secret! Even she had moments where she needed to complain to another, yet Natsuki held off from even that unless pressured into it. Did all those burdens not try to burst out sometimes, she wondered, smiling at the girl. And then she remembered the claw marks Natsuki had been leaving on herself before, and cast off that question.

"You do have a most wonderful patience," Suou told her now. "I don't think many are aware of that virtue of yours and how well you exercise it. I can only imagine the trouble all these hangers-on give you, Natsuki."

Natsuki stared. This, she thought, from the woman whom half her own troopers agreed to be a veritable gift of god-and that without counting her skills in battle or strategy yet.

" Only imagine?" the girl said with heavy accusation. "Suou."

Suou's eyebrows quizzed her tone.

"Suou, some of-" She stopped so abruptly it sounded like a choke. It took more wiggling from Suou's eyebrows to get her to go on. "They give... Also, they give you that. Trouble."

"Do they?" Suou said, trying to clarify that she had taken the girl's meaning properly. "Just to be sure, Natsuki, would you mind giving me at least one example?"

"Umm..."

"You said 'they', so you might be able to provide a name."

"Oh! Um..." The green eyes slid upwards and to one side as Natsuki tried to recall at least one. "Naoko Funasaka?"

"Funasaka-san, hm? Now I see."

Naoko Funasaka was one of the tribunes on Takeda's staff, and a rather sparkly and pretty specimen too. She was also one of those who had set her eyes on the second daughter of the Himemiya the moment she arrived from Hime, and was always fluttering those selfsame eyes at the unaffected legate.

"Yes, I suppose I must deal with similar troubles sometimes," Suou admitted, making a point of ignoring the loud snort Natsuki released at the word "sometimes". She smiled at the freedom with which the girl had made the sound, pleased that they had come to such a point in their friendship. "It doesn't trouble me much. I'm lucky in that most of the male ones happen to be subordinate to my rank, and so hesitate to make too bold an approach, while the female ones, even if some are close to my position, are generally mild enough."

Natsuki's head was angled to one side. Suou knew that meant the girl had more questions, so she prodded the girl into asking some.

"None of them..." Natsuki started, before stopping herself and shaking her head. "None catch your eye?"

Suou was surprised by the query, though she did not show it.

"No, unfortunately," she said. "Or is it fortunate, rather? Either way, it does not much matter to me."

"Um. Wuh-why?"

"Perhaps because, to be honest, I am just not interested in romance at this time," Suou smiled. "Or could it be going back to it, perhaps, that it is just because I am not interested in any of those who have proposed?"

The green eyes were very wide, and it dawned on Suou that Natsuki was genuinely interested in what she was saying.

Interesting, she thought, wondering at the girl's curiosity. And then she realised that part of Natsuki's expression had to do with enjoyment: the brat was actually enjoying their topic!

Ten denarii says because she has never had this talk with a friend before, Suou wagered, a little tickled by the girl's virginity in such areas. What a time to finally have it, though!

"Why?" asked Natsuki, striving to look serious. "Why... not interested?"

"Heavens, but you must have nerves of steel to indulge in such talk at this time."

"This campaign is good practice for such nerves."

Suou grinned.

"If it would be anything." She sighed and shrugged her shoulders.

"Well, far be it from me to admit defeat so quickly in composure. In answer to your query, Natsuki, I think they're just not my type."

"Type?"

"Type of lover, I meant, or the type I would prefer."

"Ohh." Now she looked even more interested. "And what is... um..."

"Ask away, do, Natsuki! I promise I shall not think ill of you, whatever the query may be."

"Um." A lick of the lips. "Wuh-what..."

She held off and seemed to summon courage. At length, she came out with it: "What is your 'type', Suou?"

"I'm not certain. Someone like you, perhaps?"

Natsuki's glare was withering.

"You are an ass," she said.

Suou doubled over again in her chair.

"Oh, come," she said when she was able to talk again, still hugely amused by Natsuki's response. She had actually taught the line to the girl as a jest, instructing her to say it to anyone making advances. " You began this odd conversation, Natsuki, and I'm not entirely sure you've done it in earnest. I only beat you to it because I rather suspect a joke for me waiting here, looming in the wings."

She received the princess's haughtiest glare. "Takeda Masashi is not alone in the dream of persecution."

"Oh, a sting! You've a barbed lash on that tongue, do you not?" Suou chuckled merrily at her. "See now-I've botched a whole column on this page, and it's your fault for keeping me wriggling in my seat. If I keep this, I shall write that down. Culpability should go to Shizuru's brat for having me so diverted."

"Not a brat," Natsuki declared, nose in the air. "And if you do not write well now, you blame your pedagogue, Suou. And your... your..."

"My?"

"Your shaky hands!"

Suou blew a lock of hair from her face playfully.

"I had a very good pedagogue, thank you, and my hands are quite proven," she told the girl. "Oh, look at this mess. This is too smeared - best redo it."

She balled up the parchment on which she had been writing.

"Just to answer that question you've yet to ask but have in your eyes, Natsuki," she said while crumpling the paper, "I have actually had my share of affairs."

Natsuki was stunned by the disclosure.

"Yes, you've heard little of it, have you not?" Suou smirked, aware that Natsuki heard a great deal more around the camp than she let on. "I'm not famed for my affairs, see, and am fairly confident in saying I've yet to make any grand gestures or follies for romanticism. In which sense I have decent confidence too in admitting I'm not a great lover."

She winked at the girl's slack jaw.

"Yes, I admit that," she said. "I'm not much in love with being one either. I'm too practical for it, is what I think to be the hindrance. That might be the answer as well to why I'm not interested in anyone right now. It's not convenient for me, so I've no inclination to entertaining a liaison at this point in time. One cannot be a great lover with such a sensibility, right?"

Natsuki's mouth made a silent O and Suou smiled.

"Boring, wouldn't you say?" she asked the girl, who denied it.

"Not boring," Natsuki insisted. She threw her head back and stared at the tent's ceiling, the softness of her exposed neck bored into by a pair of pale eyes. "But like you ."

She brought her chin down again and threw Suou one of her beautiful, astonishing grins.

"Always so level-headed," she told the Himean.

"You think so?" Suou asked, flipping the crumpled-up parchment into the air and catching it gracefully. "I wonder. There are yet times when I wonder what it would be like to be more-let me see now, what is the word?-oh, more impractically romantic." She shammed puppy-faced excitement. "It seems like great fun, see!"

Natsuki shared her laughter.

"It is great fun?" the Otomeian echoed.

"It seems to be." Suou flipped the parchment ball again. "One day, I promise, I shall make the attempt. I have no dearth of models after which to pattern my actions, at least."

Natsuki smirked. "You will say Shizuru, I think."

"Come, you should admit she's a front runner where this is concerned. Or I could try to be like my sister, who did flout one of the foundational rules of our world for her wife. Oh, to be a mad, unreasonable lover! I might actually enjoy it."

"Try to be like Takeda Masashi and enjoy?" Natsuki suggested wickedly.

"No, that's very much of the stupid." The Himean checked herself and groaned. "Damn it, I'm beginning to talk like you ."

The other was all approval: "More articulate now, yes."

Suou threw the ball of parchment at the girl's face.

" Tace and let me write!" she said, smiling.

---

The dawn saw them in less jokey mood, for the muster to arms was early and their easy banter the night before had just been a mask for the worries persisting. For all that there had been some improvement to the general's scheme, neither woman genuinely felt good about the day: Suou still had that ringing alarm in her instinct, and her lingering fears of some disaster; Natsuki still had the unrest Suou had given her the night before, as well as fears of her own scheme's discovery.

The captain of the Lupine troopers had arranged for some of her attendants to squirrel her out of the noncombatant cluster and they did so as soon as the march towards Sosia citadel was underway, helping her reach the Otomeian infantry with none of the Himean officers noticing. Only when she was among her infantry fellows did Natsuki release her breath: she knew where Suou was, and knew the woman unlikely to spy her from there. Natsuki had taken some precautions in camouflage as well. She understood by now that should Suou catch sight of her, the woman would stick at nothing to return her to safety-even if safety meant tying Natsuki in a bundle and having her carted off in ignominy.

"Please forgive me, but I would be tempted to agree with her then, Princess," the man marching beside the girl said: it was Otanara, the head of the Otomeian infantry legion. He was crustier than even he had expected to be today, and all because of Natsuki's sneaking into the infantry. "Please return to the noncombatants. I regret to remind you of this, but you made me a promise to keep from the fighting."

"To be held insofar as circumstances permit."

He frowned at the reminder of that provision in their agreement and leaned closer, their heads almost touching as they whispered conspiratorially.

"Please, Natsuki, let the circumstances permit it today," he said. "You know as well as I do that today of all days is dangerous."

"Mm-hm," she said. "And I come here to reduce it, the danger."

"Again, please forgive me, but my concern is reducing the danger to you!"

She snapped him a scornful look.

"Your concern, Otanara," she retorted, "is the danger to the men. I am but one person, yet you set eyes on me alone. Review your priorities-" Her eyes gleamed. "Or relinquish your office."

His voice was beseeching. "If something happens to you, Natsuki, Alyssa would have me relinquish more . Please."

"Enough." Her eyes were forward now, her posture straight despite the slight limp still in her step. "You will be silent."

Otanara's head snapped upwards and his eyes rolled to the heavens, the frustration showing in the bulging cords of his neck. What was one to do with such a strong-willed creature, he wondered. The problem was that, despite his orders coming from Alyssa, Natsuki had sufficient authority to disdain any attempt by him to return her to safety. Oh, but Alyssa would still skin him for this did he live through it! And should give Natsuki a good spanking, he added with some hope.

"A small request, then," he whispered, trying just one more time. "Please, I beg of you, at least stay out of the worst of the fighting. I've set my two best men to guard your flanks but I fear that's not enough! Please keep away from the very front, or else I will be diverted from my duties from worry. My fears today are sharp enough without fear for you severing me from moorings, Princess."

Suddenly she whipped her head to him, an unexpected smile in her large gaze.

"A good figure of speech," she said, genuinely enthusiastic. "It is pertinent to, ah, to naval matters, no? You get that where, Otanara?"

He sighed long-sufferingly.

The march proceeded devoid of incident at the start, as indeed the officers had warned the men to expect. Later, glances in the Mentulaeen camp's direction showed the foe already debouching and after them, and the sight of the accruing horde helped spur the Seventh and its allies into a faster pace. For a few minutes there was nothing but the sound of two armies rushing over the field, both heading towards the citadel. Another few minutes and then it was a race .

Midway through the second quarter of the track, the Himeans were still marching in furious double-step. The sentries atop the Sosia walls started calling out to them.

Exactly halfway through the track, the Himeans pushed all their noncombatants and artillery further into the front end of their formation, intending that these should be nearer the gates by the time the enemy hit.

Starting into the third quarter of the track, the Mentulae were close enough to sting the Himeans' eyes with their dust cloud. Wisely, the Himean commander ordered the officers to slow the men's pace to normal, afraid the legionaries might be out of breath once the armies met.

Well into that same third quarter, the battle began.

"Here they come!" Takeda yelled, calling his buglers to play 'form square'. The legionaries and auxiliary foot made up the sides, while the artillery and noncombatants were at the centre. The cavalry retained its own unit since it would have charge of fending off the enemy horse, and was assigned en masse to one flank. Once the formations had been achieved, the square did not yet come to standstill but continued to march, having been instructed to wait until the officers gave the signal to prepare. These were holding it off for the last moment to further reduce the distance between the troops and their destination.

"Brace yourselves, you cunni !" the senior legate roared to his cohort when the standstill could be put off no longer. He could see some of the men's faces already showing apprehension at what they were facing, and he addressed them over and over in those few seconds before the foe struck, trying to raise their spirits as much as words could. "They only look large, you bastards, because their arses are so wide! Give the cocksuckers as good as you get and don't let me see anyone breaking rank!"

The onrush coming at them was truly fearsome. So numerous were the enemy that the ground trembled under the legionaries, who had swords out and shields at the ready. Yet first blood went to the Himean side due to the auxiliary cavalry, who awaited the clash on their bows. Their aim was unfocused, for they loosed shafts as fast as they could nock them, but each arrow found a mark anyway in that dense crowd of men. The Himeans threw their spears too as soon as the first Mentulae came within range, and achieved similar effects.

And then there was contact.

One side of the Seventh's square nearly caved in at the impact. The soldiers dug themselves in quickly, however, and regained the form even while more Mentulae streamed to the sides, trying to attack them from three fronts. The cavalry came to the rescue, executing passes that thinned the flanks' attackers for brief moments-during which the Himeans could recoup and gather themselves for the next battery. All the while, the general kept on the lookout for the first significant break in the enemy's force, intending to use that for a resumption of the march.

"Now!" he cried upon finding what he sought. "Step until I say to hold again, and stick to formation!"

The action was quite beautifully organised, thought Suou, who was in the fight as commander of her old cohort. The Seventh and the auxiliaries neither broke the square nor fell out of step, and it was in this manner that they worked their way closer to the walls in which they sought refuge. They made their march-now a crawl-while fighting back the bursts of Mentulae still falling upon them, and actually covered a respectable distance with respectable losses for a while. The Mentulae had made the mistake of dashing towards them in that first attack and this aided the Himeans greatly, for it broke up what could have been an unceasing and solid wall into scattered pockets of assault.

The Otomeian cavalry was also doing well, if not even better: the conspicuously garbed members of the Lupine Division made up the tip of the arrow for each raid the horse ran, and these were so effective they cracked open every Mentulaean line into which they cannoned. Part of this was due to the Mentulae's inability to get over their fear of these specific warriors, about whom they had heard many a chilling tale. It only compounded the infamy of the black uniforms that the Mentulae had seen the Lupine Division go head-to-head with their cavalry on several occasions in this siege, and had seen their cavalry limp back the losers every single time. The Mentulae were wary of the sickle-wielders on the giant horses, and it was another thing that worked to the Himean advantage.

Things are going well, Suou thought with amazement, hardly able to credit her own observation. About an hour or so into the battle, they had cleared the third quarter of the way without suffering outrageous casualties yet. Against her pragmatic nature, Suou let herself hope for the briefest instant that this mad idea would work. She could even hear the hubbub from behind that told her the Sosia garrison was coming to help them.

But then there was another tremble of the earth, skittering from her heels all the way to her knees.

"Incoming," she heard someone call. "Their horse is out!"

The Mentulae had thought to hold the remains of their horse as reserve, apparently, but now changed their minds and threw them into the conflict. After them was a thicker mass of Mentulaean foot than the first wave had brought, and every Himean on the field felt his skin crawl in a fever of apprehension.

"Hold!" the general was screaming from his position, his directive translated by the buglers. "Hold now!"

The Seventh ceased the crawl. Officers and centurions yelled to their men to take heart, to ready themselves for this second major assault. Meanwhile, the cavalry-led by one of the military tribunes-detached from their side to stave off the enemy cavalry's attack. Both horse contingents veered to one side, and engaged in their own heated battle. This took away some of the pressure from the infantry square, which waited again for the enemy's human bombardment. These had to suffer those few moments of agony as the foe surged upon them in a pack so large and undisciplined that countless Mentulae were trod underfoot by their comrades still coming on. Oh the steel required to stand fast while facing that wave! It seemed to surge straight from the bowels of hell.

There was chaos when the second Mentulaean mass collided with the square. The sheer shock of soldiers piling upon soldiers actually killed most of those in the front lines on both sides, and led to a break on one side of the formation that cut off the Otomeian foot-positioned there to protect the flank farthest from the cavalry-like a splinter. The Seventh fought against the bedlam to close the gap, hard-put to do so because the Mentulae drew to it like ants to a sweet tart and because the inertia of the Mentulaean charge was still pushing them backwards, actually closer to the gates of Sosia.

The Sosia garrison, which had intended to reinforce them, now had to remain close to the walls. It protected the gates from any Mentulae who attempted to enter, and was forced to remain there even as the Seventh took the brunt of the enemy's strength.

The mayhem was occurring beside the citadel now, and both the Seventh and its foes, as well as the Otomeian cavalry, were unbearably close to their destination. The Otomeian foot, however, was being pushed further away, and had to fend for itself even while trying to rejoin its Himean comrades. Takeda watched this from high atop his steed, watching with consternation as the auxiliary foot failed again and again to return to the square. They all been so close, he thought painfully, until that break occurred. He swore an oath as he saw why the break had happened: it was due to something he had not thought to consider more thoroughly, which was the difference between the Himean and Otomeian weapons in a pitched battle like this.

Because he had wanted to provide for the possibility that he might need to separate the Himean and Otomeian foot after all, he had formed the square of two distinct parts and not mixed the legionaries with the auxiliary soldiers. Part of the square's shell was thus horned with Himean short swords, which worked brilliantly in crowded situations. The other part of the shell, being Otomeian, bristled with rhomphaia. While this was a limited weapon in close battle, it was still far better than the Mentulaean falx, which required space for the swing because it was limited to slash-work. The rhomphaia's straighter blade permitted a thrust, and this was precisely why the Otomeians lined all their rhomphaia-users-about half of the total-at the front of the side facing the Mentulaean advance.

So when the second wave of Mentulae had struck, it met with two very different shells. The first one, the Himean, took the blow upon the flat of their shields, and were thus pushed back while absorbing the shock. The second shell, the Otomeian, welcomed the rush with a solid hedge of forward-thrust rhomphaia-the first few rows of which their wielders had even thought to brace against the ground at an angle. This relieved the auxiliary foot from taking the full strength of the jolt because the Mentulae simply stacked up on the waiting skewers. The break began when the Himean section was pushed off and towards Sosia, leaving the standing Otomeian fragment. The distance between the two sections only continued to be aggravated thereafter, and through minute after agonising minute, Takeda saw nothing but the odds mounting against favour of reunification. The Himeans could make a break for the destination already, but the separated Otomeians were too far. And the Mentulae seemed to notice, for most of them diverted into the gap between the two allies, thickening the human wall that made the partition.

The Himean leader watched this with a heavy heart, and was suddenly seized by dread that he would be able to salvage nothing from here did he delay any longer over the next command. All his experiences in the army had taught him that it was the commander who delayed too much that usually lost, and that triumph went to those as swift as they were ruthless. To his eyes the Mentulaeans spilling around the Seventh were a dread sea, seething with awful portent and ready to drown the only men that remained of his forces. Abruptly an image of the Eighth filled his vision, and he wondered if this was how that legendary legion had fallen, eaten up in its attempt to stand against an outrageously larger enemy.

The battle raged on as he underwent this torturous deliberation. Still no headway was made by the Otomeians trying to rejoin the Seventh. They were also being pushed and had now drifted very far-almost halfway back the path they had marched, in fact. Takeda eyed them with growing dismay and let his gaze go to the proximity of the Sosia gates, so near that he could have ridden to them in a matter of minutes.

"Fuck!" he exploded, spitting with disgust onto the ground. "Fuck!"

One of his tribunes rode up and closer. "General?"

Again Takeda's eyes drifted to the gates and the Sosia garrison guarding the way. He drifted next to the faraway Otomeians, still fighting alone.

He turned to the tribune and made the only decision he could think to make, gaze coming to rest on his precious Seventh.

For every gain there's a sacrifice, he told himself, biting the inside of his cheek so hard he tore out a flap.

The fresh orders blew from the buglers' horns.

Suou, whose cohort was among those at the front, looked up at the unexpected complication of the call. She had expected to hear something like an order to hold, but not the series that were being announced by the horns.

"What's that?" she demanded of one of her centurions, both of them pausing their screams at the legionaries. The bugles blew again and they interpreted the sounds into the tactics being described.

All Himean foot, make for Sosia. Otomeian foot, draw off enemy left and hold. Horse, cover Himeans.

Though she summoned all the composure for which her family was known, Suou still blanched.

"Rot your shrivelled-up head, Takeda!" she cried, ignoring the fact that her legionaries could hear her. She fell back and away from the fighting. "Goddamn the man!"

She swivelled to the salty old primipilus beside her, knowing the man would understand her alarm.

"What idiot gives the men permit to retreat during a battle?" she said to the veteran, who equalled her demand with a revolted look.

"Damn fool thing, legate," he growled, already feeling the shudder from behind the ranks: the order was being carried out by the legionaries from behind. "They'll be on us like vultures after a massacre!"

Suou barked an order to her cohort to stand ground, and the centurions echoed it without question. These were men who knew why she had just contravened the general's rule, and actually approved of her contravention.

"Where's my mule?" Suou demanded, looking for the animal she had taken to replace her usual battle charger: all officers except the commander had traded their horses for mules to supplement the cavalry. "Get me a mule, lads, or an accursed horse! I need a mount and I need it now!"

They served her while battling on, and Suou was soon able to survey the field from the elevation of a horse's back. She noted everything within her sight and wrestled with her mind to give her a remedy for the harm developing even now.

She saw that the Seventh was still engulfed and in the thick of battle, but some of its cohorts had started for Sosia upon Takeda's command. They were peeling off from the square, running towards the temptation of the gates and the safety of the garrison of Sosia, which was extending itself as best as it could to help. But the fleeing soldiers of the Seventh were exposing their backs and also thinning the ranks in devastating measure. Suou could already see the Mentulaeans gaining ground as the Himean front gradually lost mass from behind. Did the front ranks turn now, nearly all of the Seventh would be in cut down like a gaggle of defenceless children.

At least her cohort had taken her order without question and was fighting on. Ushida's cohort was beside hers and not giving way either. This told Suou the senior legate had given mutinous injunction against Takeda's orders too. She could see Ushida on a cream-coloured nag he had taken from someone, and saw her alarm reflected clearly on his handsome face. She considered going after him so he could make Takeda change the order, but then she saw him suddenly go after the Otomeian troopers, who were flagging because the tribune leading them had fallen. Suou realised he was going to try and redirect the cavalry to better effect.

She dug her heel into her steed's ribs, and ran the animal straight after the retreating legionaries of the Seventh.

"Return and fall to formation! Fall to the formation, goddamn you!" she screamed with all her might, cutting off a terrified soldier. She could see Takeda's cohort at the head of the withdrawal, and his paludamentum already making safe distance from the fray. "Return to the ranks! Ignore the bugled order!"

Most of them could not hear her, although a nearby tribune did ride up at her cry. He drew alongside, his horse blowing steam and himself gasping at her rebellious words.

"Himemiya-san!" he yelled. "Stop! The general gave the comman-"

" Tace, inepte !" she yelled back. "The general has killed us with his stupidity, is what he has done!"

He reeled back from her fury and tried again. "But it's clear! We can rush into Sosia now!"

"And be cut down before we cross the gateway, you fool! They'll be after us with nothing to hold them save for the Otomeians, and they'll not even be enough to draw the dogs off our scent!"

She punctuated that with more screams for the Seventh to hold ground. A glance backwards showed her some of the Seventh had heard her cry and were staying with her cohort and Ushida's. But they had been weakened by those who had chosen to heed the general's command, and the poor holdouts were getting the worst of the fight.

And still being shoved further away was the auxiliary.

Suou jerked her mount so quickly to the tribune's that the animals' sides crashed into each other.

"Listen, Ichinose," she said, pulling the other officer close. "Go to the general now. Tell him to belay that order and call to the buglers to reform the square before this gets any worse."

"But we're being swamped!"

"We're being killed now, Tribune, so take your pick as to which sees our chances better."

"But I can't say that to the gener-"

She struck him so hard with the back of her hand that his nose ran blood.

" Listen to me, you spineless cur," she said, taking care to enunciate the words into his ear, which she had pulled again to her mouth. "If you can't bring yourself to speak my words to the general, I might as well gut you myself now. I'll even run every member of your miserable family to the ground if you don't follow my order, and you'd best believe I can do it! Do you understand, you worthless piece of shit?"

He stared into her pale eyes and felt a chill that had nothing to do with his fear for the battle.

"Tell him now!" she said, pushing him away. She slapped his steed on the flank and set him off.

She ran her horse back and forth to the rear of the remaining lines, trying to head off as many retreating soldiers as she could.

"I beg of you, listen!" she yelled, lungs and throat on fire. "This is Suou Himemiya, Seventh! Listen to someone you know well! I certainly thought I knew you! I thought the Seventh was the bravest legion I'd ever seen! Today you're proving me wrong!"

Some had already recognised her voice, and arrested their departure from the line.

"The Seventh I see now are cowards!" Suou was shouting, still running her horse up and down to maximise her effect. "You flee from the Mentulae and present them with bare arses! Shame on the Seventh for having been so quick to follow the order to run, even when they know better! Or does the Seventh know better? Does it even deserve to be called a legion of Hime, when it acts like a lot of bum-boys asking for the Mentulaean ram?"

A good number on the verge of retreat were suddenly back, growling at the insults of their beloved legate. How could Suou Himemiya say such things to them, when they were only following the bugled directives? She knew they had only been heeding orders, that they had no choice!

Yet many of them were choosing to flout Takeda's orders now, and returning to their stations to fight again.

"Prove this wrong, Seventh!" Suou called to them, her voice more urgent than it had ever been at any other time in her life. "Show me I was right in what I always thought, and that you've the most piss and vinegar of any legion I've ever known! Stand by me, by the gods, and reform-or we are all lost!"

They had as much piss and vinegar as she thought, for they saw the reason in her words and took the instruction. More than half of the Seventh reformed and fought back against the Mentulae, gaining precious time for their confederates who had fled for the walls and were thus vulnerable. Looking over the fray as she galloped to her men, Suou saw to her horror that the Seventh had not stiffened in time: the Otomeian foot was already separated from them by more than the original square's length, and was drawing avalanche after avalanche of Mentulae, which it had to fend off alone. She held her breath as an enormous wave descended upon their allies. It burst upon the blonde heads of the Otomeians like seawater on a reef, bubbling after the blow. Suou had not released her breath than another such wave came upon their allies: to her amazement, it met similar end. Suou could hardly believe what was happening. The Otomeians were holding.

"Ecastor!" she cried, following it with a whoop when yet another wave succeeded only in pushing the Otomeians away but not in destroying their wall. "Well done, by Jupiter!"

She ran her horse closer to the front lines, eager for a better view.

The Mentulae spared some hesitation right before the punch, she found after some time of surveying the distant conflict. It was during that infinitesimal recess that they lost power and lent advantage to their targets. Suou supposed the very sight of the Otomeians was also working on the enemy: over half of the Otomeian foot came to two metres tall, the rest approaching it. So large were these mountain-dwellers that they towered over nearly all the soldiers coming at them, looming horrific on the Mentulaean horizon. A blow from one such giant, too, was usually lethal because of the sheer size of the arm dealing it out. In any battle that merely traded hits, Otomeians were easily the winners.

But they're not like the Mentulae, and they've more sophistication than just trading blows, thought the vastly impressed legate, who had already had the measure of these allies yet still kept being astounded by their worth. It was not just their stature that made them so valuable: it was also their discipline. A disciplined soldier of average size might be able to bring down an unschooled giant if he used his wits: a disciplined soldier of average size would hardly have a chance against that giant if the giant gained the traits of both thought and discipline. And the Otomeians had both those virtues to add to their excellence.

We should be arraigned for spending their lives like this, Suou told herself even as she rallied the Seventh in defence. Many a Himean general has complained of feckless and inconsistent auxiliary, and here we are with a Himean general who actually has the exceptions to the rule, yet would squander them in profligate expenditure-and all for nothing. Damn the waste! It's a wonder they do not hate us for our meanness to them, our underestimation of their lives. Even I do not know how to face Natsuki after this.

That was her only consolation now: that Natsuki had probably been shepherded into Sosia already with the rest of the noncombatants, and was safe. Suou had still not discovered the girl on the field, for Natsuki's camouflage consisted of trading her black uniform for the white infantry one and the addition of a helm for her hair. Even though the helmet had been torn off in the scuffle, she was still invisible to Suou because of the confusion at the Otomeian infantry's front, which was just a ruck of men and melee. She had been a little closer to the central rows earlier, but had come nearer the fore upon hearing the order from the buglers, and joined the other Otomeian officers egging on the fatigued men and fearing the worst.

The Otomeian officers showed their mettle now, all of them hoarse from screaming non-stop to stabilise the ranks. They had tried to stand ground as long as possible earlier, but had eventually found themselves so swamped that the mere rush of Mentulae pushed them adrift. The officers-Natsuki included-were half-mad already from the stress of trying to regain the earlier position, but the Mentulae were refusing to give and the Himeans were not coming to help. The gap between them and Sosia continued to widen.

Finally, when it was clear that they had been all but abandoned, the Otomeians realised the gamble they had to take. Most of the Mentulaean weight was now concentrating beside Sosia, not least because of the sight of the Seventh turning tail. Even though a veritable horde was assailing the Otomeians too, they actually had fewer Mentulae scattered over their part of the field, and most of those present were on the side nearest Sosia and the Seventh as well. This meant that the Otomeians had little chance of breaking through and rejoining the Seventh, but it also meant that one avenue was open and uncontested: the one to the old camp.

The Otomeian leaders gave the order to inch towards it, and the soldiers soon picked it up, forming a tortoise-like configuration similar to the one they had just been parted from. They worked their way through the mass of Mentulae with agonising sloth at first, but were soon making even better progress than the Seventh, which was becoming more heavily assailed as the open gates tempted the Mentulae in their direction.

The Otomeian foot's survival depended on reaching the fortified ground around the old camp in time. The Otomeians still remembered the paths through the fortifications, but the Mentulae would be in danger if they tried to follow said paths, and had also had bad experiences in attempting it before. Many of the Mentulae would draw off once they got close to those mined and trap-filled spaces, and the Otomeians were banking on that. And it was only a short distance!

That short distance might have been several leagues' worth. Excellent though they were, nearly all odds were stacked against the Otomeians in their progress, and there were soon good numbers being felled by the Mentulae, their hulking bodies littered in the wake of the Otomeian shell. Some respite was afforded by the cavalry when it regrouped, for it was still raiding the Mentulae and now concentrated on those occupying the space between the Seventh and the auxiliary foot, to prevent more weight being added to either of the larger masses. But the Otomeian infantry plight remained, for the most part, a desperate one.

Fighting alongside her countrymen, Natsuki could see that. She took her turn near the front and battled against it herself. Her arms were raw with slashes, her accursed leg was killing her, and she could barely move from one side to the other without taking a falx to the ribs. Yet she thanked the gods for the last, for she knew the Mentulae had made a mistake in moving the battle to such close quarters: the falx was an unwieldy weapon at best, and near impossible to direct when the user's movement was hampered. Taking heart from this minor lead, she started calling out to the men to break the polearms' stems wherever possible. She herself lopped off two in one sword swing and flung one detached blade into the middle of Mentulae, hoping it would hit someone. It did.

An hour and a half into this gruelling retreat, even the formidable arms of the Otomeians felt like dead weight to their owners. Only the exhortations of the officers still kept the infantry fighting, enhanced by the constant reminder that they were getting closer to their possible sanctuary. It was while giving one such reminder that Otanara, their supreme commander, saw something that made his heart still.

One madman from the Mentulaean front, in an astounding act of defiance, actually leapt towards the Otomeian polearms on Natsuki's section and died on their points. But he managed to land his metal-knobbed club on Natsuki's brow during the landing, and her head snapped back with such force that Otanara feared her neck broken. A halo of blood whipped a curve in her wake, and howls went up among the warriors she had been commanding.

"Shiina! Kame!" Otanara roared, worsening the babel around him. "The princess is hit! The princess! She is down!"

The two men he had called were the ones engaged to shadow Natsuki during the battle. They had been separated from her during the tumult, but they were yet closer to her than Otanara, and now redoubled their efforts to push through the crowd to reach the fallen officer-who was at that moment being shielded from the enemy by a clump of outraged Otomeians.

Shiina and Kame finally made it to their destination and yelled to the others to provide cover, the two of them focused on dragging Natsuki away from the fight. As Shiina handed her to him in order to hack the arm off an approaching foe, Kame spared some time to look at the girl in his arms.

There was a great deal of blood. Red tears in her uniform revealed more injuries, but the one on her brow threw all the rest into insignificance. Kame thanked the gods it had not been a blade that soldier had held, for the force had split her flesh right over the skull and the broken wound gaped ragged, pink with shards of something shiny and white. The red kept blooming from the gap, even though it had painted half her face already. He paused when offered a safe huddle by some of his fellows, all of them sweating ice and vastly afraid.

"My god!" gasped Shiina, who had been abaft him all this time. "Did it open the brain?"

Kame tore off part of his uniform and wrapped it as best as he could around her blood-soaked head. He brought his ear to her mouth, whispering every prayer he had ever learned and making up new ones then and there.

A piteous rattle passed from the lips under him.

"Alive!" he breathed explosively. "Thank heaven!"

He trumpeted it to his commander, whom he trusted to hear the cry amidst the tumult.

"She's alive! The princess is alive!"

Otanara heard. He surveyed their position and saw that they were almost at the outermost set of ditches of the old camp.

He barrelled his way towards one of the men, the one famed for his stentorian voice.

"Call this out now!" he said, giving the man the message and sending him to the rear so he could call it without interruption. No sooner had he taken the man's place than he heard the cry, clear and articulated. At first it was probably futile, but another of the Otomeian warriors took it up, and then another. Soon, they were crying it out in chorus, an odd sound in any battle.

The words they were yelling were Otomeian, and neither the Himeans nor the Mentulae understood what was being said, even when they heard. Takeda's senior legate, who was still leading the cavalry, realised it must be something of import when he saw how the Lupine Division was acting: they had actually stopped mid-charge, and were now holding up all the horse since Ushida had been using them as the spearheads.

Ushida grabbed one of the black-uniformed troopers and pulled her to him.

"What the fuck are they saying, you barbarian?" he yelled at the woman, whose face showed panic like all the rest of her mates. "Speak Himean and tell me what that's saying!"

She slapped his hand off her collar and released a macabre shriek that had him backing away.

"The princess is down!" the blonde harpy screeched, before suddenly riding off with the rest of the Lupine warriors. She screamed again as Ushida tried to call her and her compatriots back. "She is down! Kill the Mentulae!"

Still among the Seventh, which was now reinforced by the Sosia garrison, Suou heard her own breath wheeze out as she saw the seeming defection: the black arrow shot from the cavalry, parting from it and flying straight into the Mentulae dividing them and the now-distant Otomeian infantry. There were yells as the Mentulae saw them coming and made ready, followed by a disturbing instant where the air was filled with a single and sustained scream issuing from the black warriors in weird unison.

They hurtled into the Mentulae like a pack of suicides from hell. Some of them fell, either horse or rider caught by a falx, but so insane had been their charge that the lines parted in the face of their madness and succeeded in opening the way for the rest of the cavalry, which automatically followed. Ushida and his tribunes rode with them, trying to turn them back. But the madness of the Lupine Division seemed to have infected the rest of the troopers, and all of them now rushed to the aid of the Otomeians near the old camp, leaving the Seventh and the Sosia legion to fend for themselves.

---

It was two hours later that the battle finally ended, with all sides drawing off to lick heavy wounds. The Otomeians, both infantry and cavalry, found themselves halved in total and in the camp from which they had set out that very morning and intended to leave. The Mentulaeans, thwarted yet again from their goal, suffered even more casualties among their soldiers. As for the Himeans in the citadel of Sosia, their retirement was a welter of tragedy and pain, for they were now cut off from their auxiliary as well as abridged by an unconscionable number-and that including some of their best, who had held formation even as the less sturdy fled to the safety of the walls. Yet the worst loss of the day, considered the appalled Takeda Masashi, was in the identity of one of the fallen. Among the dead they gathered from the field that afternoon was Legate Suou Himemiya.

The senior consul's sister had fallen towards the very end of the fight, during the last despairing rush by the Mentulae. Busy encouraging the declining legionaries, she had not seen the soldier aiming for her horse, which flung her away before it collapsed from the thrust it took to the chest. Dazed from the fall, its unseated rider had been set upon by another foe, whom she still managed to cut with her sword by sheer luck. Her luck ran out with the second assailant, however, and she fell mere metres from her own cohort, a gaping hole spewing warmth on her belly and back.

Suou Himemiya did not have the privilege of a swift death. She actually lived almost to the cessation of the battle, some last vestige of fortune keeping her from being trampled over by the combatants. Though she tried to rise several times, the most she ever managed was a lift of the head that always pushed more blood up her throat and through her mouth as spittle. At the time the Otomeians finally accessed the old camp and a half-dead Natsuki was being carried into the fortifications Ushida had built a month past, Suou had been living her last seconds in silence, the noise of the battle a murmur in her ears.

Either it ends now or death comes with deafness, she had thought then, helpless to control the upward spin of her gaze. She was amazed to find that even at such a moment she could marvel at the clarity of the sky, which was palest-blue and nearly white, a perfect mirror of her dying eyes.

A bird streaked across the mirror and disappeared, and Suou thought someone or something fell beside her.

But I'm not sure of that, she thought with astonishment. Why, I cannot even feel the wound any longer! She focused herself and realised that the pain had also gone and that the rest of her senses were probably about to follow. Her mind had begun to flicker, and it took strength simply to think coherent thoughts to herself. Despite all of that, Suou was still a Himemiya, and no Himemiya had ever existed whose will was not considerable. She exerted hers then to shape her thoughts into such as she thought appropriate to evoke in a dying meditation: thoughts of those she held dear, for instance, or thoughts about the strangeness of her calm. And, of course, thoughts of the sister she loved best of everyone in the world. She would not see that sister again but she was being afforded time enough to imagine that beloved face, and that was as good a way as any to spend the last of her powers.

Thus did she stare upwards and wait out her own expiration as coolly as she had done everything else in her life, glad at least that the violence of her slaying would not transmit to her passage. Her hearing had weakened enough to turn the roar of battle to a hum, and she was grateful for it. She resolved to keep her eyes open and on the mirror above her. Only there, on this bloody earth, could she find her final peace reflected. So there only would she look, wanting to preserve that steadiness that had been the mark of her character.

But Suou learned something that jarred her steadiness in those last moments. The most powerful human will, she would find, could yet be jolted by a single unexpected idea. Before her crystalline eyes glazed forever, the last thing that passed them was not contentment. This was because Suou's last thought was not according to her own will or expectation, which had been that she would pass while thinking of her beloved sibling and friends. Her last thought instead was of a pair of green eyes sparkling with trust and making Suou's last emotion one of a sudden, all-too-galling regret.

Chapter 56

Thank you again to the readers and reviewers. The first eight pages of this (out of about fifty in total) are heavily political, which means that many readers shall be likely to pass over them. Ah well.

And to clarify something from the last chapter, to her death, Suou was unaware Natsuki was on the field.

---

Illustration:

Something to apologise for the tardiness and something for Natsuki: ethnewinter. deviantart art/Natsuki-Riding-230643924

Please remove the spaces after the full stops.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Calends - The first of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The Calends is always the first day of each month (e.g. the Calends of January January 1). Along with the other two fixed points (the Nones and the Ides ), it was considered a sacred day. Note that dates were reckoned backwards from the three fixed points. For example, if you wished to say "December 25," you would say "six days before the Calends of January," and not "ten days after the Ides (the 15th) of December."

2. Censor - The most senior of the Roman magistracies, although not one that owned imperium. Two censors were elected to serve in tandem for five years, some of their duties being the regulation of senatorial membership, the execution of a general census, the application of means tests, and the giving of state contracts for public works and buildings. Note that only consulars (see note below) could stand as censors.

3. Consular - One who has served as a consul at least once in the past.

4. Corona obsidionalis - Also the corona graminea, the highest military award possible for Romans. So rarely was it given that it ensured a man nigh-eternal glory and, like the crown second to it, the corona civi ca, also bestowed membership in the Senate.

5. Curia - Senate house, the full name being Curia Hostilis; like most of the locations of Hime given below, it may be found on a standard map of Ancient Rome.

6. Curule - Relating to magistracies that had imperium.

7. ( Crop from the ) dragon's teeth - Not an obscure reference, but just to be sure: it signifies the task Æetes set Jason in the Quest of the Golden Fleece. The dragon's teeth, when sown, were supposed to sprout instant, fully-armoured warriors who would advance upon the planter-in the original tale's case, Jason.

8. Equestrian - See note for Knights .

9. Forum - More properly, the Forum Romanum. It was an area in the city dedicated to Roman political activities. It may be found on a standard map of Ancient Rome.

10 . Hercules and the lion - To be precise, the Nemean lion. Hercules had to slay this beast as part of his 12 Labours.

11. Ides - The last of the three fixed points of the Roman month. It was set on either the fifteenth or the thirteenth, depending on the month. See the note for Calends for more on the Roman calendar.

12. Knights - Members of the Ordo Equester, called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight or equestrian rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

13. Leges - Latin for "laws", the singular being "lex", so "leges Himemiya" means the Himemiyan Laws.

14. Lustrum - The term of the censors, which lasted for five years.

15. Medicus (s), medici (pl) - Latin for "doctor" or "physician"

16. Ossa - A mountain; see note for Pelion, below.

17. NOTE: On the lex Himemiya stipulating a five year wait between a person's successive consular terms - There was in fact a lex Genucia stipulating double this period, or ten years. I halved the number because, quite frankly, this tale would take too long and would see most of the characters old and balding before they gained a second consulship were I to keep the original duration.

18. Pelion - Like Ossa, a mountain. The expression "to pile Pelion on Ossa" comes from the myth of the Giants Otus and Ephialtes, sons of Poseidon who defied the Olympian gods several times-at some point, by capturing and chaining Ares-and even threatened to pile Mount Pelion atop Mount Ossa, and use the result to attain the heights of heaven. In literary usage, to say that one would see something done even if one had to pile Pelion on Ossa meant that one would see something done at any cost, even that of defying the divine. Incidentally, for a neat little point: Otus and Ephialtes were eventually brought down by none other than the goddess Artemis.

19. Pluto's vaults - Pluto (also Dis or Hades) was god over the Underworld and the earth beneath the surface, which meant he had a monopoly of the minerals and precious metals to be mined from the ground. As such, he was considered the richest of all the gods.

20. Publicani - What the Ancient Romans called individuals/ organisations hired by the Roman State apparatus (specifically, the Treasury) to farm taxes on its behalf. Tax farming activities were more elaborately discussed in an earlier chapter of the story-the 13th, to be precise-and can be found in the third part of that particular chapter, "parts" being delineated by the long horizontal bars denoting page breaks on this website.

21. Praefectus (praefectus fabrum) - Officer in charge of procuring supplies for the army.

22. Prorogue – A term one may actually find in a lexicon, though the definition used here is rarely given in the dictionaries. In this text, it is generally used as a verb meaning 'to extend (someone's) term of office in a gubernatorial or commanding position'.

23. Rosea rura - Perhaps the best grazing ground in Italy at the time. It was famous for producing the most excellent mules.

24. Tribe - Not an ethnic or familial category, the Tribus was a political category used for voting in tribal assemblies. Every Roman citizen belonged to one.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ire et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Mindful of her cousin's command, Shizuma Hanazono left for the north two weeks after Shizuru's departure, down to the day. She left a Hime besieged by a barrage of law-making activity originating from the senior consul who, everyone now realised, had been downplaying her own legislative plans when she had used them as the excuse for refusing the Northern campaign. Soon after Shizuru departed with the Fourteenth, Chikane Himemiya had embarked on an overwhelming agenda that was aided most efficaciously by her tribunician cousin. As these two also had the ear and general-though not unquestioning -support of the Princeps Senatus of the Senate, the laws Chikane put forward fell upon Senate and People in a merciless and irresistible rain.

The first laws tabled made good on the senior consul's vow to organise the electoral processes of the government.

"The first step is to fix a permanent date for the polls," she told the House in a meeting. "In the past, we have let the consuls of the year decide when to hold elections during their term, as indeed my colleague and I have done this year. But this is a haphazard practice at best and places the elections at the tender mercies of various considerations, political connivance and tragedies included."

"Hence, what I propose to legislate is an actual system. We shall begin by fixing a permanent date for all elections hereafter. I ask that elections be held from now on in the month of July. The day before the Ides of that month shall see the curule elections held in the Centuriate Assembly. Ten days before the Calends of August, the elections for the lower positions shall follow, with the exception of the positions elected by the Plebeian Assembly. Those last shall be polled two days before the Calends of August. This means that all candidates shall be sure to know their fates far ahead of the year's end, which I think most of us shall appreciate."

There was a murmur of approval. It was a masterly stroke, some reflected, to propose to set the elections in July. This made sure they took place during the same time of year as the games, when most of the rural Himeans would be in the city.

Voting of the most important magistracies was done by either Class or Tribe. All Himeans were distributed across thirty-five tribes, and of those thirty-five, thirty-one were rural. To belong to a rural tribe was a distinction: most of the members of the First and Second Classes were in rural tribes, and actually lived outside the city. Majority of the permanent residents of Hime were in fact freedmen and non-Himeans who had somehow gained the citizenship, and the senators and knights of the city were in gross minority against the numbers of these. To hold the elections at a time when the rural First and Second Class were in Hime ensured that true Himeans still controlled the outcome of the elections, and that the classic feeling for exclusivity was satisfied.

Chikane elaborated: "As this means we shall know the next year's officials about five months before they take office, it behoves us to further distinguish them. I propose to give new prominence to the officials-elect by giving them higher status in our meetings. For formal discussions, incumbent consuls shall still be asked to speak first of all in the House, but consuls-elect shall be accorded the right to speak immediately after them from now on. Incumbent praetors shall follow, and praetors-elect shall be accorded the right to come immediately after. The usual order shall apply to all speakers after that."

That saw less approving murmurs and the Leader of the Senate on his feet, his handsome face none too happy.

"If I may, Himemiya-san," he began, when Chikane paused to allow him a word. "You are proposing to rearrange the traditional order of speakers in the House. I agree that it would be but sensible to have consuls-elect and praetors-elect enjoy this 'new prominence' in our meetings, but do you mean by the 'usual order' applying after that that the consulars and ex-censors-and even I, the Princeps Senatus!-may only speak after the last praetor-elect has spoken or been given the chance to do so?"

All eyes swung back and forth between the two, understanding why the Princeps had cut in: he was being demoted in this speaking order, after all, and no one had expected him to take it meekly.

"That would be correct," the senior consul said coolly. "Not to put too fine a point on it, but the consulars and ex-censors-and even you, the Princeps Senatus!-are not in positions of imperium or of currency. I should think it makes more sense to put the opinions of those who are in or about to be in such positions ahead of those who no longer are."

Reito Kanzaki Princeps Senatus responded with a bitter smile. Damn you, Chikane, he thought, recalling their conversation of the night before. She had spoken of the electoral revisions she wanted, but had not spoken of this. The woman gave you no warning!

"But this puts the opening statements at the mercy of men who might have less experience than those who have it in abundance," he retorted. "The reason we ask our fellows to speak in the House is to tender opinions that are wise and well-directed, am I right? It only follows, in my opinion, that those with more wisdom and direction on such matters should speak before, not after."

"Hardly!" Chikane shot back. "The reason we ask our fellows to Speak in the House is indeed to tender such opinions. But we only ask for those opinions in order for us to formulate policies, and that is the true purpose of all our meetings, not mere opinion-giving. In the end, the policies that come into practice after our sessions are at the discretion of those who occupy the offices tasked to execute them."

She sighed and looked supremely weary.

"Let us be honest, Senators," she said in a dry voice. "Most of the time, our opinions count for rubbish where a lot of the executive decisions are concerned. Many a consul or praetor has easily found reason, whether justly or unjustly, to spurn the recommendations of their 'wise and well-directed' fellows. I am not saying that the opinions of those out of or not about to occupy office shall no longer be heard. I am merely saying that it is wiser to have the current executives of our government be the first to tender what they think should be said or done because I want those with more experience and wisdom to have a better chance of being listened to. With what I am proposing, those with the experience shall know what suggestions to make when their turn to speak comes, or what critiques to proffer, and better gauge the way to phrase them in order to make a difference."

She met Reito's warm eyes with her chill ones, her face indicating she could not be bent or broken from this.

"I am proposing it as the order for formally-directed discussions," she continued. "My intent here is to establish a method, Princeps, that may serve as a template for the House when it actually has sufficient composure to follow. You shall take note, I hope, that the template's execution is chiefly dependent on the supervision of both the consuls and the Leader of the House. The Leader of the House is still expected to interject an opinion or his words if necessary to keep the Senate functioning properly, his tongue still the directing organ when disorder threatens. Indeed, this even means the Princeps has an elevated position, for he is now to be charged with ensuring an actual written form be followed. Or have you objections to this very important task?"

The Princeps sat down, at once placated and miffed.

"None for now, if that would be the interpretation," he admitted with caution. "Thank you for clarifying that. Please go on, as I'm sure we are all eager to hear the rest of your proposed changes."

"Six to eight praetors shall be elected each year, as usual," she acquiesced. "From now on, however, I request that a precise number of twenty-one quaestors shall be elected yearly, all of whom-as always-shall be automatically admitted to the Senate upon election if they are not already part of it. The same promotion shall still apply to elected tribunes of the plebs and those falling under special circumstances provided for in existing laws, such as the senatorial membership awarded to those with the corona obsidionalis or civica. Thus for the avenues of entry into our ranks, which should see us sufficiently plump each term. Regarding the consuls, I am tabling a law that makes it impossible for anyone to be elected consul unless he or she has already served as praetor in the past. I know this has already been the established tradition, but I feel it is time it was put down as law."

There were no objections, but someone did pose a question.

"I notice you say nothing about the censors' powers to admit new members into the Senate," said Mai Tokiha. "Does this mean you intend to make no changes to that other avenue for entry into Senate, Himemiya-san?"

"Indeed, Tokiha-san."

"Please bear with me, but just to be clear, will you not be adding to the requirements for admission?"

"I shall not. My view is that the present requirements are sufficient."

Mai thanked her and Chikane proceeded.

"Regarding the consuls again, we already have a law stating that no one may be elected consul two years in a row. I wish to add to that by stipulating the actual period that must elapse before a man who has been consul may seek the office again."

"In future," she said, "five years must pass from the end of a man's term as consul before he applies again as a candidate for the consul's chair. This is a fair period and should ensure that most of the House gets a chance at the position. I am also introducing a stipulation that no one may seek the consulship immediately after having occupied the praetorship."

She was treated to curious faces, as she had done just that to get to where she was.

"Henceforth, all former praetors must let two years elapse after their praetorian terms before they seek the consulship," she told them. "This shall allow sufficient staggering to distribute the positions of praetor and consul across our ranks, and also makes for better officials, I think, since a person can gain a great deal of helpful experience in those two years."

She continued: "For all offices, candidates must present themselves in public and in person to the officer designated to oversee the relevant election. 'In public' means at the scrutineer's booth, witnesses present. 'In person' means no one may file candidature by proxy, save for the case of in absentia candidates."

"Any candidate proposing to stand in absentia must apply to be given a legal mandate for it, specific to him or her and not applicable to any others, even if they are candidates for the same position. No more blanket dispensations shall be possible from now on, and applications for the single-person dispensations shall be reviewed with the strictest discernment under supervision of the relevant electoral officer and the advice of the Senate. I intend to make impossible laws like that passed by Takeda Masashi-san last year, which allowed in absentia filing for all and sundry in the previous elections. Such unspecific bills have been allowed thus far only to the benefit of shady politicians trying to hide their intention to outrun charges or creditors by seeking further office after their terms. That law also led to the predicament we faced in Shizuru Fujino's election, and I shall have no more predicaments similar."

"Thank all the gods for that!" whispered Sergay Wang to his neighbour, who looked far less enthusiastic. "So far, I can't complain with anything she's said."

"Just you wait!" snapped his neighbour, Jin Akagi.

So they waited. The next laws, which came right after the electoral ones, had to do with the procedures and regulations covering governors and Hime's provinces.

"We currently hold ten provinces and are even now on the way to establishing control over another, setting us at eleven," she informed the House. "By name, our provinces are Hispania Citerior, Hispania Ulterior, Cilicia, Sicilia, Sardinia with Corsica, Macedonia with Greece, Africa Province with Cyrenaica, Asia Province, Sosia, Argus, and the ongoing addition of the former Mentulaeen Empire, to be called the province of Septentria. Each of these has a governor's seat, which provides us with at least ten possible provinces for outgoing praetors and consuls who might wish to take a gubernatorial shift after their term, provided no current governors are prorogued. I say ten instead of eleven because the wartime governorship of Septentria shall be occupied for at least five years by the same person, as we all know."

She ignored the mutters at this reminder and barrelled on with what she had to say.

"If you recall the stipulations I made in my laws on the elections and electoral procedures, I asked for twenty-one quaestors to be elected each year. This is because each governor needs at least one quaestor, to be assigned at random from the lot. Why at random? To make it just a little bit harder for potential governors and quaestors to collude with each other beforehand in how to strip a province bare, as so many of them have in the past. Why twenty-one each year? Twenty-one allows, at most, ten remaining quaestors to be assigned to Hime and Fuuka, which is a manageable number."

"I do not seek to change much about the manner in which provinces are assigned," she told the perfectly attentive House. "However, I do wish to make some changes to the manner in which governors receive their stipend. You will note, fellow senators, that we have been subject to various requests throughout the years from our provincial governors requesting an increase in funds for diverse reasons. Sometimes these are granted, sometimes they are not. Either way, they only add to the bureaucratic backlog. Therefore, this is what I propose: when the reasons provided for the request have to do with grave emergencies such as sudden war or disaster, only then shall we review the application. All other cases from now on shall be turned down ."

She raised a hand to silence the outburst of voices.

"This is because I propose that the gubernatorial stipends be given to the governors in full at the very start of their terms," she explained. "Under advisement of the Treasury, the Senate shall henceforth pay out the complete stipend of all governors when they leave to go to their provinces. This sum is legally theirs upon transfer and they shall use it to pay staffing expenses and whatever might need funding in the exercise of their duties. They shall be required to present a detailed accounting of how they used that sum at the end of their terms, but they shall not be required to return to the state any amount of that sum that might remain unspent afterwards."

"Oh, I like it!" said one of the current praetors. He was heavily in debt and looking forward to taking a province after the year, in order to recoup his fortunes and make enough to free him from his creditors. The problem was that his debts had grown so large that he was in serious danger of being brought to the courts by the usurers even before he left to govern a province. What was occurring to him at the moment was that, if the senior consul's proposal were approved, he might get his hands on the gubernatorial stipend before he left and ask his creditors to attach it by lien instead of bringing him to court.

"I like it too," said his handsome neighbour, who happened to have a (distant) familial link to the senior consul. "But I wouldn't count on the stipend for fending off your creditors, old boy."

A frown. "Why not, Suguru-san?"

"If you've been paying attention, you'd remember why the senior consul is doing this," sighed Suguru Kashiwagi, his beautiful eyes settling on an epicene, very smooth face in the row of backbenchers opposite them: Kashiwagi liked pretty young men, and was famous for his exploits among the males of Hime-to say nothing of his exploits among the males of Athens.

"If word on the street is right," Kashiwagi continued, "I'd say your debts will just about clean out a gubernatorial stipend. And don't underestimate our moneylenders: they would likely attach the stipend by lien before you even think of collecting it, which means they shall take it all whether you offer it to them or not. That means your creditors will see you going to govern your province with barely a sestertius clinking in your purse, because no more money shall be forthcoming from the Treasury after that lump sum. How long do you think you would last then, governor of a province for one year without a coin to your name?"

"Shit!" his fellow hissed. "What am I to do with the moneylenders, then? I have to govern a province to even begin to make enough to pay them! Pluto's cock-it's why most of us go to a damn province in the first place!"

Kashiwagi sighed and did not bother explaining the sting behind the senior consul's seemingly governor-friendly plan: if moneylenders could indeed seize a prospective governor's full stipend through attaching it by lien before his departure, the prospective governor would have to give up his claim to a province, it being that he would likely have no money left for governing it. The other senator was right in saying moneymaking was the regular reason for wanting a gubernatorial post: it was the easiest solution for a debt-riddled senator to take a governorship, then suck his province dry in order to make enough money for his needs. The result was that most of the provinces were raped to destitution by one money-hungry Himean governor after another. The senior consul's proposal, however, was purported to alleviate precisely this by crippling the avaricious officials before they even set off.

"Can't you apply to a friend to put up part of the sum you owe?" he proposed. "It would hold them off."

"No, I'm already up to my ears in debt. Unless you would-"

"Sorry, but I can't."

"Then what can I do?"

Kashiwagi broke out his best grin, but not for the benefit of the man beside him: the lovely backbencher had noticed his stare and was smiling an invitation.

"Who knows?" he said carelessly, no longer interested in the conversation. "Maybe you'll just have to give them the slip and run off to your province. Run off in the night with the money or something. Once you're in your province, you'll be exempt from prosecution for the duration of your term."

The senior consul was still speaking.

"There have been some qualms in recent years about the lack of gubernatorial positions available to outgoing consuls and praetors, because some provinces have governors who have been prorogued over and over again. Proroguing a governor, however, should happen only in special circumstances. I propose to tighten up our regulations on gubernatorial occupancies to make chances fairer and open to all of us. Not every outgoing praetor or consul wants to take a province after his or her term, but every outgoing praetor or consul deserves the chance to do so."

"From now on, all provincial governors shall be obliged to vacate their positions after one year or whatever term is stipulated in their mandates so as to open gubernatorial posts to the outgoing consuls and praetors. However, if there are fewer outgoing consuls and praetors intending to take provinces than there are open gubernatorial posts, the Senate shall review the circumstances of each incumbent governor and prorogue those with the best performance. Governors who are prorogued shall receive another year's stipend, of course, to be sent to them by the Treasury."

"Governors committed to wars shall automatically come under review by the House towards the end of their terms. Should they prove to have been capable in their situations, they shall be prorogued. Otherwise, they must step down at the end of that year and turn over their province and war to the next governor sent by the House."

It was a heavy programme, by no means finished. Chikane's next shafts targeted the publicani and Treasury, and sent a reflexive shudder through all members of the tax-farming community .

"Throughout the years, many a travelling senator has been approached by people from our provinces applying for aid against the depredations of the publicani, " she said to the House, in strong attendance because it was curious to hear what she had next on her impressive itinerary. "So regular is this occurrence that we have learned to brush off the issue whenever encountering it, even when presented with more aggressive applications. Indeed, we have had at least four formal delegations this year alone on that subject, from provincial landowners and businesspeople requesting that we do something about the exorbitant tax rates in our territories. Last year we had two of the same. The year before that saw another four. Each term has seen us do little on the issue save brush it off, time and again."

"As we should," interjected Senator Satoshi Higurashi, his skin prickling with warning at her tone: the Higurashi were heavily committed to knight lobbies, as indeed were many other influential people in the House. Any trouble stirred up by the senior consul for the publicani would see the knights squealing to their patrons, since they were the ones who profited most from collecting payments for tax arrears in the provinces abroad.

"As you just said, Himemiya-san, it's a regular occurrence," he went on with feigned boredom. "I do not see what you can propose to do about it. The provinces will always cry foul when it comes to paying the Republic their due, so much can I assure you."

"If it were so simple as that, Higurashi-san, I would not even have drawn attention to it," she replied. "But the fact is that there is a reason behind the protests, and it is our responsibility to address that. I have been reviewing the contracts for the publicani in the last ten years and have come to the conclusion that these applications have validity. The taxes in many of our provinces are far too high."

There was a stronger stirring now among the ranks.

"I used some of the reports sent in by our more conscientious governors and their quaestors for my calculations," she went on. "If the results I have found are any indication, we are officially taxing a good number of our provinces by as much as a hundred to two hundred percent over the appropriate rates! We are nurturing more bad blood than is our share among our provinces, and using that same bad blood to water a crop sown of the dragon's teeth! Far be it from me to act a doomsayer, but I very much fear this shall bring worse than formal delegations in the future, should we leave the ravages unchecked."

"If you're not acting a doomsayer, aren't you being a dramatist, Himemiya-san?" a voice called. It was from one of the consulars, Kanako Ootori. "To call these things as ravages is a little more tragedy than they deserve. The provinces depend on us for their protection and administration, which means we are fully at liberty to set the rates as we wish!"

"To the tune of what-amounts you would expect from Pluto's vaults?" said Chikane. "Administration does not equal abuse, Ootori-san. What I am telling you now is that the rates we currently have are not merely abusive but abhorrent! We are indeed tasked with the protection and care of the territories, but this does not mean making of their assets an economic abattoir. It means seeing them prosper so that their well-being may redound positively upon the Republic. And what we have been doing has seen to the opposite: we are well on our way to impoverishing our territories, which means they shall be hard-pressed to fend for themselves on the day some catastrophe strikes. Oh, we may praise the richness of our provinces for hours, but this is a wealth in which we are not investing properly! When was the last time you went to one of the provinces and saw the state of the fields, the dilapidation of the towns? When was the last time any of you did that, as a matter of fact? Those who have shall know of what I speak, I think."

The urban praetor was requesting the floor, and it was given to her.

"I was actually abroad two years ago, as quaestor of Asia Province," said this worthy, a fine-looking and fairly young woman not far from Shizuru Fujino's age. "I had occasion to visit Sicilia before that, and Macedonia after. I think I may claim to have some current observations on those provinces as well. I know of what you speak, Himemiya-san, for there was never a day the governor of Asia was not assailed by complaints on that subject. And you're right in saying we cannot simply toss aside such complaints, because they do come from decent, well-respected citizens, not mere canaille out to escape their duties to the state. But even when we discussed this issue, my fellow provincial officials and I, we failed to see what could be done as - to put it bluntly - the ravages you have mentioned are legal ! The censors gave the publicani the contracts to collect, after all, which means they have governmental permission for their rates. It's true that we have Shizuru Fujino-san's case last year, where she managed to persuade both the tax farmers and governor of Sosia to lower rates-" She had to pause to allow the grumbles to die down. "But that was only for rates in the case of usury. Tax collections are a different matter."

"You bring me nearer my point, Ginga-san," said Chikane, nodding. "We may do something about it, as a matter of fact. I am not about to demand that the censors recall the contracts, so you may rest easy there. I am, however, demanding several changes in the manner we let the tax farming contracts in the future."

"Such as?"

"Such as the Treasury changing its estimates for what we may expect from the provinces."

Objecting voices arose all around, and one soared to the forefront: "The estimates we currently have are the ones we use by tradition! Any attempt to change them will see me protest!"

"Oh, you may protest all you like!" the senior consul snapped, looking her most supercilious. "But the arithmetic stands on better foundation than your objections. What the numbers show is that neither the publicani nor the Treasury has been doing their homework with diligence. The estimates the Treasury currently employs might be traditional, but they are not reflective of the facts. Indeed, to point out one particularly salient fact, please recall that the present estimates were actually ones set literally three decades ago! I dare some sterling economist and model of probity here to stand up and tell me that the economy has not changed significantly since then!"

As expected, there were no takers. The senior consul eyed her grumbling colleagues with tangible disdain, her face speaking the insults her famously well-mannered mouth would not.

"What I am asking is for us to face the facts, not the dream," she said. "The facts are that the Treasury has been asking for far too much from the provinces. The publicani are aggravating the trouble by placing impossibly high bids in an effort to drive out their competition among the other tax farmers seeking contracts. This is not just detrimental to the provinces, Members of this House: it is detrimental to both publicani and Treasury too! Consider, for instance, how much trouble the publicani are always claiming when it comes to their collections. Consider how many accounts are yet standing, with the Treasury feeling the pinch from the tardiness of those payments. I only wish to make it easier for all of us to live together and profit in that harmony, so those who think I am doing this to either make trouble or gain provincial clients may think again! Have I proposed that we abolish the provincial taxes for you to react with such exaggeration? And I am the one accused of being a dramatist in this medley?"

She all but sniffed in her disgust, brow darkening so much that everyone suddenly found valid reason for looking very attentive.

"What I propose," she proceeded, "is that we give both the publicani and Treasury the support necessary to make their jobs easier. Let us send to each province a commission that shall assess how much a province's taxes should properly be. As these investigators shall be working in the provinces themselves, able to access data necessary to the generation of their estimates, they should be capable of telling us how much we can reasonably expect from each territory. Their findings shall be transmitted to the Treasury, so that it may know how much it should demand in the new contracts."

The House had settled down, seeing that her solution was not as unreasonable as they had feared. Indeed, it showed sterling good sense. And even among the conservatives, those who were not too thickly entrenched in knightly and publicani matters were nodding in approval.

To give them their due, a fair number of the conservatives were genuine Himeans of the old and sensible kind. They had sufficient pride in their lineages to keep from "low" businesses like tax-gathering and had a measure of the classical Himean practicality too. One of them spoke out for the rest suddenly, and silence ensued as they listened to her.

"It's an idea, Senior Consul," said Haruka Armitage in her unmusical voice, her purple eyes actually quite calm. "How often will these commissions be sent?"

Chikane smiled at her best friend's most obdurate foe, glad for the question.

"Once every five years, at the beginning of each censorial pair's lustrum," she answered. "As the current censors exit office next year, the commissions may be sent this year, and the data they gather may reach us in time for the next set of contracts for publicani in our provinces."

"Who will overwrite the organisation of these commissions?"

"Ideally, either the consuls or the censors shall oversee their administration," Chikane replied, placing emphasis on her correction of what was most likely another of Haruka's malapropisms. "I would like it noted that I put myself forward for that task. It seems only fitting that the person proposing the commissions be the one to supervise them."

Haruka harrumphed, though not in dissent, and nodded with seeming good opinion. The other conservatives and moderates took note, to Chikane's relief. Catching the interest of someone as influential as Haruka meant the meeker sheep were more likely to open their ears. Even though there was further debate on the issue, the discussion proceeded reasonably after that - enough to assure everyone, by the end of the last session, that Chikane would get what she wanted.

"Jupiter!" Sergay told his supposed rival and actual friend, the Princeps Senatus. "She's setting procedures for nearly every part of our government that matters. Just when I was thinking her insane to have passed up the opportunity to get in the history books with the command she passed on to Fujino, she comes out with this - this mad flurry of legislation."

"I didn't hear you protesting too much," the Princeps sighed, still suffering some lingering sting from his downgrade.

Sergay flapped a hand at him.

"How can I, when everything she's done has actually made sense? But damn me if the procedures set by the leges Himemiya won't be the ones we'll be following, generations into the future. She's found her way into the history books without even having to go off to win some grand war like her friend. Himemiya's a wonder!"

Some of the senior consul's acts did not actually promulgate laws, even if they still related to them. The day before Shizuma Hanazono left to join her cousin in the north, Chikane Himemiya announced to the House that she was contributing a building to the Forum.

"It is not unusual among us to make such public works as contributions to the Republic," she told the senators, who were not surprised at her announcement: she was right in that it was to be expected from most officials, especially those with the means for it, that a public work would be donated to the state in exchange for the glory of it bearing their family's name.

"As such, I would like to announce that I am making my own contribution," Chikane declared. "I shall be building a Tabularium, a grand records hall to house all our tablets of law, our annals, and the like. We need a better repository for those than the musty old basements of various temples, which are not maintained as well as they could be, and are thus suffering from paper-deteriorating pests of all kinds. The lack of organisation with our records has also made it harder for us to access some account or other when we need it. I consider it high time we made a building dedicated solely to their housing."

That was actually something of a surprise. It was more normal for an official to contribute a basilica or temple, something grand and for use in public events and political meetings. A basilica or temple was something over which people could ooh and ahh, and marvel at the glory of the family in whose name it had been established. But something as sober, as staid as a tabularium? Well, that was a patrician Himemiya for you! Bizarre people, all of them!

"While we are on the subject of records, permit me to inform you that I have also added a public records officer outside," Chikane added afterwards. "He is the man at the desk you might have noticed on your way in, flanked by assistants on either side. This is a little adjustment that I hope shall be continued by later consuls and officials. It has not been lost on me that many of the laws we promulgate amongst ourselves, even if they are eventually aired to the People or the Centuries, are not actually easily accessible to the public when they do want details. The public records officer I have set outside shall try to address that, being armed with copies of the laws I have been proposing and ample knowledge on their minutiae. Any questions from the curious may be addressed to him."

Such Himean level-headedness resonated with the People and the Centuries, and they ratified every last one of her laws into being: even, miraculously enough, the ones that purported to cut both publicani and Treasury revenues.

"It was all typical of Chikane's roundabout style," Shizuma Hanazono told the governor of Argus, who met her when she arrived with the rest-but not the last-of Shizuru's Northern army. "One could never call her doings jejune. She focused in particular on regulations for overseas governors such as yourself because she was trying to point out, in her own delicate way, that the territories needed to be given more attention. All those seemingly insignificant foreign events are not given notice by anyone save the Princeps, who has to deal with foreign delegations and whatnot all alone. No one really pays attention to these things until a war breaks out, and then it comes as a surprise! Just like the Mentulaean situation. And the one I see germinating near our Asia Province, I suppose. I shall wager anyone fifty talents that thing shall turn out a rot!"

"Why, what's going on near Asia Province?" asked the governor of Argus, curiosity piqued.

"An interesting changeover of rulers in Cappadocia." Shizuma grinned wickedly. "The old king has apparently died of illness-another name for poison among the royalty!-and has been replaced by an alleged sprig off the original dynasty, a boy of nine or so years, we hear. Said lad, incidentally, happens to have been placed on the throne by his so-called protector, who is..."

"Don't say it, let me guess: the King of Pontus?"

"The King of Pontus."

"The old game!" Midori was scowling. "The boy's a puppet!"

"So we suspect, although all Senate did was to shrug and say it was not really our business," the silver-haired woman said, rolling her eyes. "They did ask the governor of Asia Province to make an inquiry on it, but that was all. It is our business, Midori-san! And it is a worry, especially as we are allied to the Pontic rulers' old enemy, the ruling line of Bithynia."

"I agree. Cappadocia's important."

"Especially as the imbrications of that land would open Cilicia to Pontus by default," Shizuma said. "And how far away is our very own Asia Province from that? Unfortunately, the Senate does not seem overly concerned. So Chikane's provision on more regular turnovers for gubernatorial seats wasn't solely for fair distribution, as she claimed: it was also to force more senators to give attention to affairs across the seas."

"Yes, I see," Midori replied pensively. "It's high time. We governors are usually left to our own devices, and though I'd like to think I haven't done too badly by my province, I have to admit it doesn't always turn out well, either for Hime or her bailiwicks."

The other nodded. "Given that your province is adjacent the one Shizuru's carving out- Septentria, I should try and remember to call it that from now on-I very much suspect you shall be among those prorogued. The war situation might work in your favour, to that end."

"If I apply to my friends back home to lobby for me to be prorogued."

Shizuma lifted a steely eyebrow. "Shall you not?"

"I might," Midori sighed. "Oh, I need time to think on it. I've been here ages!"

"It shows." The younger woman plucked a grape from the bowl between them and popped it into her mouth. "And the people seem to love you."

"Oh, they do. I love them back, just so you know. It's just-well, I can hardly believe I'm saying it-but I do miss Hime sometimes! Years since I've been there!"

Shizuma smiled in understanding.

"It's a horrid place," she hummed. "As well as the best city in the world. I think we all miss it when we're abroad."

Midori agreed.

"I might apply to stay on as an adviser to the next governor instead, unless they ask me to retain the seat," she confessed to the younger woman. "That way, I shall be able to journey to Hime when the urge takes me, yet maintain my residence here. One does get used to living in Argus. Hime holds my heart, Shizuma-chan, but my feet have taken root here. I have no problems with living out the rest of my years in this province."

A crack of laughter.

"Oh, you sound like a gammer!" Shizuma said.

"True, I do, don't I?" Midori laughed back. "Strike that! Never let it be said I let myself age so quickly with a reckless word."

"It never shall be said," the younger woman agreed. "Well, so much for events in Hime. I am well rid of them!" A flick of her hair, which fluttered soft as a silver wing. "If you'll excuse me, I've matters to see to yet. My cousin's an understanding sort of woman, but not where her own plans are concerned. People would not believe it, but Shizuru's hard with her goals."

Midori laughed at the truth of that. "Then do not let me keep you from your work, by the gods!"

Shizuma did not let Midori keep her. Up she shot from the governor's nicely padded seat and off to her quarters where the rest of her staff was working, back to the hard chair at her desk. Her favourite military tribune was beside her in a moment, and handing over a scroll cylinder.

"I've finished arrangements with the governor," she said, breaking open the cylinder. "Any word yet from Takumi-san, Nagisa-chan?"

"The praefectus came in earlier to say he'd negotiated matters with the local businessmen already, Shizuma-san," the tribune answered. "All the contracts have been drawn up properly, and he says to tell you he negotiated very good prices for the supplies."

"And the warehouses?"

"We've managed to hire two more."

"That should be enough to hold the next shipment of grain. We're fortunate this year saw no drought," she sighed. "My cousin should be pleased that we've managed to requisition part of the harvest calculated as excess. Although we'll need more presently. It takes a lot of grain to run an army."

Nagisa grinned.

"Along with a hundred and one other things, Shizuma-san," she said.

"How true!" Shizuma took a peek at the letter in her hands and winced. "Another request for audience from one of my cousin's clients. Wonderful."

She rolled up the scroll and threw it carelessly into a bucket full of similar letters.

"Gods spare me from her favour-currying sycophants," she sneered, resting her chin on one hand and ignoring her red-headed tribune's apology. "I might be her senior legate and her cousin but I'm not her blasted secretary. She should have left one of her own staff members here to cater to these."

Another tribune in the room spoke.

"Please excuse me, Hanazono-san, but aren't you going to meet with any of them?" said this other young woman on Shizuma's staff, a dark-haired and rather smart character Shizuma only noticed because she was apparently great friends with Nagisa. "We've had at least ten such requests and you haven't honoured any with a hearing."

Shizuma lifted an eyebrow at the young woman's professional tone, aware that said young woman was not a great partisan of her. Which did not sting Shizuma in the least, given that she was no great partisan of the young woman either.

"Thank you for that useful reminder, Tamao-san," she said with smooth scorn. "It's very hard to count them, really, so thank you for doing it for me."

Tamao Suzumi flushed and avoided her friend Nagisa's eyes, keeping her own locked with the senior legate's.

"I only ask, Hanazono-san, because they might be offering assistance to our campaign," she said with difficulty. She really was not fond of the senior legate, especially given the way the woman was always looking at Nagisa—who was the sort of clueless young woman who needed protection from the wolves. And such a wolf this one was! Tall and lean and silver-furred, always just a little hungry in her eyes.

"The local plutocrats can prove invaluable if we nurture them and listen to their needs," she told the wolf, who was looking even hungrier than usual. "They're in a great position to serve ours in this mission. I think General Fujino would agree, especially as she spoke of the need to cultivate long-term resources in her staff meeting before she left Hime."

Shizuma's eyes twinkled, shifted colour in that way they did when her mood was unstable.

"True, General Fujino did speak of it," she said, pronouncing her cousin's title with remarkable sarcasm.

Suddenly a change came over her, however, and she smiled quite happily.

"Oh... Do you know what, Tamao-san?" she exclaimed. "You have just given me the most brilliant notion!"

Tamao visibly drew back and eyed the senior legate's smile the way one would eye a wolf's jaws.

"Yes, Hanazono-san?" she said.

"I think what you said is right," Shizuma grinned, very aware of Nagisa watching their exchange, along with everyone else in the room. "You - are - right! So right, in fact, that I intend to give you full credit for it."

She pointed to the bucket where she had thrown the missive that had started this.

"From now on," she said, "you shall be the one talking to these local resources for me and seeing how our needs, both theirs and ours, might be resolved to everyone's benefit. In fact, I want you to take that bucket and arrange meetings with every last one of those people in there right now. This shall be the focus of your efforts for the moment, so I am taking you off your regular staff duties temporarily just for it. Dedicate yourself to this special job, Tamao-san! It was your genius that got it."

She motioned to some of the other officers listening to them and gave further instructions.

"You'll need assistance," she told Tamao. "So Hideo and Neru shall be going with you. Hideo-san, go and fix a place for Tamao-san to hold her meetings. Neru-san, you go with them and take notes, so Tamao-san has her hands free. Bring all your things. I am assigning all three of you to this so that it may be done most efficiently. I shall be sending over some scribes to help as well."

The trio stared at her, a little taken aback. The legate snapped her fingers at them impatiently.

"Well, why are you looking at me like a bunch of idiots?" she demanded. "Go on and be about it quick. This is important work too, you know."

The three tribunes got to work, trying to gather their things in a hurry. Shizuma watched in pure pleasure as they packed, her smiling eyes following Tamao with particular attention. Said tribune paused on her way out of the room with the other two and shot Shizuma another borderline-rebellious look.

"Just to be clear, in what capacity should I meet them, Hanazono-san?" she said, still wary. "As a tribune of the general's army, or as a member of your staff?"

Shizuma lifted both eyebrows. "You are both, Tamao-san. I would have thought that clear to you from the beginning."

The young woman bowed sparingly to the legate and looked to the remaining tribune in the room, her eyes softening when they alighted on her friend.

"I'll see you later, Nagisa," she said, making ready to leave.

The senior legate stopped her.

"Hold, Tamao-san."

Tamao paused. "Yes, Hanazono-san?"

Shizuma's eyes were appraising as they looked at each other.

"I believe you shall do exceedingly well in this new task," she said. "You're a very capable young woman and you have a lot of good qualities for a tribune. There is no doubt in my mind you shall remember all my instructions, especially since you seem to have a good memory."

Tamao's brows went up at the praise and Shizuma continued the rest of what she had to say.

"But never question me in that way again. I let you off this time, but you shall find me most mercurial when it comes to mercy." The senior legate smiled and proved she was a genius of striking the perfect median between looking dismissive and looking nasty. "No doubt you shall remember that instruction along with the rest, hm, given that good memory?"

The tribune's mouth was tight, but she still saluted and responded to it.

"No doubt I will, Legate," she said before stalking off, flesh crawling from the warning.

Shizuma listened to the patter of Tamao's feet moving away.

"Your friend doesn't like me, Nagisa-chan," she remarked to one of her two remaining companions, amused when the girl answered with a flinch.

"No, she does, Shizuma-san, really," said the young woman, worried for her friend's sake. "She's just a little – a little, um–"

"A little nothing," Shizuma said dismissively, waving at the nervous girl. "Do not get yourself into a pother over it. I care not if she hates me, even, should her dislike of me come to hate. The only thing that matters to me is that she performs well and proves she has a good brain to go with that - hmm - obvious dedication of hers, let us say. She has yet to disappoint there."

She stretched in her seat and added: "I can very well put up with her not liking me as long as she suits my purposes. I'm still the one giving her orders, at the end of the day."

The awkward-looking tribune shook her head miserably.

"She really doesn't dislike you, Shizuma-san," she tried. "Tamao isn't the type to dislike people. Oh, and the other day, she even said she admired you for your thoroughness with the army!"

"While calling me a cunnus, I wager."

That set off another flinch.

"No, no!" Nagisa said. "She wouldn't say that, Shizuma-san! She never said–"

"Calm yourself, girl," Shizuma laughed. "I know she'd not say it. Tamao-san hardly strikes me as the type to use such words. I'd think she has other, more refined ones in their stead." Her mouth quirked, turned up on one side. "And to tell you the truth, Nagisa-chan, I've been called far, far worse names - and even deserved some of them. So I would hardly bat an eyelash had she indeed called me a cunnus."

She grinned at the queasy-looking tribune and added: "Although it's quite nice of her to admit my thoroughness with the army."

Which praise could not make her bat an eyelash either, all things considered. Shizuma was far more aware of herself than most others would credit, which meant she suffered no crippling weakness for flattery. She knew she had been thorough in her duties thus far and expected neither thanks nor compliments for that, so she felt no gratitude at all to Tamao Suzumi and all others who might acknowledge her performance. Such compliments were simply from persons who had not expected her to do well, and their grudging admissions were not the measure of her self-esteem, but rather of theirs.

Perhaps most of them have forgotten I served in the army before this, she thought, knowing that it was that prior experience that had helped her in her current post. Shizuma's memory was nearly as good as her cousin's, so she had a good remembrance of her own experiences and the analytical skill for knowing which among those deserved repetition and which of them begged rethinking. This meant going into details as much as general orders, and Shizuma had been detailed. Or to put it in Tamao Suzumi's words: she was so surprisingly thorough it was impressive.

Even while still in Hime, she had made the centurions personally inspect the soundness of all the soldiers' kits and gear, and inspected each legion's common property herself. She culled the old pack animals whenever she found them and was clever enough to draw up contracts with mule breeders from the rosea rura, demanding only the youngest mules for the legions. She tested the axles of each cart and wagon, and actually had them driven through rough patches just to be sure of their calibre. She drilled each legion from the time it was formed to the time it was marched, ordering the centurions to keep at it once she could no longer oversee them. Throughout it all, she made sure to keep with her cousin's direction that each ready pair of legions be sent on to the north. And when the two weeks' grace her cousin had given was done, she left one of Shizuru's old legates, Taro, to continue taking recruits and volunteers for two more weeks in her stead. Only then did she move out for the north herself, heading another pair of legions for Shizuru's army.

What few people knew about Shizuma was that she was the sort of person who could carry out a task to its end. The only problem was in getting her to start at all. Since her cousin had practically corralled her into this post, however, that hindrance had already been leapt. As a result, the silver-haired woman exposed herself for the dedicated worker she could actually be. Canny and intelligent, she held up well against the stresses of official status in an army. A more straightforward person compared to her cousin, she also brooked opposition about as well as she brooked foolery: with as much intolerance as a wolf disturbed from its winter sleep.

This she demonstrated several times before her cousin's enemies, who questioned her to no end before she finally quit Hime with the Seventeenth and Eighteenth legions. Questions about what was her cousin thinking, doing this, doing that; questions about their plans and the things they had dared to do; questions that were not questions but implications, reversed remarks, accusations of all kinds...

She remembered one such accusatory query from her cousin's "most beloved senator"-a richly sarcastic designation, even coming from Shizuma.

"I passed by the Campus Martius the other day and saw your troops. What are those men in the lion's skins?" Haruka Armitage had harrumphed some days to her before Shizuma left for the North, the two of them having run into each other in the Forum. "Barbaric sight! Another radical novelty from your cousin?"

"Doubtless you shall call it that in the next session," Shizuma had replied, sure to spread as much vinegar as possible in the response. "We call them the aquiliferi after the eagles, the standard-bearers of the army. All are chosen with an eye to personal bravery, the very flower of the legions. My cousin has chosen to distinguish the position of standard-bearer so as to better honour the Republic, represented in the standards these excellent specimens carry. Is it not fitting that the men given so elevated a task must be elevated as well, in the eyes of all who follow their steps in battle and march alike?"

"Oh, yes, of course!" Haruka had replied, hard-put to contradict that. "But I don't see what purpose the lion skins have for the... er... aquiliferi."

"It keeps them warm, obviously," Shizuma sneered.

She understood very well that Haruka's real opposition to the new standard-bearers had been in the associations Shizuru had placed in their costume. While the eagle had long been associated with the Republic of Hime, the lion was a little-just a little-less so, and was also a rather blatant link to the Fujino, as their seal had always borne a lion with a full mane. Well, Shizuru had explained that it was a reference to Hercules, to whom all soldiers gave honour during battle in the old cry, "Hercules Invictus!" That was what she said and that was what would continue to be said, even if everyone knew otherwise.

"You just can't resist, can you?" Shizuma had told her cousin after the first explanation of the idea for the aquilifer. "Eagles and lions, Shizuru? You tempt the wolves."

"A good thing," Shizuru had replied. "Are they not also beasts associated with our nation?"

"As your choices are with the Himemiya families and the Fujino. Should I be glad you did not have the gall to include the snake as well?"

"The snake! I wonder..." The blonde had frowned in thought and looked wistful. "Perhaps I should have, cousin. It would have looked so good, now that I reflect on it. The ferocity of the lion with the nobility of the eagle, and upon that the diplomacy of the caduceus. Yes, yes, it would have been so much better! I should have added it."

Shizuma had sighed and thrown up both hands in surrender.

"Oh, to Dis with you!" she had exclaimed, more exasperated than angry. "Even he'd be hard-put to reason with a woman who would plant a menagerie on a legion's standards!"

Which meant Shizuru had gotten the better of her, of course, but she had found it difficult to care just then. There had been so much to do and think on, and while Shizuru did not tax her with too many orders, it had only meant that Shizuma had had to divine for herself what to do next to prepare her cousin's army. When Shizuru had left, she had wondered for a while what she should do once she reached the North, aside from drilling the new recruits mercilessly at the Argus camp. Was that to be all, she wondered. Should she send out some of the troops for forays while waiting? Should she have some of them do a reconnaissance by the boundaries? She had some ideas about what she would like to do, herself, but she was not the commander of the mission and the commander of the mission had told her to stay in Argus until she came a-calling.

As it turned out, she need not have worried over the issue. She had found Shizuru's instructions waiting for her at Argus.

Upon arrival, the senior legate was expected to stock four of the legions in Argus with provisions and send them to the boundaries of the Mentulæan Empire to hold the passes. So off went four legions to do just that, with Shizuma appointing her cousin's old legate, the ginger-haired Kenji, to be the officer in charge of the expedition. Shizuma picked the Fifth, the Sixth, the Fifteenth, and the Sixteenth legions for the task, with the two partly-veteran legions of the Sixth and Fifth chosen specifically to stiffen up the latter two, which were raw.

The rest of the legions, including the pair Shizuma was left holding, were instructed to wait for further directives from Sosia and continue training on an intensive programme. My cousin is no fool, all right, Shizuma had thought then. Shizuru had obviously expected most of her troops to be tyros, as turned out to be the case: the senior legate's two remaining legions and the rest of the legions coming in would likely be composed of none but raw recruits. It troubled Shizuma a little, but she knew there was nothing to do but to work them and hope they did well despite their greenness. The rest of the veteran legions of Hime were already assigned elsewhere, and Shizuma's cousin had not thought to twist a few arms to get her hands on them. Or more probably had not cared, the cocky wretch! Typical that she would walk into a grand venture like this without giving a fig for the advantages others would try to get.

"All's well, Shizuma-san?" said a male voice. She looked up at the man who had interrupted her thoughts.

"All's well," she said to her fellow legate, Keigo Kurauchi. This young man was actually brother to Kazuya of the Traditionalists, and though no Traditionalist himself, still of the conservative faction, for all practical purposes. As to why he was a legate of Shizuru Fujino, that was because his elder brother had not scorned to approach the enemy of the Traditionalists and ask for a post for his younger, less-established sibling. As to why Shizuru Fujino had accepted-well, leave it to her damned politicking!

Still and all, Shizuma had to admit that she did not in fact dislike Keigo Kurauchi. He was quite a likeable young man, to both her relief and her chagrin.

"Drills are finished?" she asked.

"Just now, yes," the other responded, his brow shiny with sweat. He took the seat in front of her desk and pushed out his legs. "I just ran into Takumi-san. He looked happy, I'll say."

"That young man shall turn out a plutocrat, I'll wager," Shizuma said with a smile. "He struck up some nice deals with the locals for our provisions, apparently, so he shall be happy going to bed tonight."

"That's a relief he did that, though. The men will eat us out, at the rate they're going."

An inquisitive look. "Are they so voracious, these youngsters?"

Keigo laughed and showed that he had a far more mobile face than his brother, even the corners of his eyes crinkling in good humour.

"The centurions are working the poor bastards so hard they're eating like people who've starved a month," he said with a low whistle.

"You do have some tough officers in there, Shizuma-san."

"They belong to my cousin-they would be tough," Shizuma said. "I wish we could have worked the Fifteenth and Sixteenth a little more before sending them off to the borders, but they shall have to find their exercises on the field, I suppose."

A change came over the animated face, the little creased fans at the edges of his eyes disappearing.

"Yes, about that," said Keigo. "I've just been giving it a lot of thought, Shizuma-san, and I have an idea. Not about the Fifteenth or the Sixteenth, but about the legions we have here."

Shizuma nodded.

"I think at least one of us should bring them to Sosia," he said, only to be stopped by a shake of her head.

"No," she said firmly. "No troops to Sosia yet."

"But Shizuma-san, is that really wise?" he asked, revisiting one of his first concerns upon their arrival. He had mentioned it once before, but been turned down so swiftly that he had kept the misgivings hidden-until now. "Even if we don't both go, we could just send one legion to be sure. We know there's a lot of the Mentulae up there, and we don't know how many have been lost to us from what remains of the Seventh, not to mention if the Ninth and Eleventh have reached it. Fujino-san might be grateful if we erred on the safe side here instead of assuming all's gone well."

Again Shizuma declined.

"No," she repeated. "The orders were to keep the Seventeenth and Eighteenth in Argus until she sent word that she needed them."

"But what if she did send word and it's just yet to get here?"

Shizuma laughed. "Oh, no! If Shizuru did feel she would need them, she would have sent word halfway through her march there. So no troops to Sosia, at least not until she demands it. She'd not thank me for contravening her orders out of a misplaced desire to 'rescue' her against that piddling lot of savages she's to contend with in that province."

He stared. "Piddling? There's a horde of them, I hear!"

"All the better." She smiled at him with almost illusive innocence: a weird and white woman of enigmatic attitude. "Just remember what your relatives and friends say about my cousin, Keigo-san, because it's true: Shizuru's a plague to her enemies. By the time any unsolicited 'help' from us would arrive, death shall have infected every Mentulaean still in Sosia."

---

Shizuma was right in choosing not to send further troops to support Sosia's relief, for the end of the siege there was the same day her cousin came within sight of the citadel. Shizuru and the Fourteenth arrived in the midst of a battle between the Mentulae and the Eleventh and Ninth of Shohei, and she struck with characteristic opportunism: she ran the Fourteenth the rest of the way and took the Mentulae to the rear of one flank, rolling them up from the right. Between her troops and those of Shohei-which were being supported by the remains of the Seventh and the Sosia legion, along with the remaining Otomeians-they finally eliminated the Sosian besiegers and freed the beleaguered city.

Amidst the ecstatic yells of the soldiers and the citizens watching from the walls, Shizuru called out for some of her officers to ride with her. She found her old legate exactly where he should be in the battle, and the two of them met astride their bloodied horses, which had stepped on more than a few people during and after the fight.

"Shohei-han!" she said to his salute. "Well done."

Shohei grinned the embrace he would never have thought of giving her. He loved his commander as only a true soldier could of a truly good commander, so her sudden appearance during the battle earlier had driven him as crazed with joy as it had the legionaries-who were coming in towards the two of them, yelling to their old general. Soon Shizuru and her officers were at the centre of a mob of legionaries calling her name, and she smiled at them while speaking with Shohei above the hubbub.

"It's good to see you, Fujino-san!" yelled her old officer, still unable to wipe the broad grin off his face. "Senate knuckled under?"

"As ever!" she yelled back. "Hold a moment!"

She turned to wave to the men, who cheered another deafening chorus before settling down under her call for silence.

"As promised, boys and girls," she shouted to them. "I have returned! Oh, how good it is to say I am once again your commander-for I am that once again, by decree of the People and Senate!"

A voice answered: "What d'you mean? Y'always were, General!"

"S'right!" someone agreed. "We don't care what the fucken Senate and People say! You're our General always!"

"Nobody else calls us their boys and girls, do they?"

Others affirmed the cries, and there was a racket of celebration. Shizuru laughed and waved them to silence for the second time.

"True, how could I forget that? Thanks to all of you for remind me," she said. "I shall speak to you later. For now we still have pressing business. Some of your comrades are still combing the field, and we must help. You know what to do: tend to the wounded, see to the dead, clean up the field. Look to your officers for instructions, and trust me when I say I am prouder of you than words can express! You have done Hime proud today, and you have proven you are my boys and girls!"

They roared to her again and began to disperse in orderly clumps, their officers shepherding them in the cleanup of the battle.

"I wonder if they ever realise their general's younger than most of them," laughed Shohei to Nao, who had not left with the rest of the soldiers. The Ninth's primipilus was smiling almost as broadly as he was, having been infected by atmosphere. As her grin exposed her longish canines, however, it meant she looked less ecstatic than the rest of them and more caught between happiness and hunger.

"The Fourteenth and Eleventh are still babies by comparison but your Ninth's grizzled," Shohei continued to her. "Many of them are a good bit older than Fujino-san, for all that she calls them her boys and girls."

"Don't forget about us in that comment," she replied, just as Shizuru turned again and finally saw her. Nao smacked her cuirass loudly and whipped out her hand in crisp salute. "General!"

"Yuuki-han." Shizuru reached down and shook her centurion's hand in a firm grasp. "My god, am I glad to see you!"

"Likewise." Their hands released. "Harada's stayed in the city, Fujino-san?"

"Yes. The new senior legate is my cousin. She should be in Argus by now."

"Yes, General."

Shizuru's eyes had been touching on every other face in the small circle, and now swung back to Nao's in confusion.

"And where is Suou-han?" she demanded. "I would have expected to run into her now."

Nao shook her head.

"Haven't seen her yet-though I saw a few of the old Seventh's soldiers during the fight." And, reading perfectly what Shizuru meant by asking about Suou, she added: "Haven't seen the girl either, but it was a mess in there. Still hard to see clear right now, this dust up and all."

She jerked a thumb to the field.

"You can see there're some of the Lupine troopers, though. They did good, as always."

Shizuru nodded, still trying to find a glimpse or clue of Natsuki even if she did not actually expect to find the girl among the troopers still going over the field. She remembered that the Argus scouts who had been here had reported seeing her girl with a bandaged leg, which told her that there was a high possibility that Natsuki had not been in the battle-Suou would have guessed Shizuru's wishes and would most likely have kept her out of it. So it was Suou Shizuru had to find.

For a moment she toyed with the idea of heading over to the smaller camp, the one that had been set up by Ushida. But a part of her reasoned that Suou would have been with the Sosia officers during the battle, and probably brought Natsuki with her. Shizuru could not imagine a leg wound being powerful enough to tamp down her strong-willed girl's character, and it stood to the girl's nature that she would have demanded to at least be part of the Himean command overseeing the action. Yes, it was Suou she had to find first.

"They might be with the Sosia officers-they're over there, I think," Shohei was suggesting, pointing to a spot near the citadel's walls where a cluster of officials seemed to be calling out orders for relieving the wounded soldiers.

A light brow was lifted at him.

"You think? Do you mean you have yet to speak with them?" Shizuru asked, surprised. She whipped to address Nao before he could answer her, however, and indicated a few other officers in the group. She told them to oversee things and wait for her other legate to come and take over for them. The rest of the officers she ordered to follow her and Shohei as they rode towards the citadel.

"The reason we've not spoken to them yet is that we only just got here," Shohei explained in a yell as they galloped. His commander's eyes were all over the field, noting the presence of Otomeians where she could find them.

Reassuring.

"We thought we'd get here soon enough when we took that eastern route, but we didn't count on it being little more than goat track. Damn thing was practically a midget's footpath!"

"Was it so bad, then?" said the amazed Shizuru, who knew her legate better than to accuse him of sloth.

"The land was a nightmare, General," Shohei revealed. "No wonder no one bothered making paths through it. The plain and wood sections weren't so bad. It's the heights that were the worst part."

"I knew there was a rugged range barring transport from the maps," Shizuru said, recalling the many charts and representations she had of the north and thinking of Shohei's news. That finished her hopes of building an alternative passage to the east! "Yet there was little data on just how rocky."

"Jupiter, I'll say it was rocky!" the legate cried, still obviously exasperated by the memory. "Full of the most awful cliffs! Some of the paths we had to pass were but barely a tall man's length wide, and ended in a sheer rock wall down and up. They're not all that high for ranges, but damn me if they weren't tough. If I'd known they'd be so bad, I'd have fought my way through those Mentulae at Argus instead!" He peered eagerly at her. "By the way, those are-?"

"Gone," Shizuru said. "I handled them when I set out."

"Oh, excellent! I'd have taken them on with the Ninth and Eleventh, but we thought we'd make better time just giving them the slip. Turns out it might've been the same had we fought them first. I'm very sorry about that, Fujino-san."

"You were not to know the pass would be so hard."

"I should've done my homework first. Might've spared us some mules too if I had known it—we lost some in the crossing."

"You left the artillery," Shizuru noted. She had seen them in Argus when she had put in with the Fourteenth and had ordered them brought with the Fourteenth's artillery pieces when those were sent in later.

"Best decision I made in that mess," he said. "They'd not have survived that path to the east."

"Hmm," she said absent-mindedly: her thoughts were already turning to another thing, far more important to her than even considerations of the army. She took one hand off the reins, a perilous act for anyone but a skilled rider like her, and waved to the group before them. They waved back.

"They are coming to meet us," she said. "Quicker!"

They spurred on and were soon before the Sosia officers, who dismounted with them some distance from the citadel. Sosia's citizens were spilling out of the gates and gaping at the field, some of them already jumping and dancing in celebration of the battle.

"Ikita-han," Shizuru said, greeting the provincial governor first of all and nodding congenially to the others-including her foe, Takeda Masashi, who she thought had aged since last they had met. Had his face always been so pinched and narrow?

"A good day for your province, I should say," she told Ikita.

"A very good day," agreed the governor, who was beaming at the double-pleasure of today's victory and of seeing her again. He stared at her skin too, for he had actually not realised it was she earlier until her mount had come close enough for him to address her with a yell. He held her extended hand in a firm grip, not minding the blood she got on his palm. "You've saved us, by god."

"No, Shohei-han did that," she said, inclining her head towards the legate she had named. He was standing beside her and grinning at his old comrade and fellow Fujino legate, Toshi. "He arrived to save you before I came to help finish."

"The General's was properly the killing stroke," Shohei said modestly.

"Not at all. I was only in there for a few minutes."

"Those few minutes were what saw the Mentulae go down, General."

Ikita ended the passing of praise, his spirits too lifted for him to stay out of it as he would have normally.

"Either way, we're damned grateful to both of you!" burst out from him. "We've had those cunni up our arses here for what feels like a lifetime, and it's your coming that's ended it. I assume you've been given a second commission?" he asked, eyeing Shizuru with giddy expectation. He might not have said it outright, but it was clear to everyone that he preferred this other commander to the one standing beside him, who seemed cloaked in a black despair.

"Yes, although I would prefer to discuss the details later."

She turned her head to his side and met her foe's tired eyes, her own expressing nothing but cool detachment.

"Masashi," she said.

"Fujino," he answered.

She went straight to the point.

"I am to relieve you of your mission by order of the Senate and People of Hime, and am retrieving the legions I left after my first campaign here. I am aware the Eighth is gone, so I shall be taking the Seventh along with all auxiliary legions gathered under your command. My officers have copies of the mandate, but I fear you shall have to wait until later to see them."

He ignored the others' glances and nodded bitterly at her businesslike manner. What a way to be stripped of both mandate and men! But what could one do about it in his position?

"Right," he said, striving to sound as detached as she was. "What about my officers?"

"Any who care to remain under my command may apply to my staff tomorrow." She smiled suddenly and without malice, albeit with little warmth. "For today, however, I would like our personnel to remain functioning under each of our commands, but in cooperation with each other. It should make things work faster in the transition."

"Fine."

She frowned all of a sudden. "Where is Suou Himemiya? I came here looking for her."

That brought all eyes again to Takeda, who set his teeth against the cringe. Too late - she had noticed it! Already her eyes were staring at him more sharply, some of the fire he had expected from her building up enough to show him the innocence of her curiosity. She did not know anything.

That was no surprise, he reflected. No one knew it yet outside of those who had been through the whole of this awful siege. Only natural Fujino bore no inkling, then, what with the suddenness of her return. Little though he liked it, he was conscious of a near-crushing apprehension as her eyes continued to search him, scratching for the answer. He was very conscious of how abnormally tall she was and darted an eye downwards: no, that was not it, her boots were of the same height as his. She really was so long, he thought, and then remembered that he had thought this before. Well, he supposed it took you by surprise each time.

Something bit his stomach as he sized her up in a quick look, painfully aware that standing next to her was none too flattering for him. How to tell this darling of the gods that her friend had perished under his command? Takeda had realised by now that he had no gift with words and nothing in him that might soften the blow he was about to give. Not that he wanted to soften the blow for her! Rather, the mercy was sought for himself, as this would be the thrust to end him. Suou Himemiya had killed his career by getting herself killed, and he felt again the resentment he had in the first few days after her body's discovery. A part of his mind whined at the injustice of it while another part, stiffer than the rest, kicked at him and ordered him to do it, to get the suicide over with, to kill the career of Takeda Masashi, who could have been one of Hime's brightest stars, who had almost been its brightest star if not for characters like the one standing before him...

The stiffer part won out and he spoke it in the plainest way: "She's dead."

To his surprise-and a bit of gratification-the golden face before him went lighter by a full shade.

"Dead?" The word was slow to come and sceptical. "How could..."

She shut her mouth and frowned, and there was no effort to hide the disbelief when she spoke again.

" Suou Himemiya ?"

As she made no attempt to hide, neither did he: Takeda did not dissemble or bind up the truth in soft words. He told her and spared no one, not Suou nor himself, in the account he tendered, which had the faces of Shizuru's officers-who had not known of Suou Himemiya's fate either before this moment-contorting with shock.

"She led those countermanding orders, but her actions gave others the time they needed," he ended after somehow pushing out the ghastly tale, aware every eye was riveted to him but somehow unable to care overmuch for all the others present. Only his old nemesis seemed to exist in the same space, the same time of his storytelling, and the rest might as well have been ghosts. And though he knew the story himself and had even lived it, he still found himself wondering at the end if his face was as pale as hers had become.

"Still, she should have been among those first in the walls. I'd counted on it." He harrumphed and looked as though he had been fed something rotten, then spoke through the knot in his throat. "But Suou still was - she was a good officer. It's no lie to say it was a tragedy."

Shizuru's face had still not changed from the puzzled, disbelieving countenance it had turned into upon being informed of her friend's death, and he wondered if she had actually taken in anything he had said. She nodded slowly as though urging him to go on, even though he was finished.

"I see," she said, once finally accepting that he had no more to say. She repeated his last words not in the manner of one agreeing, but in mindless rote. "It was a tragedy."

Then she frowned in the way one did when still uncertain of what was happening.

"The body," she said. "What has been done with her body?"

"We were unsure what ritual practice the Himemiya employed for their dead." It was the governor of Sosia who spoke, his face proclaiming he was genuinely saddened. And why should he not be, came the scream in Shizuru's ears: Why should he not be?

She blinked again, very casually, and shook off the sound only she was hearing. Ikita was still explaining what had been done with the corpse and she needed to listen to him. She was fairly sure what he was saying mattered, even if it sounded worthless to her ears. Who cared about the body and what they had done with it? The body was not the person, and they were telling her the person had been killed.

"But in light of the heat, we had to decide swiftly before the body went rancid. We burned her with all proper obsequies, Fujino-san, and placed her ashes in the best urn we could find. I hope this doesn't prove to have been an error."

"Where is the urn?"

"I have it in the gubernatorial mansion. It is safe."

"I shall come for it later."

"Of course." Governor Ikita's face suddenly gained more creases as he shook his head in patent dismay. "It's a damned shame she had to be among the dead," he said bluntly, ignoring Takeda's presence. "It really was, Fujino-san."

To his befuddlement, Shizuru took that with nothing but a smooth word of agreement and an equally smooth nod, seemingly more interested in surveying the field than mourning her friend. But Ikita already knew that appearances were deceiving with this one. And in fact, the real Shizuru was not in front of Ikita, not the cool-looking woman who seemed to be mulling over the news rationally, as though it were just another problem to be solved in her list of things to do for the day. The real Shizuru was elsewhere and fixed on an idea that refused to leave.

That Suou Himemiya could not be deceased .

It was not that Shizuru did not understand what Takeda or Ikita had said, or thought anyone at present a liar. Simply, Suou's death was still an implausible to the frame of her universe: a thing not yet true although it was . It was such that one could not even say she struggled with it. She simply stared at and through it as it stood before her, a strange and uncertain anomaly in her world. She would wonder later that no moisture had come to her eyes upon being informed of this anomaly, but the truth was that it affected her more than even she understood. It was shock that left her eyes dry, shock that she was feeling.

She knew it was most likely no lie that Suou had died in the manner Takeda had described. You could not jest about a Himemiya dying in such a way because the Himemiya just did not pass thus. People whose forebears had founded Hime itself - who also boasted of genuine divinities among their ancestors -whose pedigrees rivalled even Shizuru's own - why, people such as that never died in a battle with the rank-and-file soldiers! They could commit suicide in desperation of a battle completely lost; they could and would be pulled out first of all officers to be saved, in deference to their name; they might even flee the arena and save their own skins, for gods' sakes! But they did not die as Takeda claimed Suou had died, practically trampled by the front lines of the enemy mob. Was that what had caused the killing blow, perhaps? Had someone or something crushed that magnificent form before the life expired, insulting the physical marvel first before the even more precious will leached from it?

No. A sheer implausibility.

Shizuru hissed a deep breath through her nose, fighting a jarring urge to step back from the people around her. The only reason she did not surrender to that urge was that she feared another part of the world would give way with that one step. It was such a fragile world - she understood it now, she with all that monstrous confidence. Even without that, how could she have known such elemental things could so easily crumble? Was anything truly elemental, for that matter?

Everything comes down to relativity, she reasoned, trying to talk herself through the confusion. What is elemental to me? Suou was part of my life almost from the beginning: she knew me as few others could ever claim, and that knowledge was a part of my own reflection. So much was she to me that I cannot think of the younger me without considering the younger her. Yet they say she is dead and I remain as I ever was. As much as I loved her-and love her still-she is not elemental to me, then, if she is truly dead and I exist. What is elemental to Shizuru Fujino? Is it fire, water, air or earth? The philosophers say it would be these, yet I feel not the pull of them in my veins. Is it something as simple as the blood that leaks from my cuts? Or am I, at the final reduction, simply bound to my own self-esteem, my dignitas? Suou is dead, and I shall never laugh with her again. What is elemental?

Her head jerked and it came to her, the thing her shock had obscured for an instant.

Elemental.

Her foot took the step she had feared before and propelled her forward instead of back. Another idea now burned so brightly in her mind that her next actions and words were produced without deliberation, driving out even the bewilderment inside as it struck out all other paths with searchlight intensity.

"Natsuki," she said aloud. "Natsuki. Where is she?"

She addressed this to Takeda, it seemed, for her eyes were on his the moment she asked the query. He met her gaze with some consternation, a muscle leaping in his neck as she took another step towards him.

"Natsuki," she insisted, even as he opened his mouth. "Natsuki."

The staccato repetition threw him off and he stammered his response.

"That's - she's - I don't know. We don't know, not yet." Seeing she was about to take him to task, he explained before she could start with the eerie iterations of the name again: "She was with the Otomeians who were separated. I'd arranged for her to be among the first to be brought in Sosia, but she'd sneaked into the auxiliary lines. We only found out later fro-

To his lasting chagrin, she turned her back to him at this point and practically leapt straight onto her stallion, taking off with her little band of subordinates trying to follow. All she threw to the officials of Sosia and the interrupted Takeda in that departure was the carelessly spoken word, "Later!"

Shohei's horse was blowing hard as it struggled to keep up, and he shouted to her as she raided the field anew with her eyes.

"Fujino-san!" he hollered. "I don't think she's been on the field today! I've not seen her the whole time - she might be with the ones they left in their camp!"

She surprised him and the rest of the officers by reining Albinus in suddenly. She then began calling the names of over half of the officers as their steeds kicked up the dust, stamping at the excitement.

"Those I named, go with Shohei-han to see to the army," she said, speaking at a rapid clip that emphasised her accent's cresting rhythms. "Those I did not, come with me. Shohei-han, get together with Legate Miyuki Rokujou. Set up camp, arrangements for the medici first. Handle the rest."

"I'll have the men ask around for her too, Fujino-sa-"

She cut him short with uncharacteristic discourtesy.

"Later!" she said for the second time, and peeled away with the tribunes she had selected. It did not take long to find a black-uniformed trooper and she led her posse to him.

"Soldier, where is your commanding officer?" she demanded, once face-to-face with the surprised man. "The Captain, where is she?"

Failing to evoke anything but confusion from him, she tried even more urgently.

"Natsuki!" she snapped, patience wearing thin. "I seek the Princess Natsuki. Where is she?"

The man's face lit up at the name and he suddenly thrust his face closer to her in a bizarre response. She was caught off guard and did not quiz him for a moment, which he exploited to squint at her. This was followed by him pulling back and giving a strange yell.

"General Shizuru Fujino!" he cried, letting his horse prance a little. "Red-Eyes!"

And then she understood that he had not recognised her earlier, either due to her brown skin or his bad eyes or both. She repeated her query.

"Natsuki!" he said, nodding fiercely and driving his horse into another jittery dance. "Come for Natsuki!"

Two other black-suited troopers had drawn close to them, all staring with expectancy at the Himean commander. Others were coming now, and Shizuru thought she would have to repeat her request for them to give way as they crowded about her and her officers. But then several of them suddenly started dancing their horses and jabbering away to her, pointing to the small fort in the distance.

It was the fort Seigo Ushida had put up, where the Otomeians had been staying ever since their separation from the Seventh.

"Come with us for Natsuki!" said one of them, clearly far more articulate than the first trooper Shizuru had encountered. The man sounded anxious, and stared at her as though not understanding why she was not sending Albinus into gallop yet. "Come now, General Fujino! You will help the Princess! Hurry, hurry with me!"

There was no telling her twice. She took off to the fort, her tribunes and the Otomeians in hot pursuit. Soon her tribunes were behind, the Otomeian horses pulling ahead with Shizuru's own Albinus. As they rode, the Northerners called out the news to their fellows who had yet to hear: the Red-Eyes was back! They were in the hands of a true general again.

They reached the camp, Shizuru pulling on Albinus so shortly he actually came almost to rearing. She jumped off him when she saw the troopers dismount, some gabbling at her in broken Himean, others in their native tongue. One of them, someone she recognised as one of the sub-commanders of their division, came to the fore and urged her to follow them. Then she was striding side by side with the man, heading uncaringly wherever the stranger would lead for so long as he was promising Natsuki.

She was actively searching the whole time with her eyes, so she looked about while walking and thus got to see the state of the camp. Sensitised to the world again by the knowledge that Natsuki had been staying here, she was appalled by what she saw. What structures existed were makeshift enclosures of scraped-up materials, and she remembered seeing funeral pyres in abundance outside the walls. The wounded had obviously been left to care for the more gravely wounded, and she shuddered to see how ill-treated many of the people coming out at their clamour appeared. These were not Otomeians gaping at her and her guides: these were emaciated scarecrows, stringy and straw-haired characters with blue eyes popping from darkened sockets. They were the stick-figures of children's drawings come to life, creatures in a nightmare of crude simplicity!

This is a sorry place, she thought to herself, mouth tense with the anger of considering that Natsuki had been forced to live in such conditions as well. That my girl should have had to stay here is an accursed misery. These very people now are a misery, and the greatest misery is the fool who let this happen.

She quickened her step another beat and was dissatisfied with it: finally, she threw all appearances to the wind and switched to a run, the troopers whooping and following her example.

"Quickly," she said to the man leading them. "Quickly!"

They were all running now, their noise bringing out even more people from the tents. Finally the leading trooper pointed to a particular enclosure as their destination, and Shizuru showed them what her legs-legs that had spent literal years of marching and hiking in the legions-were made of: she went into full sprint and earned herself some exclamations from the impressed warriors, who strove to match the pace. She still reached the tent first of all, and actually caused a man coming out of it to drop the swaddle of filthy linen he had been carrying. She set him aside with one hand and went into the tent without announcing her presence, expecting to find Natsuki in front of her. What met her was near-darkness instead, and it surprised her enough to pause where she was. She would have gone on and explored the gloom had the troopers been with her but they had apparently chosen to stay outside, perhaps out of reverence for this meeting. Such a dark place for a meeting, though! Was this obscurity truly where Natsuki was? Oh, but she did not like this!

A slit of brilliance parted the blackness, and she realised this was only one section of the tent when a woman stepped from the light.

"Where is the Princess Natsuki?" Shizuru demanded of the woman, leaving the Otomeian blinking in surprise at the sudden interrogation. Before the Otomeian could answer, however, Shizuru had already rushed past her and into the lit-but still dim-inner section of the tent.

Here Shizuru had to stop again as her eyes adjusted to the change in lighting. Eventually she saw there was a cot and that in the cot was a dark mess of hair that she would have recognised even were she half-blind and the world half-dark.

"Is that-" She caught her breath so hard she nearly coughed.
"Natsuki! Natsuki, I am here!"

She sprang towards the bed, intent on waking her girl from what looked to be sleep.

"General," the Otomeian behind her was saying in a miserable accent. Shizuru noted hazily that the woman's voice sounded like she was crying. "General, please help!"

Help? Again that word, the Himean echoed in her mind, even while calling again to the girl. She bent over the cot, not even sparing a close glance at the body on it because she knew without a doubt it was Natsuki. She simply scooped up the unconscious form, trying to do it as tenderly as she could but aware she was probably doing it too fast. Her hands felt flesh that yet had its warmth, and she murmured a quick oath of relief at that. But a closer hold let her see that it was not just warmth but a great heat, and she peered again at the face as she brought the body up. And then she was afraid.

---

"Jupiter, what a day!"

The chief of the army surgeons for the Fourteenth padded into the tent set up for them and shook his hands at his fellows who were already there, taking a break from the nonstop work that they had been doing ever since they arrived in Sosia province. One of them handed him a jug of water that he tilted to his lips thirstily.

"Those Greeks in Hime have it easy," he said afterwards, wiping his mouth. "They get called in to visit their patients' homes and make simple prescriptions for complaints of fever and simple catarrh. We are forced to keep up with a mob of soldiers who suffer from every possible injury at any possible time, from broken bones to savaged flesh. What a difference!"

"Well, I'd rather stay in the army than cater to the hypochondriac notions of the rich," said one of the other surgeons. "You learn things here that the quacks in the city never do."

"Of course, of course, it makes for a comprehensive practice and experience," replied the head surgeon, who had been longer in the service but was new to the sort of marching they had just undergone in recent days. "But this haste! What a brutal way to treat medici !"

Two of the others exchanged glances and grinned.

"Best get used to it," one of them said. This was his second Fujino campaign and he knew she had a habit of dragging everyone in the army-herself included-from one place to another without much regard for the strain it took on the legs. "She works like this all the time. At least we got to ride some days."

"But not all," said the head surgeon, who had flopped into a seat.

"Oh, I am tired! And it is so noisy! What is that noise now?"

There was a commotion from outside the tent, and it seemed to be made up of hooves and feet and all sorts of other things. They heard someone calling the general, then a voice calling for the medicus, and were just about to go out and investigate when the source of the disturbance came barging in.

"Medicus!" said the intruder, flooring all of them. "Your aid, quickly!"

The surgeons gaped at the sight of their general as she stumbled into the tent, her once-polished armour grubby and her arms bearing a clutch of rags. She put the rags on the table in their operating area, and that was when they saw that there was a body bundled up there. Again they had to stare at it. What in the world was happening?

The general strode over and lifted the chief surgeon from his seat.

"Help her," she rasped, actually panting from a compound of fear and anger. Her eyes darted from him to the body on the table and then to him again as she burst out: "Did you not hear me? Help her, I said!"

The demand galvanised the man, who had never expected to see the composed Shizuru Fujino come to him in such a lather over one patient-and to be the one to bring that patient directly to him, for that matter. Who was this sorry-looking thing on his table that she would be treated so importantly? Interesting, interesting!

"Boiled water, in a pot!" he yelled to his fellows, who were already divesting the new patient of her clothes. The other surgeons would be his assistants today. "Clear the rest of these things off, quickly!"

There was a wince as he caught the scent of putrefaction from the unconscious woman-no, not a woman. Tall but also small, he thought, re-evaluating the patient. A girl, then? Yes, an adolescent. Or perhaps not: it was hard to tell, since she was so mean of flesh. Bones all over and hardly anything within! This was a living corpse the general had brought to him.

"Watch that blade," he cautioned as one of them continued to cut down the patient's shift. "Someone start taking off these bandages already!"

"I have it!"

"Mind her skin!"

The general stepped back and watched them work, feeling awkward and uncertain in this medical mayhem. Some officers had followed her dash all the way to the tent, and now entered to stand behind her with astonished faces. Shohei was present, as was the primipilus of the Ninth and some scribes with the Fourteenth. Some of them walked past the partition to see what the general had just brought in at the tearing hurry they had all seen, when she had ignored everything and everyone who had been calling.

"My god!" croaked Shohei, who finally recognised two senseless green eyes on the creature in the arms of the surgeons. "Is that Natsuki-san?"

Nao gave one look around his shoulder, then backed away and pulled Shohei and all the rest with her, shaking her head at their protests. She herded them out of sight of the table and cursed them into peace.

"Cut these rags!" the surgeon ordered, a little calmer now that one mystery had been cleared. He remembered that strange name from the gossip, the name the legate had just given. Of course, of course - it would be the barbarian mistress. He only just managed to stop nodding to himself at the realisation and continued his examination of the patient, occasionally punctuating her insensible moans with his own grunts and noting her symptoms and injuries as they were discovered.

Incisions on the arms, incisions on the sides – a mess, just a mess - some of those stitches need redoing - grave and abnormal discoloration, a bad sign - and what do we have here? Ah, of course, of course, this would have been the source of the odour...

They had removed all the bandages and the shift by the time the patient started to come to properly. She began muttering, her body doing a chorea of no particular rhythm. Keen on the girl's attention, the general tried calling the girl's name as she had done the whole way to the tent. Again it provoked no sensible response and a new note of desperation entered Shizuru's voice as she addressed the chief surgeon.

"Why does she not answer?" Shizuru demanded when the surgeon turned away from the table to face the box carrying his tools. She winced when she saw another odd jerk from Natsuki's limbs, which another of the surgeons had to hold down. "Why does she shiver so?"

"Delirium-it is the fever," the medicus replied, concerned with ensuring all his tools were at hand. A loud thump drew their eyes to the patient, who was producing more jerks against the assistants' restraints. She was still strong for a near-corpse, thought the medicus, about to give the order to bind her.

Suddenly her head came up and two wild eyes stared at him: he froze, fascinated by the lambent irises he had not seen properly until then. Two broken lips quivered and pulled back until he could see her teeth.

The living corpse screamed.

"Natsuki!" Shizuru gasped, amazed that the girl had seemed not to even see her when their eyes had met for an instant. She shuddered at the sound of the girl's scream in decrescendo, a lingering roll like the growl of a beast. "What is the matter with her, Medicus? Can she not recognise anything?"

"She is not sensible," said the chief surgeon. "I doubt anything we say is understood."

He frowned at the sound of another scream, hoarse and more air than voice to the ears.

"I must strap her to the table to better tend to the injuries."

The general watched helplessly as the man gave the order to tie down the patient, anger twisting her as she saw them lashing down the girl. Natsuki fought the surgeons with the stubbornness Shizuru knew her to have and once tied, resorted to thrashing her head against the table like a savage. They forced it down and secured it with more cloth, inspecting the stitches on her brow before that. Thus fully immobilised, the patient emitted another breathless scream, and then another, and another still.

Listening to what was clearly the sound of a creature out of its mind with terror, Shizuru grit her teeth hard. She still had the sense not to approach, however, as she was afraid of what she might do to the medici for what they were doing, even despite her knowledge that they were trying to help the girl. It was easy to understand that, she thought, but her heart was being commanded by those screams and she was afraid of what it might compel her hands to do if she did not keep her distance.

"Can you not give her something for calm?" she asked nervously, eyes riveted to the long, twig-like neck straining against the bondage. By the gods, she could break that twig with one hand! "Medicus, how grave is it?"

"This one - this one is very bad," the chief surgeon muttered, selecting various implements from his box. "I will try to induce her to swallow something to put her to sleep, but it is very bad. Where is my reed, my reed... Tch!"

He did not see the look she flicked to him, which shimmered between hope and despair. "But you can take care of this."

"To some degree," he said. "She is very bad, General. It is not wise to get our hopes high."

"Because you are the person best-equipped to help her, I shall pretend you did not just say that," Shizuru shot back. " You should be the one concerned with hopes right now, since you had best hope your skills do not fail you this time."

She and the man locked eyes, the latter experiencing a skitter of fright at her stare.

"I have every faith in my skills, General," the surgeon still replied bravely. "But she is a very bad case and I cannot guarantee survival. It is well to prepare, because she will probably die."

It was a good thing he was not holding any part of the patient's body at that moment, for Shizuru covered the distance between them with inhuman speed, reached for him some feet away, and then tugged and lifted him into the air. The physician would not have believed the slender woman's power had someone only told him of it, and was so shocked that he kicked and struck one of her greaves with a clang. An angry shake stopped that and he went still, forced to meet her glare as she brought his head level to hers. Her face was very close and he could finally see the smoothness of her olive skin, and the purity of feature that made up her beauty. It was strange from up close, the incurably clinical part of him reflected, because it seemed almost to have too much purity. It was as though he were staring into the face of a statue by the old masters from Greece, and not at a living being.

But this statue had the eyes of a demon, and it was sending his heart into his ribs.

As the spot where they stood was not shielded from the receiving area of the tent by the partitions, everyone save the patient saw her assault the man. The other surgeons stopped what they were doing, frightened half out of their wits.

"Say that again and I guarantee your non-survival," Shizuru said softly to the man she held aloft, her voice dropping to her boots as she struggled not to kill him. "Hear me, Medicus, and the rest of you quacks in this tent: you shall guarantee her life, even if you must throw Pelion atop Ossa to do so! I shall see this girl alive or I shall end you superfluous worms myself!"

The threat woke one of the gobsmacked spectators. Miyuki Rokujou had just joined the other officers in the tent and now reached out to her commander, still panting from the run that had brought her over.

"Shizuru-san-" she tried to say.

Shizuru silenced her with a glance. Miyuki suddenly found reason to think better of what she had to say and ended in deciding not to say it.

"Fo - forgive me," the chief surgeon whined, wondering if she was going to kill him. Her stare narrowed at his apology, and his heart bruised itself against his ribs again. And with almost evil timing, the patient breathed out another terrified scream.

The surgeon begged for his life upon feeling her hands tighten.

"Please, General, forgive me. My tongue was careless! It was an error and I am very sorry for it!"

She glared at the apology but still released her grip. The medicus crumpled to the floor, his face pasty.

"Predict no tragedies for this patient's life," the woman before him said between her teeth. "Or see me match them for yours. Clear?"

The man nodded with convulsive speed. He recoiled when she reached a hand out to him, but could not fight the force as she pulled him to his feet.

"Get to it," she snapped irritably. "You are not dead yet, Medicus, so move!"

He all but ran for the table. As for her, she stalked to the other side of the partition, glaring scornfully at the officers clustered together. Suddenly these wished they had bethought themselves of better things to do earlier, instead of choosing to stay and watch the delicious drama they had seen unfolding.

"What are you all doing here?" she asked, still so furious that she actually lifted her upper lip in addressing them. "Are there not things to be done with the army?"

That got rid of most of them, but not the ones she considered most loyal and highest up in rank, ironically enough. They got a haughty eyebrow for their courage, each of them flinching for each cry the patient gave behind the partition. Shizuru herself pretended to be oblivious to the sounds, but they knew she was listening very keenly: her eyes got a little narrower after each cry, as though she were the one in pain instead of the girl voicing the noises.

"What?" she said, driving them to shift on their feet. Someone had to answer her, of course, but they well knew that said someone might end up getting flogged at this rate-or perhaps strangled by the general's hands, given the way they were still clenching. Oh, this was a fine pickle they had gotten into! If only they had left her alone after her dash through the unfinished camp, instead of following her here and poking their noses into her private business. Well, someone's nose would be getting lopped today. This decidedly different, practically alien Shizuru Fujino looked to be guaranteeing it.

"What?" she repeated, prompting sweat to break out on all foreheads.

Easily the bravest of the lot as well as the one with the most affinity for rebellion, the chief centurion of the Ninth stepped forward and took it on her shoulders. The rest stared at the redheaded officer, each one half-afraid and half-applauding.

"Excuse me, Fujino-san," Nao told the dour-looking commander, careful to keep her voice as respectful as possible. "D'you want me to send for Erstin? She can help watch her, you know, and she's a good girl. Be good to get someone you trust in here while you work."

I'm dead, Nao found herself thinking in the silence following her offer. Fuck if it's not what I get, all cocky-like and coming up to her right now, and that bloody medicus isn't helping, what he's doing to that girl to make her bawl, and fuck my stupid mouth-

Her inner rant was cut short when she heard Shizuru's breath hissing out.

"Indeed," the general was saying, for she understood what the centurion was trying to say and knew the rightness of it. "Erstin."

Nao let her shoulders sag just a little, knowing no one could see it in her armour.

"Thank you," Shizuru said, slightly calmer too because the cries in the tent had subsided. "Yes, she shall do."

"You can send some of your servants, 'course," Nao added in an effort to keep her in this reasonable mood. "But Ers will see the job right better if she's with them. She'll have them sending you word on her too."

Shizuru nodded without a word. She might have calmed enough to respond to Nao's offer but she was far from composed, especially as she was concerned about the change in the patient's noises. No sooner had she turned with the intention of seeing what had happened than the chief surgeon trotted out and joined their party.

He froze upon seeing all of them glaring at him. Why-was everything to be blamed upon him today?

"Medicus?" Shizuru said, inviting him to begin whatever he had been on the verge of saying.

"Fujino-san," he said unenthusiastically. "There is a difficulty."

She walked around him and tried to get a better look at the patient.

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"The rest of her wounds I am certain I can address," the man answered. "But the one on the leg is very bad. We have just taken off the wrappings, and they too have gone dark." He pointed to the farther end of the body, which Shizuru could not see properly due to the table's orientation. "There is much discharge from it, and it is not wholesome."

Shizuru froze in horror, halting her steps that very second.

" Gangraena ?" she asked in a hoarse voice, knowing that condition as one of the most fearsome ailments that could ever afflict a soldier. " That serious ?"

He grimaced and nodded.

"Very serious, General," he said. "The effluvium is putrid and so is the surrounding flesh. It is beyond simple repair."

She sucked in her breath and looked staggered. Her officers were staring, but she could not care about them just then. For all she was concerned, they might have been massacred by a pack of Mentulae and she would not have noticed.

"Can it not be treated at all?" she asked, sounding more like someone begging than someone asking a scientific query. "Can nothing be done for it?"

"No, unfortunately." He shifted and looked even more unenthusiastic. "There is only one thing left, I mean."

"What? What is it?" Shizuru asked, looking as though she would claw him whatever he said next. The surgeon swallowed and said it anyway:

"We must extirpate the limb."

This time everyone in the tent sucked in a breath. Shizuru stared at the chief surgeon with shock written all over her face.

"You are asking me..." she uttered incredulously. "To amputate her leg?"

He swallowed.

"I am asking if you would permit it, General," he said.

"A good question." The look in her eyes was lethal. "Why should I?"

Again the reflex contracted his throat.

"The limb cannot be saved," he explained. "But it is likely that she can be, if we sever the rotten part now. The rot will migrate to all the other parts if we let it stay, and then nothing can be done to help the patient. It is the only way to help her."

The rest of the people in the tent listened with mingled dread and fascination, their eyes on their commander as she eyed the man as though sizing him up for the cremation urn. Her glare was practically boiling off the sweat as fast as the physician's face produced it, and suddenly even those not on the receiving end of her anger felt the need to flee. Another kind of fear rooted them where they were, however, and they were forced to stay and watch this potential tragedy as it played.

"So you are asking me for permission that you may do the only thing there is to do," Shizuru finally spoke, doling out the words with ominous care. "Is this not so?"

The poor surgeon bent over as far as he could, his face gone the colour of slate.

"General," he uttered miserably.

"You did say it was the only thing to do, correct?"

Another miserable utterance: "Yes, General."

"Then," she growled, "why are you even requesting consent if you say it is the only thing to be done, damn you!"

He came out with the truth, his voice croaking in dejection.

"Because if I did it without asking, General, I was afraid you would kill me."

Those fierce eyes stayed on him, a world of fire binding an expanding spot of darkness in each one. The poor man cringed, visited by a presentiment that the fear he had just spoken would become real. Why had he ever agreed to this post? Who was it that had told him she was a wonderful general?

The wonderful general gave him one last glare and looked away, her face hidden from all of them. When she turned back, her whole countenance was bizarrely devoid of expression.

"I see."

She inclined her head and said, in the most reasonable tone he had heard from her all day, "Sever the limb."

He gasped and bowed to the waist. "General!"

Then he was rushing back to the table where his patient was already strapped down and waiting, leaving Shizuru with her officers. Who looked to their commander with hearts pounding, wondering what fresh fury this would visit on them.

But she was cool in her address, her voice bearing nothing but the crushing authority they had only ever heard her bring out in the most dire army situations.

"We shall leave the Medicus and his assistants to their work," she said. "And betake ourselves to ours. All outside now."

Nao was the first to exit, going off to fetch her body-servant for the promised task. The rest filed out slowly, all with sombre and downcast expressions. Only Shizuru's old scribe dared to meet her eyes as they were leaving, and the face he turned to her was on the brink of tears.

Shizuru warned him off before he could say a word.

"Hold your tongue," she whispered, her throat hurting so badly it was a wonder she managed to say the rest. "Aisuka-han, say anything and I shall send you home this very moment."

The older man nodded and lifted his arm so he could wipe his eyes. He hid his face from her and went out with the others. Then only Shizuru was left.

"Medicus," she said, just loudly enough so the man would hear.

He stepped out from behind the partition.

"Yes, General?" he said fretfully.

"Remember what I said."

"Oh, yes, General."

"I shall send people over."

She left him and went to the group waiting outside. Her old legate came close and addressed her first, speaking in a hushed tone she could barely hear above the racket of soldiers starting on nearby parts of the camp.

"Rokujou-san and I can do the work, Fujino-san," he said. "If you want to stay here for a while, you can. We'll handle it."

She actually opened her eyes wide at him.

"Impossible," she stated. "I am the commander, and I should be the one to tend to certain things. Even I must prove I am not superfluous."

She lifted her voice and addressed the rest.

"Return to your duties, which I expect all of you to know by now," she said. "If you do not, quit my sight immediately and find out what your duties should be. Shohei-han, take your officers with you to handle the clean-up and set up camp for the army. Send a note to Masashi's group to handle the Seventh for now and work on supporting the other legions in their work."

She looked up and seemed to squint into the field before them, which was a little less dusty now that it had been muddied by all the dragged bodies.

"Do not forget to account for the Otomeians still quartered in the hill base. Most of them are wounded, so they should be transferred as soon as possible to the medical quarters. Expand those to suit the current requirement. Inquire about the Seventh's injured as well: they might need assistance."

"Right away, Fujino-san."

"You know the rest. Send me an update on your progress in about an hour's time."

He agreed and made to leave, but she stopped him with a word. Something else had caught her notice, and she seemed displeased by it.

"Water donkeys are not enough," she said, eyeing the asses being led about to water the thirsty soldiers. "From now on, I want water skins added to the standard issue for our legionaries. You shall notice the Fourteenth is provided with them already. In contrast, the Ninth and Eleventh are clearly parched, and I do not want that happening in future battles or for this day, which shall have them working under the summer heat to the evening. Delegate one of your officers to take care of this. Buy out all the water skins in Sosia if you have to and have them making more immediately."

"Right," said the man. "Ah-do we get the same provisions for the auxiliary?"

She said not a word but met his eyes with hers. He took the hint.

"Right, General," he said again, and went off to do her bidding.

The rest of the officers Shizuru brought with her to their command tent, which had already been put up courtesy of the Fourteenth. Shizuru's servants, too, had been very efficient, and had already arranged the necessities for a war council, complete with all the stools and desks the commander required for her ever-present scribes.

The somewhat dazed officers were marched into the room and made to take their seats by the still strangely calm general, who got down to work as soon as her rear met a chair. Her first order of business was to ask for an accounting of their current forces and for specific officers to be called over from Takeda Masashi's billets inside the city, as well as for the captured Mentulaean commander-yet another prince of Obsidian's enormous brood-to be brought to her for an interview. So competently did she run the council that those officers who had seen her passions earlier were tempted to doubt their memories, all of them wondering how anyone could return so coolly to business after such an experience. Why, she did not even seem to spare time for mourning the dead legate they had all known to be her friend! Or for the casualties among the Seventh, come to it.

Only a few of these observers realised that, had the commander indeed let her grief rein, it might well have brought out all of theirs. As she acted so professionally, however, they could find no space for indulging in their own miseries. Which Shizuru understood perfectly, herself being no stranger to the demoralising potential of military losses.

"So this brings the Seventh down to half-strength," she said to Takeda Masashi's senior legate, who came to detail to her the casualties in Takeda's last legion. Shizuru's officers watched with interest as she lifted an eyebrow at the handsome man, who looked not a whit discomposd by the accusation in her tone.

"At least six members of illustrious families gone, a Himemiya included," she drawled to him, sounding as critical as she looked. "Half of the Seventh gone. Half or more of the original auxiliary gone. All of the Eighth gone. Impressive figures... for the Mentulae."

Seigo Ushida took that with the exactly the right amount of gravity.

"There were some unwise orders going on," he said flat-out, provoking some looks from the other Masashi officers in the tent. They all knew he was friends with Takeda, of course, so it was something of a defection for him to admit this to the other general. But then again, everyone knew Takeda was going down and no one wanted to go down with him.

"That's all I can say, Fujino-san, and it's no excuse, I'll agree," said Ushida. "Bad decisions made with our command, and good people paid the price for it."

"You were part of the command, Ushida-han," she reminded him.

"But not the command," he stated strongly. "I agreed with Suou Himemiya on most things, and if things had gone our way, I doubt those losses would have happened. But we weren't the real command, Fujino-san, so we couldn't have our way. That's about the sum of it."

And that is suggestive accounting if ever I have heard it! thought an interested Miyuki, who was watching this interview on her feet, her hip rested against a table edge. She understood what Ushida was getting at, naturally, but was uncertain of what Shizuru's answer would be. Would she take on the man, despite his established friendship with Takeda Masashi? Granted, he seemed to know his military from the way he had explained everything, but there were other things about him, some tendencies Miyuki did not feel to be too palatable to someone of Shizuru's ilk...

"It was a shame, then, that you were not heeded," Shizuru eventually said. "Perhaps if you were in other, differently structured armies?"

Ushida looked at her, his eyes shining.

"Yes, that's what I think," he said. "I'd love to work with someone who knows bad decisions from good ones."

"I think we all would."

"Not as much as I do. I'd give anything for it."

Shizuru kept her gaze level, not giving him an inch of hope yet.

"Really," she said with a bored tone. "How much do you want it?"

"Enough to drop what I have right now and go after it if I had the chance."

She made up her mind and nodded to him.

"I am certain you shall find it accommodating if you do go that far," she hinted, ending their veiled conversation. "I have kept you long enough, Ushida-han. Please return to your duties, and thank you again for lending us your time."

He walked away very relieved and already making plans to have a private interview with her the next day. There could be no mistake: she had just approved of his informal request to become her legate. Ah, let the ill-thinkers whisper what they would of him after this! He had a career to protect and a whole pack of siblings to provide for, and he could not do all of that without a good campaign and good pickings. Takeda's attempt had failed and had gained him far less than he had expected, so it was off with Takeda's attempt and on with Fujino's. It was all well and good to stay chummy with his old friend, of course, but the ship had to go first-and he was not about to let Takeda's sinking one drag his along with it.

Only a few minutes had passed from Ushida's exit when the guards announced the arrival of someone Shizuru had been awaiting: the captured general of the Sosia Siege's Mentulaean army, Prince Hanu of Obsidian's Royal Family.

"Good day, Prince," Shizuru said, indicating that a chair should be drawn up for their aristocratic visitor. It was done in an instant, one of the tribunes vacating his chair for the guest. "Please sit."

The invitation got her a sniff to the face.

"Very well, if we must exercise the petty strategy of positioning," Shizuru said tolerantly, getting up from her seat and walking over until they were face to face. He stared at her height first when showed she was taller than him, then stared at her eyes when the initial shock from the first trait had gone away.

Shizuru dropped her chin a little. "Far be it from me to satisfy your need to make me look churlish by standing while I enjoy a comfy chair. Would you like a cup of wine, by the way?"

The dark-eyed, light-haired prince scowled, flexed the corded muscles of his arms, and spat a refusal.

"And have you poison me in public?" he growled. "No, thank you, Himean!"

Several people chuckled behind Shizuru, who smiled a little as well.

"Er - no, we are not in the habit of poisoning our guests," she said to him. "I could sip from your cup to assure you of its safety, but I doubt you would like that. Are you sure you would not like something? Water? Some food?"

No response.

"I see."

She narrowed her eyes at him as if evaluating his appearance, running her gaze from his feet to the top of his head. Every part of him radiated offence at her prying look.

"The soldiers who caught you said you were to the back at first, but came closer and closer through the fight," she said. "You could have run away when it turned against you. Yet you did not."

His upper lip pulled back as he snarled and looked goaded.

"And how do you understand that, then?" he hissed. "Does it fit your image of us? Or are you wondering why I was not cowed enough to flee?"

She looked patient again. "I shall thank you not to pose questions to me. Speak directly, Prince."

"You would prefer to think we Mentulaeans are cowardly!"

"I wonder," she replied, unfazed. "For myself, I have never really espoused such a view of the enemy. At any rate, it is not about what one prefers to think and more about what one actually thinks. For instance, some of my men actually think you did not flee because you did not realise there was a possibility of it."

"Hah!" He scoffed out the laugh, his tone derisive as he retorted. "Am I blind? Your men think wrong."

She surprised him by agreeing.

"I believe you chose not to flee, Prince. I shall grant you have your share of bravery," she said to him. "You did not flee even when you could have and knew it, even when your men were being cut down. No, you simply were not willing to run. I see it in you even now. Your very look, your demeanour-" She eyed his broad-shouldered, very martial frame. "It tells me you have courage."

He sneered despite the compliment. She gave him reason to do so the next second.

"Skill, however, you have not," she continued dispassionately. "From what I hear, you had somewhere around six legions' worth of foot and a legion's worth of horse with you, along with a fair number of artillery from the outset. Yet you could not take the citadel even after three months of attempt. A performance one must term laughable. Brave? I suppose. Persistent? Definitely. But smart?"

She shook her head with obvious pity for his apparent shortcomings.

"I wonder your King allowed you command at all," she sighed. "But then, that is the difficulty with monarchies and I realise it. Nepotism is the law. Or perhaps it is the nature of politics everywhere, given that it rears its head in our case too. Furthermore, it must be noted that most nations are still unable to separate their notions of the great warrior and the great general. You must be a great warrior, and I see it: they thought you would also make a great general by default. Still, Prince, I must say I have rarely seen as pathetic a job at siege as you have done here. Were you a Himean commander, you would be arraigned by now in a special court. Count yourself fortunate you are merely one of the Mentulae."

He snarled and looked so close to biting her that the guards took a step forward.

"You will pay for your insults, Himean," he promised. "My siblings and the King My Father will see to it! It shall be so before you have had your fill of celebration after killing me!"

But the face Shizuru turned to him was a surprised one.

"Kill you?" she echoed. "Do I look a butcher, man, that you would think that? I have absolutely no intention of killing you."

His expression said he could not believe her.

"It is not our way," Shizuru insisted. "Even your father shall not face an execution of the kind you seem to expect. No, you and all your fellow commanders shall live to walk in my triumph after this war. You shall be placed in confinement at a villa in a nice Fuukan town while awaiting that event, which shall likely take place only after a good many years, given the length of my term. Your brother, the Prince Artaxi, is already enjoying such a confinement, you know."

He stared at her with even more dislike despite the assurance that he would live.

"Then you would disgrace us instead of giving us death?" he said sourly. "You put us in a low dungeon, treat us like pigs in the sty?"

You Himeans have a greater sense of cruelty than I expected."

"Oh, how much you love the erotesis! And how little you know of us!" Shizuru said to that, sounding almost kind as she explained something to the foreigner. "Himeans have no dungeons, Prince! Save for a tiny and unguarded cell in Hime that we call the Lautumiae. No one is ever really put there to be imprisoned. Even were someone to be put there, it would be largely useless, at any rate, since the cell is gateless."

She peered into his amazed eyes and revealed the future of his imprisonment.

"As I said, you shall be going to a villa," she told him. "I did not speak in irony. Your brother the Prince Artaxi is certainly not in a dungeon. However, the two of you shall never meet during your confinement. The locations of your villas are assigned by secret, and neither of you is allowed to leave the walls of your temporary home. All your needs shall be provided for-if you need women or food brought to you it shall be done-but you shall be guarded at all times and you shall not be permitted to exchange letters with anyone. You shall endure, in effect, a comfortable sort of anonymity. As to how long that shall last... Who knows? Perhaps your name might be forgotten by the time we release you. A relief, I imagine, considering your performance here."

The scowl returned to his face and shunted the bewilderment from it. The Prince inhaled and stood straight, intent to show up this foreign menace for what she was relative to his royal person.

"Enjoy your brief victory, Shizuru Fujino," he said with immense dignity. "It won't last, so gloat all you can before my siblings and the King gut you and what's left of your armies. Those of you who do live will be blind, deaf, and dumb cripples before this is over."

She smiled. But she followed the smile by stepping in and throwing her fist so viciously at his face that the warrior prince howled and fell to his knees. Both his face and Shizuru's knuckles were bloodied from the shot, but his was by far the worse state: the masculine, forward-thrusting set of his mandible was a grotesque parody of before, his chin reset and skewed in a preposterous way. She had dislocated his jaw.

Shizuru asked for water from one of the dazed tribunes, who punctuated the shock in the tent by jumping up and scurrying to pour water for her. She held out her hand under the trickle and washed her cut, pleased that only a small one had broken. She could feel no internal injuries either: little though most people would expect it, she had given enough punches throughout her life to thicken her knuckles as well as teach her the best way to deliver a blow without breaking the bones of the fist. She asked for clean linen next from the tribune and used it to stanch the cut on her hand, turning her back on the man moaning on the floor.

"Please escort him to the quarters prepared," she said, returning to her seat. "And have one of the free surgeons put that back first. I doubt our prince would enjoy having that reminder of me each time he stares into the mirror for the rest of his sorry life."

The other spectators woke from their torpor, the prince's legionary guards suddenly jerking to his aid and pulling him away. Shizuru watched with a bored air as they helped him out of the tent, her eyes coming to Miyuki Rokujou's once the party was gone.

"Because I felt like it," she said matter-of-factly, as if Miyuki had asked the question.

Miyuki cleared her throat, the accusation that this was becoming a habit dying on her tongue.

"Concerning the legions we have on hand," said the commander, as though nothing of moment had just happened. "I want some of the cohorts redistributed to fill out the five lost by the Seventh."

The others did not respond quickly enough, a little slower in the recovery.

"Five cohorts for the Seventh," Miyuki reiterated for the benefit of the still shocked scribes. "Is that right, Shizuru-san?"

"Not exactly. The redistribution shall come to only three additional cohorts for the Seventh, so it shall have to stay understrength for now."

"Along with the other legions from which you plan to take those cohorts, I presume?"

"Quite so." Shizuru was patting the cut on her hand with a handkerchief. "One cohort from the Ninth, Eleventh, Fourteenth each."

"Why aren't we using the Seventh to plump out the other legions?" one of the tribunes said. He was still getting over the shock of seeing the commander take a pop at the foreign prince, so he forgot to school his tongue and spoke freely. "At least we'd have stronger legions then, even if there are fewer."

All eyes darted to him.

" Your manners, Tribune !" Miyuki snapped before anyone else could. "You are in the presence of your senior officers! How dare you interrupt your general when she's addressing her legates?"

The tribune flushed at the objurgation, his posture stiffening.

"As to why the general has chosen to redistribute the legions that way," she continued, "it's obviously because any fool can see that four understrength legions are better than three overstrength ones, if only because they are more manoeuvrable. Something you managed to miss, along with your lessons in army hierarchy. The next time you get the bright idea of opening your mouth and showing off to your superiors in council, try to display something other than your folly."

Shizuru sighed aloud, regaining the focus of the tent.

"Do all of you think I might return to my depositions without interruption?" she said with a decidedly humourless smile.

Everyone nodded, including the blushing tribune who had interrupted her.

"Good," she said. "For my next concern, I would like to hear from Arashi-han again."

That young woman, another of the officers sent over from Takeda's camp and someone with whom Suou had worked often in the months prior to her death, stepped forward and waited.

"Arashi-han, you have been liaising with the Otomeians for the Seventh," Shizuru began. "You said earlier that there were some of them tearing down the bridges on the boundary. Were they also guarding the banks of the rivers, then, or was it a single-task deployment?"

"The Otomeians said the directions assigned to that contingent were specifically to bring down the bridges and do all they could to prevent Mentulaeen incursions, Fujino-san," said the young woman. "They assured us those Otomeians at the rivers would have stayed there until further directions or extenuating circumstances required a retreat."

"Certainly it would indicate they are yet there, as we have no news from the scouts we sent weeks ago of any further intrusions by the Mentulae," Shizuru noted, looking at Miyuki. "Have you details of their strength, Arashi-han?"

"As I recall, two legions foot and four alae horse," was the answer.

"That's a good number," Miyuki said, having expected fewer.

"But hardly enough to cover that whole stretch," Shizuru cautioned. "The length is too large, and the Mentulae shall eventually find a clear pass. Now I am doubly thankful I left instructions at Argus to send another four legions to cover the boundaries. They should encounter the Otomeians and agree on how to split up the areas for their duties."

She turned to Arashi again and frowned.

"Do we know who is commanding that boundary army, by the way?" she asked. "And whence does it come? As I calculate it, there are more Otomeians in total than there were before, last I was here."

Arashi agreed.

"The surplus comes from a fresh army that apparently just returned from their other provinces," she explained, rather enjoying having everyone's attention. There were some stellar names in the tent, even excluding the general and the legate, and to be treated so importantly by such illustrious people was rather an experience. "The bulk of that army is the one that went to tear down the crossings, and its original commander is still handling it. They called her the Princess Alyssa."

Again the thoughtful frown came to Shizuru's face. "Alyssa? Information."

"She's one of the Otomeian king's daughters. Very highly respected by the Otomeians and said to be a great commander."

"Which would make her a great warrior as well, as I understand the Otomeian way of thinking to be," Shizuru responded with some curiosity. "Very well. That gives me higher hopes of initiating the next phase of the plan for the border infiltration soon. For now we should focus on what is taking place on this side of the rivers and make sure we have no more interlopers running about our piece of this country. Have the scouts all been sent?"

"Already on their duties," someone answered.

"I am not yet fully satisfied with the run of communications here. Our intelligence network is starting to take shape and more agents from Yamada-han should be coming in from Argus this week, but I want a separate communications division aside from that. Aside from the scouts, I also want at least two couriers always on the roads of Sosia to Argus and Sosia to Otomeia. That means at least two daily for each route, whether battle is taking place or not."

"Even on days when there is no real news?" Miyuki said with a frown.

"There is always real news. Otherwise, we may write to each other about the weather or what we had for breakfast. Have we enough horses and couriers for this?"

Miyuki had been inquiring into the status of the scouts and stables earlier and told her it was doable.

"A little rearrangement can work it out," she told the general. "But we need to think about getting more horses soon. From what our Otomeians and Masashi-san's officers have told me, Masashi-san's Otomeians are ridiculously low in horseflesh after all their battling. So much so that Masashi-san's officers had to trade their horses for mules and nags to keep up the cavalry. Right, Arashi-san?"

"We converted some infantry soldiers to cavalry ones," Arashi clarified. "It was Himemiya-san's idea."

Miyuki paused her response, but Shizuru did not.

"I see," the commander said. "Have someone do an accounting of all the Otomeian cavalry's present stock-retrieving the Himean horses, of course, since we shall be hearing from some querulous people soon if we do not return them-and send a request to their citadel for the horse deficit. Put that request with similar letters and accounts penned by their own leaders, and have one of their scouts or couriers accompany the ones we send for that missive."

"Should we wait to include that in the package we're sending them today?"

"No. I see no need to delay the mail announcing my reinstatement and the victory at Sosia. Ye gods, how pitiful is it we shall even have to deem this a victory, by the way? A legion and a half lost and thousands of our allies slain."

She looked disgusted and had to shake her head to stop herself from going further. She knew she could not let herself go far enough to start thinking along these lines or she would be tempted to shirk her duties-and that was something one simply did not do when one was the commander of such an enterprise.

"We can send the missive about horseflesh in a separate package," she told them.

She angled her head and seemed to consider something.

"Inform me before that mail goes out, however. I think we should tell them to bring up even more horses from their horse-raising provinces than what we need to fill our cavalry deficit. I shall place an order to them to sell us horses for seating all our officers, including even the junior tribunes. Officers need to have height and always be visible. Most of the minor officers are not given steeds and I think I shall change that."

"Even if the Otomeians do have enough reserve horses for this, the circumstances will make those additional ones ridiculously expensive," Miyuki warned her-rather uselessly too, as Shizuru's scribes and longer-standing officers knew. As these had expected, the commander brushed off Miyuki's warning with a wicked reply.

"What is that to me?" Shizuru said. "The Senate is paying for it."

Having caused Miyuki's jaw to snap shut, she then looked up at the sound of a soldier entering the tent and throwing her a salute.

"Here with an update, soldier?" said Shizuru, recognising the man as a highly decorated member of the Ninth. She leaned back in her seat and looked expectantly at him. "Well done with the battle earlier."

"Thank you, General!"

"Deliver what you have, please."

He clapped both feet together loudly and started reciting what the legate had told him.

"General! The Eleventh, and Ninth are setting up camp. The legate estimates time of completion to be two hours from present. The Sosia legion is with the Ninth and the Fourteenth is on cleanup duty. The medical quarters have been expanded as per instructions and are finished. The legate has started moving the Otomeians from the hill camp."

"Have we any numbers from the Otomeians on their casualties?"

"Not yet, General, very sorry. The legate has sent someone to gather the information from their leaders now."

"Very well, then. Proceed."

"Sosia's stocks are low. Maximum period of use is a week until further supplies are brought in. The legate requests permission to use one legion for forage as soon as possible."

"Granted, but not today. Proceed."

"The legions can extend a week if the Seventh is included in the Ninth's and Eleventh's share..."

And so on and so forth. Shizuru worked without even pausing for a drink, let alone a bite, and strove to finish everything she would have expected herself to finish after a normal battle, even sparing some time to send for the centurions of the devastated Seventh and praising them for their spirit as well as patting them on the back when several burst into tears. She dictated messages to Otomeia, Hime, and Argus to her scribes at her usual breakneck speed and had the officers announce a muster to be held the next day, during which she would address her reconstituted army. She also took some time away from her desk to ride into Sosia with some officers and collect the remains of her old friend, which was perhaps the worst thing of all that she had to do as the commander. Besides that, there were about a hundred and one other tasks she dealt with. Through it all, she did not once stop by the tent where she knew Natsuki to be, for all that it was merely a few minutes away from the tent to which she kept returning. Even when one of her slaves arrived at the command quarters and announced that he had an update on the progress of the Otomeian princess's surgery, she refused to hear it, much to the astonishment of those listening.

"I do not want updates on her," she told the slave flatly. "Stay with her and only come here again if she does not make it. Otherwise, do not interrupt my council."

Which words had several of her officers gawping and poor old Aisuka dabbing at his eyes again. Some of the newer officers found a renewed respect for her then, but out of misinterpretation; some others found a little more fear, again misinterpreting her words and thinking her a colder bitch than talk had it. Not that any of these understood. Even the sympathetic Aisuka could not grasp Shizuru's feelings during that whole stretch of deliberate disregard, and the woman herself did not let on all that much now that she was no longer seeing the patient before her.

Many of the observers did notice that she was washing her hands a great deal, though, but they thought it could also be due to her famous mania about being clean.

Whatever she was feeling, the commander performed her duties admirably. She slogged on without seeming to tire of the endless details and logistics and kept all of them steady in their own facilities with her ruthless capability. Even under her direction, though, it was still another hour or so before Shizuru managed to settle everything that demanded her unique attention, and the camp was nigh-finished by the time she finally managed to leave her seat.

"I think you can handle the rest, Miyuki-han," she said quietly, going around her table and flicking quick, dismissive glances to the rest of them. "I am leaving now."

What members of her staff were still present got to their feet. They knew where she was going to go now, of course, and knew better than to try and keep her from there.

"I can take care of it from here, Shizuru-san," said the legate. "Thank you for the assistance today."

Shizuru was already walking. "Do not work too long."

"Understood, General."

"Leave accounts of everything you decide on my desk so that I may go over it afterwards."

"Yes, General."

And the general left them.

---

She reached the surgeons' tent in two minutes. Then she spent another five just standing in front of it.

Shizuru wiped her hands on her tunic while staring at the entrance to the structure, wishing she could strip her palms and dry them over a fire to get rid of their annoying dampness. They had been running a cold sweat ever since she left Natsuki in the surgeons' care, and she had been careful not to touch any paper or anyone's bare flesh from then-with the exception of the Prince, whom she had struck on impulse. It was the word "cripples", of course, that had done it. That had been her undoing, although she still wished she had held a little more control: it had not been her intention to go so far as to force his jaw from its set. Well, it was already done, and it had been done on instinct. Besides, she reasoned, he deserved to be struck for his incompetence, for all that he was their enemy. How many inept leaders there had been in this war! It was enough to make anyone despair of the future of war-making. Where had the geniuses of battle gone, all the great strategists and tacticians of the histories? Perhaps the gods of war had decided to forsake men. But then, it was less up to the gods than it was to fortune, which decided whom to bless with the skill and whom to leave wanting.

Which really did not have anything to do with her purpose at the moment, she reminded herself, berating herself for rambling.

The sweat was back on her palms. She ran her hands over her soaked shirt again, wondering why it never seemed to go away. How could hands sweat so much? She had never experienced such a strange symptom, and now felt her trepidation increasing, the credulous Himean part of her fearful that it was a portent of fresh evil. Some people had already noticed her vigil outside the tent and were staring, and she knew she had to move soon or risk accusations of insanity. She had to go in the tent.

But she was afraid to go in the tent.

She is not dead, she reassured herself, coming straight to her worst fear. None of my slaves came after the first one, so she is not dead. I can go in and see it for myself and there is no worry. I am sure she cannot be dead. The greatest proof of this is that the world still exists. Yes, that is so: I am yet here, and so she must be. There cannot be anything but truth to this.

The defining logic of her world: I am yet here, so she must be.

She summoned all her courage and finally walked in, making her strides long and powerful to conceal the tremble in her knees. The first thing to greet her was a clutch of her slaves huddled on some stools, along with two characters she had expected: Nao's body-slave, Erstin, and Nina, Natsuki's cousin.

The latter was staring at her with an anger Shizuru had no difficulty interpreting.

She knows I did this, she thought, not even daring to return the Otomeian's glare. There can be no question that I did this. I did it when I left my girl here, and then did not return as quickly as promised. Then I told my slave to bring news only if she passed away and did not check on her once during the whole time I was working. And I told the medicus to cut off her leg.

She caught her breath dazedly at the list and wondered, Why did I do this?

The chief surgeon walked out from behind the partition and saw her.

"General," he said cautiously. "We finished the surgery earlier. I intended to send for you, but your servants said not to interrupt you during your duties."

Out of the corner of her vision, she could feel Nina's eyes stabbing her all over again.

"How was it?" she asked, expending every iota of strength to keep her body in check. She was frightened of what the surgeon might say, and the very fact of her fright was driving her close to panic. She had never felt fright like this, not even during the times when she had faced death. Or perhaps she had never faced death before this. Which was it?

"Is she-how is she, then?"

"Still dangerous, Domina," he said, speaking with utmost deference. How to tell such a woman that the patient she had deemed important enough to carry in herself might still perish? "We have severed the limb and sealed the wound with success. However, the fever grips her, and is now the most pressing concern. It is a very grave fever, and very dangerous even now."

The long-lashed, tired-looking eyes blinked druggedly at the news.

"The fever," she repeated.

"Yes, General."

"You mean," she said, "the fever from the poison you were supposed to have excised with her leg?"

He confirmed it. "The poison is in her blood. The wound went too long with the rot for us to be able to terminate the complication with a simple amputation."

A gleam came to her eyes that reminded him of the patient's crazed glares earlier and he visibly diminished, already trying to hunch his body to protect it from any more manhandling.

"Too long?" the commander echoed very softly, in those caressing notes that always seemed to precede her maximum displeasure. "Too long for you, eh?"

He took a step back.

"If that is so, Medicus," she went on, not walking but starting to lean towards him. "Why was I even asked to sanction a 'simple amputation'?"

The others were beginning to shift from the change in atmosphere, and Shizuru could feel Nina's eyes lifting from her and turning on the surgeon instead, charging into him with fresh accusations and hate. The medicus was oblivious to all but Shizuru, however, and she expanded visibly before him as she took a step closer, towering so far above him she cast a literal shadow over his eyes.

"We have done all we can, General, I swear to you," he said pleadingly. "At this point, however, all that is left is for us is to palliate, not to cure. With fortune, the fever shall burn out soon and the poison exit her bloodstream. She shall recover as soon as that happens, and in the meantime, the best we can do is see to her care and give her much rest and peace."

He was a smart man, the medicus. The appeal to the patient's need for peace brought the general out of her mood and back to the world of reason, although she did retain some measure of darkness as she told him to wait for her behind the partition and to check again on the patient. He retired obediently-wondering if this was to be a good thing or not-and waited as she addressed her slaves.

"Go out for a moment," she said to them. "Wait outside or nearby. Anywhere within sight and sound of this tent so that I may just come out and call you over should I have need of you."

They bowed deep and went to do as she had told them. Erstin made as if to go too, but Shizuru asked her to hold a moment before she left.

"Thank you for your help, Erstin-chan," Shizuru told the girl gently. "You may return to Yuuki-han. Please tell her it was much appreciated."

The girl nodded, keeping her head low.

"Take this too, please." The general pulled out a tiny purse she had been carrying for the past few months, fingering the soft cloth before handing it over. It had something oval-shaped in it, like a very large coin, thought Erstin. "Give it to one of my servants outside, please, and tell them to put it among my things."

The girl gave Shizuru the sort of watery smile that was filled with compassion, then scurried away before the general was displeased by it. The centurion had actually warned her not to show such emotions to the general, and she had to obey the order even if she was not too sure of its reason. Her Otomeian companion was refusing to follow her lead as she tried to exit, though, and she had to tug harder on the other girl's arm. It had little effect.

Nina did not wish to leave, and Shizuru understood why.

"Please," Shizuru told the girl, letting her face drop a little: just for a moment and just enough so the girl could understand that she knew her guilt. "You have things to do as well, I am sure. I shall stay with her."

Still the girl looked uncertain, her eyes red and angry as she scowled at the Himean. Shizuru tried again.

"I promise to you," she said, lowering her voice. "She shall not be alone from now on."

Too late, Nina's face seemed to say.

Still, the Otomeian finally turned on her heel and walked out after the others, her back still rigid with anger for the woman she had just faced. And said woman felt it even to the moment Nina disappeared through the exit, the very image of her departure chastising Shizuru in a silent but no less violent way.

"General?"

It was the chief surgeon. Shizuru took a second to compose herself, then went to join him and stand beside the patient's bed. They had converted this part of the tent to be a proper sickbay of sorts, she noticed, and taken away some of the other paraphernalia that had been here earlier. She turned to the surgeon, whose first reaction was to jerk backwards.

"You have removed many things," she observed, ignoring his obvious fear of her.

"Ah, yes... We thought it wiser not to move her around after the operation, General," he explained. "So, instead of transferring her to a different tent with the other patients, we thought to transfer our headquarters to another tent instead and dedicate this tent to her. We thought you would prefer to have it so as well."

She nodded slowly, taking in the changes. Not once did she let her gaze touch the square area occupied by the bed, however, and he noticed it from the immediate evasion her eyes did whenever coming to that spot. Oh, he was still frightened by her, but this was so interesting ! She would not even look at the patient, and that was a strange thing to him.

"Yes," she was saying. "Yes, I find it better. This is for her alone, then?"

"Yes, General."

"I see." She paused. "I shall make a few more changes later."

"Yes, General."

She crossed her arms over her chest and let her eyelids droop. Heavy-lidded and mysterious, they finally made the slow trek from the stand on the corner to the edge of the cot, over the soft cream sheets, and towards the girl.

The first thing she saw prompted a crease on her forehead.

"Must you keep her lashed down?" she asked. "She is already asleep."

"If she wakes, she may go into another fit, especially as she is still drugged and likely to be unreasonable. It would be unwise to let her move much, especially when she has had some new stitches."

He could hear the air hissing as she sucked it through her nose, a hard breath that seemed to chill her whole body. This was the statue he had seen earlier, stiff and stony save for her eyes and words, like a frozen peak whose vents betrayed hot internal pressures. Yes, that was the best simile for being around her right now, he decided. You felt as though you were looking up at a snowy volcano from its foot, wondering if and when it would spew fire on your head.

"Explain what you did," she said to him. Her eyes flickered down the bed for the shortest beat and shot back up so fast even her head showed the movement. She could not bear to look at the leg then, he noted, or at the empty space that should have been the leg. "Except for the amputation. You say... You say it went well?"

"Very well, General. There was nothing out of what we expected there."

"Good. Go on."

He licked his lips and obliged.

"We had to redo the stitching for some wounds," he said. "Some of them were torn, and a few of her wounds reopened during her struggles. The laceration on her head was actually quite well-sewn, to my relief, and the rest of the injuries except for the - uh - the leg wound were relatively less grave, which made it easier. There were many gashes upon her, however."

He pointed to a few of the stitches visible on her body, which they had covered with only a short shirt for the torso and a loincloth for her pelvic area. Most of it was bare, Shizuru supposed, so that they could access her wounds as soon as possible for post-surgical care.

"Most of the gashes were not too deep, thankfully," he went on. "None were penetrative to the point of threatening the organs. Most of them were most likely cuts from a falx. But because of the number, the surgery took a little longer than expected."

She breathed very quietly next to him, staring at the sunken face she still knew despite the ravages marked on it. And what ravages! Shizuru's teeth clenched tight, the pulling muscles on her jaw worrying the surgeon eyeing her.

"Her head," she said. "It looked bad earlier."

"A blunt trauma," he replied. "It was not a clean cut at all, so even though the stitching was quite good, we still had to do a little work there too. Something large and dull struck her, such as a club, and caused the laceration."

"Shall she sustain added injury from that?"

"Of the physical kind, I doubt it, as we have already fixed the wound," he said. "However, it is my experience that patients with head injuries have often manifested symptoms such as problems with thought or memory later on." Seeing her face contort reflexively, he hastened to reassure her. "But this is not always the case. We may tell more of this later, when she comes to her senses. For now, General, it is the infection that should concern us. Her leg was left too long without proper medicine for fighting off the rot, and the poison from that may have spread to the rest of her body already. We must hope it may be stopped by the herbs we have prepared."

She nodded almost meekly at his words, taking a step closer to the bed and still focused on the girl's face. It seemed to him that she wanted to touch it but dared not, and he was tempted to tell her it was safe to do so. He could not understand why she, who had not just carried in this girl but also threatened his life over hers, would suddenly hesitate to touch her when she was insentient and could not even complain.

"How could it have gone this long with no-one noticing?" she asked.

"I believe it was a delayed infection," he said. "Not one that broke soon after taking the injury, but developed afterwards, by conjunction of ill care and post-wound corruption. And a lack of the proper medications."

"She must be washed often, then?"

"Certainly, and with great care."

"Have you assigned someone to this?"

"One of my assistants is assigned to check on her every hour, General." He glanced at the water-clock on a table. "There should be an hour before the next one."

"Can that person show me the way to clean her?"

He was surprised. "Why, yes, of course."

"Good."

She looked up as though searching for something in his eyes. It was a most uncomfortable search, he thought, at least where he was concerned.

"Can she..." She paused and exhaled heavily, her eyes going away, then coming back to him. "Can she suffer being touched, then? Even if not just for cleaning?"

He released his breath as well.

"Yes, certainly. But her injuries should be avoided." A finger came out to point at the swaddled areas. "These places, for instance. And the remaining part of the leg must not be touched, of course."

He found her giving him a glare that had the air catching in his windpipe. Her face said, Do you think me a cretin that you must tell me that?

"Has she any other grave injuries?" she said, not hiding her irritation with him. "Aside from these bandaged areas? Are there any broken bones?"

"None, General," he said timidly. "We have done our best."

She said nothing for a while, to the point that he felt compelled to raise his eyes from where they had been nailed to the floor. The commander was finally looking at the lower part of the patient's body, seemingly riveted now to the frank asymmetry to be found at that location. The surgeon could see the ridges coming up again on the side of her jaw, the faint shudder of her eyelashes as she stared down the sight as one would an enemy.

"How was it you managed the surgery without her waking?" she asked in a peculiar tone he could not place. "You did drug her for it?"

"We introduced a blend of mandragora and opium into her gullet by means of a reed," he explained. "A technique I picked up from Egypt. I had to be sure she would not wake, so I gave her a lot, General. It is unlikely she shall wake today. Even should she wake, she shall still be in delirium, as she was when you brought her."

Her brows contracted.

"So bad still?" she whispered.

"I fear so. She is still very ill, as I said."

Her eyes came to him again and she asked, seemingly without expression: "But she shall be better?"

Ye gods, the woman was dangerous! He mastered the urge to lick his lips and said, voice a husk of anxiety,

"Given proper care and medication, and with the grace of fortune, she has a chance to be better."

"Leave the bargaining with Fortune to me," she replied, pushing him gently to one side and returning to her chilly, fatally volcanic persona. "Well done for now, Medicus, but nothing is certain yet, as you have made a point of reminding me this whole time. Mind, if I find out from some other physician that there should have been a way to save her leg, not even Dis shall take what is left once I finish with you."

He said nothing, too terrified of what she might do if he responded. She turned a provoked eye to him anyway.

"What are you still doing here?" she whispered.

He scurried away as fast as he could to gather his things and leave the tent, deciding he had tempted fate far too long. His last image of the general was of her kneeling beside the bed and slipping her head under one of the patient's clawlike hands.

Chapter 57

Thank you to the readers and reviewers. And as ever, apologies for the tardiness.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Calda - Wine flavoured with spices

2. Medici, medicus - Respectively, "doctors", "doctor".

3. Note on crucifixion and breaking legs - The legs of crucified persons were frequently broken to hasten their expiration. Leaving the legs intact often mean a long, drawn-out death.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

There were a great many decisions to be made and only one woman to make them.

Shizuru's liberation of Sosia had her falling into captivity, shackled to her job and duties for hours on end. Her staff was equally fraught with work, the scribes never without something to write and the officers never without an order to follow. This was not precisely unexpected: it was a Fujino campaign and Shizuru was notorious for working herself and her men in marathons like this. But there was still something new here, and it was best indicated by a seemingly innocuous fact. This fact was that no one complained. Indeed, no one complained aloud whether in her sight or out of it.

It spoke tellingly of the menace exuded by the leader of the campaign.

Everyone knew the origins of the menace, of course. The amputation of her mistress's leg, her manhandling of the Chief Surgeon, her blow to the enemy prince's jaw during his interview—all of these would be classed as prime gossip in any setting and they were certainly treated that way by the Fujino army. So quickly was word of these circulated that no one in the legions was ignorant of them by the end of the same day all three things occurred. And though the general everyone saw after that was hardly the vicious, unrestrained woman some versions of the story made her out to be, she was also not the cheerful, light-hearted woman most of the soldiers had come to know and expect.

The changes were subtle at first, as she seemed to make an effort to put on a façade of normalcy when discharging her duties. It took a while before people realised that the generous mouth had become stingier with its grins and that what few it did dole out were concise and non-lingering. A little after that it was recognised that she had become prone to eyeing people in council, always selecting those who were thinking of questioning her words and throwing them such basilisk stares that they all ended up swallowing objections.

There were many other small changes, and the older officers came up with a description for it. A kind of hardness, they said, that they thought to be toughening her skin. To some extent the words were true, but to a larger extent they were also reductive. One had to acknowledge that the people making the descriptions were non-intellectuals, and what was taking place in Shizuru's golden hide was too complex to be articulated in the words available to them. As the limits of language often defined the limits of perception, this also meant that most could not see any further than the thickening of the general's skin. It was a pity, for there was so much more going on beneath it. For instance, the hardness ossifying Shizuru's shell, even if it did destroy the surface softness, did not eradicate the basic elasticity. This was important to note because it differentiated her from an embittered human being who had hardened in response to loss and pain. It made her hardness so much more than the vent of mortal bitterness and resentment.

Shizuru was not bitter, after all: she was merely evolving.

Again it was not strictly new: those who knew her would say she had been evolving all her life. This particular stage was only remarkable because the lessons provoking it were so strikingly delivered. She had been given quite a few lessons lately, to her mind, and she found them all of great importance. For instance, the first lesson was that leaving important things in the hands of mediocre people was always foolish, no matter how well-meaning or confident the mediocrity. Witness Masashi.

Conclusion: mediocrity must never be given high opportunity.

The second lesson was that when excellent people attempted to accommodate lesser people out of courtesy, the only result of the disproportion was injustice and the usual victims were those who were excellent enough not to deserve it. Witness Natsuki.

Conclusion: if one knows oneself to be most excellent at something yet yields control of it to another, one can never be held blameless for either that other's blunders or the blunders' victims.

The third lesson was something she had known all along, but had failed to note for the canon of life that it was: that various things, from luck to law, contrived to give mediocrities and other lesser people seats far above what logic would dictate, and that it was the reluctance to question these gross irrationalities that led to the tragedies of the mortal condition. Witness the Eighth. Witness Suou Himemiya.

Conclusion: one must not step aside for lesser beings, no matter what or who the regulatory authority demanding it.

She had seen the results of denying herself that which she deserved simply out of deference to the rules of her people and supposed peers. In this she had facilitated the slaughter of some of the most excellent persons she had ever known, to say nothing of permitting the crippling of the most excellent person she knew to exist. All because the Senate had told her to do it. All because Masashi had wanted to have a go at her seat and they had wanted to humour him to spite her.

All because the mediocrities fancied themselves her equal simply since they were her peers.

The abuse had been too much, the prices too high. Shizuru Fujino could only be prodded so far. Thus her evolution was in the choice to be far more of herself, to shed one more layer of the oppressive skin her parents and those who loved her had persisted in maintaining because they feared for what she might do sans its restraint. The most visible result was an even stronger autocracy than before and a visible prejudice against incompetence: her most common address was suddenly that of command; her most scathing word inepte. Her hardness was that of a woman who had seen lesser minds at work and was finally fed up, intent now on suffocating the subpar even if it meant she had to do it brutally. It was also the paradoxical hardness of a woman for whom practically everything, no matter how "fundamental" she labelled it, was a pliable concept.

All of this was not to say that the more common interpretation of her "hardness" was entirely off. If anyone doubted the term the old campaigners propagated to explain her change, he received a salutary lesson when the thousand captive Mentulaeans were clapped in chains and marched out of Sosia. Shizuru sent these to Argentum, ordering that they gather and burn the despoiled bodies of the Eighth mouldering there. The captives were accompanied by the Fourteenth, which was told to supervise and stand guard at a hygienic distance.

Following the unconventional order, one of the tribunes assigned to oversee the expedition had asked, "Begging your pardon, General, but what if there are arms remaining there and some of the captives try to take them up against us?"

He asked this not out of concern that the captives could do any damage, of course, but because all captives from a battle were the exclusive spoils of the general. She would make a fortune by selling them in the slave market later, as indeed was a normal practice for Himean commanders. To harm any of the captives would be to tamper with the general's private property, so the tribune had asked out of valid concern.

The general's response had been considered astonishing, considering her reputation.

"Kill them, but always try to capture them alive. Flog first, then crucify. And do not break their legs when you have put them up, unless the cleanup has finished and there are still some living on the crosses. For so long as you have to stay in the area, however, none of those crucified should be taken down or slain out of pity. No leniency for Mentulaeans in Argentum, where the Eighth found no leniency either."

Although it was suspected by several that it was less about equalising the injustice to the defunct Eighth and more about the general simply feeling short of mercy at the time. And truth be told, most others felt the same. It was not just that the danger of further Mentulaean incursions forbade any abeyance in the restorative operation. It was also that said operation had to run on less-than-optimum fuel.

The citadel's immense underground vaults were finally depleted, and the army had to share food with the citizens. Shizuru had not brought a proper baggage train with the Fourteenth as she had arranged for it to proceed at its own pace, which was much, much slower than the legionaries'. She had made the soldiers carry only enough to sustain them, due to the exigency of speed at the time. More or less the same could be said of Shohei Nagayama's group, the Ninth and Eleventh. And horribly enough, the Mentulae turned out to have been running dangerously low on supplies as well, which might have explained the desperation with which they had tried to bring down the stubborn citadel on that last day. So what little there was to be shared out had to be shared out at siege rations still, which rather put a damper on the celebration of the actual siege's end.

Forage was the only recourse until the baggage arrived. But both the Mentulae and the Himeans led by Masashi had scoured every loot-worthy shed, granary, or plot of ground nearby, which meant the land was practically emptied of produce. Sosia was, in the first place, not a farming province. Most of the searches returned with rather mean greens and the few edible mushrooms not yet touched by previous foragers. Of plums there were plenty, but though delicious, these came with a cost: eating too many of them had people running to the latrines with many a groan and some explosive cursing.

The onset of boar hunting season alleviated the problem slightly. The animals could be heard rooting all around the woods now, sometimes even venturing out and into the edges of Sosia's clearing. Shizuru regularly sent hunting parties after them after these were detected. It was soon noticed that the Otomeians outperformed everyone else in the hunt, as was expected of a people used to living in forests and mountains, and Shizuru quickly leveraged them for training the rest of the parties. There were also some deer but it was a little early for them, according to the locals, and they were also far more skittish than the boars. So wild boars were the prey of choice. Soon enough there were heaps of them being brought in and hundreds of slaves set to work. There were days upon days of boar being skinned and salted and spiced and smoked. It helped.

But it was meat.

Himeans knew people could not live on just meat, even if their game-loving, mountain-dwelling allies seemed quite willing and able to do it. The grain stores were dwindling fast and bread was being rationed heavily. The true relief only came when the scouts reported the baggage train finally trundling in, tolling as it did deliverance from their un-Himean diet.

This was the baggage train formally attached to the Fourteenth, an impressive convoy of provisions Shizuru had calculated for both the legions and Sosia. With it were the Fourteenth's, the Ninth's, and the Eleventh's artillery; replacement gear and fresh army issue for the legionaries who might need it; a herd of livestock and poultry to provide a fresh source of meat and eggs; and the possessions of the Fourteenth that had been impossible to carry on a double-step march, including some of the superior officers' personal effects and slaves. When Shizuru had assured her legions that supplies enough would be coming in, she had not quite explained how many supplies she had arranged: the sight of the enormous procession and its goodies had everyone breathing prayers in thanks for their commander's wisdom.

Being so loaded with goods, the procession when it arrived took hours to pull in completely, a veritable drove of ox wagons and donkey carts with people milling about and in between. The noise brought out all of Sosia as well as the legions, who came to watch the plodding people and lowing beasts. Eventually they were doing more than watching, as several helpful members of the public started giving the soldiers a hand with the unloading. It started a trend, and soon more people were being brought into the line to help carry the share of grain allotted to relief of the Sosia citizenry.

The general was among those who remained watching the activity, letting her officers handle the supervision and direction of the work. She kept herself apart from the crowd but made sure to stay close to the forefront because she was waiting for someone. As she was still surrounded by her new, quietly glum air, people read her pose easily and left her alone, although nearly everyone threw a passing greeting. She was properly the woman whose arrival had ended the siege, after all, as well as the woman who had arranged for these relief supplies. If anything could still add to her immense popularity with the locals, it would be those feats.

After responding to yet another bashful salutation-from some very pretty local women, whom Shizuru hardly noticed-the general turned to the slave who had accompanied her for this meeting. The slave's name was Aella, and she often managed the commander's household on campaign or during marches, when Shizuru's steward was not present.

"This is worrying, Aella," she said grimly, although her eyes twinkled. "He is not yet here. What if they mistakenly left him at Argus?"

Aella could serve a dour twist of humour herself and did so.

"I doubt it would have been a mistake if they did, Domina," she said dolefully.

"You are cruel, Aella. One would think he was not your friend."

She glanced at the sky and tried to enjoy the faint breeze ruffling her hair, when all she really felt was a powerful urge to press on her eyelids. How tired she had been feeling lately!

"The weather has been cooling rapidly - yet it was a tardy autumn. They must have had a fine march."

"Surely better than ours, Domina."

"Mm," Shizuru hummed, running a white palm over her bronzed hand. "Summer's mark has yet to leave my skin."

"And mine, Domina," said the congenitally dark Aella with perfect seriousness.

They were approached by a group of slaves coming from the huge crowd before them. Shizuru blinked once against the weight pushing against her eyes, and then nodded at the familiar face of her steward. Was it queer that she should feel comforted to see him?

"Took your time, Hermias?" she said.

"My deepest apologies, Domina," he responded with one of his elegant bows. "I am sorry that our sloth has inconvenienced."

She shook her head and motioned to the woman standing a little behind her.

"To the camp. Aella shall breeze you through everything," she said, with a touch of quiet humour: aella was Greek for 'whirlwind'. "Install yourself as usual: the lodgings have already been arranged."

"Domina," he said gently, wondering how long she would make him wait for it. For all that Hermias would never gossip about his mistress to anyone-one of his most unique traits, which Shizuru knew-he was still as nosy as the next human being. He was dying to know where she was, the foreign girl who called to him as a child would, the one who even when absent had had his poor mistress on the end of a string. Hermias had no fears this powerful child was dead: he rather doubted even the gods would dare to foil his mistress's plans that way. But to not have her present and beside his mistress was something he found strange and warranting explanation.

She also looked very tired, and it worried him. He had to talk to Aella about it.

"I am pleased to inform you that we were able to procure the things you wanted, Domina," he informed her as they went, knowing for whom these "things" were; it was as good a hook as any. "The apples in particular are very fine and fresh."

Her head came up and she produced a smile. Now why would she have cause to look hopeful at that, Hermias wondered.

"Ah! Did you get exactly the ones I wished?" she asked, walking a little more slowly to keep her eyes on his. He took the advantage to study her more closely as they talked. Yes, she was very tired: she had not been sleeping again.

Cucumbers, he thought, busily making notes in his head. It is a good thing I thought to bring her cucumbers; it shall relieve the pain I know is in her eyes. She has been working too much again. I do not know what is going on yet, but I must see to it that she gets some of those fresh cucumbers in the evening-she will not spare time to put them on now, because she will insist on working until it is dark. She is impossible that way but it cannot be helped.

"We made sure to buy only the sweetest varieties, Domina" he said. "We tested them all prior to purchase, of course, and weeded out the bitter or sour ones. Most of the small ones, we found, were undesirable."

"I see. And what of the goats? Were you able to find good milking ones? How did they take the march?"

She is asking too many questions too fast-she is anxious besides being tired. Aella has not been looking after her properly: she has even forgotten to have her hair trimmed. We shall see about that soon. But first, the cucumbers: I should have someone soak them as soon as possible in water, as they will feel cooler then...

"They endured it well, Domina," he assured her. "We kept them away from the other livestock brought from Argus, as the goats we chose are prize animals." He smiled in reminiscence of something amusing. "The local cheese-makers were very reluctant to sell."

"Ah. And you changed their minds?"

"We were very eager to buy."

She smiled distantly and he saw that she was too distracted to appreciate the jest.

"Good, that is very good," she murmured, seeming to talk as much to herself as to him. "We could not find any here: nearly all the beasts had been butchered for their meat inside the city. Fresh milk may be just the thing. Do you not think so, Aella?"

Aella nodded dutifully. "Yes, Domina."

"Hermias, is it possible to milk them now? Yes? Then have someone collect a beaker's worth immediately and bring it over to my office afterwards. And get me a basket of those apples, too, yes- the very best ones. I want none with bruises, Hermias. I want them perfect."

He was a little amused that she would have to remind him of her standards after so long, but kept both amusement and curiosity inside and trusted all would be explained later. And when later would arrive, once Aella told him where their lady's mistress was and what had happened to her, he thanked the gods Shizuru had not spoken a word of it to him after all: he would not have been able to help weeping and it would have been discourteous to his mistress, who would not show anyone her own grief that way. For him to vent his own to her face would have then been the height of insensitivity.

While Hermias went off with Aella, Shizuru ended up walking with the governor of Sosia, who had asked to join her on her way back to camp. He was all smiles and laughter, and was so pleased by the food train she had masterminded that he nearly wrung her arm off with his handshake.

"Wonderful! Absolutely wonderful!" Ikita was gushing, not quite over the relief yet of knowing his poor civilians would be able to eat properly. Oh, to be spared the wretchedness of malnourishment and the monotony of meat! Once people got over the fear of being killed by blades and arrows, they had time again to start thinking and grousing over other things, such as how mean their daily fare still was although the siege was over. What did it matter that the end of siege did not mean an instant return to the bounty of before? That was a sensible reply and people were simply not sensible!

"Such foresight, Fujino-san-it's really quite astounding!" he continued garrulously. "How could you have known this much food would be required? For all you knew when you marched from Argus, the Mentulae could've won and we were all already dead!"

"True," Shizuru replied. "But for all I knew, you could all have been alive too."

"What would you have done had it been otherwise?"

She threw him an odd look, expressionless but nerve-tingling. He realised his error.

"Oh, of course that would've been - well - just awful, including for me, obviously," he rushed with a weak attempt at a chuckle, wondering how to extricate himself from the mess his tongue had created.

She saved him by bringing up another topic, nodding nonchalantly all the while to the greetings being thrown at her. Her red eyes were on the people passing them, watching the scuttle of soldiers and servants bearing the supplies unloaded from the oxcarts, ticking off each item of food she could recognise as it was borne past with grunts of effort: bags of wheat, sacks of barley, barrels of salt pork and bacon, wheels of hard cheeses, jugs of what was probably garum...

She hates that, she thought with a sense of odd fascination. I wonder what would happen if she got a whiff of it direct from those- she might faint if ever she got near enough one of those jugs. I would have to cover her nose with my cape and carry her off in a bundle.

An internal chuckle, as private as it was wistful.

It is a pity she could not be here to watch this. The cheeses would please her most: I know their shape appeals to her imagination. These are of a size and she would think, as she confessed to me once, of wagons made of slabs of cheese and even more cheese for the wheels. I think she wanted to get a wheel big enough to roll down the road...

"They tell me the farms nearby were not destroyed, even if houses were ransacked," she said to Ikita. "I hear the fields are still workable. Your small landholders shall be pleased about that, at the very least."

"Oh, they are-when we finally get them to see it's not as bad as it could have been," he sighed.

"You might remind them of what we did to Carthage after the war."

"Salting the fields, you mean? That would scare them into the bright side, I'd say!"

She said nothing to that and he filled up the silence by continuing.

"We're encouraging them to start working on their farms and gardens again as soon as possible. It's true we've very few farms, but every bit helps in war, doesn't it? The fewer people depend on the grain carts coming in from other areas, the better-which is why we've actually opened and leased fresh plots of land, courtesy of some of the bigger landowners we've talked to, for more people to try their hand at growing their own produce. We need to move more people out of the city as soon as we can."

"You started rebuilding very quickly."

"Starting with that," he laughed, jerking a thumb to the citadel-which was undergoing extensive repairs, its front having been battered almost to collapse. "I'd not be fool enough to think I can just leave everything alone and it will somehow turn out fine. I was thinking about what to do even when I was still stuck in the walls. You might say I had a lot of time," he said dryly.

"Time enough. It is a near-miracle the city did not come under enteric fever," she told him.

He frowned, knowing the seriousness of that problem and having been worried about it the whole duration of the siege.

"We can thank the lay of the land," he explained. "The city's water sources flow from behind, or from underground streams that run the wealds towards the west. The Sosia springs are unusual in that we can tap them through wells from inside the citadel without aqueducts or special devi-oh, why I am I explaining this to you?" he said, realising all of a sudden that what he was saying was probably old information to a woman who was here on her second campaign. She might think him either forgetful or foolish. "You've been here before me."

She smiled anyway. "The underground water lines run from the west, you said."

"Right. As all encampments-and their latrine pits-were situated in the other direction, you might say we were particularly lucky."

"And you opened fresh latrine pits outside and beyond the city," she said, stating the observation she had made long before. "No doubt our Mentulaean friends harassed you whenever you came out of the walls to... empty your chamber pots."

"Naturally," he said, giving her the wryest smile in his repertoire as he saw the ridiculous image in her mind. "And I'll admit we even lost people in the doing of it. But in my humble opinion, death from a battle is far preferable to death from a plague. The air was already toxic with the scent of blood and burnt bodies each day; failure to dispose of our waste properly would've made it downright lethal. I made as much clear to the citizens when I gave the order-and none of them disagreed, I'll have you know."

"Nor shall I disagree now," she said, lifting an eyebrow. "A woman mad enough to have the floor of her tent bedspace boarded up would hardly disagree with measures for avoiding deleterious filth."

He gasped, caught himself. So she knew about that wicked little rumour circulating in Senate about her, did she?

"Of course," he chuckled to her amused expression, quite tickled himself. He found nothing wrong in a woman who liked cleanliness, although he did think the rumour so exaggerated it was ludicrous. So Fujino liked to smell sweet and fresh-there was hardly any need to make fun of her to that extent, was there? Boarding up a tent floor indeed!

"We'd make a fine pair of obsessives if only you really did that," he told her jokingly. "By the gods... They do let their imaginations run wild when it comes to you, don't they? I mean, really - why in the world would anyone board up a tent floor?"

They were inside the camp. She turned to him and smiled: a softer and more lasting smile than before.

"To protect against sand-dwelling fleas and lice," she said. "I cannot abide them."

He laughed. And then he looked confused.

"Thank you for accompanying me, Ikita-han, but I must leave you now," she said, ignoring his puzzlement. She had told him no more than the truth about the rumour, after all: it was up to him whether or not he wished to believe it. "Please make yourself at home in the camp and do not hesitate to ask any of my officers for assistance should you need anything."

She went first to her offices to check that her staff was functioning as she expected. There she found a newly-come courier, his arrival unnoticed due to the hubbub of the baggage train.

"He comes from Seigo Ushida-san," said Miyuki Rokujou, who had come in to give Shizuru the inventory for the recently-arrived cavalcade. This was being checked against the actual supplies at the moment, of course, but unless there were stark departures from the quoted amounts, there would be no need to inform the commander for validation.

"Thank you. And I do not think you need yet be so formal," Shizuru said, taking the inventory from Miyuki: it was a very large, very fat scroll. She turned to the courier still standing to attention. "Is your message to be given orally or just handed over, soldier?"

"To be handed over, General. Here it is, General," he said, extending to her the scroll from Ushida.

"Thank you. You may go."

He saluted and went out.

"Have you made a copy of this for storage?" Shizuru asked her legate, waving the inventory scroll. Miyuki followed her when she started walking.

"Yes, I gave it to Aisuka-san. And I need not be so formal about what?" Miyuki asked as Shizuru passed the other desks and made her way to the end of the tent, where her own desk was situated. The space was very large, so even the officers and scribes working at the other tables had to lean to one side to hear what the general and her legate were saying.

"In your address of Ushida-han, I suppose," Shizuru finally replied, motioning that the other woman should take a seat as she had. "One would think you did not trust him."

The cool-looking Miyuki said nothing.

"He has a good head for war, you must admit," Shizuru said seriously, although she was actually teasing. She thought in the ensuing silence that Miyuki Rokujou had a most excellent facility for looking ironic. Was that why her cousin was so fond of the woman, among other things?

"Sticky fingers," Miyuki stated, so quietly even Shizuru had to strain for it.

Shizuru propped up her chin on one hand and looked unconcerned. "Nine and a half out of ten Himeans have fingers coated in honey, you might say. And he has his reasons."

"He would throw the foreign auxiliary to the enemy in a pinch, Shizuru-san," Miyuki warned, unknowingly reminding Shizuru of words another legate had once spoken, a legate so well-loved that to be reminded of her now that she was dead brought a grimace of pain.

"Not now that I am here to keep an eye on him," Shizuru stated, masking her wince as a frown. "I would throw him to the enemy before that. And he knows it."

"That may be why I find it hard to like him, you know."

At Shizuru's quizzing look, she explained: "That I shall have to keep an eye on my fellow legate just to be sure he does not overstep his bounds."

The corners of Shizuru's mouth lifted slightly.

"That sounded as though it were coming from someone without prior experience in politics," she teased. "Which you most definitely are not."

The other woman took the jibe with a little smile of her own.

"I dislike having to deal with more of it than I have to when it comes to the army," she explained. "Not that I haven't, as you say, but having to do it in a venture this large grates a little. A bit more is at stake."

"True, but the size of the venture itself also indicates how many personnel we shall have to keep our eyes on."

She had opened Ushida's scroll and was reading it. And then, in her superhuman way, she was done.

"It is a short letter," she said. "All Ushida-han says is that the cleanup of Argentum went as well as it could, the captives cooperated fully-he notes it is due to the penalty of crucifixion that was announced, though who really knows with captives?-and that they are on their way back. He also notes that, as we already know from our talks with the seized officers of the good Prince Hanu, Argentum is in ruins and the Mentulae took everything of worth. Hardly anything valuable in Argentum was left, he says. Well, we do have a great deal of what was obviously Argentum's wealth in our hold at the moment, courtesy of the Mentulaeans."

Her legate was still fixed on a particular phrase: " Hardly anything ."

"You believe he took whatever he could find, I see."

Miyuki angled her head. "He'd be a villain, Shizuru-san."

"Yet he would be my villain, which suits me for now."

"And after that?"

"After that... an accounting usually happens. Not always, but usually. That is the way things work in politics as well as war, and you know it."

Shizuru rolled up Ushida's missive and put it back in the cylinder in which it had travelled. She continued speaking while moving on to the other cylinder in her hand, the fat roll of inventory.

"He shall bend over backwards trying to prove himself to me for some time yet, which is precisely why I let him take charge of the cleanup mission for Argentum. A bit of a tedious task, but a necessary one-and one I would see discharged with all thoroughness, of course."

Miyuki agreed.

"I did not wish to spare either you or Shohei-han for that as I need both of you here at the moment; as for Toshi-han, who is signed on again as one of my official legates, he is best equipped to help Ikita-han with rebuilding Sosia and thus cannot be removed from the province just yet. Ushida-han needed to prove himself to me and is also least necessary for my current activities; hence, it was he who was sent off with the Fourteenth. Give me some credit, Miyuki-han: I am not about to send him to relieve Kenji-han in his duties."

That brought out a small grin. "Not that mad yet, I think."

"Most certainly not."

To send the newest legate to replace Kenji-whom she knew to be the one heading the legions sent to the passes, courtesy of a missive-would indeed be madness on her part. Not only had she sent instructions for the legate in charge of that area to liaise with the Otomeians supposedly at the border: she had also sent word to start infiltrating the lower west part of Mentulaean country, which was filled with ranges and generally uninhabited by "real" Mentulae.

The peoples living there were considered barbarians by their lowland counterparts, and were in tiny groups and tribes, generally ostracised by the Mentulaeans and very rarely in touch with people outside their mountain homes. To Shizuru, worth tempting into secession. She had faith that her old legate would manage the feat-although she had faith too that he would know to kill them if they looked to be treacherous accomplices.

She suddenly looked back up at the legate currently before her, who lifted both dark eyebrows at the stare.

"Have you taken a look at this?" Shizuru asked, tapping the inventory scroll.

"Yes," Miyuki said.

"What do you think?"

"I think... we need a lot more to be sent over if we are to leave Sosia the way we want it."

"Exactly."

"Should I draw up a list of everything we need?"

"Yes. I can just take a look at it after you have finished and make my own additions." The general frowned. "Would you tell Mikado-han-he is the one leading the officers Takumi-han sent over, yes?-to start making plans for supply routes and sources to the east? Argus may be our main supply centre, but I want land-based supplies coming to us through here."

"Rheia and the grain producers you are thinking of are the ones that supply Otomeia citadel too, aren't they?"

"Yes. But Otomeia also supplies itself sometimes with grain from its lower provinces and valleys." Shizuru tilted her head. "Of which it has many, although most are more dedicated to rearing horses and livestock, as well as to mining. Still, we shall have to see about sourcing produce from them too. At the very least they can keep us readily supplied with herds for our meat, and free of charge."

"A convenient resolution," Miyuki confirmed, before suddenly pausing and staring at nothing, her eyes narrowed. "When you think of it, Otomeia is really just another rich foreign empire bordering our territories."

Up went Shizuru's eyebrow. It was the one bisected by a small scar, and Miyuki found herself engrossed in that tiny defect on the otherwise faultless face. She thought it strange that it did not even register properly as a defect, but rather as something that belonged there.

"But one allied to us," Shizuru was telling her. "It makes all the difference."

A smile. "For as long as they stay allied to us."

"Naturally."

"I hope no one takes it into his head to change that any time soon, then, or even after we've won this campaign."

Shizuru's split eyebrow went up again: Miyuki had noticed that the woman preferred to raise it more often than its unbroken sibling.

"To be clear," Miyuki added, "I'm speaking more about our fellows than the Otomeians in this case."

Down went the eyebrow, dropping just slightly below the height it would have if relaxed.

"True," Shizuru said simply. "I suppose we just have to look out for those sorts of things."

"We rare breeds, you mean," Miyuki grinned in rare humour.

"Rare breeds indeed," Shizuru smiled.

Her legate sat up. Which was only to say that she lifted her chin, because Miyuki always sat perfectly straight.

"Well, for now the next shipment of supplies," said the woman briskly, her no-nonsense persona back in place as though it had never gone away; Shizuru rather liked that about her. "I can take care of that now, Shizuru-san, if you can spare me."

"Yes, thank you."

Shizuru stayed behind to look over a few more matters, but soon left her tent satisfied with both her staff and her steward-who showed up scant seconds after Miyuki exited. She walked out of her offices with a jug of fresh milk in one hand and a basket piled with foodstuff in the other. Had she been less well-respected a commander, the sight of her as she walked down the path would have provoked merriment behind her back, as she looked like an unfortunate army officer pecked by a spouse into running for groceries. As she was who she was, however, she only got the usual salutes and a few warm greetings.

She was within sight of her destination when she ran into someone familiar. It was Mino, the stablemaster of the Lupine troopers-or what was left of them, at least. He noticed her shortly after she noticed him and the two of them stopped in their tracks as they met halfway, standing with the awkwardness of territorial animals meeting on neutral ground. He was obviously coming from the place to which she was headed and all at once there was a part of Shizuru wondering if he had made any headway with the Natsuki, another part hoping he had indeed made headway with Natsuki, and yet another part hoping he had not made headway with Natsuki, because it would infuriate her if someone other than she did it.

"Mino-han," she said. "Good day."

The old warrior's face looked much like she felt, she mused, wishing her greeting could be the end of their conversation instead of the beginning.

"Asleep," he said in his pithy way.

"Ah."

Again they looked at each other awkwardly. Shizuru was coming close to either a cringe or a dismissal. Then he shot a look at what she was carrying and grunted loudly enough to startle a few legionaries walking some metres from them. The soldiers threw shaky salutes at Shizuru in their recovery and scampered off with many a glance over their shoulders.

Meanwhile, the Otomeian giant continued to stare at the things Shizuru was carrying. Lamely, Shizuru offered an explanation for the jug she was toting as well.

"Goat's milk," she said.

He grunted, this time more quietly.

"Good," Mino eventually concluded, although he was scowling at the food in her hands as though it were offensive to him. Although she knew it was merely his standard facial expression for everything, she had to tamp down the urge to narrow her eyes, it being that she had so much hope for the food that his critical expression-unintended though it may or may not have been-was an irritant.

"She will like it," he muttered.

"I hope so." Enough of this; she wanted to go. "If you would excuse me..."

He would, apparently, for he walked off with no more than a nod for goodbye, she doing the same. Three steps into the separation and both were assaulted by a powerful sense of relief as well as embarrassment at it.

Mino and Shizuru's was a curious relation. Neither one actually disliked each other-they could not afford to dislike each other, in fact, in deference to the girl they loved-but their circumstances made it impossible to like each other too. It was not just the ablation of Natsuki's leg and who was to blame for it, although that did play a part in some of the most recent awkwardness. Shizuru suspected that Mino would never be able to think of Natsuki's amputation without thinking of her as well. She understood that, as she still heard her voice echoing in her ears sometimes and giving the awful command: "Sever the limb." accountable for the loss of the princess's leg. He had certainly been more understanding than the girl's cousin, who still gushed smoke from her nostrils whenever Shizuru came near. Mino, on the other hand, had made it clear that he understood the reasoning behind the surgery. He had even thanked Shizuru-with frosty sullenness and without actually saying the word "thanks" or any of its variants-for her speedy decisions, which he acknowledged were probably the only reasons Natsuki was still living.

Even so, Mino had been one of those who did not truly hold Shizuru

Despite all of which, we shall never be comfortable together, Shizuru thought while nearing the tent, her mouth a little twisted as she considered the affair. Did she really feel bothered to be un-liked by someone so important to Natsuki, she wondered. If she had to be honest, not very much: she knew it could not be otherwise, so she could not entertain sufficient what-if's to feel wistful about it. Mino would always be the person silently fault-finding her worthiness of the girl he considered his daughter. As for her, she would always be the person who had introduced sex and forbidden things to the girl he considered his daughter. How could they ever be comfortable?

She passed the Otomeian sentries and entered the tent, nodding at the three servant-girls sitting in the receiving section. Two of these girls belonged to her. The third was one of Natsuki's servants: these had approached Shizuru after the Sosia siege ended and asked the Himean general if she would allow them still to serve their princess. As they had been separated from the girl for so long-most of them had been split off from her and stuck in Sosia citadel while Natsuki was stuck in Ushida's camp-they had been clearly blaming themselves for their mistress's bodily troubles, and had thus been fearful of being denied access to her again. Shizuru had been kind, however, and had quickly arranged lodgings for the anxious slaves. Ever since then these had been working with her own servants, specifically to look after the girl.

She set the items she was carrying on a table.

"Was Mino-han long here?" she asked. "Did she wake while he was in?"

They denied it.

"Look," she said.

The trio approached and she pointed out the things she had been carrying.

"Fresh goat's milk," she began, prompting the Otomeian slave to whine in delight; she smiled at the woman, sharing her optimism. "It was milked just now, off some choice does brought in with the baggage. We shall have fresh milk from now on. Apples as well, as you can see. And here are a few hard cheeses and some bacon, as well as some dried figs."

She looked at them as they touched the items reverently, murmuring over the apples in particular because they were such a wonderful shade and firm of skin.

"Has she not woken at all since I was here?" Shizuru asked once she thought they had finished appreciating the goods. "Eaten anything?"

They denied it worriedly. Shizuru was worried too: the girl had refused to take anything but the honeyed wine again that morning, and she was getting no thicker in the flesh.

"But if she has not woken that means she has not vomited it," she consoled herself and the other women, who agreed readily.

"The supplies are being brought in as we speak," Shizuru said quite inconsequentially: she knew they already knew it and had just refrained from watching the spectacle because of their duties. "Go to the stores and tell them I sent you. Fetch some barley and make some porridge for her. Do your people eat porridge that has been flavoured with bacon? Salt pork?"

The Otomeian servant said that they did.

"Good. Use this bacon, then, and add whatever flavourings you think she may appreciate. Nothing too heavy-you know how your mistress's palate favours the delicate."

"Let her direct the cooking," she instructed her own slaves while indicating Natsuki's servant. "She shall better know the spicing suited to their people's taste. Fetch some wine from my stores as well and make some fresh caldá, just in case. We can use that to make more honeyed wine. Do we still have honey here?"

"The jar is low, Domina."

"Fetch more of that as well, then."

"Domina," said one woman. "Will all three of us go?"

Shizuru's eyes drifted to the tent's partition-larger than the old one, as she had had fresh screens brought in-and back to the trio.

"Yes," she said. "I shall be here anyway."

They bowed and excused themselves from her presence, taking only the package of bacon with them. Once they had left, Shizuru went out of the tent as well, stopping just at the entrance.

Two pairs of blue eyes glanced at her, as they had when she had walked in earlier. There was another pair besides them that Shizuru had not been expecting to see: a set of brown eyes whose owner she recognised immediately.

"Kyo-han," she greeted, addressing the Lupine Division's second-in-command. Well, really the first-in-command now, she corrected herself sullenly, still wrestling with the fact that the girl would never be able to lead her men again. Good god, the thought of it!

Not now, not the time.

She forced a smile with great effort. "The princess is asleep. Would you like to come in?"

He drew in his chin and looked embarrassed.

"I should not, General Fujino," he said.

"I doubt she shall mind it when she is not awake to complain, Kyo-han."

"No, thank you very much, General. It is not proper. I am sorry for troubling."

He backed away one step and then another, but Shizuru followed him like a big cat scenting game.

"You came all the way here," she stated calmly, drawing herself up to her straightest posture and putting on the somewhat arrogant, extremely confident expression she always used when addressing her men as their commander. He was affected as she had thought he would be, and stood to attention instead of again trying to retreat.

"One of you does this just about each day, Kyo-han. But none of you ever enter. With the exception of Otanara-han and Natsuki's cousin, that is. Are you truly satisfied with just asking for news of her? Are you sure you do not wish to see her, even if only just for a moment?"

He shook his head with certainty.

"We only come to ask, General," he said after a moment's pause. His Himean was nowhere near as good as Natsuki's, so he had to think carefully about what he wanted to say. It was a little more difficult when the foreign commander-also the notorious lover of your superior-was staring you down.

"For us it is enough," he told her. "And it is not proper to enter her rooms. She is resting and... and they are also your rooms."

Shizuru was a little surprised by the last remark.

"Only, we want to know if she is well." He shifted as much as his martial stance would allow. "Every day, if it is possible."

Shizuru smiled. It was wider this time.

"Rest assured that it is," she said. "And she is as well as she can be at the moment. You may tell the others that, if they ask."

He nodded and thanked her.

"Was that all?" she asked him, taking a deep breath to steel herself for what she was about to bring up. "You do not have queries for her regarding your leadership, perhaps?"

That saw him twisting, although not for the reason Shizuru interpreted from it. She thought him twisting because it embarrassed him to think of something so ambitious at such a time, and that satisfied her questions about his loyalties; he was in fact twisting because he considered his captain's fall his direct failure, along with the nobles in their division who had been pledged by the king to preserve her before themselves.

"It... That will wait," he got out painfully, failing to hide the guilt racking him still. "The Princess is still the Captain. I am only a second."

He shook his head and repeated it.

"The Princess is Captain."

Shizuru decided even she was not ready to talk about it; she changed the topic.

"I see. By the way, I forgot to ask before, as it slipped my mind entirely," she started. "Have any of you seen Natsuki's black stallion, Niger? Was it one of the steeds that fell in battle?"

He opened his eyes in surprise and seized the new subject.

"Mino did not tell you, General?" he asked, face actually losing some of its lines as he delivered the small piece of good news. "Niger lives. He is well. Mino keeps him with other horses." He paused as if to think of what else to tell her, then added, "I saw him yesterday."

"I see. I shall take your word for it that he is well, then." Shizuru sighed. "Mino-han did not inform me of it. I suppose it slipped his mind and he forgot to tell me."

Or just could not be bothered to disclose it until I asked, that cantankerous old man.

Kyo agreed with her spoken words, not knowing what she was actually thinking.

"Very well, Kyo-han, thank you for the information," she told him, one hand going to rest casually on the belt of her tunic. "I shall tell Natsuki you visited once she wakes. You are sure you have no messages for her? I shall be glad to pass them on for you."

"No, General Fujino," he said, bowing to her in his courtly way. It discomfited her a little as it did all Himeans-it was not normal to them to address even superior officers with such a gesture-but Shizuru hid it far better than the other officers and thus looked somewhat lordly as she let him finish his people's version of the salute. "Thank you very much, General Fujino."

She watched the wiry man as he left, her mind counting the number of times she had seen him or other members of the Lupine Division come to the girl's tent. They always stopped at the entrance with those oddly demure and unassuming looks on their faces, and always refused to enter by saying it would be improper for them to disturb the princess's recovery. Yet they had seemed unopposed to passing sullen vigils around the enclosure at one period, sometimes even massing outside it and clogging a part of the street. Once, there had even been a big enough and grim enough group of them to alarm the legionaries, who came out to keep an eye on the weird huddle of foreigners clustered near "the general's other place". Not that the huddle of giants had seemed to notice their apprehensive onlookers. They had just stayed where they were and muttered to each other in low voices, a pack of dour scarecrows grumbling in the wind.

The man running the Otomeian part of the army had explained it to Shizuru at the time, his expression a wreck of dismay as he talked to the woman his own commander would be sure to detest upon first meeting.

"She is Natsuki," he had told her. "Princess Natsuki of the Otomeians, uncrowned Queen of the Ortygians, Captain of the Lupine warriors... One of our best leaders and an irreplaceable noble. All these things come together. It is true that we are obliged to wish her well because she is of our nobility and because she is someone our nation swore to look after. But we also wish her well because we wish her well. So it is important for us to know what happens. There are many things demanding that we observe this."

Despite that, Shizuru had known that she had to send off the concerned Otomeians, not just because they were blocking one of the camp's intersections but also because they were alarming her legionaries with their gloomy presence. Ordered firmly to go back to their quarters, they had agreed on the condition that two Otomeians would be permitted to guard their princess's tent daily, rotating the duty amongst the available and willing auxiliaries. Shizuru had been intending to cast some of her own slaves as sentries, so she seized this improved option immediately. The general was pleased because she cleared up her camp and got excellent guards for her mistress's tent; the Otomeians were pleased because they now had a fixed source of news about Natsuki.

The sentries made it easier for the rest to get regular updates. The pair on duty for the day would take notes from the Otomeian slaves inside the tent, then use those to answer the inquiries of Otomeians passing them on the street; these would then go back to the Otomeian barracks and spread the word to the auxiliary. The sentries also received and transferred inside the tent whatever offerings the other Otomeians sent. These typically poured in when word got out that their princess needed something. Shizuru still remembered the day the medici had recommended that oak bark be found for treating the girl's fever. Within hours of the prescription, there had been a mound of bark in the tent, some pieces even the size of the Himean shield.

They love her, Shizuru thought now, still quite moved by the foreigners' dedication to her girl. She had known Natsuki important to them, but had not understood just how famous her girl was-and now thought herself a fool for even being surprised by it. It was natural, she thought, and nothing one should really consider astonishing.

She turned to the two Otomeians she had originally intended to address: the sentries for the day. These shifted their focus from the street to her face and looked blue-eyed and attentive.

Again she noted the disparity between their fair looks and Natsuki's. Did they ever stop to meditate on her obvious differentiation from them, the girl they watched over so protectively?

"Let the women in once they return," she said, giving instructions to the Lupine warriors as coolly as if they had been her own legionaries. "The same for my steward, Hermias, or my head slave, Aella. But no one else enters."

Two blonde heads nodded. Shizuru went back inside the tent.

There was an amphora of water on the table, near the things she had brought. She fetched a cup and poured herself a drink from it, pulling the water through clenched teeth. Bracing, but not bracing enough. It was always hard to have to go back and face her girl, and she needed all the bracing she could get for it. It did not mean she did not want to do it but it did mean that she could not help but be grieved each time she did.

The reminders of your failings, she told herself, are always a grief to witness.

She finished her drink. Picking up the basket of apples and the milk, she made her way to the other side of the partitions, ears picking out the sound of steady but laboured breathing. Another grief. She could still remember the nights when she had marvelled at the silence of the girl's lungs, the absolute calm of the healthy body when in rest. Now there was toil even in repose, and Shizuru did not know what she could possibly do to ease it.

Inepte.

She passed the partitions and went to the chair. There was always a chair beside the bed, and it reminded her of how there had always been a stool beside her desk. Times past now, for all that she remembered it so easily. Quite comically-she was aware of it-she was even quieter in her movements now than she had been earlier, when the slaves had still been present. Moving around the area soft-footed, inaudible as a ghost. Another parallel: the girl had done this with her all the time.

Times past now. Stop it.

The foodstuff went on the end table. She went on the chair, perhaps just a little too fast because she was discomfited by her thoughts. The chair creaked. She winced and lowered herself more slowly.

On the bed, the dark-haired girl continued to rasp in slumber. Shizuru sat back, content with just watching. That was a lie, of course: she was not content and wanted to touch the girl. But Natsuki rarely slept so peacefully these days, and sleeping was perhaps one of the few reprieves left. How could Shizuru possibly take that away?

So the woman famous for her grace clasped both knees with gawky fingers, like an ungainly adolescent who did not know what to do with her hands. Her mother would have rapped her knuckles had she been there to see. In fact, her mother would have rapped her knuckles for quite a number of things lately, Shizuru could not help thinking.

Sometimes, filial duty be damned, she was glad her mother was no longer alive.

She half-jokingly called this the dark chair, because she always fell into dark thoughts when in it. This chair always brought her to realise the many misfortunes that seemed to have been woven around but not directly into her. All with this girl. To be sure, Natsuki's pain was a misfortune to her as well-no day passed that she did not grieve over the loss of the girl's leg and everything that went with it. But Shizuru also knew that it was not she whose leg had been cut off. She was reminded of it each time she got up from her cot in the morning, unaided and independent of anyone else's power. If that was not enough to render the rest of the day bitter, she wondered what would be enough. Yet how much more bitter was it for the one who needed help just to get up?

She ran a hand through her hair and barely noticed its wild length, her head too full of the girl before her to even consider her own vanity.

She wondered what Natsuki was dreaming.

Pray the gods it is something good, she thought wistfully. Or let her sleep be dreamless, at least. She thought it unduly cruel if Fortune, which had so often hoisted her girl upon its crucifix, could not spare some kindness for even the girl's unconscious moments.

She deserves that much, a little kindness.

She put out a hand and touched the pillow, but pulled it back quickly so she would not succumb to the touching impulse. It was difficult and she fidgeted again, feeling as though the mere denial of the girl's skin were scalding her fingertips. She needed to feel her so badly, to lay hands on- seize it - the fact of Natsuki's existence. It was frail and it was hurting but it was close. That was a small victory in itself, for all that she would not dwell on it: it was close.

A breath, at least, she argued, struggling. A breath, it shall not hurt. It shall be a small thing to her and everything to me.

Finally negotiating an agreement with her control, she got up and bent over the sleeper, looking for all the world like a hawk looming over its prey. She was a tender hawk: all she did was drop her nose to the dark hair and inhale.

And then she was back in her chair, chest heaving a little more than normal as she considered the girl on the sheets. Her girl, who still smelled of pine and frost but now smelled too of the sickbed and of repeatedly applied herbs and medicines. Her girl, who now smelled too of suffering.

I still believe you to be lucky, she thought wretchedly, unable to keep her face from crumpling as she considered the topic. Yet I see now the direction of your luck. You are a fortunate child, but fortunate only for me, somehow, and for my fate. Never have I been unfortunate when you were involved in any of my affairs, and only now do I understand why. It is as though Fortuna took your share of her love and made it so that you could only give it to me. Yet to you she has given more misfortune than one can bear. I wish I could understand the justification behind that; I wish to all the gods I knew why she would do it to you-and even do it repeatedly.

But the distribution and reiteration of fortune had no reason, naturally. One only needed to think of Suou Himemiya and the way she had been killed to see that.

The thought came too fast on top of her grief over Natsuki; Shizuru was unprepared. Her eyes moistened before she could stop them and she had to wound her lip, angrily willing the excess wetness in her eyes to dry.

No tears, she commanded. No time for them now and certainly no right.

So she considered it again, calming herself to think of Suou without letting the unhappiness interrupt the thinking. She could afford to be cold, because her revenge for Suou would be white-hot. She could afford coolness now because she could not afford to be otherwise.

Yes, think. You can feel, but above that you must think.

She thought. Cut down so young she had yet even to be formally accepted into Senate, Suou was surely one of the more unreasonable victims of poor fortune in her eyes. Just like Natsuki. Shizuru supposed it took one to know one, because a good number of Suou's letters-the ones Suou had never sent and which the woman's prostrate servants gave to Shizuru after the conclusion of the siege-had spoken constantly of the marvel of Mis fortune, which seemed for all the wrong reasons to hound Shizuru's girl.

I hate to say it, but she is an unlucky little thing, one of the more personal "letters" had stated. Hold your rebuttal first: I know you consider her your talisman. And to some extent, I do agree. But I also hold to what I have just said.

You see, I agree with you in that she is lucky in certain ways-she has beauty and brains and battle-ready skill. I have already written of how she saved our skins several times, from the flight where she got her leg shot through to the time when she came up with the idea of firing the trees. So I must say that she is a most excellent creature to have by one's side in a pinch and a lucky little thing for us, certainly.

But-and here it is-I am beginning to think she is an unlucky little thing for herself.

Suou had been right, Shizuru ruminated. Just another reason for her to wish the woman were still alive: then they could talk more on the topic. For she had no one else she could talk to about Natsuki, or no one nearby that she could trust half as much as she had trusted Suou. Indeed, she had noticed from Suou's accounts-which were arranged and dated with inspiring organisation-that she also had no one else who could possibly have claimed to understand Natsuki half as well as the Himemiya had. The woman had come to know Natsuki very well, her interest in the girl clearly rising over time. In fact, it had risen so clearly that Shizuru's feelings on it were mixed.

She knew she was atrociously jealous. Shizuru hated herself for finding her old friend's interest in Natsuki suspect, but she could not help it. It only heightened her self-loathing that she understood exactly why Suou would have developed such an interest, innocuous or otherwise. Shizuru knew exactly how tempting it was to figure out the puzzle that was Natsuki. She also knew that the role Suou had taken for her sake had made the woman's study of Natsuki necessary. So it was not exactly a surprise that so many of the accounts left behind by Suou had been devoted to discussing the girl she and Shizuru had, in a sense, shared.

You were right in calling her a child, Suou had written. I know she is a young woman already, but there is an innocence in her that persists. It is more than her liking milk over their people's beer, or fruit over bread and meat, or the times in between seasons over the seasons themselves because then she can do things like crack the first ice coats of the trees with a finger (her words, not mine). It is more even than the way she asks for the meaning behind a foreign word and demands both its written form and its precise speech, like a precocious brat out of the nursery. It is something more than all of this, and I see how you came to be addicted to it.

There are little demeanours that make being with her wonderful, even during the plainest of occasions. She cannot resist things that pique her curiosity, for instance, and tries to fidget her way into snooty indifference; I have been watching her out of the corner of my eye the whole time I was writing, and she has been dying to know the contents of this letter ever since I said it was for you. She is asking me, finally, and I have told her only that it is about her. Now she pouts and is displeased because I refuse to reveal more. No use scolding me, Shizuru-san-we both know you would do the same! You know how it is when she gives you that adorable look of confusion: you end up withholding things you never intended to withhold, somewhat perversely.

True, one ended up doing that with Natsuki, Shizuru considered. Suou had written a surprising number of things Shizuru knew to be true about interactions with Natsuki and even surprised Shizuru on occasion with things Shizuru had not known about Natsuki. Reading those, she would end up hating herself again for being suspicious of her friend, especially because said friend was dead already and would never be the friend she had once been-nor the possible adversary.

I only discovered this recently, Shizuru-san. I am a fool for only discovering it recently. Our girl is wallowing in despair deeper than I realised, and that is saying something given that I have been keeping an eye on her all this time. It may be that my eyesight is simply limited, but it may also be that she is merely a genius of concealment.

I have never seen such violent misery, I think, so it shocks me all the more that she kept so much of it from me. I have never seen such stubborn silence either. She has thus far refused to show a shred of real loneliness before me, and now I suddenly discover she holds herself so tightly in the nights that she breaks her skin with her nails just to keep quiet. She is not going mad, I am sure of it, but that makes this more worrying.

I am not versed in such things, so I cannot be certain, but it seems to me that she is nigh-destroying herself. What is it she feels so keenly? I catch echoes sometimes-and again I must warn you that I am not certain of this-but I feel that these echoes are not only of grief at your absence. I know not why, but I feel that she actually feels guilt.

I cannot think of a reason for this guilt. If it is indeed specific to your situation, as I feel it to be, I am only baffled all the more. Let me say from the start, however, that I firmly disbelieve it to be due to any betrayal of you on her part: see, the girl is both too proud and too faithful for it. Whatever it may be, I am certain at least that it is nothing of that genre.

Still, I am trying to use this to gain a better understanding of her disease. I stand by the physicians in that it is due to her anxieties over your separation, but evaluating it now also causes me to think that it is also a form of atonement. For what exactly, I cannot say. I only wish I could absolve her of whatever it is she thinks she did.

That is all for now. I am also making a note to myself here to remind you to be even kinder to her. She is harder on herself than she would be on an enemy.

If Suou thought she saw guilt in Natsuki, then guilt there probably had been. But guilt for what? The girl already had such immense stores of guilt-Shizuru wondered if Suou had ever discovered the circumstances surrounding the massacre of Natsuki's people-and though it was unjust and Natsuki was an undeserving filly to saddle with it, it simply was that way. Could this other guilt be something like that again? Shizuru would not be surprised.

An unlucky little thing for herself indeed.

Fortune was a capricious force, and Shizuru could not deny a part of her actually hated that force now for some of the things it had done to her girl. But she also understood that one could not but ride luck's currents as they appeared, and that she at least knew now how to prevent further misfortune from reaching Natsuki. It was a logical solution: if the girl's luck was meant only for her, then she would have to use her own luck to shelter the girl. As far as she knew, Natsuki had seemed to be most fortunate when under her wing.

So whether she likes it or not, this is how it must be, she decided. I was foolish to allow her to be split from me before despite everything I was feeling: this proves it more than ever. I took the luck she was giving without a single thought and she got none of it herself. That injustice of luck was Fortuna's doing, so I cannot be blamed for it. But I can be blamed for not having realised she was being emptied of her own share of luck because of me. If all her luck is for me, so should my luck be used for her. It is now within my power to extract for her the recompense she deserves. Even if she objects to it, this is the proper order of things, and no one may say otherwise.

Which meant that Natsuki no longer had a choice in the matter, as far as she was concerned. Suou would have approved: she had even written something to that effect.

Living under miserable circumstances with like chances brings out the better points in contrast, the woman had set down in one of the more negative notes, one of those that had indicated the growing despair in the Masashi camp was affecting her as well. It had been a note unlike most of Suou's other ones: a missive written by the real woman under the Himemiya pretence of elegant negligence and detachment. Shizuru knew this colder and blunter Suou already, but it had still been strange to be confronted by it in a dead woman's handwriting.

Juxtaposition is an effective configuration for taking measure of things. I find myself cleaving to the Seventh more than my fellow officers, half of whom would up and leave the men if they knew a way to spirit themselves out of this. I prefer to sit with the centurions instead of with the rest of command, which ulcerates with the most raffish wastrels that ever ran an army. Sometimes I even prefer to work more with the Otomeians than many of our own fellows: the auxiliaries certainly know how to spare the unnecessary chatter when working, which is more than I can say for most of our people. And speaking of the auxiliaries, I must say I prefer to be with your girl most of all, because she is the best comfort I have in this shambles of a situation.

Yet I know I am little comfort to her. I admit this stings a little, especially when I see how wretched she is though she would conceal it. You would be her comfort, but you are not here. I think now that we were cruel to permit this separation after all: I do not know how you fare but she is withering away, and I-the one who is not her comfort, we must remember-can do hardly anything. I know you love her, but place yourself in my shoes for a moment. Can you imagine how it feels to see it? The best comfort I have in this wretched place is withering away.

If only for her sake, I wish these unsent letters could reach you now. Perhaps that is the only good we have had out of this whole debacle, albeit also one of its greatest evils: we have been given, you and I, conclusive proof of what you wanted. It may be that you shall be angry with me later for saying these things, but I believe they need to be said: your love for her seems to make you timid in the worst ways, and it serves neither you nor her well, judging from how she is suffering. We both love to call her a child, yet we never thought of how much she loves like a child. Almost blindly devoted, fully at the mercy of the parent. She suffers because you and I were too timid to see it and cruel enough to test it.

Take her with you next time instead of leaving her timorously with a pathetic stand-in. I foresee you arguing against the fairness of this again and how it disrespects her right to choose for herself, so let me point out to you that you have been unfair from the beginning: you made a child love you, so she shall never have a choice that cannot be completely overruled by one of yours. Please think of that before forcing an adult's choice upon a child again just because you want to be spared further culpability for your doings. If you do not, I fear we shall have words between us, you and me.

Surprising as reading all of that had been, Shizuru had nonetheless realised the justice of it. Worse, she could actually see the other woman's face as she wrote it. Just the thought of that was enough to make her hunch over in her dark chair, because it was an awful thing to know you would only ever again see your friend from imagination, and your imagination happened to have her looking at you as though she found you to be a spineless disappointment.

It stung to be regarded that way, particularly by someone you had loved as a sibling.

A passing memory unexpectedly visited: she and Suou new adolescents, the latter being permitted to try out her elder sister's inherited bow, an inheritance of their family. Even now Shizuru could hear the horror in all three of their voices; the whiz of Suou's wild shot racing past target and through field; the silence when it caught one of Father Himemiya's prized peacocks in the hump of the chest and did him in. And then the panic-stricken laughter from herself as Chikane rapped Suou with the bow, forgetting for a moment that it was a prized object in itself and too precious to be used for disciplining younger siblings.

Oh Chikane, how can you bear it? Shizuru had to work again to counter the mist building under her eyelids. Suou was Chikane's one sister, her only sibling. She had been the youngest member of their little group, though not quite their baby. It had always been Suou who kept all three of them grounded when they were together, as she was simply made more practically than the older girls, born dreamers and dreaming. Never again-impossible to believe. It still felt like mere days since she had murdered that peacock accidentally. How could Chikane bear it? How can I bear it?

The girl on the bed moved and it distracted her enough to send away the mist. Shizuru felt her world shift, all focus drawing in to that one cot and the loud breathing coming from it.

"Natsuki?" she whispered, leaning in to see if the girl was waking. "Natsuki?"

The dark head was still, the raspy breathing unbroken.

"Ah." Shizuru deflated back into her chair. "Well..."

She laced the fingers of both hands together and supported her chin. Natsuki stirred again, shifted until her head was facing Shizuru, and continued sleeping.

Shizuru smiled weakly.

I can wait. I should let her sleep.

It was slightly strange to see someone who had never been prone to naps suddenly napping at all times of the day. She knew it was because the girl had been ill, but these long naps seemed to her to almost be another sort of illness, one of unfamiliar lethargy. Even so, she supposed it was better for the girl to sleep. The chief medicus had said Natsuki's body still needed a lot of rest to recover, and he was probably right. He had been right in most things thus far, including in his prognosis for what would happen to Natsuki after the surgery.

He had predicted a terrible battle then, one with the poison still left in the girl's veins. And as it turned out, the fever did linger as prophesied, like a sustained crime staying to rape Natsuki long after the offending limb had been excised. This silent rapist was one of sustained perversion, repeatedly violating the mind with the body. Natsuki's mind during her sickness was not the ever-clear, ever-grounded one Shizuru had known. It was instead a mind of high paranoia, where she would look at a familiar thing but think it alien, and stare at a cup of water as at a Tartarean devil. There were even moments of odd perplexity where she seemed confused by her own hand. There were times of lucidity too, but these were rare and momentary, and each headlong dive back into delirium seemed to wipe all recollection of them in later reprieves.

The body that housed the mind was no more constant: Shizuru knew she would remember for the rest of her life the awful time she had touched it and expected heat, only to find it mimicking the temperature of her sword. The general famed for her sangfroid had never fainted before but had felt close to it, felt the particulars of her consciousness fading into homogeneous black. It had taken one of the other members of Natsuki's medical staff to move both Shizuru's frozen hand and the sheets, his own fingers shaking with fear, to prove that the girl was still breathing.

There had been "a special staff" at the time - a full crew of medici and slaves monitoring the girl. Natsuki had never been without company, although it was doubtful that the girl was also ever sane enough to recognise it back then. This staff had been recently collapsed due to the patient's improvement, but it was still such that Natsuki was never alone.

She would never again be alone. Shizuru had promised.

Shizuru was a member of the staff to the present day, unsurprisingly. The day of the operation, she had had several of her necessities moved into the girl's recuperation quarters, including a sturdy desk and chair so she could work there if need be. She had also slept in that tent since then, occupying the extra cot left by the surgeons who had transferred to other premises. The surgeons in that tent had all been of average size for Himeans, which meant that the cot Shizuru had been forced to use was an average-sized one as well, and hardly made to fit a woman just a few fingers shy of two metres. Natsuki's survival had occupied her too much for her to have the oversight fixed: no attention was drawn to the error and she slept curled up for five nights. On the sixth day Aella found an opportunity to do a more thorough inspection of the tent, and immediately replaced the tiny bed with a suitable one. She had also caned the slaves who had been changing Shizuru's sheets for their negligence.

Shizuru's official quarters stayed up despite her never spending her nights there. For a while she had considered transferring Natsuki to her place, then thought better of it after seeing how badly the girl was faring. She had intended to make the move once the girl got better, but it eventually slipped her mind and she just ended up being more and more ensconced in the girl's tent instead. She still returned to her own tent each morning to wash, just as she also worked from her proper office in the day. But she always returned to Natsuki's tent afterwards. And everyone in the camp knew it.

It was hard not to know. The general made the trip so often, even going over to the Otomeian princess's tent in the middle of the day before slipping back to her command quarters after mere minutes. It got so the legionaries learned to expect her pass that route several times in one afternoon, and took to calling it "The General's March".

It became something of a camp story and also a camp joke. There was a point when some legionaries took to placing bets on how often she would walk The March in a day. That stopped when one of the primipilii found out and gave the guilty parties a week's latrine duty as punishment, remarking that they were lucky he had been the one to find them and not the general or the chief primipilus-who would have strangled the "careless lot of cunni " (as he put it). Since the soldiers had not actually meant any ill by it, they went off properly chastised and swollen in the ears from the centurion's boxing.

Only vaguely aware of these inconsequential little side stories, Shizuru had continued to do her checks on the girl without fail, making the round at least once every couple of hours. After two weeks of this, her feet had worn a clear track to mark The General's March. By this time people had also learned not to try and intercept her on the way, because she seemed to have only one word for them then, no matter how small their question or concern: "Later."

It had been and still was an obsession. She knew that. She had an inexplicable fear that if her eyes were not on Natsuki, something would happen to the girl. Why Shizuru would think that Black Fate would evade Natsuki if it knew she was watching was unclear even to her, but it served to keep her from falling apart at the hinges, so she did not spend too much time questioning it. It was simply a feeling, and one she thought better to heed than to discard automatically.

She remembered the stages even now, when most of the danger had passed. There was the time when the girl could not stop shaking, even despite the warmth of the day and her blanket. The staff had sweated virtual litres just trying to figure out how to stop the rattling of her bones. But the girl-ever the overachiever, Shizuru jested weakly to herself-had then played a trick on them, suddenly ceasing her shudders and outdoing them all with her own sweating. In fact, she had proceeded to sweat so much so fast that her caretakers had had to change bedding and bindings literally every hour. Two days of that had seen her so desiccated the medici feared it would be the dehydration that would kill her. Fortunately, it had eased up shortly.

She had been given water whenever possible and fed spiced and thickly honeyed wine when more cooperative. The honey they used was finest Hymettan, brought all the way from Greece and through Fuuka. Shizuru had purchased jars of this long ago from a Fuukan businessman whose trade was to supply such Grecian delicacies, and now thanked the gods that she had been smart enough to bring a few jugs on the march. Not that the quality seemed to impress the patient: she was more likely to spit out the stuff they flavoured with the honey than to swallow it.

Always the troubles with food, always my worry with her weight. What was that she told me before? That she only ate "enough"?

Feeding her had been and was still troubling. It had seemed to Shizuru, those early weeks, that for every cup the patient succeeded in getting down, there would be a half-hour of retching following it. Once, the girl had even vomited on Shizuru herself, as the woman had been trying to shift her to a more comfortable position when it happened. Natsuki had opened her eyes and given a massive jerk, then launched the curdled contents of her gut at the patrician's hands. Not that the cleanliness-obsessed Shizuru uttered a peep: she had merely wiped herself as best as she could, called in the slaves to change the sheets while she transferred the patient to the other cot, soothed and washed and dressed the girl, then returned her to the fresh bed once finished. Only when she was sure Natsuki was again asleep had she spared time to change out of her own soiled tunic.

It is a wonder, she had found herself thinking several times, perhaps while cleaning dirty wrappings that stank of pus or perhaps while assisting the girl to a chamber pot and washing her off tenderly when she was too ill to make it. It is a wonder even to me that I can do these things without flinching, I who would never have welcomed the thought of doing such mean services for anyone. I know I love her above all, and I would have done these things for her even were the urge to flinch present. Yet the reflex seems to be gone, for all that I expended no effort in vanquishing it.

She would wipe the girl's mouth after another bout of vomit, cupping her hand to catch any remaining drops so that they would not fall to the fresh linens. Then she would cradle the still dribbling head to her chest and think with amazement, I do this without disgust, without any revulsion. It is a wonder even to me, yes, but I would gladly do even more.

A frustrated tenderness at the time: did it even make a difference to the girl, who had seemed to know nothing and no one? She who was referred to-often quite bitterly-as the Ulyssean Woman Never at a Loss had discovered startling gaps in her lexis while watching Natsuki's body struggle so hard to live it could barely spare effort to perceive. Suddenly she understood why certain terms she never thought useful existed and came upon the discovery that when the person you valued most was screaming at you as though you were a monster, there was some merit in saying the fucks and the shits and the god-fucked cacks in a language until you exhausted every ounce of salt in its veins.

She also learned quickly that these words, perhaps even all words, were largely overvalued. Natsuki had always tried so hard to teach her that, she supposed.

Yet words were her cognitive elements (and did that make her largely overvalued, she wondered); she had spent her first nights inside their shared tent just feigning sleep in her too-small cot, lying on one side and staring at the withering body of the one she loved while one of the physicians nodded off to sleep on the couch. She would play the physician herself, wording observations of the patient in her mind as though that extra vigilance could ward off harm.

She was careful, however, to never let herself forget what harm had been done. How could one forget what stared at one so keenly?

Natsuki made everything new, she acknowledged. Shizuru had thought herself inured to all sorts of atrocities-she remembered having been convinced of it after one of her earlier battles, when she had been but a cadet fighting with the rankers and had used a felled compatriot's severed limb as a weapon after her own sword got knocked away. A teenager then, she had thought sagely to herself that if anyone was so intent on survival as to strip the flesh from a fellow's arm-she had used the sharp end of the bone as the spearhead-well, that person was already beyond being shocked by atrocity.

The sight of Natsuki's deathly face, however, had seen her rethinking that youthful boast. It had seemed to her that she had never seen iniquity before that, had never seen an atrocity to compare to the unacceptable sight of a Natsuki so very clearly dying. There was no other word for it, and the medici agreed: Natsuki had been dying. The idea actually offended her almost to denial. She had known it was the girl the moment she had walked into that dim tent in Ushida's camp and laid on eyes on the singular dark hair-but the differences had struck her as well and had even tempted her to reconsider her knowledge several times. Even now, with the girl cleaned up and properly bandaged, some of those differences were still present. There was no chance she could ever fail to recognise Natsuki, but there were things now that were strange to what she knew of the girl: not precisely foreign, but exaggerated. Delicacy had always been there, for instance, but not to the point of infirmity. Angles had always been present, but not to this acuity. And pain had always been hidden...

She settled her elbows more firmly on her thighs and leaned closer, unconsciously holding her breath as she performed an inspection she had been doing for weeks now.

The rims of the girl's eyes were dark. That was the first thing she noticed, because it had troubled her enough before to ask the Otomeian slaves if they were still applying stibium to the girl's eyelids. The answer had been no, of course. Indeed, the darkness was clearly non-cosmetic, for it had the red-edged translucency of a bruise, not the black solidity of stibium. But no bruise was the same colour for weeks, so it was not bruising.

Shizuru itched to take a moist cloth to it, as she had done several times before. But she could not disturb Natsuki's sleep.

She went on with her inspection. The face was much the same as the last time she had checked, a cobweb stretched over a sharp and tiny skull. Sometimes she feared the sharpness underneath would tear the skin, and she would cradle the skull in her palm as though to keep it still, afraid of what a jostle might do to it. She would stare down at it the whole time. A skin-veiled skull with dark eyelids and a huge scar on the forehead. It was a ghastly sight, in all honesty, yet still weirdly beautiful in her eyes. The promise of beauty was still so insistent in the fundamental structure that it was hard to consider the girl ugly even when she looked like death. Shizuru could almost hear her mother speaking the explanation for their own clan's age-defying looks. It is all in the bones, was what she always said, that it was all in the bones...

All in the bones, the fragile neck, the bars and crevices at the gutted collar.

The rest of Natsuki was concealed by the sheets, but Shizuru could conjure up a fair representation just from memory. That was the unpleasant remainder of another shock: her first sight of the girl's naked body since their separation. All she could think back then was that her girl had not looked like that when she had left. Her girl had been the epitome of slender youth the last time they had been together and undressed, not the flimsily-constructed puppet the surgeons' knives had revealed then. And though her girl had been light, she had not been that light.

She let another sigh leave her as she thought of it, recalling how Natsuki had used to feel in her arms before all of this happened. Small but reassuringly stable. Fine but endowed with sleek tangibility.

Now she feels like nothing, she mused. I feel as though I am moving a bird from the nest each time I pick her up these days. Featherweight and hollow-boned, as though there were no flesh to her structure. I loved carrying her before because it was like cradling a dream, but this is a different sort of dream now. Insubstantial. Morbidly stimulating. On the verge of evaporating from my hands...

The weakness finally overcame her at the thought: she struck out, her hand searching for the one resting on the white sheet. She breathed out her relief when her recklessness did not wake the girl, handling the dried-up fingers gently and telling herself they were real.

For all that she had been aching for this, all she got was meagre encouragement.

The hand in her grasp was far frailer than it had once been, now completely engulfed by her fingers without her trying. The bones were so pronounced that they seemed to push the veins up, quite painfully. She was so young, Shizuru marvelled; hardly any looseness or crepey folds, the skin almost trying to reconfigure itself to the new sizing. This despite the abuse it had obviously taken, what with all the new scabs and the greyness where it was not bruised, as though the blood had leached out of the flesh underneath. A fingernail was missing, and another had only started to grow back. There was a wide strip of scar tissue over her knuckles, the skin of which had been stripped away.

Even this little claw of a hand was a vessel of pain.

My poor girl, she groaned, trying not to clutch the fingers accidentally. How could they do this to you? She chafed the wrist and saw the other hand on top of the sheets, the whole of it bandaged from the knuckles to the arm just below the elbow. The bandages were white, but there were small spots, little yellowish stains. They looked to have soaked through from the inside. Were the stains from some ointment the physician had put there or effusions from more resistant wounds? Which cause was better, at this late stage? Oh, what she would give to know as much as the medici !

This body, she thought, was but a pitiful, pain-encrusted version of the beautiful girl she had known. Yet upon finding it, Shizuru had given up the cameo she had been carrying every day prior to that-a cameo that depicted Natsuki as she had been before all this, unbroken and at the peak of her physical beauty. Shizuru had handed this cameo to the chief centurion's body-servant with instructions for it to be given to her own slaves, who put it away with all her private things. Those of her slaves who had seen the current Natsuki suspected she had parted with the keepsake to avoid facing the disparity of the image with the present person. A mistaken notion. It was simply that seeing the true girl had robbed the facsimile of any meaning. Shizuru supposed that it would be always so for her and Natsuki, and that no representation could ever compare to the her girl's presence in the flesh.

No matter how attenuated she becomes.

Natsuki was so thin now that it contributed to the difficulty of moving her, as the lack of cushioning meat made her insides fragile and especially tender. Shizuru had chosen to do most of the carrying whenever the girl needed to be lifted, especially because she knew she could take far more care than anyone else ever would in the doing of it. Even so, there had been times when she had still hurt Natsuki just by picking her up and setting her down. Most of the time the girl had suffered it with delirious complaints or unintelligible groans, but there had been one time where it so happened that Natsuki's delirium seemed to have reverted her to the intelligibility of childhood. And even now Shizuru could remember the look the girl had thrown her then, green eyes swimming with bewilderment and asking without actually saying anything, You hurt me-why did you do that?

Why did you do that? The question she asked herself each night and had to answer for herself each night. Because it was for the best. Because it was the only thing to be done.

Sometimes, even she could not believe her responses.

Which makes me wonder why I ever hoped for her to believe them, she reflected, thinking now to the time when hopes had seemed imminent and dreams had clouded expectations. She-all of them-had been so focused on just getting the girl through the fever that they had forgotten the more difficult matter afterwards: that of the girl's mind returning from wherever it had gone. Shizuru could still recall how much she had wanted for it to happen and could only shake her head now at her own naïveté.

In some part of her mind, she was still hearing the scream.

That appalling scream, she thought with a shudder . That scream that had sounded less human than elemental: a tempest loosed from a pair of tattered lungs that had screamed pure rain and thunder. And the way she had looked while screaming, the way she had twisted the blanket all around her struggling to get up, reaching again and again for a foot she could not find, her beautiful eyes sane and hysterical at once...

I should have stayed up-I should not have gone to sleep that night, Shizuru told herself again, having repeated it countless times since that day Natsuki's mind had come back. It had been exactly a week now and still the situation warranted that regret.

We knew she was getting better, we saw her lucid each time she was awake. It was not often that she would wake - she would even be too weak to move during those occasions - but she was lucid and that should have been enough to warn us that it would happen. She even said my name-she said my name!-several times. I was so happy. I was so happy that I was foolish.

They had hoped that the realisation could be gradual, that Shizuru could be the one to ease her into the idea of her new body. It had seemed likely to happen thus, for during those moments of consciousness she displayed to them after the delirium had broken, she had never once complained or inquired about her leg. She could not even have lifted her thigh to see the stub for herself, so it had seemed to be a fair plan for breaking it to her gently.

But again they were played by a trick. One week ago Natsuki had woken in the dark hours, far more lucid than any time before and assailed by a terrible itch. The itch was on her left ankle and she could not go back to sleep. Shizuru had been asleep in the other cot and the girl decided to fix the problem herself, summoned all her pathetic strength to move the other foot and scratch the itching one. Only to have her success touch nothing. An incongruity.

After that it had been a simple thing to redirect her dismal strength to her other leg and try to move it to scratch the ankle on the sheets. Only to feel-nothing. An enormous lack. A bigger incongruity.

She had woken Shizuru and the slaves with her scream, had forced them to scramble at lighting lamps and holding her down because she kept tangling herself further in the blanket, vainly trying to reach for the abnormality by working jellied arms and legs. Or leg. Did the remainder of the left count as a leg still? It should, Shizuru would tell herself over and over again in the days to come: It is yet a leg, even if it is a different leg. And this different leg was the only thing Natsuki ever looked at now, a week after being confronted with it.

This was why Shizuru now waited for her to wake with as much apprehension as longing, for Natsuki had yet to rupture the barrier she had put up ever since that awful waking. Since then she had woken looking pale and empty, her mind a hermetic shell and her eyes able to see only one thing. Hardly anything had the power to break her concentration on that single point, which was a vacuity.

Just like herself, a despairing Shizuru would occasionally think, wanting only the return of the girl she had found and recovered, only to lose again. Ye gods, how many times must she be ripped from my hands? Give her back if this is your doing-give her back because she is mine. Let her be free to say my name again and acknowledge me as she did, before this silence...

A silence that still held echoes of that appalling scream.

Suddenly there was an interrupting sound; the echo waned and rolled back. The servants had returned, so Shizuru got to her feet.

They were at the table. One of the women lifted the lid from a small pot and a cloud of steam puffed out. Shizuru requested a spoon, which she gingerly dipped it in the porridge and held up, blowing wisps of steam off the surface of the spoonful she had taken.

"Yes, that would be right," she said, taking note of the delicate balance in both the tastes and the structure. Natsuki loathed both overly powerful flavours and dense substances when it came to food, so she knew the light, almost watery broth was perfect. "Would you pour some of that calda, by the way?"

Her slaves were one step ahead. They had known she would insist on auditing all the food for her mistress, so they had already poured a few sips' worth of the wine into a cup. It was warm as well, but not as hot as the porridge.

"That is very good," she pronounced afterwards, making the trio light up from the approval. "She is still sleeping, however, so I shall feed this to her later. By the way, where is the honey?"

The women showed her the fresh jar.

"Good. Do we have enough left in the old one to sweeten her milk, just in case?"

One slave checked the old jar, then turned to look again at the beaker of milk on the table, measuring it with her eyes.

"Just enough for that beaker, Domina," she determined.

"Then bring that over here, please, and use it to sweeten this already. I forgot to do that earlier."

"Yes, Domina."

A thought occurred to her and she twisted to look at the Otomeian servant, who bowed demurely under her gaze.

"Kavine," she said, demonstrating that she knew even the names of Natsuki's servants; she had no need to demonstrate the same knowledge for her own because they were aware of it by now. "I forgot this as well: do your people take milk cool? Or would it be better to warm it? I only ever saw her drinking warmed milk before, back then. Shall she dislike it if it is cold?"

The woman considered it carefully, it seemed.

"We drink milk cool too, Domina," she said, answering in good, intelligible Himean. "But it is also more common to give it warm when the drinker is sick."

Shizuru nodded, looking so serious one might have been pardoned for thinking her in conference with one of her officers about the war.

"Of course, I should have thought of it- Ecaster, what a fool I am!" she frowned, clearly annoyed with herself. The other three women exchanged looks: it was generally a point of interest to the servants, especially the female ones, when the domina clucked over her lover; they thought it endearing, all the more as it came from such a generally composed woman.

"Would you mind warming it for me quickly, then?" she asked, whereupon all three women answered in the affirmative. "You might stir in the honey then - no doubt it shall mix with the milk better."

She glanced at the water clock on one of the tables. Some time had passed since she came back from watching the baggage train arrive.

"When did you last bathe her hair?" she asked them.

"This morning, Domina," one answered.

"When I was with you? No baths in between, then?"

"No, Domina."

"I see. Well, it is cooler now so that should be fine. Even so... You did not do any wipe-downs of her body at all, just to keep her feeling fresh?"

"We did not, Domina."

Shizuru was on the verge of pouring herself more water from the same amphora as before. Now she stopped and put down the jug with a dull thud, having drawn what she considered sufficient data to conclude something.

"You know," she began, "for the past week"- ever since she awoke to this nightmare -"all of you, even those who are not here but have been seconded to service in this tent, have been reporting to me that you do not give her a wipe-down in between her set bath times during dawn and dark. I know that I said you should not bother doing it if she is asleep, in order to give her ample time to rest, but I know for a fact that she does not sleep the whole day, even if she does nap quite often. This tells me there is something preventing you from giving her a bath. What is going on?"

They were alarmed, although she had spoken quite kindly to them.

"Domina," said the eldest of the three, taking it upon herself to explain because she realised her status meant the other two expected her to do it. "We try, every day. We try, but..."

Shizuru tilted her head. "But, Zosime?"

"The lady does not permit it," Zosime revealed nervously. "We are very sorry, Domina. We do not know... we did not wish to force the lady. And Kavine and her fellows cannot counter their mistress's wishes-"

Shizuru latched onto a thought there, her eyes suddenly very dark as she regarded the trio differently from before.

"Wishes?" she repeated, cutting off her slave. "Do you mean to tell me she spoke ? Did she speak to any of you?"

Now they were truly frightened. Shizuru had not spoken kindly this time, after all.

"No, Domina, not a word," Zosime hastened to say. She knew why the domina would be rankled by the thought: the foreign princess had not spoken a single word to her either for the entire week. Had Zosime indeed received the girl's first words since then, she would in fact be outraged on behalf of her mistress. She had received no such words, fortunately.

"She does not speak to us, Domina," she clarified. "But she makes clear she does not wish us to touch her. She tries to-she slaps away our hands. We did not wish to trouble her, so we left the lady alone."

"What?" Shizuru turned to the others. "Is this so?"

"Yes, Domina," they both answered.

"We are very sorry, Domina," Zosime interjected.

Shizuru only stared at her, then at the other two women. She was trying to make sense of this information.

But it does not make sense!

This entire week, the empty husk that she called her girl had acted the part of a husk: she reacted to practically nothing and no one, no matter the provocation. They only managed to get her to eat by persistently pushing soup or beakers of wine against her lips, whereupon she would eventually tire and relax her mouth, let them tilt her head along with the beakers so she could sip or drink. More or less the same thing went on for her bath-times, where she let them move her woodenly so she could be bathed, not even bothering to put up the reaction of resistance. She was their perfect puppet, a creature they manipulated without trouble. At least, that was all Shizuru had ever seen from her this week. So why would she suddenly have a reaction to the slaves when being bathed in the midday, yet not whenever she was bathed in the morning and the night?

"Has this been the case for all the others as well?" she asked the slaves, confusion pleating her brow.

"Yes, Domina," Zosime answered again, and again added: "Truly we are very sorry, Domina."

"No. No, you need not be. If she did not wish it, it was wise that you followed. But I do not understand..." Shizuru put her hands on the table and braced her weight on it, still bewildered. "In the mornings and the evenings, she is so... cooperative. She slaps your hands, you said?"

Zosime's grimace looked like a shrug. "She tries to, Domina. She is weak, so it is feeble. But one can see from her eyes that she intends a slap."

A shake of the golden head; Shizuru blew out a puff of air.

"Domina," ventured Zosime after exchanging looks with the other servants. "If I may say something? It may be of help?"

Shizuru glanced at her slave.

"Yes?" she said, not knowing what to expect.

"Domina, in the mornings and the evenings, you are one of those bathing her."

Shizuru caught her breath. Her hands on the table flexed, the thought in her head sending little shocks of tension to every extremity.

"True," she said, nodding at the helpful-looking Zosime. "True, I am."

So what does that mean?

She hoped it meant what she wanted, which would make it a good thing. She hoped it so badly that she was afraid of going further in considering it.

She pushed herself from the table and straightened, suddenly energetic as an idea came to mind.

"Well, let that be set aside for now," she said. "I can just wipe her down later, as night is coming on fast and I need not return to the command tent today. Heat the milk first. I expect her to wake soon, and would like her to have it for her dinner. When you go to get that done, by the way, also get some warm water to be brought in for her bath. I shall take my bath later, after I have given her hers."

They nodded to the command.

"Bring the milk over as soon as it is warmed," she continued. "The same with the water for bathing her. After that, however, the three of you may retire for a while to take your meals with the others. I shall not ask for your assistance with the usual things tonight, so you may simply return once you have finished with your food. And you may take your time-I shall not need you for at least two hours after all these tasks I am assigning are done."

They were smart women and caught on immediately. She wanted to try doing the usual routine without anyone else present; she was going to see if there would be a difference due to her, as they were suggesting.

"Do not forget to send over food for the sentries outside, as usual-and be sure to ask them if they have anything in particular that they desire. Our stores are finally full enough to accommodate requests," she told them.

"And your dinner, Domina?" Zosime asked.

Shizuru waved a hand with the air of someone who could not care less.

"Send over the usual," she said, to their astonishment. "The usual" was merely bread, wine, and a scrap of meat. But surely it would be ridiculous if the general were to dine so poorly on a night when everyone else seemed to be celebrating the return of better fare!

"I want nothing special," she said to their flabbergasted faces. "And tell Hermias I said that when you encounter him, as he shall be sure to ask about it. Tell him as well not to bother me for at least two hours, as I have told you. That should be all, so please go about all of this now."

All three servants bowed in unison, as though it were a gesture they had practiced several times before. They exited and again Shizuru was left to herself, her face conflicted as she stared Natsuki's food out of countenance.

I want nothing special, eh?

Well, she would soon see how special this night could be. Behind the partitions, she could still hear Natsuki sleeping. When she woke this time, unlike last week, Shizuru would be there to supervise it. So the general went in to wait eagerly for that moment, blissfully unaware of the rider who had arrived only recently, overlooked in the hubbub of the baggage train. Said rider, now dismounted and striding through Shizuru's camp, was soon outside the tent the general shared with her Natsuki.

Shizuru heard the voices even from the inner reaches of the tent. Someone was speaking in Greek. Beautiful Greek, she amended, noting that the accents she heard were perfectly Attic.

"Yes, that is her tent, but-"

"-her troopers? Step aside."

"-please, it may be unwise!"

Shizuru was on the way to investigate when she heard the smack. Someone had just been slapped, she took it.

She was already past the partitions when a stranger walked in. Someone very tall, very angry, and very blonde. The Otomeians let one of their officers in despite my orders, was her first displeased thought, until she realised she had never seen this particular Otomeian before. She was about to demand the interloper's name when an Otomeian she did know came through the entrance gracelessly, his mouth open as if to say something. The sight of the two women clamped Otanara's mouth shut.

Shizuru lifted her eyebrow at the duo, herself more indignant by the second. The first intruder was staring at her eyes, she realised, and with a look on her face Shizuru did not like.

"Shizuru Fujino."

The intruder's lip curled as she addressed the general, her scowl mirroring Shizuru's glare.

"Give me my cousin."

Chapter 58

My gratitude again to the readers and reviewers, as well as to a few persons who sent very kind messages. They were very sweet, and I shall remember them.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Aedile - there were four of these: two were called the plebeian aediles and two were called the curule aediles. They were responsible for the structures of the city, among other things, but more importantly were also the organisers (and to a large part the funders, given the Treasury's parsimony) of the Roman public games. It was considered a very good thing if the aediles were rich, because it meant a better chance of seeing fantastic-and very expensive-games for everybody.
2. Calda - warm, spiced wine often taken during the cold seasons.
3. Mea vita - extremely affectionate endearment, literally "my life".
4. Medicus, medici - respectively, "doctor" and "doctors".
5. NOTE on mushrooms - the Ancient Romans were not unfamiliar with the use of certain natural substances for psychotropic effect, and quite a few mushrooms and plants were already prized back then as the equivalents of the drugs of today that have questionable legality in various states.
6. Sponge Stick - to be precise, a sponge on a stick. This was used by the Ancient Romans to wipe their rear ends after defecation.
7. Stola - women's garment at the time, based on a design from the Greeks.
8. Tcheret – may also be Romanised as "tjeret", a willow tree.

9. Via Decumana - one of the roads in a typical Roman camp: it runs from the centre of the camp (which would hold the general's headquarters) to the rear gate.

10. Well of the Comitia - the fief of the tribunes of the plebs, who held their meetings there.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru knew who the intruder was, but she was not about to admit that.

"You are?" she simply said, matching the woman's look of scorn with one of insouciance. It was partly effective: the other woman was obviously irked by the idea of introducing herself- prideful! -although she did not seem deterred by it either. The woman even swatted away her subordinate's attempt at performing the introduction for her, cutting short Otanara before he could so much as release the breath sucked in for the purpose.

"Alyssa, daughter to King Kruger of the Otomeians," the woman stated shortly, intent on driving back as soon as possible to the point of her visit. She had not covered several hundred kilometres in a week and ridden two horses to death (and another four near it) for nothing. "And you are Shizuru Fujino, General of the Himeans in their northern wars. I'm sure anyone in this camp can vouch for your identity, just as any Otomeian nearby can vouch for mine. I demand the Princess Natsuki."

Shizuru's eyebrow went up at this remarkable opening.

"You demand the Princess Natsuki," she echoed.

The other said nothing and looked, to Shizuru's amusement, very haughty and expectant. It was clear to Shizuru that she would have to puncture a very precious bubble here, and she was barely able to restrain a smile at the prospect.

"Princess Alyssa-if that is indeed who you are," she said in deliberately infuriating tones of patience. "You are not in a position to make demands."

It did not faze Alyssa. "I am if my demand concerns one of our people. So again, I demand Natsuki."

She said this with the sort of disdainful sneer that would have set Shizuru snapping a crushing retort usually. But the Himean was paying attention to Alyssa's eyes, which were at odds with the sneer. What she saw were watching eyes, cautious and solemn. They were eyes far too aware of Shizuru for the sneer to be believed. Suddenly Shizuru realised why they looked that way.

The Princess Alyssa, she decided, was running an experiment.

Her eyes need work: they do not clothe her interests entirely, she thought to herself. Still very intriguing, however: I wonder what she hopes to get out of this. It was that question that stayed the instinct to boot the woman out of the tent in as embarrassing a way as possible. Shizuru was still uncertain of the experiment's parameters and purpose, but she was certain of the woman's eyes measuring her in detail, grave and intelligent under the pose of frightful brashness. Oh, this princess was something! Something of an oddball going from the strangeness of her little game, but the eyes said she was also intelligent enough to be a far cry from the offspring of Obsidian and leagues above even her own Otomeian siblings-or the ones Shizuru had met during that brief stay in the Otomeian capital, at least. And she had such an appealing look about her: soldierly and sharp-looking, this Alyssa was a representative of the Otomeian race at its peak. Shizuru would have been pleased to tarry and play with her for a while had this been any other occasion, but this was not a time for games and Shizuru was at heart an impatient being. She would have to dicker with the Otomeian another time, when she felt like it.

"I have things to do, as does the Princess Natsuki," she sighed, sounding bored though far from feeling it. "You may return in the morning and we shall speak then."

"But I wish to speak to my cousin, not to you."

"And you may speak to your cousin in the morning, but for now you may leave."

She was turning her back when the woman retorted.

"I understand this is her tent," said the other blonde, showing that her Himean was as natural as her Greek. "If she wishes me to leave, she can tell me, but you may not."

Now that, Shizuru thought, was a surprise. One might say it was so in more ways than one, in fact, as fashioning a retort by returning a word that way was not Otomeian. It was not common in the linguistic practices of their people, at least not from what Shizuru had noticed, and it was most assuredly not something she had witnessed in any of the other Otomeians thus far.

Except in Natsuki.

Though her interest in Alyssa was increasing by the moment, her irritation was far stronger than her curiosity on this occasion: this should be the time for feeding Natsuki, the time for giving her a bath, the time for a few precious moments for only the two of them. Instead, it was becoming time spent on putting this royal interloper in her place. One step, then another, and Alyssa was only a metre away.

"You are being unwise and impertinent," Shizuru told the other blonde, her voice still level though her look was beginning to change. "It is not good to test my patience, Princess."

Alyssa's response was swift. "One may say the same of testing mine, Himean."

"Then remove yourself immediately, so that neither of us be tested to the limit."

"I will only remove myself after I've seen my cousin."

"I said in the morning."

"I say now."

" Again, in the morning."

"And again, that is unacceptable," Alyssa replied.

Otanara, forgotten in the background, emitted a groan at their hardening voices.

"She's my cousin, Shizuru Fujino," the Otomeian insisted, her eyes unmistakably blue even in the yellow light of the lamps. "The Princess Natsuki is of our people, not yours. I am more her superior than you are, and I deserve access to my subordinate if I demand it."

"I very much doubt that she is in any way subordinate to you . At any rate, you should know that your cousin is under my absolute command, as she was granted to me by your father."

"Not an absolute command, and my father lent her to you for a limited time. You are misunderstanding the loan as a donation."

"I misunderstand nothing. The terms are clear and make her mine."

"And you've done an outstanding job of being proprietor, I hear."

The jab found its mark, snapping one of the cords holding Shizuru's temper. Her opponent watched it go with interest, squaring her stance a little just in case the other took it into her head to get physical. Alyssa knew a red eye when she saw one, and Shizuru Fujino's were nothing if not that.

"What do you mean by that?" the woman growled at her.

"Exactly what I said," Alyssa responded.

"You overstep ."

"No more than you have, it seems."

Shizuru whipped to Otanara, trying to keep the beast collared and caged.

"If you value your princess, take her away," she said to the troubled observer, who was clearly wishing he was elsewhere in the world but here. "Now, before it is too late, man!"

But her turning towards him gave Alyssa the opening she needed. Before either Shizuru or Otanara could speak again, the woman had slipped past Shizuru and through the tent partitions, moving like an eel into the other area of the tent. But the anguine Himean was a match for the anguilline intruder: Alyssa had no more cleared the partitions than the Himean's hand was nearly at her collar, there with every intention of drawing her back and perhaps even with some of dashing her head to the ground. But Alyssa veered to the side just as the hand closed and so evaded seizure-and possibly even death-without knowing it.

"Princess Alyssa!" Otanara cried, relegated again to the role of unacknowledged bystander. It was testament to his bad fortune, he thought, that he was being made to witness a clash between two women who thoroughly frightened him, although he was loath to admit it aloud. Another thing he was loath to admit aloud was that he was more concerned for his commander than for the Himean. Otanara had seen enough of Alyssa in the past and of Shizuru Fujino of late to know who had the more barbaric temper. Although Alyssa was a daunting creature herself, she had a steady, fairly cool sort of anger. Shizuru Fujino, on the other hand, seemed capable of looking perfectly calm one moment and crushing your windpipe with her thumbs the next.

His worries for his commander propelled him after the Himean, and thus had him running straight into her back-an unexpectedly hard one given how slender it looked-when she stopped without warning.

He pulled backwards to see what had happened, babbling a hasty apology to the indifferent woman.

The Princess Alyssa had stopped as well, apparently. For her part, she was standing beside a bed, on which reposed the person she had been demanding to see. The grip of sleep was apparently so powerful on this third female that she had not even been jostled out of it by the commotion. The asymmetrical outline of her legs under the blanket brought to Otanara an automatic wince and an understanding of why the Himean and his own superior had stopped their escalating argument. To his mind, it would be unthinkable cruel to disturb that poor slumbering creature's only escape from this reality.

He murmured another apology and excused himself, fleeing the scene. He had seen enough, he knew, and could not be permitted to stay now that the drama had moved to this stage. His farewell to Alyssa left the two women staring at the third, neither of them concerned by Otanara's departure.

Shizuru eventually walked to the other side of the bed.

"Leave now," she whispered to Alyssa, whose face was surprisingly clinical as she studied her cousin's emaciated wreckage. "Leave now, Princess, and do not force my hand. Not here, not where she sleeps."

To her relief, Alyssa nodded.

"I shall leave now," she agreed. Then she added, "I shall take her with me."

That got Shizuru to drop her whisper: "You shall not!"

"Are you going to stop me from taking one of my own people under my wing?"

"She is in my charge and my camp. Technically, she is one of my people and under my wing."

A dark laugh from Alyssa. "A forced argument! She's mine, and you know it."

A darker laugh from Shizuru. "Try saying that again and see how long you keep breathing."

"I have the superior claim and I'm taking her if I want!"

"Not under my watch, you'll not!"

" Your watch saw this happen to her !"

" It was not my watch, and you know nothing of it !"

They had been edging towards the foot of the bed throughout the exchange, and were now nearly at the foot of the barrier, hissing at each other indignantly.

"I know more than you think," Alyssa snarled, tossing her blonde braids. "The Lupine Division, my nation's pride, has been reduced to a shell. Dozens of our most promising warriors were killed, some of whom I called cousins. The contingent I sent with Otanara has been halved, several thousands of my own men killed. This is the toll your war has taken on us! And now you add my cousin, a girl I have known since her childhood. Aah, do not say I know nothing, Shizuru Fujino, when I know all too well what you and your people have cost me !"

She slid forward almost to the mattress, one hand raised in a rhetorical claw and the other settling on her hip. She intended to launch another verbal attack before the Himean got over whatever was clamping her mouth shut, but was prevented from it when something flew at her. It nearly made contact with her side, but Alyssa had seen faster arrows: she deflected the projectile with a wrist and it bounced onto the sheets harmlessly.

The two opponents stared at the thing with similar befuddlement. The thing was an apple.

"Natsuki!"

It was Shizuru who said her name and drew towards her, but it was the other person in the room who held the girl's attention. The newly-awakened Natsuki goggled at her cousin, who gazed back with narrowed eyes.

"See what you have done!" Shizuru growled, supporting the shaking girl on the bed with an arm. Neither of the Otomeians responded to the provoked utterance, the elder of the two carefully dissecting the other's stricken face. It was clear to Alyssa that Natsuki had no more expected to find her here than the girl had expected to attack Alyssa in any way-even if only with an apple, and a weakly cast one at that. The attack baffled Alyssa as well, for it was not like the cousin she knew. Natsuki had never been prone to rebellion where her elders were concerned and she had never before gone against Alyssa in either word or gesture. And even besides that, who woke up and threw apples at people nearby, anyway? Had Otanara's fears been realised about the girl losing some of her senses from that head wound? Oh, it would be a shame! The girl had possessed such a mind; Alyssa remembered it.

The Himean's glare was murdering her again and Alyssa shifted her eyes that way in defence, intending to address the woman once more. The flicker of green eyes moving that way as well put an idea into her head, however, and she followed it to look down at her hip, to the hand resting on it and next to the hilt of her blade.

She looked at the wheezing Natsuki, pushing away the Himean from her scope of attention for the second time since Natsuki's awakening.

" Why this greeting, little cousin? " she asked in their language. " You cannot possibly have forgotten me? "

Both blondes saw it: the throbbing swallow that raised the girl's shoulders, forced her to jerk her neck to cope with the sudden tension. The adjustment went badly, however, and the gulp ramified into a hacking cough. One blonde reacted by holding the girl's back with a palm. The other blonde only watched with rising intrigue.

Now she knew Natsuki did remember her and had not lost logic. She saw it in the girl's eyes, the struggle to understand why Alyssa had come as well as the fear of being punished for her insolence. To Alyssa, it was like seeing the trembling, nervy urchin they had brought to Otomeia citadel all those years ago. Intelligent enough to pretend she was not afraid, yet endlessly calculating with her fear. Perhaps, Alyssa considered, that fearful waif had never really gone away.

" This is the woman I hear of, Natsuki? " she said, excluding Shizuru again through their language. The Himean reacted with a glare, whereas Natsuki winced. " She's interesting, I see it. See how she regards me. Like a wild animal, with such ferocity. "

She squinted at the wild animal and continued offhandedly, " But this does not change that she's a foreigner. I did not expect the Princess Natsuki to choose a foreigner, no matter how interesting said foreigner might be."

Shizuru's eyes were on Natsuki's face, trying to eke out a reflected translation of the words from there. And as she watched the sunken-cheeked face contract, she knew she did not like what Alyssa was saying.

" Still a naïf," Alyssa murmured, drawing back to tilt her head as she eyed the pair. " You cling to her like a pup to its mother. What is this?"

She ratcheted up the understanding expression on her face, knowing it was all that was keeping the curious Shizuru from silencing her.

" I know you've been ill and that troubles me, Natsuki, so I shall excuse this poor display," she said. " When I return on the morrow, though, I expect a better account of yourself and a better reception on the whole. But keep this in mind: I'll not forgive any more pathetic assaults, Last Princess of Ortygia."

To Alyssa's delight, that brought the cringe she had been aiming for. She was unable to continue with the rest of what should have been her lofty farewell, however, for their Himean spectator gave her a nasty surprise: Shizuru put a hand on a clear space of the bed and vaulted over it and Natsuki in one leap, coming down to stand on the other side. The movement was so swift that Alyssa reacted a little slower than she should have had Shizuru been after her life.

And stepping back as fast as she could from the menace suddenly at her side, Alyssa knew it.

Shizuru did not stalk the retreating woman.

"This is my camp, in case you have forgotten," she said, her voice the softest that Alyssa had heard it; the Otomeian made a note that this must be how Shizuru Fujino spoke when she was most hazardous, and marvelled at that peculiarity.

"I am supreme here, Princess Alyssa, yet you contravened my order. Further than that, you have had the deplorable manners to exclude me from a conversation in what is still my tent, even if it is your cousin's as well. I told you that you were being unwise. Apparently you were bent on demonstrating ignorance as well."

It seemed that even Alyssa's dazed cousin knew that tone bore minding. She had already transferred her attention to Shizuru, looking even more afraid than ever before in Alyssa's estimation. Another note in her mind: Shizuru Fujino terrified her cousin.

"Your cousin is in my care," Shizuru explained gently enough, but in a way that perceptibly dropped the temperature of the air. "In an absolute way. You have obviously not been taken into your father's confidence in this matter, else you would know that he gave her to me upon my request before I left for my sojourn to Hime. I have his letters confirming this, but I do not much feel like digging them out just for your sake, so you shall have to take my word for it until you see your father again."

Alyssa blinked, surprised by that unexpected titbit: her father had given away Natsuki? Some of the astonishment must have shown on her face, because Shizuru pressed in for the kill.

"I do not care from what line you hail or what species of noble you are," the woman said. "You could be descended from blessed Jupiter himself and I would still shove a sponge stick in your mouth and stuff you in the latrines. I hesitate now only because of this girl beside me, who may be grieved if I disgrace you before her. The hesitation does not mean I have no limit. So let us make something clear before you touch the frontier: as long as you are in my camp, you do what I say. If I tell you to leave a tent, no matter which tent it may be, you leave it."

The wheezing from the girl watching them was even more noticeable now.

"Princess Alyssa," Shizuru purred. " Leave this tent. "

Alyssa studied the threat being presented and found it formidable.

She softened her approach faster than even Shizuru had expected, "Can I not speak to my cousin first?"

The other woman lifted an eyebrow.

"You already have," she said evenly.

"Those were only greetings."

"You have more to say?"

"Yes."

"Good. Keep it to yourself."

The woman certainly bore watching. Alyssa squared her shoulders and spared no time deciding to walk away, especially as she had already been on the verge of doing it earlier. She nodded to the Himean without losing her composure and turned a calmer look to Natsuki than before.

"I shall return in the morning, two hours past dawn at the latest," she declared, her language now the more inclusive Himean. "I shall speak to you then, Natsuki, so expect me."

And having said this, she turned and started to walk away, followed closely by Shizuru's gaze. But she had a final line that was only for the girl's understanding, which she delivered rather snidely in her exit.

"By the way, if the woman needs a cripple to be protected from me, what does that say of her, cousin?"

Alyssa walked out of the tent without waiting to see how that remark might be received by her breathless relative. She held absolutely no defeat in her face when she came out and met Otanara, who had waited for her. He was with the troopers she had ordered aside from the entrance earlier, and all three bowed when she emerged.

She returned the salutes with a nod.

"I require lodgings," she said simply.

"Please take mine," Otanara offered.

They left and took the via decumana out of the Himean camp, going into its auxiliary appendage. Because there were so many auxiliaries, they had been given a large, floating camp next to the already-large Himean encampment, to avoid choking the main site. There the pair retired to Otanara's quarters and sent away all who had come to see the new arrival and give her greetings.

Alyssa dealt with her visitors with characteristic shortness.

"Tomorrow afternoon," she told them.

Once these had gone, her attention moved to the people setting a table for their dinner.

"Get out," she said.

Soon there was only Otanara left, and she moved to the meal that was only half-set, positioning herself on the heavy rugs and motioning to Otanara to do the same. She picked up a hunk of bread, drew up some roast meat, and got started on her meal.

Otanara understood. He commenced his account, filling in the gaps in the missives he had been sending to her. Alyssa was content to eat as he talked, neither interrupting to ask for clarifications nor acknowledging his actual retelling in any way. Only once he was done did she talk, and what she did say was so ridiculously inconsequential that he had to pour himself some mead to wash down the disappointment.

"Shizuru Fujino is tall," she told him.

Otanara gulped down his drink.

"I don't like her eyes," she went on with a tiny squint. "They were right in calling them red-I thought they might be a dark pink-but hers were red through and through. Uncanny."

He agreed.

"Still, I can see how the rest might appeal to Natsuki. Descended from gods, was it?"

"From Ares as well as Aphrodite," he replied, only to be given a disapproving scowl.

"Mars, not Ares, and Venus, not Aphrodite," she corrected. "Believe it or not, I did listen to my pedagogues when they were teaching me about Himeans, Otanara. The Greek gods are not the Himean ones, even if they are in some ways alike."

She narrowed her blue eyes at his somewhat greyer ones.

"Foreigners they might be, but that's no excuse to be ignorant of their ways. It makes us vulnerable, ignorance."

He apologised for his lack of learning. Having successfully chastised him, she returned to her earlier statement.

"Descended from gods of war and love, then. An ambitious claim, eh?" she said.

"Their people seem to believe it," he shrugged, inwardly admitting he did too.

"They would: it shows convincingly. The woman has a face, doesn't she?" Her own face betrayed her interest. "Though that one's goods obviously go deeper than the display shelf."

The other was quick to agree-although not too quick, to be safe.

"She's a good general," he said.

"And a good fighter, obviously," she said, remembering the woman's wonderful physique. There had been no hiding the athleticism of the figure under that soldier's tunic, or the strong and long arms under the short sleeves. There had also been that leap over the bed. While Alyssa had expected the Himean to be swift, the lightness with which the woman had done that feat earlier had been better suited to someone more gracile and smaller of build. Someone like Alyssa's cousin, for example, who always reminded Alyssa of a sapling of the tree they called tcheret in Egypt.

"She was very proprietary about my cousin, that woman," she ruminated, wondering why indeed her father had withheld what Shizuru said he had withheld. She sighed aloud, more puzzled than irritated: answers were already being produced and weighed in her head, and they occupied her too much to permit annoyance. "She was even more proprietary than I expected, and apparently with reason, if what she said holds true."

"What did she say?"

"I shall make sure of it before I tell anyone. Although I doubt she was bluffing. Not the type to bluff, is she?"

Otanara thought to what he had heard and seen of the woman in question, as well as his brief glimpse of the Mentulaean prince whose jaw she had nearly torn off.

"No, I think she's not," he said decidedly.

"The two of them stay in that tent?"

"Yes."

"Since when?"

"Ever since we recovered Natsuki."

"And has she touched my cousin since then?"

His discomfort was plain at the suggestive enquiry.

"Touched...?" he started, only to receive a glare that could have curdled milk.

"I'm asking, you numbskull, if Shizuru Fujino has bedded the Princess Natsuki since they began living in the same tent again." She lifted her brows wryly. "Or were you so stupid as to forget to ask Natsuki's slaves about that?"

Otanara was embarrassed.

"No, I did ask," he admitted. "And they said she hadn't, to the best of their knowledge."

"To the best of their knowledge."

"They are not always in the tent. There are nights when Shizuru Fujino sends them to sleep elsewhere."

"Convenient for the lovers. But the slaves return in the morning."

"Yes, to care for her while Shizuru Fujino goes about her duties."

"Then they should have checked the sheets," Alyssa said, ignoring the furious colour that came to Otanara's cheeks at the suggestion. "If they assist that way, I assume they bathe her too. They should be able to test the scent of her thighs as well when they give her a bath."

He shuffled as much as anyone sitting on a rug could shuffle. She watched him, a vague sheen of amusement in her often sombre gaze.

"But the Princess Natsuki-" he tried to argue.

"Is in a foreign woman's tent," she finished for him. "She's at the perfect age where she should be in an Otomeian bed already-mine, as was the idea-but instead she's with someone not of our people. After that little indignity, I think she can bear a minor inspection of her parts every now and then, just to see if she's still being used for lewd satisfactions even in her current state. I do care for my cousin's health, you know."

He nodded mutely, knowing her concern was with keeping the other princess's strength up as much as possible. While it was an old school of thought that said people were drained of even their healing powers by sex, Alyssa was the type of person who preferred to hedge her bets when it came to beliefs. He knew that, of course: why else did he remember to ask the slaves about it?

He knew too that she was still displeased with him. She had told him to see to Natsuki and Natsuki had been-horrible word- crippled . An awful outcome and a huge failure. She was only biding her time before making him pay and Otanara knew there was no chance of coming out of it scot-free. The price might be tomorrow, it might be years from now: either way, she was merely being patient. At least this gave him time to start making amends and soften the blow before it came.

"Shizuru Fujino leaves to conduct her business in her command tent every day, about two hours past dawn," he informed her, eager to show his worth even if only in the smallest details. "But she returns regularly to Natsuki's tent every hour or so."

"Shizuru Fujino has her own tent?"

"Yes, but she rarely spends time in it. I hear she hasn't even slept in it at least once."

She nodded and asked him to pass the water jug.

"Show me to that tent tomorrow," she told him.

"Why?"

"Because she will move back into it as soon as possible-tonight, I think," she said.

He regarded her with confusion.

"How do you know she will do that?" he asked.

"Because I would."

He nodded, not quite comprehending but wise enough to pretend he did.

"How are the men since your last report?" she asked suddenly after finishing her drink.

"In better spirits, I think."

"The horse?"

"Down, but sufficient for the troopers remaining." He hesitated but continued. "Also, Shizuru Fujino sent to the citadel for more steeds.

She's also requisitioning more of our horses for the Himean officers, I hear-for a good price, naturally."

"Naturally," said Alyssa with mild mockery. "Were this a logical world, though, she would pay as well for the horses that are going to be replacing our men's lost steeds, considering they were lost in a battle under her people's command."

Otanara qualified this carefully. "It was the other one who commanded it, though."

"The Masashi one, was it? Still, it was a Himean command, and chiefly Himean responsibility." She saw a covered basket yet untouched on the table and lifted the cloth covering it. A laugh came from her as she saw the contents. "It seems little Natsuki cast that apple far enough to strike after all!"

Her companion was confused, but she had no intention of clarifying the matter for him. She picked an apple from the lot and fiddled with her belt, retrieving a small knife. The crisp sound of a chip of fruit being shaved was followed by an offer of the piece to Otanara, who took it with a nod of gratitude.

"So, then..." she started, already shaving off another chip for herself. "I shan't impose on you long, Otanara."

"You're going already? When?"

"Let me finish."

"Pardon me."

"It's because you're going to be imposing on me ."

His face crinkled. "What do you mean?"

"I only have a little time to spend here. I'm leaving again in two days and you're coming with me-all of you left and some of the other divisions the Himeans have with them." She flicked a small chip of apple into her mouth and murmured around it. "It depends on how the talk goes tomorrow. I want as many as I can get."

His eyebrows went up. "For where? You mean, for the boundaries?"

"Where else?"

If possible, his eyebrows crested even higher. She had just spent a full week of riding from that area, apparently killed several horses from fatigue, and even sacrificed some portion of her sleeping hours to shorten the journey. Her only accompaniment had been another warrior who had promptly taken a bath and collapsed into a cot after she had dismissed him. Now she wanted to cover that distance again just two days after finally seeing rest, with him and his part of her army for companionship? Sometimes, his commander seemed bent on giving him a string of surprises shot one after the other.

As if her sudden arrival wasn't surprise enough today, he thought dryly.

"I need you to do a cull of the able-bodied tomorrow," she told him, "and to get the men ready for the journey. We need to get back as soon as possible, even if I did leave the border patrols with Miyu."

Otanara had not expected her choice of replacement commander to be otherwise. Alyssa's usual second-in-command and constant companion, Miyu, was a skilful warrior and a capable general. She was also noble, a baroness thrice removed from the Kruger line and someone who had more or less grown up with the current Kruger brood, ensuring her sophistication as well as exposure to the ways of the high aristocracy.

And she happened to frighten him even more than Alyssa did.

But perhaps fear was not the right word, he said to himself, thinking more deeply on it. What one felt with Miyu was the cold creep of hairy-footed discomfort, not the gut-emptying clench true fear brought with it. Alyssa's colourless right hand-Miyu was an albino-was very much like one of Hephaestus' automata, but designed for service to Alyssa instead of work for the forge. It was the dedication of that design that made you feel uncomfortable with her, as though confronted by something less human and more mechanical in nature.

"How is the situation at the rivers?" he asked. "Have you had any more battles with the enemy?"

"The Mentulae are slow to act," she said nonchalantly. "So only two more since the last missive I sent."

"All told, only three encounters," he summed up. "Not a lot."

"Tags to the first groups too, not new armies. It seems the Mentulae don't expect regular updates from their armies. Not regular enough, anyway. Otherwise, they would have known the fate of their other armies ages ago. Only one of the groups we encountered was dedicated to finding information about those-and far too late for them to act and regain advantage."

"Which one was it, the scouting group?"

"Two were supply trains, the third a small reconnaissance unit."

No need to ask what had happened: he knew Alyssa. Instead, he moved on to another detail.

"So you need to get more forces before they catch on to the reason their investigative party's not coming back too."

She hummed in agreement.

"The Himeans said they sent reinforcements for the southern borders," he said. "Did you meet them?"

"The legions called the Fifth, the Sixth, the Fifteenth, the Sixteenth," she recited from memory, looking puzzled for some reason. She frowned and turned a questioning look to him. "It's such a logical way of naming their army divisions. First, second, third, fourth, all the way to gods know what figure. What do you think of it?"

He measured that carefully in his head.

"It's logical, as you say," he said. "But not very impressive. And just because a legion's called the first one apparently doesn't make it better than the others, they said."

She chuckled and he reflected, not for the first instance, that good humour actually made her very good-looking. It was a pity she was not very given to it, being that her natural state was that of sobriety.

"The borders are getting longer," she said, making an abrupt return to their original topic. "The inundations of spring have been receding all summer and now that autumn is setting in, more areas of the rivers have become fordable. We need every able body if we're to continue to purchase time for the conscriptions-both ours and theirs."

He nodded fervently. "Ten thousand foot and two thousand horse can't be enough, even with the Himeans doing their share."

"Exactly."

They continued to eat in silence, brooding on the topic. For a while there was only the sound of munching and of Alyssa's knife cutting into the apple. Otanara broke the monotony with a sound of surprise.

"Yes?" she said to him, a little annoyed: she had been enjoying the silence.

"If you planned to go to back to patrolling the borders immediately," he observed, "you didn't intend to get Natsuki from Shizuru Fujino after all?"

Alyssa shot him a look that said he was being stupid.

"Why would I intend that?" she said.

He frowned. "But you told her-"

"You should watch that habit of eavesdropping, Otanara... at least, around me. I don't care if you listen in on other people," she told him, instigating a profuse apology that she cut short because she hated profuse apologies: there were better ways of making up for mistakes, after all. "Yes, I did tell Shizuru Fujino that. But I only wanted to see what the woman would do. Would she let me have Natsuki or try to keep her?"

He was astounded by her strange notions. Why take that for a trial in the first place?

"So," he said, "what would you have done if she had yielded the princess?"

But she turned and only picked at her dusty-looking sleeves with a sigh on her face.

"Have your slaves bring me bathwater," she told him, brazenly deviating from the topic. "I can still smell those dead horses. It must have added to the fright for her, poor Natsuki."

---

She was right. Even if the indefinable scent of dead horses had not been among the bigger sources of anxiety for Natsuki, the girl's sensitivity to such things left her feeling sapped by the odours of decay-which she had only barely escaped with her life recently, herself. When Alyssa had departed from the tent, Shizuru had found the girl collapsed again on the sheets, looking as though she could barely hold her spine straight. Her eyes dragged up as Shizuru came near and the older woman saw the drain the confrontation had taken as well as the confusion over what had been said, and her concern for the girl had been so great she actually missed to note the crucial development: that Natsuki was looking at her.

"Forgive the commotion, Natsuki," the older woman said, bending to the dark-haired girl and helping her to a less crumpled position. She held her by the tender skin of her armpits and lifted the sagging body that way. Natsuki mewled, and she apologised again.

"I am sorry-did it hurt?" Shizuru asked worriedly. "I really should have stopped her before she got this far. That was thoughtless of me. I am so sorry."

She drew back to make sure Natsuki was perfectly arranged, and then hurried to fetch some of the calda the slaves had originally brought for Natsuki's meal. She tested the drink's heat first and found it acceptable.

"Here, drink this," she said, seating herself beside the Otomeian. Natsuki was still so stunned by what had transpired, she noted, that the girl did not hesitate to open her mouth, cooperating faster than usual. "It should help. I know it was a shock to see your cousin."

Shizuru let her have three sips of the drink and asked if that was enough. The slightest of nods said it was, so the older woman put away the cup, chest caving in with the realisation-finally, how could she have missed it?-that she was interacting with Natsuki. Even if the girl had not spoken a word, she had finally responded to Shizuru's own, which was far more than she had done the past week. It probably spoke to the Himean's contentment with this minor feat that the breath left her when Natsuki began to speak.

"Guh-guh-"

Shizuru tried to remember how to breathe as the girl wrestled with her tongue.

"Guh-" Whatever Natsuki was saying seemed to defeat her. "Ngh-guh-"

The older woman waited nervously.

"Guh-guh-guh-gave?"

Her voice was rougher than Shizuru remembered, but of course it would be. It was from lack of use and the same was probably the reason for the vicious stutter as well. Natsuki's old stubbornness apparently never rusted away, though: the girl hissed from the labour but insisted again on what she wanted to say, gritting her teeth between syllables as she worked through her impediment.

"Tuh-uh-tuh-tuh!"

Shizuru could not take any more. Much as she wanted to hear Natsuki speak, the Otomeian's breathing was starting to hitch and Shizuru feared the effort would soon see her choking. Besides, she could see the green eyes taking on a wet sheen and she knew the girl was near tears from frustration. Understandable. Even in the early days of their companionship, Natsuki had never suffered an attack of her impediment this violently, and that gave Shizuru some concern as well.

Shizuru put a hand on one clenched fist, trying to show that she understood it already.

"Yes," she said to the bewildered young woman. "Yes, King Kruger gave you to me."

Natsuki looked as though her head had just reeled, and Shizuru sat down on the bed quickly so Natsuki would not have to tilt her chin up to make their eyes meet.

"I asked for you," she revealed, tightening her grip on the girl's fist. "Months past, even before I left, I asked him if I could have you as my... my companion, exclusively. What I told your cousin was true."

Shizuru persevered to explain, anxious and frightened herself as the girl looked devastated by this. This was most certainly not how she had imagined revealing this to Natsuki. Still, now that it was here, she could do little but have it out as soon as possible, given the complications the Princess Alyssa was threatening to present. Now that she thought on it, exactly what threats was the Princess Alyssa presenting? Did she want Natsuki for herself? Shizuru had not detected the faintest trace of jilted amours early, but had certainly detected a possessive streak in the other princess's display. Oh, she would have to find out what that character wanted and quickly!

"I did not purchase you or anything of that sort, Natsuki," she hastened to say to the girl. "Let us make that clear. I would never belittle you that way, and I very much doubt King Kruger would have allowed you to be exchange for coin. He did not sell you to me, so do not worry about that."

She was lying. She knew the king had more or less sold Natsuki to her already, even if not with coin. Her statement was true, then, only by virtue of that technicality. The ruler of the Otomeians had agreed to Shizuru's request only because he saw the benefits of keeping someone like her happy. It worked out for him and for the alliance with Hime, and it worked out for the Himean he was seeking to please. Shizuru could not be angered by it, obviously, for she was one of the beneficiaries of the agreement. She was also a politician who understood the way things worked in the world, a politician who understood this way well enough to make it work for her own aims. Still, she did not know how Natsuki might react to such a view of the matter, and she preferred not to find out at the moment.

"Natsuki," she said gently, only just refraining from appending the possessive pronoun to it. "Natsuki, what do you think?"

Natsuki said nothing, eyes wide and mouth agape. She breathed through it, and Shizuru saw that what the girl thought had uncertainty and conflict.

"I had hoped you would not be opposed to it," she said calmly, for all that her heart was sinking. She was reluctant to leave it there, but she knew she had something else to do and little time to do it: dark was setting and she could feel the drop of temperature even where they were.

She got to her feet with a squeeze of the girl's hand.

"Please wait for me a moment," she requested. "I shall return presently, I promise. I only need to see to something."

She held the green eyes until she saw a flicker that told her Natsuki agreed, a part of her again inwardly rejoicing at this tiny measure of communication. She left the girl and went outside to see the Lupine troopers on duty. They ducked their heads at her appearance. Both were clearly embarrassed for having let Alyssa through earlier, although Shizuru knew they had had little choice but to do it, given who the woman was to them and their nation.

She still frowned while addressing them.

"You should have kept her out, as I ordered," she said. "I understand that you were caught in the cleft stick because of her identity. Even so, I fear this cannot serve. In this camp, my word is law. And that goes for all soldiers here, whether Himean or auxiliary."

The slaves had returned, accompanied by some porters to help with the heated bathwater Shizuru had requested. Her steward was in the train, and Shizuru raised a hand indicating that they should wait where they were.

"We are going to move," she said to the troopers. "Though I shall honour the agreement to have some of you as additional guardsmen for the princess's sake if you insist on it, I am going to have my own guards posted as well from now on, as we are moving into my tent to prevent disturbances like this from repeating. Should you seek out Otanara-han or whoever is in charge of you to see what you wish to do?"

They exchanged quick looks with each other and then nodded. She dismissed them.

"Hermias, I am moving back into my proper tent," she repeated for her steward, who sidled up once the Otomeians padded off. He was holding a bowl of what appeared to be water and an immersed vegetable—a cucumber, she saw—in his hands. She peered at the odd offering, diverted for a second as she said dryly, "And I know I said I wanted something simple for dinner, but you do not have to be sarcastic about it."

His smooth-shaven face broke out into a smile.

"Domina, it is for your eyes," he said.

"My eyes are fine. I can see it, can I not?" she sighed. "Oversee the transfer. I want it done within the hour and without too much noise. Where is Aella, by the way?"

"Here, Domina," said the woman, who had been overseeing the procession of slaves carrying the bathwater.

"Assist Hermias and have that water brought to my tent. How hot is it?"

"Scalding, Domina."

"Pour it into the tub once you get there."

Aella immediately started directing the servants to the new destination. The rest followed Shizuru into the tent she was vacating, Hermias already sending for more burly slaves to carry the heavier items. As for their mistress, she went straight to the sleeping area of the tent, her eyes meeting restless green ones discomfited by the burst of activity behind the partitions.

Shizuru bent over to the girl and explained what was happening.

"Pardon the noise, Natsuki, but we have to do a lot of work. We are transferring tonight to my tent."

Natsuki continued to look bewildered, clearly shocked by the series of upheavals being thrown at her so suddenly.

"We cannot have any more incidents like this, meum mel," Shizuru continued, the hypocorism slipping out again for the first time in a week: she had found herself unable to say it during Natsuki's bout of self-isolation, as though afraid of it being yet another disturbance to the girl. Now that Natsuki was meeting her eyes, she felt she could say it once more, even if she did still feel the slightest twinge of fear that Natsuki would reject the old endearments. How she hated that fear!

"This cannot do, darling," she said, insisting on yet another endearment to spite the uncertainty that made them stick. "It is not proper that anyone should be capable of getting into the place where we sleep without our permission. I do not want people able to barge in at all times, as the Princess Alyssa did just now."

The name sent a fine shiver through her companion. She looked like someone bracing herself for a slap, and Shizuru wondered exactly what Alyssa had said earlier to bring Natsuki to this pass. At least it had woken Natsuki from her stupor, she thought, but if the effect extended to this sort of timid apprehension, she could not see it as too much of an advantage: she hated seeing Natsuki this way almost as much as she hated seeing the girl lost in herself.

"It's all right," she hushed, reaching for her tentatively, wondering if the girl would push her away. Natsuki had never done so and demonstrated that she was not about to do it now, so Shizuru very carefully closed the embrace, mindful of the birdlike ribcage heaving against her body. "Do not think about it, Natsuki. Whatever she told you, do not think about it."

Her steward's voice in the next room reminded her of what she had to do, and she drew back reluctantly.

"I have to carry you now, Natsuki," she told the Otomeian. "The sooner we do this, the sooner you can rest and I can explain matters better."

She drew away the blanket and prepared to lift her. She stopped when she saw Natsuki shrinking as though she had been molested, limbs folding inwards and body bending. That was when she remembered that this was going to be Natsuki's first time out of the tent since her recovery. Already the girl was trying to curl up her legs and hide her stump under her shift. The sight tore at Shizuru, who was unable to restrain the flare of pain on her own face.

Swiftly inventing a solution, the Himean took the blanket from the bed and folded it over and around the girl. The long drape of the sheet fell far past the girl's legs, and Shizuru essayed a soft smile while folding the last edge over the girl's side.

"It is cold outside," she said in the most cheerful tone she could manage while concealing her lover's crippled body from the world. "I know you like autumn, but I do not want you catching a cold from the chill. You were still feverish only a week ago and I am not chancing anything." She sent the girl what she hoped was a teasing glance. "And as I said before, you always needed a little more fat on you to keep you warm."

Natsuki only regarded her swaddled form with an unreadable expression.

"My apologies for this if it hurts, but I shall try to be gentle," Shizuru said once finished. "I must walk quickly, however, because it is cold outside."

She slid one arm under Natsuki's knees and another behind her back, not even needing to brace herself for this cargo. The hiss of breath was on her neck, and she whispered another apology into the black hair.

The relocation was brief. Hermias and Aella supervised the transport of the furniture and gear while Shizuru unloaded Natsuki carefully into her bed. She found something comforting in the idea of again having Natsuki in her bed. It had been so long since she had ensconced Natsuki in a mattress that both of them would share, as she fully intended with this one: it was large enough for two people, after all, unlike the other bed in the other tent, and very thickly padded.

While ensuring that the girl's back was bolstered properly by several fat pillows, Shizuru was struck by a tiny detail that she had not thought to see to before.

It has been an age since I saw her draped in a purple sheet, she thought while pulling up the new bedspread of Tyrian purple over Natsuki's waist. How right she looks in it! I had nearly forgotten, and that was remiss of me. From now on I shall use only Tyrian purple for the sheets-despite all else she is still a princess.

"Domina."

It was Hermias. Shizuru looked away from the royally-draped Natsuki and saw that the servants were just about finished. She had been fussing over Natsuki's comfort for so long that the time had slipped past without her noticing it.

"We have brought the food too, but it has cooled," her steward asked. "Would you permit us to reheat it?"

Shizuru nodded.

"But clear the tent already and just send it in once you have heated it," she said, allowing some tiredness to come through in her tone. "I would like some privacy."

She glanced around and caught sight of several blonde heads, most of which belonged to people arranging Natsuki's effects.

"And the Otomeians, Hermias," Shizuru said. "The Otomeian slaves here are Natsuki's. They have been serving me. Take charge of them, please. Assure them they shall still be permitted to serve their mistress as usual."

"Of course, Domina."

"Now send these away and see to the food. The bathwater should be nearly at the perfect temperature now and I want some peace."

"As you wish it, Domina."

Once the tent had been emptied of other presences, Shizuru wasted no time getting to her purpose-which was not actually to bathe the girl as she had implied to Hermias. Rather, she wanted to talk to Natsuki.

She asked the girl first, very cautiously, if she wished to see the letters that had been mentioned to Alyssa. Natsuki declined with a shake of her head and proceeded to look bewildered again at the reminder that she had been "given away". Shizuru responded by drawing up a stool to the side of the bed, leaning forward and putting her weight on her elbows, which she settled casually on her knees. Not a pose she was prone to making in public, but this was Natsuki with her: she would have gone to her knees easily just to make the girl feel comfortable.

"Are you angry with me?" she asked. "For doing that behind your back?"

The girl looked torn on what the answer should be. Shizuru tried to steer her to the preferable response by explaining again.

"I only wanted to be sure," she said. "I wanted to know... that there would be no hindrance when I returned." She paused and reminded her, "I told you I would return, Natsuki."

Natsuki continued to look at her with a lost expression.

"I also got you the Himean citizenship," Shizuru proceeded, prompting the girl to replace the lost expression with one of shock. Well, she had expected as much for that particular piece of news, truth be told.

"The papers are drawn up and I only need to send them to the keepers of the census," the older woman said. "I wanted to tell you that in better circumstances. And I wanted it to be a gift."

She trailed off at the sight of Natsuki's horrified face.

"Why does this displease you?" she asked, immeasurably hurt. Even now, she reflected, Natsuki still confounded her: the girl issued conflicting suggestions, one moment automatically striking a cousin under the misunderstanding that the woman posed a threat to her—an explanation Shizuru came upon at about the same time as Alyssa—and the other moment rejecting her most significant move towards securing their future together. Sometimes it tempted her to consider that there was indeed a fevered brain in the girl's lovely skull.

"You do not welcome this as I had thought you would," she continued, even as Natsuki tried to school her face. "Perhaps we should not talk about it now. I admit it is too much to take, all at one moment. I am sorry for introducing it at such a worrisome time."

The Otomeian looked conflicted but still shook her head slowly. And then she asked—as well as one with her speech impediment and agitation could ask—what the agreement Shizuru had made with the king meant for her. Shizuru realised this was central to whatever was troubling the girl about the matter, so she considered the query with care, wondering how best to phrase the response.

"At it simplest, it means that you cannot be promised by him to anyone else," she eventually decided, going the more delicate route. "I admit my foremost thought was that when first I asked him for it. Well, I am a selfish wretch after all. I fear I have not improved my skills at sharing in the time we have been apart."

The faintest of glints passed through Natsuki's eyes: to Shizuru, it looked like remembrance. She kept talking, afraid to let their interaction lull else it never start up again.

"Still, I see it is a good thing that I extracted the promise, going from what I saw of your cousin."

She saw the feeble protest in Natsuki's face and shook her head.

"Pardon my tongue. I did not intend to grieve you by saying that," she said, shaking her head again and frowning at herself: it would be thoughtless of her to suddenly revert to how they had been before, with Natsuki being the person made to suffer the complaints she hid from all the world. She should not be putting this on the girl, not when Natsuki had so many things deserving complaint as well.

"Never mind what I said," she dismissed. She sat up straight and tried to save her regard of Alyssa for the girl's sake. "Besides, I am not saying I dislike her. I did not like what she did, but I am not the sort of person who would base my full opinion on someone on one encounter alone, unless the encounter were of a more powerful, lasting kind than what transpired just now."

She remembered something and mentioned it.

"She was just as Suou described-at least, based on what she said to be her expectations of the woman in the letters she left. Your description of her must have been true. Your cousin is headstrong, I suppose, and more than a little arrogant... but that is not sufficient to condemn her in my eyes. Truth be told, my first impression of her is of a fascinating woman."

She withheld a wry smile as she realised she actually meant that. She could not feel a durable dislike in remembering Alyssa, even despite the egregious offence the woman had tendered. Perhaps it was because Shizuru still felt that the woman had merely been testing her-for the most part-with that wilful display earlier. Perhaps it might even be because she felt the draw of someone who, in some of the essential respects at least, was like unto her. The must of horse dung and sweat had not had the power to take away Alyssa's sense of puissance and intellect, and Shizuru, whose greatest frustration in life was the lack of strong and intelligent fellows, could not help but want to reach out to those traits whenever she found them-even if they did happen to be in headstrong foreigners who were clearly not thrilled about her being with their cousin.

She looked up at Natsuki, only to have her breath snag: while she had been expecting a livelier pair of green eyes than usual, what she saw definitely exceeded her expectations. This was most certainly not the Natsuki of last week, whose eyes had been but garnitures to an empty box. For a moment she had difficulty deciphering the expression in the large eyes, even, because of its very effulgence, the unrefined nakedness of the feeling fuelling its radiance.

"Ssh-" the girl hissed, labouring even as her eyes filled. "Sssuou?"

As before, Shizuru froze. It was not the speech alone this time, however: it was Natsuki's eyes doing something she had never really seen them do before, the hiccupping gasps she now realised to be a part of the way Natsuki cried. And it was the name of someone she had not mentioned to the girl all this time, not necessarily hiding that person's fate but shelving it away and out of sight.

"Suou?" Natsuki repeated, pushing out the name with a sob. "Suou left - she left letters?"

Ah yes, she does not know, Shizuru thought, still engrossed in this new face the girl was showing her. But now she does, and she knew it from those few words I let slip. Did Suou tell her those letters were to be given to me only if she died, then? It would seem so. She has not cried for herself ever since discovering her amputation yet the idea of Suou being dead moves her to this sort of heartbroken lament. She loved her, then. Well, I loved her too. I did not speak of her death only because it was not the sort of thing any sane person could have done: why tell someone already dealing with so much loss about another one?

There was something tugging at her tunic. Shizuru realised that the girl had reached for her chest and balled up a clump of the fabric with her hand.

"Shizuru," she wrenched out, finally saying her name again though Shizuru could not appreciate it at the moment. "Shizuru. Suou is-is-is she?"

But Shizuru only responded with a sad look, knowing the girl could read the answer in that very easily.

---

And over a month had passed since then. A month in which she had had to console Natsuki even while dealing with her own grief in silence, unable to unburden herself to the people she had expected to be her confidantes because one was suffering too much to be burdened any further and the other was dead. It was a bitter way to start a campaign, and she had never experienced a start quite like it. While it had not the power to stump her-Shizuru was a creature of adversity, in her own way-it did make for a less enjoyable experience. Still, she was conscious of her consolations and knew to be grateful for them. She was grateful, above all, that Natsuki was with her again, especially since the girl was no longer ignoring people around her.

It started from Alyssa's unexpected visit. Shizuru supposed it was the series of shocks that had cracked Natsuki's shell. The girl had been so devastated by the revelations that night-that of Suou's death more than anything-that she had spent the whole of the evening in Shizuru's arms, sobbing as though the news of Suou's demise would be the end of her as well. After that the prospect of meeting Alyssa in the morning had not seemed too grave a prospect. Indeed, when the time for meeting came, the other princess had behaved herself in a surprisingly different fashion from that of the previous evening.

The Alyssa that Shizuru saw after the first night was cool but also less abrasive, always clear on what she wanted and how to justify it. She had also been surprisingly forthcoming about her reasons for trying Shizuru the previous night, and delivered her opinion about the other woman's liaison with Natsuki in like fashion.

"I don't expect you to excuse my conduct, but you cannot expect me to excuse your affair with Natsuki either," she had told Shizuru flatly. "I can live with it, nevertheless, which is what I recommend you do too with what I did. I intended to marry Natsuki myself, which is the reason I'm irked by your arrangement with her and my father. That aside, it seems I cannot do anything about it for the moment. The least I can do then is ensure that she is going to someone who gives her the regard due to her station: I cannot let someone like my cousin be 'given away' to someone who would treat her like an inconsequential plaything. And in your favour, I begin to see why-aside from the political reasons, naturally-my father let you have her for now. Of course, once you do let go of her, I shall be marrying her anyway."

"You mean 'if'," Shizuru had replied, not entirely sure what to make of such stunning bluntness. "And that is an 'if' that lies completely in the realm of pure hypothesis."

"If you say so," had been the dry retort. "I would just like you to understand something, Shizuru Fujino. You are a foreigner, so you don't understand some of our ways. Natsuki is not an obliging person either when the point touches on her, so I'm the one who must inform you of this."

"And 'this' would be?"

"I was about to get to it. Physical prowess and skill in warfare are among our most prized traits, which is why you people come to us for warriors for your armies. But among us, if a person is not strong enough to be a warrior, he must at least be a great mind and leader of the community. The chief way of measuring this is in a person's performance in court or council. I think your Senate works much the same for you senators, not so?"

"To some extent."

"My cousin was a great warrior," Alyssa continued. "And she has always had a great mind, one of the best I've ever seen. But our people don't count it as they should because Natsuki has a problem with her tongue and cannot speak properly. The measure does not favour her, which is unfortunate but a fact. Our ancestors were people of the oral traditions: even now the oral delivery is privileged by many of us. It's another reason people tended to shy away from Natsuki when she was younger-she was always too fond of books and most could not understand her fascination with the written word. So now I ask you, do you understand what I'm saying?"

"Yes."

"I thought you would. Let's leave it at that."

And they had left it at that. Alyssa had then gone on to explain the situation at the boundaries and used that to lead up to a very reasonable request for some of the Otomeians at Sosia to stiffen her forces. Shizuru let the Otomeian princess have all twelve thousand of the Otomeian foot and kept for herself only the cavalry, trusting her instincts about the other woman. Her faith would be justified later in the winter, after Alyssa would send news that she had already taken over several of the easternmost Mentulaeen towns. The area was an important location because the area surrounding it was fertile from the inundations of the rivers Atinu and Holmys, making it a precious source of crops and grain.

Shizuru ventured out to the ruins of Argentum shortly after Alyssa left with the auxiliary infantry. She was accompanied only by a squadron of troopers. Her purpose was simple: to see the extent of Argentum's destruction and assess the difficulty of rebuilding it. Shizuru wanted to restore the razed city, and this would be easier if some of the old foundations remained.

She knew there were many of its people who had survived, and they would be crucial to her goal. Much like many other city-states, Argentum's populace had never been restricted to its citadel walls: that was only the central city, where the government resided. A good number of Argentum's populace had actually survived. These were people that lived in the outlying areas spared by the Mentulaeen assault, and others were people who had been vacationing in other lands at the time of the attack. Shizuru banked that the ones among these who might care to restore their city would be back by the start of fall, and it was these Shizuru wanted to persuade to stay and reconstruct.

Now the Argentians were a hardy people. They had suffered like assaults on their existence before the latest one because of where they lived. When you teetered on the fringes of great empires, you were just naturally susceptible to attacks of the kind the Mentulaeans had recently visited on them. As such, by the time Shizuru arrived with her escort, there were already some of the remaining Argentians going through the rubble, trying to salvage building materials from the wreckage and getting rebuilding plans underway. These she promised as much help as could be given, making her mission clear to them.

"You shall have to wait until we can get more supplies together from Argus," she said, bending over to feel the clay of the earth with her hands; this was where her Eighth had died, so her touch was reverent and laced with private mourning. "It shall be difficult, yes. But help shall come, so you must persevere. Argentum is not eradicated as long as you remain."

The foremost of the survivors, a local of respectable lineage, agreed.

"This has happened before," he said. "A long time ago, and even then it didn't take. Argentum's survived being razed before and it's going to survive it again. But the only problem is, how is our administration to proceed? Our leaders are all dead, and we need someone to head the restoration."

She took the hint and sized him up with a keen glance.

"You may function as the leader at present," she determined. "Select others according to your custom and rebuild your government."

He bowed to the waist, gratified by the appointment.

"Mind that I shall return to check on you," she warned him. "This is where one of my legions triumphed and also where it perished. I have no intention of letting this place be wiped off this earth by either Mentulaeans or corrupt administration. Many armies have come and gone here, and the surrounding area is not only rich with blood but also with the waste of thousands of livestock and men. It shall sustain life and grow crops tenfold in the years to come, which is perhaps some recompense for the deaths it has seen."

After that she had to reposition some of the western legions for her plans. Before the visit to Argentum, Shizuru received a communiqué from her legate heading the legions at the borders, Kenji Nakamura. He wrote to say he had succeeded in his primary mission, which was to keep the Mentulaeans from infiltrating through the southern passes. He had been successful in his secondary mission: the mountain tribes of Obsidian's southern empire had agreed to an alliance with Hime, in exchange for assurance of their territories and the promise of additional lands after the annexation.

They were eager to help in both warfare and provision, according to Kenji. While these tribes were not very wealthy in grain, they did raise a lot of livestock, which meant the Himeans now had one more food source in the Mentulaean territories besides additional auxiliary reserves. Kenji also wrote that he had already started burning small towns and doing raids on the nearest occupied places, although the real prize in his eye was a sizeable fortress not too far from the Mentulaean massif.

Our current camp is well-served. We have a nice supply line and our new allies work as perimeter lookouts to prevent the local Mentulaean governor's forces from sneaking up on us. We've not had to fend off any royal armies yet: but that will change once word gets out (eventually it should, I guess, even in this slow country) and the legions won't last long here in winter. I'm thinking of moving into that fortress-town and wintering there.

It's an interesting edifice, General, and you'd love to take it on yourself if you saw it, I think. It's built right smack on a spur projecting from the massif, and range right behind it is rocky as Tartarus, impossible to use as the attack point for a full army. Yet that's the only place you can run men into it without getting slaughtered immediately, because the rest of it's on such a steep incline in front.

Our new allies also tell me that the fortress is pretty well-stocked and has springs inside it. It's perfect for our purposes, that is. Also, it apparently has a nice cache of the royal treasures-which I think we deserve to collect as compensation for the trouble these cunni have caused us, if you'll pardon the language.

I'm going to use the mountain tribes to find a way to infiltrate the rear gate. The Mentulae don't know yet that we're working with some of the local tribes, since we haven't fielded them at all for any of our assaults. I'm confident I can take the place easily, thanks to our new friends-who seem to be absolutely afire with the idea of kicking out their Mentulaean sovereigns, by the way, whom they insist are not their sovereigns. All to the good for us if that's the case. We

Himeans seem to get along with peoples of the mountains, don't we?

Shizuru sent back a short missive telling him to take the fortress-town as soon as possible. She also told him to soften his approach a little before being too eager with the torches, especially with the smaller towns.

Fire only when you absolutely have to, she wrote. Otherwise, approach the people first with offers to shift to our side. Considering the things we hear of Obsidian's idea of government, I imagine most of the Mentulaeans shall only be too happy to defect. It also preserves our supply lines, since we want to make as much of the land as possible once we start mounting the full offensive. Remember that each time you set fire to a farm over there you are setting fire to a farm in what is going to be our province. I doubt I would be too happy with you if you reduced it to ashes before I even got started with my governorship.

It was around the time she sent this letter that she also received one from Hime, forwarded to Sosia by her cousin in Argus. This letter was from her old senior legate, Chie Harada, who had chosen to stay at home and protect Shizuru's interests in the Senate, as well as press her own long-running courtship with the daughter of Hikaru Senou, arch-aristocrat and arch-conservative.

My suit has seen some improvement, I admit, since I'm in better financial position than before thanks to my share from our campaign, Chie wrote to Shizuru. Thank gods the old boy is Himean enough to be softened by money, even if he is a monumental snob. It sticks in his craw that I'm a plebeian, although I doubt my money shall stick long in his purse!

Well, enough on that: the governor of Septentria (did you or Himemiya come up with that name, by the way?) has better things to do, I'm sure, than go through a missive dedicated entirely to the whinging of a frustrated suitor. Besides, I'm also writing this for our senior consul, who agreed that I should handle conveyance of the news from home for now. She's rather busy, you know, because she's been turning Hime upside down with her laws-which are proving, interestingly enough, that upside down is sometimes right side up! She sent abridged copies of her legislation, which I've enclosed (yes, those fat rolls are abridged already). You'll find them interesting reading and thoroughly evocative of her usual legislative lustre.

Elections have finished, by the way, and the new crop is promising. Before I get on to the results, though, I would like to tell you a little point of note that rather flabbergasted everybody. In the final announcements of the candidates, Himemiya's cousin with the cartload of a name, Urumi Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki, got up in front of Senate and People and made an announcement. She was going to run, she said, for the consulship!

Now as you can expect, no one saw that coming at all. Even Himemiya, it seems, for her face was painted with the most excellent look of "what-mushrooms-did-she-eat-this-time?" Oh, the bedlam among the others, though! Radicals babbling to the left, conservatives babbling to the right, and the maverick herself in the centre, grinning in all directions. Even I was babbling, I admit, because it's unheard of, a tribune of the plebs going straight after the consulship. Himemiya took her to task for it, of course.

"What do you mean you are running for consul?" asked Himemiya.

"I mean that I'm running for consul," said Himemiya-Kanzaki.

"You cannot do that, tribune," said Himemiya.

"But nothing in the law prevents me," said Himemiya-Kanzaki.

"Then I shall make a law preventing you," said Himemiya.

"Oh, well, in that case, never mind," said Himemiya-Kanzaki.

You may well say that over half of us fell over laughing, the maverick's other cousin the Princeps laughing loudest of all. Himemiya herself seemed in stitches by the incident, as her lips would not stop jerking up at the corners, no matter how much she tried to preserve her usual stoicism. Either it was simply a marvellous jest from her cousin on Himemiya's string of legislative schemes, or perhaps a reminder that Himemiya should try to provide for even the most outrageous of incidents in her laws because we Himeans are creatures of the outrageous by nature. I incline to the explanation that it was both. Thank all the gods for the Himemiya! They're all raving mad, but they do make everything interesting. I believe this year has been one of the best we've had in a long time because of them (and you): senate attendance has been amazing this past year, according to the records. It's because no one trusts the two to be left without supervision, of course.

Moving on to other important matters, you should know first that the horse you were backing made it in: Keigo Onishi is the senior consul, with-as you predicted-Satoshi Ootori as his junior colleague. How's that for a pair? Both of them are still fairly young too: not as youthful as our current senior consul, true, but Himemiya's special. Anyway, it's always good to have some young blood directing the Senate, which is made up of too many corpses and hags.

The political inclinations of the consular pair are interesting too. While Onishi can't exactly be called conservative-middle-of-the-road, perhaps?-in his policies, he is a little more on the forward side of things, whereas Satoshi Ootori is typical Ootori, generally conservative but quick to support the radical measure if it means profit. Both are tied powerfully to the knightly communities, Onishi even to the same communities among which you have the strongest pull, as he is himself a lobbyist for the mining plutocrats. I know you and he have known each other for some time as a result and get along, and Ootori can be reasoned with given appropriate baksheesh... all of which means this coming year shouldn't work out too badly for you in the Senate.

The other officials-elect are not as exciting, with the exception of the curule aediles. I shall talk about the minor honourables first, though; I know you like the oblique approach. The tribunes of the plebs are more conservative than anything, although Himemiya's new bet got in. Still, I don't see anyone of Himemiya-Kanzaki's calibre, so it shan't be as exhilarating in the Well of the Comitia as this year. We have one of the Hoshino brood for urban praetor and a Futaba for foreign praetor next year. Solid conservatives there, along with one of the plebeian aediles, who is an Akagi.

But, as I said, the curule aediles are the more interesting characters:

we have Sachiko Ogasawara and Rei Hasekura. You already know that Ogasawara is chummy with Hasekura and should work nicely with her. That, taken with the fact that both of their families are quite well off (which is an excellent example of the understatement in Ogasawara's case, as we both know), means we can all look forward to spectacular games next year! What a pity you shall not see it, but I suppose you will have your own excitements to look forward to over there. May you prosper in your goals and carve out your new province easily.

This was a letter that brought Shizuru some comfort, as she had missed her old friend quite a bit. She was more prone to missing people of late, and it suddenly dawned upon her, midway through the last month of the year and with her twenty-sixth birthday fast approaching, that she actually felt weary. This was due to many things-she was childishly tempted to say it was encroaching age that accounted for it-but the greatest source was perhaps the frustrated longing for the old relation with Natsuki.

Now she was not hoping for something that would never come back: Natsuki would never again be the same, just as the way they were with each other would never again be the same. She knew too that there were facets to the new Natsuki that would take some time to unveil, because it was simply too early and Natsuki was in her own way bad at sharing. But there were parts of the old relation that she still missed acutely and could hardly wait to find again. She missed Natsuki's deft humour, for instance, which had always thrilled her. She missed the girl's stunning grins, of which she had yet to see a specimen since their reunion. And she missed her touch, the old sexuality between them, that fearful urgency that they had felt whenever they had used to find themselves alone and in a room with a bed or any other feasible surface.

There was more to the last point, however, and it had to do with Natsuki's health. Frustrated lover though she might be, Shizuru was also a sensible woman: sensible enough to know, certainly, that the younger woman was not yet capable of sexual activities. The medici had also advised against it in their list of things their special patient could not yet be permitted-and advised against it with a great deal of trepidation and stuttering, for all that Shizuru had been her most serene at the time.

Some of the old affections had to be modified too for the girl's health. Shizuru could not rest her head on Natsuki's breast as she had used to, for example, because her weight could trouble the frail chest. Instead, she now held Natsuki from the side or rolled the Otomeian on top of herself when Natsuki was willing. The Otomeian always indicated this by shuffling closer when Shizuru got into bed, and Shizuru would respond by turning on one side, holding the girl by the arms, then rolling carefully onto her back and bringing Natsuki on top of her with the movement.

Natsuki no longer touched her face in the mornings. It seemed a small thing, but Shizuru had always loved being woken by her that way. Shizuru also caught her doing something in its stead once: an inspection of her amputated leg's new topography through the bandages. It had been followed by the sound of swift puffs through her nose, and each snuffle had broken Shizuru's heart so badly that she got up, lit a lamp near the damaged leg, and covered the stump with kisses, each one drawing out louder sobs than the last. It was a firm message, and Natsuki no longer cried when inspecting her stump after that.

Despite events like this, Shizuru still despaired of being sufficient anodyne for Natsuki's anguish. Again the unfairness of their relation came upon her: Natsuki for her was enough to take away the pain of all losses, but she doubted she could do the same thing for Natsuki. It was true the crippled princess was strong and that she was genuinely trying to learn how to live with her new lot. Indeed, she had made better headway than even Shizuru had expected in her renewal after her cousin's unexpected visit, which made Shizuru wonder on occasion what Alyssa had told the girl in the brief interview she let them have with each other. But there were still things that worried her in spite of that, such as the lost expressions Natsuki showed when she forgot that someone was watching, or the girl's refusal to leave their tent even when Shizuru offered to carry her outside for a little "walk". The older woman was doing her best to help the girl heal, but she wondered if the place where they were might not be holding back the recovery.

It was partly because of this and other reasons relating to Natsuki's recuperation that she made the decision to have a trip: she would be moving all but the Eleventh legion back to Argus, to winter there instead of in Sosia province.

"I agree it's the wiser thing," her legate Miyuki said in response. "Argus shall have better supply routes at the moment. Right now, I'm afraid we only stand to depress the Sosia supplies and reserves, which we should be rebuilding."

"Quite so," Shizuru said. "Besides, I think it is high time we managed to send the Prince Hanu to be held in Fuuka and shipped off our Mentulaeen captives for the slave markets. I do not intend to have to pay for the captives' keep this winter when I should be dedicating the resources to the legions."

Miyuki tapped a nail on the table thoughtfully. "To which markets do you intend to send them?"

"There are only a few thousand of them, so I shall not spread them out. I shall ship all of them for sale in Fuuka."

"Slaves are in demand right now. You will make a killing, to put it bluntly."

"So I think."

They were sitting in the command tent and joined by the rest of Shizuru's legates: Shohei Nagayama and Toshi Kumakura from last year's campaign, and Seigo Ushida, just recently taken on as part of the team. The latter was very chipper despite his defection from the hapless Takeda, who had taken the news of his friend going to the Fujino side with a few choice oaths and some choice liquor.

"I understand you've your career to think of, Seigo," the man had told Ushida sourly after another gulp of wine. "But you should be warned: the woman's not someone who'll further your goals, you know."

"Oh, now- really?" Ushida had responded at the time. "I know you don't like her, but how can you say that? Look at her records in the military alone. It's one victory after another."

"Oh, yes, she's successful! The gods love her-sometimes I think they'd drink her piss if she threw it at them," Takeda had replied with another swig of wine. "It's not going to be your success, is my point. It's all going to be hers, even if you do the work. Take the relief of Sosia. It was Nagayama who really did most of the work in ending the siege, yet she steals the credit."

Ushida's eyes had opened wider at this.

"She's their general. That theft is her privilege," he had said, knowing Shizuru Fujino had given her legate sufficient credit for the victory following the battle. It was also contentious to say it was Shohei Nagayama who had achieved the win: Ushida had been part of the command for the fighting and knew how crucial her arrival and flanking attack of the Mentulaeans had been in ending that long battle.

But even this was practically irrelevant before the main point. Shizuru Fujino had every right to call the victory hers if her officers had achieved it. That was the prerogative of a general, as Ushida had suggested: all triumphs were credited ultimately to her, no matter whose hands had directly fashioned them. The natural exchange was that all failures were credited ultimately to her as well, and she would have to be the one to absorb the blame. All senators knew this, and it was actually the reason that there were a select few who had made names for turning away just about every campaign offered to them. To these stay-at-home senators, the merest sign of a generalship was sufficient to bring on a fever lasting a week... or however long it would take for the Senate to offer that dangerous office to someone more willing.

So Takeda's interpretation of the rescue of Sosia was unorthodox, to say the least. Ushida was surprised that someone who was such a stickler for the traditional ways would fail to interpret the event in the proper, Himean way-but then again, he also surmised that Takeda did not wish to accept that principle at the moment, given how much censure he was about to face for his own generalship.

Takeda left soon after that conversation with his old friend, intent on journeying back to Hime and facing his inevitable fate in the Senate. It was then that Shizuru Fujino proved she could be refined in her cruelty. She approached him about taking on a special task before he left: she gave Takeda the urn that held Suou Himemiya's ashes and asked if he would see it to Suou's sister.

She explained to him that she would give it to the courier of her letters, were it not that Suou had been too beloved to her as well as too important a person for her ashes to be delivered by a mere courier. Better that it be a senator to deliver her ashes because she should have been a senator, Shizuru told Takeda, who agreed because honour would not permit him to decline despite survival insisting that he demur. For he knew the meaning behind the task and how it added to his shame. Not only would he be facing the Senate and made to explain the abysmal results of his generalship, he would be facing one of the greatest aristocrats of their time and telling her how it was his orders that had seen her sister fighting in the front and eventually killed. It was a horrid prospect, yet what else could one do in his place? To turn away the request would have been even more disgraceful, and would have destroyed him in everyone's esteem just as easily. And looking into the red eyes as he swallowed bile and accepted the commission, he came to a new appreciation of his foe's venomous cunning.

This wrecked man was the one Seigo Ushida had traded for Shizuru Fujino, so Ushida ultimately did not feel he had fared too badly in his switch in loyalties. Tergiversation was natural in their job occupation and he liked Shizuru Fujino's glaring capability better than his old friend's duller light, anyway. Furthermore, he was instinctively predisposed to thinking better of her than Takeda would have it. She was a fellow patrician, after all, whereas Takeda-even if he was of impeccably good ancestry-was still of plebeian pedigree. The old divisions still ruled for Ushida, as they did for many others in the old aristocracy.

"Fujino-san, if the Eleventh legion stays here, who winters with them?" he asked now, fairly confident about his standing amidst the other legates. The eldest in the group, Toshi, spoke up at his query.

"I'd like to volunteer," the man said. "I've spent some time in Sosia for a while now, Fujino-san, and I know how to be of help to them in rebuilding their defences and the city. I can keep the Eleventh in shape with the construction work too, until you need it to be moved out."

Everyone thought this an excellent idea and murmured approval.

"Very well then, Toshi-han it is," the general said, crossing her legs and leaning back in her seat. "Everyone else to Argus with me. Miyuki-han handles the supplies and logistics for our trip-please make a note to have the centurions double-check the cold-weather gear before marching-while Ushida-han and Shohei-han can handle the legionaries. I want everything ready by two days, departure at dawn."

She did not even wait to hear if they thought this feasible or not: if she ordered it, it meant she knew she could find a way to do it. And if she could find a way to do it, she expected them to do the same.

"Toshi-han, remember my regulations on constant communication now, please, especially as you are going to be the main contact point for our interactions with our Otomeian friends. Sosia is going to have to serve as a hub for Himean-Otomeian communications. Be vigilant in scouting the area as well, once we leave. If you have to employ a hundred extra scouts to do it, go ahead. Best not be caught unawares as before, even if I do doubt you shall find the Mentulae coming in this autumn."

"Why?" he asked.

"Because they should presently be getting word at the capital of their defeats at the boundaries and guessing what has happened to Prince Hanu's forces as well. They might be slow, but not static. And the King Obsidian is at heart a big bully. He shall dither for some time after getting word that the people he is bullying are hitting back, which buys us some time."

"So it's to Argus without fear," Miyuki said.

"But with a great deal of caution still, of course."

"Of course."

"I want a fast march, by the way." All but Ushida hid a cringe, knowing that meant she wanted cramp-inducing speed. "I need to see Shizuma and the rest of the legions as soon as possible. The new legions should be by tyros, as you know, and we have quite a bit of work to do on them before they are battle-ready."

"How long do you usually spend on training before fielding new recruits?"

"That's hard to say because Fujino-san never stops training," Shohei cut in loudly, prompting Shizuru's laughter. "She just keeps flogging them and flogging them, I tell you, like the world's most persistent slave-driver. But who am I to complain? It's worked thus far!"

"The average number of days would be a hundred," Shizuru said to Miyuki with a grin, shaking her head at her old legate's forbidding portrayal of her generalship. "But that still does not mean they shall be good at fighting."

"True, it takes a good commander to blood them properly," Ushida put in, knowing what she was trying to say.

Shizuru nodded. "That having been said, proper training is still essential."

"Ooh, I can't wait to start drilling the greenies," Shohei chuckled, rubbing his hands with glee. The rest grinned at him.

"Remember you said that, because I want training to continue even to the dead of winter," Shizuru smirked. "Toshi-han, I have a query for you before we leave. How fare the Sosia mines and blacksmiths?"

"Oh, they've not suffered too badly from the siege, especially the mines. They're far out on the mountain range of the province, after all, and far-removed from the city."

"They have been producing swords and armour thus far, yes? To aid in the war?"

"Yes, that's so." Toshi smiled. "They're quick to jump in, the Sosia locals. They didn't even need any telling."

"Commendable of them," she said. "But I want to place a special order that should be filled as soon as possible and by the best blacksmiths. Could you see it to the most dependable forges and foundries?"

"Of course, Fujino-san," he answered. Everyone was listening.

"I want five thousand axes," she told him. "Specifically, felling hatchets of the type we use for cutting wood in the army. Nice and portable, but very hardy."

He agreed, although he was clearly as puzzled as the rest of them.

"Are we low on the camp hatchets?" Miyuki asked worriedly. "I'm afraid I had not noticed anything, Shizuru-san."

Shizuru waved it away.

"Oh, no, it is for something else," she said. "Although it is true that I shall be having the legionaries using them. There are not enough of the hatchets in each legion, you know. Only enough for camp-making and clearing camp grounds. Really a sad deficiency."

The confusion was plain on their faces, but she did not enlighten them.

"Toshi-han, I want those quickly," she said. "To be precise, I want them finished by two months at the latest."

"Two months at the latest?"

"A month would be better. Send them to Argus then," she told him, managing to completely ignore the disbelief on his face. Again the message was clear: he had to find a way to make it work, no matter how daunting the deadline seemed. "That is it for today. Are there any queries?"

There were none.

"Wonderful. Dismissed."

She got up and left first of all, pausing only to nod as they bade her farewell before filing out of the tent. They did not bother following the general with their eyes once outside, as they knew precisely where she was headed: to the larger structure adjoining the command tent, which housed her living quarters.

Shizuru stepped into that other structure and was met by her steward and two slaves.

"Natsuki?" she called through the inner flap, slinging off the cloak over her tunic and letting one of the slaves take it. They provided her with a bowl of water as well, and she washed her hands before going through the flap and into her private quarters. There she found the girl she had been calling, reading a scroll again as usual, but doing so on one of the couches and not the bed, as she had expected.

"How did you get there, meum mel?" she asked in amazement. She was the one who lifted Natsuki, after all, and she had not moved Natsuki to the couch before leaving earlier.

Natsuki raised a hand from her scroll and pointed behind Shizuru, indicating the slaves. They bowed when Shizuru turned to look at them, only her steward remaining with his chin still raised.

"You lifted her?" she asked, addressing the question specifically to Hermias.

He denied it. "We only supported the Dominilla by the arms, Domina."

"So she went part of the way on her own power?"

"That is so, Domina."

"I see," Shizuru replied, trying to remember when exactly her household had begun to refer to Natsuki with the diminutive form of her own title. She wondered too if it was wise to already be straining the girl's leg so with this new exercise-already she doubted it. "Very well, then."

She sent them out of the tent under pretext of preparing food for dinner, although all of them knew very well that someone was already in charge of it. They understood what she really wanted to say, which was that she wanted them to come back at dinnertime and leave them alone until then . One of the servants lingered a moment longer, though, under Natsuki's behest. It was an Otomeian slave, and Natsuki ordered her to pour some calda for Shizuru before being sent out with the others.

"Thank you, Natsuki," Shizuru said after the last slave had left, moved by this small act of thoughtfulness. She brought her drink with her as she walked over to the couch and asked the girl if she was snug, studying the Otomeian as was her habit after each time they separated. It pleased her to note that Natsuki had regained a little more weight, although not enough to bring her back to her old state. The girl's cheeks were still sunken and her arms still twig-like, but she no longer looked like someone already on the road to the Underworld, to Shizuru's relief. And already the beauty of old was returning, even if it had undergone alterations. Her skin was far paler, for instance, as she had not been out in the sun for so long. Her glossy hair was longer too, and it festooned her shoulders in limp ribbons that touched her waist. Even holding a well-scarred scroll and rather well-scarred herself, she looked more unearthly than she had ever looked, and Shizuru let some of the awe shine through her eyes as they regarded each other comfortably.

"Well, it is good to see you out of the bed, Natsuki," she said, hesitating only a little at what she had to say. "But is it wise to go about like this? Did you speak to the medicus about it?"

The girl's gaze went flat very quickly.

"I take it that is a no," Shizuru murmured, taking a sip of her wine as she saw the clouds gather on the other's face. It was uncanny how easily she could conjure up the words being expressed there: Can I not even move from my bed without needing to consult in conference about it?

"I do not intend to hamper you, Natsuki," she said after her drink, folding one arm across her stomach and setting the elbow of the other arm on it. "No one does. But we do wish to preserve your health. I do not think moving about as the servants have just described is the best way to do that. And I am neither being overly paranoid nor overly protective. My concern is that standing upright shall place too much weight on your leg. Light as you are, your body weight shall still be considerable when it presses down on the seal of skin-and the weight shall be concentrated on that small point, which may prove too much for it.""

Reason always did get to Natsuki, as Shizuru knew. The girl used her hair to curtain away her face after this, and Shizuru knew she had won by that gesture of defeat. The older woman did not like having to chastise her lover, but she knew she had to be harsh sometimes to get her message across properly. While she was willing to indulge Natsuki in just about every way, she certainly had no intention of doing so if it would jeopardise the girl's convalescence. If that meant hobbling an already crippled horse, so be it!

"I am only asking that you have yourself lifted next time," she clarified, smiling to take away the sting of the lecture. "Until we talk to the medicus about it, at least. I can arrange for someone to come in when I am not present to lift you. Or perhaps you may want someone from your own servants? This only need be so until we are certain you may begin to stay upright again-and then we can have some artisans design walking aids."

Natsuki's head was bowed already, but it turned away after this. Shizuru put away the goblet on the table next to the couch, bending over the girl so that she could pull the dark head of hair to her belly. Natsuki let her do it and she ran her fingers through the locks to try and comfort the younger woman. She knew it was painful to the Otomeian to be reminded of the loss of her mobility, but she was also afraid that Natsuki would lock herself away again if she did not accept her fate as soon as possible. So she could not shrink in this, much though she too was having trouble accepting the same thing.

"I am very sorry I must place this injunction upon you," she said softly, adjusting the girl's stola at the shoulder. It was a little too big, as all the rest of Natsuki's clothes still were. "But I only wish your good health. It is not so much that I ask, anyway: only to check with the physicians first. Is it not just that we do this, mea vita ?"

There were a few moments of silence, followed by a nod of agreement against her stomach.

"Good. Now would you allow me to see your leg?"

Again Natsuki nodded. Shizuru pulled away, then lifted the hem of the girl's garment to check on the stump and see if the wrappings showed any bleeding or discharge. Since they had amputated Natsuki's leg below the knee, she did not have to expose too much of Natsuki to see the bindings. She checked if they were clean and still tightly fastened, and then covered the stump again with the dress.

"Thank you, it looks well." Shizuru moved on swiftly. "What are you reading, by the way?"

Natsuki handed her the scroll and gave her space when she indicated that she wanted to sit on the couch. She unfurled the scroll and glanced through it, then at Natsuki with astonishment.

"Chikane's legislation? Why did you read this?" she asked, barely able to conceal her amazement again; when Natsuki was the one dealing the shocks, she never was able to dull them. "I left some new texts I purchased from some Sosia collectors-there were even one or two new plays from some recent dramatist in there. I thought you would go through those, certainly not this."

The face the girl turned to her was guilty.

"Nuh-nuh-not allowed?" she asked haltingly, obviously worried she had done something wrong by reading the scroll. Her voice was small when she explained: "It was there."

Shizuru knew Natsuki was referring to the table next to the bed, which was where she always left scrolls and other offerings like trinkets and comestibles to the girl before leaving to go about her work. She realised now that she had left the scroll there inadvertently, after finally getting around to reading it herself last night, it being the last in the long series Chie had sent her.

"Oh, I do not mind if you read it," she said hurriedly. "I was only worried you would find it dull reading. And I had not intended to leave it there, truth be told."

She turned over the scroll in her hands.

"How did you find it?"

Natsuki thought for a few seconds.

"Wise," she said.

"Did you finish it?"

"Mm."

"Was it enjoyable?"

"Mm."

Seeing that the girl would not be prevailed upon to expand on it, she switched topics and got on to her biggest news of the day.

"Natsuki, I fear you shall have to put up with a bit of trouble these coming days," she started, putting one hand over the girl's limp one. "Still, the medici tell me you can handle a trip already."

The girl's mind had not been dulled at all by her illness, so she guessed it immediately: "Argus."

Shizuru confirmed it. "Argus, in two days."

The dark head bowed in agreement, rivulets of black hair streaming down again. Shizuru tucked them away, her thumb ghosting over the scarred stitching on the girl's forehead as it was revealed. Natsuki did not flinch.

"I would like to winter in Argus," the older woman said, keeping her fingers in the other's hair. "For many logistical reasons, which I am certain you can already see. Furthermore, I must meet with my cousin, who is in Argus at the moment."

She felt the smallest tremor against her hand. The green eyes were staring at the floor, somewhere between studying and glaring at it.

"Her name is Shizuma Hanazono, remember?" she said, knowing what was going on in the girl's mind. "She is my current senior legate and my older cousin. You shall like her, I am certain. And before you begin to worry, I am certain she shall like you. She is not the type of woman who would judge one by unfortunate circumstances beyond one's control, so please do not think ill of her even before you meet." She smiled at the embarrassment on the girl's face, which told her she was right in her guess. "Give her a chance, please. I am certain she shall give you one too."

Natsuki let herself fall limply forward until her cheek was resting on Shizuru's shoulder. The Himean patted her back gently, knowing this was the girl's way of saying she was sorry.

"You should be pleased we are going to Argus, meum mel," she murmured. "I expected more cheer from you at this news. Do you not want to see Shizuki?"

Natsuki drew back quickly, surprise on her face: she had been so troubled by the thought of meeting Shizuru's cousin-especially in her current state-that she had forgotten about her pet, whom they had left in the care of the Argus governor, Midori. She reached out for Shizuru's shoulders with her hands, squeezing the muscles to show her eagerness. The other woman chuckled under her breath.

"Terrible girl," she teased. "You forgot your pet. She is not even mine, yet I recalled her immediately."

The girl frowned.

"She is not my pet, Natsuki-she never was," Shizuru said. "I gave her to you, and she always liked you better, after all." A smirk. "I always said she was an excellent judge of character."

Her shoulders got another squeeze.

"Well, you shall be reminded of her in the flesh again, soon," Shizuru sighed. "As I said, we go in two days. The sooner the better so we can avoid the snows and sleet, even if winter is going to be tardy this year."

The girl shook her head, prompting Shizuru to stop with what she had been about to say.

"Tardy winter." She sighed, as if those two words alone took effort: perhaps they actually did. "No."

Shizuru lifted a brow. "What makes you say so?"

Natsuki explained, very briefly and in the furtive voice she often used now, which always made Shizuru think the girl was afraid there were eavesdroppers hiding near them. She used the calendar used by their people instead of the Himean one and demonstrated with it that the seasons were on schedule at the moment.

"Last year was different," she said quietly, not even flinching at the recollection of a time when she had still been able to walk by herself: Shizuru silently applauded her for it. "Winter was early."

Shizuru thought about it.

"You are right as usual, Natsuki," she said after some consideration. "Last year's winter was early. It only felt otherwise because our calendar is ahead of the seasons, what with all the intercalations we have been missing. Yours must be better maintained, if your calendar is on time."

Natsuki's face demanded that she explain.

"The Himean calendar's year is of a length that requires intercalation," she said. "Intercalation is the insertion of an extra month every two years or so to keep the year in step with the seasons. This falls within the purview of the College of Pontifices, the state priests, who are expected to call for the intercalation whenever needed. Unfortunately, you know how we Himeans are when it comes to things like this. We may either forget, do not care, or simply do not do it due to political benefits."

She shrugged a shoulder.

"The non-insertion or insertion of an extra month can make a huge difference to the sort of electoral government we have in Hime. For example..." She stayed the explanation that had been on the tip of her lips upon seeing Natsuki's lips parting. "But you already see it, do you not?"

"Longer terms," the other said. "Oh-oh-or shorter."

Shizuru gave her a chaste kiss on the cheek.

"Indeed," she replied after the gesture. "That is so, and that is partly why our current calendar is not in step with the seasons. Our pontifices tend to intercalate when they have an interest in extending the political term of some official, and conveniently forget to intercalate when they wish to prevent someone's term from being longer than necessary. Since our terms are year-long, it would be useful."

She winked at Natsuki, grinning easily.

"Mind," she said, "the ultimate power here would be the leader of the pontifices, the Pontifex Maximus, because he is the one who calls the meetings ordering intercalation. Our current Pontifex, unfortunately, is an enormous dumpling."

The remark caught Natsuki off-guard: it actually quirked her lips, which were almost always serious now.

"Dumpling?" she echoed.

"Fat and lazy," Shizuru sighed. "So it might be that our calendar is out of step simply because he is too lazy to see to it. Well, that and he is older than god." She was squinting thoughtfully in the distance when she said this, and thus missed another brief smile flashing in Natsuki at her words. "I hear he is not in the best of health. The College shall probably have to elect a new leader soon."

The other responded by letting her head rest on Shizuru's shoulder again, which Shizuru knew meant she should keep talking about it. She understood it was the girl's way of seeking diversion from the wounds still gaping inside her, so she went into a detailed explanation of how the state religion and priests functioned in Hime, delivering a lecture so thorough and so carefully-given that she did not even notice the head that poked through the entrance flap and vanished after only a second.

Outside the tent were three figures, besides the sentries on duty.

"No, they're still talking," Aella, whose poking head it had been, was saying. "Can't be helped - you'll have to clean it up later, when you bring in their dinner."

They ducked even further and apologised quietly, Aella looking up as a fourth person joined their party.

"What is it? It is not time for their dinner yet," said the newcomer, Shizuru's steward. Aella sighed to him.

"They forgot to clean up the plate the Dominilla threw at them," she said, also speaking in Greek. "When they hesitated to help her to the couch, she threw a plate at them and they forgot to sweep it away."

"What? Was that before I came in?" he asked the bowing slaves, who nodded. "I did not even see it! Where was it?"

"They said it fell below one of the corner tables."

"Thank goodness. Still, it should have been cleaned away immediately."

"I agree, which is why these two are only getting bread for dinner later. One piece each and no more."

Hermias said nothing, which made Aella sigh again: she knew he thought her too harsh, while she thought him too soft. Mindful of how her head servants viewed each other, their mistress often jested that between the two of them she would have the perfect adjudicator.

Aella sent the slaves away to their quarters, while she and Hermias went to see to their other duties.

"A piece of bread," he teased her. "There was a time when you would have forbidden even water."

"Yes, I've become a paragon of mercy," she said with her usual deadpan face.

"I believe it," he said with a grin. The smile softened. "It was thoughtful of you to decide to have the matter seen to later, to let them continue chatting."

"You mean 'her'," she replied. "Only one of them does the chatting."

"Ah, now, Aella," Hermias fluted cheerfully. "The Dominilla speaks in her own way."

She shrugged and urged him to hasten his steps. She thought him too mincing, while he thought her too brisk.

"However it is, as long as she keeps doing it," she said, reaching up to make sure the string tying her hair was tight, although Hermias knew it never really loosened. "You can tell the Domina about what the Dominilla did, by the way. That's your job, Hermias, so don't expect me to have to do it, even if I am a paragon of mercy."

Chapter 59

Oh dear, I am sorry it has taken so long. I fear various things conspired to prevent me from writing, so I offer my abject apologies to those reading the story. This chapter was in fact supposed to have been written about four weeks ago, but I happened to contract an illness that rather disabled me for three weeks. As people have no doubt guessed by now that I have a nearly useless immune system (chuckle), I pray you shall forgive me. I shall attempt to be better at updating now that both my itinerary and health are more willing to cooperate, however.

I send thanks as well to those who sent messages and submitted reviews. They were of great comfort during my convalescence.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Polemarch - (from Gk., "polemarchos") a very early term in Ancient Greece that was later supplanted by the more easily recognised "strategos", the best literal translation for it would be "warlord" and the duties expected of those with the title more or less those of a general, at least during the time I am referencing.

2. Pontifex Maximus - the head of the College of Pontifices, the group of state priests administering and seeing to matters religious. Note that part of their duties involved the maintenance of the calendar and ensuring that days were intercalated when needed (to keep the calendar in line with the actual seasons), although most Pontifices actually cared little for the idea of an accurate calendar and so simply did not bother. Romans generally did not consider it important.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The new year saw the environs of the Forum starting out a little calmer than before, but this changed quickly when the past year's president of the Tribunes of the Plebs proved she had no intention of retiring from the rostra. Prior to that, the only real event worthy of attention was when one of the new praetors demanded that the College of Pontifices explain why they had not intercalated extra days in the year for the purpose of keeping the calendar in step with the seasons. A cantankerous Pontifex Maximus, dragged out of premature hibernation by this imperious demand, replied that as long as a sunburn indicated summer and a shrinking cock indicated winter, no one "gives a shit about the calendar". As he said it with just the sort of nose-thumbing disdain that Himeans loved to see when their betters were squabbling, it was the Pontifex who was declared the victor and the unfortunate stickler of a praetor who was relegated to the sidelines for the rest of his tenure.

Aside from the brief interest this little episode drew at home, political attention remained on doings abroad. Asia Province and other locations experienced their share of trouble and were much-discussed in Senate, but as far as the people were concerned, it was the Northern provinces that remained far more of the moment. However, the more immediate fascination with that topic had shifted from the current head of the Northern Campaign to its former leader.

Takeda Masashi's life had become tremendously uncomfortable ever since his return to his homeland, although his last weeks in the North had been none too comfy either. Still, Hime was the worse place for a displaced deputy of the state after all that had happened. The whispers of the people as he walked the street, the barely-concealed jeers of his fellows: all this only drove home how miserable his reputation had become. What he had fancied to be the start of his ascent had been anything but that, and even now he felt the breath of a potent wind blowing his already-cantilevered fortune into freefall.

The name of the wind was Himemiya.

---

As soon as Takeda had set foot on the compound of gravel, dried faeces and ancient dust that made up the soil of the greatest city on earth (as far as its inhabitants were concerned), he made not for his house, where he could wash off the grime of his long journey and take a moment to find much-needed comfort in his old nest. Instead, he went straight for the rich neighbourhood of the Palatine and found the mansion with the most distinctive steps in the city: rare roseate marble with smoky tendrils of lavender racing across it. Up them he tripped, then rapped on the knocker to request an audience with the lady of the house. After a little temporary confusion that the steward cleared up by informing him that there were two ladies of the house-although, the traditionalist in him argued, there was really only one-he managed to obtain an interview with the former consul, who eyed the urn in his hands with what he could only describe as resigned sorrow.

"I'm very sorry, Himemiya-san," he started, and meant it.

"As am I," she answered, taking the urn from his hands. "She was my only sister."

He nodded, having already known that fact before but never really appreciating its significance until now.

"She was very brave," he said, and was cut off by an arm movement and her instructions that he be seated. He did so with care, even if he was completely unaware that he was soiling a Tyrian purple seat cover with his filthy attire. She occupied all of his attention: an aching beautiful woman holding a bejewelled urn in her hands and regarding it as though it were the most wretched thing in the world.

But her eyes when they turned to him were free of tears, for all that they channelled a heavy regret.

"Even to the last moment, she was brave," he blurted out, forgetting his own dread of this interview for a moment; one could not look at a person with such eyes and not wish to assuage her. "She was a great woma-"

She cut him off this time with words.

"She was my only sister, Masashi-san," she repeated in her silky voice. "I lived with her all her life. Not once did she give me cause to dislike that arrangement."

She took the seat opposite his and did not relinquish the urn.

"There is no need to extol her virtues before me," she explained. "Not when I have spent years being witness to and recipient of their favours."

He murmured a quick apology. She motioned to the carafe on the table.

"You are parched from your journey, without doubt," she told him. "I may send for water if you would prefer that. I would pour for you too, but I ask that you forgive me if I do not desire to relieve my hands of this urn for the moment."

He offered to pour a drink for her.

"I would prefer a witness over wine, Masashi-san," she requested.

So out came the tale of what had happened, from the calm beginnings in Argus to the outbreak of the war and the siege where her sister fell. It took him well under a turn of the glass to finish the whole story, which was far faster than he had taken in the many times he had practised and rehashed the tale. A major reason for the speed was his audience's silence: she sat through all of it unresponsively, sitting with such inhuman stillness that there were moments when he stopped out of fear that she had gone into some type of shock without him knowing. Even when he had finished, her only query was whether or not he had anything else for her, obviously expecting a letter from the woman who had replaced him. He did have such a letter-which he had not read, of course, that would be dishonourable-and he drew it from his satchel.

She set the urn firmly on her lap to take the letter, then opened the missive before him and looked through it before rolling it up again. He watched her fingers nervously as they closed on the scroll, the long stalks white but unshaken. Once she had set the scroll on the table, she met his eyes with her own, and he readied himself. He could not imagine her friend writing anything complimentary about him.

"You shall have to present an accounting of your mission to the Senate," she said with equanimity, as though the man whose command might have been responsible for her only sister's death were someone other than the one she faced. "It is a given, although I warn that it may not be too pleasant for you."

"I have accepted that and I'm going to do it," he told her, not quite knowing where she was headed.

"May I request that you do it in tomorrow's meeting?"

"I intended to do it then, Himemiya-san."

"I would suggest that you prepare for interrogations then."

"I'd expected no less."

"Very well."

She picked up the urn from her lap and rose. He did the same, astonished that this was apparently the end of their talk. And to think this was one interrogation for which he had so long prepared! Would she demand no further accounting of himself, ask no more questions? Would she cast no political maledictions to his face?

"Thank you for bringing my sister's ashes to me, Masashi-san."

There was a pause, and he fancied that he could hear the words, I would have preferred you bring her alive, naturally.

"She deserved no less," he said, considering his words.

"She deserved to live longer," she responded very gently. "You shall excuse me if I ask you to leave now, if you please. Others have tended to her body. Now I wish to tend to the dust they have made of it."

He nodded, saying that he understood perfectly. Yet how could he? He walked out of her palatial mansion not understanding how she could have been so calm, despite the sadness she had clearly shown at the realisation of her sister's death; he did not understand how she could have taken his narrative sans a query or indication of scorn, when even the most self-sparing version of the story that he could come up with could not dispel the opprobrium of having been commander in a battle where her sister and a thousand others had fallen. Did he not know better, he would think her to have known it ahead of time: yet that could not be possible, when he was most certainly the first to bear news of it.

She was a remarkable woman, he thought while walking out of her house, down the gorgeous pink marble of her front steps. If he had admired her before he had done so from a distance and with much the same taken-for-granted esteem his peers granted to one with so illustrious a career and provenance, fractured only slightly by her eccentric choice of wife. Now that he had come face-to-face and spoken in private with the idol, he was struck by a greater admiration than before, commingled with perplexity and almost fearful respect. Anyone else would have burst into tears at being presented with the ashes of one they had loved as much she obviously loved her sister, yet not a single one had leaked from her eyes. And if indeed she scorned him for his part in the play, she had betrayed no trace of it to his face, which he thought far more civility than her close friend had shown. So deep was the impression she left on him, in fact, that when he went from her house to Sergay Wang's and elicited an astonished "Ye immortal gods!" from the man, his reply was, "I think I've just seen one."

Takeda's befuddlement would have been partly allayed had he known a simple fact instead of merely suspecting it: Chikane Himemiya had indeed known of her sister's death prior to his arrival. That this was so was due to none other than the person who had sent him to that dreaded errand.

The letter Takeda had been asked to hand over to Chikane held very little, only a few lines of commiseration. Even had Takeda not balked at the idea of opening it before handing it to its recipient, he would not have found anything impeaching him in the meagre contents. That was because it was a front: the real letter had been sent even before Takeda's company departed for Hime. Shizuru had inked an account-as she had it from the officers and soldiers of the Seventh-of Sosia's siege and Suou's death, as well as a concise but systematic dissection of Takeda's tactics during the battle that clearly placed the blame upon his shoulders for Suou's fate, among others. That Chikane had not had tears in her eyes even when presented with the remains of her younger sister was because she had shed them already, keening into the sheets of Suou's bed in their mansion and huddled into one of her sibling's old cloaks. It was her astonished wife who discovered her in that piteous state and who covered for her by sending all the servants to have an early night that evening, making excuses for the sake of the patrician's dignity.

Himeko was not the only person who learned of Suou's passing before Takeda arrived to spread it. Chikane also made a cousin privy to the news, trusting that the younger woman would understand the need to keep it quiet until Takeda Masashi's arrival. Unfortunately, her own grief made her forget how close her sister had been to said cousin: Urumi Kanzaki-Himemiya was so appalled by the news of her cousin's death that she had to be held back bodily from running to the dens of the Subura and rounding up assassins.

"I'll make him bleed," the former tribune of the plebs had sworn in frustration, eyes running unashamedly. "I'll not rest until I make him suffer."

Chikane had forced her into a seat, feeling the frankness of Urumi's display picking at the scab just beginning to form over her own hurt.

"You shall, Urumi," she promised after taking a moment to compose herself. "But not by assassination. Nor by having your gangs assault him in a dark corner. You shall not harm him that way."

The blue-brown glare was furious.

"Your scruples are ill-placed," Urumi hissed, hands closing on either side. "Who cares how we harm him now? Suou didn't deserve to perish in that way. He practically abandoned her group in the front lines, going from Shizuru-san's account of this! This man doesn't deserve your moral considerations, Chikane!"

"Lower your voice."

"He doesn't!"

"Please," the other said, sinking into another chair and covering her eyes by setting a hand to her forehead. The sight of that dear, fair reflection of her lying trampled in a battlefield. All ashes now; there were no reflections in dust.

"He got my only sister killed," she said lugubriously.

"Then why should it not get him the same?"

"Because it should get him worse."

This judgement brought down the wrath of a long-dormant leviathan upon Takeda, a kind of mythical monster of the world in which he and his peers moved. The puissance of the dead legate's name now unveiled its menace, with the direct members of the Himemiya clan and all its offshoots and relations suddenly dusting off their linkages to join hands. There were marriages to be counted, adoptions and long-running alliances or patron-client relations held over the ages, a multitude of interconnections forming a vast web whose origins were in the very founding of Hime the Society, not merely Hime the Republic.

The fallout was easy to predict. No matter how much Takeda tried to deliver a good account of himself and his command before various parties, no matter how many of the conservatives who had backed his usurpation—that was what people called it now—of Shizuru's role tried to back him again, Takeda found himself pushed ever deeper under the political waters by this monster recently awakened, roused by Suou's spectre and over five thousand other shades who had died under his aegis. Even his foe abroad had a part to play: Shizuru's letters describing his failures showed up immediately after his first agonising presentation to the senators, and so effectively demolished the defence he had built for himself that every brick of his own construct added another lump to his already sore head.

It would have been a relief had it been Shizuru's accounts alone lodged against his. It would not have been good, but it would have been better. His biggest problem, in fact, came from another document whose existence shocked even him: a series of scrolls from Suou Himemiya that chronicled the ill-fated Masashi Mission, and if nothing else, painted him to be an incompetent who had lucked into a major command and proceeded to bungle it, losing an entire legion, thousands of experienced auxiliary troops, and even several members of good and even noble families in the process. Shizuru Fujino was apparently in possession of these chronicles and had forwarded a tome's worth of selected entries to Suou's sister, who wasted no time in sending this abridged collection to the bookmakers and getting it published.

Some of Takeda's remaining allies tried to repudiate this account by saying that it had probably been written by Shizuru Fujino herself, who had tacked on her dead friend's name to the text in a fit of malice. This was by and large considered so ridiculous an attempt at denouncing the material, however, that even the vast majority of those who were still trying to help him scoffed at the idea. Besides, Suou Himemiya had been a prolific correspondent to many of her peers in her time: they recognised her literary style and confirmed the account's authenticity. Which meant, since the dead woman's prose was perfect and her narrative as riveting as it was convincing- and because there was just something irresistible about the notion of reading a dead person's letters as they destroyed a living one's career-the demand for the resultant book was so high that the bookstores could scarcely keep up with the orders. This only led to more headaches for Takeda, of course.

The worst blow that Suou Himemiya's chronicles dealt him was in an entry that was actually not penned by her hand, nor even by the woman some accused of having written the chronicles under her name. In fact, no one knew of its falsity save for the two persons who inserted it into the text. Prompted by the dead woman's sister, Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki wrote a short but damning insertion into Suou's account of the Mentulaeans' invitation to Takeda-the one that had prompted him to try and march to Argentum, only to fall straight into the war. The inserted note rode off the original lines of the text, where Suou was expressing her scorn for the invitation and the flamboyant golden sculpture the Mentulae had sent as a gift. To this Urumi added two or three lines that she crafted for maximum suggestion. The suggestion in its simplest form was this: that Takeda Masashi had been bought by the Mentulae.

"Which means, whether it's true or not, that people think he was in discussions with them, at least!" Sergay Wang said despairingly to his fellow Traditionalists, who had come together to discuss the matter of Takeda Masashi, among other things. "I personally think he'd never do it. Takeda-san is too much of a straight arrow for that. But since he himself admitted that the artefact in question was among his possessions, he's become a bought man in the eyes of the People."

"It's not the People who rule Hime's judgements, but the Senate!" was barked at him by Haruka.

"Oh, I know that," he snapped back impatiently with a roll of the eyes. "But it remains a fact that popular opinion-and senatorial opinion, mind you!-has shifted even more powerfully against the man ever since that little titbit got out. And leave us not forget what Harada-san brought up yesterday during the session, the flood of letters we received from our North-based peers last year critiquing his performance in Argus and Sosia when first he took over for Fujino. Face it, my friends: on top of all that, the issue with the sculpture was simply the straw that broke the camel's back."

Off to the side, Hikaru Senou managed one of his more advanced feats of aristocratic expression: a sigh that sounded as though it had been drawled. He plucked a grape from a tray of food a servant offered.

"If he had half a wit in him, he would have denied being in possession of the sculpture," he sneered, turning the grape in his fingers and inspecting it. "In fact, he should have sold it off quietly the first chance he got, even before he came back. Banked the money for himself, and no one would have been the wiser."

Haruka glared at him. "That sculpture belongs to the Republic!"

To which no one made a direct challenge, knowing it would be impossible to make her understand that every other person in the room would have done exactly as Hikaru had said, Republic or no

Republic. There were times when the Armitagian arrow ran too straight for sanity, and was best left on its solitary path.

"Anyway, he could have just kept it hidden and handed it over at a more opportune time," her dearest friend volunteered meekly. All eyes turned to Yukino as she continued, moving some of her mousy hair over her brow, "He could have declared it as being from some other campaign, or something like that."

Sergay sagged in his chair and looked defeated.

"It's too late for that now," he said. "It scarcely matters that he insists he was going to turn it over to the state and just plain forgot. To everyone, it sounds more like he intended to keep the damned thing."

His shoulders dropped as he tried to think of a way out of this predicament-for Takeda Masashi's crash from favour was just that. The archconservatives had been the ones backing Masashi's replacement of Shizuru Fujino in the Northern Command, and the latest events had proven nothing so much as that the horse the Traditionalists had put their money on was in fact an ass. Even the predominantly conservative results of the last elections could not help to reduce the swing of public as well as senatorial opinion against the Traditionalists... which meant it was going to be a tougher year for them than they had foreseen.

It also meant that Shizuru Fujino was safe for one more year.

Despite the care Shizuru and Chikane had taken in including a five-year ban on discussions of the former woman's command and future province, the archconservatives were already trying to work out ways to topple her once and for all. Laws could be repealed; new laws could overturn old ones. Failing that, there might also be ways to siphon funds and support from a command until it became so miserable the commander would be forced to resign from it herself. Yes, many things could still be done.

It did not seem to occur to the leaders of the faction-save perhaps to Yukino Kikukawa, who was never really paid much attention-that Hime was in very real danger of losing all her northern provinces due to the Mentulaean attempts at invasion, and that they themselves could come up with no names as inspiring as Shizuru's when it came to the question of who else might spearhead that command. All that was important was getting her to abrogate her imperium, for their opposition to the woman had matured instead of faded with time. And why not? They had been opposed to her from the start, even when she had yet to shed her few pretences to tradition and amiability. Now that she had not only made them look like sheep in front of everyone but also managed to wrangle consular-level command from them afterwards, one could not expect the Traditionalist cause to be anything but justified. It gained new force from the moment Shizuru Fujino uttered that first thunderous "TACE!" in front of Senate and swore to destroy all who crossed her.

Due to the precariousness of their position at the moment, though, very little could be done save to plan for the future. So the Traditionalists settled for minor jabs at the Fujino hide instead, hardly felt because she was busy with her war abroad. Among the popular pokes they aimed at her were remarks on the present dearth of soldiers in the country-a problem for other wartime and war-threatened overseas governors, like Tanaka of Asia Province. He had been pestering the Senate for more legions to secure his rather tumultuous demesne, and the Traditionalists took every opportunity to point out, quite justifiably, that the tardiness of the answer for that request was due to the recruits all going to reinforce Shizuru Fujino's legions.

Few minded these little stabs from the archconservatives, though. For one thing, the elimination of an entire, decorated legion like the Eighth was still ripe in the popular mind. Such an event had not happened in decades, perhaps even a century, which meant that the vast majority of Himeans were praying for the success of the Fujino enterprise in their eagerness to see Mentulaean blood spilled.

Moreover, the former tribune of the plebs Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki was always in the Forum with one or two of the new tribunes, drawing people's attention to the related matter of prosecution for Takeda the Traitor. At first the conservatives had tried to get her hauled off the rostra, it being that she was no longer a tribune of the plebs and thus did not have the protection of that office, but they soon abandoned all efforts at it when every attempt only resulted in their people getting mauled almost to death by the people, whose protection the maverick apparently still enjoyed. So, Takeda Masashi's allies had no choice but to let the woman declaim what she would declaim and demand what she would demand.

After only a couple of weeks of Urumi's demands to the public, one thing was clear: one way or another, Takeda Masashi was eventually going to be brought to trial in the treason and extortion courts and not all the Traditionalists' best defence advocates would be able to help him.

"He can't be let convicted, damn it," Sergay told the others nervously. "If he's convicted, we'll have been shown up as having made a monumental mistake. Well, it's already clear that we did make a monumental mistake-but a conviction changes everything!"

"Can't we buy the jury if it comes to that?" asked Kazuya Kurauchi, only to wither when a dozen glares were shot at him.

"You might have enough money to contribute something to that," a sneering Jin Akagi told him. "But the rest of us can't afford to be so free of purse!"

"Beside the point, Akagi! Bribery is a vulgar resource for this problem!" Haruka interrupted indignantly, blissfully unaware of Yukino's mutter of "recourse". "I can see bribery being justifiable for a truly worthy cause-think to stop Fujino in one of her schemes, for instance, or to prevent a degenerate from occupying an important political office-but to defend this man ? Say what you will about him and his innocence, he's made us look like a joke! If we do end up helping Masashi, we should do it the proper way: as members of his defence counsel at court. We aren't even sure that it shall come to that."

"Oh, it shall come to that," Sergay huffed. "And whether we do try to bribe the jury or not, Haruka-san, it is a given that the Himemiya are going to bribe for a conviction too-and they'll get it, easy ! It's not just that they have more liquid assets among themselves than we do for that sort of payoff, it's also that the jurors will be predisposed to the idea of a conviction from the start. Nearly everyone is against Takeda-san now, and the jurors will also want to please the crowd that's sure to attend the proceedings. Want to bet the crowd will be crying out for him to be convicted? They'll take everything-and I do mean everything!-off him, even the clothes off his back!"

"We have to get him to abscond," Yukino spoke up. "Voluntary exile is the only way to save him."

"But we already tried that!" Hikaru whined. "Sergay said he wouldn't go because he's convinced of his own innocence!"

"We all know whether he really is innocent or not is irrelevant," Yukino replied. She turned to Sergay. "Can't you make him see this? Perhaps if you tried again?"

"I can try again," Sergay said tiredly, raking a hand through his blond hair: it was already starting to curl, and he knew he was long overdue for a trim. Only that he kept forgetting to visit his barber. So many things to do!

"I doubt I'll get him to agree. The man's insistent on sticking it out." He nodded at someone's scoff of " Thick! " and continued: "But I'll try again, little good though it will do. What bad luck that man has! We lost a few other members of senatorial families in that battle, no doubt their families are among those drumming for his prosecution now... but of all those he could have let perish, Himemiya Minor ? I would've sneaked her out of the lines the first chance I got! Her name aside, she really was a promising young woman, you know-and far more likeable, I thought, than her sister or Fujino, even if she did not quite have the same glitter."

"Agreed," said Hikaru, with a moue of sorrow. "I liked that young woman."

Yukino was frowning pensively, and now voiced what she had been turning over in her mind.

"Do you know," she told Sergay, "I'm not quite sure that's right? Not about Suou Himemiya-san: she was genial, I always thought. But about the suggestion that Masashi-san ran afoul of luck when he allowed her to fight in the frontlines. I think, actually, that he ran afoul of luck when he crossed paths with Fujino-san."

The rest exchanged looks with each other.

"We all know what blasted good luck that woman has, Yukino," Haruka said wearily. "I can't thank you for reminding us."

Yukino shook her head with a tiny smile.

"No-o, Haruka-chan," she said. "I wasn't actually talking about something esoteric when I mentioned luck."

"You're saying you think that the main force that was moving against him all this time was Fujino?" someone asked in confusion.

"No... not exactly," Yukino said. "It would be too much to move, for instance, that her hand was in Masashi-san's failures with the military, for those were her soldiers that were lost and we know how much she makes of her legionaries. I grant you that she's terrifyingly ambitious, but she's never low in her schemes, as I think even you would admit, Haruka-chan."

Haruka agreed, understanding what her friend meant.

"I mean, rather, that I think she's been the longer and more constant adversary to him than everyone else involved in the matter. Even now you can see her hand in this campaign against Masashi-san, and you could see the same dislike between them before that."

"Oh, everyone can see it!" Haruka said. "No doubt it's due to her being rankled that he managed to take her command off her. Fujino is a prideful person."

"True, in part, but I think it actually began before that-and that's what interests me. Listen." The others looked at Yukino in rapt attention as she began to explain without a trace of her old nervousness, the attention seeming to sit on her better now that she had had practice as a consul in the past year. "I know there's something a little... well... simple, perhaps, in crediting gossip, but when so many things and voices come together to support it, even gossip might prove true. Do you remember that rumour that came out last year, about some argument Masashi-san and Fujino-san had while they were both in Argus Province?"

A snort from somebody. "You mean the one with the grossly sensational accounts that say they got into fisticuffs?"

"Yes, although I don't believe it came to that," Yukino said. "Or not an outright brawl between the two, anyway. I have difficulty imagining Fujino-san going at it with Masashi-san."

"I'd actually like to see that," Akagi confessed.

Yukino persisted: "Still, if we pare it down to its most simple form, what do we get? An argument between two persons over, so it's said-"

"The barbarian girl!" Hikaru breathed, sounding simultaneously scandalised and pleased with himself for having the answer.

"Ooh, was that the same girl Katsu Hitagi mentioned?"

"I heard she's a rare beauty."

"I heard she was a princess."

"Bah, a barbarian princess is still a barbarian!"

"Yes, yes, I think it's the same girl," Yukino said, when they had all calmed down from their gossip-induced babble. "Anyway, it does suggest something, doesn't it? If it has been the same girl all this time, this may be significant to us. Because it seems to indicate that there is something in there that gets to Fujino-san. Even if we don't believe the fisticuff account of her argument with Masashi-san, there must have been some serious quarrelling in there for him to have been forced to leave Argus right after their supposed altercation. Too many people have sent letters whispering of that rumour to be ignored. Then there was the mention of the girl in Katsu Hitagi's speech, right after which..."

"She erupted like Vulcan pricked with a needle," Sergay finished for her breathlessly, nodding. "I see where you're going, Yukino-san. This might be something." He finally drew a breath and made a note to talk to Takeda about it to see what he might extract. "It really might be something."

Yukino smiled at his interest. She was gratified to have everyone's attention for once, and to be taken this seriously. Was that all it took, then, a little bit of gossip to get them to pay attention? So it was true: scratch the skin off a senator and you found little more than the average Himean on the street, rumour-loving and scandal-born!

"If it does, we have to be delicate in handling it." She lifted her brows at them expressively. "No more scenes like that with Hitagi-san, I should hope."

"Unless we can use it to our advantage."

"And risk getting burned the way even the river did when it threw itself against the fires of Hephaestus?" Yukino smiled sourly, still remembering Shizuru's hand swallowing hers during their last handshake, when the woman had promised that she would crush them all if her plans needed it. "No, I think it's too dangerous to do it that way."

"We'll think of something."

"So, what you mean to indicate..." Hikaru broke into the conversation, speaking with peculiar care because he was not certain he fully understood what was going on: it was hard for an aristocrat of his sort to accept that another aristocrat could be rendered defenceless by something like a mere lover-and a savage lover, at that. "You mean that this barbarian, whoever she is, is Fujino's weakness?"

Yukino turned her soft gaze to him, understanding his difficulty with the concept.

"That may not be the right word," Yukino said gently, mindful of Haruka's proud eyes fixed on her from the side. "But it's close, and it's a start. And it's definitely unconventional, but Fujino-san has never been conventional, Senou-san, so this bears investigation on our parts. If we look into this a little more, I think we might actually come to what we've been seeking out all this time: a way to break into Shizuru Fujino's shell."

---

As planned, Shizuru pulled outside the provincial city-capital of Argus with three legions at the start of the year. She found four more legions awaiting her there, although the woman overseeing them was unable to meet her when she arrived. Her cousin was at the docks doing business with grain merchants, and Shizuru decided to let the other woman find her later instead of seeking her out herself.

She went to the governor's mansion first to see Midori Sugiura-who had been prorogued, as she had expected-and install her lover in their old quarters. As she had sent word on the march of her return, rooms were already prepared by the time she arrived. She carried the girl to their quarters herself, her steward and several slaves trailing them with their effects. She stayed only long enough to ensure that Natsuki was well-situated in one of the couches in the bedroom, then excused herself so that she could see to the army. The girl she left behind watched her until she left, then threw her attention to Shizuru's steward, who felt her gaze with the unerring instinct of one truly dedicated to service. He stopped what he was doing to ask what she desired.

"To read," she told him unsurprisingly.

He checked that the chest of tomes Shizuru had ordered to be brought in was already in the room. He made two of the slaves open it and turned back to Natsuki, who ran her eyes dismissively over the many scrolls packed away.

"Which of them would you like, Dominilla?"

"What I want is not there," she said quietly, addressing him in his native tongue.

"You have only to say what it is and I shall have someone run to fetch it from the luggage, Dominilla."

"Not in the luggage either."

"Then I shall have someone run to fetch it wherever it may be, Dominilla."

She inclined her head to that and looked away, almost as though the conversation had ended there.

"This mansion," she started, as though she were speaking to herself instead of to him. "It has a library."

Hermias waited, well-indoctrinated to her oblique approaches by now.

"The governor permitted me to borrow from it," she continued softly. "Before."

He allowed sufficient pause to let her speak again if she wished. "And what is it you desire to borrow from there now, Dominilla?"

She looked at him.

"Anything on Hime," she said in that low voice.

He nodded, showing none of his inner curiosity at the request.

"Would you not have a particular area of interest, Dominilla?" he asked. "For instance, its history, the myths, its poli-"

"Anything on Hime," she repeated.

He bowed.

"Anything on Hime," he echoed in confirmation, sweeping around to snap his fingers at some of the slaves to see to her orders.

Following that, he went on organising everything in the enormous room, working around her until everything was up to his rigorous standards. Up went buckets of correspondence and fresh sheets of parchment on the desk, along with new quills and bottles of ink and sand. The general's standard cuirass and mail shirt-not her parade armour, those were kept in storage until needed-went on some bars near the desk, along with a pair of socks, army trousers, a new scarf and cloak folded on a chair. More chests were brought into the room and set to the walls, their heft meriting a few grunts from even the burly slaves.

Natsuki watched them peacefully, not at all interrupting their work save when they passed-although that there was even an interruption then was not her doing, truth be told. It was simply that those who came near felt compelled to pause and bow to the lady on the couch, despite the fact that they did not need to and were not expected to do it even with their mistress when they were going about their tasks and not being addressed. The man watching them make these swift bows understood: the dominilla of the Fujino retinue exuded a heavy sort of majesty, one that people tended to attribute to the fact that she had managed to escape death only by paying it a near-unconscionable price with her body. People were wary of things touched by death and the dominilla certainly did not help that wariness with her looks, which were both paler and darker than ever before. The bows the slaves gave to the young woman, therefore, were the bows people gave in passing to dread deities' shrines, more instinctive than volitional and intended to ward off the incomprehensible malevolence of the arcane before it struck.

It was to some extent unkind, Hermias thought, even if it did ensure that the slaves would have a kind of respect for her. He had a healthy respect for her himself that did not depend on fear, especially one laced with superstitious feelings. Granted, it was wise to fear what she might do to them if they displeased her-or more properly, what her displeasure would cause their mistress to do to them-but it was nevertheless cruel to regard her as though she were a phantom left over from dire wars. She was not a phantom in his eyes. She was merely a girl who had lost her leg and many of her friends, and who was now only trying to cover up all the holes the losses had carved in her with an enormous, independent dignity that made his eyes sting sometimes.

At some point in the arrangements, he approached her to ask if it would not displease her to have her sword set on the couch next to her own, set perpendicular to it. He was talking about the sword that Suou Himemiya had given her, and which his mistress had discovered packed with the girl's effects during her illness. Ever since Shizuru had returned it to her, it had pleased the girl to keep it within arm's reach at all times. She allowed him to place the sword, sheathed, on the other seat.

He had another query for her after that.

"Dominilla, which scent would you prefer?" he said, holding up two small vials. She looked at them curiously, recognising them as the containers of fragrance he sprinkled on his mistress's bedding to make it smell sweeter.

"It is... your mistress's choice, no?" she said with hesitation; he had never asked this of her before.

"The Domina said it was yours," he smiled. "We have been using this thus far-" he shook one vial "-but we recently managed to obtain this too, which the Domina likes just as much. When I asked her if she desired a change, she said to refer the query to you." He removed the covers on both vials. "Would it please you to test them?"

She still looked a little confused, but tested them as he offered.

"Which one would be preferable?"

She indicated the vial with the new fragrance.

And then, showing how hesitant she still was with this fresh power given her, reasoned: "For a change."

"As you wish," he bowed, going to sprinkle a few discreet drops on the bed covers and one or two on the pillows. "Please tell us whenever you desire it to be changed back to the old one."

Before he and the little army of servants finally left her in peace, Hermias managed to hand to her the books she had requested, setting several scroll buckets beside her along with a table on which he arranged some comestibles, a jug of water as well as one of fresh milk, a goblet, and a lamp. She had refused even the company of her own attendants when asked whom she preferred to wait on her while waiting for Shizuru, so he also left a bell to make it easier for her to summon two slaves, whom he directed to take up posts in the corridor outside. Her new personal attendant, a hulking but surprisingly friendly Otomeian who had recently been posted as her bodyguard and body-carrier when Shizuru was not around, took up a post outside as well.

"Dominilla," he intoned before leaving, "you are certain you need no more? Whatever it may be, we can fetch it."

She glanced at the table laden with everything she might need before her, the pillows he had placed behind her back for support, and the wrap he had draped over her lap only moments earlier. He had had someone inquire too if her old pet-Shizuki, whom she had asked for-was presentable, and had promised to have the panther brought over once the animal had been properly bathed. He had also sent word to her fellow Otomeians on her behalf informing them of where she was quartered and where to send for her should she be required.

Thinking of all this, Natsuki treated him to one of the things his mistress loved best about the young woman: a laughing smile about her eyes that managed by some uncanny exclusion to leave her mouth untouched. He answered with a grin and took the hint, finally excusing himself and leaving her to her thoughts.

Which was a relief, Natsuki considered in his absence, as she had enough to fill the room by themselves.

She reached for a scroll from one of the buckets the steward had left her and glanced at the title. It was an introduction to the Himean army-and while she supposed she might still glean from it a few points of information she was currently not aware of, she was also fairly confident that if there was anything she understood about the Himeans by now, it would be their army. She returned the scroll to the bucket and pulled out another. It was a more advanced text, this time dealing with a history of the Republic's class system.

She unfurled it and settled back against the pillows to read. For a while, this was all she did. She was not as fast as her lover when it came to dissecting the stream of letters that made up words and the procession of words that made up sentences, but she was still a swift reader, with a particular talent for cross-referencing information by memory because of the encyclopaedic stock of knowledge she had been collecting from books since childhood. She was pushing herself to read faster than usual these days, for she had a lot on which to catch up. It had taken her cousin the Princess Alyssa to point this out to her and now she had to remedy that.

You are a foolish girl.

The words knocked against her ears again and she took the blow without resistance, let the memory return with full acceptance. The words spoken in the past usurped those in the text before her and brought back, afresh, that conversation she had had with her relative.

"This is a miserable condition," Alyssa had told her, doing a slow evaluation of the area in which they had had this dialogue. This had happened in the general's quarters at the Sosia camp, so of course it had been a handsomely decorated area, full of Shizuru's favoured colours and the fine furniture that gave the tent the look of a genuine and very expensive bedroom.

Yet what Alyssa referred to was that this same area was marred by the tracks of an invalid. Rolls of bandages spread on a peacock-grained table; ointments and balms sat beside a mortar and bowls of prepared concoctions; jars of healing herbs and all manner of medicaments were lined up on the cupboards. All of which Natsuki only noticed after her cousin's survey, so deep had been her retreat prior to the woman's arrival one night earlier.

"You are a foolish girl," the woman had said then, her voice the flatly even thing she used when she felt verbal theatrics unneeded, and the voice she used when telling the truth. "Wallowing in this swamp for a consumptive. Look at this place."

A sweep of her bright blue eyes, at once dismissive and aware of everything.

"It's a shrine to sickness."

Natsuki tried to open her mouth, for all that both of them knew nothing would come out of it.

"Save your breath," the elder Otomeian said curtly, stopping that which never could have begun. "I know. I heard it from Otanara and the others. And from your men, whom you have not even seen since this happened. That is another of your errors, by the way."

She looked pointedly at the girl's amputated limb, not flinching from it at all.

"Your first error, even," she said. "You have been ungrateful, from what I hear. They saved your life, Natsuki, and I am glad for that." She scowled and said it more emphatically. " I am glad for that !"

Her eyes seemed to ask if Natsuki felt the same way, and also seemed to say that she doubted it.

"Why are you acting like this, Princess Natsuki?" she went on to ask more gently. "They tell me you have been behaving as though you have no more reason to live. But how can that be? When people save your life, you have reason to live. You of all people... you know this. It is no longer your concern or choice alone, Natsuki. You have to keep living."

Natsuki looked down, trying miserably to hide her humiliation.

"It's a heavy obligation," Alyssa admitted. "But the noble do not choose their obligations. And you are among the noblest of our people... in spite of the fact that you have recently chosen to act like an ingrate . That is not like the Princess I have known all these years. To be frank, you have disappointed me."

She reached forward to brush away the hair Natsuki was using to hide herself, and when she saw them, also brushed away the tears. Afterwards, she held out her hand and waited for Natsuki to take it. They held hands for some time then, saying nothing and both thinking of a past when the elder had asked the younger to take her hand like this, in order to lead her through what had then been a new and unfamiliar home.

"What did their surgeons say?" Alyssa asked after a while. "It is true you are out of danger?"

Natsuki nodded. She opened her mouth and when she spoke, did so in such a reedy voice that the other broke her grip in order to get a cup of water.

"You've not been speaking again, I see," the fair woman muttered, watching her cousin wet her lips. "Ye gods, Natsuki. No wonder Otanara was worried."

She inhaled slowly, measuring the waif who was before her yet on the verge of disappearing.

"This is an unpleasant repetition, my dear cousin-in more ways than one, I think?"

Natsuki stiffened, paused in her drinking.

Alyssa asked the query: "It was the same leg, wasn't it?"

Natsuki put down the cup, eyes closing. Alyssa shook her head.

"It's unlike you to be superstitious," she said softly, almost sadly. "A great many things are coincidences, Natsuki. Not everything holds special meaning."

The response was clear in the stricken face. Alyssa had known her long enough to read it easily.

"Even were it a punishment of some sort, not all is misery," she retorted to the silent response. "If you fear this to be some sort of penance for that which was not even your doing, at least see it in this light: that which once brought you so much grief has been cut away. There is no more reparation to be made." She scowled deeply, again shaking her head. "There never was a need for reparation in the first place."

Natsuki had dropped her eyes to the cup in her grip, her green eyes fixed on her own fingers, white-knuckled and quaking. Alyssa blew through her nose in exasperation when the trembling spilled a little of the water in the cup and on the girl's lap.

"Give that to me and listen," she said, taking the cup from her cousin and setting it aside. "Enough of those thoughts. Turn your mind to what is happening and what has yet to happen. Your neglect of yourself has not been befitting one of your station. This body..." A flat look directed to the stump under the sheets. "Your wound is not the end of your worth. Remember this, because it's what I came here to tell you."

The green eyes looking at her were confused and still grieving.

"You and I, we come from soldierly peoples," the other said firmly. "But it's a fault to consider that description paramount when there are other descriptions just as valid and as valuable. It's narrow-minded, and even less like you than it is for me. So you cannot ride off into the thick of battle any longer. What of it? You have your mind still and it is a mind worth considering. So you cannot strike an imposing figure to inspire your men in battle. Again, what of it? You have your face and most of a body that, from what I gather, has still the power to inspire a woman who has thousands of soldiers at her disposal. Take it from me: you are most assuredly not emptied, Princess. So do not act like it!"

She frowned, although the better way to describe her features was to say they were alight, not darkened.

"We make do with what we have," she asserted. "And you have a lot left. Your hold on Shizuru Fujino alone gives you a power unmatched in this camp, I am understanding, and may still be used in service to your country, if your fear is that you can no longer do anything for Otomeia."

There was a flicker that passed through the girl's face, followed by a hiss.

"Do not ask-" a gasp for air as Natsuki struggled to keep her emotions in check. "Do not ask me to - to - to use her!"

Alyssa lifted her brows and looked hugely haughty at this.

"I was not asking it," she said steadily. "And going from this reaction, Princess, I very much doubt that I could have. The two of you are quite taken with each other, are you not? She nearly went at me with her bare hands last night when I threatened to take you. And you... threw an apple at me."

The blush that stained Natsuki's cheeks was a shock against her ashen skin.

"I was..." She swallowed, telegraphed a plea in her face. "Cousin, I am vuh-vuh-very-"

"Yes, I know." Alyssa closed her eyes with what seemed a patient expression, then opened and fixed one glaring blue orb on the girl. "Would you have thrown worse had you had it in your hands?"

Natsuki was mortally injured by the suggestion.

"No!" she said with horror. "Never!"

Alyssa studied her with both eyes this time, expression unreadable.

"I've no desire to ask you to use her for my ends," she eventually continued. "And I've no need of it. After all, I'm merely going to do as His Majesty My Father has done, and use you instead. In which respect you need do nothing above what you have been doing. Feel free to enjoy yourself in this affair."

She exhibited a humourless grin at the girl's astonishment.

"What your lover said last night and this morning seems to be true," she said. "I believe father did give you to her, for the foreseeable future. I see how it could work out for Otomeia in the long run. Your lover is someone who shall always be a power in whatever world she occupies, an influential woman. And a beautiful one." She paused, looked evenly at Natsuki. "You think her beautiful?"

The younger woman's countenance assumed one of heavy guilt. Alyssa snorted, again without humour.

"Of course you do." Alyssa waited for the girl's eyes to come back to her from where they had fixed on the sheets. "All the better for His Majesty's plans, although I'm not best pleased with it."

She smiled after the confession that surprised neither of them.

"You knew this would be my reaction," she stated.

Natsuki smiled as well, but rather more weakly.

"She is not like other foreigners," the girl argued for her lover's sake.

"You are not like other Otomeians," Alyssa riposted. "You mistake my opposition as having only one root. There's more to this, Natsuki. My plan was to marry you last year, and were it not for Shizuru Fujino, I have every reason to believe father would have approved strongly of it. Had the Himeans not come, it is no stretch to say you would be my wife now."

She could not help but laugh at the utter shock on her younger cousin's face, and belted out a peal of laughter such as she had not had in many weeks. What would the woman hovering outside-was she the type to eavesdrop, Alyssa wondered-make of it?

She let her cousin recover her bearings for a moment before resuming speech.

"It's safe to say you did not expect that, Princess Natsuki."

The girl's mouth gaped as if to say something, was shut, then opened again to breathe a very windy, "No, Princess Alyssa."

"Yet I'm sure you see the advantages. Your dynasty with mine. And yes, I admit it, your wealth with mine." She stopped suddenly and bent over in the chair, reaching for the bag she had unceremoniously dropped on the floor earlier. She rummaged through it busily, clearly seeking something. "Though of course I would never have milked you. You know I'm not enamoured of gold in itself. The presence of a financial safeguard of the sort you offer for any ruler, however, would have been-"

"Expedient," Natsuki gasped out.

Alyssa grinned: "My word, your mouth."

She pulled out what she had been searching for in her bag: a blinding necklace of prodigiously large emeralds that made Natsuki blink several times to get the flash of reflected light to clear.

"I intended it to be my wedding present to my bride. Now it appears that it shall just have to be my get-well present to my cousin-for now, anyway."

She placed the necklace on the girl's lap, resting it gently above the silky, deep purple sheets. The green lustre was enhanced by the contrast, and Natsuki stared at it with bewildered awe. She reached out tentatively to finger one of the emeralds-she had never seen ones so large before-and stopped midway, begging permission to touch it with her glance.

"You need not wear it now," Alyssa said with a smile, shifting her baldric so she could sit more comfortably in her chair. "I would not burden your neck with that yet, lest it break."

The girl perceived the suggestion immediately, a furious procession of moods running through her eyes.

The most expensive gems from Scythia, Alyssa thought, glancing at the emeralds on the necklace then back to her cousin's irises. Still they fall short. I feel cheated.

"Princess Alyssa," Natsuki whispered, pleading with her face. "Cousin. I cuh - cuh - cuh - huhn-"

"At peace. What did I tell you long ago about taking time to breathe when you feel pressed?"

Natsuki started breathing in and out obediently. Her cousin finished her statement for her anyway.

"And you cannot marry me, not at the moment, I know - I said so, did I not?" Alyssa said, sounding like someone conducting business, which in a sense she was. "As I said, go on and enjoy your affair as long as you can. Insofar as your interaction with her remains of benefit to our nation, I've no intention of getting in between. But remember that when this affair has run its course as it eventually must, my offer and interest will still stand. And I will be satisfied once there are no more impediments of this type."

Natsuki said nothing, still trying to regulate her breathing as the elder woman had instructed. Her eyes were very large as she looked up, and her birdlike chest heaved and throbbed with each juddering inhalation. Again Alyssa smiled at the sight, for she really was quite fond of this relative.

"I'm not a very expressive person, but I hope you know how dear you have always been to me. I would treat you well." A beat. " She treats you well?"

Natsuki took a moment to breathe in and out before nodding.

"She..." She paused, took and passed a few more breaths swiftly. "She is kind to me. Always ."

"As would I be."

It was Alyssa's turn to draw a breath.

"I'm afraid I must go soon. I shall see to your troopers before I leave, although I think Kyo is looking after what remains of them. If you want him to be the new captain of the group, you should talk to them soon, however; the Lupine Division shall take no one else's words but yours come matters such as this. Your fanatics would not be content to listen to me if they know you capable of delivering words yourself."

The sunken eyes sparkled at this, which relieved Alyssa a bit. She knew it could not be easy to have to relinquish a command that the girl had held for years. Well, Alyssa had no intention of taking that completely away. As she had pointed out earlier, there was that excellent brain still to consider, which did not necessarily require participation in the actual fighting to be of use. And a clear message had to be sent to the other barons and nobles that the Princess Natsuki was not yet to be retired from her military duties, lest they begin consciously excluding her from the war proceedings: not out of cruelty, even, but simply because it would be seen as the right thing to do.

"I have to ask you to remain Head of the Lupine Division, however," Alyssa stated. "You have led and known them far too long for them to take well to the idea of anyone else managing their affairs, especially in court and military councils. I also need you to remain an active member of the army, given how lamentably few are the minds in our own high command that are endowed with your talent for creative thinking. To that end, I shall have it announced later to the officials and send news to His Majesty that under the power he vested in me for this war enterprise, I'm endowing you with a new title for the military. The title shall please you since I'm borrowing it from your friends the Hellenes. You shall be Polemarch of the Otomeian Army, Princess, which combined with your status as Head of the Lupine Division means you shall still have duties in overseeing stratagems, policies, and relations with the allies. Novel, I know, but these are novel times as well as trying ones. I'm sorry to have to ask you to take on even more work as you recuperate, but I fear you are still very much needed."

Alyssa tried very hard to hold back her smile when her cousin gaped at the news, the small face crumpling as the younger woman burst into noiseless tears. Silly girl, to think she would be let fade away so easily! Surely she could not have expected her cousin to do nothing?

"The Lupine Division's figure needs to be brought back to full-strength," Alyssa continued, still in tones of strong decision. "I would ask that you do this first of all, in fact. It's been a while since we had to undergo auditions, but I've no doubt you still know how to proceed. I'm going to make my own recommendations from my men-I have several in mind who would be suitable for your needs-and will leave the list with Kyo. I will tell the other captains to recommend from their ranks as well and give Kyo their lists tonight, so that he can consult with you tomorrow on which people you find acceptable for admission to your Division. I need you to make the decisions by tomorrow too, as I am leaving the day after that and need to know which persons to leave here so that they may begin their training. Is this acceptable?"

The younger nodded, still too taken aback by all this kindness to speak. She followed the gesture by dashing away her tears a little childishly with the back of one hand, striving to regain her composure.

"That is all for now," the elder princess said. "There is a lot to be done for me-and for you, keep it in mind. You are doing your most important duty at the moment, technically, by just being beloved of that Himean. But I see no reason that you should not endeavour to do it better by understanding her even more than you already do, as it may help you deal better with those from her people who may be less than kind to you. Do that reading you love to do, investigate their culture, learn as much as you can of her world: it may come to your advantage as well as Otomeia's later on. I am not happy that my cousin, whom I had long intended to marry, has to be the lover of a foreign politician in the interests of securing an alliance. But if it has to be that way and my cousin is pleased with it, I think that it would be well for my cousin to be the best lover that she can be for that foreign politician."

It would be wrong to say her eyes warmed: they never truly did. But they did soften.

"You wear excellence best of all coats," she said. "Never forget it. A princess with only half her legs can still be wholly a princess, Natsuki of Ortygia and Otomeia."

She got to her feet and leaned over the bed for the customary kiss on the lips she had always used in their greetings. She rather surprised her cousin this time, however, by putting more into the kiss than she had ever done before.

"For remembrance as well as curiosity," she said when she finally pulled away, leaving Natsuki's lips wet and swelling. "I wanted to know what I was missing. I also wanted you to know the same."

Natsuki sighed heavily at the recollection of that scene, rubbing her lips reflexively now as she had then. She had not done so out of disgust or some similar emotion at the time, but rather because she had been (deathly) afraid of what Shizuru might have done if she had suspected that someone else had touched her mistress's lips. No argument about light-hearted play or familial affection, Natsuki suspected, would convince the woman to rein in her viciousness were she to perceive something encroaching on her territory. And as disconcerting as her cousin's revelation about intending to marry her had been, Natsuki's love for her cousin was perhaps stronger than ever for all the woman had done, which meant she did not want to entertain Shizuru's hands laid on her relative. Alyssa was strong too, yes, and could fend for herself very ably: Shizuru, however, was beyond strength when enraged.

The woman had such hands, she thought, remembering the time the woman had shaken her out of frustration. She knew Shizuru had still been holding back then, yet her arms had been tender for over a week after only a few seconds of that grip. Not that the experience had the power to dull what she knew even better of them, which was their immense tenderness and the warmth of them on her chilled skin. It was a fine point of irony, to her mind, that the hands she thought kindest in the world were also the most fatal with which she had ever been acquainted. They were hands that could make you die, yet could get you killed.

What else she had to think on that particular subject was interrupted by a sound from outside the room. She craned her head lightly to better hear what was going on, but the source of the noise actually made it easier for her: the door swung open with a crash and someone stalked in, the posted slaves from the corridor trying fearfully to stop her advance.

Natsuki's mouth fell open, her scroll dropping to her lap.

"Do not touch me," the intruder sneered, affronted by one of the slaves' hand on her sleeve. It was one of Natsuki's slaves, the huge Otomeian who served now as her bodyguard and carrier, Zidek. This gigantic man had been summoned from the capital by the Princess Alyssa as soon as she had heard of Natsuki's amputation, and he was just another of the things for which Natsuki thanked her cousin these days.

He held on to the intruder's sleeve despite the latter's snarl, and Natsuki waved a hand at him so that he would let go. She motioned to the door and he exited obediently.

"Domina, please, she is out," one of the remaining slaves was saying, making gestures in the air that begged the intruder to step outside again. "The mistress has gone to see to the army."

"Really," the woman dusting off her sleeve murmured, albeit absent the earlier heat. She was distracted by what was opposite her, which was a raven-haired, fabric-swathed wraith with a lovely face and an open scroll atop her legs. What a picture for a greeting! Said wraith regarded her with a look that said it was as fascinated with her as she was with it, and that drew her mouth into a curve that her relative would have recognised as boding ill.

"Well, she's new," she said under her breath, suddenly giddy.

The slaves resumed their entreaties.

"Resume your posts - I will wait for your mistress here," she told the slaves in a voice that brooked no dissent. "And shut the door behind you. Go, before I have your mistress whip the lot of you."

The slaves exchanged uneasy looks, glanced at the still-staring Natsuki, then excused themselves to do as commanded. They had not yet shut the door behind them than the newcomer was already stalking over to the couch, approaching with a confident, I-own-all-you-see gait that further fascinated the watching girl for its familiarity. Whereas the walking woman's green-gold eyes were darkened by interest, however, the waiting one's eyes were tainted with disturbance instead.

Natsuki was seeing-experiencing-something worthy of unease. What had come into the room and was now walking towards her was a version of Shizuru drained of colour and recast in new metals, topped with a mane even more fantastic than her lover's because it was not white, not even grey, but steel. Another moment of staring at this unbelievable replica of her lover distinguished the image from the original and stripped away the illusion, but not the effect. There was still genuinely so much of Shizuru in the woman, flickering in and out of her narrowing eyes, angling into view with the arrogant lines of the jaw and the condescendingly patrician nose. She even observed Natsuki with something of the same slightly temperamental, secretly undressing gaze Shizuru had often given her at the start of their acquaintance. And Natsuki, who until now had never understood that she could feel physical attraction to anyone else save Shizuru herself, looked away with cheeks that burned as though she had been slapped, ashamed beyond words.

Shizuma understood, having seen the reaction in the girl's face during her approach.

"Ave," she greeted at the end of her advance.

Natsuki glanced up at the woman, only to bow her head awkwardly and return the greeting in a whisper.

"These," Shizuma announced, "are my cousin's rooms."

She noted that the girl showed no surprise.

"Did she tell you about me?" she asked.

A nod.

"Then you know my name as well?"

Another nod, and that was all.

Oh, of course - "Not a talker."

"Then I should like to say we are even," said the standing woman, crossing both arms loosely and unleashing a brief grin. "But I feel I cannot, as I seriously doubt she spent as much time talking to you about me as she did talking to me about you, Princess Natsuki."

An incline of the head flashed a speck of green, but the hair curtained it away quickly.

"Natsuki is sufficient," the young woman answered, and Shizuma was pleased to see that her voice was as pleasantly whisper-low and feather-soft as she had been led to believe. Now if only the girl would lift her head and display her damned face! Why did she have to be so furtive, anyway?

"An odd thing for royalty to say," she retorted to the permission the foreigner had just given. "I have heard it said that those of noble stock still invested with their titles are most reluctant to leave them out of their address-certainly, if you come from a nation that insists on retaining titles, unlike us, it would be odd if you as an individual did not also insist on retaining yours. Are you certain you would not prefer me to remember your title, Princess?"

"Thank you," the low voice said. "Buh-buh-but I need no one's remembrance for my own."

Shizuma decided she might like this mistress of Shizuru's after all.

"Then it shall be 'Natsuki'," she said. "Although I shall never forget that the unspoken title of 'princess'."

The girl ducked her head again and Shizuma's lips twitched.

Really very shy... and that is an unexpectedly adorable stammer; so far Shizuru has described her exact. But her face-I want to see the face I saw from a distance.

The young woman opened her mouth: "Shizuru is-"

"Going to turn up, sooner or later. I imagine it would be the former option as it would be a fool who would keep you waiting, and my cousin is not a fool."

The girl was peeking up just then so she accompanied this with her most winning smile, the one that always got her a hitch of the breath from those who would later be opening their legs to her attentions. It was a test, in its own way. So when she heard that little almost-gasp from her favourite cousin's lover and whom her cousin had described as a woman beyond all women, she was somewhat disappointed and perhaps a little bitter. She immediately prepared to shift her attitude to one of cold courtesy-if she could summon sufficient civility for the girl who had fooled Shizuru and, for a moment, even her.

Her frosty farewell was stopped by the curious sound coming from the girl, though. Shizuma peered closely in curiosity and realised that the girl's shoulders were shaking.

She stared, unsure of what had just happened.

"Is there something you find something amusing?" she asked, distracted from her purpose.

"You..."

Shizuma bristled.

"... are her cousin," the girl finished, still trying quite hard not to give vent to her hilarity. Little puffs of laughter were coming through her nose, however, and Shizuma stared harder at her.

Eventually, the Himean found herself trying not to laugh as well.

"I see," she said, understanding now. "I see. Did she do that to you often in your early acquaintance?"

Another stifled chuckle. "Even now."

"Lucky girl, to be given such attentions!" Shizuma placed a hand on one hip and abandoned all her attempts at being distant: she had already decided to like the young woman. "My cousin may be a charmer, but not a flirt. Well, save on occasions where there is absolutely no danger of being taken seriously, in which case it would not really be flirting, would it?"

The look she received was calm and oddly clear. This time, it was Shizuma whose breath hitched as the new tilt of her companion's head slid away the many locks of hair, exposing the exotic planes her cousin had been lauding to her for months. How right she had been to do that! It was indeed a face, even better from nearby because proximity revealed the lustre of the eyes. Not even the effusion of adjectives Shizuma's love-struck relative had been using to describe them captured their colour. Neither leaf-like- too lucent - nor emerald- too animated -they were shocking little pools of green the likes of which Shizuma had never imagined possible in mortal eyes.

Then she caught and cursed herself. She had been staring, and the girl knew it.

What a creature Shizuru would pick, and how like my cousin to pick this way, she thought. She cast about for a subject and landed a glance on the unevenness of the rise to the lilac dress. She rejected that subject, knowing what it was as she had been informed by correspondence beforehand of this misfortune. Instead she directed her attentions to finding a seat, and her eyes went to the one with the sword propped atop it. The seal on the sheath caught her attention as she was about to move the weapon aside.

"Why... this is of the Himemiya," she said wonderingly, picking it up and looking to her cousin's mistress for an explanation. "Why do you have it, Natsuki-san?"

The green eyes dropped a shutter: something was being concealed.

"Natsuki is enough," the girl murmured.

"Natsuki, then."

"It was a gift," was the answer.

"A gift," Shizuma echoed pensively, running her hand over the sheath. "From Suou-chan?"

The shutter went back up and Shizuma saw the flash before it could be hidden again: it was pain that had been behind them.

"Suou?" the young woman on the couch said with passion, body actually twisting towards her. "You know - knew Suou?"

Silvery brows went up at this familiar address, but she replied nevertheless: "Of course. I count her sister among my greatest friends, Suou-chan not far off. She shall be missed, and upon my word, avenged. With utmost prejudice." She paused, steely brows drawn together. "She gave this to you?"

An affirmative.

"Then take good care of it, for it came from a person of genuine worth." She set the sword gently beside her, careful to place it where it would still be within reach of its owner. She took a seat on the vacated space. "Now then. How is she?"

The look she got was confused.

"I mean my cousin," she explained.

"Ahh." The exhale was followed by a slow nod. "She is... well."

"How are you?"

Again the look was confused, and Shizuma smiled lightly.

"Your answer to this would answer the previous question better, I suspect," she said. "If you'll not clarify for me, I shall have to flesh out details myself."

Here she stopped to give the girl another evaluation, trying-with some difficulty, she admitted to herself-to ignore the extraordinary beauty for a moment and isolate only some aspects of the form. Perhaps it was easier at this range: this close she could see the shadowed patches of fatigue under the eyes, the light greyness of the lips. She could see how thin the girl really was, and how one could make out the fine traceries of veins around her wrist under what looked like the barest tissue of skin.

" Are you well?" she asked more earnestly than before.

It was apparent that she was asking out of fear that the person before her was at present in some suffering that she had not noticed quickly enough. Natsuki, who felt herself liking the woman better for that frank compassion, sought to reassure her with an almost equally frank smile.

As their luck would have it, that was when Shizuru walked in.

The general had been out checking that her officers had all in control and seeing to a few things she wanted to get out of the way sooner rather than later regarding the instalment of the legions in their cantonment. These minor impedimenta were actually quite quickly handled, but she had been detained longer than planned by a chat with the man running special espionage on the Mentulae for her.

Yamada was eager to ingratiate himself with the ever-rising young senator, especially given that he knew her friend had reported his recent period of inaction and would have predisposed her to be frosty to him. As such, he had paired his apologies with an offering: the latest information on what was happening on the Mentulaean side of the borders, which he knew would be significant to anyone in her position. Fortunately, she deigned to spare time to hear him out, during which he explained that his network had discovered that the second force meant for invasion had been detained a little further north and farther from the borders than the Mentulae had planned. The Prince Calchis, its commander, had been forced to take this position owing to a sudden resumption of rebellious movements among the tribes he had supposedly already conquered there on his father's behalf. This meant that the central and eastern Mentulaean regions would have relatively fewer troops than expected: a boon for Shizuru's mission.

Shizuru showed little excitement at this intelligence, however, for it was not her intention to show him she thought it as important as he did just yet. After listening stone-faced to the man's presentation, she merely reminded him of their agreement, and asked if he truly was committed to it. Upon receiving an earnest affirmative, she then proceeded to shock the generally self-possessed man by informing him that she had already drawn up papers granting him the citizenship and that he could count himself a Himean that very day.

"As my client," she told him with the hint of a smile. "Which means I am now your patron. I should inform you that the conditions for patronage generally extend to the ability to call freely on the services of clients, absent pecuniary considerations if so wished. However, as I hardly wish to deprive you of your profit, I shall settle for a discounted price on your work for me. Shall we see say thirty percent off the total and a commitment to privilege my needs above all other potential customers?"

There was nothing for it but to agree to her conditions. He actually admired her more for them.

"I am glad we have that settled," she said, suddenly turning jocose. "Please remember that I shall geld you should I ever have cause to doubt your loyalty to me. My preferred procedure for traitors is actually to hang them from a joist upside down, skin the balls first, then follow with the actual castration. A delicate procedure."

"Any eunuch would stay in your bed instead of climbing into Obsidian's, Fujino-san," the man replied after a pause to clear his throat. "I'm the sort of safe gambler who bets on sure things, you know."

She left well-satisfied with him. She had gone straight from that conversation towards her quarters, wanting to check on her girl one more time before she got on to more brass tacks for the army, but had been informed by the slaves outside their room that her cousin was inside and had thus been a little uncertain of what to expect on entry. She certainly had not expected to see her cousin sitting next-so close! -to Natsuki and Natsuki regarding- smiling at! - her cousin that way.

She stopped at the doorway and the pair turned to her with looks of greeting. Still unsure of how well she liked this image- too close!- she stepped from her post at the entrance gingerly, motioning to the slaves she had brought with her to stay where they were against the wall, unseen.

"This is a surprise," she said, her shirt making that hiss chainmail did when the links slid over each other; she bent over her lover and gave her a kiss first, then presented her cheek to the girl for a return of the gesture. It was a show, and her cousin was not fool enough to miss the fact that the show was staged for her benefit.

"I presume the two of you have gone through introductions," she told the pair afterwards.

"More or less," Shizuma said with a sweet smile. "Natsuki-" she drew out the name voluptuously "-has been very warm and welcoming."

"That is good." Shizuru's hand slid over her lover's shoulder and held on to it. "I was looking for you earlier."

"I could say the same to you."

The silver-haired woman rose from her seat and smoothed hands over the lap of her tunic.

"I assumed you would want to check on the new legions and have a talk with me, cousin. I would not blame you if you wished to put that off given what other, infinitely more appealing companionship you have to occupy you here," she said, directing a smile at the dark-haired girl who was watching the two patricians with even greater absorption than she had shown with Shizuma alone. The silver-haired woman supposed she was comparing them, and she was right.

"I am tempted indeed," Shizuru said to her cousin, hand a little heavier on the girl's shoulder. "But I cannot leave my duties to others, or Natsuki would berate me herself: she keeps me in line, you know."

"Does she? You are fortunate to have such a person, cousin!"

"I count myself that each day, yes."

"Methinks I would profit from such help as well. I confess myself the one tempted now."

"To do what?"

There was a crisp rap from the doorway that interrupted the developing bicker-match. The would-be contestants paused to find Miyuki Rokujou at the door.

"Er... pardon if I am interrupting," the legate said with uncharacteristic hesitation. She kept glancing to something out of sight from the entryway and seemed to be consciously edging away from the side to which she was directing her suspicious glances. Shizuma was curious, but was unable to ask about it when the other legate asked to be allowed to enter. Their general granted permission, and Miyuki strode in at a swift clip, looking inexplicably relieved.

"Just arrived and two visitors in my rooms already. My, but I am popular today," Shizuru smiled at her lover, who lifted a brow that asked when she was ever not .

"What is it, Miyuki?" the senior legate prompted her old friend, still wondering why the woman was behaving so oddly. "Are you all right?"

"Oh - oh, right, yes," the usually collected woman said, running her hand through her hair in yet another uncharacteristic gesture. "I came to see you, Shizuma. I was told you would be here... although I also thought I would see if Shizuru-san wanted to have me check on the new legions and prepare a report on them."

"No need, I shall check on the legions myself," Shizuru said, turning to her and exposing a corner of something Shizuma had not noticed before. She drew attention to it.

"Cousin, what is that... thing tucked into your belt?"

Shizuru smiled.

"Oh, yes, I nearly forgot," she said, drawing it out from behind her and grinning at the girl on the couch. " Meum mel, here is a quill made from a peacock feather. I saw it when I was passing by a scribe's store earlier. See how pretty it is."

She presented it to Natsuki with commendable grace for someone whose two subordinates were watching with eyebrows halfway up their foreheads. The recipient of the gift, however, accepted her present with grace equal to her own and thanked the gift-giver with acquiescence to another silently solicited kiss on the cheek.

"I thought it would please you," Shizuru said, either quite oblivious to Miyuki and Shizuma's exchanged glances or simply unconcerned about them. Either way, she certainly appeared very proud to them for a woman fawning over her foreign mistress shamelessly. "As would she."

The only seated person in the room raised her chin.

"She?" she whispered.

"Well, I actually I encountered them headed here, so I cannot take credit completely," Shizuru admitted. She called out to the slaves she had ordered to stay out of sight some moments ago. "Off with it now!"

The next few seconds were rather a blur to the girl, who watched the sudden explosion of movement from two of her companions in the room with some befuddlement. The finished tableau after all the manoeuvres was one of Shizuma standing in front of Natsuki's couch and brandishing Suou's sword, Miyuki a little off to her side and looking ready to pull out her own weapon, and a very amused Shizuru still in her place, merely regarding her cousin's horrified face with a growing smile.

"Ecaster, Shizuru, have you lost wits?" Shizuma cried out, watching the approaching creature with sweaty fear. "Why would you unleash this upon your own lover? Or us?"

Miyuki, who had at least been warned of this even if she still found confronting the real thing unchained frightful, glanced at her friend and tried to explain. Shizuru beat her to it, however.

"As impressed as we all are by your heroics, dear cousin," the general said, "they are unnecessary. Let her pass. She merely goes to her master."

Shizuma stared at her again as if she had gone mad. Shizuru sighed and manoeuvred her cousin's arm down, literally dragging her away from her defensive position.

There followed a human cry of delight as Natsuki saw what had been hidden from her view by Shizuma's back, followed by an animal chortle as the unleashed panther leapt happily into its owner's arms. It had not forgotten Natsuki at all, and Natsuki certainly looked to have not forgotten it either. Shizuru watched the pair reacquaint themselves with each other, feeling just as gleeful as they did because it had been some time since she had seen Natsuki this visibly delighted. How nice to see her girl's smile so untrammelled again!

She clapped her hands at the slaves who had bathed and brought the animal and told them they could go.

"Jupiter," the slack-jawed Shizuma whispered beside her, finally dropping the arm with the sword. "Jupiter."

The blonde faced her.

"Shizuma, come now, I told you I gave her a cat," the younger woman said in a scolding tone.

For the third and possibly not the last time that day, Shizuru got a look questioning her sanity.

" Cat ?" Shizuma echoed hoarsely. "A cat?"

"Yes."

"You told me you gave her a little cat! A kitten!"

"Well, it was a kitten at some point, you know."

"A kitten!" Shizuma sheathed the sword with some reluctance and put it on a different table from before, not yet willing to come near the two purring creatures on the couch. "Why would you give her that - that - monster ?"

"Oh, really, Shizuki is hardly deserving of such a designation!"

"Shi-are you insane?"

Miyuki chose to speak up.

"Again, pardon my intrusion," she said hurriedly. "But if you do not mind, Shizuru-san, I think I would like to wait for Shizuma outside instead. And for you, so we can check on the new legions."

She did not bother waiting for a reply and made her way out, whipping out a handkerchief from her uniform and dabbing at her mouth with it.

"I think I'd rather wait for you outside as well," Shizuma said disgustedly, clearly still bothered by the presence of the huge animal jumping around the couch. In what corner of the world was something that big, that fast, that black still referred to glibly as a cat ? "Come out quickly, would you, or I might come in with a pack of legionaries for fear you've both been mauled to death. Good gods, to call that a kitten! You've gone round the bend, Shizuru."

After which she made her way out of the room with as much dignity as one could muster while checking constantly over their shoulder for an animal lunging at them. A chuckling Shizuru followed her to shut the door. When the general turned around, she received a reproachful look from her kitten.

"Yes, perhaps I did enjoy that a little too much-but I must say it is wonderful to see my cousin so riled for once," Shizuru confessed, coming over to stroke their old pet's head as well. It snorted at her, shifting its pawing attentions to the straps of her uniform's leather skirt. "She is so large, my darling! Did you imagine her being of this size already?"

"No," Natsuki said with a smile. "So large now, yes."

Shizuru stroked the furry black jaw, her hand tickled by the vibrissae as they brushed over her wrist. Natsuki kept her own hand busy on the panther's body and rubbed patterns into the gleaming coat.

"Still so docile," the older woman murmured as she heard the thrum of the beast's purr. "Thank goodness. She looks big enough to eat someone now."

She gazed at her girl.

"Was my cousin pleasant to you?" she enquired.

"Mm-hm."

"She is charming, do you not think so?"

"Mm-hm."

Her cousin would have tried to flirt. Shizuru knew this, and knew it would have been harmless and probably done partly to check how faithful Natsuki really was. Which still did not make her like it any better.

"My cousin..." Shizuru paused, wondering how best to word this. "Shizuma is fond of beautiful women. Do not think badly of her."

Natsuki's eyes flickered.

"I say the same to you of her, Shizuru," she said softly.

Shizuru wrinkled her nose with humour, not at all bothered that she had been found out.

"Am I so obvious?" she asked.

A speaking look was her answer.

"Then pardon me." She pulled in her lips and added, "But I care not for anyone's hand on what is mine."

The other woman held out her arms in response. Shizuru complied, abandoning Shizuki.

"Where do you wish to go?" she asked, when she had already picked up the younger woman. Natsuki hesitated-almost as though she had not thought of a location before holding out her hands, Shizuru thought-but eventually pointed to the bed. Shizuru dutifully carried her over and placed her on the mattress. "Is that good?"

A nod. The Otomeian refused to let go.

"All right," Shizuru chuckled, following her gently downwards, rolling to rest next to her with a laugh. "Although I should not be lying here: I need a bath." She felt another body suddenly bumping against her, one covered with short and thick hair, and laughed again. "Ye gods, I am surrounded by felines."

Natsuki murmured something in her ear, stopping her laughter.

"Ah, yes," Shizuru said, sighing and getting up. "I said I would talk to you about that soon. I remember."

"That" referred to what she intended to do in the winter. The topic had come up several times before on the way to Argus, not just with Natsuki but also with her officers, and the commander had not been forthcoming with either party, which her officers knew to be fairly normal for her when she was planning something where secrecy might be important. However, this had not been normal with Natsuki and had consequentially hurt the Otomeian, even if the girl had tried her hardest not to show it.

In hindsight, it would have been easier for her to leave it there, Shizuru reflected. But she was unable to stand the hidden hurt in the girl at her refusal to share her thoughts, which had once been free and open for Natsuki's perusal before. Shizuru could not have let the young woman hold that hurt, especially when the true source of the hurt was in the girl's interpretation of Shizuru's confidentiality as avowal of her devaluation, something Shizuru would never have permitted even as a mere idea. So in order to prevent at least that wound from opening up in her lover, Shizuru had told her part of the truth, admitting that she did not yet wish to disclose her intentions because they would involve to some extent Natsuki herself, and the involvement was such as would be likely to require a private conversation between the two of them. This conversation, she said, was one that she did not wish to have while on the march and living amidst her officers in a tent that afforded limited privacy. She had then promised to take up the matter once they got to Argus and were once again afforded the confidentiality of a closed room with real walls and a firm ceiling.

Still, this is not what I meant when I said "once we are in Argus", the woman considered dryly, looking at her lover's sober face. I should have expected her to take me at my word literally, I suppose. But this is a precipitous time for such a conversation and not the time I wanted!

"I fear I have little time to spare at the moment," she said, knowing the words rang untrue even to her ears: she was commander of the entire enterprise and could spare time whenever she wished. "As promised, though, I shall tell you soon."

"Soon has come," said Natsuki, who was obviously getting antsy about the subject due to Shizuru's unwillingness to come to it. The girl was no fool: she had sensed that whatever Shizuru had to say was most likely something that she would not like, and when it came to things of that sort, she preferred to face them sooner rather than later. Especially given all that had happened of late.

"Soon is now, no?" the young woman pressed. "You - you cannot tell me quickly?"

Shizuru sighed and got up, standing beside the bed and assuming an apologetic smile.

"Soon," she repeated. "I shall tell you soon. But I have things to do first. I shall return to talk to you about it, but you heard what I said to my cousin. She is outside with Miyuki-han and you know I hate to keep people waiting."

She bent to give her what was supposed to be a farewell kiss, but met fingers instead of lips.

"Natsu-"

A thumb and forefinger held her chin, stopping her retreat. The steadiness of the eyes on her were surprising, to say the least, and they arrested for an instant what she intended to say.

"Come now, Natsuki," she essayed, smiling her way through the surprise that had given her pause. "I shall tell you soon. I have to take care of work first."

That elicited a shake of the head.

"Natsuki," she repeated. Again the girl shook her head and Shizuru felt something unexpectedly intimidating licking at her heels. A small line on her brow betrayed her confusion at Natsuki's insistence, but she permitted none of the hesitation to corrupt her tone. "Pardon me, but I really have no time."

The fingers let go, to her relief. She straightened and looked at the cat watching the two of them, its yellow gaze innocent yet oddly voyeuristic.

She looked again at her lover and tried a small grin to convey apologies in parting. She had already turned around when the low voice addressed her once more, speaking in a solemn tone she had not heard in some time. And in a language that Natsuki almost never used with her too, which she knew the girl had preferred for use with her-no, their dead friend.

"You said your intentions required my involvement," the girl noted to her back, stopping her escape. "And that it wuh-wuh-would require too a discussion between us."

Shizuru turned around and nodded, honouring the girl's seriousness with her own gravity.

"True, that I did," she said, also speaking in Greek.

"Yuh-yet..." Natsuki swallowed, steeled herself to say what she had to say. "Yet you are going to tell your cousin what it is before you tell me."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow, not gainsaying it because it was true.

"The conclusion one must draw," the girl finished, "is that the discussion you plan for us does not hold my involvement... except in agreeing to what you are planning."

Her chest heaved after she got out her accusation and Shizuru considered her in the ensuing silence, intrigued by the realisation that the girl was actually still very afraid of her yet was also daring to prod her just to get to the truth of this thing. Had the girl divined her plans already, then? Uncanny and unlikely, but she also had to wonder if there was some animal instinct already built up between them now that had allowed Natsuki to detect something in the air about her meaning. Not a divination by Thought, but by some other sense. Was it a matter of Sound, for instance, or even of Smell? Could Natsuki already sniff out the things she was thinking?

For a moment she considered yielding, but she had already given her word that she would do this at a later time. One in her position had to be stern, or so the stubborn side of her asserted suddenly.

"Natsuki, I am sorry, but I have decided the matter already," she said, adopting a firm tone she hardly ever used with the girl. "I must go with my officers first, but I shall return soon. You can wait for me for a few hours."

That there was even a reply to this was sufficient to knock her off-balance in itself.

"No," the girl said shakily.

" No ?"

"No, Shizuru." A yanked inhalation. " They can wait for you for a few minutes."

Shizuru's face was the depiction of sternness warring with astonishment.

"Natsuki..." she said, shaking her head. "Be reasonable."

"Please."

"I shall meet my officers now."

"You can meet them later, Shizuru," the young woman said quietly.

"I have to check on the new legions-"

"A legate can do it."

Shizuru said not a word to this, her face turning darker even as Natsuki's chest-heaving got worse and worse. Finally, after a while of glaring sulkily at the younger woman, the Himean general turned on her heel and walked towards the door.

Miyuki and Shizuma were still outside. They had clearly been chatting during the wait, for the two were smiling when they turned their heads to their commander.

"You tarried long enough," teased her silver-haired cousin. "Thank the gods you seem to be in one piece."

"I shall meet you later," Shizuru said. "Give me a report on the new legions then, cousin. Miyuki-han shall help."

And she went back inside her room, shutting the door calmly as she vanished from view. The two women left in the corridor blinked at each other, both a little slack about the mouth.

"Unusual for her to change her mind like that," Miyuki observed. "Isn't it?"

Shizuma's flabbergasted look was all the answer needed.

Inside the room, the two were in the same positions as before, staring each other down again. Shizuru lifted an eyebrow at the young woman sitting on the bed, surprised by her own actions. Had she just yielded to someone else's command in a confrontation? There could be no mistaking it: what she had just received earlier had been commands. Yet Natsuki did not look the least bit triumphant, which mollified her pride a little.

"Does this satisfy you, Your Highness?" she said with a hint of taunting.

As Natsuki's face lined with remorse, the older woman got herself a stool so they could sit face-to-face.

"It will satisfy," Natsuki whispered, peeking at her lover with pained apology. "It... Shizuru, what is it? Please, tell me?"

Shizuru settled in front of her lover and said, hardly able to help herself, "How nice to hear it phrased as a request again."

The girl on the bed reached for her hand. The older woman let her take it and also permitted her to press her lips to its curve, trying to apologise for her earlier insolence.

"Shall you tell me why I should not be displeased with you for ordering me around, meum mel?" Shizuru asked eventually.

Natsuki looked up, face half-hidden by the hand she was holding.

"Because you are not displeased," she murmured, doing an excellent job of shamming certainty in Shizuru's feelings. The older woman's lips quirked.

"Smart girl. It is true, I am not really," Shizuru admitted while crossing her legs and petting the girl's cheek. She cocked her head slightly to one side, considering the young woman with worry. "But that was unlike you just now to insist in such a way, and that is what troubles me about this. Is something wrong, Natsuki?"

Natsuki gave her a beseeching glance.

"I ask that," she said. "Of you."

Shizuru supposed she had to praise the girl here for her courage, considering that every part of Natsuki was shaking with an obvious suspicion that whatever Shizuru had to say was along the lines of a dismissal. Or was it something else Natsuki was thinking? Oh, who knew any longer? The Himean sighed deeply and reconsidered the matter, beating her own pride into submission for it. She supposed she had let the girl have enough grief over this: she had not know that it was bothering the girl this badly- bad enough, a voice inside berated-and she really did know better than to let the one she adored suffer such anxieties. Perhaps it was indeed best for both of them to get it done and over with as soon as possible, ultimately.

"Winter is nearly here," she started. "And we have every indication that once it does, the Mentulaeans shall be content to spend it in defensive attitude again, at least going from what we know of them from experience as well as actual intelligence from our sources abroad the country. Thus, I shall move forward in the winter, which they shall not expect."

Naturally, the sensitive ears picked up the inflection in the pronoun.

"You will lead the advance?" the girl said in a soft query, getting a nod. "And... and where do you go?"

"Through the lowest parts of the river border," Shizuru replied. "You recall: I pointed out the area to you before, the one at the very bottom of the River Atinu, near its section leading to the sea. I am going to put up a bridge on the wrong side of that area, then shall move west before joining Kenji-han and picking up the legions over there from him."

"The wrong side..." Natsuki's eyes went wide as she caught on. "You want to go through the major massif?"

"They shall be too busy keeping watch on the easier-traversed parts of the border to see us once we do come out of the mountains."

Natsuki was impressed. "In winter, Shizuru."

"If your people can march through the mountains, so can mine, Princess," Shizuru said. "Besides, I had some people investigate the pass I plan to take. Rugged, naturally, but still manageable with the right organisation."

The look she received said that Natsuki thought her the type of person who would consider even the impossible manageable, so it was only natural that she would deem the massif so.

"Height?" Natsuki asked.

"Roughly twenty-five hundred metres."

"Then it matters little for the crossing, the season," said the mountain expert.

Shizuru nodded.

"True: at that height, the season does not truly shift, or not appreciably where my purposes are concerned. But the season does matter for another reason, which is that I mentioned earlier. It is harder to deal with rapid and unpredictable enemy movements if your defensive stance is static, which is precisely the attitude the Mentulaeans favour. They have figured out their winter positions by now as ones meant to deal most effectively with threats coming from the areas they have already pinpointed as origins of enemy forces. These are the crossings on the borders, your cousin's camp there and the camps of the legions I sent to police the edges with her, Kenji-han's position. They shall be considerably less prepared for a variable like the one I plan to throw at them."

"And your march will be occidental to force them to shift their forces from the east," Natsuki observed. "If they do... you will loosen the borders."

"Precisely, mea vita."

"It is a good plan," the girl confirmed with approval.

"Do you think so?"

"They will think you mad. But it is what makes it good."

"I am gratified that you approve, Natsuki."

"Um..." A frown. "But what is my involvement?"

Shizuru's smile vanished, in its place a sad smile already begging apology.

"You know, of course, that I cannot take you with me on this excursion," she said heavily.

To her credit, Natsuki only had to hide her eyes for a few seconds. Of course she knew.

"I would not risk your health," Shizuru said with hesitation, before adding with vehemence: "Not ever again."

Natsuki looked away, but only for a moment.

"I know this," she whispered. "That is all?"

Shizuru shook her head.

"I am going to have Shizuma move up to the borders to establish base camp there," she said. "This way I can have her closer to me." A swift inhale, barely heard. "And when that happens, I want you to stay in Argus until I ask for you to be sent up there too."

That got Natsuki to sit straight, every stiff muscle on alert and telling Shizuru she was going to protest. Her face quizzed the older woman's decision even as Shizuru expanded on her reasons for it.

"The war is going to be a tough one, Natsuki," the Himean said. "I want you somewhere safer than in a place so near the lines of engagement again. To have you stay in Argus for the moment would go a long way to ensuring that." She pleaded for the girl's understanding. "Surely you see that this is only sensible, given that-"

"That I am a cripple?" Natsuki cut in abruptly.

Shizuru's wince made it seem as though she were the one so disabled.

"Given that things have changed," she finished firmly. "Natsuki, this is my decision. You will have to stay here until I am certain that little danger remains on that front, and not before then."

"And when - when is that?" Natsuki closed her eyes painfully. "It is a war, Shizuru. It will be a long time."

Shizuru exhaled with the same pained eloquence.

"Perhaps, and perhaps not. I would rather it would be the latter, but I would also rather, above all other things, that you are safe," she said with feeling. "So you shall stay here, and I shall leave most of my retinue, Hermias included, to serve as your own. Please understand, Natsuki. You only need wait for me."

But that got her a furious glance.

"You hate to make people wait," Natsuki replied with tones of great restraint, her jaw bearing a tremor as she threw back Shizuru's earlier words to her face. "I understand, Shizuru. I am a cripple, but I understand."

"Natsuki, would you stop using that word?"

"Even if I use another word, it changes not thuh - thuh - the fact," Natsuki hissed. "Euphemism, it cannot replace a leg, no?"

Abruptly she slid into Greek once more, fixing Shizuru with the most defiant expression the older woman had ever seen on her face.

"You forget, Shizuru," the Otomeian said deliberately. "I am not separated from my army."

Shizuru breathed out a loud exhale through her nostrils. "Many of your duties as the Otomeian Polemarch may be discharged from Argus as well as at boundary camp. It is no less vital to an enterprise to be the one seeing to matters such as communications, recruitment for the allies, and various organisational details, as I expect you to do during your stay here. Come now, meum mel, you know I am right."

"I know you ask me to wait for you again."

That arrow struck Shizuru squarely in the breast and it showed on her face.

"Damn it, Natsuki, try to see it from my point of view," she said through clenched teeth.

"I do," the girl uttered, looking lost. Her eyes roamed the sheets, the delicate folds of her dress draped over her knees, the walls of their room. "I am such a burden..."

The way she said it made it impossible to tell if it was a statement or a query. Either way, it was enough to make Shizuru lean forward from her seat.

"My god, Natsuki, how can you say that?" she demanded angrily.

"How can you say this to me?" Natsuki shot back, hands balling up the fabric of the bed sheet.

"You nearly died!" Shizuru cried out, having had all she could take. Her nostrils flared as she struggled to keep her emotions in check, just barely lowering her yell into a spitting growl. "The last time I left you in the fighting, you lost your leg and very nearly more than it! Do you think I would let such a thing happen again? Do you know what I would do if something happened to you again because of me?"

"I can fend for myself!" the princess retorted, also having had her fill.

"And see what has come of it!" Shizuru hissed.

Natsuki's hand came out; heat exploded on the older woman's cheek.

"Ah-!"

The gasp was Natsuki's. The two of them regarded each other with equal astonishment, showing that even the one to have done the act was surprised by it. For a few seconds nothing was said, the swift retraction of Natsuki's hand to her chest followed by the bloom of a scarlet flag on one side of Shizuru's face.

It was Shizuru who broke the silence.

"You slapped me," she whispered, wide eyes betraying her amazement. She put a hand on her smarting cheek and felt the warmth emanating from it, marvelling at the pain infinitely more delicate than she could ever have expected going from people's descriptions before. The tingle was light but she felt more aware of it than any other pain she had ever felt, and it stung in a curious way that made her chase after it when it felt as though it would leave, pressing harder with her palm to stop the burn from evaporating.

When she looked again at the young woman who had given her this pain, she did not know what to expect, given that she would never have expected said woman to slap her in the first place. But the look on her lover's face signified a deeper burn than her own, laced with a heady dose of shock along with an acute and terrified guilt.

Hermias had warned her of the girl's thinning temper before, relating a few occasions of broken pottery and flying objects in her tent while she was out. All the incidents, Shizuru knew, had been related to the young woman's inability to get somewhere unaided, and were usually owing to Shizuru's injunctions too on what should and should not be permitted the girl. She had chosen to turn a blind eye to these alleged episodes of flaring temper when told about them, considering wisely that she could hardly berate the girl for anything if no major damage was done and no one had been harmed. Certainly she had seen or heard worse tantrums from others of her people and class, who would sometimes turn to flogging slaves out of misdirected anger.

This is frustration, she thought. Again someone boxes her into a place she does not wish to be boxed into, and this time, she has even less means to fight back against that act. I should never have forgotten this-how could I? She is still essentially a free creature, one more at home in the wild and intrinsically independent, but now without the strength that free creatures must have. It is still an open wound to her, for all that she has done such a good job of hiding it thus far. It is only natural it would find a crack in the composure she tries to pile on it.

She felt the warmth racing under her skin again, seeming to sear into the palm on her cheek.

This is a big crack, and I am the one who pried it open.

Yet how intriguing it was, she thought, that this assertive attempt was still so affected by the girl's other character, the one that held Shizuru as her master. The Otomeian was looking at her now as though Shizuru would strike her for her insolence or possibly even do worse-and as though she had held no intentions of doing that which she already had. Well, Shizuru believed the slap would not have been any conscious intention of the girl. Her frustrated, fearful, defiant girl.

" Meum mel," she began, taking her palm off her face. "The next time you slap someone, you should make it stronger and not take it back with your eyes afterwards."

She caught the hand that had slapped her and held it to her lips. She could feel the cold fear on it through her mouth, salty and chilled.

"That is my apology," she said to the ashen face. "Because of what I said. Please do not look at me like that, by god. I would not strike you."

But this only reminded Natsuki of the fact that she had in fact been the one to do the striking. The Otomeian withdrew her clammy hand in a jolt and wrung it with the other in what was coming close to a blind panic, Shizuru resorting to gripping both hands now in an effort to calm the girl's anxiety.

" Mea vita, mea vita, stop it," she said, pressing more kisses to the hands in her grip. "I am not angry, I promise. And I apologised just now because I did deserve it."

Natsuki regarded her anxiously and Shizuru tried to deliver more reassurances. They were interrupted, however, by the panther next to them suddenly bumping its head against the girl, perhaps trying to comfort its fretting owner. As it was so large now and Natsuki so lean, it nearly caused its owner to topple over, which prompted Shizuru to push away the animal firmly and press it down until it rolled over docilely on the sheet.

The animal quieted, she returned instantly to Natsuki.

"I mean it: I am not angry," she reiterated. "And I am not trying to... to leave you behind or retire you from the army, I swear it. If I could traverse those passes and fight our foes with you beside me as before, I would-but only on the condition that the gods themselves deflect any manner of harm that comes your way if I myself cannot provide sufficient defences to do it. But even I have my limitations and the gods can be weak in their promises. Natsuki, do you see what I mean? It is too much. Everything that has happened is simply too much..." Her face contracted, mouth twisting into an honest rictus of pain. "I cannot bear it. I cannot live with the thought of you ever being hurt again, Natsuki."

She turned and took a seat on the bed too this time, perching on the edge beside the other woman.

"It is selfish," she admitted, cradling her head in her hands. "I know it is selfish, and I ask you to forgive me for that. I am not even the one who has suffered the most, and I am aware of it. But ye gods, Natsuki, if something were again to happen to you... If I ever lost-"

She shook her head fiercely and bit off the idea, her expression hardening into one of cruel decision.

"A world without you would not survive me," she concluded.

Some moments passed following this assertion, which rang too true for either woman's comfort. After a while, Shizuru felt a weight fall on her shoulder and press into it.

"I will not leave you, Shizuru," she heard the girl whisper.

"Good," she replied. "Because I would never let you, anyway."

"Then-" the weight against her arm got heavier "-why will you leave me?"

They both knew she meant "do not leave me here", of course; Shizuru took time to think over it, saying nothing just yet because she really did find it hard to do even that which she knew to be the right thing when it meant a chance of putting the girl closer to harm.

The younger woman misunderstood her silence, however, and said something that startled the Himean worse than the slap had earlier.

"It is buh - buh - huhh. Uh." Natsuki took a few sharp breaths, then burst out: "It is because I am unlucky?"

Shizuru stiffened and twisted to one side, causing the other to draw away.

"Natsuki," the older woman breathed, appalled. "Good lord. How can you think that?"

Natsuki's hand on her trouser tightened.

"Truth," said the girl, hanging her head.

"Of course not!" Shizuru put her hand over the fist one clutching at her breeches. "Do not think it true for a moment. It is not worth thought, even."

The girl's head hung even lower: a silent argument. Shizuru shook her head passionately.

"You should not, truly." She drew the dark head of hair back against her shoulder, sifting fingers through the glossy strands. "You may have been unfortunate, mea vita, but you are not unlucky! Why, have you already forgotten what I always observed to you before, about you bringing me all my good luck in my doings here? It argues powerfully against the ludicrous idea of you being unlucky."

"But I am," the girl insisted in a very small voice thickened with fear. "Shizuru, I - I am thuh - thuh..."

She stopped, plucking piteously at Shizuru's mail-clad sleeve. Shizuru felt a sharper press of weight on one point of her shoulder and realised it was the girl's nose. She shifted, picked her up with a heave of both hands, then set the young woman on her lap.

"I do not want you to bruise your skin with the chainmail," she explained. "What is it, Natsuki? What were you saying? I would like to know, truly."

It took another few moments of plucking before the girl whispered it, having the air of one confessing to something worthy of extreme censure.

"I am afraid," she uttered.

"Of what?"

"What if I am unlucky?"

Shizuru took in the genuinely aghast face, the tears threatening to spill over her lover's cheeks. When Natsuki's meaning came to her, she had to give the younger woman an abrupt hug out of pity.

"Oh, Natsuki," she said fiercely, "do not fear it! Do not ever think it, do you hear me?"

She pulled away and kissed her cheeks, then her lips.

"What happened at Sosia was not your fault," she told her. "You even did a great deal, I hear, to try to remedy it before it got worse. No, that debacle and the unfortunate deaths during it, including Suou's, were the fault of an incompetent general on one side and a perfidious enemy on the other. People talk about luck often-certainly you have heard me speak of it as though it were something simply granted to me by the gods-but the truth is that people make their own luck. It is simply that there are occasions when those who are trying to make their luck make bad decisions and the consequences affect all those around them, who then have to try to make their own luck too in the aftermath."

She slid her nose against the girl's before continuing.

"As to what happened with your people, that again was the fault of none other than Fate-which is not Luck-conspiring with yet another perfidious enemy in the person of those who duped and destroyed your people." She searched the green eyes for some sign of understanding, or perhaps the barest hope of redemption.

"Understand me, Natsuki: you did not cause those deaths . Your touch is not marred by any curse save that of a troublesome past, and this is something nearly all of us carry in our own way! Yet we move past it, not towards it."

She stopped, not spent but reflecting on the cruelty history had etched upon the girl. It was awful to have to think of all her scars, all her many stains where she had suffered the ham-fisted writing of Time, its quill scratching out lessons of pain that she had never deserved nor even needed to learn. What a precarious lattice of lines it had left, that unjust, unkind, utterly insensible hand!

She looked at her lover's still-downcast eyes and revoked her earlier decision then and there.

"If indeed luck may be possessed, then the only thing that is clear is that you are my luck," she declared. "And you were right earlier: I should have seen it before, but my fears clouded my judgement. It would be foolhardy to keep you too far from me."

Natsuki finally looked up, her beautiful eyes questioning.

"I shall have you accompany Shizuma to the new base camp at the borders once it comes time to do it," Shizuru determined. "If indeed luck may be had then you are the best talisman of it, as we have proven time and time again. Of course, having you there would also make it easier for me to see you sooner following my winter demarche, as well as spur me to clean up the boundary regions even faster. Overall, an improved situation."

She smiled at the look on the girl's face, inwardly scowling at herself. This was a heart she owned-she had to accept that now, even if the thought filled her with wonder and a near-unbearable gratitude each day. How could she have been thoughtless enough to have not spared that heart this worry?

"Please forgive my earlier thoughtlessness," she said. "I was only worried. You know. You said it before, after all: that I worry too much."

Natsuki's face tucked into her hair and pressed into it. Shizuru felt with her own hand the long fall of the girl's mane cascading nearly over her lap. She slid it through two fingers, finding comfort in it even in her private self-castigation.

"You slapped me."

She felt the body in her lap stiffen before the girl started pressing kisses again to her smarting cheek.

"Oh, Natsuki," she said, laughing at the frenzied attempts at apology. "You really are far too kind for your own health."

She pulled back a little to look the girl in the eyes.

"I really did deserve it earlier, you know," she said unhesitatingly. "So I understand why you would have been provoked to slap me, although I cannot understand why you would hold back as you did. And you cannot suddenly try to take it back out of fear that I shall retaliate, especially when it was so clearly merited. You know I would never hurt you."

The green eyes shot her a hurt expression nonetheless, and Shizuru responded by surprising both of them with a rough kiss, the likes of which they had not had in a while because the older woman was still tiptoeing around the frail thing she perceived her lover to now be. When their lips parted, hurting at the brief knock of teeth, Shizuru blinked slowly.

"That was the first time anyone slapped me," she revealed to the wide-eyed Natsuki. "I would have knocked anyone else's brains out. But it was you."

"You will knock my jaw loose instead?" the girl whispered.

She burst into laughter. It had been a while since Natsuki had let loose one of her quips on her, and she realised that she had missed them beyond belief, running awed eyes over her girl.

"I adore you," she told her with another kiss to the slightly parted lips. "So I agree to what you ask, as I said earlier. But you must promise to never entertain ideas of yourself being unlucky again. Please, for both our sakes, be assured that it is not true." A grin. "It is bad luck to think such things, you know."

Natsuki's smile peeked out.

"I will try," she said honestly.

"Talk to me if you are threatened by such thoughts again. I shall tell you as many times as needed."

Natsuki nodded.

"Ah." The girl's eyes showed alarm. "Your cousin, Shizuru. She waits."

"She can wait a little longer. Right now I need your presence."

Some moments passed.

"Natsuki," Shizuru said. "What did you really think of her? My cousin."

"Interesting."

The standard reply; Shizuru probed further. "People say we look alike, especially on first glance."

A narrowing of the eyes, followed by an affirmative hum.

"Should I be worried, meum mel?"

A sharp nose pressed against her temple, stroking the amber skin reverently. She had noticed Natsuki's growing fascination with her summer-darkened skin for some time now, and was privately very pleased by it. When Natsuki finally delivered an answer to her query, she burst into laughter again.

"Gold," came the sage words, "is always more valuable than silver."

She tickled the girl after that, chortling uncontrollably herself until something solid and heavy bumped into her ribs.

"Oof," she huffed. She lifted an eyebrow at the panther that seemed to be trying to turn her to her side. "Dear me, but you are big, Shizuki. What have they been feeding you?"

Natsuki smiled against her ear.

"Tell her to sit still, Natsuki, or we may both drop. She keeps pushing me."

The girl reached out a hand and grabbed the feline's head, drawing it to her knees. It settled down instantly.

"A glutton for attention," Shizuru remarked, pretend-scowling at the big yellow eyes. It shifted its attention from her to Natsuki, looking up at the girl with a rapt attention that made the Himean laugh. "But one with taste in women. Do you think you could teach her to do some tricks?"

Natsuki tilted her head. "Tricks?"

"Basic commands, as some do with their working dogs." Shizuru frowned in thought. "Nothing like pulling a cart, though. I think it would ease my mind more if you taught her to attack for you, among other things. She would make a wonderful defence, although even the very sight of her should keep people away, I think."

Natsuki hummed but did not look opposed to the idea.

"I am not defenceless," she murmured, however.

"Of course not," Shizuru agreed quickly.

"I am not."

She reached somewhere into the folds of her dress and whipped out her hand in a blurring arc. Shizuru heard a whiz before the thud as an apple on the table fell to the ground, destroyed by the dart that had cloven it. Shizuki leapt off the bed and went to investigate.

The older woman looked at her lover with wide eyes.

"A superb shot," she praised.

A demure nod.

"What are you hiding under there?"

Natsuki showed her the strap from her old military effects, which the girl had modified to tighten and fit more comfortably on her thinner thigh. There were still several darts in the strap, hidden by the leather pockets. Shizuru shook her head and drew the folds of fabric over the exposed weaponry again.

"So that was what I felt over your leg. When did you put that on?"

"When you... and the slaves... left," the other said shyly.

"Indeed," Shizuru smiled, rather impressed. "I am not at all opposed to it, Natsuki, so you may put it on even when I am with you if it makes you feel more secure. Do you want me to get better sheaths done? I know you used to wear that over your uniform, so it may not be as comfortable against your skin. We can even come up with other kinds to hold whatever weapons you want."

Natsuki nodded, then seemed to hesitate over something.

"What?" Shizuru prodded.

"Also, I want..." She paused. "I want my daos. Here?"

Shizuru's face softened. She had in fact been debating whether or not it was time to bring out the instrument again from Natsuki's belongings and return it to her without causing too much pain in doing so.

"As you wish," she agreed, slipping the hand she had on Natsuki's waist higher and feeling the ridges of her ribs under the dress. She knew the girl's body was actually not as bad as before, although the femininity of her breasts had yet to return: her chest was still a topography of plains and gorges, geographic strata that only some weeks ago had been stripped almost to the bedrock. Only weeks ago they had never been dormant, perpetually shifting under tectonic efforts of respiration. Shizuru could still remember wiping down that area most gently of all during Natsuki's baths, wanting nothing more than to hold the girl as she was doing now until the tattered body calmed and those labouring lungs learned to relax again.

But she is better now, see? she reassured herself, still doing a gentle inspection of the form under the dress. She is regaining her old substance. And she is getting better every day .

" Meum mel," she said to the young woman. "Is there anything you want to do? I want to make the most of the time we have here before I have to go. We have a week or two. Ask for what you want and I shall have it done, whatever it may be."

"Want... to do?"

"Yes. Anything you want to do."

"Um..."

Although Natsuki had the appearance of one considering the query, the truth was that the girl knew her answer the moment Shizuru posed the question. Her pensive expression was merely because she was thinking of what had so recently whetted her desire for what she was about to request: the glimpses she had had of the road and the woods during the march to this part of the country.

Their progress from Sosia had been one showered with multicoloured foliage. A beautiful time, to Natsuki, and indeed the season she liked best in the year. What she would have given to be able to travel amidst the red deaths of the leaves again! But she knew it would not be allowed on the march, not by the doctors nor by Shizuru. Even when the leaves had first started to drop and fly into their marching camps she had known what she wanted would not be allowed either-and not just because of her leg, but because she still been too weak then. But she was gaining strength each passing day and she knew they could no longer deny her.

"I want to ride," she said with decision. "You will help me?"

Shizuru did not immediately reply, a mess of conflicting feelings in her heart. There was some relief that what Natsuki wanted to do involved going out-she had been afraid she would have to coax the girl just to come out after so long inside tents, after all-but she had not expected to be asked this, and had her own concerns about such a venture.

Some of the apprehension must have shown on her face, for Natsuki spoke once more.

"I will not ride alone," she assured. "You will ride with me?"

"Of course-but darling, is it wise to do something so strenuous already?"

"I am not your steed, Shizuru," the girl smiled humorously.

"But the jostling..."

"I will not ask to go fast."

"Knowing you, you might try to kick the horse in the ribs once the urge took you anyway," Shizuru teased feebly.

"Please?"

The older woman sighed and gave in, running a hand through her mass of golden hair.

"Very well," she said. "But let us ask the medici."

Natsuki pursed her lips but did not argue it. She knew better than to try.

"Do not get your hopes up too much, meum mel," Shizuru warned. "They may say no."

"They will say yes," Natsuki said positively.

"I fear I doubt it."

"I can go now. I know." She was very determined. "I am strong enough for it."

"I am not certain of that."

"Why?"

"Because I am not even certain you can already handle my affec-"
The Himean swallowed the rest, unwilling to let Natsuki hear it. The girl should not have to worry about that too, above everything else: if it came down to just a little bit more self-control for the sake of Natsuki's health, she could certainly exert it without having to show her lover how parched she was for her .

"We shall ask the doctors," she said again. "If they say yes, I shall make arrangements that very day. But if they say no, you must ask for something else. No gainsaying their expertise, Natsuki."

"So if they say I can go, I will go," Natsuki said, eagerly repeating the parts of the terms she found most favourable.

"Yes, but no bribing them."

"I am not Himean," the girl said archly.

"What an awful thing to say," Shizuru responded, eyes twinkling. "But true. So what do you do to your people when you want to force them to do something?"

"We threaten them."

"Revolutionary," Shizuru chuckled, kissing her brow and moving aside the wing of hair that hid one of the new scars, one that always filled her with fury when she thought of whoever had been responsible for it. "I do wish they shall say that you can ride, Natsuki. I see how much you desire it, and who knows? Perhaps riding with you this way shall finally give me an opportunity to get horsemanship advice from someone whose manège I find truly worth of respect."

"They will let me ride," Natsuki said again under her chin, sounding more and more certain of it. "Because I am only crippled, Shizuru." She paused and said, before Shizuru could think of what to say to that: "I am not weak ."

Shizuru closed her eyes and uttered an invocation.

"May the gods never let me forget it."

Chapter 60

Good day and thank you to the readers and reviewers. My apologies for the brevity of this chapter. A great deal of activity is imminent in the next ones, however.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Croesus - Lydian king of proverbial wealth
  2. Our Sea - in Latin, Mare Nostrum . The Romans referred to the Mediterranean by this term.
  3. Sagum - (L.) a cape of waterproofed wool, very thick and hardy for use by the Roman legionaries in wet weather. A good sagum could last longer than a man's lifetime, and many soldiers only ever purchased one to use for all their campaigns.
  4. Talent - a unit of measure, typically the load a man could carry. A talent of silver would thus be the amount of silver a man could carry.
-

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

She stayed in Argus for two more weeks, getting things ready for the beginning of the advance into what would, for the next half-decade at least, be her gubernatorial fief. A part of her found it amusing that even at this stage of her career she would be saddled with more than others (were there even any other senators who had been awarded provincial governorships that they had to earn first by an invasion?), but the challenge was not unwelcome, since she knew it meant greater distinction for her once she triumphed. There were many things to be done but she was more than eager to tackle all of them. So deeply did she throw herself into the preparations that, even before the end of her two weeks in Argus, she was able to sit back and survey what she had already accomplished, well-pleased with herself and her officers.

"I am happy to say that we are going to have a fine start, even with the supplies. In fact, we have enough grain to last the winter, thanks to Shizuma's work," she told the young woman who had served as her sounding board for matters military and otherwise ever since their reunion. "I do believe she tapped every grain merchant shipping around Our Sea. Provided your people come through on the promise of more grain delivered to the holding vaults in Sosia, the army and the provinces should be capable of getting through to spring very easily."

"We will provide."

"The question is if what you can provide shall be enough."

"This harvest? Yes. The next? We hope."

"As do I. I have no intention of relying on Sicilia and Africa producing a surplus for the next harvest as well; one never knows when scarcity shall strike. Besides, I am providing for twelve legions now, and need more local resources."

"There are the Mentulaean farmlands."

"I know, which is why I am striking in their area first. Yet one has to keep in mind that we are not sure how many of them shall be spared from the firebrands... nor indeed how many of the people doing the farming on them shall be spared from the sword. People can be strangely unwilling to participate when they are being invaded, mea vita."

Natsuki puffed at her and rolled over. The two of them were on the bed, the Otomeian stretched out over the sheets while Shizuru sat on the edge, using it as a seat as she worked on the desk she had ordered to be pushed against it. Every now and then she would twist about to glance at her lover as they talked, usually to emphasise a point or to inform her of something she had not before. She did that now, setting down the quill she had been using to write letters.

"By the way, Natsuki, I have decided on the arrangements for the border," she said, bringing up and folding one knee on the bed to make her position more comfortable. "When Shizuma establishes camp on the boundaries, I want you to stay on our side of the river."

There was a curious look from the Otomeian, who turned her head on the pillow to better regard Shizuru.

"Shizuru, I thought both sides were ours now," she said with a laugh in her voice, not bothering to put forth the query because she was expecting the older woman to explain.

"Soon there shall be no doubt of that! But I meant the current acception."

"Mm."

"To be clear, you shall stay in a camp on our side of the river," the Himean went on. "There shall be a mirror camp on the other side, and that is where the army and Shizuma shall be staying."

Shizuru treated her lover as an equal when it came to intelligence, and the girl had always shown the justice of that treatment with her acuity. She did not fail Shizuru now, taking the hint in the way Shizuru had intended.

"Your mind is a wondrous thing," she concluded, pronouncing the compliment in her sophisticated Attic.

Shizuru grinned.

"You do me great honour!" she said. "Thank goodness you are one less person to whom I shall have to explain it, though."

Shizuru was aware that not everyone would catch on to why she wanted two camps erected beside the river boundary that separated the Mentulaean lands from the plains adjacent Argentum's. It was yet another of her unorthodox moves, and one of safety as well as strategy.

As far as garrisoning the boundaries went, the obvious plan would be to erect a camp on the Mentulaeen side of the river border, in order to help the troops better defend their position and the main bridge for the passage. The construction of a second, equally fortified camp on the opposite side was Shizuru's unusual way of ensuring that should something happen to turn the tide swiftly against the Himean advantage-such as the unexpected appearance of an army too enormous for the border legions to deal with-there would be an immediate provision against disaster on the other side of the bridge, to which the legions could simply retreat and reform until reinforcements arrived. The battlements of the second camp would also be excellent positions for standby ordnances, which could be aimed at the bridge in case it needed to be shelled into collapse in a trice... say to prevent enemy forces from charging over it and onto the Himean side in the event of emergency retreats.

Besides these practical considerations was the psychological pause the plan afforded, of course. Provided sufficient display were to be made-a standing guard, people manning watch-towers even on the second camp-the foes would be prone to hesitate before attacking either fort because of the possibility of there being two full armies instead of one in the area. Why else would anyone waste resources to set up two camps, after all, if not to house two large armies that could not fit into a single one? If there was anything Shizuru had learned about the Mentulaeen military style, it was that its strategic underpinnings revolved around the might of majority instead of actual organisation. Their commanders would be very unlikely to attack a location around which there was a potential heavy reserve literally sitting across the river, especially if they had no idea how large that reserve really was.

"You shall probably have to cross from one camp to the other almost daily, though," Shizuru told the girl, who hummed with the attitude of one who thought that to be no trouble. "You could use your camp for work with the auxiliary, at least. How goes the training for the new Lupine units, incidentally? Are any of them giving you trouble?"

Natsuki shrugged as well as one could shrug when lying down. Shizuru's sustained gaze exerted pressure on her, however, so she expanded dutifully on her answer.

"Well," quoth the girl.

To her puzzlement, Shizuru's response was a disappointed sigh.

"Do not misunderstand: if indeed all goes well, I am pleased for you," the older woman explained. "Yet it seems to me that either all the Otomeian affairs go well or must be matters of powerful secrecy, given your taciturnity on them."

The other blushed guiltily.

"We have troubles too," she eventually admitted. "But there is no need to worry, Shizuru."

"Do you never worry?"

"I?"

"My concern here is over your worries, not worries I might have as your commanding officer. What I meant was that you never seem to express any to me, Natsuki. You should know that you can."

"But it is not... for you to worry about," the Otomeian replied. Then she realised that what she had said might be misconstrued as a rejection of Shizuru's invitation, and so added hastily, "I mean that you have much already on which you worry and - and I will be thoughtless by adding more."

"You must think me a self-involved wretch then, considering how often I unburden myself to you."

The other's eyes went wide at this interpretation.

"No!" Natsuki responded. "I do not. But Shizuru, you are - you are the general."

"And this means I have more right to trouble you than others?" Shizuru teased as she continued scribbling on her parchment. "Yes, I suppose that is one perk of generalship."

"It means you have more trouble than others," the girl retorted. "You have more worries than I-than all others here, I know. I thought because of this, I would not be suh-suh-so unkind an officer."

"I am touched by your consideration," Shizuru said to that. "I genuinely am. But as I suggested earlier, you are not just an officer, and I do wish you would remember that. It is not exactly pleasing to hear you say this as though you were forgetting who you are to me, even if I know the thought was for my behalf..."

A line petered out mid-stroke. She dipped the quill into the ink again to restart it.

"But let us simply put it this way. What may not be permitted others here may be permitted or even encouraged of you. I am always willing to listen to and possibly even help to solve your problems, Natsuki, because they are yours. Even if I cannot aid you in solving them, I would rather you felt comfortable enough to talk to me simply to air what issues you may be bearing every now and then. I spent most of my life being unable to complain to most people around me about many of the things I found grievous in my environment-and I know a little about what it costs to have to bear so much so silently. I know the toll it takes on the temper."

"I think it helps to have the ear of someone you can trust when you are oppressed by troubles," she went on. "It is true that understanding is limited... and that it may transpire on occasion that the person to whom you are unburdening yourself cannot grasp the extent of all that you are expressing. That does not make the unburdening futile, all the same. I believe it is not, and have felt for myself that it is not."

She shot the girl a glance: "And the admission of worries, I should think, is not always a confession of inadequacy."

Natsuki had been staring at her ramrod-straight back all this time and now lifted her head from the pillow to answer.

"I never think you inadequate, Shizuru," she said, putting all her conviction into the words.

"I know, and I thank you for that," was the other's answer. "I trust you enough to unburden myself to you without fear that you shall think me weak for having troubles too or for admitting lassitude on occasion. I do not wish to pry into your life forcefully, meum mel, but I simply want you to know that revealing some of your worries to me would never qualify as you prying forcefully into mine."

She stopped there, knowing it need no longer be said that she hoped Natsuki would eventually return the same trust she had described. With that she returned to what she was writing, dipping the dry quill into the inkwell once again. She had already managed to put the final words in the letter, which was to her legate Toshi and regarding the hatchets she had ordered from Sosia, when Natsuki spoke up from behind.

"I have - I have some worries also," she said in a small voice. "Some."

Shizuru picked up the bottle of blotting sand on her desk and smiled, not bothering to turn around. She asked calmly what it was that gave Natsuki trouble these days, although there was a split-second where she felt a slight fear that the girl would point to her leg and say, You have to ask?

"The recruits," the girl confessed to her. "The Lupine Division."

"So they are giving you trouble, after all?"

"I would not - I do not say they do it to make trouble," Natsuki specified duskily. "It is a matter of ability, Shizuru."

"Ah! Slow to train?"

"A little."

The Otomeian hummed to herself, trying to figure out how exactly to phrase what she was thinking: these were not concerns she was used to airing so directly-especially to Shizuru. There was still enough of the tender insecurity of a girl in her to be intimidated into wanting the older woman's respect... and admitting problems like this, as Shizuru had guessed, did make her feel a little less impressive in front of her lover. Still, she was also sensitive enough to pick up on the fact that Shizuru needed this too, this sort of openness that did not depend on presenting as perfect an image as possible to each other all the time. Shizuru needed her to be unguarded, she realised, and she was fair enough to know that Shizuru deserved that much. Besides everything else the woman had already done, she had also personally nursed her back from the precipice of expiration, for heaven's sake!

It did take work to do this, though. She had to pause every now and then to fit her ideas into a verbal construction, parsing her mental stream as best as she could and running through her Himean vocabulary in an effort to do it justice.

"It is this, Shizuru. Kyo-and I-we push them as far as we can. I will borrow your words, if you do not mind: we drill them hard, then we drill them harder."

"All right. And?"

"And we do realise it is early days."

"True."

"But I think, even so, it is still too slow. They are too slow."

And then, because she had the sort of antiquated nobility that disdained those who pronounced judgments on others too hastily, qualified, "For me, I mean. It is my opinion. It could be it is not so to others."

Shizuru had a response to that: "But you are the head of the Lupine Division as well as Polemarch and Princess of your army. Your opinion matters more than most other opinions."

"Yes." The corners of her mouth turned down as she let her head plop onto a pillow, eyes contemplating the ceiling. "I know this. That is my concern."

Shizuru sprinkled a little more sand on the wet ink of her letter.

"I understand the concern," she told her lover. "Yet given what I have seen of your unit, Natsuki, I know that it is no easy or quick thing to produce people capable of doing all that is required of it."

"It is so, Shizuru," came the heartfelt reply. "I think to myself, 'I must be patient.' But - but still, I worry."

"Did not your other troopers undergo a similar training? Surely it took them some time as well before they got to where they are today," Shizuru said, not even bothering to ask Natsuki how long it had taken for her to acquire her own skills. It was not just a matter of starting early: it was also a matter of talent, and Natsuki's talents at martial learning were not normal. Perhaps this was part of the problem in that such self-assurance skewed the girl's expectations of others, she thought-before remembering that a lot of her own friends had used to tell her that the same thing regarding her own self-assurance.

"Yes," Natsuki said to her. "But that was not at a time such as this."

"During a war, you mean."

"A war such as this, if I am to be - to be specific," Natsuki determined. "Of urgency, there was little before. Compared to now. Before, they were smaller, more scattered foes. Not an empire."

She huffed loudly enough to prompt Shizuru to look over her shoulder: the beautiful face was tight with trouble, her eyes narrowed enough for the green to be shaded over into a dark glitter, hidden away by the sweep of black lashes.

"It could be I am being unfair, Shizuru," the girl said with clear pain in her voice. "I know this. I do not wish to be . But I think... I think..."

She stopped and ran over her thoughts in an effort to articulate them better, licking her lips gently as she pondered over her diction once more.

"If the urgency does not go away, the only solution is that the person must change to satisfy it," she settled for saying. "I expect them to be faster because the situation, it requires that they be faster."

She sat up and pulled into a cross-legged pose. Shizuru, who was still eyeing her from over her shoulder, noted that she also clasped her hands over the end of the leg that had been severed, although the stump was not visible because of her dress.

"I think this, and so I am hard on them," Natsuki admitted wistfully. "But I admit that - that I also think I am being unjust, so I worry double."

She looked up and saw Shizuru watching her.

"I do not mean to put you in a bad position in this, Shizuru," she suddenly added, earnest as ever. "I do not say this to ask if you think me unjust or not... even though you may say what you think if you think either. But I do not mean to make it seem that - that I am forcing a judgement from you."

Her lover smiled.

"I understand, though I have no problem in confessing I think you far from unjust here," Shizuru said honestly, privately charmed by the girl's tender and rather noble dignity. "I agree that they should rise to the occasion. But given how many times I have been frustrated by subordinates myself in such expectations and shown that many people are bizarrely incapable of rising to the occasion, I must confess too that I am perhaps not the best person to give a pronouncement here, so it is just as well that you are not asking me to make a judgement, as you say. They do satisfy you in other ways, though? I collect that you are not completely displeased with them."

Natsuki nodded.

"So is it the daos that is the problem? Training them to use it to your satisfaction?"

"Wuhh-were it a question of my satisfaction, it would be the problem with all of them," the younger woman said in their other shared language, voice turning sulky even as Shizuru chuckled. "No, there is more. It is the weapons. Some are good at only two; some, at only one."

"And membership in your division, I know, demands excellence in the daos as well as all the basic weapons-as indeed you yourself have proven. I understand that you must be exacting and that you worry about how long it shall take them to be properly skilled in the other weapons as well." There was a good-humoured smile on Shizuru's face. "Although it does make me wonder how I would fare were I among those you were training."

A lift of the black brows.

"It is not in you to settle for anything beneath excellence, Shizuru," Natsuki pointed out.

"You forget that I nearly crushed my own head like a melon the last time you let me try out your daos, Princess."

There was a whoosh of surprised laughter as the girl recalled that incident, which had happened quite some time ago. She had laughed as well at the time, although the older woman had not known that it had been partly out of hysteria: what if the Himean had crushed her head like a melon? Oh, if Shizuru had only known how horrified she had really been!

"If part of your worry stems from my eagerness to move forward quickly in the war, ease it," Shizuru continued. "I shall let you have sufficient time to train them to your heart's content before drawing on them again for the heavy work I used to demand of your division. Your people are bringing more cavalry, anyway, and your cousin has quite a lot of auxiliaries at the borders that I can call on should I ever need it."

"Ah. Yes."

"Besides, they might surprise you yet. A few skirmishes with the aid of their new fellows just might hone the abilities you find dull."

Natsuki lifted her chin and inhaled deeply.

"It is my hope too," said the princess, sombre again but also slightly more relaxed than before; Shizuru could hear it in her voice.

"Blooding them, yes, as part of the Lupine Division. It is one thing to fight in the normal regiments..."

She mulled it over and nodded to herself once.

"Yes," she decided. "It is possible it is experience that will push them."

"I hope it turns out well for you. And not just as your commander." Shizuru brushed off the sand from her letter and rolled up the sheet, picking up a stick of wine-coloured wax and holding it over her lamp. "Pardon me for interrupting the conversation, Natsuki, but would you hand me my signet ring? I took it off earlier before we ate. It is on the stand on your side of the bed."

She felt the girl roll over and crawl on the huge mattress before returning to crouch beside her. Natsuki held up the requested object, but the Himean shook her head instead of taking it.

"If you please," Shizuru said simply, holding the melting wax over the scroll and letting a puddle form over the edge. Natsuki stamped the ring on the puddle to leave the impression.

"I am sorry, Shizuru," said the younger woman after the deed was done, looking mortified.

The other was astonished.

"Why, whatever for?" she demanded, turning to the woman beside her.

"It is not in the centre."

Shizuru laughed at her lover's crestfallen face. "Natsuki, that does not matter!"

"It is better when it is in the centre."

"Believe me, meum mel, the recipient shall hardly inspect it for that." She shook her head again. "You have the oddest compulsion to be precise sometimes."

The young woman said nothing, still eyeing the off-centre seal on the wax with regret.

"Really, do not worry about it. Going back to what we were talking about," Shizuru pressed, "would it help if I asked Shizuma to organise regular raids using the troopers on whatever nearby Mentulæan settlements might still be in the border area? You could work with her to blood your new recruits into the Lupine way better." She cracked a smile of conspiracy. "Although I have no doubt you yourself might have been planning to propose this to her later, one way or another."

Natsuki finally tore her eyes away from the wax.

"Yes," she said. "But thank you, Shizuru. I think it, um, it helps if you say it to her too."

"You are welcome." The Himean picked up another sheet of parchment from her stack and spread it on the desk. "We poor commanders have to stick together."

There was a muffled sound of something hitting the mattress: Natsuki had her back on the sheets again.

"Poor commanders," she echoed quietly, as though questioning the adjective. "Shizuru?"

"Yes?"

"That legion you will take through the massif-the Thirteenth," she said. "It is going to drill today too, no?"

"Of course."

"Um. Do you drill it more than the others?"

"Not necessarily. Drilling is pretty much a quotidian activity for all legions, not just the ones I plan to take with me on my next move. Variation depends on how a legion performs during the drills and if my centurions deem 'more' to be necessary. Why?"

"To use such a legion - a raw one - for such a march," Natsuki pondered aloud. "It is such a risk, no?"

Shizuru stopped her writing again and faced her lover.

"Of course it is a risk," she said. "But as I told you before, Natsuki, it is a risk I have to take if I am to justify my creation of a Thirteenth."

Once Shizuru had managed to set up her temporary office in Argus, the first thing she did was to deal with the reorganisation of the legions under her command. First, there was the matter of the long-suffering but hardy Seventh, which was still understrength after its travails under Takeda Masashi's guidance. The veteran legions of the North, the Ninth, the Eleventh, and the Fourteenth, had given up one cohort each to fill in what the Seventh had lost in that bloody first stage of the war. Even so, Shizuru wanted the Seventh a little stronger, and so took a cohort off one of the raw legions in Argus to give to it too.

This left her with five slightly understrength legions of the total, each missing only one cohort for the full count: the Seventh, Ninth, Eleventh, Fourteenth, and the Twentieth. The rest of the legions were full-strength and all raw, with the exception of the two legions Kenji was using in the southwest amidst the Mentulaean mountains, the Fifth and the Sixth. These two legions were mixed in composition, made up of both new legionaries as well as veterans from other campaigns who had signed up for this new war.

Now that she had this many legions at her disposal and a command of this importance, Shizuru felt justified in renaming the legions and using numbers already assigned to other Himean legions in existence and posted elsewhere: the legions with the same numbers in their names would simply be referred to with a specifying adjective in their nomenclature when people wished to distinguish them from the other similarly-numbered legions based in other territories. Hence, the Fifteenth became the Third Septentrian (in reference to the official name to be used for the Mentulaean territories once annexed) Legion, the Sixteenth became the Fourth Septentrian Legion, the Seventeenth became the Eighth Legion, the Eighteenth became the Tenth Septentrian Legion, the Nineteenth became the Twelfth Septentrian Legion, and-rather controversially-the Twentieth was named the Thirteenth Legion.

Of the renamed legions, only two were not given the specifying adjective. One of them, the newly-minted Eighth, did not need it yet because it was the only Eighth in existence in all of the Himean territories. When another Eighth was created for Hime's army, then the adjective would be applied to it. The other legion to not receive the specifying adjective, the Thirteenth, was in a similar position in that there was no other Thirteenth in existence. However, it differed from the Eighth in that it was unlikely to ever need the specifying adjective of "Septentrian" in the future.

Thirteen was an unlucky number to the Himeans. In fact, it was so unlucky that their legions were traditionally numbered to skip it. There had never been a Thirteenth Legion, which was why Shizuru's announcement that she was using it to name one of the raw legions- and the only understrength raw legion, at that!- set off ripples of triskaidekaphobia through the army, which she only managed to quiet after a brief speech she made herself. She held her ground even when the officers pleaded with her to change her mind, and no amount of begging seemed to persuade her otherwise.

"It is a foolish superstition, and I shall demonstrate it," she told her officers quite simply. The others' fear was that the morale of the Thirteenth would be down from the very beginning because of the negative associations their name held, but Shizuru replied that she would turn those associations on their heads. The fact that the legion was the only raw one that was understrength had actually initiated her decision, for she had known she would have to vest these recruits with more confidence than the rest to make sure that their understrength status did not discourage them. It was then that she realised it: why not vest them with so much confidence, in fact, that she would create another mythical legion, one with the same gritty determination and thick-shelled confidence her old Eighth had possessed? Why settle for anything less than a legion that had so much belief in itself that it believed itself capable of taking on anything for her, the person who would help it discover its luck?

Few knew better than the lucky how luck was made, and Shizuru had always been considered among the luckiest persons in the world by those who knew her. She made her choice and named the raw and understrength legion with the unluckiest number possible, knowing full well that luck was not possessed by numbers but rather by the people who dealt them. Her promise to her officers and the soldiers-as well as to herself-was this: that by the time she was done with the Thirteenth, people would consider thirteen a lucky number.

"I am the best person for this task," she told Natsuki, returning to the explanations she had given the girl before. "I can make the Thirteenth a legion people shall want to join, a legion that all shall remember. As I said before, the trek through the massif, which no one else has ever attempted, would be the ideal first step to such a..."

She trailed off even before finishing the sentence, finally realising what had led to this conversation being repeated with Natsuki.

"... and I am apparently slow today, mea vita. Pardon me for not catching on faster," she continued, a smile building on her mouth. "You only brought this up again as your way of telling me that you are a little worried about it, right?"

The girl was sitting up again, and in her eyes was one of her old Sphinx looks: one of those that Shizuru thought one could fall into and never reach the bottom.

"Only a little, Shizuru," she admitted, her low voice textured with emotion. "I know things will work well because it is you. Even if it is a raw legion with what your people think is an unlucky number. But there is still part of me that worries. This is a worry that is... hmm... irrational, a worry from the part of me that worries in spite of logic. It is not that I do not know you will do what you say, because I know you can do everything. I only worry because it is you-although I also do not worry because it is you."

Shizuru smiled softly at her, warmed by the words.

"I thank the gods each day for every part of you, you know," she said, prompting an embarrassed smile from the girl.

"Even for my temper, Shizuru?" Natsuki asked, eyes bright with humour.

The patrician snorted inelegantly, turning both eyes heavenward.

"I have far more cause to ask you that, considering mine," she said as she returned to her work.

Warmth and fur brushed beside her all of a sudden as Natsuki's pet, which had been sleeping on one of the couches, decided it wanted to join them on the bed. She heard Natsuki coo to it as it settled on top of the covers, pushing its body as close to its owner as possible.

"Besides, as far as you are concerned, Natsuki, my stance is that I love a passionate woman."

"A passionate woman is one who slaps you?" Natsuki whispered with amusement, curling against the length of her pet and throwing a leg over it. It hummed against her, a cavernous rumble far louder than that of any house cat.

"I did try the passionate woman quite sorely," Shizuru answered gamely. "Although I would certainly not be opposed to it were the passionate woman to extend a little more patience to the sorry creatures around her-if not to me, then at least for the poor servants, who are a little less used to facing the aggressive use of projectiles than a war-seasoned military woman like me."

She heard Natsuki's breath hitch and kept her face to her desk, hiding a grin.

"Do not be mad at them for telling me, Natsuki," she said. "They are my slaves, after all."

"I am not mad," came the near-breathless reply at her back. "But I am not - I - Shizuru, I am sorry. Only, I wuh-wuh- was-"

"Sorely tried, I know," Shizuru said. "Oh, I am not angry, Natsuki. I understand, trust me. But I am only asking that you try to be a little more patient with them. They are not, well, accustomed to facing down such displays from their mistress."

"Mine are not used to it either!" the girl burst out indignantly, sitting up. "Shizuru, I do not do such - such things. I never did! Not - not before..."

"I thought so. I have always seen you to be a mild person with your own servants, after all."

"And it is not-Shizuru, it is not that I wish to harm them!" came the earnest protestation.

"Oh, I know that too, Natsuki! Had you actually been aiming at them, we would be having a discussion about dead servants and not frightened ones, after all. The problem, however, is that they do not know that." Shizuru looked over her shoulder and winked. "These silly slaves, hm?"

Natsuki smiled shakily. She ran one hand over her pet's black fur and apologised once again and with great feeling, seeming to be very put-out by the idea that the slaves had thought her to be aiming at them. She had never done so, of course: Shizuru was right in saying that had her target been one of the servants, she would have struck him on first cast.

"You will tell them?" she pleaded. "That I did not - do not wish to hit them?"

"Hermias has been doing so for a while now, although it cannot be helped that the sillier ones are not yet convinced. I shall talk to him about it once more, though."

"I will not do it again," the girl swore.

"All right."

Sufficient time passed in silence after this for Shizuru to finish the new letter she was writing and spread sand on it when Natsuki suddenly spoke up, voice so low it was caught between a growl and a whisper.

"Shizuru."

"Yes?"

"I did something."

Shizuru stopped what she was doing. Down on the desk went the bottle of sand, off came the felt slippers on her feet, and up went her legs on the bed as she turned her back to the desk, facing the dour-looking girl with a twinkle in her eyes.

"All right," she said. "Which of the slaves did you hit?"

The Otomeian's jaw fell open.

"Shizu-I hit no one !" she exclaimed resentfully, a blazing flush suffusing her cheeks.

"Oh, well, my apologies then," Shizuru said, trying not to laugh and failing miserably at it. The younger woman glowered at her for that, but she carried on impenitently. "It was merely that you said it so seriously that, given our topic just now, I was worried you had actually managed to nick one of the slaves with a plate and everyone was simply too afraid to tell me about it."

Natsuki sniffed with great injury. Hitting slaves, in her opinion, was beneath her dignity.

"So what did you do?" Shizuru prompted.

It took a while of the girl brushing her hands over her panther's coat before she finally answered, requesting permission-rather stiffly, Shizuru thought-to employ Greek for the conversation because she wanted to be sure she expressed herself as precisely as possible. The older woman agreed, thinking this must be something of an official order; Natsuki usually just used Greek without asking for permission whenever she felt like it.

"Some days into the march here from Sosia," the girl began, staying true to her intent of precision, "I asked to speak with some of my people at night, after we made camp."

She stopped here and looked up at Shizuru as if to ask if she recalled it. They both knew Shizuru did, but the older woman nodded anyway.

"Five of the Otomeian nobles left the next day," the girl continued. "One was from the Lupine Division and another was my cousin."

Again Shizuru nodded. She knew this already, but now she was getting more and more curious about whatever it was that the girl might have to reveal.

"I presumed those went under your orders, Natsuki."

"It is so."

"Then go on."

Natsuki's face was frightfully grave. Shizuru did not know whether to worry or smile at it.

"The arrangement was for three to go to the borders, two to the citadel," the Otomeian princess-for that was how her lover saw her at that moment-said with her frightful gravity. "Their tasks were in aid of accomplishing a single directive."

She frowned and explained the directive, speaking with slow concentration because she wished to get it right the first time.

"The directive was to send Otomeian envoys to the northern parts of Mentulaean territory. The purpose was to foment unrest among the secessionist peoples of those territories and to offer monetary aid in their struggles against their Mentulaean rulers."

Her breath rushed in loudly after she got all of that out, and she looked to her commander, obviously hoping for approval. Shizuru was regarding her with flat-out surprise, however, and that melted away the gelid professionalism she had been employing to conceal her nervousness.

"Shizuru, I have done wrong?" she stammered out worriedly, wondering what she might have forgotten to take into account in her calculations. "I - I know I erred in that I should have told-oh! Perhaps I have ruined a plan? Please forgive-"

" Natsuki ." Shizuru held up a hand to quiet her, which it did in an instant. "No, you did not ruin any plans. In fact, you have just improved them. What you have done stands to enhance our position greatly, meum mel, and I myself was planning something similar to it, at least in the sense of drawing up an alliance with those selfsame tribes later on. So I thank you for your perspicacity in beating me to it."

The relief that washed over the girl was so palpable that Shizuru saw it loosen the rigid post of her spine.

"I am glad," she breathed.

"You certainly appear to be," Shizuru said in response, amused.

"Natsuki, did you really think I would disapprove of the idea? I do wish you had told me first-and expect you to tell me first next time if I am this close to you, mind you-but I know you enough to know you would never have given that order unless you thought it would help me." And unless you thought I would approve of it, she added in her head. "I hope you do not think me so dense as to fail to see the advantages of your plan."

"No. No, I do not think you to be so." Natsuki's shoulders dropped a little as she finally relaxed enough to smile back. "The probabilities of you formulating a strategy that would - hmm - invert the value of mine were low, Shizuru. But a low probability is not a total exclusion. There is also a condition to my arrangement I have not yet revealed."

Shizuru was smiling very widely, she thought.

"I still cannot get over how utterly mathematical you can be in Greek," the older woman explained with a wiggle of the brows. "I find it delightful from you in quite a different way from how I find your Himean delightful. At any rate, what is this condition that prompted your hesitation to tell me earlier?"

Natsuki looked away for the briefest instant, but there was no mistaking the decision in her face when her gaze returned.

"It concerns the financial aid to be offered to the tribes," she said. "Besides what the King will give, I shall add money from my coffers."

That wiped the smile off Shizuru's face.

"Natsuki, I cannot let you do that!" she said with a gasp. "You should not need to use your personal funds for this war!"

"You do it."

"I am the general."

"And I am the polemarch."

Shizuru shook her head. "Not quite the same, mea vita . I do not want you losing money because of what is in a sense still my war."

"I am involved too. Also, Investments are not losses. Or not always, no?" the girl said gently. "It - it is my money, Shizuru. To dispense as I will. If it serves to protect my people and help you, I do not see how it can be a loss. I would give it all if I could for such ends. It is to be considered too that few investments have such success as you. What in this is a loss to me?"

And before Shizuru could think of what to say to that, she added with unexpected impishness, "Also, I should say to you that I am rich too, Shizuru."

Her smile was so mischievous that Shizuru ended up setting aside her qualms for a moment, intrigued by the young woman's tone.

"Are you now?"

Natsuki nodded, eyes sparkling.

"How rich?" Shizuru smiled back, playing along.

The girl told her.

"What?" The answer wiped Shizuru's smile off her face. "Are you serious, Natsuki?"

The girl nodded.

" So much ?"

Again the girl nodded.

"Would you say you could produce..." She paused to think of an astronomical sum, the type only Croesus himself could produce at a snap of the fingers. "Say, ten thousand talents if you needed them at a moment's notice?"

And inevitably, the girl nodded.

" Ecaster !" Shizuru scowled, the golden fur of her eyebrows glinting as they drew together. "You are rich!"

"Umm." Natsuki gave her a funny look. "But you are too, Shizuru."

"Even so, I had not thought-"

She broke off and looked away, then threw another scowl at the young woman.

"And it is all sitting there, in the royal vaults at the citadel?" she demanded. "Have you other assets or investments accruing profit for you?"

The girl was still trying to understand why her revelation would cause Shizuru to look so appalled, but answered honestly anyway, unconsciously reverting to the Himean tongue: "I have land in our lower territories also. Grazing land, for cattle and horses."

"Which horses? The prime horses?"

"Mm-hm. Like Niger and Albinus." She chewed fitfully on her lip, then seemed to decide it was better to come out with all of it at once: "Many of the Lupine Division's horses, they come from my stock. And - and some of the suh-suh-steeds for the cataphracti."

"Do they fetch as good a price among your people as they do among mine?"

"We were fair to your people, Shizuru," the girl said, seemingly affronted by the suggestion. "There was no difference in price."

"Which makes each horse worth a small fortune," the other observed, brushing off the Otomeian's miff. "Do you keep the money you get from that in your personal funds or do you add it to the vaults that are properly the Ortygian Treasures? You do your private banking separately, of course?"

Again Natsuki chewed on her lip.

"Shizuru, I think I must explain," she said with awkward gravity. "The Ortygian Treasures are mine."

She struggled for a moment, then proceeded: "The Treasures, they were not the collected wealth of the people who - who were part of our tribe. It is not the wealth of individuals. Those were taken by the Mithrii. What is in the vaults is the rightful wealth of the rulers of the Ortygians."

"Which would be you," Shizuru said, staggered.

"Yes. It is what you can call, um, my private bank, in a way."

There was a pause as Shizuru let that sink in, weighing it over in her mind.

"So all of it is yours," she summarised for the girl. "Unequivocally and totally?"

An affirmative.

"And what happens to it once you are gone?" Shizuru asked, seemingly caught between awe and dismay. "For I cannot see a single person exhausting so much wealth in a single lifetime. Your wealth sounds as though it would rival mine. Is there anyone who is next in the line of inheritance?"

"If I adopt or have a child, yes. Otherwise, no."

"What of your cousin?"

"Nina? No." She sounded positive. "Nina is not close enough to the ruling line to be considered part of it. She is my cousin, yes, but she is a - a distant one."

"So who else can touch it after you?"

"No one."

At the older woman's flabbergasted look, she enlarged on it further.

"It is bound wealth, Shizuru. Like a curse. Many of the Otomeians even say it will curse their bloodlines if they try to use any of it, and this holds even more for those of us - the Ortygians - who remain. It was in the oath, and the oath holds."

"The oath?"

Natsuki explained the original agreement between the Otomeians and Ortygians to her.

"It is good, I think. It means people do not even want to steal from me," she said with a small smirk afterwards.

The blonde shook her head, still dazed. Did the girl never tire of giving her surprises? She had expected the Ortygian Treasures to be extant in some form or amount, perhaps hidden away somewhere known only to their relatives, the Otomeians. But to have them publicly known and to have so much of them remaining... How could this not have been made known to her before? Why were people unaware of it? For if they were, she knew, there would certainly be far more belligerent nations making attempts on the citadel of Otomeia.

"So, I go back to your question," Natsuki told her, ever the stickler for tying up loose ends: "I put my profits each year and booty that belongs to me there too, sometimes. Sometimes I bank it elsewhere or invest. It depends on which is of more convenience or - or opportunity, yes."

Shizuru closed her eyes and pressed on the lids with her fingers as though she were having a headache.

"Pray do not mistake this to be an offence, my darling," she murmured. "But I had not taken you to be a businesswoman."

"Only a little, Shizuru," the girl answered. "I only do it because I think it is, umm, what is the word you use? Ah, wasteful. Yes. I think it is wasteful not to have at least a part of it work." She switched to Greek for a clearer explanation: "I think it is also a responsibility of those with wealth to see that it circulates."

Even in her dismay, Shizuru could not resist smiling at her lover.

"And apparently you are versed in economics too," she told her. "I disapprove of hoarding money as well, so I agree."

Natsuki nodded, watching her closely. "But you are troubled."

"I am indeed," the older woman admitted, red eyes grim again. "I suspected its existence, but never the vastness of your inheritance, Natsuki. I know you are not given to hyperbole, so this means I cannot but trust in your word as to its size. You are fabulously wealthy."

"And this is a problem, Shizuru?" Natsuki asked, eyes twinkling because she was secretly amused-besides being worried-by this reaction. Was it normal for someone to be dismayed by the fact of a lover's affluence, after all? She could not recall feeling anything negative, herself, when she had found out about Shizuru's money.

"I am afraid it is in fact a problem," the other said, running a hand through her hair. "Natsuki, answer me frankly. Have you mentioned or even intimated this to any of my people? Or spoken about it within the hearing of any Himean-officer, ranker, or servant?"

Natsuki baulked at the idea: it was ignoble to brag about wealth, in her opinion, especially when one had so much about which to brag. Joking about it the way Shizuru often did about hers was all well and good, but since she considered herself not very good with jokes-although Shizuru kept telling her the contrary, but she suspected she was only good with jokes in front of Shizuru, so it did not count-she certainly could not joke about her wealth with others either.

"Never," she said with feeling.

"And I have not heard about it until now. Why is that? Your people do not talk about it, do they?"

"No. It is never talked about, except once, when each Otomeian is told of the oath and the bond. All Otomeians are told the promise, and then they do not speak of it again."

Natsuki squinted when she saw that the older woman was still looking for assurance on the subject.

"I told you before, Shizuru," she went on. "I will tell you again: it is like cursed wealth. No one talks about it because it is not something they wish to touch, even. It is forbidden to use to all but those with the blood of the Ortygian rulers. It is not forbidden to talk about it, not specifically. But it is held to be wiser. They do not talk about it because they have no reason to."

"Whereas there is every reason to keep it that way." Shizuru frowned at the girl to show her she was deathly serious. "You might need to talk to your people at some point, Natsuki, just to remind them to keep to their code of silence on it. Ensure no Otomeian even mentions the Ortygian Treasure or even admits to its existence before my people-at least not with a tone of factuality. Do all of them know how large the wealth is, by the way?"

Natsuki considered it for an instant.

"Very few are permitted to see it, even, Shizuru. Many know it is large because of the tales, but..." She smiled shamefacedly here. "But perhaps not as large as in truth."

"With good reason. What you have just described to me sounds as though it would be sufficient for a nation, not just one person." She started, checked herself. "What am I saying? Of course it would be so. You were supposed to be queen of your own nation, after all!"

Natsuki was still smiling.

"I am not, um, extravagant," she explained, smile widening after saying that: she was pleased with herself for getting out the Himean word properly, it seemed. "I spend not much for myself. So many think there is not so much in there."

"And that the tales of its size were inflated myths, I suppose? But some do know, of course, few though they might be if it is indeed as you say."

"Mmm."

"Natsuki, listen to me." Shizuru sat up straight. The fantastic eyes were riveted to hers, showing her Natsuki was listening. "This is important. You should not admit to your wealth, or never anything even approaching the true extent of it, within hearing of any of my people. You may admit to wealth you have gathered from other campaigns, or wealth you hold as a member of the Otomeian nobility-in fact, pass off all your wealth as that, if ever a situation arises that you are questioned-but do not admit to the wealth your family left you. Tell your people not to speak of it either, as much as possible. Never talk about the Ortygian Treasures. Do you understand?"

Natsuki nodded, although her brow was wrinkled.

"But Shizuru," she said. "Why?"

"Because were my people to know that such a hoard of riches were in Otomeia, it would not take long before they found reason to annex it."

Natsuki's eyes regarded her with a studying expression, not astonished but not absent queries either. Shizuru saw that she had considered this possibility herself, but had not really come to a conclusion yet.

Yet she told you, she told herself, chest swelling with gratitude that the girl would trust her so much. Not even as a test, for she could never have taken it back. She told you.

"Is this true, Shizuru?" Natsuki eventually asked. "Even if we are allies?"

Shizuru's smile was humourless.

"It is the way of my people," she said. "Not for nothing do we have a reputation for conquest, Natsuki. Usually, it comes from the ambitions of those leading our armies, from senators salivating after power, or money, or fame. I admit I belong to those ranks, meum mel, but I am different and I have my share of scruples. I would not destroy a faithful ally simply to grab his money and I love you more than myself besides. But many among my peers would do what I would not."

She rubbed at her temples, not noticing the girl's wild flush at her casual profession of love.

"Your people's history and their fabled wealth would see many a greedy ear perking up," she continued. "Many of our wars in the past have actually been impelled by a single senator's relentless agitations or manoeuvrings to seize for himself as booty the wealth of another nation. Granted, in my case, what I really want is glory and the chance to enrich Hime, not specifically myself-but I understand what motivates my peers all the same. Perhaps I am only fortunate in that I have never lacked wealth and also happen to believe in alliances more than dependencies where possible... but while I would never think of taking your wealth or what is better known as the Ortygian Treasures, I am only one person among four hundred. I have no doubt that over half the Senate would come up with designs to get their grubby hands on your fortune by taking over your country."

"They would find it very hard," the girl replied with flinty determination.

"Even so. Let us not give them any reason to try it at all." Shizuru clicked her tongue in annoyance. "Although it is a given that they shall find out sooner or later."

"My people do not talk of it, Shizuru."

"If your people know it exists at all, tongues shall eventually wag and fables of wealth repeated, Natsuki. It only takes a few cups, as they say-and if you have not noticed, a good number of your soldiers and mine fraternise over liquor. Damn."

Natsuki looked worried now. If Shizuru thought something sufficient reason to curse, after all, it must be a grave possibility indeed. She got on her hands and knees and crawled forward, instinctively seeking the warmth of her lover's side.

"Shizuru," she said upon reaching her destination, her tone asking what she should or could do. This was a point of great sensitivity to her, after all, given her fears over being a talisman of misfortune for those who hosted her. If Shizuru's worries came true, she might end up being the undoing now of a people who had taken her in after she lost hers. What a wretch she was turning out to be!

Shizuru saw the self-castigation in the large eyes: she put an arm around the girl and kissed the top of her head.

"Do not fear, Natsuki," she told the young woman, who kissed her shoulder. "I promise that I shall think of something. It shall not be a problem for as long as this Northern War lasts, at least, so we need not think of a more definite, set-in-stone safeguard yet. And even after the war is done, as long as I am alive and you are known to be linked to me, no one in the Senate would dare the idea I have just put forward."

The green eyes turned to her and she went on, smiling to soothe what she had just ruffled.

"Really," she said. "You are fortunate indeed, my darling: had your lover been any other Himean, you would probably be in trouble. But no one shall try a trick on you because they are not stupid enough to dare touch what is mine or what I have taken under my wing. For now, you may take comfort in my protection there. My cousin would undoubtedly add her protection to you too, among others."

"Shizuma," Natsuki murmured.

"I hope you are just saying her name because I mentioned her and not because you are already confusing us."

She got a light tap on the arm for that, although she pretended it had hurt, rubbing the muscle dramatically. Her statement had been a jest on Natsuki's regular-if-unspoken comparisons of her with her cousin.

"All right now?" she asked.

"All right," Natsuki responded.

They looked at each other.

"Shizuru, when do you meet her today?" the girl said, clearly eager to move on to a topic of less gravity for them. "Your cousin?"

Shizuru glanced at the water-clock.

"In an hour," she replied, pushing Natsuki to lie down. She followed by lying down herself, facing the girl so they could talk even in this position. "You can see the clock. Tell me when it is time, please. I want to while away the time with you until then."

"Mm."

Shizuru put her palm against the other woman's and laced their fingers together.

"You know, the winter gear we ordered should have arrived by now," she purred, playing idly with the hand in hers. Despite the scars on it, it was so white it could have been fashioned out of pure alabaster. "No doubt the troops already know that the winter shall not be a quiet one. If they have not gathered it yet from the ceaseless drilling and constant injunctions to 'be prepared to mobilise at a moment's notice', they should have gathered it from the rumours of me buying out the stocks of the sock- and scarf-makers in the city."

"Ah." Natsuki's eyebrows were up with curiosity. "Shizuru, I have a question."

"Speak it."

"Why did you not commandeer them instead? The socks and scarves and things? They are for a war that also saves Argus, no?"

"True, they are."

"So why pay for them?"

"Because I can," Shizuru answered, pinching the girl's fingers. "I could have commandeered them by that logic, true, but it would only have been the proper thing to do were it the case that I absolutely could not afford them. It keeps my name smelling sweeter too to pay for what I can pay."

"Oh," Natsuki said with some dismissal. "The politics."

"Yes, the politics," the other replied, lifting a fine eyebrow. "To commandeer things so carelessly is rather a royal way of thinking, Your Highness. It shall not serve an elected Himean politician well."

"Huh. So you think your legions... they will know you plan to march in the winter due to this?"

"Yes. Rumour gets around faster than you would credit among the rankers, especially as they mingle more than we do with the common folk, or the local markets. I doubt any of them have an idea of where I intend to take them. But as far as the plan of marching in the winter goes, they are probably expecting it already, all the more as I directed the centurions to encourage the legionaries to go to the bagnios as much as possible these past two weeks." At Natsuki's frown, she clarified: "To the brothels. The warehouses?"

The rapid series of nods the girl gave nearly made her laugh, but she held back behind a wide smile. The prude in the Otomeian was obviously afraid she would come to saltier synonyms or descriptions if she continued-which had in fact been her intention.

"And - hrm! - the prostitutes," the girl said, actually producing a delicate cough that rather expanded Shizuru's smile. "Why the need for them? Why does it tell the legions you will march?"

"Let us answer one question first," Shizuru replied, propping up her head with one hand by crooking an elbow and setting it on the pillow. "As you well know, military life tends to make for cold nights, especially given how we disapprove of liaisons between the rankers. Not necessarily a whipping offence, of course, but something that is not encouraged and which can lead to dishonourable discharge in certain situations, as a general rule."

Natsuki nodded: it was a given in an army, naturally.

"For this purpose, we have a culture of encouragement that supports a view of the army as one's family," Shizuru proceeded. "Rankers are siblings, not potential lovers. Incest is taboo in our culture, so it helps to prevent affairs from popping up. And we encourage homosexual liaisons very strongly-I think you do the same, correct?"

Again Natsuki nodded, adding, "To prevent complications such as childbirth."

"Precisely," Shizuru agreed. "People understand this and expect it when considering active military duty. This is pretty much given in the Himean army, as they probably are in yours. But with a powerful difference: we Himeans have rather a more sexual culture than you do."

Natsuki did not nod, but the colour on her face sufficed for an answer.

"Part of ensuring that I have the soldiers' absolute loyalty is in keeping them happy whenever I have the wherewithal to do it," the older woman continued. "And in ensuring that in between the tough times, they get their rewards. Sometimes I do it with bonuses in the booty. Prior to a long march where they shall not be granted access to women or men, I do it by making arrangements with the local brothels to see to the soldiers' needs. The discounts the legionaries are being given when they visit such establishments are ones I have actually paid for already to the Mistresses and Masters of the brothels. This way, all the soldiers get their romp in the hay, as it were, and at an affordable price so that they can do it as much as they need to before the march."

"This is why they already suspect that we are going somewhere soon," she concluded. "Because I typically do this when I am going to put them in camps or take them on marches where non-combatants like slaves and the usual prostitutes you see following the legions shall not be allowed. They know I do it to let them glut themselves on sex if need be so that they think little of being forced to be more abstemious for a time afterwards."

Natsuki was very quiet and thoughtful after that, and Shizuru urged her to say what was on her mind. The girl smiled with a bit of embarrassment.

"Your people," she started. "They - they make much of this."

Shizuru smiled and flipped over onto her back.

"Whereas it matters not for yours," she responded.

"It matters," the girl replied with surprising swiftness, Shizuru thought. "Only differently."

"Quite."

They were not the only ones to sense that the context of the conversation had already been altered to something more secret as well as sensitive: the panther still stretched out next to Natsuki flicked its ears, sensing disturbance in the air, and then got up and padded away to the corner where its water bowl was kept. The sound of its tongue lapping was low beneath the other sounds floating from outside: muted but still understandable calls from the people on the streets, slaves inside the mansion's courtyard going at their work, carts trundling on the roads. After a while, Natsuki's voice joined this background symphony.

"Shizuru," she called.

Shizuru hummed to show she had not fallen asleep.

"You have-" She stopped and composed herself. "You have been tuh - tuh -"

"To a brothel? Yes, I have." She clarified immediately: "Never to touch any of 'the wares', so to speak. The first time I went into one it was merely out of curiosity, and all I did was talk to the proprietor of the establishment and the friend whom I had accompanied there. I have never gone to a brothel for sexual companionship."

She turned her face to Natsuki's patently relieved one and asked, "Did you think I had?"

"I - I thought the possibility was very small," she admitted.

"I meant: did you think I had recently?"

"Ah, I..." A swallow. "No. I thought, no."

"As well you should. I have not and shall not seek companionship in such places. And I did promise to be faithful to you."

She sat up and heaved a breath before looking over her shoulder and casting an unreadable glance at the girl.

In her mind, she was thinking, But I am still Himean like my legionaries, at the end of the day.

This thought did not signify any desire to visit a whorehouse to get her needs seen to, but rather her frustration over the fact that the two of them had not made love at all since their reunion. While a great part of that had used to be due to Natsuki's illness at first, Shizuru had to admit that part of it now had to do with her, and so blamed herself for it even while at a loss on how to resolve the matter. It was not that she felt no carnal longing-far from it, in fact-but rather that there were subtleties of fear that now informed her decision to chain down the hunger.

A good deal of the fear had to do with her self-knowledge. Her attraction to Natsuki, she knew, had always been one of remarkable power. Time and more intimate acquaintance had built upon that foundation a deeper, even more remarkable affection but it had never really subdued the gravity the fleshly foundation exerted on the construct. It was why she had always been rough with her in the past, no matter how many times they started out tender. She had developed a strong urge to protect Natsuki as a result of her love now, true, yet that urge had not managed to kill off the initial response her body still held to the girl's. It was something to which either of them could attest based on all the times she had tried to crush, to bite, to practically animalise Natsuki's body in the past, and all because her own body continued to be as disturbed by the girl's as much as it was enraptured by it.

So how much more savage could she be now, she wondered, that their separation had clarified her desires to the level of supreme violence? This was complicated by her belief that Natsuki was still convalescing and not yet fully recovered-or as recovered as she could be-from the toll the war had taken on her. While her amputation and all the other wounds on her had sealed up quite cleanly, she still looked so fragile in Shizuru's eyes that the older woman continued to cosset the girl in her care. And for good reason: why, the girl had not even resumed having her courses yet! Shizuru knew this because she had asked the girl's loyal attendants, who said they had not needed to wash her bleeding rags for months, and that the drought of her courses had started even before the outbreak of the Mentulæan incursions. Worried about what this might mean, Shizuru had taken up the sensitive matter in private with the chief of the medici, taking him aside one early morning.

"A common outcome of poor nutrition," the experienced physician had told her, having been called in by worried parents before for the same thing regarding their teenage daughters back when he had still been practising his trade in the city. Back then, though, they had also called him in to ascertain that there was not a secret pregnancy in the wings, although in the case of the general's lover he was very certain there was no such thing: the meanness of her form and what she had just undergone could very well explain it.

"I believe it is the body's way of ensuring that vital functions are provided for, Fujino-san. It reserves what strength and life fluids it can spare for the more important parts of living, and not procreating."

"So it is not a serious thing?" she had asked, more genial to him than she had been before because he had been partly responsible for saving Natsuki. "Shall this lead to something worse, perhaps? And what can be done about it?"

"It is only indicative of a weakness of the body, nothing more," he had assured her. "Does she complain of any pains in her lower stomach, General? Any, ah, unusual discharges?"

"No, none at all," she had answered positively.

"Then there is no fear of worse things. As long as she regains her strength-which she is doing nowadays-and eats properly, her body should resume its normal activities by itself. She should not be troubled at all by it. If she is or does complain of pains, call me. Otherwise, please do not worry too much."

Despite that assurance, Shizuru had been unable to set her mind at ease, the words "weakness of the body" echoing about her head. She knew the girl was indeed progressing, and Natsuki herself did all she could so as to not be viewed as weak, exerting all her wonderful strength of character-but then Shizuru would see the stump, the scars, the skeleton of her collar and the slash of her ribs...

So she was caught in the cleft stick, afraid to let loose for fear she would end up devastating the girl without meaning to and aware too that the longer she checked herself, the more aggression was built up under the surface. She had not felt this before in their separation due to worries, she suspected, and not immediately upon their reunion either due to Natsuki's sickness. One could not have seen so mangled a body as the girl's had been as an object of sexuality but rather one of pity. This only compounded her confusion now because said body was not yet completely healed, yet no longer as brutalised as it had been when she had picked it up and practically felt the life leaching out of it. It was in an ambiguous, almost-interim state, midway between its non-sexual and war-torn form and its healthy and sexual past. Shizuru could and did already lust after it: her mind said it was still sacrilege to desecrate so frail a body that way.

Thus she struggled with her needs and fears, wondering how to reconcile them. It had reached the point where she actually felt the desire as a dull ache in her teeth, a nagging in her gums that felt as though she had to bite something. At some point she considered touching herself but gave that up within mere seconds of the attempt, realising it gave her no pleasure at all because she did not want to touch herself: she wanted to touch Natsuki. But Natsuki still felt untouchable. So she would wick away her passion only to suffer it anew every time she helped the girl bathe, smelled the provocation of her and touched the absurd softness of little ears and still-adolescent skin. Every time she parted her lips when kissing and encountered again that clean honey-and-milk taste, the flavour of Homeric Greece and the Ithaca of Ulysses...

The very voice and touch driving her mad cut into her meditations.

"Shizuru," the girl was saying, having been plucking at her robe for some time now. "Look. It is the hour."

"Ah." A glance at the water-clock confirmed it. "Yes. Thank you, meum mel."

Natsuki watched as she got up, tracking her movements to the chair where Shizuru's slaves had placed one of her red military tunics. Shizuru stripped off her robe unashamedly, her long back and legs exposed to the girl, and proceeded to change. As always, Natsuki stared with a faint sheen on her cheeks, crawling over to the edge of the bed and lying on her belly. She was still fascinated by the edges where the bronzed skin from the summer still showed darkly against the Himean's true colour, which was very fair.

When Shizuru turned around again, tunic on and properly belted, and her sandals around her feet, the girl flicked her eyes to one folded item on another of the chairs, which was placed atop an alternative tunic the slaves had also set out.

"Not the toga?" she asked.

"Not today. There is little use for it when I am going to simply deal with military matters, anyway." Shizuru strolled over and bent over the bed, kissing her lover's nose on its point. "Why, did you want to see it?"

"No-o," Natsuki answered, before cocking her head and narrowing her eyes at the garment. "Only, I wondered."

"Yes?"

"Do you think I will know how to put on those things?"

Shizuru laughed at the idea. "Want to try?"

Natsuki was intrigued. "How?"

"Try putting it on me, if you do remember how it is supposed to fold."

She fetched the bolt of cloth and handed it to Natsuki, who unfurled it and gawked at its length: it was clear that her memories had made it seem shorter than it really was, especially as she had only ever handled it in its unfolded spread now. Shizuru urged her to try, standing in front of the bed so the girl could do what she wanted.

"While I have your attention or some part of it, Polemarch," the older woman said, suffering Natsuki's mumbles to herself as she tried to figure out which part of the cloth to throw over what part of her model's body. "I would bear a request to you. The cavalry archers are considerably lower in number than before."

Natsuki knelt up a little shakily-she was still getting used to the proper distribution of her weight now that one foot and part of one calf were gone-and was steadied by Shizuru's hands on her hips. She thanked the older woman with a nuzzle against her collar, then fussed around the Himean's neck with one end of the toga.

"We are replacing them," she said.

"Good, but I want to increase them."

"Un-Himean."

"You're telling me!" Shizuru cried, emitting a laugh. "But what makes you say that?"

"Shizuru. Your armies, they have not had archers in - in centuries, I think. Always, you get your archers from the auxiliary."

"True. Do you know why?"

"Stupidity?" the girl murmured, undoing a fold she had figured out to be wrong. Shizuru cuffed her affectionately in the chin for her cheek.

"Fair enough," the older woman admitted anyway. "I confess I find the low opinion of ranged combat among my people stupid as well. That said, the practical benefits of having uniformly-trained troops and just outsourcing other troop types cannot be denied either. But back to what I said! I want more cavalry archers. We shall be going into quite a lot of plains later, based on my readings of the Mentulaean maps, and cavalry archers are crucial. As shall be your cataphracti."

"I will see it done."

"My thanks. Now what in the world have you done with me and my toga?"

She was referring to the horrendous tangle of fabric that Natsuki had managed to weave around her torso, arms, and neck during their conversation, which was as far from the proper arrangement of a toga as Otomeia was from Sicilia. Natsuki regarded her failure darkly and flopped back onto the bed, sitting back to survey the uncooperative garment with irritation.

"You are too tall," she grumbled. "I cannot reach properly."

Shizuru was incredulous. " Now you say this? You, an Otomeian?"

Natsuki waved a hand dismissively, still irked that she could not figure out what had gone wrong with her attempts.

"You are the tallest woman I know personally, Shizuru," she said.
"You are taller than even some of our men."

"Therefore this is what causes you to make a toga look like a tool of either capture or persecution?"

The answer was a pout and, unexpectedly, a knock on their door.

"It's me!" said Shizuma's voice. "I thought I would meet you here instead. May I come in?"

"Yes!"

Shizuru's cousin came in and shut the door behind her, stopping when she saw Shizuru's sartorial circumstances.

"You look stupid," she observed.

The other Himean rolled her eyes. "Apparently it is because I am too tall."

"Well, you are, though I fail to see how that relates to this."

Shizuru told her.

"While I see the merits of immobilising her this way, Natsuki, it actually goes on like this," the white blonde said, coming forward and untangling the toga about Shizuru so she could show how to properly do it. "Don't move, cousin."

Her young cousin looked on the verge of grumbling, being far less willing to stand still for a demonstration if it was not Natsuki doing it, but Shizuma shushed her before she could get up a decent wind of complaint.

"You're right in deeming her overly tall," she said, addressing the girl watching her demonstration. "I myself am considered statesque, but as you can see, she'd beat me to the rafters. She's rather an ogre, really: just look at those feet."

"Why are you here?" Shizuru said, interrupting her with a frown as Natsuki stifled a giggle.

"For one thing, the gear you wanted has arrived."

"Ah!" The commander was pleased. "And do we have all of it?"

"All accounted for, as a matter of fact. I went through the equipment myself." Shizuma put the last fold of the toga in place, moving aside so Natsuki could see the finished product better. "I talked to the centurions of the Ninth and Thirteenth too and they are primed and ready. I thought you would prefer to be told here, instead of in the staff room where people can overhear us, that your insane march through the mountains is good to go. "

There was a smirk from the darker Himean: Shizuma had tanned less than her cousin over the summer, having preferred to shade herself a little more than her cousin over the march. The still-brown Shizuru seemed even more golden when standing next to her, as a result.

The golden woman now winked at her lover and said, "Thoughtful of you to come here for that, Shizuma, but are you sure you did not come here too to get away from Suzumi-han?"

The other woman's face puckered as though she had just tasted something sour.

"That young woman hates me," she muttered, walking over to the bed and seating herself next to Natsuki-or trying to, if not for Shizuru coming over too and pushing her at least a foot away from the girl, who could not help but laugh at their antics.

"I shan't do anything to her, idiot," the silver-haired woman glared, resigning herself to sitting a little further away from the Otomeian than she had intended. "I'm only trying to sit a companionable distance, for Jupiter's sake."

"I find that distance companionable enough," Shizuru retorted, displaying all her magnificent teeth. "Now what has Suzumi-han done to you this time?"

Shizuma explained as her younger cousin started taking off her toga.

"Nothing, if you discount the fact that she looks to be praying for me to be sent to perdition," she groused. "Oh, it's all well and good when my mind is on work: she troubles me not at all then. But let me approach just another of the other tribunes to say a friendly word and suddenly Tamao-san is by my side and pestering de novo, pecking at me like some offended mother hen!"

"It is not so much you approaching the other tribunes as one particular 'other tribune', is it?" her cousin said. "Aoi Nagisa, that is?"

The green-gold eyes gave her a jaundiced glare.

"Just so you know, I have not even done a thing to Nagisa-chan," Shizuma sneered. "Nothing that would merit Tamao-san's rancour! I have been naught but amiable to Nagisa from the start, yet her damned friend acts as though I were the most licentious cur to ever approach her, rudely cutting short every attempt I make at simply engaging the girl in friendly conversation. As though I could violate her chastity with an affable word about the weather!" she spat.

"But you do intend that," Shizuru pointed out. "Eventually."

"So?" Shizuma was surly. "Does that mean I cannot be friendly with her first?"

"No, but do you have to be friendly with her first?"

The other patrician hesitated.

"Well, it is not as though vengeance would be satisfied with simply having her, I suppose," she murmured, sounding, her cousin thought, less enthusiastic about her plans than expected. "It might be in my interests to have her actually fall for me. Genuinely. That would be a far better way to show up those puckered-up asses of relatives she has, don't you think?"

Her auditors exchanged a swift, near-invisible look.

"If you say so," Shizuru said.

The older woman glowered at her again. "I do say so. Do not patronise me, Shizuru."

Shizuru held up her hands in surrender. "After all this time? Gods forbid! But what of Suzumi-han, then? Do you want me to assign her to someone else's staff?"

"Why?" The silver-haired woman seemed puzzled. "Had I wanted to do that, I could have just sent her off to one of the other legates myself."

"I merely thought it would be best for your appearance if the order came from me and not you. So you do not want her off your team, then?"

"No," Shizuma sighed, letting her chin fall into one hand as she bent over her knees grumpily. "For all that she can be irritating, she is in fact a superb tribune. Does all I require and absent complaint or complication, yet with a great deal of capability. You've seen the records she made of the local influentials offering their resources to the campaign for one request or another?"

"Oh, yes! Outstanding organisation, I thought. And she also negotiated very wisely with several, I hear."

"Yes," the other agreed. "So I think I would rather keep her, because she is, quite irritatingly, a genuine asset to have on my staff. Especially when you compare her to that prat I have to deal with, Satoshi."

"Who?" Shizuru asked, returning from having deposited her toga in a closet.

"Satoshi Takamisaki."

The Otomeian listening avidly to them noted that while Shizuru was already standing still when her cousin answered, she nevertheless seemed to freeze over at the name.

"What?" the younger patrician hissed. "Why, by all the gods, is he here?"

Shizuma smiled wryly at her. "He is one of my-and by extension, your-tribunes."

"Cousin, he is a cretin."

"No argument there." Shizuma shrugged. "But his mother came to me before I left Hime and begged position for him."

"From what I recall, the mother too is a cretin," the tawny blonde said, looking disgusted. "Good god, you could prop her up next to a caryatid, Shizuma, and no one would be the wiser as to which figure has a head made of granite! Why did you agree?"

Her cousin was incredulous.

"We're related to him," she reminded.

"Rubbish. We're Himean nobles, which means we're related to half the imbeciles in Senate. I notice said imbeciles are not here."

"Related to him a little more closely than most of them, then."

"We're related to Tomoe even more closely than to him, at least on paper," Shizuru riposted. "And I would never consider her for a tribunician role in any army I commanded."

Shizuma crossed her legs, sitting up.

"An extreme and unfair example," she said, twisting her mouth ruefully. "Not only did Tomoe employ your name for fraudulent purposes but was also, we know now, in league with the Mentulae in conspiring to get you sent back home so they could deal with a lesser commander. Satoshi's a cretin, but hardly touches upon that class of malice!"

"Granted," Shizuru said with withering dryness. "After all, he is far too stupid to think up a plan like that and far too much of a snob to dicker with Mentulaeans, rich and princely or not. Yet a cretin can, on some occasions, be as perilous as a harpy."

"Perhaps, but he occupies only a minor role here, Shizuru, so he can be managed," her cousin responded. "And more to the point, I had to give him a post and you know that."

"Do I?"

"Don't you?"

Shizuru folded two lean brown arms in front of her chest and said, "I find it a geriatric mode of thought. Why should we have to give people rewards for merely being related to us? I chose you because you were capable of being the chief of the legates on a campaign such as this and could be trusted, not because you are my cousin. Why should merit not be our standard for all such appointments, Shizuma?"

The other blonde opened her mouth to reply but shut it abruptly, seeming to remember something that kept her from presenting a retort just yet. Shizuru realised what it was when the older woman glanced at the girl sitting near her.

"Speak your mind, cousin," she said. "I can tell you now that I keep no secrets from her and that this shall eventually reach her ears, even if you do take it up with me when Natsuki is not here."

Natsuki smiled sheepishly at the legate, who exhaled heavily and shot a speaking glance her way.

"Actually, I was refraining from saying my piece just now not because I was worried about that," Shizuma clarified. "But because I did not want your lover to hear me giving you a sermon, Shizuru."

The younger patrician chuckled, not failing to see how Natsuki's ears seemed to perk up at the prospect.

"Go on, then. I have no doubt Natsuki would love to hear that, in fact," she said.

"It dampens my passion on the subject to have you invite me to it," Shizuma complained, shaking her head. "But have it your way. I understand what you mean about competence being the primary virtue, especially in the military, but the military is only one part of our world. The other part is one where nepotism reigns, and while that may displease you, it is yet the rule that holds and to which one must make concessions every now and then. We have to remember that a good number of your appointments for this campaign have already been considered unconventional. And with all the posts we have been handing out to conservative family members, how do you think it would look to refuse actual family?"

"I imagine it would look like plain good sense in this case. Everyone knows Takamisaki and his mother are cretins."

"Oh, for-!" The silver mane stirred as Shizuma threw her hands up in exasperation, swinging about to look to her cousin's lover for help. "You understand what I am saying, I hope?"

The girl seemed to be smiling at her, Shizuma thought, although why she would think that when the Otomeian's mouth did not even curve up at the corners she had no idea.

"It is not that I do not understand," she said hesitatingly. "But I see the justice of both, um, accounts."

"Do you ever run into issues of this sort in Otomeia?" Shizuru asked her, interested.

Natsuki thought it over. She eventually told them that it was a balance that had to be maintained in their world as well, although she also noted that it was very difficult to keep a military post in Otomeia-and one had to remember that many of their administrative posts were also technically military ones, given how deeply war was ingrained into their culture, she said-if one lacked merit, as it was possible to be challenged to a duel for it by someone also interested in the position. Duels were generally supported only if the person being challenged was considered to deserve that challenge, which meant skilled leaders were unlikely to ever get a challenge.

"But it is rare now to do it, a challenge," Natsuki finished.

Her audience considered the information she had just given them, intrigued by the savage-seeming custom.

"A duel to the death for command," Shizuma eventually murmured. "Well, it may work for military commands, but not for bureaucratic ones. Would one challenge a state treasurer for his job?"

Even as her cousin laughed at the notion, the girl answered, "No, but one can for... um... treasonous accountancy, I think you will call it."

"Why, whatever can that prove?"

"Nothing. Only, it is an opportunity to kill him."

The Himeans looked at each other, then to her.

"That is not how we do things," Shizuma told the girl who had succeeded in astounding them. Natsuki was not done yet, however.

"It is not how I wish to do things either," she confessed.

They asked how she would prefer such a situation to be handled.

"I think," she said, pondering as she spoke, "that there is - there are always possibilities of theft being more, mmh, complicated in big organisations. Even if you discover one thief among the treasurers, it is possible it is not a - a - an act from one, but from a number more - um - nebulous."

"That is a good word," Shizuru praised, prompting her to flush and nod in recognition of the compliment.

"So I think to kill the one you catch will let the others escape. If there are others, I mean. Also, I think to keep them alive gives a chance of recovery. One may still recover what has been stolen by investigation. But investigation, it is hardest on the dead," she said with great sapience.

She looked up from the sheets to find that Shizuru's cousin was looking at her with a smile, and she blushed even harder.

"Are you certain you're not Himean?" the silver-haired patrician teased.

"My girl," Shizuru interjected with particular emphasis, "is just naturally level-headed. I agree with your opinion, Natsuki. But we have rather strayed from our point."

She was solemn as she turned to her cousin.

"You may keep him on the staff if you find it necessary, cousin," she ruled. "But keep him well away from me and keep an eye on him. Do not send him to any of the other legates: they might not know how to handle him as well as you do, because they might end up thinking of his relation to us and act unduly gentle around him. So keep him with you. Any slip-ups that reach my ears will get him packed off or assigned to shit duty, depending on my mood. At the very least, we have already given him a chance: I can hardly be called unkind to family if family disappoints me and gets what it deserves afterwards."

Shizuma flipped her mass of silver hair off one shoulder and sighed.

"Fine," she said. "I shall keep him on my staff. This is the thanks I get for thinking of your image?"

Shizuru puffed air through her nose dismissively and came over to her lover, stroking her hair.

"We are going to the staffroom now, meum mel," she said. "You said you had an interview with the local artisans here?"

"Mm-hm."

"I say, how is that going?" Shizuma asked, getting up too. She was referring to the process of creating an artificial leg or support for the girl, for which she knew Shizuru had commissioned some of the best artificers and inventors in the city. "I wonder that it is taking them so long to produce something. What, did you not breathe fire under their rears, Shizuru? You should have told them to be faster."

"They actually already had some prototypes yesterday," her cousin informed her. "But Natsuki said she wanted changes made to them."

What did you ask them to change, mea vita ?"

Natsuki had not liked the weight of the leg, she told them, so she had asked the craftsmen to trade in oak for lighter woods. They asked her which woods she had selected.

"Cedar and African Cypress."

Up went two fair pairs of eyebrows.

"Wood for ships and boats," Shizuma observed. "Interesting."

"This is a wet land," the girl answered. "Other light wood, it will rot."

"Clever," her lover said. "Anything else?"

"Strips from a sagum on the soles."

"Even more clever!" Shizuru laughed, her cousin nodding quiet but firm approval beside her. "That would certainly dampen its sound, as well as soften and make more bearable its contact with the floor."

"Perhaps you should have her as head of your artificers, Shizuru."

"How about it, Natsuki?" Shizuru teased, her long fingers brushing over Natsuki's earlobes. "Interested?"

The girl shook her head at them with a smile.

"I do not know," she said, playing along. "I have already so many titles."

"Princess, Polemarch, and now President of the Artificers," Shizuru's cousin listed, putting a hand on one hip and slanting her head at the Otomeian. "Saturated with titles indeed. Are you not worried that someone will come to ordain you next as a god, my dear girl?"

"That is a big leap," Natsuki protested.

Shizuma jerked a thumb at her cousin. "Not for this one. She already worships you."

"And with good reason!" the younger of the Himeans proclaimed, bending over so she could press a kiss to the girl's white forehead, then to her pink lips. She had intended to stop there but caught a whiff of the girl's hair and ended up sliding her nose into the dark mane as she straightened, inhaling deeply so she could tide herself over with it for the next hours.

"Well, we shall cease troubling you for now, meum mel, " she said. "But would you come over to the staffroom once you are done with your own errands so we can trouble you again? We promise to do it with utmost reverence."

"Oh, does that mean I can also press kisses to her altar?"

Natsuki sighed as the cousins started bickering again, pushing both of them away from the bedside and pointing to the door.

"Go now," she ordered, looking upon them with fond forbearance. "It is so. You two are trouble."

---

King Obsidian was aware that something had gone wrong with the first sally in the war against the Himeans. The last they had heard from Prince Hanu was the letter bearing news of the triumph at Argentum, which had sent the royal court into a transport of jubilation. While the king had participated in the festivities and announced fresh honours to his son as reward for the coup, his feelings had been more complex than displayed: on one hand he was authentically pleased, deeming the victory a positive herald of their future; on the other hand he was eaten up by envy, grudging his son a triumph that had been denied him when he had met that demon-eyed Himean outside Argentum's walls.

It was that incident and the monumental laesa maiestas he had taken away from it that had seen him ruminating after his retreat to the Gorgo citadel, licking at the thorn the Fujino woman had driven into his kingly paw. He discovered it a thorn not easily pulled out too: dentate and noxious, its poison seeping even to his subjects. It did not take them long to get news of what had happened from those who had witnessed it, tongues wagging enthusiastically in dark corners of the royal palace. It did not take him long either to see that the members of the court now glanced up at him doubtfully from under their bows, their praises of him less passionate and fearful than before. He knew the signs, having been sensitised to them from birth and throughout his upbringing. He knew they were losing their faith in their king.

At any other time, he would have responded by ordering heavy massacres of the still-insurgent tribes in their newly-won territories to the North, and perhaps finished that off with some showy executions of the less likeable aristocrats in his court. Those sorts of demonstrations were par for the course when you wanted to secure power. But this was a special case, and even he had to admit their loss of faith was understandable. He had been cowed into a retreat without a single arrow even being fired, a humiliation compounded by the fact that in retreating, he had been forced to leave one of his sons in the foreigners' custody. This required a stronger demonstration than before, and his own pride demanded that he acquire vengeance for the insult besides.

It was thus that, even as his subjects thought him already a conqueror manqué, ready to present his rear for the Himeans to bugger more thoroughly, the king of the Mentulaeans schemed. To Obsidian, it was time to get rid of this noisome neighbour of theirs, time to show the rest of the world what soft skins Himeans still had. It had been a stroke of luck that another of his sons, who had been sent to the Himeans' city to pretend to seek an alliance-to blow smoke in their eyes while they took over Argentum, as was the intention-had remained in that far-off city longer than expected, and could thus be sent a note of recent developments, events and intentions.

The son in Hime, Prince Nagi, was perhaps the smartest of his offspring. He interpreted the missive from his father as an order not to return until he had done something in aid of the royal intent of invasion, then worked a trick that had even Obsidian surprised, somehow managing to get the Fujino woman-who represented the greatest mental obstacle in the king's mind to his plans, so impressed had he been with her-out of the picture and back to her godforsaken country. After that, it had been an easy thing to proceed... and the first thing he had done was to regain first his people's faith by declaring that he was going to rid the North of the ordure that passed for the Himeans, steal their territories from them in order to add to his growing empire. How the barons and princes and princesses had cheered, gasping with pride in their king! He saw then how close he had come to peril, and how many ambitious sons and daughters were waiting in the wings, how many nobles watching for his exposed neck so they could slit the royal throat.

Thrones were held with a mixture of power and paranoia. Hanu had razed Argentum to the ground, destroyed one of the Himean legions, and was martial and well-liked in court. After Argentum's destruction, Obsidian feared how the people would view his old failure against the blaze of his son's success. He spent several weeks plotting how to get rid of Prince Hanu after the prince's part was done in the war-only to be greeted with the news that the lack of communiqués following Argentum was actually because the Himeans had finally managed to throw up their defences on the boundaries. He let one more week pass, then announced that he believed Hanu and the first invasion force lost, deploring the Himeans forcefully and promising vengeance in front of his Court while privately thanking the foreigners for at least doing him a small favour. No threats to his throne could come from that son now!

Despite the fact that there were now Himean legions apparently policing the borders, the king was not overly worried about the possibility of the Himeans coming up with sufficient forces to return the blow they had just been dealt. He knew the way the Himeans worked: small armies to respond to provocation, not the massive forces necessary for a proper invasion. They were not invaders, being unable to produce the sheer hordes needed for being true aggressors. The old fame of Hime as an invasive force had been reduced to that of a commercial and diplomatic nation that only traded on the fame of its old conquests to maintain its status. How long had it been since Hime had invaded anyone, after all? The best they had done in the last century had been interventions for and with their allies, annexations of territory abutting theirs that had been defended by no more than barbaric tribal peoples, not empires with armies that went into half a million strong.

Compare that to his wherewithal. For every legion Hime could throw at him, he could put up five times the manpower. Even the enormous force Hanu had taken on that first sally and which was now lost to them was a loss the king considered conscionable: more soldiers were being found from the people every day, and there were still three of the royal armies to consider, besides the smaller armies some of the barons and more favoured nobles kept. Yes, the loss of Hanu and his army was fine. What mattered was that the first blow had been struck and had taken the Himeans off-guard. He had no doubt that Hanu had destroyed more of their cities and farmsteads as well as soldiers before finally being arrested at-they guessed-Sosia. And that would have been a fine disruption in their favour.

Originally, the plan had been for the Prince Calchis, one of his most favoured sons, to follow Hanu with another of the royal armies. But then there had been a disruption in their own lands, a massive outbreak of insurgencies in the North that Calchis had had to put down. During that time, the Himeans had been able to call on their Otomeian allies-oh, he owed that nation a reckoning too!-and thickened the boundary defences, tearing down with surprising speed every bridge on the Holmys as well as on the Atinu. Obsidian did not bother sending scouts to find fordable spots the foe had left unguarded on the rivers: the Holmys and Atinu were not mere capillaries, and were in fact the largest as well as deepest rivers in the North, which was why they had been chosen as the demarcation of the western bounds of his empire.

Fall dropped upon them and the king sat darkly on his throne, rethinking his plans. The Himeans would not hazard any major movements in winter, so he could be relatively quiet too. They would stick to the boundaries, as was their wont, and any retaliatory strikes on their parts would be made on the Mentulaean territories in that area, no further.

Calchis was made to stay in the north to keep the rebellious tribes quiet for the winter, but also instructed to move a little closer to the border. Another of the royal armies stayed in the centre and at the citadel of Gorgo, which the king vacated in favour of moving to his cushier winter palace to the west. With him went the royal court-including the Prince Nagi, who had returned from his sojourn in the Himean capital. Other, smaller armies were directed to take up positions near Gorgo, in cities capable of sustaining their bulk. Cities and towns near the border were instructed to either shore up fortifications or relocate citizens westward, bringing with them their most able-bodied to plump the armies.

Let them come, the king thought. They do not know these lands the way we do; here, we have the advantage. They will come in and be swallowed up by our might, our numbers. My suspicions were right: the woman I met in Argentum-the one who destroyed Artaxi's army with a force outnumbered by five-to-one, the one Nagi managed to tie down in their country-is only one among many. She would have to be, for no people could possibly throw up someone of her sort regularly. Even so, I regret that I did not kill her back when I first met her: why was I so afraid, so tentative about provoking Hime? Hime is a great farce. That woman was just a special case among its products, and she is no longer here to deal with. Whomever they send to contend with me will fall far short of her. All the more once I've trimmed his head off for my pike.

Chapter 61

Good day to everyone. There have been stirrings on the site of which I have been apprised only recently. My gratitude to those who informed me of what has been happening. I had in fact been searching for a backup fanfiction site in which to store this even before, but have been so overwhelmed by the number of choices that I could not choose easily. To the other writers: would you please share your suggestions for which sites may be preferable among the many, if it would not be too much trouble?

And to the readers, I am so very sorry for how long this has taken. We all have moments when fate delivers a lesson in irony, I suppose, and my earlier projection of possible good health was perhaps nothing short of an engraved invitation for it.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.), alae (pl.) - a cavalry unit. Estimates vary for the precise number of troopers per ala, but for this story, the standard shall be set at 500 per ala.
2. Jupiter Feretrius - the aspect of the great god that presided over the creation of various contracts, especially treaties. Rome's treaties were regularly brought to the temple dedicated to it.
3. Mea vita - (L.) extremely affectionate endearment; translates to "my life"
4. Meum mel - (L.) endearment; translates to "my honey"
5. Octet - military unit within the Roman army, composed of eight men. Each century divided its soldiers into octets.
6. Quartan ague - familiar to those with some medical knowledge, no doubt: this is the strain of malaria that recurs at four-day (quartan) intervals.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

"You there, clean up the body." A rustle, footsteps moving away, footsteps coming in. "I am done."

"That was all?"

"Yes."

"That was brief."

"The gods will reveal no more. The carcass has ceased twitching."

"Did you learn anything?"

"I always do, my prince. How it may be useful is usually what is unclear. The knowledge we gain is not always the knowledge we seek."

A sigh that yet managed to convey great restraint misted the air of the tiny glade. The trouble with having been raised by a personal tutor who was also among the most respected (and thus, outspoken) of the druids, thought the Prince Calchis of the Mentulaeans, was that it brought a more-than-fair share of pontification for the student in its train. He gave his old teacher a sigh and a mild look of warning, impatient to know what the old man had gleaned from the auspices.

"I asked the questions you wanted," the druid, Hiempnos, answered. "But I had to do it fast and could not ask more, I fear. The gods are reserved tonight."

"What did they say?"

The old man was crouching down to the earth, washing his hands in a puddle where the water from a nearby spring had pooled on the forest floor. He wiped his hands on his robe afterwards and moved nearer to the prince, the two of them holding their heads together and speaking very quietly.

"When I asked if we would win the war against the Himeans, the responding movements were very vague, very strange," he said. "Only the smallest hint of a nod did I see. It is only suggestive at best. I take it to mean that we have a good chance of prevailing but are not assured of it yet. And then I asked if the king would die in the war. The answer was yes. When I asked when, the head jerked thrice, each jerk a twin of the one before it. Three years. When I asked if your plans would succeed, there was no movement in the body. The gods reserve their wisdom on that topic, I take it."

Calchis took in the news, worried at his bottom lip.

"The signs aren't too favourable," he decided.

"They are not too unfavourable either," the other reassured him. "What is crucial, My Lord Prince, is that they offer hope. Perhaps it is the gods' way of telling us how conditional the outcomes of our actions are. A reminder that you should not stray from your path and resolve else you lose that which you have been working towards. Your plan can fail, but the chances are high it will succeed. You may yet be king after your father sooner than you think."

"Or I may join him where he will be in three years."

"Were it to be so, there would have been a clear negative to my question regarding your success."

The prince's voice took on a note of wonderment. "Three years! It's not so long a time, is it? Could it really be?"

"The gods have no reason to deceive us. Why should it not be so?"

"You taught me that gods deceive men often."

"When the men are undeserving and their causes base. You suffer from neither weakness."

"Three years," the prince repeated, now even more wonderingly.

"Be warned, My Prince," the still-upright old man said, blue eyes turned dull grey by the evening. "It is one thing to have the king dead. It is another to succeed him. Three years is indeed not so long a time, which means there is all the more reason to prepare your claim to the throne now and quickly."

"I've been preparing for years, Hiempnos."

The crown of white hair glowed even in dimness: Hiempnos bowed to his prince and- Dann and Dagda be willing! - future sovereign.

"I know that better than anyone, My Lord," he said. "But preparation does not stop until you achieve the goal for which you have been preparing."

Calchis sighed again, but this time out of wistful agreement instead of impatience.

"And there are many other, smaller goals along the way," he uttered in his low and hoarse voice. This was one of his few defects. Calchis was widely acknowledged one of the best-set-up of the royal children in many ways, a big and soldierly man in the pink of health, attractively masculine of face even if not a stunning beauty, and a proven leader of armies. His voice, however, had a peculiar roughness to it that could not be described as husky or gravelly. Rather, it had the sound of one either afflicted by a chronic cough or recently obliged to swallow a mouthful of chaff. It was most uncomfortable to auditors, who often found themselves reflexively clearing their throats upon hearing the prince talk, and was thus something that the prince privately wished he could change in his person. One thing he did to compensate was to boom his words-especially his orders-most of the time, since speaking softly exacerbated the cough-afflicted quality of it, but he did not do that now and spoke in uninspiring, chaff-filled tones to his druid.

"For now, I have to find a way to put down these northern barbarians first," he whispered. "At first it was useful to prolong my fight against them. But now it's an inconvenience, and the worst of it is it's not an inconvenience I can sweep away as quick as I thought I could. They're canny, more than you would expect them to be. The moment they think our attentions are being drawn elsewhere, they make trouble. They don't stop trying, they'd even go out of their old lands to burn our northernmost towns if I let them alone! How can I distinguish myself in the war against the Himeans if I can't be assured that these belligerents won't blaze up again come spring or once I leave?"

They were walking away from the site where Hiempnos had taken the auspices, leaving the druid's helpers to remove the body-a captive from one of their recent skirmishes with the northern insurgents-that had been used for the ritual. It would not be hard to clean the victim's blood off the large slab of rock on which they had set him: a light rain had begun to fall, blanketing the area with a greyish mist. The two men made off with their cloaks thrown over their heads, both grimacing against the winter chill.

"Have you no ideas at all about how to keep them quiet, Prince Calchis?"

"I'm still thinking."

Hiempnos grunted as he almost tripped on an overgrown tree root that had curled up and made a loop in the forest floor. He paused to utter a quick apology to the tree-it was an old tree, obviously, and thus a living one.

"If only we could have an all-out battle with them," he offered after making his apologies to the forest spirit. "We could finish with the north quickly."

"They're too canny to engage us out in the open. There are still some cunning weasels among barbarians. At least its winter, so they're quieter than usual. But when spring comes? It's like a fever, rises and keeps rising."

They trudged on a little further in silence.

"What do you think about trying to lure them into a parley of some kind?" the older man asked. "Discussions for peace or even for terms-say you wish to know what they want, exactly. Say you wish to speak with their leaders under a flag of truce."

"And kill the bastards while they're at their meals? I wish I could do it," Calchis growled. "It would break down the resistance in a flash! But if they don't trust me enough to face me in open combat, they wouldn't trust me enough to sit with me at dinner."

"It is worth attempting: we do not know how men shall react to an idea until it is put to them. And you do not even have to kill them. Not immediately. You could hold the leaders captive and see what advantage you could gain from it."

The prince mulled it over for a few seconds, the hiss of the rain masking his heavy footsteps.

"It might be worth a try," he said eventually, sounding less troubled. "Even if they refuse, I've thought of how to handle them. If they want to play at avoiding me, let them do it. I'll play at avoiding them from now on and focus on the local villages instead. I'll destroy any that's said to harbour them, even if we don't find any rebels in the place when we do ride in. It's been enough leniency from me-every time we do visit any of these reported 'hot spots' sympathetic to the rebels, all we find is soft people as quiet and meek as yoked donkeys. Well, we've all had suspicions about these donkeys and what they're hiding. I don't care anymore if they say they don't have any rebels among them: from now on, we'll go into the damned towns and burn them at any warning of insurgency."

"A harsh policy, my prince. Is it wise to punish even those not proven to be rebelling?"

"The problem is that we can't prove anything, Hiempnos," the prince answered. "We'll never prove anything. And there's an itching in my thumb telling me that nearly every little town or settlement we've spared thus far has been full of lying cheats. They house the rebels and ply them with food when we're not looking. It's where the rebels get their supplies, the towns themselves. Where else would they get the grain to feed themselves in the wilderness, where they hide when we come running after they've struck another of our own towns and settlements out here? So I'm cutting them off from their supply. Even if I have to destroy all the natives' villages to do it."

Hiempnos nodded. "I see, yes. Eventually, even their own tribes would cease supporting their fight out of fear."

"Or I could wipe out every settlement they have. That's not be a bad thing either, I'm sure I could get the king to see it. We could just repopulate this accursed land with more of our own people instead."

"A great improvement on the local population."

"On any population. Either way, it works out well for me." His face set, his eyes glowered. "And soon, perhaps in three years' time even, things will work out even better."

"Pray the gods it is so, for it has been a long time in coming."

Oh yes, Calchis thought. It had been a long time in coming.

Calchis was still fairly young, yet he already felt his years acutely, having spent most of them working to attain various things and securities. Even his current position had demanded a long climb up a summit whose peak yet eluded him. But that was the way it had to be: life as one of the king's legitimate sons was an arduous upward trek from birth, rendered more perilous by the presence of other climbers scrambling up the same mountain face you did while attempting to sabotage each other. Accompaniment here was not something sought out: it was a lonely climb, of necessity, as well as a perilous one.

Prince Calchis had something his rivals did not, however, and it was to his advantage. He had a helper, and most importantly, a helper who happened to be both usefully well-born and absolutely loyal. This was his full sister, the Princess Faris. Ever since her birth two years after him, she had been nothing but accomplice to any cause of his, and he himself felt a loyalty to her that was made more unusual by the fact that they were in a position where sibling rivalry was as natural as it was deadly. Thus the two had confounded everyone early on: they were ever with their heads together, ever assisting each other in all matters. Such was their bond that they were even mistaken for twins in their early years, before nature took over and forced puberty upon them. Simply, the prince and princess shared everything, including their likes and dislikes. For example, they both disliked their albino brother more intensely than all the rest of their siblings, bastards and unacknowledged royal spawn included. Which meant, of course, that their albino brother had better look out once Calchis became king!

They were closer to this goal than ever, with Calchis very likely to be pronounced the next in the line of succession very soon and Faris in a superb position to consolidate his power in Court since she was a fixture in the king's administrative council. They had managed to get this far through a mixture of luck, ability, and base cunning. Certainly their birth had done a good deal of it for them, but the rest they had had to do themselves, with the occasional windfall of fortune that the gods would throw their way.

King Artai IV, styled Obsidian of the Mentulaeans, had like his predecessors taken several wives into his household-and continued to do so even after his first children had already reached adulthood, every now and then stirred into the desires of youth by some noble beauty in one of his lands or offered a new wife by those seeking a political alliance. His first marriage, done to secure the support of a powerful baron, had been childless. The second, third, and fourth marriages-as well as many of the marriages after them-fared better. However, the children of the latter two marriages came first. Which meant that Calchis and Faris, though birthed by the king's second wife, fell far behind their older siblings in the line of succession, with the better-positioned Calchis merely being fourth in the royal pecking order when he was born.

Three older siblings: three serious obstacles. Luck took care of one early, when the second-in-line was struck down by the quartan ague in adolescence. Cunning weeded out another when what was supposed to have been a daring cavalry raid during a battle failed catastrophically, the enemy having received an anonymous tip about what tactics would be employed by the Mentulaean side. And just recently, luck had appeared to aid them again in one of the oddest guises it had yet to take, acting through the Himeans who seemed to have swallowed the army of the prince who was supposed to have been the next in line (though their father had not proclaimed it yet), Prince Hanu.

The Himean affair was an interesting element that had been affecting the siblings' plans. It had blown both good and bad for them. First it had seemed to be on their side when Artaxi-another brother they disliked, despising him as a sadistic loon who took pleasure in the application of pain without purpose-had been trounced and was eliminated as a competitor, and later on when the king himself had been humiliated by the Fujino woman, who had sent him home with his tail between his legs like a whipped cur. It had been a prime opportunity for a coup, and the siblings had already been planning for one that would ride the waves of dissatisfaction the king's humiliation caused in Court. It was for this reason that Calchis had prolonged his handling of the northern tribes so much, so that he would be able to hold on to his huge army until the time came to move against the king and his foremost rival.

But then the Himean breeze had blown against their sails. The king declared war and gained strong support in Court again, and Prince Hanu was sanctioned command of one of the royal armies. Not so headstrong they were blind to circumstances turning against them, the siblings had put off their plans once more and wait for a better opportunity.

Now that Hanu was to all appearances out of the way, though, they were back in business. Calchis was now the eldest legitimate heir, the first in line, the one nearest the summit. The peak was only a few steps away... but the siblings were aware that it was still ringed with so many perils. Now they had to tread ever more carefully and give the king no reason to suspect them even while remaining high in the Court's favour by distinguishing themselves, Calchis in battle and Faris in policy-making. If they played the game right, soon, very soon the king would make an error in this war and show himself inadequate while proving his son the better general, the better fighter, the better man in every way. And then they would strike.

Calchis only prayed that the king would not be canny enough to strike before they did.

---

Shizuru gave her Thirteenth and Ninth only a few day's warning prior to the march, calling a private council with her legates in order to inform them of where she was taking the two legions and what she wanted to be done with the rest. The plan floored the officers, of course (who crossed a massif with an army in winter?), although the shock was not visible in the legionaries on the day itself. Even the raw recruits of the Thirteenth looked trim and bright-eyed when they pulled into their columns in the dawn. But then, it was Shizuru's centurions who had trained them; if there was one thing Shizuru's beloved centurions knew about their commander, it was that she expected every unit of the legions to be constantly ready for a march, even down to the last octet's mule.

The commander thus managed to spend less time ascertaining the soldiers' readiness than making clear to her officers her strategies and intentions. The nearest possible crossing for her on the river boundary was the one Kenji Nakamura had taken to the southwest: a spot just a little north of the great massif. The bridge there had already been demolished but the crossing was still watched from both banks by armies from either side of the war. This crossing, she told her officers, was not what she would be using.

"I do not want to engage the army they have positioned there: it is too large, it would take too much time and I lose the element of surprise once the strongholds and towns further west of that spot get word of the fighting," she said. "River engagements are always time-consuming too. They would likely manage to move enough troops from the central Mentulaean lands to stiffen the southwest by the time we finish, and I have no intention of giving them allowance for that. So instead, I shall be bearing further down the river in my march and for the Via Fujino, then over the bridge that connects the northeast limits of Caledonia to the southwest limits of our Argus Province. That is where I cross."

"The bridge near the estuary," said Shohei, frowning as he-like most other people in the room-tried to figure out where in the world she was headed. Certainly he could see how going over that other bridge to cross the Atinu River would spare her an engagement, but that was an advantage rendered futile by the fact that she would end up on the wrong side of the country and the massif.

The bridge she was referring to had roads that led south, as she had noted, to Outer Fuuka and the lands of one of Hime's neighbouring allies, Caledonia. These roads, including the major highway of the Via Fujino, ran even further down to Fuuka Proper and eventually to Hime. There were no roads to the north once one crossed the bridge she wanted to use because they were blocked on that side by the geographic boundary distinguishing Caledonia and parts of Outer Fuuka from the southern Mentulaean lands: the Caledonian Alps, a prodigious series of ranges whose width at the thickest point more than doubled Argus Province's total breadth and whose highest peaks scraped the sky. To anyone's mind, the ranges were a far more insurmountable blockade than that the Mentulaean camp at the other crossing presented.

Yet the general leapt that blockade as though it were a mere pebble at her feet.

"I am crossing the massif," she said bluntly, causing jaws around the table to go limp; only her cousin remained unmoved, having been told of the plan beforehand. "There is a part of the most eastern ranges-the ones nearest the estuary and thus nearest us-where the height of the mountains is not as forbidding as in the other parts of the Alps. Under twenty-five hundred metres at the peak."

"Measly, really," her cousin drawled.

The general's lips quirked even as she continued speaking.

"As I said, I shall cross the more southern bridge, start from the wrong side of the country, then take a turn northwards to enter the massif. From there I shall cross the watershed and stay within that height as long as I can. According to the scouting parties, it shall be possible to march at that height for about five hundred kilometres to the west-provided no heavy wagons come, of course. Perfect for my intentions. I am hoping that the height as well as the season means that no Mentulaeans shall see us during that time, so that we shall be able to pass the Mentulaean army watching the other crossing. I plan to come out of the massif about three days' march away from that enemy camp-or seven days' march away from it, if we use the Mentulaean marching pace-which puts me within a few days' march of several of their towns in the southwest and closer to Trogum, Kenji's position."

"That would be a good outcome, Fujino-san," someone finally said after some time. It was Miyuki Rokujou who spoke. Like the rest, she was still struggling to come to terms with this unexpected plan, and spoke more to confirm she had heard aright than anything else. "But crossing a mountain in winter?"

"Ask the Otomeians: at twenty-five hundred metres, it is always winter," Shizuru said with dismissal. She wanted to get on to her commands quickly. "Why else did you think I was buying up all the socks and scarves from the Argus tailors, to become a sock merchant? Now as I mentioned, the Ninth and Thirteenth are coming with me. As are you, Keigo-han. Fancy a bit of mountain air?"

Keigo Kurauchi blinked, startled by the honour of being selected-especially as he was brother to someone firmly in the political camp that criticised her most strongly. To be chosen for this sort of venture was an honour and he knew it.

"I hear it does wonders for the health, Fujino-san," he said with a smile, prompting unsteady laughter from the others.

"I shall send Kenji-han a letter telling him to come down from the mountain fortress he has taken over to increase the size of army I have with me," Shizuru went on to say. "I am taking three alae of the cavalry here for my foray too, but not with me through the mountains, of course. The passes I am going take are better suited to mules and grazing shall be sparse and strappy."

She spared a nod for the two Otomeian representatives in the room: the polemarch was present, as was the baron who would be leading the three alae she had mentioned. Two military tribunes had already been selected to give Himean leadership to the auxiliary horse too, of course, and they received a quick glance from her as she continued.

"The cavalry I shall be using will go with the Fourteenth, which shall march with Avaro-han." A new legate, who received this appointment with a pleased look on his face. "This group shall head for the current position of the Fourth Legion."

The Fourth legion was the one locked in a staring battle with the Mentulaean army at the other crossing. She pointed to its representation on the map on the table.

"Before you and the Fourteenth Legion come within sight of the river, Avaro-han, send a courier ahead of you to the Fourth and to Ayase-han and Okada-han, who are heading that legion. Tell them that to break up camp and make as ostentatious a display of it as possible, then start marching upriver to join the Third Legion at the major crossing in the north. That is going to be our main base on the borders, as Shizuma shall explain later."

The man nodded, intelligence glistening in his small eyes as he thought over what she had just said. His newness to her staff showed, however, when he hesitated to speak even after she paused for him. It took one of the old Fujino legates, Taro, to prod him into speech.

"Oh, for god's sake, Maiza, she won't bite if you ask a question," he teased, compelling the council to share some friendly laughter with the overly-careful new legate.

Maiza apologised.

"And we're to take the Fourth's place, Fujino-san?" he guessed.

"Yes, but not immediately. Stay out of sight for as long as you can and wait for the Mentulaeans on the other side of the crossing to break up their own camp and head west."

"Why would they do that?"

"Because I am going to be making such a ruckus after I come out of the massif that they shall be obliged to deal with me before anything else." Shizuru tapped one of the small wooden figures placed on the map in front of her. "This is their position. Besides them, the nearest Mentulaean army of any note is more than a week's hard march away at our pace, far closer to their capital than to any of their Southwest Frontier's towns."

Her long, large hand covered part of the map.

"The southwest is their most sparsely militarised area because they believe it the safest. There are the mountains hedging it, after all, and the river getting closer to the sea is stronger, harder to cross than at other areas, at least without a bridge. Of towns there are many but cities are fewer and farther away from each other than in the central territory. According to our intelligence, the cities are smaller as well and there are no major barons or princes who have major claims in the area. They would be of even less concern to the empire in a war, then, simply because there shall be hardly anyone with interests in the area strong enough to compel him to bring the centre's attention to it."

She took up a new wooden figure, this one with the wood stained a shiny red, and placed it the left of the figure representing the Mentulaeen army she had been talking about earlier.

"Once I emerge from the mountains here, I shall be just a short distance away from the enemy army at the crossing, as I mentioned before," she told them. "I am not going to increase that distance too much. Even if I work my way west for a week, they shall still be the nearest army. Which means they shall get wind of my presence soon enough, probably scratch their heads at how I got there, and then abandon their post temporarily to deal with me. After all, by this time, the thing locking them to the border should have already vanished: the Fourth should have long gone and no legion appeared to take its place."

Her legate was grinning wide enough to split his cheeks.

"While I with the Fourteenth and the cavalry should actually be in hiding, waiting for the right time to occupy the old position of the Fourth," he finished, delighted by the subterfuge. "So you want us to throw up the bridge as soon as the Mentulae vanish and send the cavalry over?"

"Yes. The Fourteenth has some of my best engineers, Avaro-han. They should be able to throw up a bridge faster than even the Mentulaeans could credit."

"I think we generally do things faster than the slowpokes can credit, Fujino-san," Shohei interjected.

"True, and I plan to push the bounds of their credulity in the coming months."

She looked to the people leading her cavalry, then to Maiza.

"It is vital that you wait for them to move out before you show yourselves, though," she specified. "Otherwise, you sacrifice a crucial advantage. So watch them with care and wait for the right moment to present itself. Once the Fourteenth has established base, it has more or less done its job. The cavalry shall have the harder task afterwards, for it must cross the river, then shadow the Mentulaean army and find a way to overtake it unseen. It should meet me here."

She moved the figure on the map again.

"I expect to be in the massif for fourteen days," she informed the cavalry leaders. "Fifteen if something goes awry. Meet me at this location two months at the latest after leaving Argus. Earlier, if possible: you should be able to find me around the area even if you arrive earlier."

Maiza had another question. "When should we march?"

"Two days after today. The same day I do." Her eyes went now to her cousin. "The Seventh, Eighth, Tenth and Twelfth may march a little later than that, to give enough time for their baggage trains to be arranged. Cousin?"

The general sat back and the senior legate leaned forward.

"The rest of the legates and auxiliary are coming with me," said Shizuru's cousin, resting both elbows on the table and lacing together the fingers of her hands. "Our goal is to establish the main base at the bridge near Argentum, held by the Third and the bulk of the auxiliary. We have a lot to do in the next few days. Every detail in the army is every legate's concern, naturally, but here is a rough division of duties: Miyuki and Zanki-san will handle the supplies and general logistics, Shohei-san and I will handle matters with the soldiers, and Taro-san and Ushida-san will help the Argus authorities in organising a militia and setting up better defences in case the enemy penetrate the borders again. Once all of this has been settled to satisfaction, we shall leave Argus."

Like her cousin before her, she extended her hand to the map to move some figures around and illustrate what she was saying.

"The Eleventh, currently in Sosia, is going to be moving up to join us there at the end of the winter," she began. "More details and orders shall be given once we get to the Third Legion's base, but for now that is all you need to know. Focus on getting your respective legions ready and duties discharged as quickly as possible. You heard what my cousin said: speed is an advantage we have on the enemy in this war. If you catch anyone wasting that advantage by dragging his heels, give him a prick to speed him along."

She sat back and bored her light hazel-coloured eyes into each legate's, one by one.

"There is another thing you do need to know now," she said. "While we typically get word out to the legionaries of where we are headed by means of general musters, I want the final general muster until we get to our destination at the border camp to be held here. Should any alterations in our route or movements be made necessary along the way, word of it shall be disseminated quietly through the ranks instead of being shouted out from century to century. Shizuru and I have been talking about it and while the Mentulae do not appear to have any intelligencers left to speak of on our side of the river, we can hardly be certain there are none who are unsympathetic to the Mentulaean cause or that there are truly no spies at all in our lands. Screaming where we plan to go and what we plan to do just makes it that much easier for them to know what we intend."

"Good," said Ushida, approving wholeheartedly of so much military sense. "So it's going to be a quiet march to the border."

"Not at all," the general threw in, drawing their eyes to her once more. "I actually do want some screaming to take place. Shizuma?"

Her cousin took over again.

"We do want the soldiers to do a bit of theatre when opportunity presents itself-say in a skirmish or sighting of Mentulae across the river," the silver-haired woman said. "But it has to be clear to the legionaries, of course, that it's only for the purpose of theatre. To be exact, we want it given out regularly within hearing of the Mentulaeans that official orders forbid that the Himean legions stray from the river boundaries."

Never had she seen such a pack of wolves as the simultaneous smiles revealed around the table, Shizuma reflected. Then she thought better of her notion, remembering her experiences in Senate. Or were the smiles in that particular body better likened to those of jackals?

"So we're going to be pretending that our policy is going to be non-invasive and defensive?" Shohei asked for clarification.

"Yes."

"But what of Kenji Nakamura-san's position in Trogum?" Ushida enquired. "He's already penetrated that far into their southwest, after all, and they can't consider that anything close to non-invasive."

"A fluke, minor because it is so isolated, so small, and also happens to be positioned in the least-threatened of their territories," Shizuma replied. "And several of them already know how Himeans can break off from the central command just out of greed or desire to distinguish themselves with an independent incursion into foreign lands. They do it themselves. They would hence be more inclined to think Kenji-san's little army a little splinter that has broken off the Himean wall on the boundaries. We've not even sent any reinforcements to Kenji-san all this time, to add to it."

The others nodded, taking it in. They knew, of course, what this meant: they would probably be penetrating deeper into Mentulaeen territory shortly after arriving at the base camp. Why else give out such a deception, after all? Certainly it might prove useful to their commander's planned foray in the southwest too, but given where they were headed and the routes where they were likely to spread the false intelligence, it was more likely a shroud put in place for their own concealment.

"So make sure it is clear to the men which orders are true and which are intended for enemy deception," Shizuma followed. "The centurions are going to be instrumental to this, of course, but so shall the octet leaders: be certain to tell the officers to make good use of them. Anything to add, cousin?"

The commander shook her head and looked satisfied, smiling.

"Then this meeting is adjourned," said the senior legate. "You have your orders. Let's all get to work."

The Ninth and Thirteenth left on schedule after two days of packing, gear inspections, and organisation. They went on an almost perfectly western route as they exited Argus, trailed by a baggage train that served them for as long as they stayed on the Himean side of the river. Their general led them, again riding her horse only to cover the gamut of the column and exchange a few friendly words with each century. Every now and then she made jokes to the men too, laughing with them about how the foes' faces would look after they marched out of the supposedly impenetrable massif.

"Probably look like their mothers-in-law come for a surprise visit," one of her centurions quipped, causing everyone in the vicinity to double over laughing.

"Trouble at home, Hakase-han?" said the general, whipping away a tear of mirth.

"Pray it's the type of trouble you'll never face, General," he said with a grin. "If only you could make a legion full of mothers-in-law, though! Whip every enemy into shape in seconds, by Dis!"

"But then you'd get all their sons- and daughters-in-law deserting!" someone laughed at him.

There were many of these sorts of talks between Shizuru and the legionaries throughout the march. Even those who were new to it, like the legate Keigo Kurauchi and the greenhorns of the Thirteenth, were swiftly sucked into the Fujino army's appealing rhythm, soon coming to look forward to the times when the general would pass by their century for a chat again. She was so friendly and casual while remaining commanding that her presence was something the men found a genuine comfort. It gave them a bit of warmth against the cold, something to stiffen their backs and harden already-leathery feet for the long and chilly climb they faced.

Shizuru knew this, which was why she never let her good cheer fail, it being that she was the arbiter of everyone else's attitude. Due to their dependence on her, few of them probably realised that she was the only one in the army to whom comfort was not readily offered, for she had no one like herself to keep her spirits up as she plodded. This did not trouble her at all, however. For one thing, she was the commander and commanders had to fuel themselves almost all the time, stiffening their backs with self-belief and hardening their feet with their own steel. In her case, she also had the added benefit of a tingling in her bones that told her that her luck had returned in all its fullness and had turned again to her its most munificent face.

Even more concrete than the tingling was the exceedingly welcome yet totally unexpected assurance of her luck's return that she had received in Argus before departing. Time and time again on the march, as she returned to it in her memories, Shizuru would accord that assurance the same reverence one granted a divine visitation. For how else could one explain the boldness her shy, primly Otomeian lover had suddenly shown on that evening following her announcement of the march to the officers?

Had Natsuki herself been asked (and inclined) to explain, she would have spoken of lip-gnawing deliberations more mortal than divine, however. Human concerns were what birthed the assurance Shizuru regarded with such reverence, more than anything. It was undeniable that the girl's own needs were a motivation too, naturally, but as had become typical for some time now, it was Shizuru's needs that bore greater weight in the measurements Natsuki used for her decision.

The younger woman had noticed the restraint the Himean had been applying in her touch ever since their reunion, noting the familiar signs of the patrician's arousal and noting too the look of near-antipathy that flashed through the red eyes shortly after, cutting short any possibilities of indulgence. At first she had been hurt by these indications. Her thinking was that the jerky retractions were signs that her maimed form repulsed her ever-perfect lover, that the pathetic little stub of bone and flesh below one of her knees was enough to prevent anyone's desire from truly rising. But as time went by and delivered more information her way-and as she began to make her peace too with the loss of her leg and started to discard what she realised were useless insecurities over an unchangeable thing-the consummate observer came to a conclusion very different from the first and far closer to the reality.

It was strange, she came to think, how so fearless a creature as her lover tended to harbour so many fears for her sake. Her heart melted at the woman's concern, springing as it did from a powerful affection that had been proven to her beyond all doubt recently, but she worried nonetheless at seeing the complex trap Shizuru had walked herself into due to these same feelings. It took a great deal of time and thinking for her to fully appreciate it, but the epiphany itself only struck her between the eyes one morning while watching the older woman fuss and pick about their breakfast: as always, Shizuru had separated the best parts of the stuffed fish, slicing out the whole of the fatty belly and forcing it on the girl's plate. Watching Shizuru do it in that finicky and almost ritualistically obsessive way, the Otomeian was reminded suddenly of the priests back home and the way they offered sacrifices to the deities, taking extra care to cut out only the choicest parts of the calf or the sheep to lay respectfully on the altar.

Well, Shizuru had always pretended to worship her as a tease, she thought, but now she had to wonder if the Himean was aware of how much she had fallen prey to her own jest. For what Natsuki suspected was that Shizuru now viewed her as a species of sacrosanct object, to be revered and touched in only the most delicate of ways lest she be defiled or broken. It did not matter that she had already been broken, in a sense: indeed, it might have fuelled the Himean's reverence all the more, since Natsuki guessed that it only served to prove the possibility of graver defilement. Shizuru's own confession recently that she might not even allow Natsuki to enter battle any longer even if the Otomeian were still whole strengthened the hypothesis, which was that Shizuru the Protector now ruled so much of the Himean's affection for her that it now tied down Shizuru the Lover.

Natsuki knew something had to be done. It was not just for their relationship that she had to come up with a solution, but for Shizuru herself. The Himean was so attuned to the needs of the flesh: it was one of the things Natsuki loved most about her. But the sensuality of the Himean's nature also meant that this self-enforced abstinence took a heavy toll. Natsuki was aware that her lover lacked sleep, knew she was forcing herself to sit at that horrid bedside desk covered with work only so she could tire herself enough to get into their bed without being jerked into arousal by a touch. She fixated on Natsuki's scars and stub whenever they bathed, asking again and again about their healing as if to convince herself that the girl was still recovering-and thus, not to be interrupted in that process by less-than-gentle handling. Ah, her poor Shizuru! She must have thought the purity of her attentions was convincing. But Natsuki still felt the tremor in the woman's hands each evening when she finally left that damnable desk and curled up behind her.

It was up to her to do something and she knew it. Shizuru the Protector was hardly about the buckle in on itself, so Natsuki was the one who had to batter on its armour. At first she agonised about the means-how did one entice another, for heaven's sake?-and spent a fruitless day trying to imagine all sorts of seductive techniques that had her flushing so much that her lover summoned one of the doctors, fearful of a fever approaching. After suffering an uncomfortable check-up by the mystified physician, she finally accepted the simple fact that she had no head for seduction and had no experience whatsoever in premeditating it. The straightforward approach was the only way and the one most likely to work, since Shizuru found her-strangely enough, in her opinion-most provocative when she was not trying at all to be.

This still took a great deal of courage from her, it must be said. For it was not just that she was going against the grain of her character and cultural upbringing. It was also that she had to face the very real, very terrifying prospect of her theory being erroneous. Nonetheless, she took heart in the idea that it would help both of them-Shizuru especially-if she turned out to be right. She chanted over and over in her heart while preparing for the moment that even if she had to do something like this, at the very least she was doing it for the right reasons and the right woman, undoubtedly.

So it was that Shizuru had been arrested in the middle of reading a communiqué one night by a decidedly shaky but insistent voice asking her to turn around. The Himean was on the bed and facing the desk she kept pushed against it, as was usually the case in the evenings, when she usually worked and chatted with Natsuki until the latter fell into slumber. As usual, she planned to work a little more until she was exhausted enough to trust herself in bed with the girl, as the Otomeian had guessed, and only then would she sleep.

But that night, it was not to be.

She turned at the request and ended up freezing at the sight of the girl naked, sitting next to a pool of cloth on the bed that she took to be the nightdress the Otomeian had been wearing. She was certainly no fool, so she interpreted the blush and nakedness as the invitation the girl intended. But as she was shocked beyond measure too, all she was able to actually do was look, swallow, and say like a dunce, "Are you not cold, Natsuki?"

Natsuki frowned, obviously discomfited by the reception.

"Are you?" she responded.

Again Shizuru acted a dunce, privately wondering why her mouth felt sandy.

"No, not really. This mansion has a fine hypocaust, I think. I was saying it to Midori-han the other day." She swallowed, cast about wildly for more. "Oh, but I am not the one naked, of course. I do not wish you to catch your death of the cold, Natsuki."

Another frown, this one cast at the bed on which they were sitting.

"In... here?" Natsuki asked.

"It is winter, after all."

The other bit her lip. "I am cold now."

"You may want to put your clothes on, then."

"That is what you want?"

A despairing look. "You should not ask me what I want right now, mea vita."

"Shizuru." The young woman was close to tears, frustrated beyond belief. "Please! I also want."

All hope was lost the moment Natsuki uttered this. Shizuru found herself atop the girl and the girl atop the sheets faster than her mind would allow her to count the seconds, sparing no thought for the scroll that fell to the floor and the jar of blotting sand Hermias would have to clean in the morning because she had kicked the desk in her haste. All thoughts were for the naked girl in her arms, whom she discovered to be a fresh empire to conquer even if not a strange one. Shizuru had plundered and plumbed the very deepest parts of this creature before, but now discovered new treasures mixed with the old when the young woman reciprocated her touches with a fresh, savage fervour that she found as rewarding as it was astounding.

It was perhaps the combination of that fervour and the pressure of her desires that led to her defeat. Before, she had been able to hold her own fulfilment at bay long enough to give Natsuki hers several times over, even if it had often cost her a shrieking pain in the temples afterwards. But now it was Natsuki who did the destroying, slipping from her arms like a snake and tunnelling between her legs so hard that the first touch had her wrenching the girl's head away.

"If you do that, Natsuki," she gasped, "I will spend on you in an instant!"

"Please spend on me," was Natsuki's answer.

And in mere seconds, Shizuru did.

But if she thought that was the end of it, she discovered her error quickly: Natsuki fed from her so long and hard that by the time the girl finally relented, her mind had left her more than once-the last time so viciously that she had to thrust her own hand downwards to grab herself after the other's mouth left, in an attempt to calm the hip-yanking spasms that forced her to spit every breath like a curse. She was aware that Natsuki watched her unrestrained display with almost perverse absorption, but was powerless to stop the paroxysms still whipping her belly despite the embarrassment. She had never lost control of her own body in such a way before and certainly never in front of a spectator. But this spectator evidently enjoyed her performance, eventually coming to lavish kisses on her stomach and causing the taut muscles there to rise with long, slippery strokes of a hand on the wet skin.

"My god," she said through her teeth after a while. Another echoing clench caused her to swear and jerk again, teeth gnashing at the spasm. "You are insane!"

Natsuki looked at her from her belly.

"You are tired," she said.

Shizuru narrowed her eyes at the pride in the other's eyes, knowing Natsuki was right.

"Yes," she admitted. "Yes, you tired me. Brat."

A pleased laugh from the Otomeian, who clearly liked hearing this old moniker. Shizuru took a few more breaths to let her sweat-soaked body regain itself.

"But I am not all spent," she said, pulling the girl up. "Even if you did wreck me terribly."

"Ahh."

"Wonderful, terrible girl. Of course this is not something you prepared for by practising it, I warrant?"

Natsuki smiled slowly, flattered and feminine and suddenly all too assured of her own power. Shizuru jetted air through her nose, subject to an aching desire to break the girl's lips with her teeth.

"No practice," Natsuki told her.

"Tell me no one touched you while I was away." They rolled over. "Tell me you touched no one."

"No one touched me." Arms went around Shizuru's waist. "I touched no one."

The Otomeian moved a little but to great effect.

"You touch me," said the young woman, taking Shizuru's ear between her teeth. "Now."

This also-desperate-for-her Natsuki was a revelation. Shizuru bit and was bitten, subjugated and was crucified in return, and was lashed back into a frenzy after each torturous climax. At one point she grew so thrilled yet maddened by the Otomeian's reciprocations that she resorted to twisting one of the bed linens into a cord and bound the girl's arms behind her back. Undaunted, Natsuki retaliated by hooking both legs around one of the Himean's as though sitting cross-legged, shifting up and more tightly against the older woman until even her lower back was lifted from the bed. Their last position was thus a difficult tangle with Shizuru on her knees, both her hands cupping Natsuki's rear and pushing it harder against herself while only the girl's upper body and bound arms remained in touch with the sheets: every other part of Natsuki was in the air and locked around or against the Himean, whose own torso pressed on the girl's and emphasised the strange diagonal they drew from the bed and to their pelvises when their frantic coupling concluded.

"This colour becomes you," she said later, wrapping the now-untied purple cloth around the waist of the girl straddling her as she was fed wine from a cup. The wine's tannic, velvety depth mixed with the sweetish female tastes she already had on her teeth and tongue agreeably and she shared it with Natsuki.

"It becomes you too," was the response.

"I think it favours you even more," she said. "You look sumptuous in purple. You absolutely ooze royalty, Natsuki: I adore that about you. Why not be my queen? I have already kissed your very toes, after all."

Natsuki laughed at the notion.

"Barbarous," the girl uttered. "To demand such of a subject."

"Call me barbarian, then. But would you never entertain the idea?"

The other paused, uncertain now as to whether or not this was still a jest.

"What idea?" she enquired.

Shizuru took the empty cup from her and let it roll on the bed, beside them.

"Being my queen, so to speak. More properly, my wife."

The younger woman paused in the act of reaching to stop the rolling goblet.

"Shizuru?" she said, clearly requesting assurance that her ears were still functioning properly.

Shizuru gave it: "I am asking if you would consider marriage. To me."

Well now, thought the older woman upon seeing the girl's flabbergasted expression, it has been a while since I got her to play the startled statue like this.

"Surprised, hm?" she teased.

Natsuki's face asked why she should not be.

"And here I was hoping you wanted a firm future for us," she said, still teasing.

Up went the fine eyebrows. "Shizuru. I do. But... marriage?"

"Well, marriage would help with that, would it not?" Shizuru abandoned the teasing tone. "I do not say that marriage would make my love for you any firmer than it already is: your meaning to me is more than any contract of this type could ever express. Nor is it a matter of grave dissatisfaction with you and what we have. Still, I should like to be able to give you more than I do now."

Natsuki gave her the smile of one truly astonished.

"You gave me life, Shizuru," she said, causing the other to wonder if she was referring to her nursing during her illness or to something more abstract. "I cannot ask for more."

"And you should not have to ask for it," Shizuru told her. "Without taking away anything from the power of my affections for you, there is great sensibility to this course of action as well."

"Would you say the word... it is 'expedient'?" Natsuki interrupted unexpectedly in Greek, causing a suspension in the delivery of what should have been a fluid and well-worked speech. Shizuru looked at the girl, wondering at the remark and worriedly picking at her own justifications for the proposal to see what in them could be viewed as ones of expediency and just that.

"I suppose it would serve, but as I just signified, to call it solely that would be to rob it of sentiment," she replied, leaning into the pillows against her back. "And there is a great deal of sentiment here. You should know that by now."

Natsuki was silent and she took that as her cue to proceed.

"It would be expedient, however, in the sense that it would certainly provide for several things that could be cause for worry in the future. You would have to take on the Himean citizenship first, but I already have that ready when you wish to assume it, so it is not a difficulty. As for your status as an Otomeian, I doubt it would be entirely nullified in such an event, and I know your hereditary aristocratic titles-though probably not your assigned ones, I confess-would persist even were you to become a Himean citizen. Marriage to me would then ensure that you receive the full extent of protection that I can offer: as my lover, I can shield you by repute and word; as my wife, I would be able to shield you with the added strength of law as well. It would give you the benefit of Himean citizen's privileges and rights, and would also permit you legal access to my assets." She held up a hand. "Of course, your assets would remain yours: there need be no fears of that, mea vita, and I shall draw up legal documents providing it, as certainty."

Natsuki was watching her with an expression caught on the fringes of both amusement and awe, clearly fascinated by how much thought Shizuru had given to the idea. She betrayed nothing to indicate she would agree to it, but the older woman saw that the girl was at least not evincing displeasure either.

She probed her again.

"Does it sound unpleasant in any way, Natsuki?" she asked. "Surely you can see how it would be of benefit to you."

The girl's eyebrows drew together. "Umm. Buh-but how is it of benefit to you, Shizuru?"

"Surely you can see that as well!" the Himean said, eyes wide. "I wish dearly for you to be my wife, for one thing. I wish dearly to protect you as well, as I already mentioned. And, if I am to be honest, I wish you to be mine."

"I am."

She lifted the young woman's hand to her lips. "I am grateful. But I meant legally too."

"Himeans," the other murmured, tracing Shizuru's mouth. "Always legal."

"Would it grate on you so to be thus considered? I would be yours too."

"And now? You are not?" the girl said slyly.

"Again I meant legally too," Shizuru winked.

Natsuki chuckled as a hand turned her face away, lips finding the spot where the jaw met the throat.

"Again..." she sighed. "Always legal."

The older woman stayed her answer long enough to make another mark on the other's skin.

"You know I do not always live completely within the law, meum mel ." She sent a pleading smile the girl's way. "I realise it must seem abrupt, but please believe me that it is not. I had thoughts of it even before, when I had to return to Hime. It was the reason I arranged matters with your citizenship as well. I am not saying something in a passing moment of rashness: this is something I have thought on and decided with care."

"I... um... I am honoured by this, Shizuru," Natsuki answered after a moment of pondering it. "You honour me. I know not how to say thanks."

Shizuru smiled, a little tickled by the apparent framing of her proposal as a courtly gift. The girl took her amusement to mean that the older woman was taking her words as mere expressions of rote, however, and took one of the Himean's hands to set on her chest.

"My words are thin," she continued. "But my heart is full, it leaps, you feel it."

Shizuru's smile faded as she felt the thudding under her palm and became engrossed in the beat of this tiny but powerful drum.

"I do," she replied.

"It is because you - you have me," the other continued in a throaty, emotional voice. "Legal or not, it is so. As long as you wish."

Shizuru's eyes sought hers. "Forever."

"If you wish." A deep breath. "Buh-buh-but if it happens that-if one day, you wish it no more -"

"That negates the idea of forever."

"Even so, it will be and I will go," Natsuki persisted. "But as long as you wish, I will stay. I make oath for it even without marriage."

"I shall never wish you from my side, but I thank you for that," Shizuru said gently, seeing where Natsuki was headed. "That said, I still want to marry you, Natsuki."

She smiled to hide the slight feeling of disappointment, seeing that it would take more argumentation to convince the girl of this course.

Well, of course it would: what had she expected? That the girl would gasp with delight and immediately say yes? Perhaps there was a foolishly romantic part of her that had hoped for it, she admitted, but she knew that her girl was a rational one and that what she was proposing, for all her nonchalance, was no small matter. She would have to give her more reasons. And time, perhaps. She would have to give her time.

It must have been the fact that she had to leave her side again soon: she suddenly felt that she had very little time to spare.

"I apologise," she spoke. "I know I rather cast this at you without warning, Natsuki. Still, I would actually like to discuss it with you right now. Sensibly, of course. Is there anything in it that would be off-putting to-no, rather, would being married to me cause you some trouble? Or is it that you do not want to take the Himean citizenship?"

Natsuki brought her head from side to side slowly.

"May I know what it is then that gives you pause? I know this is a grave decision, of course, and thus merits pause by virtue of that alone. But I would still like to know if there are other objections or obstacles to it that add to the hesitation."

Her calm seemed to encourage Natsuki, who thought about it.

"I wonder only, Shizuru, if marriage would answer," she eventually confessed in a soft voice, bringing her arms over Shizuru's shoulders as if aware that the older woman needed the touch badly at the moment. "I said to you earlier. You know you have me. Even-" her eyes darted about swiftly "-even my property is yours, if you have need of me to use it."

She held back the Himean's protest with two fingers on the lips.

"All I have is yours already, is what I wish to say," she continued. "So why marry me ?"

"I already explained why, Natsuki. "

"You spoke of my gains," Natsuki returned, pleading with her eyes for the Himean to listen for a moment. "But you gain nothing if you marry me. I know you will say it is so that - that your mind is calmer as to my protection. But what protection you give now is already powerful. You are confident in it, so the added calm to you would be not so significant, I think. The good of this marriage, it all falls upon me. I do not see it treating you the same." Her mouth turned down at the corners. "I should ask if it is wise, Shizuru, to enter a marriage so slanted."

"I gain more than you think, meum mel," Shizuru said. "I gain you for a wife."

"But I am yours now. It is only the name that is different."

"There is more to it than nomenclature."

"More?"

"I have been trying to say it all this time, Natsuki."

"But what you said, it was more for me."

"It is for me too."

"Then what is 'more'?"

Shizuru frowned and exhaled a deep sigh.

"It would be in the fact that people would treat you as my wife," she admitted heavily, "instead of slandering you as my lover."

They stared at each other for a few moments, silent. Shizuru's eyes conveyed apologies to the girl, who answered them with an understanding expression.

"So it is to make me, hmm, respectable, no?" she said, prompting Shizuru's protestations instantly. "No, Shizuru, I understand. No, shh-I take it not as offence. All people are so about their race. It is that I am not of yours; I understand, it is simple."

Shizuru was staring off into some corner of the room, lips curling in indignation that the girl would not feel herself.

"I can only ask your pardon for my people's small-minded chauvinism," she said. "Were they only to know - were they to have sufficient honesty and fairness to compare any specimen of our nation to you - no one could deny that you would make them all look miserable by mere juxtaposition!"

The Otomeian hushed her again with soothing hands and lips.

"It is not that I do not think you respectable, please understand," Shizuru pleaded with a touch of anxiety. "But I do not like the idea of them making free with their censure when it comes to you. You already know I have many enemies. They launch animadversions at me without halt and they would not spare my lover."

"But Shizuru," Natsuki said. "Why would they spare a wife if the wife is such as me?"

A wince complicated by a grudging smile: "Oh, you are a smart girl."

The Otomeian smirked, patting her lover's cheek.

"I admit I cannot be certain they shall," Shizuru allowed carefully. "Nearly all of my people will see only one thing: that you were not born of a Himean, wife of a Himean or not. But if you were to be my wife, Natsuki, it would at the very least spare you a little of it. And it would make it easier in many ways for me to exact reprisal for any insults they cast at you."

"I do not need such reprisal-"

"But I do," Shizuru interrupted. "I see no future without you, mea vita, which means I intend to live out the rest of my time on this plane with you by my side. But I do not wish to do it in any way that belittles you in the least to others' eyes. It is a mere matter of convention, I know that. Yet silly as it is, it shall make a difference in the view of many including, I think, your own people. A mistress is someone people consider to be sufficient material for the bed yet undeserving of wedlock. A wife has all the mistress has and more: there is the nod of respectability, among other things, and more legal protection for many situations."

The black hair fell softly on one shoulder as Natsuki slanted her head.

"Again this is for me, Shizuru," she said contemplatively. "Not for you."

"What is for you is for me as well."

"There is a difference still."

"No, not any longer, and that is what I have been trying to explain all this time." Shizuru leaned back into the pillows again and launched into a speech of absolute honesty. "It is time for you to realise that my jealousy goes beyond that of simple possession. It is no longer a matter of ownership, strictly speaking: it is a matter now of identification. One might even call it selfish. Some would call it insane. To me, it simply is. To me you are already an extension of what I am and what I have that others can never take away, of things that are inseparable from Shizuru Fujino and that I must therefore protect for self-preservation. My self. My mind. My heart."

Natsuki's expression was open to her, and she saw that the girl was appraising her words with wonder. More significantly, she was appraising the words with no fear, which made Shizuru conscious of a great relief settling somewhere in herself.

"Does this not frighten you at all?" she asked, brushing a knuckle under the girl's chin. "This is not a normal love. I know that. But it is the love I have for you and I feel in my bones that I shall never know another. It is the only love I can give and like it or not, it has already been decided that it shall be given. As I am already being honest, I must confess this too: a good part of this is that I want to bind you as firmly, as irrevocably as I can in every way possible. A marriage to me would only be part of that."

What a horrible lover I am, she thought while observing the girl's flushed expression, trying to imagine how she herself would react were a lover to say such things to her. Would she break away, concerned for her freedom? Would she deem her lover insane and be frightened? She could not be certain and she could not imagine such things coming from Natsuki herself. Despite that, she did understand how terrible were her demands and how singularly unattractive was the proposal she had just put forward; what lover painted the picture she had just painted, which was that of marriage as an assimilation, an absorption of all that was oneself into the dominion and identity of another?

"It sounds frightful, does it not?" she quipped, still criticising herself in her mind.

Natsuki looked up at her in surprise.

"No," said the girl. "I think it an honour, I said."

"Even after hearing that?"

"I find nothing - hmm - unattractive in it." A cock of the head. "Or in you."

"You are just saying that to please me," Shizuru said in good humour.

"I am glad it pleases you, Shizuru," the other replied. "Truth, it is rarely pleasant."

"My wise little love. But?"

"But I... I have doubts still about the idea of this. Not of you. Of marriage."

"All right. Go on."

"One thing is that I-no, we are still young."

"Which is wonderful, as it means that we can get started on married life earlier."

Natsuki burst into more of the soft, low laughter Shizuru found so appealing, green eyes wet and narrowing with mirth.

"Your friends will say you have already started," the Otomeian snorted once her mirth permitted her to speak again. "They called you-what was that word? A strange word. Ah, it was 'uxorious'. I remember."

"It would be another argument in my favour. You could say I already have enough practice behind me to prove my worthiness as a spouse."

Natsuki shook her head in amusement.

"It does not prove mine," she rebutted.

"Actually, they called you uxorious too, Natsuki."

"Me?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"Whenever they called me that."

"I did not know," Natsuki said with wide eyes, obviously tickled.

"Now you do. Any more objections?"

"Only some. But most important is that I am still an Otomeian, also," the other replied. "Not Himean. And I think of your career, Shizuru."

"Ye gods, how noble you are! I thank you for the thought, mea vita, but that concern no longer matters. There shall never be a point in my career when you are not by my side. You might as well support me in it as my wife instead of just an unusually constant, ever-present lover then. As I said previously, this would not mean you would not draw censure, but it would mean our situation could be better-fortified against the assault."

"But is it worth the gain, that sacrifice?" Natsuki held on to her lover's hands tightly and began speaking in her most deliberate tones. "Shizuru, I will stay with you even without marriage, I said. I will stand the - the reproach you mention. I am prepared, I need not marriage to shield me. But you are such a great woman-"

"As are you-"

"A great woman whose people watch her with care," Natsuki persevered, clearly in earnest. "I appreciate this, Shizuru. It is so that you will become consul one day. I believe more than once."

"You have been studying our government," Shizuru smiled.

"Shizuru, there is no Himean consul with an - an Otomeian wife. No, listen, please. It is expected you will choose a Himean for a wife. Not a person who will-hmm-tarnish your respectability. Your people wed too for political alliance and advantage, I know this. So why not suh-suh-save your marriage for that, Shizuru, and wed one more proper?"

"I could never love someone other than you, Natsuki," the Himean replied indignantly, jerking up from her slouch like a pricked cat. Natsuki pushed her back into the cushions with one palm flat on her chest.

"It does not need to be of love-"

"It needs to be for me."

They stared each other in the eye.

"There was a time when I would have said otherwise," Shizuru said, suddenly wishing the girl was not so noble after all. "But I have changed and I have you now. To wed someone else would demean you as my mistress, even were my wedding merely for convenience. As I said, I would never demean you and by extension, myself."

She plucked the hand on her chest and kissed its pink-scarred knuckles.

"And aside from the fact that you should never call yourself tarnish again, mea vita, you should remember one critical fact: most of my peers already consider me tarnished by the many radical things I did even before I knew you. They believe propriety as they define it to be distant from my kind. Whereas I believe propriety as I define it to be in giving all I can give to the woman who owns my life."

The beautiful features in front of her melted between exasperation and fondness. Natsuki exhaled a sigh of resignation, then chuckled briefly.

"You will insist on this to the dawn," she predicted with a smile tugging at her mouth. "I see it."

"You see exceedingly well, Princess." Shizuru wiggled her eyebrows, smiling back. "But I must say you react well too. You are taking this very calmly, Natsuki, all things considered. Most people are often unable to think straight, never mind reason with fair soundness after having been presented with a proposal of this kind and with such suddenness. I wonder now if I gave you any hints before. Were you in some small way expecting me to do it, perhaps?"

The young woman denied it soundly and Shizuru nodded.

"Yes, I did not think so," she said. "Yet your composure is remarkable..."

A thought sent a flash across her eyes for an instant and she asked, "Was it because this was not the first marriage proposal you have received in recent time?"

The lack of response was sufficient answer, and she asked another question scorching patches of white into her sight.

"Your cousin? Was it your cousin? Did the Princess Alyssa ask you to marry her?"

Natsuki tried to head off the eruption before it could happen.

"Shizu-"

"When?" She ground her teeth angrily, wishing she had dashed the Princess Alyssa's brains out when she had the chance after all.

"When she came to visit you? Was it then, Natsuki?"

"Yes, but-"

"Oh, but that woman needs a lashing from more than a tongue!"

Realising she would never get a word in if she did not head off the furore somehow, Natsuki took the physical approach and captured her lover's face with both hands, forcing the woman to look at her instead of at the imaginary Alyssa she was no doubt subjecting to all manner of indignities. She ignored the glare the crimson eyes threw at her and threw her own assault: kisses onto the sulking mouth, kisses on the proud nose, kisses on the crease between golden brows.

"So jealous," she hummed, amused and showing it. "Always without reason."

Shizuru touched their noses together.

"She has some gall to proposition you when she already knew her father gave you to me," she uttered, still irritated. "And I warned her that you were mine! Can you blame me for being displeased? Your cousin is begging for correction, Natsuki."

" My cousin is a good woman," the girl answered, somehow feeling that the two would not get along even were she out of the picture. Both autocrats, both persons who wanted to dominate their world even if they had different styles of doing it: such persons would eventually clash, one way or another. "I ask you to be kind to her, Shizuru."

An eyebrow arched haughtily in response. "In this situation, it does not make me feel more charitable to her when you are the one asking me to be so, mea vita ."

Natsuki poked the hollow of the older woman's cheek with a finger.

"I consider your proposal, Shizuru," she said. "Not my cousin's."

Shizuru's expression lightened in the time it took Natsuki to blink.

"So you shall consider it?" she asked enthusiastically with another jerk forward, her mood taking one of those perilous turns Natsuki had by now learned to ride. "Mine? Only mine?"

"Yes."

"Truly?"

"Yes."

"Then that shall have to do for now."

She sat back again and Natsuki went with her: she had to because her arms were around the older woman's neck once more. The Otomeian shifted closer after that, getting comfortable by sitting nearly on Shizuru's waist and pressing more kisses onto the woman's shoulder. Shizuru accepted her caresses with the look of a happy cat expecting a dish of cream.

"I suppose it can wait a while," she said. "As long as I know you are giving thought to my proposal, Natsuki."

She felt short bursts of air puffing against her shoulder and asked Natsuki what it was while leaning forward, grabbing a greyish pelt from one side of the bed to drape on the girl.

"I love this. I love the white line of your neck and belly under the fur," she said, gazing at the strip of skin left bare between the fur wrap's edges, running from the collar downwards. She traced the pale strip with her fingers and stopped at the navel. "Why were you laughing just now?"

A small smile. Natsuki said nothing.

"Very well then, keep it to yourself with all your other secrets," Shizuru said, caressing the flat of the other's belly. Hands looped about her sides in response until there were palms cupping the sharp projections of her scapulae. She felt fingers trace the blades.

"You are thinner." Natsuki sounded worried. "I knew. I felt it."

"I did not lose as much weight as you did."

"You must eat."

"I shall." She nuzzled her, feeling the hands on her back crawl up her neck, one of them caressing the back of her head. "I shall eat properly, but promise me you yourself shall not miss your meals while I am away? I worry about you."

"Mmm."

"And do not be afraid to talk to Shizuma. For anything."

She kept very still: Natsuki was alternating suckles with licks to her lip.

"And consider my proposition. With care. And openness."

A sighing laugh blew wind over her lower lip, drying the wet on it until the suckling and licking started again. She let it go on for a moment, then said something with great nonchalance that made the caresses halt.

"You know, mea vita, you shall eventually agree to marry me in the future. So you might as well save yourself the trouble and just give your assent now instead of later."

Natsuki pulled away from her lip with a wet pop and stared, eyebrows and corners of the mouth shooting up though she was obviously trying to prevent it. The Himean nodded and looked as all-knowing as she could, aware it would provoke the other further.

"Trust me, I know," she stated matter-of-factly.

The lip Natsuki bit this time was her own as she grinned at the smug woman sharing her bed.

"I see now," she told her, "why they think you arrogant."

"They also think me very persuasive."

"I thuh-think people think me stubborn."

"I think they think that of me too," Shizuru whispered conspiratorially.

"Oh, Shizuru! I promise I will consider. But enough persuasion for tonight, no?"

Although she did renege on her own ban quickly, allowing further and more pleasurable persuasions when the Himean covered her again. While an answer was not to be had for Shizuru's question that night, the older woman nonetheless discovered a benediction in the girl's arms that evening, a reaffirmation that the forces in her life had returned to blow the way she wanted. So when she slogged with her soldiers through the dusty snow of the mountains, taking her turns with the soldiers at the front to clear a path, she was as cheerful a commander as she had ever been, powered by the immense confidence that had long gotten subordinates to trust that whatever she endeavoured would lead to a win. The Ninth and Thirteenth joked and dug their way up the range with a general who seemed so irrepressibly, inimitably happy in those two weeks that even the snows of the range seemed less freezing in some way.

Shizuru led her army down from the mountains precisely fourteen days after entering them, undetected and whole save for a number of minor injuries and only four deaths. The beauty of entering the mountains in the winter, as she had been counting on, was that there was even more snow than usual at the altitude they had traversed: in other words, those who might slip had more padding waiting for them on the ground if they fell. People looked out for each other too and the officers overseeing the affair were among the general's most seasoned. All of which did not take away anything from the daring of the journey and the brilliance of the mind behind it.

But it was just the beginning. No sooner had they exited the range than Shizuru took the legions on one of her notorious forced marches, rushing them over to the nearest Mentulaeen town so quickly that its inhabitants barely had time to gather all their possessions before retreating behind their walls. Shizuru raided the abandoned granaries and farmsteads to feed her legions, then parked the Ninth and Thirteenth in front of the town gates. She had her heralds announce that Shizuru Fujino would give the townspeople an hour to surrender peacefully and that all who did surrender would be spared provided they signed the oath and treaty naming their new master as Hime. Whereupon the townspeople replied that Shizuru Fujino had best take herself elsewhere because they would not surrender and Mentulaeen armies would soon come to succour them sooner than her tiny army could break into their defences.

She got her tiny army to some big work. She had the men bring the planks stripped from the cottages and barns and stockpile them along with rubble from the same sources. She let an hour pass, then had the legionaries throw together a makeshift siege mound and ramp with breathtaking speed. Since the walls were low-she could only wonder at what Mentulaean peoples thought was an impregnable position-the legionaries were over them in minutes. The locals were mostly unarmed and had no militia of which to speak. In less than an hour, the town was finished.

After pillaging all she could from that town and stuffing her men's food packs again, Shizuru headed further west for another settlement. She gave the same terms and was met with the same answer. The fallout too was the same.

By the third town warnings (and smoke fumes) were beginning to travel, so she found the people already well-ensconced within their walls by the time she set the legions down in front of them. This was also the first big town, already a small city, that she had encountered since coming out of the range. While it had no militia or army too, it did have massive walls, far more than double the height and probably thickness of the walls belonging to the first two towns she had encountered. Yet the construction of the walls of this third settlement had her smirking within seconds, flashing an awful grin when the hour's grace she had given elapsed.

This time, she sent her heralds in first to shout something towards the anxious faces atop the battlements.

"Tell them this happens when walls are made of wood," she laughed, and sent the pitch- and torch-bearers in.

After she had raked through the ashes for what booty might have survived, she pushed on to the next place on her list, another big-town-or-small-city on her map of the Mentulaean lands. This time, a delegation of the town leaders was waiting for her outside the walls, requesting a parley as soon as she came close enough for words to be shouted across the distance. She set the legions to work on making camp and had her heralds tell the town leaders to come to her tent for a meeting.

---

The person who headed the deputation herded to Shizuru's command tent was a woman of aristocratic birth, yet not quite high enough in the Mentulaeen aristocracy to be a regular of the Royal Court. Of course, had she been a regular of the Court, she would most likely have been resident of a place other than the supposed backwaters of the Empire. She was uncontested in her prominence in the city, however, and it was thus she who was nominated to hold an audience with the foreign general. When she indicated this to the foreign general's officers, they exchanged looks with each other.

"Just to be certain," said one of the foreigners, all of whom seemed to wear the same uniforms as their rank-and-file soldiers. "You are going to speak on behalf of the entire delegation, and thus your city, er...?"

"Ertuala."

"Ertuala-san." They were all speaking in Himean, which every member of the Mentulaeen delegation naturally understood. "You require no accompaniment from another member of the delegation?"

"No."

The officer turned to the others. "Are all agreed to this?"

They answered in the affirmative.

"Then please go inside. General Fujino is waiting."

How polite they were! All without hinting violence, businesslike and serious but absent the arrogant condescension typical of the Mentulaeen officers and nobility. Ertuala took her leave of the other town leaders and walked into the huge tent, which resembled a proper building from inside, complete with windows and furniture. There were several desks and more uniformed Himeans inside, and as they turned to look her way, she followed their eyes to see where they would instinctively turn towards next, knowing that person would be their general.

A tall- extremely tall!-woman with blonde hair was standing near one of the windows and talking to another Himean. When the eyes in the room turned her way, she stopped her conversation with the shorter Himean and found Ertiyala with her eyes, which flashed a strange colour from a distance. A trick of the light from the window, surely.

Someone guided Ertiyala to a seat at the desk at the end of the room while the officer to whom she had been talking outside approached the pair at the window. She sat and waited primly as the tall blonde—who was clearly their general—listened to what the man had to say, and after that she watched the woman's every step when she left the window and headed for her. Ertiyala was actually one of the few in the city to have seen Himeans in armour before, during her travels, but she had still been young then whereas she was silver with age now. Even so, she could certainly recall none of them ever strutting this way and making all those drab layers of grey metal and leather look like a casual and suspiciously attractive fashion choice. The beauty with the golden hair got closer, towering over her even from a polite distance, and when she got close enough for the rather weak-eyed Ertiyala to see her eyes and face to full advantage, the Mentulæan could hardly resist a gasp.

"My eyes are a shock, no doubt," the Himean smiled, taking a seat.

Ertiyala gulped, the crepe-like folds of her throat moving. Among other things, she wanted to say.

"Yes," she said simply. "You are General Fujino?"

"Shizuru Fujino, to be precise. Ertiyala-han, yes?"

"Yes."

"Have you no title by which I should address you?"

"My name is sufficient. I'm only a minor aristocrat."

"Very well." The young god in front of her reached for a beaker on the table and poured water for both of them unselfconsciously, somehow managing not to relinquish an iota of her glamour in the deed. "These are my terms. In surrendering to me, you shall cede fifty hostages, all of whom shall be inspected prior to acceptance and who shall be returned to you after the war is over. They are to be surrendered to my army to serve as insurance for the treaty I wish the city's leaders and all the heads of the families of note to sign today. The treaty shall establish your new masters to be Hime and its legitimate representatives and revoke all your previous alliances with your old masters in the person of the present Mentulaean ruling dynasty, namely Artai the Fourth, who is also known as Obsidian, and all members of his Court and Party."

The tent was very quiet. Ertyala had a suspicion that it was not just the situation. Whenever this woman spoke, everyone was most likely listening.

"The terms shall be effective forthwith upon agreement," the woman continued. "Which means that Asterion-" the name of Ertyala's city "- shall be obliged by law and the sacred oath that binds the treaty to lend all aid that may be required of it by Hime and Hime's representatives. Naturally, Asterion shall also be obliged to refuse all aid that may be demanded of it thereafter by the present Mentulaean ruling dynasty and its representatives, and shall do all it can to repulse all enemies of Hime and her interests in Septentria."

Ertyala's brow rippled at the unfamiliar name.

"Septentria?" she echoed.

"The name we are giving to the Mentulaean Territories once the war is finished."

The assumption was obviously that they would win, Ertyala ruminated.

"Should you agree, the sort of aid we will expect is typical for campaigns. We may well require grain from you at some point, naturally, but as we have just stripped the granaries of the towns we came to before you, it is not pressing at the moment. The comestibles that are perishable and which we have already run out of, of course, we shall have to requisition from your stock while we are here. But we shall take only as much as is feasible for you to give, or that which is in surplus. Other needs, such as extra iron or leather for our use, may be asked of you as well-but for these we shall pay the fair and going price. These shall be considered trade merchandise, while food and grain may be considered your first tribute to Hime."

Ertuala's eyes looked as though they were about to pop from her head.

"I shall instruct the legionaries to treat your people with respect provided they do the same to us," Shizuru continued. "I shall permit no looting, no rapine, and no abuse to people who shall effectively be under my authority as the Himean propraetor of this new province. If anyone does molest any of the civilians absent prior provocation such as life-threatening assault, I shall have him flogged. Anyone who steals from you shall get the same treatment."

"You're too generous, General Fujino," the older woman gasped, hardly able to believe her ears. For she could never have expected an invader to offer such mercy, especially since her only point of comparison was based on the usual attitudes of the Mentulaean armies and the people leading them. Yet here Shizuru Fujino was willing not only to be clement but also—oh, what was the word for it?—reasonable, was it?

"Do not misunderstand me, Ertuala-han," the Himean said. "There are other things you are expected to do for us in return, aside from providing my armies with whatever supplies might be necessary. You and the other town leaders are expected to keep the peace and ensure that your people stick to the oath. If you have dissenters who would refuse the terms, either lock them up or surrender them to me as added hostages: I promise I shall not kill or wound them unless they somehow render such actions necessary to my cause, but they shall nonetheless be my captives and their fates thus mine to decide. Taking care of such contrary elements would in fact be more for your sake than mine, I hope you see that."

The other woman nodded emphatically, understanding exactly what the Himean meant.

"There is also the fact that I cannot be here all the time," Shizuru continued. "This is a war, after all, and I can hardly play bodyguard to a single city. While my armies shall be moving throughout the country, there may be times when none are close enough to defend you should your present masters take it into their heads to suddenly pass by and besiege you. Very unlikely but still possible. If it does happen, you shall have to defend yourselves until one of my armies comes to help-which it shall, that is for certain, but the question of when it shall is not. We shall give you some assistance in improving the fortifications of your walls prior to our departure, however, just to be safe."

She stopped talking and reached for her own cup, then took a leisurely sip. When she had finished, she looked expectantly at the Mentulaean.

"Well then, what do you think?" she asked.

Ertuala pondered it.

"You're very confident, General Fujino," she said cautiously, minding her tone lest this strangely urbane, bizarrely courteous foreigner suddenly proved more vicious than she seemed. Well, she had to be: had she not annihilated several towns before getting here? Best tread carefully, especially when those weird eyes kept putting the image of flames into her own head.

"I hope you don't take exception to my questions, General," she went on. "I'm compelled to ask because I'm making a decision for all of the people of Asterion. I beg that you understand why my position would demand it and do not think me taunting you."

"I understand your position. Please go ahead."

"If I may ask, how can you be so certain that you will win the war?" the older woman said. "We may be far-removed from the centre, but I know the king has armies to spare. I've seen only one of them... yet it could have swallowed up yours in one bite, I think."

"Size is not the measure of an army," the Himean responded. "Surely you have heard of the battle that took place on the other side of the borders, the Battle of Argentum that the Prince Artaxi lost?"

"Word did reach us that one of the royal armies was defeated there."

"I defeated it. The royal army outnumbered mine five to one."

Ertiyala's look was speaking.

"It is true, I assure you," Shizuru said, amused. "I see news is as concentrated in the capital here as it is in Hime. I take it they lied and said they were the ones outnumbered when they announced the defeat, but you know the way empires of this type are run. Propaganda to perpetuate fear."

Ertiyala shook her head.

"No, they didn't even announce it, as far as I know," she said frankly. "I have friends in the capital and they wrote that there were no great announcements. Most of the talk was through backchannels, and while the king was said to have sworn vengeance for the capture of his son, the disparity in size wasn't acknowledged at all. I actually did hear rumours that the royal army outnumbered the enemy a great deal, but they were never confirmed." She shot another telling glance at her auditor. "Still, General Fujino, five-to-one is hard to believe."

"I would tell you to ask the Prince Artaxi, but I already packed him off to my country for captivity. The same for the Prince Hanu."

That was a shock, and Ertiyala showed it. "The Prince Hanu? You captured him as well?"

"Yes, outnumbered again."

"And he's..."

"He too has been sent to Fuuka."

Ertiyala looked so staggered that Shizuru had to urge the woman to take a sip of water.

"He was likely the king's heir," the Mentulaeen uttered after taking a gulp of the cool, sweet beverage. "It wasn't confirmed yet. But people were saying he would be next in line."

The Himean general was looking at her officers, who were murmuring to each other. They quieted down upon feeling her gaze, showing Ertiyala that even these bizarrely egalitarian Himeans had their forms of autocracy.

"Be that as it may, he is now a captive of Hime and shall lead no more armies against us," the general said gently. "So there is your proof. Numbers do not always win. Besides which, I have other armies of my own to pit against your king's-and I assure you that I shall prevail."

The golden-haired, faintly golden-skinned young woman spoke her next words with a confidence that Ertiyala found fascinating for its subtlety. It had the air of factuality rather than force, which was perhaps why Ertiyala found herself privately agreeing with what the Himean was saying.

"Hime is going to win this war," Shizuru Fujino stated. "Even your Empire, vast as it is, cannot compare to the might of Hime and all its territories, which spread from these northern regions to lands all the way to Africa and Egypt. And though you may have worthy generals of your own-although I have yet to run into one, I must admit-all of them shall have to contend with me. I may look young, Ertiyala-han, but I have seen more wars than many of your princes ever will. Ask any of my officers here and they shall tell you I have an unblemished record as well. Never have I entered a war where I was not the victor and that shall not change any time soon."

Ertiyala believed it, but said nothing.

"The question now is whether or not you shall accept the inevitable or be destroyed by it," Shizuru continued. "I would prefer that you sign the treaty, in which case your lives and belongings would be spared, but I would not shrink from what I must do if you chose the other path, in which case your lives and belongings are automatically forfeit. I assure you, however, that if you do take the latter choice, you and the rest of the deputation shall be permitted to return to the city unharmed in order to inform the rest of your decision and reasons for it. Of course, I shall have my heralds accompany you to shout confirmation of your stories to the walls, that the people may know you are telling the truth and have chosen as well as your lights permit you to do so. After that is done, however, I shall attack and grant no quarter."

The woman was no fool, Ertuala thought. If Ertuala chose to decline the treaty, she and the rest of the deputation would have to return to the town with the foreign heralds on their heels and roaring the details of the Himean's generous offer of clemency to the people, who would most likely lynch Ertuala and the rest of the aristocrats for choosing the obviously less attractive option, the one that would see them all dead. There would be no opportunity for dissimulation, no way to spare themselves what would most likely be a more brutal massacre at the hands of a panicked mob.

She found her lips pulling into a smile. This was a very sly woman she faced, but so much more than that too. Capable, obviously, and staggeringly confident. Even more regal than any of the nobles she had met or seen during her visits to the capital. And what spectacular looks! Very tall for a woman or even a man, endowed with a splendid physique, and vested with one of the most beautiful faces Ertuala had ever seen. Were all the Himean commanders like this? No wonder the king hated them so much, then: were the other local leaders to meet this Shizuru Fujino, Ertuala had a feeling they would make their decisions to shift masters even faster than herself.

"How can we be assured you will keep to your word if we accept the route that grants mercy?" she said.

"I am hardly a savage unable to keep to an oath," the other responded, lifting an eyebrow. "A treaty is sacred. Besides which, my preferred policy is generally that of clemency."

"Yet you destroyed three towns since you appeared in our lands."

"You know as well as I do that there are situations where ink may only serve once blood has preceded it. They proved this was one of those situations. I gave them a choice. They made theirs."

"And you killed them all."

"Again, blood and ink." Shizuru smiled brightly and the Mentulaean was surprised by its friendliness. "I made them reasonable offers, as I make you one now. Make a treaty with Hime that you and all you represent do so pledge everlasting allegiance to us instead of the Mentulaean Kings and shall aid us in our war against them, and in return you shall enjoy more than mercy in the fullness of time. You shall have my protection as the governor-general of the Septentrian Territories. You shall be in particularly good standing, in fact, as the first of the local peoples to demonstrate reason by making an alliance. This shall gain you my especial good favour. The first demonstration of which shall be in my granting you the neighbouring lands of Limnias, whose city is now gone and whose fields and farms shall be added to yours." She let that sink in first. "If not to you now, they shall eventually go to someone else. Hime prefers to leave local administration of resources and farmlands as well as cities to locals in our provinces. I see no problem with giving the leaders of your town that honour for Limnias as well. I am a reasonable woman, as well as a generous one."

Ertyala's brown eyes glistened with interest.

"And once word of your largesse to us gets around, more people will think of surrendering," she observed.

A grin. "You're quick."

"I'm also reasonable."

"Then we are agreed?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Excellent! Let us bring in the other members of the deputation, that they may be informed as well."

Shizuru entered the city with the deputation and a cohort of soldiers for guard and made a speech with the leaders of the city to the people, who were obviously relieved by the choice the deputation had made and the terms that had been granted by the foreign commander. While Shizuru was prepared to deal with malcontents, none appeared: the fact was that this far away from the capital, there was very little feeling for the Mentulaean king, who almost never approached this part of the empire and whom many of the locals had never even seen. The only real touch the locals felt from the royal presence on the throne was in the yearly tax hikes that were being levied on them, and which thus rendered them more predisposed to cursing the occupants of the capital than singing their praises. It gave no citizen of Asterion grief to agree to the oath of allegiance to Hime, as Shizuru observed to Ertuala during the signing of the treaty.

"We've no opportunity to see either the king's kindness or majesty here," the older woman said to her as the rest of the leaders filed out of the room with the lively chatter of the relieved. "Of his greed, though, regularly."

Shizuru nodded. "Once the war is finished, it is my intention to spare the local citizens taxes for five years. There shall be a great deal of rebuilding necessary then, and taxation shall only hamper it. After the five years, taxes shall be collected again-but at non-extortionate rates."

"Truly too generous!" The Mentulaean licked her lips and looked demurely curious. "By the way, General, Limnias held one of the offices of the exchequer in these parts, and the city proper had a treasury."

"Wars cost lives as well as money," Shizuru replied, eyes twinkling. "Fortunately, in your case, it need not cost both."

So Shizuru obtained the first treaty in her war, which she would send later on to Hime to be nailed to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, along with all of Hime's other treaties. Shortly after it was signed, Shizuru took to her horse with a century of her veterans and rode for the pass where she had arranged to meet with her cavalry. She left Keigo Kurauchi in charge of the army in her absence. He was a little nervous at first, but soon fell into the role quite comfortably. No complications arose that might make his life as the temporary commander more difficult, and the locals were genuinely helpful and ready to provide whatever he might requisition. Admittedly, the occupants of Asterion did remain more than a little wary of the soldiers encamped outside their walls and often venturing into them for the first few days. The Ninth and Thirteenth followed the general's orders on good behaviour so strictly, though, that the locals soon got over their fear and started thinking Himeans terrifically agreeable, even if they did deem them bizarre too due to it.

As for the commander of the bizarre legions, she found her band of Otomeians exactly where she expected to find them. It had waited for the Mentulaean border army to decamp, as instructed, then made a hasty crossing after the Fourteenth constructed a new bridge on the remaining pylons of the one that Kenji Nakamura had torn down months before. They had then taken a looping route that took them past the Mentulaean army, which was at the time of their reunion with the general still snailing its way to the second town Shizuru had razed. Shizuru led her cavalry back to Asterion and immediately called a war council.

"A small change of plans: we are going to deal with that army here," she informed her officers. "We have led them on a merry enough chase and this is as good a place as any to finish it. First things first, however."

She turned to the chief of the Ninth's primipili, whom she had asked expressly to attend the meeting.

"Nao-han," she said. "How much do you trust your new slave girl?"

The primipilus grinned.

Chapter 62

Thank you very much for the advice, reviews, and readers from last time. I am still inspecting alternative sites, but once I do choose one and it proves necessary, I shall simply note which site it is on my DeviantArt account. I myself am not taking this story off this site, however.

On another note, some persons have told me they were saving copies of the story. I responded to a number of these advising them not to do so: I had yet to go over past chapters to edit them to be more to my liking, after all. Please recall that many old chapters-especially those prior to Ch.30-were pounded out by a typist I would corral into taking down the text for me over a duration of one hour or so. Even the ones after that tended to be horrifically rough: I often uploaded them without reading through the text in order to make uploads faster. Some of the earliest readers shall recall I actually uploaded once or twice a week at the beginning of this story, in fact. The earlier chapters were thus rather dreadful. I finally managed to return to most of them (up to Ch.40) to make some necessary changes. To be clear, I did not "rewrite" whole chapters. I merely changed some parts, omitted others, and corrected the language and punctuation to be more in line with my preferences-again, recall that some of my poor harassed typists were American, which gave both of us problems over where I wanted marks to go and how some words should be spelled. They kept arguing with me over inverted commas in particular (chuckle).

---

Notes/Vocabulaire:

1. A Reminder on Army Policies for Booty - material loot was generally split up amongst the members of the army and the state's Treasury (with bigger portions going to those higher up, naturally, and with the commander retaining the prerogative to increase or decrease booty shares for particular persons/positions as he or she saw fit). Captives to be sold as slaves, however, were entirely the general's: all profits from that went to him or her.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The commander of the Mentulaean army that had been pinned with the Fourth Legion was a baroness named Thorak, a noble of middling position in the Mentulaean Court's hierarchy. Her father had been more highborn than her mother, but the latter had been richer, and this meant Thorak came into a split inheritance: she got wealth and thriving partnerships in good businesses from her female parent; she got titles and lands accompanying them from the male one. The wealth allowed her to collect and fund the troops she used to face off the Fourth at the river boundary, and it was the aristocracy that allowed her to actually lead said troops herself. However, the same aristocracy only extended so far, as was seen in her assignment.

Had Thorak been higher up the Court's pecking order, she would certainly have been assigned a far better post than what she got. Granted, she was being given an important job in a way, one for a river crossing with a garrison of enemy soldiers on the other bank. But it was still one of the subordinate crossings and its bridge had already been torn down. Besides-and even more to the point-no one expected anything very exciting to happen in the south for this war. These were the backwaters of the empire, largely made up of mountains and agricultural plains and a few not-too-large cities and even-less-large towns in between. Thorak knew her army was stationed where it was for only two reasons: first, as a reserve force to be held ready for further movements along the border come spring; and second, for protection of a largely hypothetical nature for the region. Even the tiny Himean army they knew to have penetrated the border months ago was unlikely to come down from its defensive squat in the citadel of Trogum, far west of the Southern Frontier: it would be eaten up by the larger Mentulaean forces on the plains. So no danger was expected from there either. In effect, Thorak was little more than temporary warden of a rather unexciting ward.

Yet the baroness had no desire to inhabit some other commander's shoes in this war. While not actually a coward, she was of a sluggish temperament that meant she was pleased at least by the out-of-the-action location of her post. The appointment itself, though, did not initially please her. She had been hoping to winter elsewhere this year, and the king's declaration of war with Hime had already crippled her original plans to travel out of the empire for a nice vacation away from the fast and furious company of the Court. When she presented her obligatory tribute of war materiel and troops to the king at the capital, her hope was to at least be allowed to return to her lands for the cold months. No such luck for Thorak! Still, to be assigned to the sleepest place in the country was some consolation to this sleepy aristocrat.

Thus expecting the military equivalent of a sinecure, she was considerably troubled by recent events in her area of concern. These included the sudden exit of the enemy force facing hers across the river and the strange reports of another enemy force running rampant nearby, on her side of the river. One was naturally more troubling than the other. When the first event had occurred, all she had been duty-bound to do was send a letter to the camp near the larger crossing, higher up the River Atinu and near Argentum. The letter bore warning to the commander of that area, saying another enemy force was heading nearer their post and possibly reinforcing the enemy camp defending the crossing there. That was the span of her obligations in that matter, and after the letter had been sent off by courier, she and her army had settled down again to enjoy a fairly cushy time, even more relaxed than before because the army fronting them was gone.

When news of the second event came upon them, though, she knew she would have to actually bestir herself from her camp. Part of what troubled her so much about this matter was the difficulty of ascertaining truth from rumour: at the time, all that was for certain was that two Mentulaean towns had already been razed by this phantom foe they kept hearing about. Of the foe itself, though, they had only garbled and confused accounts from local witnesses too panicked out of their wits to deliver anything more reliable.

Some claimed the enemy to be the force that had been holed up in the far southwest, in the mountain fortress of Trogum. Others alleged that it was actually a different army, one that had been just been hidden in the region and lying in wait for the right time to come out. Some even claimed that it was an army that had come to the area by-and here was an unbelievable rumour indeed!-crossing the Great Southern Alps, also known as the Alps of Caledonia.

Obviously, one account was more plausible than the others. Thorak was hardly about to credit something as fantastic as an enemy force passing through the great massif in wintertime. Far easier to believe that it was the army that had been holed up in Trogum Citadel-which the Himeans knew as Kenji Nakamura's group. That explanation was made more believable as the few reports commenting on the enemy's size said it was just about the same as that western army had been reported to be months ago.

Ah, but that little western army had a daring leader, Thorak thought: first he had managed to seize the supposedly impregnable fortress of Trogum, presumably by some treachery from inside the citadel. His army had been left alone even after Trogum was taken because the Mentulaean command believed, from what was known of his army's size, that it posed little threat, especially given that it was separated from all its allies across the river. Furthermore, Trogum was generally held to be impossible to siege, owing to its rugged mountain perch. Everyone had thus been pleased to leave alone the Himean army settled in that citadel for now, choosing to focus on the forces across the river that were the bigger threats. Yet here this tiny, ignored army was proving itself a worse troublemaker than its fellows across the border, its commander taking his soldiers out for a romp through enemy lands and acting as though the Mentulaean Southwest were his own damned garden.

It intrigued Thorak that anyone could have such audacity. That said, she was certain she could trounce this audacious army even so, since all the accounts did agree that she had the far larger force.

Thorak was a typical Mentulæan commander, so this was typical Mentulæan thinking: numbers determined the battle. Besides, this was also her home turf, so to speak, and the enemy was an outsider. If anyone knew the place well enough to get a tactical advantage and would be getting support from local peoples as well as nearby garrisons, it would be she.

So when Thorak marched out of her camp at the head of an army twenty thousand strong, she had few misgivings rattling about her mind. The only ones that did ring a clatter every now and then were the uncertainties she yet had over the precise identity and origins of the enemy. Well, all in good time: she would find out more once she saw them for herself, was her philosophical position on the matter.

Thorak's army traced the footsteps of the enemy force and followed a path taking them farther and farther from their origins at the river border. They picked up more bits of information as they went, talking to locals who had escaped their foe. Overtime, they managed to solidify to near-certainty several of the rumours: the enemy was indeed Himean, judging from the armour and speech; the enemy was certifiably fewer in number, possibly only half their own size at most; and the enemy had already burnt down a third town and now seemed to be on its way to a fourth.

Hence it was to the fourth town that Thorak marched, taking a straight route from her position instead of tracing the Himean army's footsteps again. The plan was to try to catch the Himeans there before they ran off and had to be tracked down once more, so Thorak made her troops go even faster than they had already been moving, almost doubling their pace. By the time they were only about ten or so days' march away from their goal, however, something happened that compelled them to speed up yet again and with even more purpose than before.

One dusky evening, as Thorak and her soldiers settled down in camp, two weary riders were rounded up by the night's watch. The watch said that the pair claimed to be from Thorak's very destination: the city of Asterion. They were servants of one of the city's magistrates, said the male messenger, who also brought with him a brief letter bearing what looked to be a Mentulæan aristocrat's seal; it was supplied as proof of his and his companion's identities.

The letter also served as support to the pair's tale, which Thorak and her officers digested with fascination.

It seemed that while Thorak and her army had been marching to save Asterion, the city's leaders had decided to capitulate almost instantly to the Himeans parked outside their walls, deeming it the wiser ploy instead of trying to resist what had thus far been proven to be an irresistible force. The Himeans had proceeded to build camp outside the walls and then used the city's facilities and fare as they saw fit after that, greedily sucking up Asterion's stored-up food for the winter into their own mouths because this had been the first town they had not been forced to set on fire (thus destroying granaries) to defeat. Asterion had not made an effort to resist the depredations, giving the foreigners all they wanted until the Himeans began to deem the town truly subjugated and hence became laxer with their policies of entry and exit. Once they relaxed enough, though, Asterion had taken revenge.

The commander of the Himean forces had apparently taken well to being feasted by the local leaders and quickly came to enjoy her dinners with Asterion's magistrates, where they pulled out every delicacy and drink they could to satisfy the woman's finicky tastes. At one of these dinners, the town magistrates arranged for the commander's sparse guard to be overcome and the Himean commander herself taken hostage. After this, they had shut the town's gates and refused all Himeans entry, holding the enemy leader as insurance to prevent the troops in the camp outside from attacking and waiting for succour to arrive. Succour that it now appeared Thorak was going to provide.

Immediately after the enemy leader's capture and before the city gates were shut, the magistrates had sent off the two messengers that now told Thorak the tale. Their order had been to ride for Thorak's old camp at the borders, as they had not known her to be moving their way already. It had been good fortune that led them straight to her watchmen and eventually to her command tent, where they were able to regale her and her officers with the story.

"How did you manage to escape their own watchmen?" Thorak asked. "Surely they set guards around the town?"

"Yes," said one of the messengers. "But we know paths out of our city better than any foreigner ever could."

"Besides, they wouldn't have noticed us even if we'd ridden in front of their noses," the other messenger, the dark female, snorted with derision.

"Why is that?" Thorak said.

"Drunk, the lot of them," said the woman. "We plied them with drink to see if it was true what they said about Himeans, General, and it was. They down wine like fish drink water. By the time they noticed their commander was missing, it was past noon of the next day, since they'd been drinking through the night."

Thorak smiled: most people around the Himean Sea knew of the Himean weakness for liquor.

"So you slipped out without notice, good," she said. "How many of them are there?"

"We couldn't count perfectly," one messenger replied. "But our master reckoned about nine, ten thousand."

"Half ours, the others were right," one of Thorak's captains muttered.

"Where did they come from?" another officer asked.

"Down the mountains from the west, I think they said."

"I told you so!" the officer who had asked the question crowed to someone else at the table. "It's those ones."

"Well, of course it's those ones," the man responded to his friend. "I never said I believed that shit about them coming over the massif."

"Never mind that for now," Thorak sighed. "What's important is that we get there as soon as we can, before the Himeans get antsy enough to try anything drastic like storming Asterion despite their leader being held captive in it. That is what your master begged in the letter," she said, addressing the two messengers.

They nodded in earnest.

"Tell the others," she said to her officers. "We'll march as fast as possible tomorrow, crack of dawn. Even if holding their leader might seem strong insurance for Asterion for now, you never know with these Himeans. They're insane enough to come down from a nicely fortified spot like the one they probably left in Trogum to start up this commotion in the plains and in the middle of winter. We'll have to go fast or Asterion's trick will go to waste."

And fast they went indeed, making what even the much-faster-on-the-march Himeans would have considered fair time. Thorak sent scouts ahead to survey the situation and once they had cleared more than half of the distance to the city, those returned with reports corroborating the Asterion messengers' story. They told Thorak of what they had seen, which was the Himeans milling confusedly around the camp they had put up beside Asterion and occasionally sending groups near the city's walls to yell threats to the people looking down at them from the towers-who, more often than not, retaliated with jeers and a rich variety of rude gestures that the scouts took great pleasure in replicating for their commander. The Himeans had apparently grown so discomposd by the abduction of their general that even their watch had eased sufficiently to permit Thorak's scouts to get in close during their observations.

This relaxation of discipline was obviously something to be taken advantage of as soon as possible, so Thorak and her officers spurred the men forward again. Thus they arrived at their destination two days ahead of schedule, panting from the effort but rewarded by the sight of a tiny Himean host beating a hasty retreat from its posturing near Asterion's walls. The Himeans ran to the safety of their camp-another of those weird structures the foreigners seemed to like to build, the ones with the rows of ditches outside its walls, Thorak noted-and locked their own gates upon spying the new army on the scene.

The Mentulaean force parked itself menacingly in front of the Himean camp, sitting between it and the city. Meanwhile, Thorak prepared a contingent of one hundred soldiers to accompany her into Asterion, where they would fetch the enemy's general. The town leaders had said that they would only cede the prisoner to the Baroness Thorak herself, being wary of tricks from the Himeans-who might attempt to slip their general out of the city by impersonating some other officer under Thorak's command.

"Are we going to threaten to behead her in front of them?" asked one of her officers as they waited for the guard to be put together, earning a nod from his general.

"That should get them to give up their arms," Thorak said with confidence. "It wouldn't have worked if the local officials had done it, of course. They don't have an army behind them and it would have lacked the pressure needed to convince those Himeans out there that they've no possibility of winning even if it came down to a fight. With us here, it'll be all over as soon as we flash their commander at them."

"Yes, that makes sense." He heaved a sigh of relief. "At least this'll be over quickly, then."

Thorak agreed. She could hardly wait to settle down again for what was left of the winter, keeping to herself as she had been doing before this accursed foe had come along and obliged her to trudge all over the region following its tracks. If she could bring all these in alive too, she would be sure to get an added reward, for the king would enjoy making examples of them. Their commander would probably be paraded around the capital's streets naked and dragged from the heels by a donkey, made to suffer the taunts and excrement the capital's inhabitants would be encouraged to throw at her. And as for Thorak, she would probably be given gold, lands, or perhaps even added titles. These did not really exert as strong a pull on the baroness as the chance of asking the king for something, though, which would be to ask for a position that would strategically keep her out of the fighting from now on in this war. Somewhere nice and quiet, as was the idea.

"General, we're ready."

Thorak surfaced from her thoughts. "All's done? Where are the messengers from Asterion?"

"Over here, General."

"Let's go, then."

The two messengers directed Thorak and her guard through the smaller of the two gates Asterion had. The bigger gates had been barred and even fixed shut from inside, they explained, to withstand battering ram attacks from the Himeans. Thus Thorak and several of her officers were obliged to walk into Asterion through a narrower entrance than was ideal for a guard over a hundred strong-which number was severely abridged when the townspeople gathered at the mouth of the gate to welcome them drew out swords and started to cut down Thorak's surprised guard with the efficiency of veteran soldiers.

So quickly and capably was the ambush carried out that Thorak and her officers were already divested of their own swords and drawn aside before the fight concluded. Not all of the Mentulaean soldiers guarding their commander were slain: over a third of Thorak's guard escaped, fleeing through the gates before these were shut and heading for the safety the rest of Thorak's horrified army afforded outside. As for Thorak and what remained of her party in the walls, they were obliged to surrender themselves quietly to their assaulters, who started shrugging off their civilian cloaks to display mail-shirts underneath.

One of the supposed magistrates of the city-these had been standing in wait in the formal style at the end of the courtyard and had watched the fray without once joining in-detached from the rest of the group and strode over to Thorak and the rest of the captives. The person pushed off her cloak's hood and gave them all a friendly and decidedly glorious smile.

"Which is the Baroness Thorak?" she enquired.

"I am," Thorak said, still stunned by what had just transpired as well as the looks of this new character.

Out came a hand. "Shizuru Fujino. I am pleased to see you were not hurt in the scuffle."

"Fujino. Fujino..." Thorak muttered, wondering where she had heard the name before. Ah well, who cared? It was highly unlikely to matter now. "Himean, of course?"

"Yes."

"Ah."

Thorak's hazel eyes drifted away, still blank with shock, and fell upon some of the bodies around them: those of her guard who had been dispatched by the Himean ambushers. How quickly they had died! Was that normal? She had never been this close to the actual fighting before, so she did not know. It seemed to her to have been a curt battle: most of the soldiers had provided argument only once and then ceded the issue almost without retort after that. How could such brief disputation have given birth to all those glorious paragraphs of description the writers and poets often generated in their accounts of war? For some utterly inexplicable reason, she felt a greater disappointment in the brevity of their fight than in the fact that she had just been played for a fool and made captive.

"So you hold Asterion," she mumbled. "What happened to the city's magistrates? Did you kill them? Were we too late?"

Shizuru indicated the people still grouped behind her and watching with varying degrees of curiosity.

"Those are the magistrates," she said. "We certainly did not kill any of them."

Comprehension dawned on Thorak: "Ahh. It was a lie."

"It was a lie."

"And you were never captured."

"I was never captured."

"Yes, I see," Thorak sighed wearily, looking her up and down. "You don't look the type to get captured."

Shizuru flashed her glorious smile again.

"And you do not seem the type to rave when faced with a situation disadvantageous to you," she returned to the Mentulaeen, who looked more tired than sulky, annoyed, or anything else along the same lines. "I approve strongly of your composure."

Thorak took a deep breath and slanted her head to one side in a shrugging way.

"It won't do any good if I start screaming at you now," she told Shizuru. "So now that I'm your captive, what's going to happen?"

"Ideally, you are going to go with us quietly to the top of that tower over there, where you shall be in full view of your army. You are then going to tell them to surrender to us if they wish to live. You shall remind them that they are not only absent a commander and most of their superior officers but are now presently in the middle of two enemy camps, in the perfect position to be enveloped by their foe, and are also still weak in the knees and winded by their long march. You shall make all these things clear in order to show them the wisdom of capitulation. After that, you shall have a drink with me and a bit of refreshment. I think we both shall have earned it by then."

"I understand."

"I am happy that you do."

They brought Thorak to the top of the tower on the walls nearest the Mentulaeen army, and from there overlooked Thorak's confused army for an address. Thorak saw that the Himean army at the other camp had given up its pretence after the scuffle at the gates: it now stood arrayed in proper battle lines before the Mentulaeen force. It was bigger than Thorak had thought and been told, and she said so.

"And you still have more soldiers in the city, I see. They said there were fewer of you."

"There used to be fewer of us," Shizuru told her, and left it at that.

They trumpeted the horns to draw attention to the tower and began their address. By the time that address had been finished, the Himean artillery was already ranged on the other towers and being pointed threateningly at the dismayed Mentulaeans, who also had to watch as yet another army issued from Asterion's big gates-which had not been barricaded and fixed shut after all. The army coming out of Asterion was actually the one Shizuru had been marching with all this time, since the group now lined up outside the Himean camp was Kenji Nakamura's army: these were the Fifth and Sixth legions. They had come down from their post in Trogum at their commander's behest about a month ago, reaching Asterion after a blisteringly fast march that ensured they would reach Shizuru's position in time for her plan. It was two days after they arrived at Asterion that Shizuru sent the pair of messengers to the Mentulaeans she had known to be shadowing her, and thus set into motion the deception.

One of these two messengers observed the surrender as it was managed, her mistress at her side and acting as one of the chief supervisors of the weapon collection.

"Do you ever think any of them will try to get a hack in or something while the others give up their arms?" she asked her mistress, who snorted.

"That'd be damned stupid," said Nao.

"Well, sure. Who said it'd be smart? I meant as something out of desperation."

"Not likely."

The primipilus barked an order out to some legionaries first, then turned to look at the dark-skinned woman muffled up in local winterwear.

"You see those looks, Poll?" she said. "Those're the faces of people who've been beaten already. It takes the heart out of you, you know, to see your commander in the hands of the enemy and to suddenly be shocked into facing a foe much bigger and nastier than you'd been told you'd ever see. They're past desperation, no fight in 'em left. There'll be no hacking from them now. They were done even before we started taking their swords and spears."

Pollonia nodded, crossing her arms across her chest as she regarded the surrendering soldiers again.

"They were sure livelier when we first ran into them," she mused.

"I'll bet." Nao had turned to the work again, but threw Pollonia a look over her shoulder. "You did your job perfect, Poll. This's some good work you've done here. I'm pleased."

Pollonia grinned hugely. "It was easy."

"Good to hear."

"And it was fun!"

"Even better. That local we sent to play messenger with you made trouble?"

"Oh no. I think he enjoyed it as much as I did," laughed the other woman.

"Yes, I thought so," Nao said, smiling. "The one we picked for the job was another regular villain. And he'll be getting rewarded for it."

"Will I be getting a reward too?"

"Definitely."

Nao grabbed one of the pole-arms the legionaries were gathering from their captives, testing its weight and the blade on it. It was new and cut a tiny line on her finger; she licked the bit of red away instantly.

"Even if I don't reward you myself, Fujino-san will," she told Pollonia with a smirk and the taste of her own blood on her lips. "Twenty thousand! She'll make a fortune off the lot-not that she needs it, mind you. But every time she makes money, she gives her soldiers nice chunks of it, bigger chunks going to those who've been of more help. She's right generous, she is. You'll be seeing a fat bonus next time the pay is issued."

This was indeed standard practice in the ever-lucrative Fujino army.

While material booty had made up bulk of the returns for it in this war thus far, its commander actually expected more loot soon from slave sales. She had been utterly ruthless in her marches ever since entering enemy territory, putting everyone from all but one town to the sword, but that had been out of necessity and not cruelty: she had wanted to exploit the advantage of her unexpected arrival as much as possible, and it had served to demonstrate that she was a foe to be reckoned with. Had she not completely destroyed those first three towns and their populations, she knew Asterion would never have surrendered to her and made this latest victory possible.

Taking all those slain as slaves to be sold in the great markets of Hime and Greece would in fact have been an alternative to killing them, of course. However, it would not have worked in light of her aims. Captives would have slowed down the army's pace, hampering them in her efforts to lead Thorak's army on a merry chase through the Mentulaean Southern Frontier. It would also have obliged her to split her men's rations in order to provide for the captives. This was why no prisoners had been taken until now.

What made the difference now was that she had Asterion as a temporary base for holding her prisoners. The added resources being supplied by the city would also help in tiding over everyone in her army until she could move the captives to another location.

"Send messengers to Avaro-han today to inform him of what happened," she told Keigo as they surveyed the armour and loot their captives had surrendered to them. There were both legionaries and noncombatants working on sorting out the items, and other officers directed them on where to put certain objects. "I want you to take one of Kenji-han's legions-the Fifth shall do, I think-and bring the captives with you to Avaro-han's camp over the river. Arrange to have them sent on from there to Argus, where there should already be some slave traders waiting to buy them and have them shipped off. I shall prepare letters to inform my banker's representatives here on how to handle it, so you can simply send those over to Argus as well."

Her legate nodded.

"I am allowing you a slower march than usual," she went on, "to allow for the fact that you shall have an entire cavalcade of prisoners walking with you. However, I still expect you to make it to Avarohan's camp by early May, provided you leave in the next few days."

Of course, he thought with an inward sigh: to Shizuru Fujino, a slower march than usual was actually about the same pace as a truly "usual" march for any other commander. Not that he really minded, however. Now that he had seen how effective her ruthless speed was, he was pleased to do all she ordered. And though he probably would not be able to admit it aloud to his brother and the rest of his senatorial clique later, he was enjoying himself under her command, finding it more thrilling than anything he had yet done.

"They're going to go for a fat price," he observed, thinking of those twenty-four thousand prisoners being auctioned off. "It's been a while since we had a proper war, so we've not seen this many slaves for sale in a while around Our Sea. The demand's been a bit higher than the supply for the past few years."

Shizuru smiled at him.

"True," she said. "Slave prices may go down a little in the future, as we shall be getting even more throughout the course of this war, but I predict they shall stay up for quite a while yet. From what Shizuma told me, several of the other provincial governors-Asia Province comes to mind-have been demanding more soldiers for their garrisons of late. Some of our other territories seem to be getting their share of threats these days."

He frowned. "But if those threats break out into conflicts too, wouldn't that have the potential to drop the slave prices as well by providing more sources for captured slaves?"

"Only if they develop into wars and only if the other governors are as successful," she said, her tone obviously implying she thought both unlikely. Had Keigo not seen her in action in the past few months, he might have been annoyed by her easy dismissal of the other governors, but he had spent enough time with the woman now to see from where all those mountains of confidence arose.

"Even should those conditions come true," she said, "I do not think you shall see them realised in the next year just yet, at least from what I know about the territories in question and the people administering them. Which means that able-bodied men and women are currently being siphoned out of Hime by her territories through the military conscriptions-our recent ones included-such that there are going to be fewer and fewer labourers at home for the industries, fields and farms. Result? Hime is going to not just want but actually need more slave labour. So you see, I shall have technically fuelled as well as filled that demand. That may develop into an issue later, once the wars are over and legions start coming home, but it should be easily remedied with the right legislative action."

"I see," he said, impressed by her economic acumen and uttering a silent apology to his brother and other conservative friends for it: but it was so hard not to be impressed by the woman! "It's amazing, though, that we got this many without even having to fight. I admit I'd never have believed you if you'd have told me this could be done, Fujino-san. Well, most of the things you've recently shown me can be done haven't been the easiest things to believe, in all honesty. I was even sceptical about this latest trick until the last moment. So much about war is about deception, though, isn't it?"

"As it is in politics," she chuckled. "Thank you, however."

"For what?"

"For never questioning me even when you were sceptical of my orders."

They looked at the sorting of the loot again.

"What should we do after the slaves have been sent off to Argus?" he asked.

"Join forces with Avaro-han and come back here. I expect both of you here in Asterion by June."

Another furious march. "Will you be here?"

"No," she answered. "I am going to cause a little more mayhem around this region to distract their central bases once you leave, and then I shall head over to Shizuma's camp."

"Fujino-san!"

They turned to the call and saw a woman trotting towards them, hands lifting the hem of her dress above her ankles so that she could jog faster. Keigo heard the air puffing through his commander's nose at the sight and sucked in his lips to try and prevent his smile.

"Good day to you, Harumi-san," he said once the woman had reached them.

Harumi patted down her cloak and dress and self-consciously smoothed a palm over one side of her head to make sure her hair was in place.

"Good day to you too, Kurauchi-san," she returned. "And you, Fujino-san. Everything went beautifully today, didn't it?"

Shizuru gave her a smile.

"Yes, it did," she said. "Thanks to your help and that of all the other citizens of Asterion."

"Oh, we were glad to do it! Those boors would have as soon killed us as saved us from so-called 'invaders' if they thought it would be amusing."

Shizuru hummed and nodded. It was Keigo who answered her with actual speech.

"We'll be seeing you at the dinner Ertiyala-san is giving tonight, Harumi-san?" he enquired.

"I wouldn't miss it!" she said, with a glittering flutter of her eyes at the woman standing by Keigo's side. "I hope I can sit beside you later, Fujino-san. I heard that you were quite a lover of poetry and I thought I might discuss it with you then."

Again Shizuru gave her a smile.

"That sounds lovely, Harumi-han," she said. "I fear you might find my knowledge of poetry disappointing, however, as I might not be as versed in it as you may have been led to believe. Besides, I very much doubt the others attending the party shall find it as scintillating a topic as someone with your learning would, so we might ostracise them by discussing that then."

"Oh, pooh on them! Or we could simply talk about it over dinner at my house one evening. I daresay you might find my library interesting, and you could give me opinions on the local poets there too. I have copies of all the most popular works."

Shizuru sighed expressively and made an excuse about needing to check on something before walking away, actually intending to go to the town's main commercial street to see if there was anything worth bringing back for her girl. Her legate stayed behind to give the thwarted Harumi a helpless smile.

"A word of advice, Harumi-san," he said. "The general has someone waiting for her back home."

The woman lifted her brows at him and he reflected, not for the first time, that she was actually quite handsome. The Asterion local had large blue eyes and masses of thick auburn hair, and her face was a heart-shaped, well-formed one that actually suggested that she was noble, which she was. If his general had been rejecting all her blatant invitations all this time it was not through any real embarrassment in her form, he thought, but simply due to the fact that all these virtues still did not quite put her in the league of her competition.

"That never stopped anyone before," she told him now.

"It will stop you, trust me."

"Well!" She frowned, looked put-out but not devastated. "It's a girl, of course?"

"Yes."

"She's not married, though," she said with a note of triumph.

"No, she's not."

"Then there's still hope. Besides, all people are faithless lovers sooner or later, Kurauchi-san. It just takes time."

Keigo chuckled at this and explained, upon receiving a questioning eyebrow, that he was of the opinion this did not apply to the case at hand.

"Somehow, I don't think either Fujino-san or her girl count as 'people'," he laughed, mystifying Harumi even more before he also walked away and left her alone himself.

---

When the Lupine Division was training, it often cleared its chosen training ground of people without intending it. The troopers had a reputation for getting energetic and the division's trademark weapon was known for whizzing perilously near bystanders' heads during their sessions; though no actual accidents had yet been recorded, the mere breath of that paw shooting past one's ear was sufficient argument for most onlookers to clear out of the environs in moments.

So when the Polemarch of the Otomeians came for her inspection of the troopers one chill day in the winter of Shizuru Fujino's alpine march, she was one of the few observers present. Joining her were three of the most important of the Lupine officers, the only ones excluding themselves from organisation of the current exercise. The rest of the officers were right up against the fray, barking and snarling at any of the troopers they thought not pulling his weight. Since the exercise was for the division's latest draftees-and since it was common knowledge in the army that a draftee was never considered to pull his weight for at least the first few months of his service-there was a lot of barking and snarling taking place.

As for the trio of officers not involved in this harassment of the recruits, they were also observers today, though not of the troopers themselves. Rather, all three were observing their polemarch-princess, who sat primly on a stool they had fetched for her and had her own gaze on the exercises. She and her fellow observers were silent: the quartet neither spoke nor looked away from their respective subjects. The only sound was from the whooping troopers and their steeds, and from the snapping, scowling cavalry officers telling the sweating troopers to Move, damn it, or you'll be snorting mud!

The princess herself appeared too fixed on the activity to pay any mind to the three officers watching her, but she was in truth very aware of their eyes. She knew it was less eagerness to see her reaction than routine that kept them looking: her officers had already spent years of doing it and could no longer kick the habit. It had started from their paranoia over her welfare when she first joined their ranks-she learned about it only later in her command, but the leaders of the Lupine Division had apparently been threatened with execution if they failed to keep the last royal Ortygian alive in her first battles as a young trooper-and it had been encouraged over time into dependence due to the style of leadership she had long employed with them, where she delivered commands as much with her eyes and body as with her tongue. They had simply grown so used to looking over and to her, she knew, that they were hard-pressed to stop it now.

This was the very logical explanation she gave her lover when that woman had remarked on the fixity of the Lupine troopers' gazes on herself. Shizuru had accepted it as a sound answer; however, the Himean had also taken care to point out that said logical explanation passed over the adoration that was also present in the stares, almost as if dismissing the emotion aspect of their motivations from the theory. Natsuki had admitted the justice of this criticism-albeit not without gentle protestation that she had not explicitly dismissed emotion. She was fairly aware of her troopers' emotions, she contested, and never considered what she knew of them irrelevant.

Those notes had been exchanged after an observation not unlike the one taking place at the moment: but that earlier one had been conducted by Shizuru herself, who had come one day to view the Lupine Division's exercises. She had actually obtained permission to do so from the polemarch, asking if she could escort the girl to the location and observe the Lupine Division's recruits during their training at least once, some days before she had left to go on her mountain march. Her request had been phrased so gently, with a hint of timidity that Natsuki had found uncharacteristic enough to merit curiosity.

"If it pleases you," Natsuki had said to the request, pushing herself up to stare at the Himean on whom she was resting. It had been very early in the morning when this conversation happened and they had still been in bed. "You are my commander still, Shizuru, even if I am now Polemarch. You need not ask. You need only tell."

Her commander had smiled.

"With anyone else, I would," had been her response. "But I do not wish to step on your toes, Natsuki."

"With your big feet."

She was literally spanked for it, the older woman's hand coming down on her rear with a smack and causing a squirm.

"Oh, your cheek! But yes, unfortunately, that is indeed what I mean."

"That you have big feet?"

"Do you want me to spank you again?"

She asked what Shizuru had meant.

"I do not want to intrude on your fief, so to speak. I may be your commander but everyone in this camp knows I am more than that for you-and we already know some are not inclined to thinking well of our relationship, even among your people."

"The same goes for your people, Shizuru."

"So it does, dear. But you are the subject here, not I. And I do not want to injure you out of my own wilful recklessness."

"You think I could be injured if you come to see my troopers at work?"

"Let us simply say that I do not wish to impose myself on the situation carelessly and harm your dignity in the process."

"My dignity is never harmed by your presence."

"How sweet of you to say so. Very well then. Still, I do wish you would appreciate my asking you for permission first instead of pointing out its non-necessity due to my rights as the commander of the army. It's unromantic, meum mel, and perhaps slightly inconsiderate of the one romancing you . "

"Do I harm your dignity with my lack of consideration, Shizuru?" she had asked then, laughing.

"No, darling, but you do injure my ego."

Which had prompted Natsuki to laugh again, as she considered Shizuru's ego so monumental it was already beyond casual injury. Natsuki liked the high points of pride in the other woman, finding them as appropriate as they were charming. Shizuru's attitudes generally had reasons, she thought, and when the reason for your self-confidence was as great as the woman's, it was only to be expected that you would have a healthy regard for yourself. Indeed, the woman's self-confidence was so deuced assertive that it even made you feel silly for worrying about her during some trial, on occasion!

That reminded Natsuki: she had to ask her servants if all the sacrifices she ordered had been made already. Having them finished earlier was better, naturally, although she was not opposed to a bit of delay if it only served to enhance the sacrifices' preparation and contribute to their propriety. One had to be certain that the right offerings went to the right gods because the deities were finicky creatures. Perhaps she should go ahead and double the offerings to the gods of war and triumph? Yes, and send for one more calf to be sacrificed to the altar of Shizuru's ancestress. Shizuru might laugh at her many precautions were she to learn about all of this, Natsuki supposed, but that was fine: what mattered was that the woman would be blessed by enough fortune to laugh at all, even if Natsuki had to be the object of said woman's amusement.

She emitted a long exhalation, her three officers perking up at the sound.

"Better," she pronounced, which caused all three to frown. They knew that she saw a difference between something that was better and something that was good.

"They're still learning, Captain," Kyo offered, only to receive a sharp look. He caught himself and amended the title: "Polemarch. They're still learning, Polemarch. Please pardon me, Natsuki. I'm still getting used to it."

"As am I," she told him.

"We need to get them into even more skirmishes with enemy cavalry to make proper Lupine troopers of them."

"Mentulaean cavalry are a poor standard against which to measure ourselves."

"Then what are we to do?" said another of the officers. "We already have them sparring with each other and against the enemy when opportunity allows it. What more is there here?"

The green eyes turned to the one who had asked the question.

"A lot," she said. "This is not pushing, Zofel. You have them fight each other or each other with the veterans distributed evenly between sides. What in this is a challenge?"

"Then what must we do to make it more challenging?"

She mulled it over for a few seconds before answering, flicking her black hair out of the furred ruff of her cloak.

"Put all new members together instead and collect the veterans in the opposing team. Have them use only the daos."

Her officers digested the idea.

"Excuse me for saying so, Natsuki, but that doesn't sound like a match to me," said the last member of the trio to speak, a blonde who had a look of the Kruger brood about her. As well she might: her father was the king's half-brother. "If we put the veterans into one group and the tyros in the other, it's an inevitable conclusion which side will see victory. Especially if we forbid them from using anything other than the daos in the skirmish! It won't be fair."

"This war is not fair, Arania," was Natsuki's retort.

She tilted her face to the sky and shut her eyes with a look similar to that of a basking cat. Yet the sun was already dying in the west and could not truly reach her through the clouds.

"Do you think our division great?" she asked Arania, face held up that way and unreadable.

"The greatest in our nation," Arania told her.

"This is known." Natsuki's eyes opened again, sliding to fix her very distant relative with a meaningful gaze. "And our greatness is our ability to always match the odds, no matter how unfair the measure."

She then transferred her attention to her humming pet, bending over to catch its black head in her hands. It sniffed her jaw noisily and she smiled.

"I give the parameter on what weapon may be used for a reason," she said, dropping a kiss on the big cat's nose. "See their timidity. That is fear of the daos. They fear what it can do to them even when they are the ones wielding it."

"With good reason," Arania said, tapping her right ear. Kyo and Zofel smirked at their comrade, knowing the crescent of missing flesh on it had been lost in a mishandling of the daos when she was younger.

"Yes," their polemarch allowed, her eyes smiling as well. "But also only within reason."

Kyo grunted; the princess's mind was set.

"I understand," he said. "It will be done."

"Good," she said.

"Which paw of the daos should we have them use?"

"That is your decision, Captain."

He shook his head and looked put out.

"I just can't get used to it," he told them.

They all grinned at him, Zofel patting his back.

"You can," Natsuki told her subordinate. "You shall."

She took a quick breath to brace herself, then got to her feet. The weight on her left side was distributed between her walking stick and the prosthetic buckled to her left knee. She was still getting used to the latter, even if she showed no actual struggle, and the newness of the object to her was betrayed in the long pause she took once she was off the stool. The trio she was talking to-as well as some of the officers directing the training-watched her intently, their jaws tightening. They knew of the prosthetic, naturally, though it was almost entirely concealed by her dress. The three surrounding her were the only ones who could see the brown tips of several beautifully carved toes poking out of one of her sandals and beyond the hem.

"Whom have you deputed," she asked, her big cat slinking against her, "for later?"

Kyo rattled off the names he and the other two had settled on.

"Good," she said, and gave them the hour and prearranged location; they all knew these details already, but she repeated them anyway for confirmation. "Prepare."

"I'll get on it," said Kyo.

The trio bowed and she made to leave.

"You do that," she heard Arania say to the other two just as she was about to walk off. "I'll walk with you into camp, Natsuki, if you don't mind the company. May I?"

Natsuki lifted an eyebrow at the request but nodded anyway.

"Where's Zidek?" Arania asked once they were off, referring to the hulking Otomeian who had been serving as Natsuki's attendant and "body-carrier" for the past weeks. "Why didn't he come with you today?"

"He is on an errand," the polemarch answered. "What is yours?"

"The new senior legate," Arania said instantly.

"You wish to speak with her?"

"Of her."

Natsuki nodded.

"There are some worries among the others," the fair-haired woman expanded. "We've not had a lot of time with her, and no real battles yet, so there are still more questions than answers. She seems to be fine so far, but you would know her better than we do. How does she compare to the previous senior legate?"

She glanced at the younger woman's feet as the latter frowned at the query. She slowed her steps another half-beat after confirming Natsuki's pace, bringing her eyes back up quickly.

"Imprecise," the cool voice was telling her. "There were two previous senior legates, and comparisons can be made on too many levels. The walk is not long enough."

"Please excuse me. Compared to Seigo Ushida and on the subject of our treatment."

"Better."

They walked two more steps in silence before Arania realised that the response to her clarification was in fact the answer to the question itself.

"She's Shizuru Fujino's immediate cousin, isn't she?" she said then.

"Mmm."

"They're not very alike."

Natsuki withheld a smile and hummed again.

"They say she's a great womaniser, too."

"Is there a reason you offer me these opinions on the senior legate, Arania?"

Arania released her breath noisily.

"Small talk, Princess Natsuki," she said. "Even all the time you've spent with the Himeans hasn't made you any better at it, I see, if you will excuse the joke."

This time, Natsuki let her smile develop untrammelled.

"Small talk," she said, "is often a size larger than it appears. Come to your point."

The other woman nodded and delivered an apology.

"Is she trustworthy in battle itself, Natsuki?" she asked, abandoning the extensions of the conversation that she had been planning. Natsuki might still be smiling, but Arania did not want to give her any cause to drop that expression. That was one of the interesting things about their Ortygian princess: she was not always opposed to prevarication and could display a near-foreign tolerance for it at times. Yet she was still someone who loved precision, and was best heeded whenever she indicated she wanted it served to her immediately. She was just, yes, and kind too, even, as well as bizarrely compassionate in certain ways; despite that, she could be as pitiless as she was proud. This with her power meant that she would not hesitate to make you bleed if she thought you were making her wait for something just out of insolence. And though Arania had absolutely no intent of being insolent, she knew that the princess was acute enough to sense when a conversation's loops were premeditated, and might just read that as a form of insolence one way or another.

"In the last battles where they used us, we were turned into living bait," she said, turning her head so she could look at the princess as they walked. "We lost many. Numer's wife was one of them." She was referring to the spouse of her dearest friend, a woman who had been a friend as well. "And he was not the only one made a widow, even just from among our ranks. We lost so much, Natsuki, without a need to. We were just used badly, and that was the problem. There's also the return of Princess Alyssa and her new involvement in the war: had we been under her leadership instead, it would be safe to say we'd not have been used as badly as we were. Unlike our infantry comrades, though, we can't go to serve directly under her. We all know the Himeans will keep the horse- our horse, in particular-close to them because they want the strongest cavalry to be with their armies and not those of their allies. Can you blame me or any of the others for feeling worried?"

Natsuki nodded, and Arania saw that she was not yet able to wipe away the upturned crumple of her brows at the inner corners, her grief at the losses among her troopers still too thick to be folded away so easily. Yes, she was indeed compassionate, their poor princess. And she too had been used so badly!

"You ask a complex question still," said the polemarch, sadness in her voice. "We are auxiliaries. This means we tend to go last in the rewards and first into the battles. However, we are also valuable auxiliaries, as even the Himeans know now that we are the most valued of the royal military. Furthermore, we-no, you are under my command, and I am polemarch of the army as well as thuh - thuh - the mistress of the Himean commander."

Both she and Arania bit on their tongues after the last comment, it being the first time Natsuki had ever avowed this point of her status so frankly with any of her subordinates. Neither looked at the other for a few moments after that as well, choosing to look at the frozen road they trod instead.

"Consider these things," Natsuki concluded. "They are factors in the answer."

Arania chewed on her tongue a little more.

"Yes, they would be normally," she said eventually. "Will they matter to this senior legate?"

"You think her to be unmindful of such things?"

"I think her-compared to the ones before, at least-a little different. I'm not sure how. But isn't she?"

The other huffed a cloud of breath.

"Yes," said Natsuki. "She is a little different."

"In a good way or a bad way?"

"Both. Relative to your query, time will tell."

"That's not all that reassuring."

"We are of the Lupine Division. For us, life is never all that reassuring."

Natsuki stopped walking and leaned on her walking stick, the long fingers of her hand folded around its curved end.

"There is my destination," she said, indicating the command tent now only some metres away from them. "You may go. I can walk unattended, though you all refuse to listen when I say it."

"I never intended to make you think that, Polemarch," Arania replied with a sombre face. "I didn't come with you with any ideas of assisting you. I walked with you only so you could assist me, and so I could talk to you just now about my and the others' fears."

"Yes, and your fears were very small," the polemarch said, shaking her head at one of her most loyal officers. "You are a bad liar, Arania, and you do not know how to make your talk big enough to be convincing. But I thank you still. Now please leave."

The other woman bowed and did as ordered, though she lingered in her steps enough to see Natsuki finally enter the Himean command tent. Natsuki felt her subordinate's eyes boring into her back as she went but chose not to shoo Arania away again. She understood that the woman was only suffering from the same worries that afflicted her other troopers, who, though they refused to say it to her face, constantly fretted over whether or not she was truly strong enough to walk about this way without accompaniment again and all other things to do with her general safety. In some ways, she thought, they were as silly as Shizuru herself. There were so many silly people around her-this injury of hers had demonstrated it-but how much she loved them!

Fresh events had cast them to light beyond all possible ignorance, she supposed. Take that recent incident involving the Lupine troopers and some members of Alyssa's infantry army. Before the Princess Alyssa had taken Otanara and the Otomeian foot at Sosia away to the borders, a dispute had arisen between several infantry soldiers and the Lupine cavalry. Apparently, a number of people from different companies of the Otomeian army had been drinking to pass time in their camp. As often happened when soldiers had a drinking party, some careless talk had developed a dispute. This dispute had been a grave one, however, and not the sort to be forgotten once the alcohol had dissipated.

The subject had been the Princess Natsuki's return to the Himean commander's hands. The problem came because liquor had loosened tongues enough for some soldiers to go where most did not, at least not aloud: three of the infantry made salacious and contemptuous remarks on the Princess Natsuki's scandalous record of bed-bounces in recent time, from her hop into the bed of the Red-Eyes then into the late Legate Himemiya's and back into the former's bed again.

When Natsuki found out about this incident, it was much later, well into her recovery already and after Alyssa's departure with the Otomeian foot. She did not suffer as much pain as others might have expected upon learning of the bawdy insinuation that had started the matter, having been aware of that popular suspicion herself. Indeed, she had known it long before and had even predicted it to herself: it was perhaps only natural, she had told her late Himean friend, that she would be suspected of playing whore-mistress to the next woman to share her tent after having so famously done the same for another. Even now it made her smile to remember how it was Suou who had grieved for her, offering again and again to transfer quarters elsewhere if it would in any way help her reputation. She had declined for two reasons. First, because Suou was someone she liked to have around. Second and more importantly, because the damage had already been done and the proposed activity promised no mitigation. And as for challenging the suspicion in public, what would that do? Merely acknowledge it and possibly even fan the fire.

So Natsuki was calm in her treatment of this suspicion held by some of the auxiliary, especially those who did not know her as well as her troopers did. The problem was that her troopers proved to have less temperance than their politically-astute commander. After challenging the loose-tongued soldiers from Otanara's army to retract their vulgar accusation and being denied, they had demanded satisfaction in the traditional way.

As Otanara had been reported to say after the fallout, it was only indicative of how mind-addled the three infantrymen were that they had not backed down when given the chance. The Lupine Division was the elite of the royal military, and that adjective was applied to its members not because of their lineages or those of their officers. These were people chosen from the outset because they lacked fear in battle and showed more promise than anyone else: and after they entered the division, they were trained still harder than anyone else. It made things worse that this particular collection of them had also been observed to have a bizarre obsession with their commander. Other Lupine Divisions had been loyal too, it was remembered, but not as focused on their captain as this bunch obviously was. Whether the reason for it was their commander's identity, her personality or her skills, no one outside of the group could settle on a firm answer: the simple fact, which everyone did agree on, was that the Lupine Division was made up of suicidally-fearless fanatics with lethal skill sets. One simply did not tempt to argument people of such profiles.

It was no surprise that the challenged soldiers were corpses the day after the quarrel. It was no surprise either that vengeance was a privilege eschewed by the friends of the dead: the combat had taken place under the old laws and the outcome was considered valid by most. Besides, anyone contesting it would likely only have added to the casualty count, given the temperament of the Lupine Division at that point (their former captain had still been bed-ridden at the time, and they had all been in dangerous moods as a result). Thus three deaths were all it took to settle issue nicely, and none of the Otomeian officers bothered to do anything after hearing of what had happened. This included the Princess Alyssa herself, who was heard to remark that she considered the outcome satisfactory.

For her part, Natsuki reserved her opinions on the incident. Her thoughts on it were many, though, as she considered it to have been her responsibility. It was astounding how many protectors she had, and she knew it was a failing not to have seen them as clearly before. Their presence was something that made her worry more than it set her at ease: when your guardians were the likes of Shizuru Fujino or the members of the Lupine Division, you had to worry greatly about the ramifications of nearly every act. To have so many fearless persons willing to kill for your sake meant that you had to shoulder the fear of someone actually getting killed for you each day, in a result whose chain of causes would likely lead back to you.

Words that Suou had once spoken echoed in her ear when she thought on it: not my fault, but my responsibility. For someone who had been deprived by fate of the duty-laden position she should have inherited from her parents, she was still a young woman with far more responsibilities than most would think. She was the Otomeian Polemarch, an adoptive princess of the Royal Kruger House, and ward to several hundred troopers who would insist on protecting her at the cost of their own skins. And, beside all these, she was also now a person who had to deal with two marriage proposals given at nearly the same time and by two rather awesome women. Choosing to accept either one would shake to pieces parts of her world and those of the people around her. Yet choosing to accept neither would likely result in similar tremors.

Growing up as she had, Natsuki had never really thought of marriage as an urgent reality. It was a distant option back then, not a likely one. She had known that she would have to confront it sooner or later, since she knew the king would likely make overtures at some point to try and absorb her blood and everything that went with it into the Kruger dynasty. But in the grand scheme of things, she had expected this confrontation to come far, far later in her future.

Life could be very interesting that way, she thought wryly. When she had first contemplated the possibility of one day being persuaded to marry one of the king's issue, all she had hoped was that whomever he proposed would be not too embarrassing to her personal standards. She knew that admiration was not generally the basis of such arrangements, but something in her had still rebelled against the idea of taking someone uninspiring for a spouse when the need finally arose. If she had to marry at all, she would rather marry someone worth that commitment. In other words, she had hoped for someone great. That was because she herself had her share of this quality and greatness only ever really called out to greatness, of course; however, as she was her own harshest critic, she did not explain it thus and simply attributed that hope to the juvenile side of her person.

Well, she supposed her juvenile side should be satisfied now, at least. Now she had two marriage proposals from two of the greatest persons she had ever known, with one coming from a woman she loved more than should surely be safe for any mortal being. And the other proposal came from a woman she loved too, even if in a different way. Who would have ever imagined such a situation worrisome? Yet it was to her, and greatly so.

Oddly enough, it was the proposal from her lover that she found more surprising. While her cousin's had been a surprise as well, a moment's contemplation had worked quickly to reduce the astonishment. There were definite benefits to Alyssa in it, for one thing. It was not an unattractive arrangement to her either, from a practical perspective. Furthermore, Alyssa was the only one of the king's unmarried children whom she had considered capable of satisfying her standards for a spouse. She had simply never considered the woman in her hopes before because Alyssa had always seemed uninterested in such a union, even when the king had hinted at it jokingly in their presence. Ah, but Alyssa had been playing a game, Natsuki saw now. It was a game she herself understood fully.

That being the case, one could easily see which marriage would be more expedient from a simple view of her aims, which included protecting Shizuru as best she could from the odium their relation might breed. But again: that was from a simple perspective. On the whole, the Princess Natsuki did not favour them.

A more faceted vision, she thought, would reveal that it would not only be disrespectful to her older cousin and painful to herself to agree to the other princess's proposal but also monumentally hurtful to Shizuru. A little hurt Natsuki could have condoned if it meant she could spare Shizuru graver pain later. But to hurt the woman in a way that might be genuinely critical? Impossible. Natsuki would sooner cut off her remaining leg herself, and would not even spare a tear in the doing of it.

This was also why she had revised her decision not to go to Hime if Shizuru asked again. Among the many things she had discovered recently was that she had made that gravest of errors one could make with Shizuru Fujino. That is, she had underestimated the woman. Shizuru would truly dare all to get what she wanted, and she also made no bones any longer about the fact that Natsuki was one of the things she wanted. Want, Natsuki saw now, was different when it was from Shizuru. Perhaps it was due to the woman's ego, perhaps it was due to her compulsion to conquer whatever she set her mind to conquering-but whatever the case, Shizuru tended to need the things she wanted, or perhaps she even only wanted the things she needed. And one of those things was Natsuki.

This understanding made a part of Natsuki happy (though she felt some guilt over that, being her ever-guilty self), as its revelations gave her permission to do at least one thing she truly wanted, should opportunity for it arise again in the future. Even so, she had to think first on the matter of marriage, since she did not think the excuse she had just been given provided for that much as well.

Were her scruples on Shizuru's behalf not present, though, she knew she would have agreed to the proposal so fast she would have choked. What a proposal it had been! Passionate and possessive, a headlong dive into the kind of mind-numbing I-would-dare-all-for-you romance that nearly all girls dreamt of inspiring in their lovers. Listening to that splendid voice profess such adoration for her that its owner deemed her a necessity for life already, Natsuki had been sent tumbling even deeper into love where she had thought further depth impossible. It had truly frightened her not at all when Shizuru had admitted to her the selfish and strange nature of this amour. Natsuki had spent so much of her life being held on the fringes: an outsider even among her people, a kind of anomaly tolerated and even revered in her community while still being considered an anomaly. Hence, to be encompassed and absorbed by someone she loved so much might even have been something of a relief.

" Ave, Natsuki."

She was in the tent; it was Shizuru's cousin who had just greeted her.

" Ave," she replied, putting her considerations on hold.

"Have a seat over there, please," Shizuma said. "I just need to finish talking to the centurions here."

Again she tilted her head, moving over to the indicated desk and seating herself on the chair drawn up to it. Her pet followed without needing to be told, spreading itself next to her seat and resting its head on her living foot. One of the servants in the room came to offer a drink at this point, but she waved him away. Natsuki waited in silence as was her wont, taking in the sounds all around the room as the officers talked and worked. She took in Shizuma's tone in particular as the woman addressed the centurions at her desk.

It was so, she thought after a while: Shizuma was truly a little different from her cousin.

Shizuma could be a nice person, for one thing, where Shizuru simply was. The senior legate was charming, Natsuki thought, but she knew that was different from being nice even if it could look the same. She wondered why: a possibility might be that the woman had been hurt before by being nice and was now wary of it. But that was only one possibility among many, so Natsuki did not place too much stock in that as an answer.

She clearly possessed a sharp intellect too, though Natsuki had not seen anything from her yet to indicate that she could equal Shizuru's staggeringly colossal one. Also a little bit colder, more obviously withholding of herself than her younger cousin. But not to the point of being haughty with her subordinates, Natsuki could see. She still talked to the centurions with much the same friendly authority her cousin did. That was good. It was smart and Natsuki approved of things that were smart.

In fact, she generally approved of Shizuma. She even liked her. Part of what made Shizuma so easy to like was a matter of reflection, though: even if Natsuki easily differentiated the woman's face from that of her lover, she nonetheless acknowledged the presence of many other little curves and angles of countenance that the two cousins shared. Those similarities, tiny though they were, predisposed her to being instantly warmer with Shizuru's cousin than she naturally would be of others in the early stages of acquaintance. And little though she knew it, this actually helped the Himean live up to the expectations of said predisposition. As Shizuma tended to strike so many people as rakish or haughty from the start, and because her reputation as an inveterate philanderer often preceded her, she regularly ended up hiding the better side of her character from most people from the beginning, being a sensitive enough person to detect disapproving judgements even before they were voiced. Because she sensed nothing of that kind from her cousin's lover, though-and because warmth, no matter how deeply buried, still tended to recognise and respond to warmth-she ended up treating the girl with the kindness many others never had the opportunity to discover.

This outcome benefited Natsuki greatly, considering how much apprehension she had harboured over finally meeting one of Shizuru's relatives-and one Shizuru herself seemed to esteem highly, at that. Arania's concerns earlier had been valid, to some extent. There had been the added worry over how this new senior legate would perform, and whether or not said legate's opinions of Natsuki might have an influence on how her troopers and the rest of the Otomeian auxiliaries were treated. The Himean command was restructuring itself, and with the high likelihood of Shizuru being gone for stretches of time for her own marches and battles, Natsuki needed an ally more than ever. She had an excellent one not too long ago, but that ally had been lost along with her leg and a part of her heart.

Ah, the accursed leg. Or perhaps it was better to say the accursed person. Natsuki reached out for her pet at the twist of anguish this brought to her belly, hugging the animal's furry head to her knees as she doubled over to find comfort in its purring presence. She still feared the possibility that she was a bringer of misfortune, worried even more now that yet another group of people she had loved had been slain around her. Her fear on this was ever-present, although it was being rocked by some powerful counterarguments at the moment-and ones brought to her by the two women asking for her hand, even.

The more moderate of the counterarguments came from the Princess Alyssa. From her had been the suggestion that there might be no more cause for Natsuki to hold on to her fears of being accursed: Alyssa's suggestion was that Natsuki's leg could have been taken as restitution for some of the past tragedy it had caused the first time it had been broken. That took some of the sting away from its loss too besides proposing to ease Natsuki's worries. If Alyssa was right, there was a possibility that the misfortune the girl feared to have been her companion all these years had finally been excised and could no longer harm those she held dear, severed from her along with that rotten leg that had once led to the deaths of so many.

Natsuki hoped so much for this that it was nearly a fantasy. That she did not classify it as one was because another, more fantastic idea had recently been presented to her-and by the one too for whom she feared most whenever she considered the possibility of being a bringer of misfortune. Shizuru's contention, as well might be expected, was the more radical of the two, an argument so wild and optimistic in Natsuki's eyes that merely to think of it often left her reeling so much she had to sit down.

"I do not deny that in your life you have seen great misfortunes," the woman had said, in a conversation sparked by her notice of Natsuki's worries over her 'unlucky nature'. "I do not belittle these misfortunes or their significance. Yet were you truly as hounded by misfortune as you fear, it seems to me that more of your ventures would fail. But this is not the case, and many other ventures bearing your involvement have also seen success. In fact, from what I know of your military record alone, especially taken on the merits of your specific ventures' outcomes, success has far greater constancy than failure."

Natsuki had been confused, baffled by the direction her lover was taking.

"What is it that you are saying?" she had asked, only to be treated to an answer that would set off a small tremor inside her that would over the years slowly grow, morphing into a full-blown earthquake with time and in its maturity violently collapsing many of the things she had come to believe of herself for so long. But this tectonic shift would happen only much, much later in the future, and at the time Shizuru set it off with her answer, would begin only as a small shudder in her being.

"What if the gravity of the misfortunes you have seen has distracted us from the true common denominator regarding your fortune in them?" Shizuru had told her. "You have seen great trials, my love. I shall be first to admit it. Yet you have seen great triumphs too, and I would say even more frequently. Indeed, that is the point we should heed: that even in the midst of great misfortune, you can and do succeed. You have suffered losses too, of course, some of them unconscionable. Even so, this should not take our eyes away from the fact that more than once, you have managed to evade the most unconscionable of losses, which is the loss of life and all possibility of restitution for or improvement upon past failures. You have lived through the worst of situations, you have survived things many others would not and indeed have not lived through."

"Taking this logically recommends a different interpretation from that you hold," that beloved voice had concluded. "What if the misfortune was in fact borne by those around you, your presence the thing that was incidental? What if your only true misfortune was to have chanced to be around these other, unfortunate people? What if the reason you have survived so much that so many others have not is that your life strand is so strong and so cherished by the Fates that you have long been and are in fact a genuinely fortunate, powerfully lucky being?"

It was so subversive an interpretation of her life that even just to remember it made her heart still in her breast. Even now, her breath hitched. No one but her pet marked it, and the animal was quick to comfort her with a nudge to the belly. Natsuki caught herself, smiling down at the creature as if to reassure it that all was well.

But all was not well, she knew, and the still-nudging cat seemed to know it as well as she did. There were so many things shifting in her world of late, testing her adaptability while testing her iron at the same time. Even the thing she had thought to be most unchanging, her old sin, was being questioned. It was true she did not believe what Shizuru had said. Not yet, not really. But sometimes she thought about the possibility of it and would usually end up so rocked by the mere presence of another option in the reading of her history that she would plunge into deeper guilt than before, augmented by what she thought was her selfish try to grasp at something that could absolve herself. The deaths of her parents and people, the deaths of half of her beloved troopers, the death of a foreigner who had somehow become her dearest friend in the short time they knew each other-these were great sins, she would tell herself, and were surely not so easily absolved. And yet, that small but ever-growing echo of Shizuru's voice often whispered what if, what if!

"Well, that's done."

Shizuru's cousin had finished her work and was coming over. Again Natsuki put away her considerations, doing it with the swiftness of one merely opening one door and closing another. The Himean had something in hand and gave it to her. It was a slightly flattened bun, some sort of pastry. She smelled it and caught the scent of cheese and bay. Good scents. She sniffed again, more approvingly.

"Libum," Shizuma said, with a flick of the eye at the big cat's head now sniffing too at Natsuki's lap; she had already made her peace with the animal upon being shown how docile it was, but she was not above a cursory glance to check its docility on occasion. "The cooks made some today because I requested it. Try it, do."

Natsuki pinched off a piece of bread and started eating as the other woman ordered someone to bring over warm wine for them both.

"So why are you unattended today?"

Shizuma grinned at the silent look that was her response.

"I'm sorry, is it a sore subject?" she asked.

"No," Natsuki responded after swallowing the food in her mouth. "A common one."

"Very well, I suppose you have had enough of that then. So how are your troopers faring? Are your recruits up to your standards now?"

Another look from the girl.

"Dear me, I am clumsy-tongued today," the senior legate laughed. "Perhaps I should just have started off by asking how you are. How are you today, Natsuki? How do you find the weather? It's quite fine for winter, no?"

The girl chuckled.

"The recruits are better," she said, smiling up at the Himean and seeing the flashes of Shizuru again that predisposed her to better liking this woman. "And I am fine. Thank you for asking. You?"

"Good and good. And good, thank you for asking too. I do feel my nose a bit tweaked of late, though."

"You have, um, trouble?"

"I have, in a manner of speaking. Though some of the people in this room will likely tell me it's common enough in the army to be discounted as that," she said with a small grin at the two persons hunkered over a document at the nearest desk, both of whom returned her smile. "Fortunately, I can make the argument that I'm green enough a legate to pursue the matter yet. I think some of the junior purveyors of supplies are getting a bit heavy-handed with the bills, you see."

"Exaggeration?" Natsuki asked.

"I believe so. Now to be fair, I cannot complain that the quality of the materials is embarrassing, so my officers have told me. However, I would insist that I can complain about these prices."

She chatted cheerfully with the girl over the issue, letting the other officers in the room get a word in every now and then and laughing at their jokes over what she should do with the purveyors whose bills she was questioning. No one but she and Natsuki understood that they were just passing time now, waiting for the signal to come for them to leave.

Near the time the senior legate's staff retired, the signal arrived. One of the Lupine Division's officers stood at the entrance. He exchanged looks with his Polemarch.

"An hour," Natsuki told Shizuma, who told the others to go after another turn of the glass, ordering the most senior tribune to be in charge. She and Natsuki left the tent.

"Let's go to my place first so that I can change." Shizuma paused to regard the girl, who looked up at her with large eyes that were rimmed with blackness. "You'd best show me how to do that to my eyes too."

They went and outfitted Shizuma accordingly, with Natsuki and her personal servant praising the Himean several times for her appearance in the Lupine uniform (which praise Shizuma received with great suspicion, given that those lauding her wore grins far too wide for her comfort) and then headed for the site of their purpose. As what was about to take place was clandestine and was unknown to anyone in the Himean camp save several of the Lupine troopers—the same ones who had helped to arrange it in the first place—and Natsuki and Shizuma themselves, the location was unassuming: the last in a row of heavy tents used for storage, so far back behind the other tents that people almost never even got to see it from outside. It had been cleared out of its contents surreptitiously and more fitting furnishings had replaced the sacks, crates, and barrels that had once been in it. The Otomeian polemarch and Himean senior legate were escorted into it by the trooper who had been leading them, and the two regarded the two large and handsomely-carved chairs that had been provided.

It was the polemarch who found a complaint. She turned to the troopers present and demanded that a pedestal or some other means of elevation be used to raise the seat she was going to be occupying, also stipulating that the distance between it and the other seat be increased by-she was very precise about it, as they knew she would be even before she spoke-two-thirds of a metre.

"My, my," Shizuma said after seeing what the girl had ordered of her soldiers in that gentle yet guttural language of theirs. "I confess I had not expected you to be so conscious of appearances, girl."

Natsuki regarded the senior legate levelly.

"I am not," she said. "But they are necessary sometimes, so your cousin said."

Two of her troopers stepped up to help her ascend the two steps up the wooden dais on which they had hurriedly put her chair. She seated herself gingerly and put her walking staff across her knees, resting both hands on the arms of the seat and seeming to be pleased.

"Is this particular appearance necessary today?" Shizuma asked, not at all surprised that the girl looked good on a throne. Indeed, the Otomeian looked as though she belonged on it. It was another sense in which she was a perfect match for her cousin, Shizuma supposed: that was another woman who looked as though she belonged on a throne, and whose demeanour only strengthened that opinion, unfortunately enough in her case.

"Yes," the girl said.

A few seconds of silence went by before Shizuma saw that she would have to ask it.

"Why?" she voiced out.

"To Mentulaeans, my people are, um... alien. Not truly unknown. But before this war, we did not often cross paths."

"And this resolves that how?"

"By presenting an image more familiar," the girl responded. "I have read-I hear such displays, they are normal to them. I try to make it easier for them to... hmm... to understand my position with this. Also, they know now because of the war the appearance of my people."

"You're concerned they shall doubt your identity because you're not the usual blonde and blue-eyed Otomeian they've come to expect by now?"

"Mm-hm. Also, I am not very warrior-like to see," Natsuki admitted. "My arms are thin still. I cannot even walk without my stick. This is not what people who expect display think to see of a polemarch."

She smiled lightly all of a sudden, as though she were remembering something that inspired fondness: her next words told Shizuma she probably had been.

"Shizuru, she can avoid the display sometimes because she alone is already a display. But I, as I am now? I seem feeble, I look weak."

"Looks can be deceiving," Shizuma murmured, a little moved by the self-critique; she knew how much physical strength mattered to the girl's people, who had a happy ability to produce hulking exemplars of it. How did they see this waif who was their polemarch besides being their princess? It was fortunate that her face at least made up for the deficiencies of her body: it was thin too, yes, but you still could not look at it without believing her related to either gods or kings.

"Still," the beautiful, feeble being was saying, "I must make the concession."

She then proceeded to pick at her dress, trying to make sure it was arranged properly over her knees. Shizuma smiled reassuringly once she was finished.

"At any rate, you look perfect for the part now," she said. "Though this must be the first time I've yet heard of a concession being the sort that gains one the elevation of a throne."

The girl on the throne tried not to smile.

"It is an irony, yes," she told Shizuma. "You do not appreciate it?"

"Oh, I do. More than most other tools of rhetoric, in fact."

"I worry you will not, um, appreciate what I ask next."

"What is it?"

"I ask of you not to disrupt once we begin," Natsuki said, smiling lightly and with apology in an effort to keep the Himean's hackles from rising: she did not know Shizuma well enough yet to know whether or not the woman would take umbrage at this, so she was worried. It only made it worse that the woman was her lover's cousin, as Natsuki wagered that the tremendous pride that often reared its head in Shizuru was something that ran in the family. She really would rather not butt heads with it.

"It is I they seek, our nation and not yours they wish to speak with," she continued, watching the shifting green patina on the golden eyes for a spark of danger. "I ask you to respect this, only, and not disrupt me. You may have your own time for - for interrogation after, I promise it. I shall yield her to you. But only after I have done. I ask only this, please."

To her relief, Shizuma nodded without rancour.

"Of course," the senior legate said, noting the girl's fingers as they relaxed from their tight grip on her walking cane. The girl understood Himeans fairly well, then; what a pity she did not yet understand that Shizuma was one of the better ones, who would not consider acquiescence to so reasonable a request as begging their pride. Even so, it was understandable. She could not fault the girl for having been anxious.

"Thank you," the polemarch breathed, before asking: "There is - is there anything you would ask me to say? To ask?"

Shizuma grinned.

"Why?" she said. "Would you actually ask or say it?"

"I will consider," the girl said earnestly and with charming honesty.

"No, I think I would rather let you handle this as you wish. As you say, I have time enough later for my own interrogation."

Natsuki sighed.

"So what time will they get here?" Shizuma asked.

Natsuki called in one of the troopers at the entryway and conferred with him.

"They are here," she said after the brief exchange. "My men wait only for my word."

"Speak it to them. Oh, wait first. What of your staff? You need not get up for this interview, anyway, so do you want me to take it for now?"

"No, I wish not to hide it. And my wooden foot is seen from this height, so it matters not if the staff is too. Also, if she gets angry and leaps at me, I will use it to poke her eye."

"Right, of course. Do not give the word yet, please."

"Why?"

"I need to laugh at what you said first."

Afterwards, when Shizuma's laughter had finally drained, the troopers brought into the room the person they had fetched outside camp and had been keeping hidden. This person walked in and stood in front of the chair indicated to have been provided for her, waiting for permission from the presence on the miniature throne before seating herself. She displayed remarkable composure when the big black cat prowled out from behind the throne and curled up at its mistress's feet, but she did look warily at the third person in the room: the very fair Otomeian who stood behind and beside the polemarch's throne.

The polemarch suddenly lifted the hem of her dress and showed off one of her legs.

"I am a cripple," she said in a low, memorable voice and in Himean. "I know you asked for only us to meet, Baroness Horyma of the Mentulae. But you see my situation. My attendant is for my safety."

The baroness smiled, recovering from the tiny shock the wooden leg had caused.

"I am sad to see you distrust me so much even before we start negotiation-this saddens me indeed," she responded, switching to Greek in the latter part of the sentence for the sake of showing the Otomeian princess that she knew that language. It was an extreme rarity among her own people, and it was part of the reason Horyma had been chosen for this parley: the Otomeians were known to prefer Greek to Himean, and the polemarch seemed to confirm that when she shifted to the Hellenic tongue as well, speaking more smoothly than she had in the other language.

"It was on account of your fellows that I am now void of symmetry," she said. "My precaution is justified, I think."

The Mentulaean bowed her head to the revelation.

"I've no doubt the polemarch has made my fellows pay for their offence," she responded.

"Not yet."

Horyma looked up.

"That limb once cost an entire people," the very young, very haughty-looking wisp on the throne said gently. "The same price may be applied to its loss one day."

The enigmatic remark confused Horyma, who lost some of the smooth confidence in her smile afterwards. She bowed her head again and took the two seconds that afforded her to school her expression once more.

"Just so, Polemarch," she said. "My purpose here is in fact to see if the price for that and this war may not be negotiated to something more preferable as well as beneficial. Not just for our people but for yours too."

The slightest cock of the head encouraged her to continue.

"If this war proceeds as it is, your side will suffer losses that may turn the aforementioned price of one people into two," she said with a carefully rueful smile. "Our king, His Majesty Obsidian of the Mentulaeen Empire, has sworn to call on every resource at his disposal to exact reprisal on the invaders. The king's resources are vast: they are worth an empire. For now, it is the Himans who gain his ire and whom he regards his bitterest foes in the matter of securing his dominion. The Otomeians, your own brave people, may yet gain his favour. And he is most eager to give it, if terms can be met here."

She paused, but the polemarch said nothing. Horyma tried to read the girl for a moment but caught nothing from the beautiful eyes- which were unmistakeably green, not the blue she had grown to expect from Otomeians by this point in the war. Actually, many things about the polemarch defied the stereotype and would have caused alarm had she not been warned by the Otomeian barons to whom she had sent messengers and who had helped her organise this parley. The big cat was only one of the things they had warned her about, although it had also been arranged as her surety that she addressed the polemarch of Otomeia and no one else: the polemarch, they had informed her, was the owner of this exotic beast. No one but the polemarch would dare keep it around without a leash.

The rest of the warnings had been on the polemarch herself and her appearance, and Horyma saw that the barons had been right to give her information on those things in advance. The polemarch was thin enough to be called frail and had very dark, very black hair that betrayed no highlights under the torches' illumination, as opposed to her powerfully-built and universally blond subordinates. She had a goddess's face, however. The Polemarch-Princess Natsuki of Otomeia was extremely beautiful, if sickly-looking, but Horyma admitted the latter could be partly an exaggeration of the dim lighting and the black cosmetic applied to the polemarch's eyelids.

That said, she doubted it an exaggeration to call the polemarch very young. The Otomeian looked as though she had yet to step into her twentieth year, and that had been another surprise. Despite that, the polemarch conducted herself like someone who had more experience at these matters than her form suggested, showing only the faintest touches of wariness and curiosity in her face and nothing more. She was reserved and languid and as perfect in composure as the royal tutors often wished several of the king's children to be when they were deep in their cups and lamenting to the other members of court how difficult their pupils were. Well, the king's offspring were a spoiled, bratty lot. Something Horyma suspected for some reason that the Otomeian Polemarch never was.

"If you join with us and forsake the Himeans, the king will share the spoils of the war with your people," she went on. "Indeed, he offers more than that. He will send valuable treasures to be offered to the ruler of the Otomeians-with a special portion set aside only for the polemarch, of course, as thanks for brokering so beneficial an agreement between our peoples. As for the spoils from the Himeans, he offers land from the current Himean provinces. Sosia, for instance, may become your people's property."

"Sosia," was the whisper. "Not Argus?"

Horyma put on her most apologetic smile.

"The king has long desired a port province opening into the Himean Sea. But perhaps an arrangement for Otomeian usage of the port could be drawn up. Management of the port must be ours, however."

" Must be ?" came the soft voice, questioning the words.

"The king would prefer it to be so, although perhaps later talks may persuade him to reconsider his preferences to some extent. The king is a most reasonable man when applied to with the right sort of persuasion," Horyma lied, pleased at least that the Otomeian was showing interest in the idea. Again she paused, and again the polemarch stayed silent. She was beginning to see the foreignness in the young woman's conduct: were this parley taking place in the Mentulaean Court, she would be suffering interruptions and threatening remarks aplenty every few statements. The Mentulaean nobles were impatient and hot-headed, and it was not uncommon for them to interrupt subordinates and messengers to throw up an often-unnecessary question or warning. Of course, they were also prone to interrupting subordinates and messengers to have them thrown the way of the executioner's axe, so questions and warnings were often generally regarded as welcome by comparison.

"As I mentioned earlier, His Majesty would also lavish gifts on allies," she said. "Wealth, jewels, gold-the fruits of our land to be presented to your sovereign in formal deputations expressing the king's gratitude. Special emphasis will be placed on the role the polemarch has played in facilitating this beneficial relationship between our nations, as I said earlier. In fact, the king will offer the polemarch special status as an honorary baroness of the Mentulaean Court, and grant her lands from within the empire too in keeping with that honour."

"The Himeans are a rapacious race," she followed, working to close her proposition. "Their greed ensures that not even allies are safe. We have heard that they have proven this before, with several of their allies in the past. Those were cheated out of their spoils of the wars in which they fought and the Himeans even forced them to pay tributes like land and wealth eventually, as though they were conquered peoples and not allied ones. One day their hungry gaze will turn even to your wealth and the wealth of your people. They will demand tithes and taxes as though you were theirs to milk and enslave. Already they attempt to enslave you to work for a war you did not even start! Even now, Esteemed Polemarch, you should already see their self-importance and insufferable arrogance."

"It is so," came the unexpected interjection. "Their arrogance can be insufferable."

Horyma noted that the polemarch's attendant-another goddess's face!-smiled at that.

"Then join with us," Horyma pressed, taking heart from the remark. "Forsake the Himeans and aid us in pushing them out of these lands. With our combined strength, Polemarch, we can take back the North and end their arrogance once and for all. We can drive out these intruders and foreign elements and regain the ascendancy of our peoples over this region."

She had said her piece and knew it was now the other's turn to talk. So she held her mouth shut again, this time with more expectation of the polemarch actually speaking to her.

"So," the dark-haired girl on the throne said, "you ask us to inform the Himeans that we no longer wish to be allied to them and then shift our support to you?"

Youth had to betray itself one way or another, Horyma thought. Her smile widened, took on the sickly sweet taint it had when she was forced to fawn on some privileged aristocrat above her in Court but not in intelligence.

"Actually, we would prefer you to support us secretly, Polemarch," she replied. "We feel it to be wiser."

The girl on the throne smiled sweetly back.

"I see now. You ask us to make an arrangement with you in secret?" she queried. "And ask us to break the one we have with them in like fashion?"

"That is so."

The polemarch's smile turned into a smirk.

"That only tells me you consider betrayal of a friend a trifling thing, Baroness Horyma," she said. "This counsels against the friendship you offer."

To be tricked by one so obviously younger than her did not sit well with Horyma, and it showed on her face for an instant.

"Not when ours would be a firmer friendship, Polemarch," she responded, recovering with the speed only a true courtier had. "We have a firmer, more lasting base for our alliance if only because its foundation would be a stronger cause: that of securing the integrity of the North. The Himeans do not belong here, unlike us. They are strangers who have come to intrude on our ways and colonise lands that were never really theirs to begin with, wresting them from local peoples who have lived here for ages before their own ships sailed to the shores of Argus. They are outsiders, in other words. If we, the true northern peoples, come together, we can repel these intruding foreigners from the north and take back what is rightfully our own. We can-

"Baroness," interrupted her auditor, raising a hand with the palm out. "I have heard enough. I have an answer."

Horyma quieted, hoping anxiously that the Otomeian would reward her with a positive response. The polemarch dashed Horyma's hopes to the ground with her next words, however.

"You ask us to make common cause with you," said the polemarch, whose face was suddenly looking haughtier by the second. "But all I have seen and heard advises me we have nothing in common."

"On the contrary, Polema-

"Am I finished, Baroness?" the polemarch demanded.

Horyma supposed she was not, and delivered an apology hastily.

"You hold to no oaths," the Otomeian continued, eyes narrowed; it was clear that the interruption had annoyed her. "You cleave to no promises. And your king is a man who once threatened to murder an enemy commander while under sacred terms of parley... then ran off chastised after the one he scolded him as one does a mere brat. This is the man who promises us so much? How does one trust promises from so ignoble a personage? You appear not to know us, Baroness. We Otomeians place not our faith in those who trade in the language of perfidy. Or the actions of cowardice."

Horyma swallowed at the scathing words, losing her smile.

"You do me a disservice by insulting my people and my liege so, Princess," she said stiffly.

"As you do me one by thinking me willing to play traitor." A look of frosty contempt followed the remark. "As well as to think my people capable of the same cowardly disloyalty that is becoming the mark of yours."

"I would have a care, Polemarch," Horyma warned. "You may find yourself regretting those words very soon. The tide is about to turn, and it will swallow the Himean side whole. You do not have to be among those drowned, but you will be if you fail to take advantage of this opportunity you are currently squandering."

"The quality of Mentulæan threats still fails to impress."

"That may change in the future when you have seen some of them realised. Please reconsider! I beg of you, for all our sakes, so that we may have fewer casualties in this war."

"I doubt that claim. I think the rebelling tribes of your empire's northern frontier would as well."

"Barbarians, nothing more! They are not on par with our peoples, Princess, and deserved every chastisement we gave them."

"For fighting chains you forced around their necks? Are they not also peoples of the north?"

"They are, in a way. But not peoples of the Mentulæan-or Otomeian-calibre."

"So you claim that some peoples are better than others."

"Of course. Just as a Mentulæan will always be a better friend than a Himean."

"Just as a Mentulæan will always be better than an Otomeian in your eyes, I know. Even my wooden leg itches. No part of me inclines to trusting you."

"Princess, please thi-!"

"Enough! You have my answer."

Horyma had been drawing up straighter and straighter in her chair throughout this exchange, and now she regarded the Otomeian noble with similarly rising suspicion, a prickly fear lifting the fine hairs on the back of her neck. It was time to make a retreat, before this apparently unpredictable princess got any ideas of doing something to her.

"Is there nothing at all that may make you reconsider your decision?" she asked. "Can nothing be said or done that would prompt you to think twice on the value of what I am offering?"

"Nothing."

"Not even ownership of Argus and partial ownership and management of its rich ports, perhaps?"

"We are not a seagoing people," the girl sniffed. "What do we care for Argus?"

Time to retreat indeed. Horyma bowed her head in defeat.

"Then, if such is truly your final answer, I shall take my leave now, Polemarch," she said, preparing to escape.

"You shall stay."

The hairs on Horyma's neck shot up like spikes.

"The princess has more to say?" she asked guardedly, anxiety boiling in her stomach.

"No," the polemarch told her. "But you do."

The suggestion was clear. Horyma looked around them. There was still only the other Otomeian, the beautiful whitish-blond one. She supposed the others were all outside, though, and waiting for her.

"The king will mark my absence," she protested.

"That is good. It shall give him our answer to his proposal."

Then the girl said something in her tongue, which Horyma naturally did not understand. It could have been a name, for all she knew. But it was more likely a command, for five of the black-garbed soldiers that had brought her here materialised in the room immediately afterwards.

The polemarch had turned to the soldier who had attended her throughout the interview: the beautiful, snowy-fair one.

"You wish to ask something?" she asked this soldier in the Himean tongue.

"My questioning can come later," the woman replied.

"Where shall we take her?"

"I've had a place prepared; I've some legionaries waiting outside for it already. I daresay she should be quite comfortable."

The brief exchange and the smirk of the snowy-haired "attendant" gave the baroness to understand the trick: that woman was not an attendant and most definitely not Otomeian.

"You accuse me of perfidy but practise it yourself, Polemarch," she said. "Are you even truly the polemarch? And this woman is what, a Himean?"

"I am the polemarch, yes," the girl replied. "As to her being Himean, I did not say otherwise."

"You said she was your attendant."

"Did she not attend me?"

Horyma snorted with annoyance.

"Now you take me captive," she accused, not even bothering to shrug off the hand one of her captors had put on her shoulder. "You insult our king while claiming that rules of honour are paramount. How can abduction of an envoy in a parley be honourable?"

The camouflaged Himean had stepped closer and was about to snap something to her at this; however, the woman was stayed by the Otomeian polemarch's hand brushing her arm.

The polemarch thus made the reply to Horyma's accusation, the steadiness of her voice chilling the captive not even because it sounded consciously cold; rather, it was that it was so strangely unexcited in the midst of the excitement that Horyma knew her abduction was. This awful girl, the baroness thought, had veins of ice.

"This is not parley, Baroness," the princess said. "You came to us not with a white flag but with black words. You sought us not in the day but in the night. You are not an envoy of peace but... but one of treachery. Do not speak of insult; you have insulted us more than we have you. To an Otomeian, honour is everything. Your offer has presumed that we have none."

The baroness apprehended it now: this had been a futile attempt from the beginning. The polemarch and the silver-haired Himean, whoever she was, had met with her tonight only to effect capture. Indignant and enraged at having been so roundly deceived by a people making war with her own, she stripped off her courtly composure and adopted a snarl that revealed all the serpentine malice she often kept hidden for the sake of political cunning and survival.

"I see how it is!" she said. "This was a trick from the beginning. This meeting was a farce."

"As was your offer. You would have turned on us at the first opportunity." The large eyes narrowed. "You think me a fool, Baroness. Had your proposal been genuine, you would also have offered a marriage of alliance between one of your royals and one of ours. It is possible with me, even. But you had no intent of staying tied to us after the war, so you included no such proposition."

"If that is what you want, I can arrange for it to happen!"

"No, thank you, I would not deign to marry a Mentulaean. Nor would any of my cousins, I think."

"You, Polemarch, are a treacherous cunnus," Horyma spat, frustrated beyond belief.

"And your mother mated with a weasel."

After a moment where it seemed even the seething captive paused to consider the odd retort, Horyma drew herself up again and recovered her awful glare, dropping her voice to convey what she had to say in the most menacing tones possible.

"This is the height of barbarity," she started. "And one day, I predict even very soon, you will have cause to repine at your actions, Polemarch. You may take me captive now, but you-"

She was unable to continue, having been gagged by one of the soldiers at Natsuki's command. The girl looked over the now-silenced captive with what was obviously puzzlement written all over her young face.

"The defeated make speeches only in theatre," she said with a note of instruction, as if trying to explain to the woman something of which the latter must not have been aware. "This is not theatre."

At her behest, the baroness was finally taken away, all thunder and muffled mutters as her guards directed her. The party left two women behind, one of whom watched them go with tears of mirth in her eyes.

The chuckling woman stepped in front of the polemarch's chair.

"A weasel?" she asked laughingly, now speaking in Greek as well.

"She insulted me," explained Natsuki, looking both hurt and dignified.

"So she did. I admit that the Hellenic one is not a great language for insults. Still, you do not curse often, I take it."

Shizuma held out a hand to help the girl up just as more troopers entered the room and bowed to them.

"If they're here to assist you to your tent, do send them away," she proposed. "I can serve as your attendant for a while longer and shall bring you and your pet safely to your lodgings myself later. For now, I invite you to come and have a nice hot dinner with me-and before you protest, I already had the cooks prepare some dishes from the list my dearest, silliest cousin gave me detailing the things you like to eat best. Consider it a special dinner to celebrate tonight. I daresay we deserve it!"

Natsuki agreed.

"Now then, it went well, I think," Shizuma said once the troopers had left, bringing the chairs with them as well as the dismantled dais. She held out her arm and asked the girl to take it so that they could walk together. Shizuki padded next to her owner, brushing against the girl's leg every few steps or so. "Though you said this was not theatre earlier, you must surely admit it had a touch of the theatrical about it. That aside, what do you think of how this went?"

"Yes, it was not bad," Natsuki said. "Above all, it is good she came to see me."

"Well, that is what I meant. Because of their attempt at wooing your people over, we now have a possible source of valuable information in our hands. I'm quite sure we can manage to get more from her."

But Natsuki shook her dark head.

"It is good," she said, "that she agreed to come to me in particular, is what I intended to say. It gives us perhaps more, hmm, valuable information than we can get from her by interrogation."

"How so?"

"All the people in this camp and our army know I am your cousin's mistress," the girl said in her lovely, measured Attic. "If the Mentulaeans approach me, it signifies they have no agents among us. One would not consciously choose the enemy's mistress as the party to tempt into treachery."

Shizuma's steps slowed and she looked down at the girl on her arm, astonished.

"Were you not my cousin's mistress, Natsuki, I would now strive to make you mine," she told her.

"But I am your cousin's mistress," Natsuki responded after a cough, a nearby torch showing the blush on her cheeks. "And as I said, it is fortunate that all know it."

Shizuma smiled and looked up again.

"Yes," she said. "You are probably right about that."

Chapter 63

Tardy apologies to those who sent private messages for not replying, and my thanks to all those who sent greetings for the holidays. I have been unwell, as usual, but am now recovering quite nicely.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Sagittarii (L.) - quite obviously, "archers".

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru saw her mistress again on the ninth day of April, when she and a troop of riders cobbled together from members of the Ninth and its Otomeian cavalry contingent rode into the Himean headquarters near the river. Her first thought upon riding in with their escorts—they were accompanied by auxiliary scouts they had encountered in the last leg of the journey—was that all long-term base camps ended up looking like each other, regardless of location. Himean armies were always prepared to make a familiar home in a foreign land on campaign, and nowhere did it show so much as in their long-term base camps, which often turned into small towns in their own right.

It all began with the essential square layout, scaled up to allow for the presence of more than the normal number of legions and their supplies. You had proper stone houses replacing the usual leather tents, sturdy buildings intended for the officers' comfort during long campaigns. You had thicker-than-usual walls topped with a multitude of towers and battlements for added protection against sieges. You had too the constant motion all healthy towns did, the people loading and unloading wagons in every open space, the incessant calls of slavers and purveyors, the warnings of riders weaving through the obstacles, and of course the coos of the camp prostitutes, who plied their trade by the gates. Seeing a male one trying to send a salacious invitation to her bareheaded Otomeian companions, Shizuru grinned hugely under her scarf. The lad would fare better targeting her people instead.

Her troop rode into the open courtyard of the camp, yelling for assistance with their mounts. These were not the horses they had used at the start of their journey: those had been exhausted long before and had been traded for fresh beasts at the outpost where they met their escorts. In a bid to arrive at their destination earlier, the riders had used the new horses even more ruthlessly than the previous ones, covering what should have taken at least two days of already hard riding in one. The animals they rode to camp were thus steaming with heat, trembling viciously from their heroic effort; all could see swift care was needed if they were not to become martyrs.

Shizuru dismounted with the rest, stepping aside when helping hands reached for her horse. Since she was so much taller than the rest of the Himeans in the group and since they all wore plain riding gear, they mistook her as an Otomeian first and paid her no mind, the first officers to arrive on the scene actually demanding of the other (clearly shorter and Himean) riders who was in charge. Shizuru pulled off her scarf at that, prompting cries of surprise and a scurry of people. She accepted a wineskin from one of the first to reach her.

"Jupiter, General, it's good to see your face around these parts!" he said, saluting. The man was one of her old centurions. "We got no messages of your approach though, if you sent any."

She wiped her lips with a thumb and handed back the wineskin.

"I sent none," she said. "Had that message been intercepted, we would have had to fight our way through the forces of Dis to get here."

She smiled at the others, waving a hand to indicate acknowledgement of their salutes so they could drop them.

"I left Nakamura-han in charge of the Ninth and the other southwest legions-all's well on the Southwest Frontier, lads, so no worries," she said, slapping the centurion on his back. "About time I got all of you to work too, however, since I see you're all getting fat from laziness. Aren't you popping out of your cuirass yet, Araragi-han?"

There was a chorus of laughter and good-natured jeering at the centurion, who bared his teeth happily.

"Fancy myself about to pop out of it soon, General, so a decent workout'd be welcome, by god!" he said, patting his belly. "The husband would complain faster than fire if I came back chubbier than our pigs-might even send me back to the army until you whip me into shape!"

"I shall do my best to spare you from that fate, Centurion. The senior legate?"

"She rode out about an hour earlier, General. Went to do a survey o' the roadwork."

"When is she expected back?"

"Should be any minute now, General, but we can send word."

"Good. And the Otomeian Polemarch?"

Another centurion answered this time, another of her old boys.

"In the other camp, General," he said, pushing past some other soldiers to get nearer. "Want us to fetch her?"

"If you knew the lady in question, Horikawa-han, you would know that one does not presume to send just anyone to fetch her," Shizuru said, winking at him. "No, get me a fresh horse. That one shall die if it goes another step, poor animal, and I'd not impose on it any longer."

The order was seen to with the speed its giver merited: Shizuru was seated on a new horse mere seconds after her demand.

"I shall ride over there myself," she told them after ensuring there were people going to take care of the riders who had come with her. "Even a princess should not be too insulted if a commander is the one to fetch her, don't you think?"

"I think she'd be right flattered by it, General," one grinned. "We'll send for the senior legate."

"Simply inform her that I am here. We can find each other later."

She rode out of the crowd and the camp again and took the track towards the river. The bridge was not far and she a moment to inspect it. She saw with approval that the abutments had already been reinforced and made sturdier: that was good, since the river would be engorged soon by the fullness of spring. The ordnances too were suitably menacing, seemingly aimed her way once she stood on the bridge itself. The latter were seated on the battlements of the other, slightly smaller camp across the river, which was her destination.

When she entered that camp, she knew at once that no riders had managed to go ahead yet to inform people here of her arrival: her entry broke the banality of the bustle near the gates. There was a stir when the first person to recognise her pointed her out and many of the people who approached her wore astonishment on their faces.

"The Polemarch?" she called, smiling broadly to let the people around her know not to worry over her sudden appearance: she did not want them interpreting it as portent of some disaster. Several voices answered her question, informing her that their polemarch-most of the inhabitants of this camp were Otomeian-had already retired to her lodgings. These were situated at the centre of this camp, just as Shizuru knew her own quarters would be waiting for her at the centre of the other.

She was not surprised by that parallelism: or not that much, she thought. Still, it was an interesting point, as it revealed the authority her girl held among the Otomeians now that she was polemarch. She held the distinction of being their first polemarch, even, and that alone would keep her name living forever in their political history.

Fitting, in Shizuru's estimation. Her girl deserved no less.

Suddenly she thought of the woman who had created the title and position, the woman who was at once ally and rival. This woman was the force responsible for clearing the riverine Mentulaean territories and outposts near their base camp, playing a pivotal role in assuring the base camp's safety. This area of operation meant that the woman had to be staying nearby even now, if not in one of the twinned riverside camps themselves. Her lips thinned at the idea; Alyssa had surely been exploiting this easy access to Natsuki throughout the past months, probably trying to work on the girl to consider her suit instead of Shizuru's own proposal. Granted, Natsuki had promised that she was not considering the other princess's offer of marriage to her, but that did little to sweeten the sourness in Shizuru's mouth. Shizuru grudged Alyssa any time spent with her girl because she saw it as time stolen from her.

She rode straight down the road. Even though it ended up being occupied mostly by auxiliaries, the camp had still been built by Himean surveyors and architects, and with the explicit purpose of looking like a heavily fortified Himean base. Thus the layout followed the classic Himean one, and the commander's-or in this case, Polemarch's-quarters and other officers' houses were found in the innermost part of the square. The area holding the Polemarch's house, also known as the praetorium in Himean terminology, served as the central point where two main roads of the camp met: the via principalis connecting the gates of east and west, and the via praetoria connecting the gates of north and south. As these roads were perpendicular to each other, the praetorium in effect was the heart of a crucifix, accessible in a straight line from whichever gate one happened to use upon entering the camp.

Shizuru jumped off her horse once almost at her destination, ignoring the spatters of dirt this left on her calves. She led her horse forward the rest of the way and handed its reins to a servant when one materialised. He had chanced upon her while coming out of the very house she was paying a visit to, a bucket full of scrolls dropping from his grasp in surprise.

She rescued the scrolls from the muddy ground for him and handed them over as well: he bowed nearly to his waist in gratitude, knowing as well as she did that his mistress would not have taken kindly to it had the books been ruined.

"Inside?" she mouthed, holding a finger beside her nose. The slave-who would know his mistress's lover anywhere-shut his mouth upon seeing what she meant to do, staying all thoughts of addressing her with her title. His mistress had the ears of a hunting owl, and he might ruin the surprise. He smiled back shyly instead and nodded at the army's commander.

She mouthed another word when he looked up again: Alone?

A negative answer.

"Servants or someone else?" she whispered.

"One servant," he whispered back.

Shizuru pointed to her horse as indication that she wanted him to see to the animal. She slipped into the house as quietly as she could after that, hoping to catch her lover off-guard. As it turned out, she was fortunate enough to enter the house while the girl's back was turned to the door. Even so, she ended up squandering the opportunity for her prank the moment she registered the more consequential of the things that filled her vision.

The Polemarch of the Otomeians was on her feet, her figure straight and unbroken.

"And I thought I was the one giving you a surprise," Shizuru breathed.

There was an inhalation and a crash. The sound of earthenware skittering over the floor prefaced an oath; Shizuru ran up in unison with a servant who issued from another doorway inside the house, and both of them crouched at the stunned woman's feet. Both went instinctively to the same thing, but the servant ceded that duty to her mistress's lover after recognising her. Instead, she busied herself with picking away the scattered fragments of pottery while Shizuru checked to see that the shattered cup had not harmed the polemarch's form. It took but a few moments to reassure herself that there were no wounds on the girl's foot or leg, and she got up again, taking the Otomeian's hand and pressing it in remorse.

"Forgive me, Natsuki," she said, her brow knotted in self-censure. "It was juvenile to try to startle you that way. Are you hurt? Did it hit you?"

The hand she was holding escaped and flew to her face. It made contact with her cheek and stayed there.

"You are here," the Otomeian whispered.

"You are standing," the Himean countered.

They enjoyed looking at each other for a moment, each clearly taking pleasure in that simple evaluation; the third woman in the room had swept into a cloth all the cup's fragments big enough to be picked up by then, and she slid out of the room under the mannerly pretext of their disposal. Once she had gone, Shizuru picked up her lover to heave onto a table.

"Still weigh like a bag of feathers, little bird?" she teased, setting the Otomeian on the table's edge. "Perch there for a bit and let me take a peek at this contraption, please. I take it this is the final design?"

She pushed Natsuki's dress above the knees and admired the prosthesis attached to the Otomeian's left leg. It did not take long for her eyes to come to a conclusion: the artisans who crafted it had done superb work. The upper part of the prosthesis was a leather buckle that fastened over the girl's knee and thigh. This buckle was what held on a wooden leg that she guessed to have a hollow at the top, for Natsuki's stump disappeared partly into it. It was the polished shaft of the leg that drew one's attention, though, so anyone else would probably have instantly dismissed the genius of the mechanics for the genius of the aesthetics. As it was, she took her time to admire the practical intelligence behind the object before moving on to the effort expended on its presentation.

That effort had been considerable, she saw instantly. The grain of the wooden shaft was evanescent, a marbled pattern of remarkable delicacy, and the colour was of such lightness that it did not present as stark a contrast to Natsuki's remaining leg as she had initially feared. Whoever had performed the carving had possessed good knowledge of human anatomy too: the form had been given so much attention that the faint depression where the calf muscle split down the middle had been shaped as well, a subtle detail that surprised her. Below the taper of the ankle was another joint, one to which the false foot had been attached. This was just as realistic as the leg, five perfect toes carved lovingly into the end, and Shizuru guessed that the makers of the device had actually used the toes of Natsuki's remaining foot as a reversed model because of the symmetry when she compared the wooden to the living one.

"A final design, no," Natsuki eventually said, her eyes still blinking widely at her lover as if unable to cast off her initial astonishment at the latter's presence. And indeed, she reached out to brush the older woman again with the lightest of fingers, like one obsessed with proving something to be tangible.

"It is possible improvements may be made on it in the future," she murmured. "So, a final design, no... A working design, yes."

Shizuru chuckled, feeling the wooden foot with growing admiration; the artisans had even bothered to articulate the metatarsus where the bones rose under the skin.

"I missed that awful seriousness of yours, Natsuki," she told her. "How does it do then, this working design?"

"It works," Natsuki said.

"I also missed that humour."

"You said I was serious."

"Yes, but you are also complicated."

Shizuru ran a hand next over the leather around the knee, feeling over its edge and reaching the thick bandages around the Otomeian's thigh. She could feel fingers doing their own inspection of her shoulders, palming their trim muscle over her riding cloak.

"The bandages are quite tight," she observed. "Are they comfortable?"

"Yes."

"Must they be so tight?"

"The medicus says I must keep them tight to avoid, umm, chafing."

"I see. Did he say anything else?"

"That it was good, the leg."

"He was right. I am pleased with it."

"Also, I am to change these-" Natsuki pointed to the bandages running from thigh to knee "-often for clean ones. He says it will avoid itches and other problems."

"Yes, that makes sense. I always believed a lot of ailments affecting the skin were rooted in unwholesome hygiene. Illness delights in grime, and may even reside primarily in it."

The hand on her shoulder reached for her face once more: this time, it caressed her chin. She looked up to see familiar green eyes inspecting her curiously, that old cat's look in them.

"Shizuru," her lover said, giving her the smile that always made her breath catch. "You are white again."

The Otomeian pushed Shizuru's hair away. Days of hard riding had turned Shizuru's more rebellious locks downright disloyal, however, and the dust-stiffened curls resisted her. More than a few wisps licked at the Himean's face despite her best efforts and, after repositioning her hands several times and still failing to tame Shizuru's mane, the younger woman ended up just blowing at them, to Shizuru's amusement.

Natsuki headed off any more laughter with a kiss, licking Shizuru's lips afterwards as if to wet them for her. Her tongue was soft, but it stripped both salt and sand from the surface. She did it again tenderly, and it was Shizuru who quailed out of shame for her unwashed state.

" Mea vita, I do not want you to have to taste all the dirt in which my journey has bemired me," she said half-heartedly, barely able to get the words out because Natsuki's tongue kept licking at her.

"Silly," the younger woman responded. "You forgot."

"Forgot?"

"The balm." Another lick. "Your poor lips, Shizuru!"

And then Shizuru remembered: she had indeed forgotten to pack some of the balm Natsuki had given her for her journey. The young woman had stuffed two small jars of it into her pack when they had parted in Argus, but it had slipped Shizuru's mind to bring some for her ride from Asterion to the riverside base. As a result, the last remnants of the winter wind had left tiny cracks on her lips, which was partly why she took to covering her face with a scarf in the last leg of their travels.

"I did forget, fool tha-"

"Shhh."

She quieted, resigning herself with guilty pleasure to the sensation of Natsuki's tongue cleaning her lips. It was marvellous how delicate Natsuki could be even in such a thing, she thought, for the touches of that soft muscle held all the girl's typical accuracy, never going over her lips' edges or slipping too far between them. At first, anyway.

"I should probably see Shizuma first," Shizuru protested when the animal grooming began to develop into something else. She knew her body was speaking its disagreement with her statement loudly, but she also knew that she had gone too long without her lover to be satisfied with mere kisses or licks-or with a single instant of blind relief, for that matter. Her cousin would end up waiting tonight and all of the morrow for her if she did not stop this quickly enough. And she had to bathe too, good heavens! She was surprised Natsuki could even bear to kiss her given the state she was in, dusted in the dirt one tended to pick up on long journeys without roadside inns or proper shelter. One could only do so much with a rag and river water. Yes, it was only right to cleanse herself before doing anything intimate. It was also only proper to confer with Shizuma first. Now if only this beautiful girl would stop trying to make her forget about all these accursed proprieties, her life would perhaps follow her intended order.

"Natsuki, pardon me, I smell of my journey-"

"You smell of horses," was the response, followed by another knee-wrecking kiss. Shizuru's hands scrabbled for the table for support when Natsuki tickled her ear with a finger, doing it with enough sloth to mimic a tongue's cruelty. "You are still ticklish here, Shizuru?"

She chuckled softly as Shizuru shuddered, and the low sound of her amusement pressed the claws of desire deeper into the Himean's gut.

"I should really see my cousin first, as would be the proper order of things," Shizuru gasped again when allowed to breathe. The other woman ignored this and proceeded to turn her knees into jelly once more, only pausing to mutter a retort when Shizuru repeated the protest through gritted teeth.

"If I said that to you, Shizuru, you would make the threat to kill my cousin," the Otomeian pointed out.

Shizuru's shoulders shook with laughter, distracted by the statement.

"What? You really do think me a hasty hothead, don't you?" she said.

"You are."

"I have a temper, I admit. Do you not, yourself?"

"It is so," Natsuki frowned. "But I would not threaten to kill your cousin!"

"I never said anything about killing her: you were the one who phrased it so. Besides, the most I would do is maim yours."

"That is very temperate, yes."

"'Very' is never paired with 'temperate', mea vita. They are at odds with each other."

"Like your words and your hands."

Her fingers were covering Natsuki's breasts. When she had slipped the shoulders of the dress down Natsuki's arms she had no idea, but she was suddenly all too aware of when she had last seen this body-or this chest, at least-bared in invitation to her.

"I hate not being able to see you for so long," she confessed with a frown, suddenly remembering all the nights of longing she had been forced to endure during her time away from her girl. Her hands stayed on the Otomeian's breasts as she talked, and she revelled in the sounds she plucked out whenever she tested a petal-soft tip. "It does not feel right to be away from you when I have only just found you again. All the more as I always feel so restless nowadays. I hate the feeling."

"Restless?" Natsuki echoed, her own hands splayed out on Shizuru's stomach, over her tunic. She caressed the Himean's belly that way, feeling for the familiar grooves of the muscles where they divided. "All right, Shizuru?"

"Oh I am. Do not worry, it is merely restlessness, probably due to everything I realise I have still to do. And I suppose it is only this war."

"It goes well."

"It does. But it shall keep going for quite a while yet."

"No matter. You will win."

"You mean we will win, Natsuki."

"No. You are the general. To no one else will the victory belong as much as to you."

She regarded the girl with great affection, unable to stop her eyes from roaming that dear face hungrily. One of her palms rested on yet more familiar territory, finding the bare arch of the small of the other's back.

"I have seen some of the Mentulaean country over the past months while we were apart, you know, and have finally experienced its size," she said conversationally while feeling the other's skin, running rough palms over it and enjoying the feminine sound of pleasure that elicited. "Not that I was surprised by its breadth, having studied their land on our maps long before. But it is still different, seeing something on a map and traversing it yourself."

Natsuki nodded.

"Size is not felt by the eye," she offered.

"Precisely. This is an enormous country, my love. What I have seen of it is not even an eighth of the whole, in fact. What I have already seen of its armies and fortresses are not the ones we are going to be fighting, for that matter. Those were reserves and un-militarised towns, little more."

Natsuki had succeeded in undoing her cloak. The Otomeian dropped it to the floor and started her own exploration atop the riding tunic, hands slipping over the fabric and mapping the body she had been missing. Shizuru kept talking.

"I am not worried about the outcome of this war, meum mel, for there is no doubt that we shall win. But how long before that and how many stupid, unnecessary sacrifices shall be made before the enemy realises that? Will they force me to annihilate them instead of conquering them? Will they realise the inevitability of Hime's victory quickly enough for me not to have to battle Senate for a second command? I doubt it. I doubt five years shall be enough to make an empire of this size lie down."

She smiled when the girl put an ear against her breast, unable to find the heart to give another warning on the grubbiness of her apparel.

"I was sleeping a few nights ago under the sky and looking at the stars," she said instead. "Romantic as it sounds, I saw in them all of a sudden the many lights I shall have to battle for the next years, perhaps the next decade even, just to achieve what I must. And my gravest enemies are not Mentulaeans. I may have left Hime with an army in my command, but I also left it a city of people ready to stab me in the back."

"I will kill them first," Natsuki uttered, jerking upwards abruptly. Shizuru smiled at the promise, thumbing the huge black pearl dangling between the girl's breasts. How right she had been to give her a black one! It stood out so well against her paleness, and it was unusual enough to be unique. It was a physical metaphor for the girl and her perfection, a huge and flawlessly spherical droplet of mystery and iridescence, the whole of it bounded in smoke.

"I meant it figuratively," she told her.

"I was literal."

"And I believe my foes would be wise to fear such a threat from you. Thank the gods you need not do anything of the sort, however. As it is, all you need do is be near. All my worries are insignificant with your strength beside me."

Who ever thought Natsuki's lips mute, she asked herself in their embrace. They were often speechless, perhaps, but far from unspeaking. Indeed, these were lips that produced the best kind of rhetoric: they spoke replies that one's whole body fell into, soft but articulate responses that persuaded beyond reason and logic.

She was in the middle of surrendering to their seduction when it was cut short, disrupted by the creak of the door as someone opened it and breezed in, shutting the door again efficiently upon entry. There was no slam with the final movement, but the click of the door falling into place was sharp and interruptive, as was the cut-off where the intruder's voice died in the middle of pronouncing the polemarch's name.

"Natsu-"

The intruder shifted backwards gawkily, too startled by what she had walked into to look away. It did not take a great deal to surprise this intruder, granted, but it did take a great deal to fluster her-and the sight of her cousin with hands up someone's skirt, the intruder thought, certainly did the job.

She cleared her throat and faked a recovery that was not really there yet.

"My apologies," she said, managing a saturnine expression only through monumental effort. "I was looking for Natsuki so I could inform her of your sudden arrival, Shizuru, but I suppose I should have expected you to find her even faster than I would. Still, I had expected you to restrain yourself enough to wash off the grime of your travels before canoodling with the poor girl."

Shizuru rolled her eyes and adjusted her position to better hide said girl, who had burrowed into the cave of her arms and chest upon the senior legate's entrance.

"You are the one who walked into someone's quarters unannounced-you have a bad habit of doing that, by the way-so do not lecture me on restraint, Shizuma. But yes, I was just about to get a bath anyway."

"With what, her tongue?"

"Ribald jokes at the smallest opportunity. That demonstrates grave lack of restraint. As I was saying, I was about to call for a bath to prepare for our meeting. Can you give me half an hour? We can talk in my quarters. I assume Hermias has seen to them in my absence in the other camp."

"Your pretty little Greek is efficient as ever, yes," Shizuma said, folding her arms and trying to look Shizuru's way without including in her view what showed of the polemarch's naked torso, much of which was still visible despite Shizuru's shielding arms. "I'll go and inform him now, so do not bother sending a messenger yourself. Unless you've some special instructions for him?"

"No, thank you. Simply tell him to prepare for our meeting."

"Very well."

She turned around and reached for the door-handle.

"Make it an hour instead, Shizuru," she said in parting. "We can talk over dinner that way. Do remember though, cousin, that it is bad manners to make someone wait, even if the reason for tardiness is a beautiful woman without clothing."

After which shot she left the pair to deal with their embarrassment. One clearly had to deal with more than the other, however, and as soon as Shizuma left she pushed Shizuru away with a groan.

"Do not worry about it, Natsuki," Shizuru said, watching the girl pull up her dress. "My cousin has seen far more explicit things in her time, some even orgiastic. Shizuma is no blushing conservative to be scared away by the sight of two lovers in embrace."

Natsuki cast her the sort of look that tempted her to feel her face in case tentacles had sprouted from it.

"I am a princess of Otomeia," the girl gasped.

Shizuru nodded slowly at that, which seemed to spur Natsuki onto another similarly obvious pronouncement.

"She is the senior legate, you are the commander of this army!"

Again she said it in a way that signified that it mattered. Shizuru held back a sigh and supposed it did matter—at least to the girl's prudish nature. She herself had already set aside her embarrassment from earlier. That was her nature, just as it was Natsuki's to dwell on every minor (in Shizuru's opinion) guilt. Besides, the Himean had also anticipated Natsuki's reaction, turning her attention away from her own sense of propriety and focusing it instead on protecting the girl from this very Otomeian sense of shame.

"Better she than someone else, you might consider," she tried. "Shizuma is my cousin. She would be your cousin too were you my wife already. Think of it that way. At least it was family and not some stranger or ranker who burst upon us."

Again the look. She actually felt her face this time, but of course found no tentacles there.

"You think that improves it?" the Otomeian said, aghast. "Had it been my cousin-!"

She broke off there, seemingly too horrified by the thought to voice the hypothesis. For her part, Shizuru grinned. She did not find the thought unattractive, especially considering her rivalry with said cousin, and now put both hands on the girl's thighs.

"Think she would throw an apple at us?" she asked.

Natsuki's look was glacial.

"How is it you can jest at this, Shizuru?" she growled.

"How is it you cannot?" Shizuru retorted gamely, prompting the girl to shake her head in ruefulness. The Otomeian had apparently given up on trying to make the Himean understand the shame, for her next words were spoken in her people's language instead.

"This is because your nature is one governed by humour," she groaned, "and mine by gravity."

Shizuru regarded the girl in silence then, barely able to suppress her smile as she watched the Otomeian all but chew her fingernails. She made a decision then for the sake of jolting Natsuki from her worries: she chose to pull out a surprise she had originally intended to reveal later. Well, she supposed the timing did not much matter. What mattered was the reaction.

"That is exactly why we are a good match, you know," she said, using the same language the girl had spoken. "Surely you can appreciate what we provide each other that way."

Natsuki was arrested and her jaw actually hung open.

"You know my tongue," she whispered later, still in Otomeian.

"And you know mine," Shizuru returned, also in Otomeian.

"You know my tongue!" Natsuki repeated, holding the older woman's neck in both hands. It was clear she had no intention of letting her get away without getting answers to this fresh mystery first and Shizuru submitted gleefully to this captivity. "Shizuru, how is it you know my tongue?"

"I studied it. I have been studying it for months now, in fact," Shizuru revealed, pleased by her success at diverting the girl. "Even when I was marching with the Ninth and Thirteenth over the Calydonian Alps, I was always talking to an officer who knew how to speak it."

She tilted her head at her lover, who was still regarding her with wonder.

"How do you like it?" she asked.

"It pleases me," the Otomeian answered, cheeks a lovely pink. "Buh-buh-beyond words!"

"Good. I learned it primarily to please you, after all. No doubt you can improve my vocabulary in it, which is still quite limited."

"Yes. Yes, I will."

"I shall look forward to that, then. But for now I should probably see to my bath so I can meet my cousin. The sooner I get that over with, the sooner we can talk to each other at length privately, no?"

The Otomeian exhaled at the reminder, eyes still bright from this new discovery.

"Yes," she said. "First a bath. Wait, Shizuru. Oh, and please?"

She dipped her chin and eyes as if to indicate herself. The Himean understood and lifted her off the table. She picked up the cane on the floor too, which the Otomeian had dropped earlier in surprise. Natsuki took it and went to the door to summon the slave who had been gone to wait politely outside during their reunion.

"You shall bring water for the commander's bath," she said to the woman. "Find hot water. She must be finished in under an hour, so either you shall find it soon or not at all. If the latter, cool water shall do, but you shall bring more braziers here to warm the room."

"It will be done, Princess. We're to use your bath?"

"Yes."

"It will be done."

"You shall also send two riders for clothes for the commander from the other camp. Ask to see Hermias or Aella."

"It will be done."

"You may go."

She said all of this to the woman in her language, of course, and the listening Shizuru translated it eagerly for all that it was merely everyday conversation between a domina and her slave. It was fascinating to finally be able to assign clear meaning to the once-foreign utterances her girl made. She had spent so long treating them as part of the incomprehensible mystique of the Otomeian that to now be able to understand them felt like an invasion of someone's power, akin to forcing a magician to reveal the secrets behind the magic words. Unlike with magicians, though, this was no disappointing revelation. Her girl did not need simulated mystery to radiate true strength.

The slave called others into the room from the doorway and Natsuki continued with her instructions. Meanwhile, something furry brushed against Shizuru's legs. She bent over and saw that her lover's pet was under the table. It had been curled up in one of the couches against the wall earlier, but she had not noticed it then because it was in a shadow.

"There you are, Shizuki," she murmured, crouching to pet the animal. She did it slowly in case it might be alarmed, but it sniffed at her face without suspicion; she was gratified, amazed that the animal always managed to remember her. "Have you been guarding your mistress for me? What a good little kitten you are."

"It is because you say such things that your cousin thinks you mad sometimes," Natsuki said, amusement running through her voice;

she had finished giving her orders. "Shizuki is not a kitten."

"Perhaps not to others," Shizuru replied. "But to me, she shall always be the little kitten you used to pop into your saddlebag."

"Much time has passed. She... no, all of us have grown since."

"True. We have grown old enough to think of marriage since then, wouldn't you say?"

A roll of low laughter. It was even more powerfully affecting than Shizuru remembered, and it made the hair rise all over her arms.

"Shizuru, really," Natsuki sighed once she had finished laughing. She walked off to a corner of the room, the sound of her steps uneven because the near-silent fall of the right was punctuated by two solid sounds from the left: one from the leg and one from the cane. She returned with a cup, which she filled with water.

"Thank you," Shizuru said upon being offered the drink, downing it in a series of gulps. Riding was always thirsty work, all the more so when it was the sort of riding she had just done. She watched Natsuki watching her from the corner of one eye as she drank and said after she was done: "So you were installed in what would presumably be the commander's quarters in this camp, hmm?"

"I am the Polemarch of the Otomeians, General."

Shizuru smirked at the girl's taunt.

"So why are your house's furnishings Himean, Polemarch of Otomeia?" she asked. "I expected you to fill this place with your low tables and floor pillows."

"Most of these, your cousin had sent over." A squint. "I could not refuse."

"Pushed them on you, did she?"

"No. I was grateful. She chose them with care." Natsuki looked around the room, the expression in her eyes oddly critical. Shizuru understood it with her next words. "I thought too, once you returned... it would be more comfortable for you so."

"It was thoughtful of you, and I do approve. You do realise, though, that you are acting as lady of the house-of my house, more to the point?"

"I thought this was my house?" Natsuki smirked.

"Of course. But this is my army."

The Otomeian angled her head to one side to let Shizuru kiss her cheek more easily.

"They say patience is a virtue one must learn for marriage," she said, humming into the touch; Shizuru caught her by the slim column of her waist. "For a happy one, at least."

"Are you saying I am impatient?" Shizuru asked, dragging her lips to the edge of an eyebrow.

"I am saying I ask for more time," Natsuki responded, ducking her head to avoid the last kiss: her servants were coming out of the bedroom. These bowed to the two women and said they were going to check on the water.

Natsuki reached for her lover's hand. She led the Himean into the other room, the one where the servants had been working. It was the bedroom, and a spacious one too. There was sufficient space to put an open study in one corner, along with several shelves stuffed with scrolls and wax tablets. Shizuru could see a map spread out on the desk. The actual sleeping area was to the other end of the room and there Shizuru saw the signs again of the girl's culture asserting itself, dense furs and Otomeian rugs being concentrated in that space.

The girl led her neither to the sleeping area nor the study, guiding her past the latter and to a table and two couches at one end of the room. There was an open door there and Shizuru glimpsed what was in the third room of Natsuki's house. Inside that room were more braziers and the copper-coloured tub she was going to be using.

"Do you have your own cistern?" she asked. The girl should have one installed in that room if she was right in thinking that the Himean army's builders had been the ones to construct the dwelling. "Were they able to dig a proper latrine with a drain down the river?"

"Yes. Yes."

"Good. I assume that means they managed to do the same for my house, then."

Natsuki bade her take a couch.

"There is bread and fruit here," she said, pointing to the table. "If you are hungry now."

Shizuru thanked her and declined. There was a knock from the door.

"Princess, we have the water," the servant from before said, entering.

Natsuki slid her eyes to the tub. The servant called to the others in response, directing them to the tub in the other room so they could start filling it. Meanwhile, their mistress slipped off the silver cuffs that adorned both her wrists. Shizuru watched with interest, thinking at first that the girl meant to join her in the bath, but deciding it was not that when Natsuki did not bother removing her other jewellery: the band of metal locked around an upper arm, for instance or the black pearl necklace. Instead, the Otomeian fetched a ribbon for herself from somewhere and used that to tie up her hair, the black sweep of it reduced to a tail that hung almost to the small of her back. Shizuru's hands itched to grab it and pull the girl to her again with that leash.

"Kavine," Natsuki said, so quietly that Shizuru marvelled that the servant being called even heard her: the splash of water being poured into the tub had all but covered the sound.

Kavine approached her princess.

"One of the amphorae in the other room. The wine I bought-you remember?"

"Yes, Princess. Should I bring some?"

"Yes. An ewer of it with a goblet."

Kavine went off to do as bid, and Natsuki sat beside Shizuru again, the two of them holding hands placidly. It was at this time that the Himean remembered the precious little piece she had in her purse, a treasure she had found in one of the Mentulaean towns she had sacked and which she had brought back for Natsuki.

"No, it is not amber," she said when the girl asked. "Misleading, is it not? That comb is actually made from the shell of an animal-a turtle of the great seas, harvested for ages by the peoples of coastal Africa and the waters beyond. It is very highly prized indeed, and would fetch a small fortune back in Hime. I would not be surprised if that piece passed through Argus before ending up in the hands of some Mentulaeans. It has travelled far inland."

Natsuki held up the ornately carved comb and admired the acanthus patterns, putting it between herself and a lamp so she could see the faintly darker densities of it in the glow of the light.

"This must have been a handsome turtle," she deduced, speaking her language. "I wish I could see one as it must have been in life."

Once informed that the tub was nearly full, she put it carefully on the table and got up once more to inspect the bath. She found it satisfactory now, it seemed, for she sent the slaves out. Before they left, though, she had one of them pour the fetched wine for Shizuru. When they had left, she called the Himean to come into the washing room too and asked her to sit on one of the stools by the tub. She asked the older woman to take the one with a fur rug by it.

It was clear by this time that she intended to bathe Shizuru herself. Once the Himean was on the indicated stool, she followed and knelt on the rug, using it to cushion her knees; she then divested the seated woman of her shoes. She set these to one side and peeled off the socks as well before going on to the clothes, asking Shizuru to lift one arm or get up whenever necessary. Once the older woman was entirely naked, she took the basin of oil and started smoothing it onto Shizuru's skin with her hands, working it in with sufficient pressure to give the muscles underneath a massage.

Shizuru said nothing during this time, choosing to bask instead in the Otomeian's care. The wine she had brought in to drink while being bathed was superb. The braziers in the room were doing their job as well, and though she was without an inch of clothing and evening had set in, she felt nicely warm and comfy.

Once the massage was done, Natsuki put away the oil and started to work on her with the strigil. It was at this point that there was a knock from the bedroom door. It was followed by Kavine entering and saying that the general's head servant was outside: she had come back with the riders sent to fetch clothes from the other camp. The woman herself entered the room after Natsuki spoke the order to do so.

"Aella, how was the ride?" an oil-slick Shizuru said while grinning at her typically severe-looking servant. "Do Otomeian mounts agree with you?"

"We found little on which to argue, Domina." The woman approached and stood a respectful distance before the two, a cloth-wrapped bundle in her arms. "Can I help you or the Dominilla in any way?"

"I assume those are my clothes?"

"Yes, Domina, and a fresh pair of slippers and socks."

"Then you have already done your work. Leave them over there, please. Hermias is seeing to my quarters, I take it?"

"We kept it ready for you and open to the Dominilla at all times, Domina."

"Then you may return to the other camp for now, Aella. As you can see, I am in the Dominilla's very capable hands," Shizuru returned, smirking at Natsuki's colour. Even the girl's pass with the strigil faltered then, and she had to scrape the same area on one arm again.

Aella was nodding: "Very well, Domina. Have you any instructions for dinner?"

"No, you can surprise me. Considering what I have been eating on the road the past week, I shall be ecstatic even with just a well-seasoned porridge and some proper bacon."

"We shall surely do better than that, Domina."

"Then I am very eager to sit down to dinner."

Aella excused herself.

"Now then," Shizuru said some time later, Natsuki still working at her with the strigil. "I know you enjoy your silence, Natsuki, but do talk to me, please. I missed your voice."

Her lover glanced at her, smiling.

"I missed yours," said the Otomeian.

"Then let us talk, by god. My cousin would be put out if we started in on the military topics without her, but I think she would not complain too much if we covered only the basics, not the actual movements. That way, we do not bore each other later too with repetition of what we have already told each other in private."

"You never bore, Shizuru."

"Ecastor, I missed your voice indeed! Go on, keep talking!"

Natsuki's laugh slipped out and she listened to it delightedly.

"You know already, I think," said the Otomeian, "of the southward shift in their armies in the centre."

"Of course. It was my intention."

"Yes," said Natsuki. "Shizuma, she will tell you more. But for now, it is enough to say that the army that was at Lasandre left to move south a week ago."

It was Shizuru's laugh that now slipped out: Natsuki was on point with her, as usual. Lasandre was the nearest large city close to the river that had yet to be taken by their boundary forces, and unlike the cities Shizuru had been razing thus far in the south, it was one of the true fortresses of the Mentulaeen Empire. It would take effort and time to force its gates open, but that did not dent Shizuru's confidence in her eventual conquest of it in the least. And once they had Lasandre, they would have a serious foothold in the centre already, a place from which to launch assaults on nearby cities-including the enemy capital, Gorgo.

Besides that, taking Lasandre was also intended to be a demonstration. It would tell the Mentulaeans that even their best forts, their great citadels, could not keep a Fujino out when she wanted in.

"They say it is on a great fortress, one with true walls," Natsuki told her. "They mean by this that the Mentulaeans have fortresses that are not great or that do not have true walls?"

"Yes," Shizuru confirmed. "Those were the ones I saw, meum mel."

"In their Southern Frontier?"

Shizuru nodded and Natsuki asked her to describe them, demanding to know what fortresses without "true walls" were like.

"Wooden," Shizuru explained. "The large towns of their south were similar to our camps, and most of them had walls made of wood. This ties in with what Yamada-han told me-and which our new allies in the Southern Frontier confirmed to me when I did some digging-which is that the Mentulaeans are not known for their quarrymen. The few quarries in operation here are further to their west and north, I believe. Here and in the south, stone is generally a precious commodity to them. Hence the predominant use of timber."

"But not of oak."

"No, not of oak," Shizuru agreed. She lifted her arm when Natsuki requested it. "I suppose it would be too much to hope that they all get done in by a bit of mushroom-picking around their oaks in the summer."

Natsuki had finished with the strigil. She invited Shizuru to enter the tub and afterwards asked what she had meant.

"The death cap, mea vita," came the explanation. "A lethal mushroom that tends to grow at the base of oaks. I shall show it to you once that you may know and mark it. It looks benign but its reality cannot be further from its looks. Himeans have been wary of it ever since it was first discovered to mimic the appearance of some of edible mushrooms in our country. No doubt it is seen here as well-be you warned not to pick just any mushroom you see, especially ones at the foot of an oak."

Natsuki promised that she would not and said she would like to see such a dangerous mushroom when opportunity afforded it. It was something worth learning, she said.

"But Shizuru, I learned something," she added. "It is of their druids, their faith. The Mentulaeans' faith."

"What of it?"

"Their druids teach that they have what we call spirits. Human spirits. That they live on after death, as my people believe."

"Ah, yes."

"But to them, they live on by returning to this world as - as - hmm - as other lives."

"Yes, I know." Shizuru pulled up the information she had stored away in her mind on the subject. "They assert that the souls of their people who die return in other bodies, living out new lives by having their spirits recycled on this plane as the spirits animating newborn infants."

"Yes, it is so."

A lock of blackness slipped from the tail Natsuki had made of her mane: Shizuru whipped her hand free of moisture and slipped the stray lock back in place behind the girl's ear.

"This interests you, Natsuki?" she asked, fingering the earlobe she could not resist touching.

Natsuki said, obliquely, "Your cousin said to me before, Shizuru, that I do not appreciate one of the most powerful of your - your abilities."

Shizuru smiled. She especially enjoyed the roundabout approach when it was Natsuki who took it.

"What ability was she referring to, so that I may teach you to appreciate it?" she joked.

"She already taught me," Natsuki responded archly, eyebrows high. "Your ability to hold the soldiers' feet, Shizuru. To give them courage enough to stand, is what I intend to say."

"Now I see. You are referring to my legions never taking flight."

"Yes."

"And Shizuma said you do not appreciate it because?"

"Because of my people, my faith," Natsuki said, already starting to link their topic to the previous one. "My people believe in the immortality of the spirit, Shizuru, but only for those who die with honour. You know it. You remember, your speech before? When first you came to our citadel?"

"Of course."

The girl moved to the opposite end of the tub first so that she could access Shizuru's feet. She plunged her hands into the water and started scrubbing them to loosen all possible oils and dead skin left.

"So you knew even then that we are not a people for whom, hmm, flight is normal," she said while doing this. "We do not flee easily in battle because - because it is not a true option for us."

"I see," Shizuru said. "And Shizuma thinks you do not appreciate my ability to hold the men where they are because of that? Was she right?"

Natsuki ducked her head, looking guilty.

"A little, I think," she said. "But I appreciate it now. And I thought then of some things. Of how - how yours is a culture betrayed by rituals of religion. I remember something you showed me, on the maps of your..." She paused and dug around for the word before finally producing it with a triumphant tone: "Your Forum."

"What was it?" Shizuru asked, now truly intrigued. It was always fascinating for her to see the discoveries the girl's mind unearthed and the intelligence that worked behind that unbelievable face. Who would ever think such a face hiding such a mind, after all? "What of the maps of it that I showed you?"

"I remembered a temple you showed to me," Natsuki answered. "You called it Jupiter Stator. The temple of the god who stays those who would flee in battle. I wondered at it."

"Because you yourselves have no such temple or god for that purpose?"

"No. It was because I could not see anything in your military culture to explain the - the need for such a god." She sighed, squinted darkly at the water of the bath. "I thought it was possible that I had... insufficient data, yes, on your military history. That I was perhaps missing something. Then Shizuma explained how much more often your soldiers ran away from battle with other commanders, so I saw what I was missing."

"They do not run away all that often even with other generals, to be sure," the Himean defended. "Himean soldiers are not utter cowards, just so it is clear, Natsuki."

"I did not say so," Natsuki said, her black brows lifting. "But you see what I saw."

"I do, yes."

"So I was thinking on that and how religion could show - could touch on a military," she said. "In your case, you are a religion in a way, I think. You yourself are your own priest... you, um, you promote a kind of immortality for those who follow you."

Shizuru asked her what kind of immortality it was, in her opinion.

"The immortality of those whose glory lives past their death. And then I thought too of how one difference in a similar idea could - could change, I think, a culture."

"Ahh!" Shizuru breathed a loud exhale of realisation as she saw what Natsuki was trying to say. "So you think the Mentulae flee so quickly in battle because of the way their religion phrases immortality?"

Natsuki nodded eagerly. She kept moving up her lover's body, scrubbing at it under the water as they talked.

"The Mentulaeans' immortality is not like ours," she said. "For us Otomeians, for our souls to live on, we must live and die honourably. And we do not return to this world-we go instead to the better one, the one where all the honourable dead already live their reward."

"Whereas the Mentulaeans require no such honour to be reborn and are compelled to return here," Shizuru said. "I see what you mean, Natsuki. Even a person who loves life and would welcome a second chance at it would prefer the guarantee of a life of reward and immortality to another run on this imperfect world. The second chance at life that beckons to a Mentulaean through the possibility of escaping death in battle is a far more immediate reward and temptation than the alternative their faith poses to them."

"Yes. You think this is why they flee so quickly too?" Natsuki asked.

"Perhaps. I believe it certainly informs their decisions in battle, yes. Although I would also like to think they flee simply because they see that it is useless to fight me."

Natsuki splashed some water at her light-heartedly.

"Always a peacock," she said, although her voice was affectionate as she said it.

"And always a brat," Shizuru returned, nuzzling the hand stroking her jaw. "Well, I am a tatterdemalion peacock today, meum mel. It is up to you to restore my plumage to its former glory."

Natsuki's eyes slid to her almost furtively: "You never lose glory, Shizuru. Your hair... is longer."

"Yes, I suppose I should get this mop cut again."

"No. It is beautiful."

"That may be," she chuckled. "But it is also harder to maintain, love."

"I will maintain for you."

"And what, hold it out of my eyes in every battle?" came the laughing reply.

Natsuki allowed that it was important to consider the practicality of the fringe's length indeed and went back to her work. After a while, Shizuru realised that the girl's hand had been washing the side of one breast too long already. She looked up and saw green eyes turned black, little white ears turned a telltale pink.

"I can finish you quickly," she offered with conscious wickedness, thinking she would get the girl to sputter.

"I can do the same," Natsuki responded, to her astonishment. The Otomeian's cheeks were as red as she had expected, but the husky voice was still surprisingly steady, even if it was somewhere around the floor.

"But I do not want that, Shizuru. It..." She smoothed her hand over Shizuru's flank again while thinking of the words she needed. "It has been too long for quickness."

She filled a dipper in water and warned Shizuru to close her eyes. The older woman did so, her head moving from one side to the other as Natsuki scrubbed away at her hair using the oils, which she then washed away with the hot water of the bath. Once finished, the girl took a damp cloth and used that to clean Shizuru's face, neck and ears. She even went as far as to help Shizuru tend to the stubble of hair that had grown on some parts of her body during the journey, during which time she had been obliged to put on hold her usual depilatory rituals.

"You may be even more meticulous than I am," Shizuru told her later after her body was clean and hairless once more. "Thank you for the bath, Natsuki."

Natsuki nodded, busy with the towel.

"I am meticulous because you would want it," she said. "If not, you would find, um, excuse to bathe again this evening, no?"

The Himean did not bother denying it, choosing to smile instead. Natsuki finished towelling her off and ruffled her hair afterwards playfully. She let Shizuru dress herself but insisted on putting on the older woman's socks and footwear for her.

"Where am I to spend tonight?" she asked while doing that.

"With me in my quarters, of course," Shizuru said, amused. "Did that even have to be said?"

"It is... hm... best to be sure."

"Now you have me worried. Do you actually want to spend the night with me or not?"

Natsuki glanced up.

"I had two horses saddled," she admitted.

Shizuru was diverted by the number.

"Two?" she echoed.

Natsuki was on her feet again and now beckoned to her with a tilt of the head.

"Yes," she replied. "Come."

They came out of the building and saw the two horses the Otomeian had mentioned.

"You are riding to the other camp as well?" Shizuru asked, a little confused as she regarded the hulking black horse standing in wait.

"I mean, on your own horse?"

Natsuki looked at her levelly and responded in the affirmative.

"I do not intend to peck at you, but forgive me for asking it. Is that wise, Natsuki?"

"I have been riding for weeks like this."

Shizuru said nothing, merely looking at the horse doubtfully. She might as well have looked at Natsuki that way, however: the girl cast upon her one of those looks she often gave in response, the one that said I am aware of what you are thinking and it displeases me. It was a short look, but one punctuated more emphatically by its shortness.

The girl beckoned quickly to a groom after that, and he aided her in getting up the animal so quickly that Shizuru had nary a moment to protest-or to glance at the oddity of the two-horned saddle on the horse. In mere moments, the Otomeian was already perched atop the animal with casual grace, both legs over one of its sides and hidden by her dress.

"Ahh," Shizuru breathed, comprehension dawning. "So someone shall lead the horse for you, mea vita?"

She was not unfamiliar with the position the girl had adopted, which she knew the more aristocratic Greeks and Himeans to have used often on promenades or casual rides around the countryside in the old days. It was not as common now, as most aristocrats preferred to don riding gear these days, but some still used it every now and then: it was a position used to show social status and wherewithal, as it permitted them to look coolly aloof and also display their best gowns, dresses and trouser-less formal tunics even while horsed. The only problem with this side-saddle perch, of course, was that you could not control your steed by yourself: that was why she fully expected Natsuki's steed to be led by at least one of the grooms present.

But Natsuki shook her head, holding out a hand so her servant could hand her the cane she had relinquished temporarily to him. She held it in her left hand and over the side of the horse where her legs were not resting. Then she took the reins herself.

"I ride Niger alone," she said, and seeing Shizuru's eyes widen at the seemingly impossible statement, followed with another. "I have for a month now. Shizuru."

The old way, that use of her name.

"How do you manage it?" Shizuru asked.

"My saddle, it is different. It is... is bespoke."

"I am afraid I don't quite see how that helps you control Niger."

"You will see if we go now."

She looked to Shizuru in her haughty way again, her cane resting across a leg as she channelled her defiance in silence.

Oh that pride, Shizuru thought, meeting her stare. At least it told her the girl was genuinely recovering, and not just in body. Even the girl's beauty was tied to her pride in herself, for Natsuki was beautiful in a standoffish, superior fashion, with her relentless aristocrat's features and small but adamant nose. Hers was a face meant for looking down on people, and it sometimes did that even at Shizuru in a way that presented a challenge-as it did now. Though part of Shizuru wanted to take that challenge, she knew and chose not to. Difficult as it was, she had decided that it was better to trust the girl. Natsuki knew her own manège better than anyone else, besides also having a healthier respect for risks nowadays due to the prices she had had to pay for her past daring. If the girl said she knew what she was doing on that horse, she most probably did.

She ignored the mount being offered to her and approached Niger instead, putting a hand on the beast's neck and feeling nothing save the steady power of an animal at ease with itself and the precious burden it carried. It was the burden who was not at ease, however, and Shizuru knew that it was in both their interests to make sure Natsuki was relaxed enough to do whatever she did to ride the animal in this manner.

"I missed seeing this," she said, causing the flashing eyes watching her to soften a little. "You really do belong on a horse, mea vita."

The princess's gelid expression melted, leaving behind the more vulnerable girl underneath.

"I plan to survey this area tomorrow, by the way," Shizuru continued. "Would you like to ride with me then? Only if you think you are up to it, of course. I would not compel you to do something you do not want to do."

The other woman accepted the invitation demurely.

"Wonderful," Shizuru grinned. "Now let us ride to the other camp and see my cousin for dinner... although let us not go too quickly, please. I want you to tell me as much about this special saddle of yours as we go, and I think Shizuma would understand if I made her wait a little longer just for that. She knows the power of my curiosity." She frowned upon recalling what her cousin had done to them earlier. "Besides, she deserves it after barging in on us like that, I think-and just when it was becoming enjoyable too! Had she been just a little while later, I daresay we might not even have cared about her coming in and watching. I know I would not have."

Natsuki recovered her glare.

"Sometimes, Shizuru," the girl said to the candid lament, "you are an ass."

---

Shizuru did arrive at her quarters more than an hour after the arranged time. Instead of simply walking into the structure as was her right, she chose to have a slave announce her first. Once inside, she took a seat at the table with her cousin and quipped, "See how easy it is?"

"What?" Shizuma said grumpily, knowing the other was not going to repent for making her wait.

"Announcing yourself before entering someone's rooms, like a civilised person."

"These are your rooms."

"Indeed, but you were here first and might have been indulging in some private time before I arrived. I would have hated to intrude on that, being the civilised person that I am."

The silver-haired woman regarded Shizuru sourly.

"Lessons on civility from someone who cannot even wait to bathe before pawing at her mistress like some animal?" she muttered.

"Did you hear the lady complain?" Shizuru retorted. "Besides, I should take this opportunity to remind you of all the times I caught you threatening some young woman's virtue."

The senior legate stared at the accusation, silvery eyebrows shooting halfway up her forehead.

"I am sorry, but when did that ever happen?" she demanded. "My memory seems to be going because I recall no such thing ever taking place, Shizuru!"

Shizuru smiled brightly at her steward, who had entered the room to pour their wine. She turned back to her cousin with the smile still on her face.

"It did, many times," she said. "I simply never interrupted you during all those delicate moments and took myself away before you could notice. There, Shizuma, is the mark of a civilised human being."

"This is more of your fiction."

"Tsubame Yamanaka, summer of the year Uncle broke his arm, the two of you in that little copse beside the creek in your orchards in Cumae--"

"I knew I would eventually regret babysitting you all those years ago," Shizuma scowled with a blush, cutting off the cheery recital; she remembered that incident, all right! "Damn you, Shizuru, how do you know that? Were you following me?"

"I was merely looking for you at the time so I could ask my beloved and wise older cousin something. Note that you did not even notice my presence, by the way, since I absented myself instantly."

Shizuma was shaking her head ruefully. "Thoughtful of you."

"I think so. But enough of that reminiscence! We have quite a bit of talking to do, cousin, and evening is already upon us. Let us tell our tales to each other."

The green-gold eyes opened wide, their absurd white lashes fluttering.

"What, without your girl?" Shizuma said. "I admit I expected that you would insist on her presence for this, Shizuru."

"Is this an objection in advance?"

"No." She pointed to a third cup on the table, which Hermias had yet to fill with anything. "I was expecting her for dinner."

Shizuru dismissed her steward for the evening, saying she could manage the rest. He was already slipping unobtrusively away when she answered Shizuma.

"She shall indeed join us," she said. "But she had some errands to do first, so she asked me to go ahead. We ran into an Otomeian officer who requested her presence urgently to settle something or other when we were riding over. Have you seen the saddle she designed, by the way?"

Shizuma said she had.

"A piece of genius, as your girl is. Shocked you though, I wager?"

"Ye gods, yes! I was about ready to order her down from the damned horse. If it had thrown her-"

She broke off at the idea and shuddered, hands clenching in reflex.

"You'd have had the beast cooked on the spot, I'm sure," said her cousin. "It's more secure than you'd think it to be from looking at it, that saddle, though I will grant it seems none too reassuring when put up on that devilish-large stallion of hers. But it's a clever invention and she uses it well, Shizuru."

"She does that."

Shizuma finished her drink and put down her cup with a 'thock'.

"Now to work," she said, meeting the red eyes squarely. "I should go first. What I have to relate is known to Natsuki already, whereas what you have to relate is not. No doubt she is as eager to hear of your doings as I am, and deserves to be present when you first recount it."

"I cannot agree more. Go on and tell me what has been happening here, cousin."

Shizuma began with the successes of their allies in securing more of the area around this critical part of the river. The Otomeians had launched a series of extremely effective movements that now assured them a relatively free path to several cities and Lasandre.

"You've your girl's cousin to thank for it," she told Shizuru, well knowing her own cousin disliked the woman she was praising: Shizuru had come to talk to her about the Princess Alyssa's pursuit of Natsuki's hand before leaving with the Ninth and Thirteenth on their alpine march. "I allow she's about as sweet to have around as a frozen salt lick. Yet she's done a good job thus far and I daresay even you shan't be able to complain. We've put up a good length of road unmolested, thanks to her and her army."

"Show me tomorrow," said Shizuru, already reaching for more bread. The appetite she had managed to forget in the happiness of seeing Natsuki again had reasserted itself with vehemence, and she discovered that she was ravenous with hunger. Her cousin pushed the breadbasket towards her and also urged her to try some very lightly fried pieces of fish that smelled of butter.

"It's rather a delightful taste, their butter," she said while watching Shizuru fall to the fare with vigour. "I was a sceptic at first. But with a deft hand handling the cooking, I find that butter makes as good an ingredient as olive oil."

"Delicious," Shizuru agreed, tearing another fresh roll. "So I was right to give her back all the auxiliary save the cavalry when she came for them, then."

Shizuma frowned. "Came for them?"

Shizuru explained the circumstances of her last encounter with the Princess Alyssa.

"Can they hold the borders, you think, absent our help?"

The senior legate answered in the affirmative.

"They've all the main passes and crossings in hand already," she told her cousin. "No fear on that, I think. I should note that we've been seeing a number of refugees in the past months, by the way."

"From the enemy?"

"Mostly traders and expatriates from other lands who happened to be in old Obsidian's territories at the wrong time. Some Caledonians. Few Arabs, fewer Greeks. Mostly Himeans, actually."

"What did they say?"

"That many of the aristocratic lords of the Empire started exercising policies of low-to-zero-tolerance for foreigners as soon as the war boiled up. Some just ordered eviction of all non-Mentulaean inhabitants of their towns, others were a little more selective about which inhabitants were to be ejected from their fiefdoms. Still more decided to go the bloodier route instead and ordered executions." Her lips were thin as she came out with it: "Of Himeans, mostly."

Shizuru scowled, the fur of her brows rippling.

"And they made public demonstrations of it, undoubtedly," she spoke through her teeth. "There shall be a reckoning for this."

"That too should not be doubted," her cousin replied grimly. "There were not that many refugees, though. Perhaps just an odd hundred or so thus far, all told. I packed them off to Argus under guard of the militia. Governor Sugiura can sift through them herself, since she's a talent for that sort of thing. And I made sure none remained here, in case there were spies among the lot. I actually snuck a few of your intelligencers among them to pretend they're refugees too. If anyone stands a chance of recognising a spy, it would have to be one."

"You have a mind after my own heart, cousin," Shizuru said feelingly. "Aside from that, I take it that it has been relatively quiet here? You've not had to fight any real engagements?"

"Yes, merely skirmishes. They were mostly from our scouts running into theirs, actually. It appears that your game worked, Shizuru. They ended up shifting nearly all their concern your way when you began your work over in the south, leaving Shohei-san and the others a free route northwest. They were so worried about an attack coming from somewhere between this camp and your army after the shock of your sudden appearance south that they never even noticed him sneak off in the opposite direction."

"When did he leave?"

"Past three weeks ago."

"Then he should have arrived at his destination by now."

The head of silvery hair nodded, and the light of the lamps picked out glints of steel within it.

"They have," Shizuma answered. "I got the letter yesterday."

She looked up when she heard Shizuru's chewing stop entirely; the red eyes were on her, demanding answers to questions that did not need to be voiced.

"No fears, Shizuru," she said. "They tore down all bridges and established base successfully. As far as we can see, separation was achieved."

Shizuru chewed at the food in her mouth furiously again, mindful to keep her mouth shut. Once she had swallowed it, she smiled brilliantly at her senior legate.

"Excellent!" she exclaimed. "So now we have effectively divorced our Mentulaeen friends at the capital from their friends in the north."

By the latter, she was speaking of Calchis and his army in the Mentulaeen Empire's Northern Frontier, where he had thus far been working to subdue the "rebellious" northern tribes. These were the same tribes to which Natsuki had offered and struck up an alliance recently for Otomeia, secretly sending them funds and resources that could aid their insurgency.

Calchis's army was of import to the Himeans' war plans because it was the nearest army of considerable size besides the one stationed in the capital of Gorgo—in fact, it was one of the three remaining royal armies as well as among the largest of all the royal armies, including the ones that had already fallen against the enemy and second only to the king's. That was only in terms of their core forces, of course: the royal armies tended to fluctuate in size depending on which feudal lord reinforced the concerned army and how many troops he added to its core. Either way, Calchis's army was one large in both core and adjuncts. It was thus a major deterrent to any force moving against the Mentulaeen centre as it could respond and arrive quickest should reinforcements be required by the capital's garrison, which was the last of the three core royal armies. Without Calchis, Gorgo's army would have to rely on either sizeable reinforcements coming from far away or small ones from nearby feudal lords assigned or allowed their fiefs nearby.

Naturally, Shizuru preferred to force the latter option, especially as there was a good chance of taking on the feudal support armies one by one through strategy and speed of engagement. For this to be possible, though, the intrusion of an external and large-enough-to-matter reinforcement had to be excluded. Thus the neutralisation of Calchis's army from a present threat into a future one: hoping to block it from early consideration once the traditional campaign season for the enemy arrived, Shizuru had arranged for four of the legions to travel at the end of winter up the River Atinu and towards the River Holmys.

The Holmys was the more northern of the two great rivers of the area, and it ran from the peaks and hills of the Mentulaeen north in an easterly route that eventually brought it to its confluence with the Atinu. Just as the north-to-south course of the Atinu separated the lands of the Mentulae from Argentum and Hime's northern territories, the west-to-east course of the Holmys separated the Mentulaean Empire's centre from its newly conquered territories in its Northern Frontier.

And now, with four Himean legions sitting practically on top of it, it also separated the capital and its army from its most important ally.

"With spring already starting, they shall not even need to squat there for much longer," Shizuru purred. "The melts should engorge the Holmys with so much water soon, I understand, that it shall become virtually impassable. The Prince Calchis shall have to wait for them to subside in summer or try to find another way to get to the centre."

"Which route shall he take, I wonder."

"If he has half a mind on him, he would take the latter."

"Hmm. Either way, it was a fine stroke," her cousin said lazily but with sincerity. "They were so confident in their strength in the north due to his presence there that it never even occurred to them that we would dare to try and slip an army up there and between them. What worried them more was the possibility of you attacking them from their relatively unguarded southern flank."

"And push them all together into a concentrated huddle of armies in the north? More fool me if I had done that! I expect we shall be having our own problems soon, however. Spring means more of their feudal armies shall start moving again, especially as they should have gotten over their surprise. Those feudal lords in their farther regions-the ones west, I mean-should also have started moving."

Her cousin looked at her.

"Worried?"

Shizuru smirked in response.

"Please," she replied. "If there is anything I am going to do in the next few months, it would be to show the Mentulaeans what fools they were to dare Hime into this war."

"Mm-hm." Shizuma held up a finger and hastily finished the swallow she had been taking just then. "That reminds me of another surprise I have for you."

"What is it?"

"An envoy offering an alliance to the Otomeians in return for their betrayal of us to the Mentulae."

"I'm intrigued."

Shizuma told the story of Baroness Horyma's visit and failed attempt at convincing the Otomeian polemarch to come over to the Mentulaean side, culminating in herself and Shizuru crying with laughter.

"She denied the poor woman an exit speech?" Shizuru asked between guffaws, so overcome with amusement that she had to clear her throat several times to keep herself from choking. "Good heavens, Natsuki certainly knows how to destroy a person completely."

"She said it wasn't theatre," the other responded, wiping at her own eyes. "Although when she loosed that your-mother-mated-with-a-weasel arrow, Shizuru, I just about perished from the theatrical comedy of it all. I tell you, I have never heard anyone insult with such dignity as she had in saying that. Even the poor baroness did not know if it was intended as offence, initially."

"You should hear her when she gets mad at me."

"If she manages to keep you in line, I would indeed like to." She picked up her cup again and realised it was empty. Her cousin pushed the jug on the table towards her. "You've a stack of letters waiting for you over there, as you can see, so I'll not bore you with news from Hime at the moment. You shall be discovering it shortly yourself, after all. The most interesting news from there thus far, which I do think you shall want me to bore you with, is that Takeda Masashi has been brought to the treason courts and is likely to be ruined. Himemiya should have explained in her letter."

"He richly deserves it."

Shizuma looked up and found the other's face sombre again, an unusual vitriol swarming in her eyes.

"That man bred no good for our cause, Shizuma," said the golden-haired woman, frowning. "To say nothing of the part he played in getting my girl's leg cut off and a beloved friend killed."

Shizuma nodded once and slowly.

"She was dear to her too, wasn't she?" she said after a while.

"To whom?"

"Your girl. Natsuki can barely hear mention of poor Suou without her face falling, you know. Besides the look she got when she saw the seal of Himemiya's letter-can't get it out of my mind!"

The anger was gone from Shizuru's eyes all of sudden, though not the sombre intent.

"Did she look," she said, "guilty?"

Shizuma regarded her younger cousin with interest.

"I do not think I would have put it that way before," she said. "But now that you prompt me to it, I feel as though that would be as good a word as any for her expression then. Why is that, however?"

"Because she thinks herself unlucky."

"Is she?"

"I told you of all she has done for me, so as far as I am concerned, quite the opposite."

Shizuma made a low sound in her throat.

"This reminds me of something she said recently. But first, I have to tell you that the Eleventh is here."

"When did it arrive?"

"Around the Ides of March. They brought with them an interesting package both Toshi-san and Miyuki assured me you commissioned from Sosia's craftsmen. I've no idea why you ordered those, by the way. As far as my accounting goes-and I've done it several times, to be sure of it-the legions have enough of those tools as far as their needs for camp-building are concerned. But I suppose you've something going on in that mind of yours again... and I suppose your girl knows what it is too."

"Did she say so?" Shizuru asked with a smile.

"Not so much in that way, no. But when I wondered about it aloud, she said that she felt you were going to try something others would consider unlucky but which would probably cause Fate to knuckle under for you again."

Shizuru's smile developed into a smirk.

"She may be right," she said. "At any rate, what other legions have I here besides the Eleventh?"

"There are two: the Fourth and the Eighth."

"Good. I shall take them out for a stroll soon."

"Lasandre."

"Lasandre. I shall take the Lupine Division with me too, of course," Shizuru expanded. "What cavalry do we have here?"

"Aside from the Lupines, nearly two alae of cataphracti, two alae of skirmishers and another two alae of horsed archers."

"Ah! The last are new."

"They are. Natsuki said she commandeered them under your directive, however."

"Yes, that would be right. Ah, I do not need the cataphracti yet-let us save them for the summer, when the ground is more suited to heavy cavalry engagements. Even their chariot should be having trouble right now, I think. I shall take only the Lupine Division, then. And the sagittarii ."

"Which means you are leaving me here to play babysitter of the base again."

Shizuru heard the note of complaint in her cousin's voice and grinned.

"I am sorry for leaving you to languish here while all this work has been going on around you, then," she said with a distinct lack of apology. "But the centre is always expected to be steady, after all. Everything else revolves around its stability."

"Which nonetheless means it can never be truly glorious, doesn't it?" the other observed shrewdly. "The Senate records tell of victories won on the field by this legate or that, of triumphant marches of impossible daring over massifs in winter... while I what? Win battles of organisation and logistics?"

"Of stability?" Shizuru offered, chuckling.

"I shall say this much for that view of things, at least," drawled the senior legate. "I wager no one in the House would ever have thought to associate me before with stability."

Shizuru was still laughing when the knock preceding Natsuki came, and the two Himeans paused their banter and eating to wait for the girl take her seat. She had evidently decided to go back to fetch her pet or had someone fetch it for her, for the animal was in tow: it snuffed around its master first after she seated herself, then went off to lounge on a couch at the other end of the room after being given a shooing gesture from the Otomeian's hand.

"Cats," said the watching Shizuma, "are the damnedest animals. They hold no loyalty for their masters because they hold no gratitude, believing themselves entitled to everything you do for them. It is unlike a dog, which will thank you with its life ever afterwards for every meal. These things are natural to each species, I think. Yet your girl has managed to make a dog of this cat, Shizuru. It is something I have marvelled at for the past months."

The corners of Natsuki's lips twitched.

"She is entitled too," she said, speaking now in her lovely woman's voice, the voice that was sometimes a shock coming from someone who still looked as though she were still only newly arrived at the peak of adolescence. "But it is right for Shizuki to be so."

They asked her why.

"I denied her death. Thus it is my... hmm... my obligation, I think, to provide for her life. I give to her only what I owe her. Does this not make her loyalty to me even more honourable than a dog's, if it is as you say?"

This time, everyone at the table smiled.

"Perhaps," Shizuma answered. "Would you call yourself a cat or a dog?"

"I am human," the Otomeian replied. "And this makes me less honourable than both, I think."

The two Himeans laughed.

"Her wit's a delight, Shizuru," said the senior legate, turning again to her cousin. "I've had wonderful company here for the past months, at the very least, so don't start feeling too sorry for me yet. We were talking about the cavalry she plans to take with her to Lasandre, Natsuki."

"The Lupine Division and the archers."

"Have you been eavesdropping on us, mea vita?" Shizuru said.

"No," Natsuki said while nodding at the victuals the two pushed towards her. "But it would be clear."

"To you, but you see through my mind as though it were your own," Shizuru responded. "Well then, cousin, since Natsuki is already here, should I commence with my tale or have you two anything else to tell me that should go first? I have a great deal to tell and little time left for the telling of it. I have been riding all day and I confess it is wearing at me. I want to go about this as efficiently as possible now for my bones already ache for the comfort of sleep."

Later that night she showed to her mistress what comforts she truly ached for, her lie to her cousin manifest as soon as they all retired to their beds. She was still catching her breath after the first relief when Natsuki demanded to know when she was leaving the camp again.

Her gaze rolled downwards to the girl on her chest.

"I just got here today, mea vita," she said. "At least let me get a night's rest before sending me away."

Natsuki got up and straddled her at the waist. Her lips twitched when she felt the girl's wetness spread and rest brazenly on her skin.

"You want rest?" asked the Otomeian.

"Not right now," she admitted, trying to reach for the tempting wetness between the girl's legs. Natsuki slapped her hand away several times and she whined disconsolately when she realised she would not be allowed to touch it until she gave the girl what she wanted.

"When, Shizuru?"

Shizuru scowled but answered anyway.

"Three days," she said. "Maybe four. But it is not as though I am headed so very far away again."

She reached again for her and was slapped away once more, the girl murmuring something about Himeans.

"How would you know?" Shizuru laughed at her. "Assuming you have only ever had one Himean, you would hardly be able to claim certainty in that remark."

Natsuki rolled her eyes at the thinly-veiled test.

"It is so," she said. "But my Himean is worth a hundred others. In more ways than one."

"Is this the part where you call me hopelessly insatiable?"

"No. It is the part where I offer to... hmm... serve you tonight if you listen to me."

Shizuru eyed her with a new expression.

"I never thought I would hear you negotiate with sexual favours, Natsuki," she admitted. "This must be something grave indeed."

"To me, yes."

"I see. Yet your negotiation is faulty, meum mel. For if you are to serve me the way I wish you to and in a way that will earn my favour, your mouth shall be too busy to speak anything to which I should listen."

Natsuki thought about that so seriously that the Himean had to bite her lip not to laugh aloud.

"Perhaps I will speak it first," the girl eventually offered, "and then let you think as I serve you."

Shizuru nodded gravely, having taken time to compose herself as the Otomeian considered the dilemma.

"How sly of you," she said. "But very well, please do not let me stop you."

She spread her legs and motioned for the girl to take the position for tending to her. Natsuki got on all fours and crawled backwards. She wrapped hands around Shizuru's hips, her short nails scratching Shizuru's skin to pleasurable effect.

"I may speak?" she said.

"Yes."

"When you go to Lasandre."

"What of it?"

"I wish to go too."

She was sly, it seemed, for she spared no pause after Shizuru's eyes widened at the request: after her words, she simply dove forward immediately and pressed a firm kiss between her lover's legs, drawing a choked sound from the older woman. It pulled her own lips, still in contact with the warm flesh, into a wide smile.

She rolled her tongue over Shizuru, seeking the fleshy little bundle of sensation that she knew the Himean liked her to catch between her lips. She found it and started suckling on it as a sleeping child on his thumb. Shizuru's answering groans to this ministrations were soft, but the woman's hands were also hard, pushing Natsuki's head insistently towards its task and holding her in place with a fistful of hair. The Himean enjoyed herself for a few moments first, then yanked Natsuki's head from herself with a growl of self-sacrifice.

"I suppose we had to talk about it sometime," she panted, drinking in the sight of the girl's jaw running wet with her juice.

Natsuki agreed.

"Do you mean you want to leave with me? To see the siege itself on the day it begins?"

"Yes."

"You intend to ride there, I take it?"

"Yes." A beat. "With my troopers. I walk when they walk. The distance is not too great. As - as you said."

Shizuru's eyes narrowed and she breathed heavily through her nose.

"I must think on this," she murmured. "It is something significant that you are asking me, especially when you consider that I asked you to occupy the camp across the river precisely so I could keep you safe and out of the area of engagement. Yet even I must confess I never imagined that a permanent arrangement. I must think on this."

Natsuki nodded mutely, her posture at once sombre and diffident.

"You may go back to your service."

Natsuki obeyed, applying herself to it so fervently in her desperation that Shizuru gasped. The sound only roused her on and she directed all her frustrated power into the present activity. Her fingers dug into the older woman's flanks and locked the white hips in a stranglehold of pleasure, one that she brought to its teeth-gnashing fulfilment mere moments into her effort.

Shizuru threw an arm over her eyes afterwards, feeling a trail of sweat roll from her brow as the beads coalesced. She took her time recovering.

"Well," she said later. "Well done."

The breaths finally stopped tickling her; the weight of Natsuki's head vanished from her thigh. The Otomeian dragged herself up and pressed her lips to Shizuru's stomach. She tested the moisture on it with a tongue and sighed when Shizuru trembled at the contact.

"Naught in the world could be as far from an offence to the senses as you," she whispered in her language, glancing up afterwards to see if Shizuru had caught it. The Himean's gentle smile told her the answer.

"I have not sufficient grasp of your tongue yet to match such poetry," Shizuru said. "Oh, wait-I believe I actually did have a fairly good grasp on your tongue just now, did I not?"

Natsuki laughed and kissed the heaving plane of her belly again.

"You are vulgar," she accused.

"Says the girl who had her tongue inside me just now."

"I shall call it acculturation," the Otomeian said.

Shizuru closed her eyes and laughed.

"Oh, if only your acculturation would indeed be in that aspect," she said with a lusty final chuckle, admiring the other's naked body openly. "But going back to the topic of your negotiations earlier, are you certain you want to do that? It shall be a hard march-you know that even when I take my time, it is a hard march."

"I will do it."

"I do not doubt you will try." Again her eyes narrowed, and her lips pulled back from her teeth. "You have me at disadvantage, Natsuki. I should equalise matters before going further."

She dragged Natsuki up and flipped her over, pressing over her after that. Her heat when tested was as wet as before. She did not bother to work on her this time, considering her prepared enough, and simply went inside her immediately. The other hand she put on her belly, feeling the muscles as they strained with the girl's arch. Natsuki's skin under her palm was warm, but the flesh around her was hot.

"I hope we are clear on at least one thing," she said. "I forbid you from joining battle yourself, Natsuki, so do not even bother attempting debate there. Do you understand?"

"I... yes!"

"Do not attempt to trick me or get around this by finding some loophole in what I said either." She dropped her voice even further to make sure the girl understood her seriousness: "Gainsay me on this and you shall rue the day, mea vita . I shall not take your insubordination on this matter, let that be clear."

She punctuated the directive with a clench that had Natsuki screaming, whipping her hips back and forth against the hand in her and lashing herself into a whimpering oblivion. Shizuru's drew a silvery track on the white thighs when she retracted, and she smeared the silver over the girl's belly with a smile. Then she lay down so she could gather the shaken form into her arms to comfort it.

"I uh-understand," Natsuki said when she was able. "I did not think to ask. Or try it."

"Then that is good. I was merely warning you from it in advance."

She pressed a kiss to her forehead. "What is it precisely that you were going to negotiate, then?"

The Otomeian pulled away, a speculative look settling over her flushed features as she regarded Shizuru silently. I am being measured for the strike, Shizuru thought, entertained, her own eyes roaming the wild black hair where her hands had disarranged it.

"A place in the command. Ah-as I deserve."

Shizuru ignored the stammer graciously.

"I see," she said. "Pray take this not as an insult, but I would like to know the answer to this question. By what reasoning do you claim to merit what you are asking from me?"

Natsuki was nervous; the movements in her long neck showed it.

"By reason of being Polemarch of your auxiliary," the girl said. "Also supreme head of your - your most valued cavalry. My... my standing deserves consideration in issues of command."

"Perhaps. But I must point out that you were given this singular authority absent our participation or consent," Shizuru retorted. "You were also invested with the title of polemarch subsequent to our initial agreement with your nation to aid us in the war. As such, no pledges of obligatory acknowledgement exist for us as regards changes to your particular status, save if you were to be elected the actual monarch of Otomeia, of course."

She chuckled at the girl's obvious consternation in the wake of her words, shaking her head and tutting when Natsuki's first attempt at a reply was prefaced with a miserable stammer.

"Always maintain your composure, my love," she said. "In front of your enemy, be the ice you are so often viewed to be. Granted, I am not truly your enemy and wish never to be. But if you are to be a part of a Himean command council-and not merely as the silent attendant to the commander-you must know how to deal with litigious-minded Himeans resenting your presence and questioning your right to be there. Stand up for it, mea vita. Take a moment to compose yourself if you must. I know you shall have to work against your stammer, but at the very least, demanding pause for your response is better than lunging into ill-conceived words."

It seemed to her that Natsuki had to stop herself from releasing another halting response as she finished-and indeed Natsuki had. It had been on the tip of the girl's tongue to say that she was at disadvantage from the beginning in this test, as there was no one in the world as capable of stripping away her composure as Shizuru. One look at that young goddess's face with its wise red eyes and her tongue shot down her throat. But then she realised that this situation might be to her advantage after all, for if she could maintain composure around Shizuru, she could surely maintain composure around anyone.

She steeled herself to meet again the beautiful eyes adoring her.

"If you refer to... our pledge of aid to Hime as indicated by our monarch when first you came to our citadel for help with Argentum," she began in that deliberate way she had when trying to master her treacherous tongue. "You present an argument that is - is - uh-"

At Shizuru's encouraging nod, she finally found the word: "Specious."

"How so?"

"Because it was a pledge made under circumstances that no longer exist," she replied, gaining confidence. "There have been at least two great changes in the legal scope of what you call 'The Northern Mission'. Tuh-taken with the changes in the composition of your command, I may argue that you yourselves have made grave... hmm... alterations to the circumstances that were in effect when you first solicited our troops. This means, by your logic, that we have even less-no, I mean fewer-fewer reasons to acknowledge you due to all the changes in your and your officers' status since then."

The eyes on her were alight in the way only red eyes could be.

"Shizuma was right," Shizuru murmured, before asking, "I trust you have been delighting my cousin with wit and wit alone of all your many talents?"

Natsuki laughed, having learned by now that this was one of the older woman's ways of saying she had done something worthy of praise.

"More seriously, though, be warned that people may question you for reasons beneath your own superb logic, Natsuki. They may say that the situation is different since Himeans are the ones commanding the venture, and Otomeians are merely auxiliary-"

"So what goes for one does not for the other?" Natsuki finished for her.

"Precisely. You know how my people are and what sort of logic rules them. Most might even question your presence in the command tent for the simple reason that you are my mistress. When something like that happens, do not even bother trying to reason with them. But above all, my beauty, you should simply insist on your right to be present and do so with the stubborn composure of one who cannot be moved from her intent. Do not flare up, but do not give in either."

Natsuki nodded. "I will keep my temper, Shizuru."

"Good girl."

"This means I may be part of your command council? Where - where I can?"

"Yes."

Natsuki dove into her arms again.

"Thank you, Shizuru," she breathed, actually slumping now against the older woman. "I thank you."

Shizuru caught her, hugging her close with a fierceness that surprised both of them. She explained it with her next words, which rushed out before she could stop herself.

"I know I cannot deny this to you and I shall not deny it," she said. "But damn it all, I wish I could!"

Lips fell warmly on her neck as Natsuki's way of saying she understood, and neither of them said much in the wake of her unguarded declaration. It was enough for both to share the echo of it in silence.

When the time did come for speaking again, it was Shizuru who spoke first.

"Well, that conversation woke me up."

She disengaged herself from Natsuki after that and got up, though not without kissing her lover on the brow first. She found her slippers beside the bed but scorned to don her robe: she simply walked out of the bedroom naked.

When she came back, she had a scroll in one hand.

"Chikane's letter," she said, waving it at Natsuki. "I shall read it first of all the mail waiting for me. Gods know it should hold more worth than the rest."

She got back in bed and pulled up some of the pillows to the top, setting up a place where she could rest her back comfortably. She sat on the side next to an end-table, on which was a lamp, and thus unfurled the fat scroll in her hand beside its light. After a while of reading it, she saw Natsuki looking closely at her from the periphery of her vision.

"What is it?" she asked, without removing her eyes from her reading.

Natsuki shook her head.

"Come here."

The Otomeian complied with alacrity, rolling her head to rest on Shizuru's bare thigh and placing a hand over the older woman's knee. Shizuru put a hand on the dark head in response, stroking it much as the girl would stroke her pet cat's when it was seeking attention. It calmed Natsuki as much as it did that animal, and the girl was near-asleep already when Shizuru made an odd sound that broke the silence between them again.

Natsuki twisted about to look at her lover.

"Shizuru?" she said, wondering what had happened for Shizuru to produce that noise. "Hmm?"

Shizuru's eyes were still on the letter, skipping from left to right even more quickly now. It was as if she was consumed by an overpowering desire to read the rest of the thick scroll's contents as swiftly as possible.

"You may want to give thought again to my proposal, meum mel," she said during her furious reading. "Even more thought than you may already have."

"Why?"

Still she kept reading. She did reply after a pause, however.

"Because Suou-chan's sister is offering to adopt you under her family."

Chapter 64

As ever, thanks to all those still reading and who are kind enough to share their opinions in a review. My apologies too for not responding to most of you-my health goes through some deuced low valleys sometimes, to the point where it is difficult just to take a breath. You may well imagine that even typing something can be exhausting then.

Today, however, is a good day. I hope it is for all of you too.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

She woke to the blare of the horns calling for the daily formation, the brassy sound succeeded by the duller beat of the march. It was a siren song to her despite its uninspired rhythm, and she felt her whole being thrum a refrain.

There was sweat on her skin; it was thin, an irritant. Atop it was something thicker, even more irritating, and she found that the blanket had draped over her again. It was suffocating her with heat and her teeth flashed as she flung it away.

It was all the signal the shape hiding in the corner needed.

It lunged for her with all the swiftness of its kind. She did not bother evading it and pushed both palms outwards instead, in the manner of people trying to hold back a thing that could not really be held back. The result was a rude landing for the assailant, but it still managed to land on the bed. She put an arm around it and clicked her tongue in reproach. She knew it was excited but that was still not reason enough to try to crush her in the morning.

She supposed the poor thing had grown hungry while waiting.

This was her second time to wake, which meant it was the beast's as well. Their first waking had been when her lover arose. She had been told to go back to bed by the woman then and had acceded, guided into the sheets by a gentle voice and her own bleary mind. She was grateful for the luxury of a longer slumber, especially when waking meant facing another torrid summer day of the lowlands. Yet she felt as though she had sinned as well by that evasion. Who slept in when the commander herself woke up earlier than usual? Today was expected to be an important day too!

Unless the Mentulae marched more slowly than usual, of course. And that was something they could only achieve if they took to using their chins to crawl.

She gave her pet a kiss on the nose and suffered the forceful cheek rub the animal gave in return. Then she rolled to the other side of the bed and felt for the stand on which she kept her cane and leg. Her hand touched her cane first and discovered that something was wrapped around the shaft.

A tactile exploration conducted by the fingers, descriptors clicking away like abacus beads. Pliable and thin, but not precisely fragile; the texture a whisper. Parchment, most likely, and probably a letter.

She found the blanket again and called for a light, knowing that at least one of the three servants outside-she counted three centres of resonance beyond the leather wall-was there to answer just such a demand. One materialised with a lamp, asking if she would prefer lamplight alone or if the window flaps should be drawn up. It being that she was naked (not her fault, she always went to bed clothed even if someone else contrived to negate that nightly), she opted for the former and the servant lit more lamps for her, including the one at the bedside.

She found the letter under the illumination and read it.

Do not leave the tent absent the scarf and hat, or you will sting again on places other than your face. I told Hermias to make sure you eat more than a roll for breakfast. I know how you are.

Have a good morning, mea regina. Then find me and make mine better.

Only a Himean would pause to write such a message before going off to a siege, she was sure. It was enough to make her shake her head even while admiring the regularity of the letterforms on the parchment. Who else too but a Himean could be bothered to think about the beauty of his hand in a quick missive? Sometimes, she really had to sigh ( smile ) at her lover's ridiculousness ( romance ).

Time to start moving if she was to make anyone else's day better later on. Her daily routine was to bathe, and put on her foot and leg after her clothes. A servant came in to help her with this as usual. Natsuki knew she could get through her schedule alone, but it always took too long without help... besides taking so much effort that it tired her more than even she cared to admit. That was hardly the way one started a good morning, so she decided to just embrace the necessity and work with the solution.

She used Kavine, as she had the day before. If there was anyone on her staff who was loyal unto death, she would say it would be this woman, but even then she felt embarrassed when she let the woman bathe her, as she knew there was no hiding her rear and thighs. To her relief, Kavine ignored the sight, only humming the song she always did when bathing her princess; Natsuki thought the woman seemed a little too nonchalant this time, but neither aired suspicions nor forbade the tune. She knew that paranoid ears were not always good interpreters and she would not accuse someone so faithful merely on the basis of her own shame.

After her ablutions were over, she got on with the rest of her tasks. She fed her pet with fresh meat, broke her fast as enjoined-she ate a roll and a half-and even managed a conversation with her grooms on the horses' health. Usually this would be a short exchange, as Otomeian horses were hardy and their grooms the most dependable on campaign. It was a longer dialogue this time, however, because there were two things this time that were different from other campaigns: the first was the land and the second the heat scorching it into a cinder.

The land they stood on was no longer the lush riverine one they had occupied in the past months. The army had marched from the River Atinu to Lasandre Citadel on spring's first breath, putting up a road on the way so as to make travel easier from and to Base Camp afterwards. As they were building a proper road on an existing path, the work was faster than usual, so all expectations were for their schedule to work out. The intention was to begin investment of Lasandre on the last legs of spring, as this would make the more gruelling parts of the big job-setting up for the siege and confrontation-easier on everyone as they would be conducted in moderate instead of intense heat.

The plan was thwarted when spring in the empire's heartlands proved a curt visitor. It was an ever-warming period that rushed so swiftly into summer that the latter season burst upon them even before the rivers had been properly flooded from the melts. The escalation of temperature was thus an uncomfortable one, and not very welcoming to an invader.

The Himeans weathered it quite well, though. Such climes were not entirely unknown to them, for most of Fuuka was subject to similarly sweltering summers. Hime itself often saw summer temperatures that made it possible to cook an egg on the sidewalk, and the national fashion was the short tunic, which showed off their nicely browned legs.

But their auxiliaries were a people who did cooking indoors and wore thick trousers and full skirts. To the Otomeians, the Mentulaean climate was as much a foe as it was foreign. Formerly unflappable, the blonde giants suddenly took to carrying fans with them, flapping away during every opportunity they could grab. Not that breezes were scarce where they were, on the Mentulaean steppes; indeed, they rolled helter-skelter over the wide plains. But they were coarse winds, unfriendly ones, burdened with heat and dust. They hit your face with a slap, and it was a slap from a hand full of calluses.

The weather was actually special, in a way. Some of the local informants confessed to finding it a hotter summer than was normal for the empire-and not just from a political perspective. Even when told this, however, the auxiliaries of the Fujino Army were little inclined to pardoning the land. They had already made up their minds, that it was as much a land of wretched seasons as it was one of wretched soldiers. It was no wonder the Mentulaeans were such cowards, they would say, since people used to such battlefields would logically be eager for opportunities to run off it. It was no wonder that the Mentulaean commanders were so paltry, since the heat of their homelands must have long baked to ashes whatever minds they used to house under their sparse thatches (the Mentulae kept their hair short, like the Himeans, although they also grew beards). In the same way was it found no wonder that the Mentulaeans lacked engineers in their armies, since it would be pointless to try to divert streams in a place where the sun probably dried them up in minutes. How many things were suddenly found devoid of wonder! Save for the actual heat, at any rate.

That the panting, sweating Otomeians had taken to blaming the climate for every negative trait in their enemy was because they were unwilling to show their own. They were a people who preferred to maintain a stoic ability to deal with all rigours in front of others-and no matter how much time they had spent with their allies by now, the Himeans were still others. So, unable to carp the way others would, the Otomeians settled for casting blame on the weather for everything that seemed weak or wrong in the foe instead of acknowledging that it could possibly bring out something weak or wrong in them.

It was why, when the grooms told their polemarch that the heat was also the reason the Mentulaean horses were diminutive, she took the remark with the look of someone who had expected it.

"The horses probably die before they get a chance to get big enough, Princess," one said with confidence, hair pulled tightly up in a knot on his head: it was too hot to wear down, so most of the Otomeians had taken to pulling up their tresses. "Like Jahey says, they'd just keel right over once summer rolls in."

"Surprised any of them can even take the heat!"

"Like he says, Princess. Surprising."

"Damned if the bigger ones don't go faster!"

"Like he says, Princess. The bigger ones."

When asked what she thought, she said she was inclined to say it was like he said.

She then wondered aloud if it was because larger animals had more hide upon them. By which, she said, she meant that they had a larger surface with which to absorb the light and warmth of the day. Smaller things absorbed and retained less heat, so larger ones would be more likely to perish from overheating.

So much did she observe to the grooms, who listened earnestly to her ideas. She owned one of the most esteemed horse breeding concerns in the nation, which made her a valuable authority on equine matters. When they said afterwards that hers was a most creditable theory, the valuable authority told them they would likely perish faster than her in these lands then, which had both (much bigger) men laughing. As soon as her steed was saddled, however, the polemarch ended the conversation with them without ceremony and quickly prepared to leave.

As usual, her personal guard attempted to tag along, even going so far as to prepare his own steed.

She took one look and said no to him, although she did eye his horse rather more kindly.

"But what if you-"

"No."

"But there might-"

"No."

"Princess, be-"

"Zidek, you tire me."

The titanic Zidek fidgeted, shifting from one boat-like foot to the other. He looked like the largest child that had ever been scolded, thought Natsuki, sighing quietly to herself.

"I always ride far from the field," she said, knowing this particular child was especially concerned for her safety as well as especially sensitive. "Am I a child, you children, that you worry if I ride alone?"

She glanced to the side as if remembering something.

"It is nuh-not a condition that endures overlong nowadays, besides that," she added morosely. Seeing the confusion on his face, she clicked her tongue at the woman fixing a waterskin to her saddle.

"The princess means that she never gets to ride alone now," Kavine said to Zidek. "Not for long, anyway, given that one of you oafs always manages to follow her with an excuse."

He had the grace to look apologetic, it being the first time he had ever heard their princess complain of it.

"We don't mean that it should gall you, Princess," he said lamely, and received a look that asked if she had ever accused them otherwise. Wisely he resigned himself: "What should I do while you ride?"

"Discover a hobby." A pause, then a thoughtful squint. "Get a wife."

He grinned at Kavine's poorly-concealed laughter and helped the princess up her mount. He did the job with ease, practically lifting her onto the horse with one hand. She was tiny, their polemarch, even if she was also great.

"Your horse, Zidek," said the great little girl looking at him with green eyes. "From Baron Tharren's?"

"Yes, Princess-a reward after battle. How did you know?"

"It has the look. Handsome." She smiled. "But not young."

"No, he's quite as long in the tooth as I am now, the old boy."

He found the princess eyeing him with scepticism.

"I see no grey hairs," she said.

"Horses don't show age as we do, Princess."

As both of them knew she had been speaking of him and not the horse, her response to this was drier than the wind.

"You are an idiot."

"The princess's sword," said Kavine, who was now busy with a satchel of edibles. There were two hard cheeses in it, along with a small loaf of bread and some dried meat and fruit. It was all food the princess liked to eat, although they knew she would touch none of the items: she had an annoying habit of forgetting about food even when it sat next to her hand. Thank goodness the Himean commander made a point of forcing her to eat more whenever they sat together at the table! The princess's poor staff were ever worrying about keeping her fed, wondering how to tear her away from those rolls of paper and parchment she preferred to consume when the commander was not watching. Books, of all things! Who could possibly live on them alone? They knew no one who could, yet their princess seemed eager to try it.

Zidek waited for the satchel to be secured first before he handed over the requested weapon. It was the princess's Himean sword, a long and thin blade that he admired very much. It had been given to her by someone important, according to the others, and that was why she insisted on having it with her wherever she went. It did not matter if there would be occasion to use it or not, which was allegedly a demonstration of the regard she had held for the giver. Privately, however, Zidek felt that she simply wanted to keep it with her because it was so beautiful. If he had a sword like that he would bring it everywhere too, just to let others know he owned such a treasure.

But then again, he allowed, their princess had never been the type to show off her wealth.

"The hat today, Princess?" asked Kavine, looking at the headpiece the princess had in hand.

"No." She handed it over. "Tie this to the saddle."

"As you wish. You will wear the scarf?"

"Yes."

The hat joined the sword and other things strapped to the saddle; Kavine handed over the scarf for her princess's head. The cloth went over Natsuki's scalp, over her nose and her mouth, and the loose tags of it draped around her shoulders. It left bare only her eyes and the neatly gathered tail of her mane. The resulting enclosure was a touch stifling, but Natsuki refused the alternative: she thought the hat looked ridiculous, with its dangling chinstraps and gigantic straw brim. She only tied that other headgear to her saddle in deference to her lover's wishes that she bring it. It was true that it might be more comfortable than the scarf were she not concerned about airborne sand and her mount's speed, but as these were things to be taken into account, she could justify the scarf. There was also her dignity to consider, and as far as that was concerned, the scarf won by a mile.

Even though Shizuru had burst into laughter upon first sight of her with it, side-saddle on a horse and dangling a cane with one hand.

You look like a mad Arab, my love.

She was too aware of the many oddities of her appearance on horseback now to have felt the least bit insulted. People still stared when they saw her side-saddle perch, even more when she had her pet cat in tow. She had left Shizuki in the tent and under her servants' eyes this time, however, as she preferred to keep the big cat out of the sun. Its fur trapped heat-like her own hair-and she could not countenance the thought of having it perish right under her watch. She would have left it in Base Camp, where she thought it would be more comfortable, had it not been for Shizuru's insistence on it coming with them for now. She seemed to think Natsuki safer when the animal was around, although Natsuki pointed out that it was not a dog and might not think to attack anyone assaulting her.

"Even so, you never know," Shizuru had persisted. "Beasts often comprehend more than we think they do. I would not be surprised to see her leap to your defence were she to sense some danger to you."

Her black stallion too she left in the stables. The horse she used in the daytime was younger, but still one of her favoured mounts: one so favoured, in fact, that the appreciation for it extended far beyond Natsuki herself. No fewer than thirteen other nobles had made offers to purchase the animal when it had yet been a foal. Even the king, upon finally seeing the filly, had remarked that it was as well for the princess that he no longer rode much at his age or he might have offered to buy the animal himself-which would have been an offer the princess could not have turned down. As it was, no one had prevailed upon the princess to part with the creature, whose unique coat it was that had many an Otomeian in raptures. Properly a cremello, the filly had a metallic gloss to her fur that gave it the look of electrum with less gold than silver. She had pale hooves below spun-metal pasterns, a pink skin under her fantastic hair, and eyes blue as an Otomeian's on a bright winter day.

Natsuki thought Aurea the only possible name.

Aurea was Natsuki's pride and joy in a different way from how Niger-and when he had still been hers, Albinus-was that. Whereas Niger was a representative of the classic Otomeian horse at its best, enormous in every aspect and almost physically overpowering by sheer presence, Aurea was a freak, even if she was a breathtaking one. She was the first of her coat any of them had ever seen, for one thing. Other cremellos there were, yes, but none with coats of that metallic shine. Even her conformation was deviant from the typical stock. While she was nearly as tall as Niger, her head was slimmer and less robust, her neck and legs longer-looking and more gracile. She was all lines and leanness, delicate but deep-chested, and certainly more suitable for parade than for war. And how many of Otomeia's noble warlords wanted to parade her!

But Aurea was one of Natsuki's special pleasures, one of the few things she permitted herself to own in true selfishness. In her ownership of Aurea was an absence of guilt, of considerations of sharing or social obligation. Shizuru had guessed at it after recovering from her own first encounter with the animal, teasing that Natsuki had been holding out on her after all.

Aware of the jest but slightly embarrassed, Natsuki had replied that Shizuru was at liberty to return Albinus if she found him unsatisfactory.

"Are you saying you would replace him with a more satisfactory animal to carry me if I did?" Shizuru had answered, glancing pointedly at Aurea.

"Could be," Natsuki had countered, glancing pointedly at Zidek.

Shizuru had decided that Albinus was more than satisfactory after all.

The polemarch held in Aurea while she was yet in the camp, but urged the horse to go faster once they made it out of the gates. The sentries barked salutes to her when she passed, even though she carried no officer's insignia. Everyone in camp knew that filly on sight and the strange rider perched on it as though it were a bench instead of a moving animal.

The rider clove to the hills as she had told Zidek, every now and then even running into one of the army lookouts. Her track was an uneven one since she stuck not to the shorter paths but to the shadiest ones. Even if she was fully geared to stop the sun's touch, she knew better than to think that was enough to stop the heat. Besides, like all other Otomeians, she was a conscientious user of horses: Aurea was not proof to sunburn, even if the filly could weather ambient heat much better than her heavier and darker stallion.

The besieged citadel she kept on her right, deliberately driving first for the ground she knew the Himean officers would not occupy. She knew Shizuru would forgive her if she put off their greetings for the morn, especially if she explained her reason. She merely wanted to see the field from a different perspective before she went to share her lover's; her spectatorship, she believed, would be much more interesting for the difference.

She heard her pursuer before she saw him, and slowed Aurea's pace to a walk.

"Polemarch," said her chaser, pulling roughly at the scarf around his head. "May I accompa-"

A sharp tug halted both his words and her steed, which blew through its nose.

"If you cannot spare the chaperonage, you shall spare the lies." She turned her head to address the man looking sheepishly at her, a wince evident in his eyes. "You ask, but you shall follow me regardless of my response. We both know your fellows sent you to be my lookout."

"But I, uh... but I was actually sent to you to convey the reports of the day, Princess!"

Green eyes rolled all the way to the grass.

"The day," she said, "has only just begun."

"But today may be the day-"

She cut him off with a loud snap of the teeth, her chin lifting, head thrown back. Her neck was so long that the scarf over her shoulders could not obscure the pose, which reminded the alarmed Arichnos of a horse about to rear.

"May be," said the princess, "is not a thing to report at the start of the day. A May Be is not a report but a phrase for those in command."

She danced her horse before his, a minor dust storm roiling about her steed. For a moment he did not know whether she would gallop away or have her filly kick his in the face.

Yet her voice was controlled when again she spoke, no shout hidden in its tones.

"Tell me now, Arichnos, you paragon of report-givers, do you really think May Be's are things to which a polemarch would be ignorant?"

Her glare, he thought, was withering him faster than the sun.

"I don't - I suppose, I guess not, Polemarch," he stuttered out. "I guess a polemarch wouldn't be ignorant of them, at least I think so. I mean, I don't know much about polemarchs, so I don't rightly know the answer. I mean, I'm sorry to say you're the only polemarch I've ever known, Princess Natsuki, so I guess I could... be wrong."

She gave him one of the looks with which he was familiar: a glimmering one that he never had been able to parse into understanding yet had often encountered from her.

"Report," she eventually said, her voice low but rather softer than before. He blew out a sigh of relief at the change and launched into recitation.

As Arichnos delivered the day's reports-which had not changed from yesterday's, as she had suspected-Natsuki paused to drain the laughter that had nearly bubbled out at his bumbling, wondering which of her officers had sent Arichnos for her daily escort. Most of them shared her opinion of him, which was that the man was a good fighter and a well-meaning person. Unfortunately, they also all thought said well-meaning person an intellectual lightweight. It was a nice coincidence, everyone agreed, that he also had the sort of manner that made him more amusement than annoyance. A bearable sort of fool with his uses, which was probably the best kind of fool there was.

She busied herself with scanning Lasandre as he babbled on- truly a fool, anyone else would have simply noted which things were unchanged and moved on to whatever was new-and eyed the troop positions, looking longest at the shady tents under which some of the troops were resting. These unorthodox battlefield structures had been installed by the commander as a solution to the summer sun, a means of making the soldiers more comfortable and keeping them fresher for longer on the field. There were also non-combatants and donkey trains bringing water to the soldiers and their steeds, and these supply trails ran constantly, like tells for invisible roadways on the plain.

Natsuki knew that the unconventional shade and water provisions had initially provoked debate among the Himean officers, some of whom thought the troops were being unnecessarily babied. Not that the debate was held within the hearing of high command! Whatever dissenting opinions there were about the general's orders were expressed far away from her ears-although not quite far enough from the Otomeian polemarch's sensitive ones for her to fail to detect them.

Natsuki had not bothered telling her lover about the disagreement since she thought it inconsequential; she thought all the dissenters would change their tune once the siege started. And in this she was right: the carping officers reversed directions after the true work got underway. There were still some who would prate noisily of having soldiered in worse heat with no such provisions, constantly telling the men they were epically lucky to be soldiering in such comfort by comparison-but she thought that to be expected, the natural braggadocio of one soldier to another.

She said little on the topic herself to her own troops, but knew that the arguably bigger beneficiaries were her people. Even though most of the Otomeians currently in the Fujino Army were from the lowland provinces of the realm, there were still a fair number of the citadel-dwellers present, particularly in the cavalry contingents. This meant that a good portion of the horse was made up of people chafing constantly from the heat, and who thus needed all the water and shade they could get, at least if they were to function as the commander was expecting.

It was also why the auxiliaries were supplied with white scarves for their heads and adjured to keep on full sleeves and trouser legs. This was to prevent them baking blisters into their white skins during the day. To the Himean commander's relief, most of the northerners demonstrated a happy ability to brown after the reddening phase. There were some unlucky exceptions, however. Several merely found themselves with itchy hides that peeled off into skin that was first pinkish, then even whiter than before. These were the most vigilant about their dress when going out of their tents by day, as the army doctors had warned of permanent scarring if they did not keep themselves covered or in the shade.

Natsuki was part of this group, and it was a constant source of anxiety for the commander herself.

"Oh, for heaven's sake, I told you to bring your hat!" she would groan each time she saw the princess return to the tent without the object on head or in hand. "Every time you go out was what the medicus said. Gods know I love you, mea vita, but you are tempting the paddle."

Natsuki would roll her eyes in a way that made no secret of her weariness on the subject.

"You are paranoid beyond the telling of it," she would say, speaking her language because Shizuru had. "Ten minutes spent and eight metres away."

"I care not how long or far-the medicus insisted. Your lovely skin!"

"Is fine. You see it?"

"Yet another thing! I should not even be able to see the skin of your arms if you come from outside. Even your arms can burn, Natsuki, so roll down those sleeves."

Another roll of the eyes, whereupon the other's sensuous mouth would twist ruefully.

"Stop being so mulish, please, and do as I say... or one of these days, I shall throw you over my knee. You've yet to feel a true sunburn, Princess, and it would pain you more than a spanking. Do you really want to end up as a roast when you come back to me?"

"I am roasting now," an embarrassed Natsuki would mutter, profoundly glad that no one else in the tent either spoke her tongue or understood it.

The cataphracts had also been shifted into lighter cavalry gear for the moment, both horses and humans made to shed their metal shells. The heavy lances and swords, they retained. As Natsuki pointed out to the commander when asked if she thought this wise, it would in fact be easier for them to manoeuvre those now that they were working with less weight on their bodies. The heat would be no obstacle to it, she argued, given all the other precautions taken to ensure the heavy cavalry stayed cool. Besides which, she said, the cataphracts were not like the Lupine Division. They were trained all their lives to use the heavy lances and swords and those weapons alone. Forcing them to use full-on light cavalry or even archery gear, according to their polemarch, would likely result in them being wasted anyway despite the modifications made to their armour.

The Lupine Division had its own concessions to make, even though it was one of the lightly armoured units. While the leather trappings of their costume were retained, the Polemarch gave the order for the division's members to switch to light uniforms and put the dark ones in storage.

"Black is hot," she said succinctly, tapping her own pate.

Since they were a key cavalry unit and also used for more than one purpose, Shizuru decided that she wanted the Lupine Division easily distinguishable from the other white-uniformed troopers from a distance. This had been easier when they had been black-clothed, as they were the only ones so-uniformed among the horse. After some discussion, it was decided that they would also be provided with striped scarves instead of the standard plain ones. Natsuki could see her old unit easily even from a distance, the blue striping of their headscarves clear in the day.

There was the thud of missiles from the catapultae hitting the wall.

She redirected her attention there, drawn to the sound. It came sporadically, interrupted by intervals of parade and verbal harassment for the defenders atop the battlements. Not far off was more activity, visible to all on the field: a catapult's throw from Lasandre, the base of a siege tower was rising.

There was a lot to look on in this field, but the sound made up more of it than the sights for the polemarch. The imprecations thrown from one side to the other, the incessant yells and hammering, the low roll of rocks and rubble each time another stone was hurled at the citadel-these joined with Arichnos's droning report in a symphony of battle that formed a logical familiarity to her ears. And although there was no distinct sound to it yet, she could hear the other instrument already playing: a May Be is coming .

Eventually one part of the melody petered away. Her companion's memorised reports were drained and his recital ground to a halt.

Not that his mouth did the same.

"The battle we want aside, I don't see why we don't take the city already," he sighed with obvious puzzlement, eliciting from her a sigh of obvious restraint. The polemarch deigned to reply even so, perhaps due to some vestiges of her old captainship: she never had been able to resist plucking out military ignorance in her troopers whenever opportunity presented it.

Even if it did present a little more often in some.

"If the city were taken, there would be no battle. If the battle happens, the city will be taken."

His look reminded her of a friend's old hunting dog: the folds in his brow and cock of his head inquisitive and constantly perplexed by the world, his attitude earnest if comically ignorant.

How fortunate was Arichnos! She happened to like old hunting dogs.

"But we can take it without the battle can't we?" he answered, worrying his original bone. "Why don't they just bombard it day and night until one of those walls falls? The Himeans brought so many of their siege engines with them! It will take a while given the thickness of the walls, I suppose, but it would still be possible."

She smiled, but at the horizon and not at him. There was already a cloud of dust thicker than the other clouds of dust in the distance to the south, and that could mean only one thing. Today was the day after all.

"They do not break the city because they do not want to break it," she said patiently. "What they want is to have it."

She needed only to cast her mind back to a conversation with her lover for proof of this. They had still been in Shizuma's camp then and were discussing the strategy at Lasandre when she had asked it: would Shizuru offer terms to the inhabitants of the citadel before attacking them, to give them a chance to surrender?

"Of course," had been the other's answer. "Have I not offered that to all the cities and towns thus far?"

Natsuki had avowed the possible foolishness of her question.

"The terms shall be the same as the ones I offered the others, naturally," the other had gone on. "They get leniency and protection if they surrender within one hour."

To this she had replied with a sceptical lift of the eyebrow. Lasandre was unlike the other towns Shizuru had taken thus far in that it was built to withstand sieges, one of the relatively few stone citadels of the empire and one of the great fortresses of the Mentulæan heartlands. Its walls were thick enough to withstand sustained battery for days, and they were tall enough not to be scaled by quickly-built ramps. Collapsing Lasandre's walls-whether they were physical or mental-was not something done in an hour's time.

Something Shizuru had already known, judging by the woman's smirk.

"You do not want them to surrender," she had concluded.

"I do not. At least not within the first hour."

"I see."

"Do you really?"

And she had, with nothing but perfect clarity. Were the people of Lasandre to surrender to the stated terms, Shizuru would be compelled to stand by her promise of offering them peaceful settlements, Extended Rights citizenships, retention of their homes and present lands. This meant that Lasandre would stay populated by most of its original inhabitants, as indeed surrendered towns such as Asterion were.

This was in fact what Shizuru wanted for most of the empire. She had long been a believer in the aspect of conquest that presented as conversion. It was something that would be problematic were it to be applied to Lasandre's case, however, since Shizuru wanted that citadel as a linchpin location for the central offensive. The more Mentulæans stayed in Lasandre, the more potential traitors would be compromising its integrity as a Himean-owned fort-and given that the Mentulaeans of the central regions identified their loyalties firmly with the empire, that was not something Shizuru had any intention of risking.

Better to take all Lasandre captive and sell it to slavery, apparently.

"You can be ruthless," had been Natsuki's verdict.

Shizuru had agreed.

"In fact, I often am," the woman had laughed. "Somehow, I do not think that disillusion or disappoints you in any way."

And she was right, as she often-almost frustratingly, always impressively-was. Natsuki knew she had never expected Shizuru to display anything else where her schemes were concerned, and she knew Shizuru well enough too to know that this was a woman nearly always scheming. Given the excellence of her schemes, however, why should that be disappointing? Rather, she even thought it worthy of praise. Even the Princess Alyssa, who begrudged the Himean a lot of things, had admitted to some admiration of that particular ability.

"I find her unpleasant because she's the sort it would behoove me to distrust," the other princess had stated during a private conversation. "It's not just because of our dispute over you, Natsuki, let that be clear. She's very sly, this foreigner of yours, even brilliantly so. The sort of devil who would outwit a fox in its hole."

The two Otomeian nobles had been having lunch, the elder having come over to the Fujino camp to call on the polemarch. The army heading to Lasandre had made camp near Alyssa's own, and so it was only to be expected that the elder princess would pay the younger a visit at the time. She had sent a rider ahead of her to inform Natsuki of it-and also to make sure the army's commander knew of her impending arrival.

When Shizuru was told of the planned meeting, she had been nothing but gracious. She had even encouraged the polemarch to make the most of it by inviting her suitor to "a cordial lunch". The cousins would not have much time to spend after all, she had noted, as the march would resume the day after that. Who knew when they would see each other again and have space for this sort of encounter?

Even Natsuki had been surprised enough by this magnanimity to take her lover to task. Upon asking, she had been met with a smirk and a reminder: they would be having lunch in Shizuru's camp, within her quarters and surrounded by her people. Most importantly of all, perhaps, they would do it with her express permission.

To those with the upper hand, Natsuki inferred afterwards, magnanimity came at a lower price.

"She is... political," had been Natsuki's uncomfortable response after Alyssa's accurate observation. "It would be necessary."

Alyssa's expression had been flat enough to balance a marble without it rolling.

"That is what they say," the woman had eventually answered. "I feel compelled to point out that your new status as Polemarch of the Otomeians does increase your political interests as well, though-as we've seen in recent diplomatic events to do with the Corosians and Benii, am I right?"

Natsuki had been intrigued by the choice of topic. The tribes Alyssa had named were the largest ones among the many occupying the new, northernmost Mentulaeen territories: these were the rebellious peoples in the lands beyond the northern banks of the Holmys. They were also among the ones she had offered an alliance and aid in their own conflict with the empire, in order to make trouble for the enemy.

"You disapprove?" she had asked her cousin, who doubtless already knew all the details of that venture.

"No. Allying ourselves with the enemies of our enemies is only good sense." She had quirked her yellow eyebrows at Natsuki, her blue eyes gleaming. "As far as I'm concerned, for any political being."

"I am political, then. Am I also sly?"

"You are many things, Princess Natsuki."

"It is not an answer, Princess Alyssa."

"No, but I had not intended to be. Are you sly? Smart, yes. Clever, yes. Strategic, certainly. But sly, unfortunately or fortunately enough, no, I incline to doubting it."

Natsuki's brow had knitted, although not in offence at the verdict.

"May I know by what leverage you achieve that slant?" she had asked, prompting a chuckle.

"Oh, enough to make the inclination steep. For example, were you actually sly, you would have agreed to my proposal to be betrothed for the future already."

Natsuki had been surprised, but had chosen to say nothing.

"You see, had you been sly, you would have seen that it's in your interests to agree to my offer and extract a promise from me on it. Then you would have had me on a string while also enjoying the fish on the other line."

Again Natsuki had chosen to say nothing.

"Think of the neatness of it. You would not have needed to honour the betrothal later on then, if indeed your foreign lover proved constant-unlikely as that may be. And if your foreigner proved inconstant after all, why, you would still have me waiting for you and ready to see our betrothal through. In other words, by agreeing to my proposal yet not actually marrying me, you would have had the excellent security of always having at least one of two influential lovers to choose from at the end, no matter what should happen in the future."

Looking into the unspeaking girl's face, Alyssa had scoffed: "Come now, Princess Natsuki, of course it would have been the slyer-in fact, more political-thing to do! You can hardly claim it to be unjust or less than savoury since you claimed your lover to be the sly type herself. Shall you now claim political natures to be distasteful?"

It had always fascinated her, Natsuki had thought then, how much some people could make out of nothing.

"Nuh-nuh-now it is you who is sly, Princess Alyssa," she had responded, speaking gently but with the barest rumble of accusation. "You try to convince me to the choice you prefer by... by suggesting all consequences shall only be of my choosing in such a situation. Buh-but we know I have not the power to restrict fate so."

"Why, are you not mistress of yours?"

Natsuki's response had been given with all the dignity in her being.

"I am a cripple and an orphan."

Alyssa had been obliged to concede defeat.

"I thank you for the offer, cousin," Natsuki had continued. "It warms my heart. I - I speak no falsehood."

"Mm, you never do, which proves my point on your slyness or lack of it."

"But my answer remains the same."

"Of course it does, for god's sake!" The older woman had chuckled deep in her throat at the younger's befuddlement, her expression lightening and her face transformed by it. "Your foreigner is still yours and yours alone, is she not? Until that changes, I doubt your answer will as well, little cousin. You take my words too seriously when I was only teasing you."

"Not testing, Princess Alyssa?"

The other had laughed aloud.

"Perhaps a little of that too," Alyssa had admitted. "Who says one's words always have but one purpose? But then, Princess, that would be the thing to remember. You and your foreigner are not the only ones who can be political."

Of that there was no doubt. Even if she was not sly, the Princess Natsuki was nevertheless truly political: sufficiently so to see the trait in other beings. She was political enough, for instance, to grasp exactly what Alyssa had meant by the slyness of agreeing to her proposal even before the elder princess expanded on the argument. She was political enough, in fact, to go beyond understanding those with whom she had grown up, political enough to grasp the slippery slyness of activities from others operating in different arenas of power... as she did, for example, in Chikane Himemiya's enormous personal-and enormously political-gift in offering to adopt her.

Now there was a topic worth dwelling on and turning about in mental acrobatics! It had certainly exercised her and Shizuru's minds that way of late. It was such a shock for both of them. Even Shizuru had said it, and whatever shocked Shizuru could knock out anyone else's teeth-and if Shizuru was involved in the shock, possibly their jaw.

"No, I had no expectations, no inkling of it," her golden lover had professed, her lovely eyes larger than normal and bleeding astonishment. "None whatsoever, I swear. I had not even dreamt of asking her such a thing, Natsuki, for indeed one cannot easily ask for a gift like this one. And most certainly not of a Himemiya!"

Natsuki had done little more than nod then, being too winded by the offer to say anything herself.

"Ye gods," Shizuru had continued, putting a hand to her brow as if blinded-perhaps she had been, Natsuki thought, in a way. "I have known her since youth but even now she surprises me. Oh, I am shocked beyond all measure, but I could kiss the madwoman!"

That had loosened Natsuki's tongue.

"Then," she had uttered, "you wish me to accept it?"

The look she received had been conflicted.

"What I wish is immaterial. I still adjure you to do only as you like, and Chikane herself cautions the same. You should make your own decision on the matter."

"I shall. Still I ask."

"Well, Chikane offers no small thing, meum mel," Shizuru had responded, sketching out a smile that was at once vulnerable in its trust and full of hope. "It is not a gift I can easily refuse, and the gift I cannot refuse is rare indeed. Chikane, through adoption of the kind she offers, can give you things I never could, not least of which would be the sort of protection in a Himean society that even marriage to me-perhaps even especially marriage to me-could not grant."

And then Shizuru had proceeded to explain to her what had long been a possible problem in their marriage plans. For them to get married in a way that would be recognised by Himean Law, Natsuki had to acquire either one form of the Extended Rights or the full citizenship. Shizuru's status meant the latter option was the only acceptable one, and the older woman had already drawn up the papers for it, in fact. She had yet to file those papers, however, because of a little hitch that kept staying her hand: the way the Himean citizenship was granted.

Ever canny, the first Himeans to offer or grant the citizenship to outsiders had been ones in the mould of the typical senator. They gave it away purportedly for reasons to do with honour-as when thanking eminent allies of noble birth for considerable services rendered in battle-or reasons to do with money-as with wealthy-enough foreigners willing to pay an exorbitant fee in exchange. Purportedly. The true motivations, as Shizuru had explained, were unsurprisingly political. In truth, the Himeans only began awarding, selling, or giving the citizenship to gain clients.

A large clientele was one of the best forms of political leverage, and making new citizens one of the best ways of expanding it. Because the citizenship was for life, it was also a cliental contract for life. And if the client happened to marry a Himean or had a spouse who was also given an appropriate citizenship, their children would be Himean too-as well as clients of their parents' patron. The grace of being born as Himean citizens, after all, was only theirs thanks to him. The same went for the children of the original client's children. It was the cliental relationship that could theoretically run on into perpetuity.

It was also not the kind of relationship you wanted to have with someone you wanted to marry.

One could not possibly have one's spouse in a position where she appeared as one's client. It made it all too easy for critics to paint her as bought property. If you were your own wife's patron, what was to say your marriage to her had not been the price she paid for the boon of the citizenship? Or even worse, what was to say it had not been more order than exchange, the demand of a master exercising his will and whims over a slave with whom he had grown obsessed to the point of lunacy?

Natsuki saw instantly the invidious suggestions that could be made there, in such a cliental relation as she and her lover would be having. She knew then that this was something the Himean had been worrying about for some time-and kept from her too, yes, but she did not blame the woman for it. It was a hard thing to explain to someone you wished to take to wife, and when that someone had not yet agreed to your proposal, it was even harder to say it.

So she could see why Shizuru had near-sagged with relief at her friend's proposition. Chikane Himemiya's scheme would save Natsuki the odium of being client to her (possible) wife, yet would still ensure for her the full citizenship. The adoption would make her a daughter of the Himemiya and no daughter of a Himemiya was ever under cliental obligation to another.

Not even to a Fujino who was also a Hanazono through her mother's side.

"It would also be wonderful social protection, since it adds Chikane's weight to mine," Shizuru had emphasised. "Any insults cast at you would be ones against both my family and Chikane's. I told you before that Chikane's family would be one of the few that could rival mine in terms of prestige and that was no exaggeration; ask anyone here about the founding of our nation and he will mention the Himemiya name in the story."

"I credit it."

"Then you can credit what a worthy offer it is."

Natsuki had squinted: "But I... I am sorry to ask this."

"Ask away and do not be sorry."

"Thank you. It is that, um, is not your friend-is not Chikane Himemiya the one with the wife your peers call unworthy?"

"Yes. Why do you ask?"

"Then forgive me, Shizuru, but I must say it. Would it not be easy for them to ridicule the relation anyway, as further proof of her being... being, um..."

Shizuru had grinned. "Insane?"

"Mm."

"Jupiter, I love your mind. But to answer that, yes, there are likely many who will say it of her as well as of me. Well, they say it already of many of us old patrician families, so I daresay neither of us will care much at that accusation. Besides, the critique you just predicted would still be an insult easier to weather than the one painting you as my slave-client. The latter is simply, well, insupportable! I could not have it said of my wife, Natsuki, that she married me only at sword-point or under the slave's leash. It goes against all dignity and decency."

Natsuki had been unable to resist a smirk.

"I will remember to say this next you try to coerce me into agreement when we are abed, Shizuru."

"As it is, I fear my parameters for dignity and decency yet accept that, meum mel," Shizuru had smiled back somewhat naughtily, looking suddenly like a girl again. It did not last, however, as she had slipped quickly back into her more womanly, mature mien:

"Really, Natsuki, what Chikane offers to us is a splendid thing. Not only would it spare you the shameful cast to your character-and mine, of course-that I just mentioned, but it would also make it harder to insult you to your face. Chikane's reprisal for offences to her family is something people would not take lightly. Granted, she says that she would immediately transfer to me her familial authority over you-which is a legal authority in our world, by the way-once we are married. Even after that, though, you would hold the Himemiya clan's public loyalty afterwards, whether the other members of Chikane's family like it or not. Once you are formally adopted by their family head-that is Chikane herself-they have no choice but to consider you one of them, to esteem and protect, at least in front of the world. Oh, wonderful! It would be such a neat point too, you know: since you would then be my dearest friend's daughter, the ties between Chikane and myself would be even firmer than they already are. Why, the two of us would become legal immediate family! A good joining of lineages and leverage, if I were to be politically self-concerned about it."

Natsuki had listened intently to her lover's impassioned speech, sorting through the tumble of information until she managed to make an orderly thing of the mess in her head. Then she saw why Shizuru was so excited, so pleased and wishful of accepting the offering. It was, as the woman said, not a gift one could easily refuse.

Yet she herself was not yet beyond the notion of refusing it.

Her hesitations were not out of any redirected reluctance about taking the citizenship. While Otomeia was influenced by many of the same aspects of Hellenic culture that had also influenced Hime, a rigid and exclusive concept of citizenship was not one of them. For if one was born and bred an Otomeian and identified so, one was an Otomeian. No census was needed, no bureaucratic stamp or seal required. A Himean citizenship would not stop making Princess Natsuki an Otomeian, just as it would not expel the Ortygian blood animating her body. Legalities, for all their power, did not change realities of this type. At least not from the Otomeian point of view.

So it was no trouble to the Princess Natsuki to think of gaining a citizenship from Hime. She could own it without being rendered any less Otomeian in most useful senses, whether in her people's eyes or her own. No, what troubled her about this new decision was something else: it was actually none other than the person making the offer herself.

The consular Himemiya Major was an intimidating personality in Natsuki's life, even if they had never actually seen each other nor even communicated to each other in any way. Yet the woman's hand touched Natsuki in many ways. She was the person who had contrived to send Shizuru back to the North, the former senior consul and a prominent senator of Shizuru's nation. She was Shizuru's most beloved friend, the one Shizuru trusted with everything she did. She was also the elder sister of Suou Himemiya, a friend Natsuki had never expected to get or lose as she had. And perhaps it was the last identification that made it hardest to swallow the offer Chikane presented.

Suou Himemiya was a landmark in Natsuki's history. This was saying something when you had a history as landmark-laden as she did. Suou was even a landmark Natsuki visited every day, for not a day passed that Natsuki did not grieve not being able to see that face one last time before they burned it. Poor, blonde, beautiful Suou! It seemed almost impossible to think of someone that handsome being thrown to the flames and the kindling, reduced to a heap of dust that she had never even seen in the aftermath.

Had someone who had known her all her life been allowed to reflect on it, they might have concluded that this was perhaps what affected her so much about it, aside from actual affection for the deceased. All Natsuki's deaths-the ones of those significant enough in her life to be counted-had been followed by a body, from the corpses of her parents atop her to those of her troopers on the field. There was always a body to gather up after the event, a talisman of farewell and mourning. Not so with Suou. All Natsuki had found, upon waking from the stupor of sickness and loss, had been other people's voices telling her the woman was gone. No bodies, no bones; no ashes even to sift. It was almost as if Suou had dematerialised in death and somehow turned into air.

It was more disappearance than death in a way, an event that occurred almost entirely out of Natsuki's presence. She had not been there to protect or stand by her friend's side when she died and she had not been there to see the body fall to ash on the pyre. It underscored to Natsuki's eyes how far she had failed the woman that Suou had simply evanesced into inexistence without her noticing. Yet there was more to her sin than neglect. She also agonised perpetually over whether or not her ill fortune had gotten that wonderful woman killed, just as it had been her ill fortune that had gotten her family slaughtered. It was just a possibility, one thought amidst the grief. But considering that possibility, that single chance, how could she even begin to accept what Suou's sister was proposing?

There were other nuances to the issue, ones that were no less important and certainly no less complex. Marriage was an affair of intricacies, at least for people of her and her lover's lives and standing. Consider the King of the Otomeians' reaction to such a proposal, since it would undoubtedly ruin a critical part of his plans. Oh, Natsuki was no fool: she knew she was being used as a toy on a string, was just being dangled in front of the powerful, political lion from the south to keep it happy. She knew the king's intention was to keep that big cat batting away interestedly at her and thus retain some hold on it. What would he say if he knew what that lion was planning, which was to spirit away the whole toy, with every one of its strings?

Consider too how to resolve the matter of her properties: would Himean citizenship subject her finances to review or compel them to disclose her wealth to the Himean government, one that Shizuru herself avowed to be ever on the lookout for those with more rather than less? Money could be as much a hindrance as it could be a help, and when you had as much money as she did, it could be monumental in either form. She did not mind giving her fortune to the enterprises of the woman she loved, but she would be damned if the hard-won wealth of her forebears ended up being appropriated by another nation on a matter of law. Were Shizuru queen of Hime and here she shook her head again at the wrong that Shizuru was not—it would be different, for whatever was the wealth of the state would then be Shizuru's as well. But as it was not so, Natsuki had no intention of ceding to a foreign government a single talent of the money of her ancestors.

Even more worrying than the issue of her wealth, however, was that of welding herself to yet another foreign family. Consider also how adoption would tie her to a clan made up of strangers, a clan of whom she had only ever met one representative. Granted, she had loved that representative with all her heart, but even so: that woman was not the one offering to adopt her, offering to become even if only legally-and was anything ever only legal for these people?-her mother by law in that city across the sea. It might have been a gift, but it was also a prospect that was immensely frightening.

"This one's not frightening though, is it?"

Arichnos's voice pulled her from her thoughts again. She followed his gaze and saw the thing she had spied from farther away earlier, the source of the dust column on the horizon.

"Are they ever?" she asked for reply.

"I meant in size, Cap-Polemarch."

"Even then."

"Well, that's right enough. They all look weaklings on the field to me-always did, no matter the size of their armies."

She nodded.

"Still bigger than two of the Himean legions, though. I guess they never make them smaller than that? They've an obsession with being bigger, don't they, though? Probably to make up for the fact that they'll always come up short," he suddenly cackled, his laugh so sharp it startled his horse. In the absence of any echoing laughter, he turned to look at the polemarch.

Her smile was faint but decidedly lenient.

"Ah, male humour, yes?" she asked him.

"Er... yes, Princess."

"Very good."

She paused to consider the multiple meanings of the jest, wondering if the comedian was actually aware of all of them. Either way, it was a better jibe than she would have expected from him, and she thought it deserved repetition of the compliment.

"Yes, very good."

As she delivered the compliment so seriously, however, Arichnos took that to mean she was being sarcastic. He clamped his mouth shut a little sulkily then, berating himself for that failure of judgement: he should have known better than to try out one of those Himean jokes on the princess. Princesses were of a different level from his, and this one was sometimes of a different world!

As for the princess, she spared the jest no more thought since she was busy watching the game unfold. It took some more time, but eventually the Mentulaeen army coming in from the south was near enough. It finally sat down to see what the Himean army was up to.

A tableau of potentials for a moment; the mass stalled tentatively and seethed. Natsuki could practically taste the sweat salting their lips, seasoning the opportunity presented to them.

She knew then that she had chosen a good perch, for it let her know what they could see. There was a citadel invested by an army only two legions strong but boasting a good array of siege machinery. There was a siege tower rising, a path already cleared partway for it. There were open tents housing the besiegers, a good number of whom seemed to be lounging under the shelters. And then there were the siege operators, who were handling most of the aggressive activity.

She saw that it was tempting. Of course, she also knew what they could not see, and it was what soured the temptation for her taste. But that was only from her privileged perspective: the enemy saw things differently. To the Mentulaeans watching the investment, it was the sort of situation that required snappy sense and initiative. Any moment now the Himeans carrying out the siege would decide the newly-arrived enemy was more important than the one they were bullying, and then they would tumble out of their shady enclosures completely geared for a skirmish, would face those lines of artillery the other way, would be perfectly prepared, would be ready...

Suddenly the mass from the south started shuffling, its lines reordering with urgency.

The fox had decided to leap into the hole with the devil after all.

Shizuru's devilry aside, Natsuki thought the fox would leap anyway even could it see what she did. And even had it not, the devil would likely have pursued it. Either way, things would still have developed to the conclusion already taking shape. Everything she saw said this ending was inevitable, at least as far as probabilities could go.

Arichnos had been right earlier in deeming the enemy army only a decent-sized one: the Mentulaean group they faced today was not the size of the bigger armies they had already encountered. This was since it was only a regional defence army and had originally been stationed in Lasandre Citadel. When armies were made for the express purpose of defending a fortress-and one as sturdy as Lasandre, at that-they were sized accordingly, with fewer numbers than would be necessary absent a proper bastion. Overly large armies actually choked fortresses, the best of which could be defended by just a few men.

So this army now looking down the plain was a modestly sized one by the enemy's standards, packed with a decent number of foot but hardly any horse. No machines either, as it had never been intended to go into Himean territory and start invading. To the Himeans and their stalwart allies, not a bad prospect to face on the field.

There was also the mettle of the commander to consider-and it was often what decided everything. From the moment the troops at Lasandre abandoned the citadel, the enemy's commander had proven himself unworthy. They had supposedly moved southward to head off any enemies there that might think of attacking the capital by launching a northward offensive. Stupidity, in her thinking. Keeping Lasandre was more important than blocking incursions from the south now that that frontier had been infiltrated-she would have insisted on it were she part of the Mentulaean command. Any threats originating from the south would have met other obstacles when moving north, especially with the number of Mentulaean forts and loyal towns in the central region. Whereas most of the towns east of Lasandre and facing the river had already been cleared or seized by the Otomeian raiding forces. Lasandre's defenders would have done the empire more good to stand their ground.

It took just a short while before the clash started. The besiegers abandoned their assaults in favour of meeting the attacking enemy, and the battle was joined. It was a predictable fight, in a way, as the Mentulaeen line extended beyond the Himean one when they met face-to-face. It was an obvious result of the disparity of numbers and an attempt at outflanking the smaller party.

Tactically moribund. The polemarch's green eyes were disdainful at this. It is so predictable it enervates the spectator.

But predictable strategies sometimes worked, that much she had to concede. Would this one have worked without the cavalry now issuing from behind Lasandre's northern wall, the four alae of horse Shizuru had held in reserve and concealed by the citadel's own bulk? She did not think so. The cavalry was the shock here, but the killing blow had been struck much earlier, as she saw it.

It had been the hours of baking heat under which the Mentulaeans had marched, the failure to take a moment to rest and water themselves in their haste not to squander what seemed a fine opportunity. They knew the Himean base camp was not that far away, naturally, and had feared the onset of more of the enemy before they could strike at the more manageable force before their eyes. And in their eagerness to get a bite in before the whole beast appeared, they had leapt into a battle with only half their breath, half their strength.

She sighed in subdued satisfaction at the events playing out, her restraint wasted in light of the uproar: the noise from the fighting, cries of horror from the Mentulaeans perched atop the battlements of Lasandre, shouts of exultation from the Himeans also watching, and howls even from her attendant, who played his horse in a few whirls beside hers. Her own mount merely nickered to the wind, seemingly unexcited by the impending victory.

"A great triumph," Arichnos said happily once the rout progressed to its final stage. His nose was beaded with sweat, for they had been on the hill for a while and the sun was approaching its zenith. The tree giving them shade could not also shield them from the heat of the very air. "What a fight, Princess Natsuki! Look at them run!"

"It seems," she said, "all we do."

"Oh, I'd love to be down there lopping one of those weak heads off. Whoosh goes the blade!"

Her head did not move, but her eyes slid coolly his way.

"You wish you had been there?" she asked him.

"Oh, yes!" He stopped, caught himself for some reason he could not explain. "Oh, but it's something to see it from here too, Polemarch. I usually just see things from in there, I mean. Not like this. Here you see everything. When I'm in there I can only see the enemy in front of me, and I've no idea what's going on with my mates. I don't really think about them then. I mean, it's not that I don't care about them, but it's hard to think of anything else then."

She nodded and touched Aurea in the flank with her cane. The filly moved to the direction she wanted and Arichnos followed, still whooping down at the field.

It was a pitiful battle, concluded Natsuki, even while conscious of the efficiency that had won it. She could not help but feel slightly irritated with the display of so much cowardice, especially considered it was paired with such overinflated confidence. It was not just that the foe had been worried that a chance for victory would pass. It was also that they had believed it to be an opening that all but assured triumph. Why else would so cowardly a lot attempt to take initiative?

Now Lasandre would be bereft of an army, which would be a severe wound to its morale. Then would come the news that it had been cut off too from Prince Calchis's forces, that that prince's army was now separated from them by the overflowing Holmys and a Himean army on top of it. And then the final blow: that even the defenders of the capital would be unable to come to their aid, the enemy armies of the south inching ever closer and constituting a greater threat than the one holding Lasandre under siege. Put those things together and add the constant battery outside the walls. It would not be long now before Lasandre gave up the ghost, opened its gates and cried mercy.

"And if they do not?" she had asked, drawing a tiny smirk from her lover during their private discussion of the strategy. "What if they are not disheartened enough for it?"

"You think it likely?"

"No. I think it... hm, distantly possible."

"Even then we shall carry on. Every fortress breaks, sooner or later: all it takes is persistence and demoralisation. The artillery and soldiers shall continue their harassment. All the heralds I have with me now shall do the same. And I shall throw every carcass I can find into Lasandre with the catapultae if I must, at least if they do not surrender after learning they can rely on no more armies to defend them. Mentulaean, bovine, canine, avian-it matters not what the animal, as long as it is dead and starting to rot. If I run out I shall even start dipping into the captive pool and just slaughter the weakest, or those least likely to get good prices at the auctioneer's. Just a few hours in this heat shall make a ripe little missile of each freshly-butchered carcass. I might even cake them with horse and mule dung before throwing them in. How many stinking corpses will it take, you think, before they either come down with illness from the bouquet or fling open their gates in desperation?"

Shizuru's smile had been tranquil, which told Natsuki she had every intention of making good on this sinister tactic. It told Natsuki too that the woman was actually waiting to see her reaction.

"This is... a terrible design," Natsuki had whispered.

"Does this mean you disapprove of it?"

"No. I would not have thought of it. But I do not disapprove, as it increases the distance of the possibility."

"As would my earlier promise of terms with them had they surrendered within the first hour," had been Shizuru's response. "A pity it would have already expired by that time. How quickly things do spoil in the summer sun!"

Yes, Lasandre was holding on borrowed time. Yet she thought it had never needed to fall into such dire straits, at least had someone with a decent mind actually been directing the Mentulaean defences. She rather doubted it, especially when she thought about the Mentulaean south.

It was a grave error for them, in her opinion, to have left the south unguarded. The Himean armies should never have been allowed entry there, had the empire's defence force been doing its job properly. It was a case of internal politics distorting strategic perceptions. The empire might long have viewed the south as its weak link, but probably never realised how that perception had turned the frontier into a military weakness as well. By making no effort to build loyalty in that region, it had created an area of towns-not great towns, but towns nonetheless-and peoples all too easy to convert for a magnanimous invader, which meant any fighting in that territory would be against them from the beginning. The centre, from which they had tried to keep out the enemy, was by contrast peppered with loyal peoples and cities, which meant it should ideally have been the first and main area of engagement.

What sad foes they did make. Their commanders put in jeopardy even the exact cities they were supposed to defend. In so large an empire, were there truly no great military minds? For thus far nothing impressed Natsuki about the commanders they had fielded. But then, it would be difficult for a commander to impress her now. Any foe would have to be both excellent and fortunate to present a challenge to her Shizuru.

She caught herself at the possessive expression, then felt conflicted about the catch. Shizuru was hers, was she not? The woman spared no pains in telling her so, and was certainly not shy about owning her back. Even so, Natsuki could not quite bring herself to think of owning Shizuru as she owned Aurea; she still did it cautiously, with nagging insecurity, because she did not fully dare.

Sometimes she wondered if that hesitation was a sign that she had no right to accept Shizuru's offer of marriage.

The sun wrenched her from that thought, for it had finally caught up with them: the shortest path from their position to the Himean command's lookout was entirely devoid of shade. Her hand came up to her face to check her scarf. She coaxed Aurea to a dash, and Arichnos did the same with his steed.

Time enough to worry on such things later, she told herself, ignoring the hot pain the gallop set off again in her hurting bottom. Time now to hurry instead, lest her silly lover start chafing. The woman would be in a good mood due to the success of her latest scheme, but she would be none too pleased anyway if made to wait too long to share that victory. By now she would already be wondering where Natsuki had been, if the polemarch had been staying cool and away from the day. But that was the way Shizuru could be about the things for which she cared. It was easy to see how the same woman who spared time to lecture her lover on not bringing her hat would also be the commander who made provisions to keep soldiers well-watered and in the shade.

And the same commander already making plans to sell an entire city into slavery.

They were close now, enough to be seen by the officers sweating out the day on the little hill. The commander-who seemed to be starting to brown again-looked over the two riders approaching, her eyes warming when they set on the polemarch. A hot wind took her words to Natsuki, just barely textured by the dust in the air.

"What did I say? When I say the day will only get better, you should all learn to believe me."

---

When Prince Calchis of the Mentulaean Empire learned of the army sitting on the Holmys and blocking his way, he called a council of his officers and advisors that very moment. It was important that they return to the centre quickly, he said to them, at least if the centre was to be saved.

"It's obvious to me that they want to isolate us here for as long as they can," he announced to his staff, his eyes scouting the same map all of them were studying. "I'm not about to make it too easy for them by just playing meekly into their plans."

"Can't we push a crossing upriver, far from their camp?" One of his barons pointed to the uppermost bridge on the stretch of the Holmys they were eyeing. "I doubt they've torn that one down, since they just got here. What do the scouts say?"

"I wouldn't cross that thing even if it were still up," the prince scowled. "From what I've heard of these foreigners on the march, they'd be on us before half the army got across. They might even shell down the bridge while we're still on it. And you can forget any other plan that involves crossing the river. Even at its narrowest part, that water will be too wide and deep."

Another baron sighed. "The waters of spring are finally here."

"Right. There's only one choice."

A collective grimace as the same baron said it: "The long route."

"The long route," the prince affirmed, his hoarse voice making it seem especially grating. "As I said, we've no choice but this one. We'll have to go the long way up, into the hilly parts at the base of the range-" He pointed to the triangular jags on the map that represented one of the mountain belts in the north. "Then we negotiate the way west, and towards the Ruviccan Forest. Then it's down we go, turning around as we go south and back to the centre."

There were rumbles and other wordless responses to this, but the real response was in their looks, which were apprehensive and guarded. His own swarthy face managed to darken even more at their poorly concealed distaste for the plan, even though he understood the origin of the apprehension.

Their planned route was one perilously near the mountains and one that involved passing partway through a sacred forest; the Mentulae were not a people who conducted wars in either terrain. After generations of its armies being formed into the sort of large, perfect-for-flatland masses that feudal warlords had used in the days of upheaval, the empire no longer bothered training soldiers to negotiate terrain other than the plains.

Armies now met on open land. Rugged ranges and mountains had become the province of uncivilised folk, whether warlike or timid. And forests? Forests were fine, but they were not meant for an army's passage. Forests were sacred things and full of the living oaks they revered in their faith. How fast could one go in a forest when one was constantly trying not to call down the wrath of the gods by harming the sacred trees with a careless tread?

"I've already dispatched Hiempnos to arrange guides and find the best path for us through the Ruviccan," Calchis told them, knowing they were already worrying about it. "If anyone can find a path that can take an army through those trees, it would be the local druids."

"I agree and it's good sense. But for an army as large as ours, My Prince? The Ruviccan isn't a forest traditionally walked by great crowds or cavalcades. The best path they find may still be so narrow we'll take forever to traverse it."

"Which is why we're leaving as soon as we can, so get the men started on packing. We've no choice, so get over it."

"And the tribes of this place?"

"Fuck the tribes of this place," the prince growled, his look silencing the one who had asked it. "We've wasted enough time on these northern barbarians. And for all the good we've done, it's been a waste! We've burned all the fields and seized all the granaries here, so they should've begun to thin out from starvation by now. Yet they keep coming. Either they've grain hidden in holds where we can't find it or someone's feeding them under our noses. My money's on the Himeans. They're the sort of canny wretches who'd do it, aren't they?"

"It could be the Otomeians too," someone suggested.

"More northern barbarians!" a baroness sneered.

Calchis rolled a big shoulder and looked grim.

"Either way, let them keep doing it-they'll be wasting their grain on these savages once we leave," he said. "I'm not letting them divert me any longer. The Northern Frontier is no longer a concern, and now that we've destroyed the tribes' grain stocks and fields, whoever's feeding them may end up expending even more resources to keep them happy. Better if they run out of resources doing it, especially when we're not here to care about these rebels anymore. What's vital now is to get ourselves out of this corner they think they've trapped us in."

"So our goal is Gorgo?" the baroness who had been sneering asked, mind immediately going to the empire's capital.

But the prince shook his head.

"Our goal is Vedio," he stated, picking out another important citadel instead. "First we focus on getting through the Ruviccan and then on getting to Vedio. But by the time that happens, I think they'll have taken over a good part of the centre, possibly even Gorgo. Vedio's the smarter option since it's northwest of the centre. They won't even be anywhere near it by the time we get there, which gives us the opportunity to take stock of the situation and resupply ourselves before meeting them."

He scowled at their alarm, wishing they would stop acting as though losing Gorgo would be losing the war: "It can't be helped. They got the jump on us and are probably already sieging one critical citadel or other in the centre by now. Or they could be sitting quietly at the borders, still waiting for their own reinforcements to give them the numbers they need. We don't know-and we won't know anything if we stay here instead of moving on."

Someone muttered that given how things were going, it was highly likely that the enemy had already begun laying siege to the citadels instead of vegetating by the borders, as his other option suggested.

"I think so too. Else why cut us off from the centre? If we're lucky they'll devote their resources to some particularly strong cities and waste some time on that. I don't put my faith in luck, though, so we'll see what the situation is when we get to Vedio. Forget about Gorgo for now. It's a single place when we have a whole empire to think about."

There was an extended moment of silence following his words. The notion of abandoning the capital-even if only a notion-did not come easily to them. The geographically centralised concept of power had been ingrained in the nobles so firmly that they had difficulty conceiving of an empire absent its supposed heart. They were mostly personalities and aristocrats of the centre too, which meant that they had added interest in preserving the safety of that part of the empire: most of them had homes in it, as well as business holdings and feudal properties in the region.

Calchis accepted that self-interested reason for their alarm, but he did take issue with the other. The central region was undeniably important, but as far as he was concerned, it was nevertheless not The Empire. It was an important part, but still only a part. Calchis knew this in his bones, knew that the heart of an empire could be moved without killing off the rest. Even if he did not make it to Gorgo in time to save it, that would be fine: Gorgo was just one more citadel if one viewed it dispassionately. It was just stone and marble and wood and inhabitants. It could be broken down and built up, surrendered and retaken. It could die and its people, the Court, the King, and himself could still survive.

And so would the empire.

"Ah, and if we go a little further there, we could join forces with the king," someone observed all of a sudden, drawing a chorus of eager Ohs and Ahs. The king had wintered with his court and personal army to the northwest, not too far from Vedio. "He might even have moved back to the centre by now, in which case we've nothing to worry about!"

"No doubt," the king's son said flatly, exchanging a look with one of his favourites and confidantes. The look said what both of them thought, which was that they very much doubted the king would move from his cushy palace until their side established a better position. The man was, as Calchis's sister had once whispered to him, a bully after classic tradition, the type who would enter a scene only if given sufficient supporters to assure forceful dominance. He was also a great opportunist, which meant he would wait for others to do most of the work before walking in at the last moment and claiming the credit. More likely the man was waiting for Calchis himself and the others to do something about the east and centre, would come riding in to look the hero after they had done the work, would blame failure on them if the capital was indeed taken.

Calchis knew the measure of his father better than his father did his, and knew well the failings of the great king of the Mentulae. The man was no genius of war, for example, even if most people thought him to be. He was a great fighter and thus cut a warlike figure, but the worth of a commander was hardly proven by hand-to-hand combat. More like the king had cunning enough to surround himself with people who actually had the talent he lacked, and then demonstrated further cunning by getting rid of them after they did their jobs.

That was another thing in which the king actually excelled: guardianship of his throne. He brooked no threats to this position and would throttle his favourite child with bare hands to secure the kingship. It was why he would not yet join his army with Calchis's, because he was wary of the younger man's ability. It would not do to show himself the weaker commander in front of the barons, which would happen if they were in the same council. Better to let the younger man sort through the intricacies and then to magically appear and resolve the situation once it was simple enough for him to figure out by himself. Never mind that it would actually be better for their side were they to join forces, as they could repel the invaders by sheer force that way: the king would not abide it, would see too many dangers to him in that strategy.

No, Calchis had few hopes of the king taking initiative. What he had hopes for were actually the feudal lords of the deep west. These were among the greatest of the king's subjects, powerful barons and baronial states whose support had been critical to the empire's very inception. In fact, it had been to them that his father had gone for a first wife, as a means of securing support for his claim to the throne.

It was a story well-known by all the great lords and ladies of the Mentulae. The young Obsidian had headed to the stronghold of the most powerful of all the western baronial families, the House of Firens, which at the time had been governed by the Baron Entei. This was a man widely acknowledged to be one of the more remarkable Firensian lords, and that only added to the union's lustre for the young Obsidian.

The remarkable younger man had brought the remarkable older man wagons of gold coin and treasure, purloined from his father's vaults. This the young man had used to court the Firensii, along with the promise of further fortunes. Even more power too could be theirs, he had said, with so stout a friend as he ruling the empire. And for the ultimate enticement, the young man had asked them what they would say to having a king who was part-Firensii eventually ascend the imperial throne.

The nobles of Firens had taken a look at the confident, impressively-muscled young buck promising them the crown and decided that they liked the buck's odds. Thus did Azula, the Baron Entei's daughter, become wedded to King Obsidian, born Artai of the Empire. It was a promising start for that ambitious young man, who found gaining support for his cadre much easier in the west thereafter. And why would it not be easier? He had a wife serving as living proof of the Firensii backing him, and many other lords thought the Firensii bets worth backing.

The Firensian gamble seemed to produce results in short order. It was not long after the marriage that the young buck became king, and it seemed that it would not be long either before an heir with Firensian blood would be born. After an entire year of the new queen in the new king's bed with no news of children, no one worried much. But after another year went by in the same manner, followed by yet another year of such silence, talk started to get around, especially with Obsidian's illegitimate brats littering the empire's brothels.

Azula's infertility was not the cause of Obsidian's second marriage, which was to Calchis and Faris's mother. He would have married again even had Azula borne him an heir, after all, the tradition for royal polygamy being long established. But his first wife's barrenness was nonetheless the cause of her falling from his favour. It was such that when he departed the capital for his winter palace in the year of Shizuru Fujino's invasion, he did so with a retinue that did not include his first wife and queen.

Instead, Azula was left to lord it over the capital. An honour, outsiders might have thought, but actually a hollow one. The king had taken with him all those he valued in court and castle.

Technically too, the real overseer of the capital in the king's absence was the commander of its occupying army-who was one of the king's old generals and favoured courtiers, and not lonely, barren Azula.

Azula's sterility and fall from Obsidian's grace presented a serious problem for the plans of her father, the Baron Entei. Had he possessed a second, fecund daughter and had the king not had other wives yet, he might have offered a second Firensian queen to the king as replacement. But of second daughters he had none, just as of subordinate wives the king had already accrued many. So it was Azula the king had to keep.

The king would never truly dispose of Azula, though, if only for the simple reasons that she was a daughter of Firens and had been instrumental in his ascent to the throne. Still, she had already become little more than a relic, a symbol of a time long past, when he had still needed the support of others to gain the title of king. But support had become less important ever since he laid his stranglehold on the crown, and even though Firens and its daughter were still useful, they did not have to be coddled and courted any longer.

Things changed, every halfway-decent courtier of the king knew. What many did not know in the court, however, was the precise mettle of Queen Azula's father. The Baron Entei might never have attended the king's court-the Firensii were particularly averse to paying homage even to the kings they supported that way-but he had an inborn cunning that made him perfect for it. People had thought him remarkable for his handsome looks in his youth, his skill at commanding armies in his maturity, and his wise counsel once he joined the league of greyhairs, but his daughter knew that what was truly remarkable about her father was something few people properly perceived. What separated the Baron Entei from most other lords was a shocking political flexibility very well disguised in his stiff old warlord's costume.

The Baron of Firens had originally planned to raise the clan fortunes by attaching them to the empire's ruler, hoping to eventually have Firensian blood dominate the Court and the dynasty of the present. But in the wake of his daughter's embarrassment and an increased perception of the king's arrogance in his dealings with them, he had been moving gradually away from ideas of allying the family to the ruling line. The recent losses of the empire to the Himeans had only further exacerbated his growing aversion to the dynasty of the Artais-as well as to all the rival ones, as he found them so attenuated of bloodline and power that they had the strength of paper dolls. Alliance to the empire's rulers, it was becoming extremely clear to him, was not where the future of the clan was. Which led to the question: why should he continue to expend Firensian resources just to heed the whims of an emperor who did not esteem them?

So by the time Shizuru had been heading for her cousin's camp, even news of the increasing havoc wrought by the Himeans in the south had no power to move Firens into action. Even as the other lords of the deep west debated whether or not the king's charge for them to see to their lands included recovering those taken by the invaders in the southern provinces, Entei was advocating patience and forbearance instead.

"It's better to watch and wait here," he argued strongly when invited to council. "Our lands are more valuable than those towns they've seized. What is the south but scrubland, a place for minor aristocrats of no substance or breeding? Even the reports of their army's size are doubtless exaggerated. Why would they need large armies to take over such places as are there? Why do you think that paltry army they had holed up in Trogum all this time wouldn't leave the place? Too scared to come out of their holes, too aware we'd eat them up on our plains. If they want to, let them come here-we'd chew through them in an instant. Otherwise, leave them be to their shabby pickings! We've better lands to tend in our place and other enemies to consider. What of the Nervii?"

These were the peoples of the lands abutting theirs, the outer territories of the Kingdom of Nervia. The empire held an uneasy truce with this realm-one of the youngest of the royal wives was actually Nervian-but the Nervii had trouble with their own feudal warlords and secessionist aristocracy. It was not uncommon for a spate of internecine warfare to break out between the Nervian warlords, especially when relations broke down between two of the clans. More often than not, the fighting would spill over the border, especially as the Nervian lords liked to jockey for advantage by expanding territories east-right into Mentulaean lands.

To be sure, these border areas had long been a source of dispute. Were they really the Nervian Far East or the Mentulaean Deep West? The settlement struck by Obsidian's ancestors had seemed to settle the quarrel, but that was only as far as the western Mentulaean lords and Nervian rulers were concerned. The Nervii near the border were actually unhappy with the terms agreed upon by their distantly-located rulers. They made this clear practically every generation thereafter, where at least one would make a serious sally of reclamation.

This tied into the esteem and respect accorded the Mentulaean lords of the west. They had so long policed the boundary keeping out the Nervii that their import to the empire's security was undeniable. The many generations of conflict and guardedness had made of them genuine warlords with permanent armies, ones toughened out of necessity. Anyone hoping to win and keep the Mentulaean throne would do well to court such strong supporters and gain their fealty.

But fealty went both ways, thought the Baron Entei. The king had made promises he could not keep, and the House of Firens no longer enjoyed his favour. The first gifts of added lands and titles had not been followed with more, and there were no longer any overtures to keep the most powerful house of the west happy, the assumption seeming to be that it was now forever in the king's camp. The young buck of before had re-evaluated his priorities and decided that there was no more need to keep Firens well-fed; their support was simply no longer a critical part of his plans because he had achieved what it was that he wanted. What did he care that Firens had not achieved what it wanted? He was the king of an empire and the uncontested ruler of his realm, no longer dependent on the powers of his baronial backers. If anything, he was the one now backing barons where needed. And in the last rewards and reallocations of western fiefdoms following executions, Firens had not seen much of his backing.

The Baron Entei had marked it, and later on the baron remembered.

"You can run off south if you really think the king will thank you for it," Entei told the other lords when the first tremors radiated from the south. "I doubt it. Take my advice and wait to see what happens first, or you'll just waste your energy. You'll see what I've been saying, which is that you shouldn't bother with those smooth-shaven foreigners yet. Remember that the south doesn't matter, whereas the west does."

The other barons reluctantly did as he urged, placing their faith in the counsel of one they had only ever known to be wise in words and war-making. Even as they bided their time, however, many of them were already chewing their nails over fear that Entei had lost it, that they were all missing out on a critical opportunity. What if the Himeans were a worse enemy than the Nervii? What if the king viewed their failure to act as less a decision of wisdom than one of negligence? Yet still Entei counselled patience, even after it was discovered that the army supposed to be in guard of the Southern Frontier had been taken captive entirely, even after an entire string of southern towns was reported burned down to their very foundations. And the barons chewed and chewed until all that was left of their nails was the quick.

Eventually, weeks of stewing came to a head. Several of the lesser lords of the west called a council that excluded Firens from the guest list.

"We've decided to take our armies up and fight the enemy," the deputed speaker of the coalition said. "Firens may be the most prominent of the old houses, but it's obviously lost its teeth! It's high time some of us did what's long needed doing and drove the enemy out of the Southern Frontier."

An attendee of the meeting, a baron of one of the great houses, scowled under his beard: he was no partisan of Firens in this matter-nor indeed in much of anything-but it would not do for one of his status to follow the lesser lords so easily.

"There's no love lost between me and Entei," he said, speaking in a low rumble. "But even I have to agree with him when he says we shouldn't worry so much over that frontier. Even if the Himeans take it, what is that to us? It's a weak place we don't much need, and Entei's right at least in saying that the lands we do need are right here. They need to be defended against Nervian opportunism, which just might bloom again now that they see us facing another enemy."

"That's why we're leaving a complement each of our own forces here," another of the council's orchestrators answered. "That way, there's a defensive force available in case of emergency for our lands. It's not going to be too big, of course, especially if none of you see fit to fill it out a little with some of your own-but that's calculated in the risk we're taking, since the Nervii haven't launched a major incursion on us in decades. Just little skirmishes every now and then with some raiders on the outskirts. The Himeans, on the other hand, are looking set to invade us seriously. That means we need to concentrate forces on them instead of on the lighter enemy."

"Lovaris is exactly right," said another council orchestrator, eyes gleaming. "We don't disagree with you when you say that the south is little more than a butt, but it's still part of the empire and it's connected to the rest of the body, isn't it?"

"You're saying," said another of the great lords, "that the butt's still close to the cunt and they might rape us."

"I'm saying it's still close to the arsehole- and they might rape us," the woman replied, as laughter ran around the table. The mood lightened then and some of the scowls went away, the air palpably softer than before. Nearly everyone knew the source of the tension, which was the same one that had given the earlier baron his pause: even if the vast majority of barons and baronesses were in agreement with the council, some of them nevertheless resented that it had been representatives of the lesser houses to call them to it. The great houses always took the lead-else why call them "great"?

Lovaris addressed that now with his honest plea.

"The simple fact is that we can't fight them off by ourselves, however," he said. "We don't have a big enough force even all together, we're all just minor lords with small fiefdoms and personal armies. We called this meeting to ask of you, the greater houses, to give us a fighting chance. We'll need you for your experience as well as your men. If we pool our resources, we shall have the equivalent of a royal army. Nay, even better! No royal army has ever had the stiffness of spine our warriors do, because no royal army has had to deal with the constant fighting we've had to do with the accursed Nervii. We can beat back the enemy and reclaim the south by ourselves. No need for the royal armies to step in, which means no need for someone else to take the credit. And the king would doubtless reward us for our gumption later on."

"That's something to consider," a listening baroness said slowly. "He also couldn't fault us for inaction then."

"Indeed!" Lovaris said heartily. "It's all well and good for the Baron Entei to stay inert in this sort of situation, but I fear none of the rest of us have a daughter married to the king."

Another crack of laughter filled the room, swifter to come than before.

"By Dann, you have me convinced," said the baron who had protested the plan previously. "Though I still say we should do Firens the courtesy of asking again first. He's still one of us, little though I like the man, and besides, he's one of the biggest armies in the west as well. His numbers will as good as secure a victory."

"He'll just say no again," someone protested.

"Yes, but we'll have made sure of it."

"Baron Rothar is right," said Lovaris, smiling at the author of the suggestion. "I admit I too think Entei will decline once more, but that's his prerogative. It's proper for us to ask, and we look better for it later. That way, when the king calls upon us for an accounting, we can cite it to show we didn't exclude Firens out of spite. And then... well... whatever happens to Firens afterwards we can't be blamed for it, can we?"

"My thoughts exactly!" Rothar beamed.

And so the warlords of the west set out for the south, which none of them really cared about but felt obliged to defend from the enemy.

The Baron Entei, along with just a handful of other holdouts, did not go with them or lend them armies. Nevertheless, the collective number was enough: all told, the western lords put together an army of twenty-nine thousand to head south, leaving another eight thousand-all cavalry, to make movement easier between fiefs-to stay home and guard their lands. The force that went to fight the Himeans was led by the council of barons and lords working together, with supreme command given to the Baron Rothar of Vomaes upon unanimous agreement.

Their destination was Massae, a medium-sized town of little consequence to the empire from a certain political perspective. There were no great aristocrats holding lands near Massae, no noteworthy vaults or unique resources within or near it. Massae's significance was entirely strategic and owed to local topography: it sat in the region bounded by two small rivers that ran between the western and southern frontiers as well as the shortest pass from those territories to the central lands of the empire. The land around Massae was therefore a wet area that was not only good for growing crops but which also represented one of the best routes from the deep west and into the southern and central provinces.

Unfortunately for the Mentulae, their enemy was aware of that.

Not long after Shizuru Fujino reached base near the Atinu, her legate Kenji Nakamura left the newly-allied city of Asterion with the Sixth, the Thirteenth, and the Ninth. The Fifth legion, which had originally been at the city with them, had gone with Keigo Kurauchi for the conveyance of captives across the border.

"They shall then double back after their errand and have the Fourteenth with them," the general had told her ginger-haired legate. "They shall join you in Massae, where you need to establish base and prepare to meet the far western armies if any of them decide to uproot themselves and head south or even my way, once I get started on Lasandre."

"Do we expect them to do that?"

"Yes, or, at the very least, to try to join forces with the centre. The lords of the west are not tyros when it comes to defensive battle due to their histories, I hear, so they might have the sense to try that much before we fracture the imperial defence further."

"Which means they will likely have the sense to join forces with each other as well," Kenji said, worrying his lip. "How many are we looking at, General?"

"Our agents say they could be as large as the larger royal armies if taken all together, so that means we shall see anywhere from the high thirties to forty, forty-five. But those are old estimates, they agree, so it might be lower or higher. I incline to higher-always better to expect worse, after all."

"Forty, forty-five."

" If they all come in one mass."

"You think they won't, Fujino-san?"

"Their lands would be in too precarious a position, what with their Nervian foes watching developments from across the border. Would you leave your lands unguarded just to fight an enemy some distance away if you knew another enemy to be already peeking over the fence?"

"I'd leave a good lot of watchdogs if I had to go somewhere, that's true."

"Yes, so no fear of them bringing the totality of their forces. Then there is also the fact that the west is actually an agglomeration of multiple landlords with personal armies. Some may choose to stay, some to go. Even if a good number of them do come en masse, you should still be able to hold until the Fourteenth and Fifth arrive."

He could not resist a grimace: "Hard going, though, only three legions against forty."

"Yes," she told him, her eyes dancing. "But not impossible. If it truly becomes necessary, the Fourteenth and Fifth can send for reinforcements from me. I should be a little closer to your position by that time, as I expect to be in Lasandre by then. It can be done, Kenji-han! You and I both know it, so do not fret so much. You may end up dealing with only one small feudal army at a time, even, if you are lucky. Not that you should plan for that, by the way."

"I know-always better to expect worse."

"Precisely."

When Kenji arrived at the alluvial plains surrounding Massae, he immediately seized the town and its properties, along with the harvest they had brought in. Off came every piece of building wood and stone in the town and its vicinity, and up it all went to create a strong camp for the Himeans. It did not matter whether he had to deprive bleating goat or babe of a roof to do it: he was expecting worse, and worse meant something as large as forty.

"I honestly can't decide sometimes if I love or hate her for it," he told his fellow redhead in the command tent, the primipilus of the Ninth. "Who else tells you not to fret, then tells you to expect the worst and gives you a number that big? Forty-thousand, I tell you! We'd be better off sending for reinforcements already, if it does turn out like that."

The primipilus laughed at him, her longish eyeteeth showing.

"Got the wind up, old boy?" she teased.

"Who wouldn't, thinking of facing so many with only three legions?"

"The Ninth alone's worth forty," she sneered. "But she's right-I doubt we'll be facing anything that high from them, at least not in one swoop, so don't get your tunic all bunched up yet. She obviously doesn't, else she'd have waited for the Fifth and Fourteenth to return before making us travel up here. Whatever comes for us will be less than forty, you'll see, and whatever the damn number is, we'll deal with it."

"I never said we wouldn't, Nao-san," he said, cocking a smile playfully her way.

So when not forty but some twenty-odd thousand Mentulaean soldiers were sighted by the lookouts watching the westward passes, Kenji dealt with it without too much complaint. He very much doubted they could win a pitched battle, but he was going to be fighting defensively, on terrain he had already prepared and gotten to know well in the weeks of waiting there. He also had two more legions coming in soon, not too far away based on the date of the rider they sent ahead. All told, he did not think his position too worthy of whining, as it was no Argentum just yet.

"For which I'm terribly glad!" he said to the primipilus surveying the coming enemy from beside him; both were in a tower, which gave them a good view of the mass that was obviously taking its time in arriving. "I've none of that Fujino blood in me, to go into an untenable position and come out somehow winning everything."

"Ahh, you've your own piss and vinegar in you, Legate," she said with almost surprising generosity. "Don't get too modest on me now."

"You don't need to stiffen my spine with praise, Yuuki-san-although I do appreciate it." He looked out at their foe and frowned at all the metal winking in the sun. "This doesn't look too hard after all, especially since we have reinforcements coming in. They don't have any siege with them either, but that's normal when you're not looking to break cities but defend them."

"Wouldn't give a shit about siege even if it were here. Wouldn't do much good on this soft soil." She pointed to the tiny pool of horsemen in the sea of curve-bladed spears. "Damned surprised they don't have more of those, though. What do you think?"

"Yes, it's odd for a people who value cavalry."

"Maybe they're just in the back and we don't see them."

"Maybe."

But by the time the mass was completely visible and had started setting up a camp already, no more horse had appeared. It was clear that they were facing an army of footmen, just like themselves.

"Good odds," one of the tribunes declared in council that evening.

"We'll hold here easy, even if the Fifth and Fourteenth don't get here this week."

Kenji voiced agreement.

"That would be ideal, anyway," he admitted. "I don't want to give them the battle they want, not yet at any rate. Make that clear to the men, please-I want no pitched fights here! It has to be a battle of our choosing, and it would be smarter to fight them once the Fifth and Fourteenth stiffen our ranks. Still, we'll have to meet them if they try to storm our fort, because god knows there are enough of them to actually stand a chance of breaking through if they come at us all at once."

"We'll just push them back if it comes to that."

"Good. Tell the men to stay in gear and have weapons and shields at the ready."

His general had warned him that these would be among the most warlike of their foes, and they proved it by attacking the very day after their arrival. The legions met them in front of the camp and pushed them off, but not without difficulty. Not only was the enemy far more numerous but it was also of a different mettle from the Mentulaeans they had fought thus far: tougher and more assured of itself, harder to cow on the field. The Mentulaeans too had their own problems, as they found the Himeans too smart to meet them in pitched battle on the open field and also found the defence structures and strategies of the foreigners too alien and effective to overcome easily. It was a stalemate, and one that repeated over the next few days until it had become nearly a routine.

On the seventh day, however, the reinforcements arrived that would tip the balance. They arrived right in the middle of another contest for the camp, which was being fought by over two-thirds of the Mentulaeans and all of the Himeans, and their arrival threw one party of the fight into a brief but awful moment of consternation.

The side that faltered was the Himean.

It was hard not to falter, their commander thought, jaw almost locked into a clench even as his officers rallied the men into recovery. For there, it was, like a swarm of doom come to reap them, another mass of Mentulaeen arms that looked to be perhaps half the size of the first-which meant another ten or fifteen to add to the thousands they already faced. It rolled closer and closer at a steady pace, obviously in no hurry because it was already clear who had the far ascendancy now, and he could see on its flank a contingent of actual cavalry.

"Jupiter and all the gods," the tribune at his side uttered, dabbing at his forehead with his cloak.

"What I wouldn't give to have them on our side now," was Kenji's hoarse response.

What they were seeing was actually the forces of the western Mentulaeen lords who had stayed back and out of the first coalition, coming in with apparently changed minds and every intent of helping repulse the invaders. This apparition had shocked not only the Himeans, in fact, but even the Mentulaeans themselves, whose leaders gawped at the coming army from their position near their camp.

"Entei," the supreme commander of the first Mentulaeen army said, identifying the banners of the group leading the force pouring in. Even the tone of surprise could not mask his stiffness at seeing his old rival. "What in the world is he doing here?"

Lovaris brought up his horse beside him.

"Why, they've changed their minds, it appears!" he crowed brightly. "This is wonderful, Baron Rothar. Now we truly have the numbers to crush anything."

Rothar grunted unenthusiastically, torn between two attitudes. He knew it was indeed a considerable improvement to their strength to have the armies from the initial holdouts joining them-especially Entei's, as Firens had the largest feudal army in the west-but he also knew they had not been doing too badly even without this new addition, and felt a little cheated out of the credit. For Entei would doubtless have to be given a post of high command too to keep him happy and secure his army for the entirety of the venture, and would thereby evade the odium they had predicted for him due to his earlier refusal to join their army. The king would have punished him, perhaps even executed him for it-and now the man would probably end up getting accolades for defending the realm instead. How tidy it would have been, had the old fool only stayed in his cobwebby castle!

"Considerate of them to show up after we've done seven days of work already," he snipped to the other barons, some of whom appeared to share his feelings. "The fools should've just come with us from the beginning if they were planning on changing their minds eventually."

"Come now, barons and baronesses," Lovaris urged, smiling pleasantly at them. "It's true we're seven days of work ahead of them. But we'll also be seven days of work less if we have them with us, as we'll be twice as strong and capable of twice as much. We'll have this camp down today with this many men! Right now, it's winning our battles and the war that matters, not who went willingly first and who changed their minds later. And as for that, that can always come to light later, can't it, if we can get people to whisper to the king afterwards who went willingly and who begrudged help?"

Rothar finally unbent enough to smile a little, his teeth showing for the briefest instant under his grizzled beard.

"You've a good mind on you, Lovaris," he said, for he liked the young man. "What you say's right again and does your House proud."

Lovaris smiled back, but rather more expansively and enduringly than the baron had.

"Here they come now," he said, shielding his eyes from the sun to better see the band of cavalry and nobles riding towards them. "We can use that cavalry too, since we left all of ours back home. Come, let's meet them!"

Off most of the Mentulaean command went, leaving only a few minor personalities to tend to the fight still going on. Rothar, Lovaris, and all the major nobles of the army galloped towards the coming cavalry, at the head of which several could already see Baron Entei, distinguished by his perfectly white hair and beard.

Rothar was first to speak.

"Entei!" he roared, even before they were close enough to properly look into each other's faces. "A surprise to see you here!"

The Baron Entei's response was given once they were near enough to speak without shouting.

"Perhaps for you," he said coolly. "Not to Lovaris."

Before either Rothar or any of the other barons of the west could question what he meant by that, they were cut down by the cavalymen. Some of the barons and baronesses travelling with Entei even joined the ambush, unsheathing their swords and attacking the unsuspecting lords. Only Lovaris and his three comrades—all minor aristocrats, all responsible for forming the coalition—survived.

"I expected the old sod to go harder than that, given how difficult he was when alive," Entei remarked to his allies after the carnage was finished. He moved his horse around to get a better look at the corpse, but the gelding went the wrong way and stepped on the skull, crushing it. "Ah, Rothar, how soft you turned out to be!"

"He wasn't too happy to see that you'd come out of your inertia," Lovaris told him, busy with a handkerchief. The trooper who had cut down Rothar had hacked the baron right over both jugular and carotid, and the arterial spray had caught Lovaris on one side of his face. "It was clear he'd been hoping for you to fall from the king's graces because of it."

"Firens fell out of the king's favour a long time ago, and vice versa."

"I suppose he never imagined we'd actually do something like this. None of them did, poor bastards."

"Suffering from remorse?"

"No, just pitying them." Lovaris finished wiping off the blood around his lips. "Some of them really did want to protect the empire, you know. Harkon over there joined so eagerly."

"Misfortune happens even to the brave or the noble. Besides, you're the richer for their bad luck, young man."

Lovaris grinned and showed that Rothar's blood had gotten to his teeth.

"I admit I thought you were jesting when first you approached me asking how I felt about the state of my House and the empire," he confessed readily. "And then I thought you were setting me up for treason, which was why I hesitated initially. But I'm glad you let me be part of this scheme, Baron Entei. My House is now richer, as you say-I assume you seized the cavalry they left?"

"All the guardsmen we left in the west are now retainers from our Houses. You will have the fiefs abutting yours directly, as promised." Entei pointed a finger downwards at two more bodies on the earth. "I don't think they'll complain."

"Excellent!"

"The same goes for your comrades here. You are all now greater instead of lesser lords." He looked up and at the Mentulæan camp, which was in uproar at the massacre they had just witnessed. "We should move on before those hens up there stop squawking. Are your forces ready?"

His younger conspirators responded affirmatively.

"We separated our men from theirs last night after we got your message," said Lovaris, pointing to a group standing on the right side of the camp, all armed and ready for battle. It was also in formation, in contrast to the rest of the panicking, confused reserve of the late Rothar's army. "We're just waiting for yours now."

"Let's finish this."

Lovaris's forces joined the newly arrived horde. This new army overran the camp of the old one and started killing the soldiers that had not been committed to the battle outside the Himean camp-which suddenly started to go entirely the defenders' way once the betrayal of the Mentulae happened. It was horrific to the Mentulaeans, for obvious reasons, but it was almost equally so to their foes. The Himeans had not seen the slaughter of the Mentulaean army's command, so they knew nothing that could explain the enemy's own reinforcements turning upon it with a vengeance. All they saw was the second Mentulaean army ripping through the first one's camp and that second army's cavalry flanking the forces they themselves were fighting against. One moment they had been certain that they had no hope, the next they were seeing the enemy warring with itself.

" Edepol !" Kenji was gasping, as flabbergasted as the rest of the officers watching the phenomenon. " Edepol !"

"But-are those Mentulaean?"

"They look it, don't they? What else could they be? Edepol !"

One of the tribunes riding in from the fray galloped up to him.

"Nakamura-san," the woman said, her eyes wide with fright. "What should we do now?"

Kenji gulped air, fighting to rip his own eyes away from the insanity taking place.

"What do you mean what should we do?" he cried. "We keep fighting! We keep at it! Edepol, asking me what we should do-as though we could do anything else! Next thing I know you'll be asking me what's going on when I'd like to know the bloody answer myself!"

Chapter 65

Greetings to everyone. I very much hope everyone has a pleasant winter this year.

Et on the subject of winter, I wonder who among you have seen "Frozen" already. Because I toured the Elsanna ship recently and may now be manning one of the capstans. Mais non, non, je ne regrette rien~

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.), alae (pl.) - a cavalry unit. For this story, every ala shall be equal to 500 horsemen.

2. Corona graminea (L.) - also corona obsidionalis ; the rarest and greatest of all Roman military awards. Only the actual army and its non-senatorial officers (the centurions) could award it to a person, and they awarded it only if the recipient had saved, by his personal efforts, the lives of an entire legion or the whole army itself. It was thus the only crown that could be awarded by the soldiers to their general upon their own determination. The recorded Roman recipients of this award were so few that they could be counted with just both hands.

3. Cataphracti (pl.) - a cataphract is a type of heavy cavalry, a fully armoured man on a fully armoured horse. It is basically a "shock unit".

4. Contubernalis (L.) - a cadet; typically, the first military exposure of the upper-class family members of Rome would be in this position.

5. "Depth" in army formations - this is in case anyone has trouble understanding the military term. In armies, "width" (sometimes "length", depending on the perspective) typically indicates the number of columns and "depth" the number of rows, at least if one looks at the force from the front. Take this representation of an army, for example:

---

Let us assume this army of x's is facing the three exclamation marks. If each "x" is a soldier, the army would be then be 4 men (or columns of them) wide and 2 men (or rows of them) deep.

6. dies caniculares (L.) - The Dog Days of summer were from July to August in Ancient Rome, at least when the calendar was in step with the seasons. Sirius, the Dog Star, appeared in the sky around this time and the heat would drive many Romans out of the city and to cooler provinces.

7. iugerum (L., pl. iugera) - a Roman unit of measurement for area, specifically for farmland; one iugerum would be a little over 2,500 sq.m.

8. Manumission (Eng.) - the freeing of a slave. Manumission was fairly common for Roman slaves, who typically gained it either by fulfilling the specified years of service in their contract, by being granted it as a gift from their masters, or by saving sufficient money from their wages to buy their own freedom. Note that slaves can actually continue to work for their masters after manumission: they simply do so as hired freedmen, but everything else stays much the same.

9. pilum (s.), pila (pl.) - (L.) a heavy standard-issue Roman javelin. It could be a fearsome headache for enemies because it tended to pierce deeply even into heavy shields, which made the shield difficult to handle afterwards since the pilum would be stuck in it.

10. rosea rura (L.) - the fertile lands outside of Reate, or modern-day Rieti. This was where they bred the best mules in Italy.

11. "Servi poenae poenas dabunt." (L.) - "Servi poenae" is an anachronism, of course, but I doubt anyone really minds here. There were many types of slavery in Ancient Rome. "Servi poenae", or in some translations, "penal slaves", entered their type of slavery as penalty due to some transgression of law on their parts. Loosely translated, the sentence reads "the penal slaves will pay the price", referring to the doubled punishment the persons referred to in the text are about to receive. They will enter slavery as the penalty for being conquered by the enemy, then must also pay an additional penalty (presumably for their attempt at a last-ditch stand) of entering the worst kind of bondage possible.

12. Strigil - or strigilis (L.) , a bathing implement used for scraping off oil and dead skin.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru wasted no time when she received the missive from Kenji Nakamura. She dashed off an answering letter, sent another requesting that her cousin come to the conquered Lasandre, and sped up the work of converting the former Mentulaeen citadel into a serviceable army base from which to deploy her own troops.

"Which is quite easy, as an army was quartered here not long ago," Shizuru told her cousin when the woman arrived, the Fourth legion and cavalry in tow. "Besides the petty one that gave us that sad little drama when we entered, I mean. And to think no one gave them applause for their pains; someone should have told them that what they were doing was not theatre."

Natsuki's laughter filled the background as Shizuma requested an explanation.

"There was a small core of diehards in the city-loyalists, that is, to the realm," Shizuru said. "The group was headed by some local aristocrats, even. They were vehemently against the idea of opening the city to us, and certainly did not change their minds even after the fact had already been accomplished. They were so against the idea of surrender that they decided to try and hold out in one of the towers on the walls."

"I take it you assaulted the diehards' tower, then."

"Why would I?" Shizuru asked. "I posted guards outside the tower's entrance and let them do as they wished. They could have had an orgy up there for all I cared."

"And did they?"

"I doubt it," the other grinned. "The cretins went up there with little forethought. They stocked up on weapons and got themselves up in some of the most stifling armour you ever saw a Mentulaean don in this heat, but somehow neglected to bring food or water with them. Barely two days of summer up in that spire and they came down with tongues touching their navels."

Her cousin sighed at the sorry tale.

"Poor devils," was the older patrician's verdict. "They surely imagined rather a more glorious end to their protest. And perhaps they would have had it, had they only had the fortitude to end their lives themselves instead of surrendering! The thirst might have weakened them too much for that thought, though. Animal misery has that power."

"Misery is right," sniffed Shizuru, unimpressed.

"Ah now, Shizuru, at least allow that they had some courage, standing up to the inevitable. As to their end, I doubt even they predicted it. They probably thought you would tear down the tower and they would in that doom like fallen patriots. What person moved to his actions by a blaze of honour ever imagines defeat from water instead of blood?"

But the other Himean was dismissive, more interested in the princess passing her couch.

"More flicker than blaze, I should think," said Shizuru while tugging at her lover's dress; she wanted Natsuki to sit on the couch with her instead of returning to the third one around the table. "Besides, I am not overly enamoured of arguments based on honour nowadays. I find that the word 'honour' is very often used to disguise folly now because some think it a universal justification. People are allowed to overlook the logical when honour supposedly demands something less reasonable. Even had those idiots brought supplies with them, what would they have achieved by holing up in that spire? Nothing, at least not in the grand scheme of things. Lasandre would still be a fallen city and, eventually, I would still win this war."

"You mean Hime would win this war," her cousin teased.

"I am acting as Hime's representative here, so naturally I meant that," Shizuru said dryly. "And there is the difference, Shizuma. The honour I have of performing my duties for my country shall be recorded as significant to its history. It is honour that everyone else shall acknowledge. Think of the results alone when this war is over. I shall have expanded Hime's territories by a whole empire's worth. Surely one can consider that honourable, sufficient to ennoble a whole family for generations. Whereas those idiots' supposed honour of standing up to me shall not even make it to the official records, so pathetic was the attempt. Honour! Sometimes, I think that people only quote the word to justify some self-satisfying stupidity."

The other Himean lingered over the drink she was taking and when she looked up from it, her gaze turned not to her cousin.

But the green eyes were on Shizuru, and they held nothing but adoration.

"Maybe you're right," Shizuma sighed, finally. "What happened to the diehards then?"

"In with the rest of the captives," was the response. "Surely you did not think I killed them?"

"Heavens, and give them the satisfaction!?"

"Exactly, so they are more or less unharmed." A beat. "Still, I am thinking of arranging for the members of that idiotic cabal to be sold especially to slavers selling to Sicily or the Spains. Gods know people of such mean sense cannot do much good as slaves elsewhere."

Which meant, a wide-eyed Shizuma thought, that they had given her cousin no petty irritation with their "sad little drama" after all. Such a fate as Shizuru was arranging for the Diehards of the Tower (for so did the senior legate think of them now) could be nothing but a punishment: Sicily and the Spains were full of the toughest slave owners in all the provinces of Hime.

Sicilian slaves worked vast tracts of agricultural land without cessation and under harsh guard. This was because the great landowners of Sicilia had practically militarised their operations after the servile wars in years past. The slaves of the Iberian Peninsula had it even worse. These worked the famous Spanish mines-mines of which Shizuru was one of the biggest landowners, and which constituted a big chunk of her vast inheritance.

Mines were among the most profitable of investments, and that was helped by the fact that they ran on unpaid labour. As a result, mine slaves faced the greatest drudgery of all those sold into bondage; none of them entered the status of his own accord. His lot was a stark contrast to those of slaves who not only got paid for their jobs but also sometimes entered slavery of their own will-slaves like Shizuru's charmingly epicene steward, for example.

Hermias hailed from one of Greece's many rural pastures, all too aware that his potential was wasted in the idyllic backwater he called home. Even as a youth, he had yearned to live elsewhere, ideally somewhere that mattered. He transferred to Athens once he came of age and had been happy at first. But after a year the appeal palled: he found even the seat of Hellenic culture wanting.

The problem with Hellenic culture, he decided, was that its time had come and gone. Athens was no longer the navel of the world. Another place mattered more now and had become the centre of culture and power. Athens would always have a special place in his heart, with its unapologetic intellectualism and fragile ideals and all its beautiful boys endowed with the sweetest arses. But it had already passed the sceptre to Hime and Hime reigned supreme.

That was how Hermias had decided that life would be better in slavery-but only the right kind of slavery, of course, and only slavery to a Himean senator. His regime of self-improvement was brutal, covering oenology, fashion, bookkeeping, and a dozen other subjects for household management. The goal was to appeal to a rich and aristocratic Himean seeking a Greek housekeeper, and while he knew his face and form would already go a long way to making him a more presentable option, he did not care to hedge his bets on physical appeal alone. He wanted to work for a household of means, class, and influence. So he had to strive to be the best of all the other ambitious men and women putting themselves forward on that auction block.

He knew what he was going into the moment he sold himself into bondage. He could expect to be treated well, especially due to his talents and the price they put on him. He would never worry about lacking food, or shelter, or even care, for his master would see to everything as though he were a true part of the family. And as he was educated, capable, and pleasing to look at, he could expect a position that would give him power over the rest of the household slaves along with very good wages. Eventually he could even expect to be manumitted and made a Himean freedman, bearing his master's family name to show to whom he owed liberty and his vote.

A mine slave, by contrast, expected none of these things. He could receive the whip from his overseers at any time, and had only the barest of necessities to stay alive. He spent most of his hours underground and the dark would ruin his eyesight forever. When he got ill no one sent for a doctor and he would only be made to work until it became truly impossible for him to rise. And that was the end for a mine slave, for he had no manumission to aspire to after his labours. He worked, he suffered, and when he could suffer no more, he died.

So Shizuru's intentions with the Diehards of the Tower were brutal enough to merit interpretation as punishment-for Shizuma knew her cousin and knew that despite the younger woman's ruthlessness, she was nonetheless someone who would not sentence people to such lifestyles absent reason. Shizuru was not someone who took pleasure in cruelty for its own sake, but she could take pleasure in vengeance.

Shizuma wondered what it was that had irked her cousin about them.

She doubted it was the perversion of "honour" that had done it. Could it have been that Shizuru had wanted that particular tower earlier than they had allowed? But that seemed unlikely even to her. Indeed, most of the things that immediately came to mind seemed unlikely answers for such a riddle. What in the world could those poor people have done to merit this response?

Whatever it was, she decided, it had sealed their fates. Servi poenae poenas dabunt.

"On the topic of slaves," she said, "I presume you want the prisoners sent as soon as possible to the Atinu Camp, Shizuru?"

"Yes. I want some auxiliary infantry to escort them. Have one of the tribunes handle it, Cousin."

The other nodded and said, "There are a lot of them."

"True, so best put them to work."

"No, not the tribunes," said the senior legate. "The prisoners."

Shizuru gave a smile that said that was both natural and obvious.

"I did take a city," she reminded.

But Shizuma needed no reminder of that, just as she needed no reminder of the fact that not all generals seized and sold whole populations of cities on conquest: most especially not, it had to be said, when the cities were taken by surrender. More common to take only the fighting fit to reduce enemy forces, or perhaps to take only one sex so as to temporarily stunt population growth. It was not condemnable to do what Shizuru was doing with Lasandre-and indeed she would not question her cousin on it even if she personally felt it to be so-yet it left an impression on her, this great arrest and enslavement of a whole city's people after it had opened its gates in peaceful submission.

Shizuru had stripped Lasandre and its surroundings completely bare of inhabitants, sorting them into lots of men, women, and children. Those with illness were slain to prevent disease spreading and burned in a special pit. Babies and children were permitted to stay with the women, although it was doubtful that these would live during the exodus. Supplies for the captives were worked out down to the last metre of rope for their bonds, and even their rations were dispensed with the sparing attitude of military urgency.

Even though those rations were ones their captors had only seized from them.

It was a memorably cold and businesslike operation, and the senior legate saw it conducted by a person she had always thought among the most humane and sympathetic of their kind. Which her cousin still was, every part of her insisted, despite the lack of hesitation the woman had showed in treating a whole city of people as meat to be sold.

The interesting thing about her, she thought, looking at her cousin with wondering eyes, is that she can do things like this without ever seeing a contradiction between it and her compassion. One might say it is the Himean way, as we're a pragmatic people and not much given to the philosophical idealism of the Greeks. But Shizuru applies it to extremes. Absolutely ruthless one moment and shockingly humane the next, whichever serves the primary cause of her life best in a situation. The only centre or consistency she seems compelled to live by is ambition. Everything else serves it, I am beginning to think.

But then her eyes strayed to the girl occupying the couch with her cousin, sitting upright with Shizuru's bare feet on her lap.

Except that particular thing, I suppose-although I've yet to see what that thing is exactly. Is that girl a slave to her ambition or mistress of it?

"Yes, we should pass the captives off to the slavers already," she said to her commander and cousin. "That way we shan't have to keep feeding them with our supplies. When are the auxiliary troops you ordered up here expected?"

Shizuru looked to her mistress.

"The foreriders-" A sudden stop. "Is this the word, Shizuru? The advance group of scouts?"

"Yes, of the vanguard, meum mel. "

"They shall arrive in perhaps three weeks. The rest, I would increase the time by three. Maybe even by four."

The silver-haired Shizuma looked to her cousin with a question.

"I believe she means to triple or quadruple the time before arrival," Shizuru offered.

"Were they so far away?" the senior legate frowned. "I had thought them to be well on their way some time ago, and I have to say I'd not have thought Otomeians to be slugs on the march."

It was Natsuki who answered, although it was Shizuru who had been addressed.

"All those thoughts are correct," said the one dark-haired woman in the room. "But they are incomplete. The bulk of the army is made of footmen, unlike the foreriders. They march in this lowland summer when they- we are people of the snows. Thuh-thawing us does not improve our speed, Legate. It melts our sinews instead."

The more golden of the blondes listening picked up her goblet and hid a smile behind it.

"Of course, forgive me for failing to think of it," Shizuma said to the rebuke. She was not a whit discomposed as she turned back to her cousin. "Nothing for it but to wait, then. We should start working out the cart schedules for the prisoners' conveyance, though. Or maybe we could get more carts? I wish we had more oxen."

But Shizuru disagreed.

"Mules are better for this if we can find sufficient carts to match them," said the army veteran expertly, having dealt with both animals for years-even once, in her youth, from the intimate perspective of a contubernalis tasked with overseeing a legion's animals.

That experience had been intended as a penalty for the young patrician, who found herself constantly stepping over and around herbivore dung in the course of the assignment. The irony of it was that she had just been awarded a corona graminea right before it. She won the decoration in a battle gone awry, mustering a legion and countermanding her general's strategy. Her only goal had been to save as many as she could in the growing debacle. And in the end she did not only that but even turned the tide of the battle, saving both the army and the day.

Yet she very nearly got prosecuted for her pains.

Disobedience was a bad enough offence, but she made it worse by being a mere cadet. It would have been scandalous enough had she been a minor officer but Shizuru had occupied no position of authority at all when she led the soldiers in that battle. How could she have held an office at her age then? That the legionaries had even followed so young a person had been considered incredible-but as the years would show, it was only the first demonstration of her power over the people marching under the standards.

It was these same men and women whose love and gratitude later saved her, she who was also their saviour. They shielded her from the rancour she gained from her general and superiors in that battle. She had upstaged these leaders in a painful way and in front of thousands of soldiers. A contubernalis, of all people! A contubernalis did not command, and often did not even fight. He acted as a minor secretary and merely attended a superior officer. Yet this one had gone so far above her station that she had usurped the imperium of every officer above her. It was as though she had looked upon that battle and decided to take over with a shrug, saying, I might as well do it because no one else is capable enough.

She should have been brought to trial. As the army had just given her the rarest military decoration of Hime, however, the embittered senators could not have prosecuted the young woman-all the more as they knew that to do so would have brought down a true mutiny of the soldiers on their hands. Ah, but they could still hate. What did it matter that she had saved their skins as well? Gratitude ran short where envy ran long. Hence they strove instead to make the rest of her campaign miserable in various ways, including by assigning her to inglorious duties like that of managing the legion's beasts of burden.

Although the irrepressible youth had then turned the tables on them by diving into that duty as seriously as if it had been an army command. And then putting it to good use in her later campaigns, when she began to restructure the way her armies worked to turn them into the speedy machines she favoured as a general.

"I learned a great deal about the two animals when I was a contubernalis," she smiled to her cousin, who found little to smile about in her own remembrance of that time. Shizuma had been near-mad with worry back then, and had even rounded up their most powerful relatives and friends to see what could be done in case of a trial. She would be damned, she had sworn, if she allowed her favourite cousin to be condemned so soon after the girl had lost both parents. And even those of their circle most aghast at Shizuru's arrogance had pledged all their resources to save her.

But that was all before they learned of the corona graminea .

"The mules will do better because there is sufficient grass yet to keep them going," Shizuru was lecturing, "and the distance is actually manageable. They will not only move faster but weather heat better too. They should make good time without fuss."

"I see," Shizuma said. "I confess I always wondered which animal was superior."

"Oh, it always depends. Mules in this case. Change a few conditions, however, and the answer might be oxen. Either way, better one of them than horses for this sort of work."

"I know that, at least! Lucky for you-though not for the Treasury-I nearly bought out the breeders of the rosea rura to supply your campaign with the best mules possible. They cost more, but no Himean general of any sense would do with anything less." The senior legate stopped, screwed her eyes up as if a thought had suddenly occurred to her. "I say, I wonder what sort of mules one can get off those devilish large horses of the Otomeians. What would the progeny of a donkey and one of the Otomeian mares look like, you think?"

Shizuma turned to the Otomeian princess for an answer, but such was the affront on that woman's face that she found herself apologising without knowledge of her insult.

"I think she dislikes the match," their general said with a giggle. "Is that it, meum mel?"

The Polemarch of Otomeia was held fast by the ferocity of her indignation. She could not even manage a word of response.

"I think she really dislikes it," Shizuma's cousin whispered.

"A donkey!" said the polemarch, provoked to speech at last. "A donkey for my horses!"

"See?" Shizuru went on. "An unwelcome proposal, it seems."

"It is puh-profanity, not a proposal!" Natsuki hurled out.

Her lover made an effort to swallow the laughter.

"We must remember that she too is an aristocrat, Shizuma," the general said to her cousin, who was bemused by the foreigner's passion on the subject. "And her horses are in a sense as aristocratic as she is, if I understand her culture and how they treat these animals. Natsuki is also especially invested in this, as she has business in horse breeding. What you just suggested might have been equivalent to-oh, I don't know-I suppose imagine how Hikaru Senou or even the more prudish snobs among the Himemiya must have felt when they heard of Chikane-chan's choice of wife."

Even as the fascinated Shizuma digested that, she realised that a better analogy would have been to compare it to how those snobs would feel upon learning of her cousin's own (desired) choice of wife. Even though Himeko Himemiya had been part of the classless Head Count before Chikane wedded her, she had still been a born and bred Himean. The Princess Natsuki, despite her nobility, was by contrast a total outsider.

The idea had not been to mate a superb horse with a common one:

it had been to mate a horse with a different animal.

But it is hardly as though she can be expected to point that out to the girl's face, Shizuma allowed, saying instead: "I suppose, but Chikane and Himeko cannot actually produce offspring, which would be the purpose of the match the case of the beasts. I do take the point, though, so I will ask Natsuki to excuse me. It was an idle thought by an ignoramus on equine breeding. Pray do not think too badly of me for it, for I've little education on the matter and could not even begin to compare to you there."

Natsuki subsided into a blush at the apology, sincere as the Himean had made it sound. Satisfied, Shizuma addressed her cousin again.

"I'm to stay here and command the ones left behind as garrison, then? I expect you've plans to head somewhere again shortly, which would explain why you want me here."

"Yes," said her cousin, peeking out again from behind the goblet. "I want you to take charge of this area, as I intend to move further afield soon. Put a cohort of the Fourth in the Atinu camp, as that should be enough. Keep the rest with you and coordinate with the other legates to subdue this area. The Carsini, Shizuma. I want them put down. These people give the empire many of her soldiers in the centre, I take it, and they are deathly loyal to the king. I hear he used to live with them when he was younger."

She paused to sip at her drink and continued: "Unfortunately, they are spread out over a huge territory nearby with several forts and lords to continue recruiting and rallying them. I want them neutralised but my attentions need to be elsewhere."

"Very well. Where do you go?"

"It depends on what I learn in the next few days-soon after I speak with the Baron of Firens."

"That would be the Mentulaean heading the deputation requesting to meet with you."

"Just so. He should be headed here now, along with a coterie of other defecting aristocrats of the empire." She set her goblet back on the table and said, with every appearance of adding something inconsequential, "I instructed Kenji-han to have them escorted here on horseback with a handpicked group of crack legionaries from the Ninth. Handpicked by me, by the way."

It was Natsuki's muffled "Oh!" that alerted the senior legate to the presence of something more to what Shizuru had said. She looked to her cousin's inamorata for an answer, but that young woman was already looking at the commander.

"Shizuru," was all the Otomeian said, saying it in a way that said she was hugely tickled.

"Yes, I did forget to mention that to you earlier, Natsuki, did I not?" was the woman's response. She favoured the polemarch with a flirtatious wink before turning back to her cousin. "I am certain she has already guessed it, so there is no point in explaining to her what I mean, at least. Now tell me, Shizuma, have you ever met the chief primipilus of the Ninth?"

The senior legate said that she had not yet had the pleasure.

"Saltier than the pork we keep in the supply barrels," Shizuru outlined, sounding proud. "The woman's tongue curdles milk in the bowl. Ask Miyuki-han if I lie about that when you see her."

Shizuma's brow pleaded: "Why not Natsuki here, since I assume they have already met?"

But Shizuru laughed.

"Do you understand half of the vulgarities Yuuki-han says, my love? Be honest," she asked Natsuki, who scowled at the challenge.

"How am I to answer?" the Otomeian replied. "If I know half of them, I shall think that half to be the whole, no?"

The other two were caught off guard by this logic and burst into laughter.

"You have me there, I admit," Shizuru said. "Now back to the centurion. She is Sulpician in origin, absolutely steadfast once you gain her esteem, and as red of eye as she is of hair. And I think I do not exaggerate when I say her hair is some of the reddest I have ever seen, no, mea vita ?"

The Otomeian's head bobbed with fervour. Shizuma remembered that the Otomeians saw none of this hair colour themselves, so she supposed it had left a profound impression on the girl.

"She also heads the Ninth's torture and intelligence detachment," Shizuru went on. "Wonderfully effective. She would not hesitate to drive shards and splinters under your nails if she thought it would help you share a secret. I believe she even once carved letters into someone's gums, although I cannot be sure of it because it was only related to me afterwards by someone else."

While the two cousins had a number of things in common, equanimity to torture was not one of them. Shizuma shuddered whereas Shizuru smiled-and both looked perfectly patrician.

"Resourceful woman," Shizuma said colourlessly, trying to cast the image of bleeding nails and gums from her mind's eye. She succeeded when she realised what her cousin was hinting at and what the polemarch had already deduced. "I see. You told Nakamura to have the Mentulaean deputation shepherded here by that centurion?"

"And a few other not-dissimilar legionaries, yes."

"You're not planning interrogation under torture of those poor people, I hope?"

Shizuru was puzzled by the suggestion.

"Why would I?" she demanded. "Do you think me a savage?"

"I'm not certain what I think of you sometimes, truth be told," the other said with a headshake. "Still, gods protect that poor deputation. I take it they shall have none-too-comfy a journey."

"But an efficient and secure one," Shizuru responded. "I want no tricks played on us here, and that means keeping those barons and baronesses isolated from others until I talk to them. It also means keeping them alive, which is again related to isolating them from others who might recognise them and see the betrayal. The people I selected stick at nothing to see my orders carried out, and it is why I chose them. It is hardly torture, Shizuma, to keep a close watch on the enemy's defectors. My legionaries shall ensure security, you shall see. Not one of those Mentulaeans will be able to relieve himself in a bush without Yuuki-han or another of my men trimming it to keep a close watch."

"What delightful vulgarities you do spout sometimes, little cousin."

"No better than the ones you surely speak to your paramours in bed," the other shot back, eyebrow up. "Still, there it is. No clandestine connivances or shadowing possible for the defectors! They can talk amongst themselves but will never be given an opportunity to meet other Mentulaeans or locals on the way. I want them here as fast as possible, and Yuuki-han shall see to that. Even if it means she has to wear their rears down to leather, she shall keep them on horseback and travelling as long as she can without actually harming them. Provided I get them here alive and capable of talking, I think I shall not lose sleep over their little inconveniences."

Which meant that Shizuru suffered no pricks of conscience when the deputation finally straggled in, looking as though they had been dragged behind their steeds instead of riding on them. In fact, the senior legate murmured to the Otomeian polemarch, their commander even looked delighted by the bedraggled appearances of the defecting Mentulaeans-who all behaved somewhat as though they were walking on the deck of a pitching boat after dismount.

This dizzy and dishevelled delegation was ushered into the commander's working premises in Lasandre. For this Shizuru had chosen one of the better buildings in the city, a domicile that had belonged to one of Lasandre's foremost citizens. It was not in fact the best in the sense of being the most luxurious or even the largest of the options available, but it was nonetheless the one she found most suitable for her requirements. It was very near the city centre, it was accessible via the main roads from the gates, it had two floors with a separate entrance for the upper one, and it had the luxury of a working latrine. The cooler ground floor she appropriated for her personal use and converted a large bedroom in the brighter first floor into her council room. It was in this room that she sat the Mentulaeans as well as several of her officers.

"Before we begin," she said to the Mentulaeans, "would any of you like some cool water?"

All of them accepted.

"The summers have always been worse here," said the obvious leader of the group afterwards, a man with a mass of white hair and the vitality of an old warlord not yet grown frail. He was the only one to have managed to exchange short introductions with Shizuru earlier so he just addressed her casually. "In this part of the empire, that is to say. Just another reason I'm not too fond of it."

"The region, Baron Entei?" Shizuru asked with a smile. "Or the empire?"

Entei smiled back and revealed that his teeth, though large and finely-formed, were heavily yellowed. As his tousled hair and beard were very white, his smile appeared a literally jaundiced one.

"The region," he said. "I have other, deeper reasons for disliking the empire, General Fujino. As do my fellows."

She invited him to introduce the others.

"The Baron Delior of House Epixes," he began, indicating a sandy-haired man with the physique of a bull. Brawny and thick-necked, head receding into heavy shoulders: it led to an impression of him being shorter than he truly was. He was the kind of animal that people tended to think less intelligent than he could be in truth. Whether or not the square-jawed Delior was more or less intelligent than his looks, though, was something that Shizuru could not yet tell.

"His daughter is betrothed to my brother's only son, and his mother was my mother's cousin. His fiefs abut mine, so the two of us are responsible for the strip of land from Irisorum to Pharuces."

"Opposite which, across the border, would be the most powerful of the borderside Nervian fiefdoms," Shizuru explained for him. "I take the point on your Houses' importance to the region, Baron. Please continue."

The others looked surprised, but not Entei. A woman capable of doing what she had with the Southern Frontier and of climbing over a massif in winter to do it could only be very irresponsible or very thorough.

"And here we have the Baroness Athain of House Hallon." This next personality was a wiry woman with dark hair slashed with grey. Her look was one of weathered severity-the sort you carved out of wood. "The Baroness was one of the first members of our coalition. Her fiefs also abut mine."

The general's smile widened ever so slightly.

"And finally, the Baron Orgestes of House Garrida," Entei finished, indicating the last man. This was a smoothly bald character with a trim beard and a well-lined face; Shizuru thought him to be the eldest of the deputation by his looks, although not necessarily because he looked creaky already. He and Entei were in fact not that far from each other in age, but the gentler and more refined-looking Orgestes had less of the other man's martial vigour. His was the face of the seasoned counsellor: so placid it was nearly blank, Yet in that countenance was the ability to reflect whatever a ruler wanted to see in other eyes.

"He was a courtier of Obsidian's father," Entei was saying, still speaking of the Baron Orgestes. "And for some time, he was a high member of Obsidian's court as well. That was until he decided to retire to his fiefs."

"And do his fiefs also abut yours?" Shizuru asked with a touch of impishness.

Entei gave his golden smile again.

"No," he said.

Shizuru welcomed all of them heartily to the conference. Next she went through her own introductions, although hers were less specifically informative.

"I am General Shizuru Fujino, proconsul and governor-general of the Septentrian Province of Hime, which shall be the name for these lands once I have annexed them for People and Senate," she said with such glib nonchalance that it caused blinks among her guests. Defectors though they might be, they were also still ruling nobles of the realm she had just condemned to conquest with such certainty. "The persons around us are all part of my army and staff. Excuse me if I skip a complete introduction for now, as you shall have ample opportunity to meet the ones you should meet later if all goes well. And if all does not go well, then at least we shall not have wasted time."

She smiled briefly at their glances to each other.

"Not that I intend to keep you in the dark about the identities of all the people here, though," she continued. "For now, let it be noted that at my right is my cousin and senior legate. That means the immediate second-in-command in our army. At my left is a high officer of our allies the Otomeians, their appointed polemarch."

This time, the disconcertment was so obvious among the foreigners that Shizuru was obliged to inquire if there was a problem.

"Forgive our confusion," said the one female in the Mentulaeen delegation. She had a far softer voice and manner than her looks allowed. "What we know of Otomeia and its people isn't much, I do admit, but the, uh, poh-lay...?"

"Polemarch, Baroness Athain. Their auxiliary's high commander and representative in our councils. Also personally titled Princess Natsuki of the Otomeians."

"Ah, princess, yes," said Athain, latching onto the more familiar term. She directed a brief glance to the polemarch, whose face showed only curiosity at their interest. "As I said, we don't know much of Otomeia, all told. Even so, we do know some things one might consider of essence. And I must say, the princess doesn't look like any Otomeian we have ever seen."

"Yes, she likely does not," Shizuru said cheerfully. "Perhaps you should all consider yourselves fortunate to have the privilege of seeing her."

The senior legate grinned.

"I have already learned of what transpired at Massae and, as you explained them to my legate there, what events led to this," Shizuru continued, ploughing on before the foreigners could say any more. "I must say, though... a cool, if not frigid scheme, Baron Entei, to so use and spend people who were also your countrymen."

"So it must appear to some," Entei answered easily. "But correct me if I'm wrong-I remember that your nation has had its wars with neighbours too. Fuukans, I think, against Himeans?"

"The civil wars, yes. Countryman against countryman. But not people from the same nation."

"And there you have it, General," said Entei, a gleam in his eyes. "You call us people of a single nation, you call us all Mentulaeans. Why, the capital too insists we call ourselves that. But we're not actually all Mentulaeans at heart."

"No?"

"No, at the core of it. To many of us, we're still Firensian, or Vomaesian, or members of some old tribe or other. Well, we were separate tribes before the empire, after all. The king claims us to be one nation as if his claim were all it took to make it a reality. What we really need-the leadership it truly takes for such a task-has not been provided. In its place we've had only wishful thinking and naïve politics. There are too many unsettled grievances against each other, too many feuds that remain."

He gave her his yellowed smile.

"You see, there's the truth behind our great empire," he continued. "We're really just an agglomeration of petty nations held together by the thinnest tissue. No doubt you know some of this, General, since you seem the type to study her enemy until she's ferreted out as many potential weaknesses as possible."

"That is a kind view of me," she said to him, noncommittal.

"It's a weakness I'm sure you already know about. The empire's leaders-we all of us-have a dozen conflicts among us, and they've remained to this day. Why? Because our kings have never really learned to settle them. Or should I say they've never bothered? All they do is promise rewards and benefits for both parties if they set aside the grievances momentarily, hoping they'll be forgotten with their causes over time. I ask you, do enemies set aside their enmity simply because they forget the reason they began fighting in the first place?"

"Unlikely," Shizuru agreed.

"Our rulers failed to live up to their promised rewards as well," he said. "Our rulers are fickle and forgetful about their own promises. A great deal of the problem has been that they have little talent for dividing their attentions. They turn instantly to the idea of expanding their empire when they have to solidify it first. And contrary to what many simple advisors would have some believe, going after a common enemy doesn't always get rid of the enemies in your midst!"

Shizuru's smile had not budged yet: "Pity you were not there to counsel him on that, then, before he started sending armies over the border."

"I wasn't, no-I never could stand the pandering in court," the man admitted. "But I tell you honestly, General Fujino, that when the king first proposed the idea of expanding to the lands east of the Atinu boundary, I had my supporters in his court counsel against it as far as they could without losing their lives."

He noted her eyebrows go up with satisfaction.

"Because you believed there were more important things to do for the empire?" she enquired.

"Yes, and because I never cared to make enemies of your people," he said, prompting some looks among the others on her side of the table. "I know what you Himeans are like, General Fujino, far though our nations may have been from each other. I know no distance would keep you from getting to all those you think your enemies once they've stung you to action. It doesn't always happen the first time, nor even in the first decade, but your people don't stick at a first time or period of years-you keep trying even if it takes you a century to do it."

He gave his counterpart across the table an unreadable look.

"I know," he said, "about the tale of Carthage."

"Ah," was Shizuru's response.

"That was just one part of the concern," he went on, a line appearing between his white brows. "As I said, internal stresses were working inside the empire. The king ignored them and based his policies solely on conquest and expansion, which meant that even the lords of the west-our houses, which have long been the empire's bulwark against our closest true enemies-were ignored in favour of Houses that had armies and men to spare for his campaigns abroad. Well, of course they could spare them. They weren't doing anything for the empire's protection, unlike us. Yet they received rewards regularly and we didn't."

He stopped to take a drink from his cup again and found it empty. Shizuru pushed her untouched one across the table.

"Thank you," he said after using her offering. "It's more consideration than our so-called king often shows us, I'm sad to say."

"As you were telling me," she said gently.

"Yes," he agreed. "Well, we who had long been at the service of the empire's defence received little consideration from him. Why not? We had little choice but to do our tasks, as we ourselves would be in the path of the Nervii were they to break through. Still, it was a bitter turn to be consciously and constantly ignored by the king in his favours and rewards. The king-the kings, as I count his father before him-have been perpetually prejudiced in favour of certain Houses and peoples too. Again, why shouldn't they be? They have their own 'true people' too. It's after the old tribe and House of the ruling dynasty, by the way, that we take the name 'Mentulae'. Did you know that?"

Shizuru nodded.

"I don't say that kingship over the different clans is impossible. Unification, I mean. Had I thought that, I would never have married my daughter to Obsidian," Entei revealed to the circle of auditors listening raptly to his dialogue-if it could be called that-with the Himean commander. "It was a leap of faith I took then, when the king asked for her hand in marriage. But it's a leap of faith that has ceased to be of benefit. You'll know this from what I told your legate already. It was obvious to me that there could be no future in staying with the realm."

"And you believe one to be in Hime?"

"I believe Hime is the future."

The general said nothing for some moments, as if waiting to see if he had anything else left to say. When it was clear he had no more, she made the smallest of movements in her chair, like someone quietly testing her spine after a long period of stillness.

"Everything you have said is interesting. But what do you want me to do, exactly?" she asked Entei.

Entei's lips twitched under his snowy beard. He had read her earlier as the sort of person who would negotiate with delicacy and more than a bit of roundabout talk; even now he thought he had not read her wrong. Her evasive responses thus far had been proof of it. So was this one deviant response now to be read as something other than it appeared?

"What do we want you to do, General?" he echoed, trying to buy himself time to reassess her.

The look in her extraordinary eyes said she knew what he was doing.

"That was what I asked," she said. "Do be frank about it, please. You may even be crude if you like. It is too hot today for us to waste everyone's time by batting eyelashes sweetly at each other."

His mouth fell open for the briefest moment.

"Very well, General," he said once he recovered, actually giving out a chuckle. "I'll come to the point."

He looked her straight in the eyes for what he had to say, knowing letting them roam would be a weakness before this creature.

"I want a kingship," he said. "I will be king of the western provinces of the realm, with an expansion of the boundaries of those provinces. You Himeans can keep the majority of the realm if you want it. However, I want the west."

A smile. "Plus a little more."

"Plus a little more, but it's a little that you can easily afford. And for every part you give us, you have less to worry about administratively. I'll do what you want me to do in the rest-~~fight~~ Obsidian, garrison citadels you take, whatever you need as long as you let me do what I want in what will be my lands. You can also request a tribute, auxiliaries, whatever, as long as you stand behind me when I declare myself king. And I want a promise of you standing behind me too in case my enemies attack. I think you call people like me clients?"

"Client-king in your case, yes."

"That's it. Any thoughts yet?"

"Perhaps a bit of surprise." She quirked a brow at him. "I thought you would ask for the whole instead of just a part. Why not request to be high king of the entirety instead, since you do believe that the whole can be united under the right leadership? You might have tried to convince me to it by pointing out the advantages of just replacing the head of the realm instead of carving it up into new territories."

The baron's eyes swept what showed of her above the table again, as if taking her in one more time.

"General Fujino, please," he said. "I'm not fool enough to think Hime would send in someone like you if they didn't want to grab as much as they could of this place."

She looked very amused by that.

"So these-" She swept the rest of the deputation with her gaze. "Would they be your high council?"

"The core of it, yes."

"They submit to the terms of the contract between us, then, as shall all those part of your coalition. Is this guaranteed? All of you would offer me your forces for this alliance?"

"Yes, and whatever else you may need that we can give. Local intelligence, grain, fresh animals if we can supply them. We'll also hold the west-the lands you let us have-against your enemies and ours, reducing your worries."

"The usual offerings."

It was an indifferent answer.

"You want something else," Entei said almost accusingly, eyes guarded.

"I want something more ." She then surprised everyone in the room by declaring, "It is very likely that you shall pay through the nose for this alliance and support you seek, Baron Entei, and I do not pretend otherwise. I am waging a war and I will use every resource I can to win, even if it means I have to use it ferociously. Besides everything you have offered, I am likely going to ask a great deal more of you yet. It is up to you to decide whether or not you are willing to supply what I want. But trust me when I say I shall ask for nothing that you cannot actually give."

Entei ignored the murmurs of his companions and kept his eyes on the beautiful woman across the table.

"It's interesting that you would ask me to trust you, General Fujino," he said softly. "Especially when you've made no gestures yet that would give us cause to do that. Unlike us, by the way, considering what we did at Massae."

"True," she concurred without concern. "But you did that because you seek an alliance with us. We do not seek an alliance with you."

At the patent flash of alarm in all their eyes-even in the thus-far composed Entei's-she halted their fears with a quick amendment.

"We do not seek one, but we may take one," she told them. "Quite a difference between the two, My Lady and Lords. Choose to fulfil my requests and the alliance may happen. Choose otherwise and it shall not. The choice is yours."

"You sound," said the grey-haired Orgestes, "as though you care not which way that choice goes, General Fujino."

"I do," she said smoothly. "Pardon me if I gave you the impression that I did not. Let it be clear that I do care. However, it should be clear as well that I care less than would be preferable for your bargaining position. You see, there is another truth I shall not conceal from you, because you can see it too if you open your eyes. The achievement of our goals is not dependent on your support... whereas the achievement of your goals is, in fact, largely dependent on ours. We both know this, so I daresay it is folly to act as though in ignorance of it. Do you think King Obsidian would take kindly to your secession? It is rather too late to change your mind about rebellion now, given what you did and whom you slew at Massae. Remember too that rulers always fear the enemies closer to home. I rather fancy Obsidian would wage war on you first if I were to pack up and pull out my legions from this land."

"And sacrifice all you have gained from your victories thus far?" gasped Athain.

"If it gained me the whole prize later, why would I think twice about returning a piece for a time? Besides, I would not go unrewarded, mind you. I have already stripped several of your armies and towns of booty, besides capturing a good number of people to sell to slavers. I shall be retreating with a tidy profit to offset my costs already as well as pay for my return once you and Obsidian have battered each other into military insignificance."

She was still speaking and smiling in that tender way, which was what made the delegation so uncomfortable all of a sudden. They were not used to people who spoke like that, who required no great gestures or passions to express power. She was powerful: they were not blind to that, despite the youth that was plain on her face. Yet she strove constantly to wrap her strength in silk, as if dulling the gleam of her own steel.

"If indeed Obsidian went after you," she said, "I predict you would war so viciously with each other that the victor would have a Pyrrhic victory on his hands."

At their expressions, she explained, "Pardon me. Something in the manner of what happened to King Pyrrhus of Epirus when he warred with us two hundred years ago. He won battles against us that led to him losing so many of his men that he could not replace them for later encounters. Hime could refill the voids left in her ranks by those battles, however, and so eventually we won the war."

"I see," said old Baron Orgestes slowly, spellbound. "A victory at so dear a cost that it spells defeat in the long run."

"Precisely. So if I did leave you and Obsidian to your internecine war, whichever side turned out the victor would be greatly reduced in strength. It would be but a simple thing for me to move back in with my legions and subdue whoever remains."

"Then," said Entei, "why not just do that? Why not egg us on to declare ourselves seceded without your help and let Obsidian come after us as you said?"

Shizuru sighed and held out her hands as if to say the answer was obvious.

"You are not stupid enough for it," she said.

"And what makes you say that?"

"You came over to the winning side, did you not?"

A moment of silence, after which the tense members of the delegation finally unbent enough to smile.

"Besides, I am not stupid enough to do that either if there is an alternative," she said. "I am not the sort of mindless invader who would prefer to denude a land this large of all its people when I could convert some instead. Especially when the possible converts would be ones I can rely on to guard the land's flanks in the future, as you pointed out earlier. I see your worth! So I admit I would prefer that we be friends, my dear nobles of the Mentulae."

The baron said nothing for a moment.

"You would prefer it," he said. "But you don't... pine after it, I think one could say."

A laugh spilled from the beautiful mouth.

"One could say that," she said merrily. "If you take the route that turns us into enemies, I shall not shed a single tear over it, to be honest. Why should I, when it would likely work out for me too, eventually? In the end, the outcome of this meeting shall be your choice. I shall not insult you by trying actual coercion. As I said earlier, you approached me, not the other way around, so I shall not barter with you like some huckster eager for a sale."

The deputation thought this over for some seconds.

"Very well," Entei finally ruled. "It's hard to deny what you say, General Fujino-and that's why you can say you shall not coerce us, isn't it? You know you have no need to, as the situation itself is coercive in your favour. There is one thing I would like to amend in your words just now, however."

"What is it?"

"You referred to us as Mentulaean nobles. As we are building what is in effect a new kingdom, we wish to build a new nation as well. Please refer to us as Firensians from now on. All of my fellows agreed on this prior to this conference."

Shizuru nodded with clear approval.

"A wise idea, Baron," she said. "Indeed, should you not be titled 'king' instead, by now? Do you not wish to claim that new status yet?"

"I've not had the opportunity for a proper coronation."

Orgestes interrupted.

"Forgive me, My Lord," said the old man, his wise eyes suddenly bright and young. "It's true you've not had a coronation ceremony yet, but it's no obstacle. All the coalition swore allegiance to you and has also sworn support of your kingship already. That is formal acknowledgement of your kingship given circumstances, sufficient in lieu of the coronation ceremony to render to you kingly status in this negotiation with General Fujino. This is a rebellion in a time of war, after all-formalities are different in such times. I imagine it would also be more convenient to the General if you were to acknowledge your own kingship now instead of waiting for ceremony to claim what the rest of us have already legitimised."

Shizuru nodded to this. Entei looked to the rest of his companions, then back to her.

"I am King of Firens."

"King Entei of Firens, then," Shizuru agreed. "I must ask something before I even contemplate agreeing to this, and mind that you tell me the truth, please. If I find out you have given me a lie, you and your new nation shall not survive unscathed."

It was strange, Entei would reflect ever after, that he had known some of the most verbally vicious warlords and kings in his time, both among the Mentulae and his enemies among the Nervians. Yet he thought he had never felt-not heard, for there was nothing in either her tone or diction to merit that word-as much menace in a warning as he did from the song-voiced and smiling Himean that day. It seemed to him as though her deliberate omission of details or power infused her threat with a malice unmatched by the loudest alarum. Was what she had left out so unspeakable it had to be censored from its own suggestion?

"Lies will have out eventually," he told her. "I don't give a lie when I know it's one I will have to give and uphold continuously, since I know that can't be done forever."

"Oh, you are a wise king!" she said with complete absence of sarcasm. "Here is the query. Were there any Himean citizens recently in your lands or in any of the western lands belonging to this alliance?"

He exhaled quietly, the snowy hairs of his beard stirring with the breath. He had known she would ask this, so it was a relief to finally get it out.

"I found none in mine," he said, "and I very much doubt any of the others found Himeans living in their lands either. Ours are rough lands and too dangerous for tourism or foreign traders. Your people have never really ventured far enough west to reach our lands."

"None in mine either," said Delior.

One by one the delegation disavowed the presence of Himean citizens in their fiefs.

"If I may?" the old baron Orgestes said, and upon getting a nod from Entei, went on to explain: "I expect you are concerned about our possible execution of Himean citizens, General Fujino, but we had no such displays in the west. The first reason, as stated by my fellows and my king, is that there was no opportunity for it. From our understanding, you took many of the Southern Frontier's towns of note already. Did you get reports of Himean executions when you were there?"

Shizuru denied it.

"Most of the few Himeans would have fled even before the war really broke out," he said. "There were stirrings even before Argentum-your battle at Argentum, I mean, with Prince Artaxi."

"And the second reason?"

"The second reason is that we were already thinking of defection even before Prince Hiempnos crossed the border. Even had we found Himeans in our provinces around the time war broke out, we would not have been stupid enough to destroy our chances of an alliance with your people."

This time, the Himeans around the table were the ones to sport startled expressions.

"If indeed you were contemplating alliance with us as early as that," the senior legate spoke up, her eyes flashing golden in the daylight, "why did you come to us only now?"

"Because we weren't strong enough," was Entei's response. "Not at the time. We had to look for supporters among the other western lords first, build a more stable position, find an opportunity such as Massae to prove our dedication to this relationship, and somehow do all of this while protecting ourselves from detection by those loyal to the king. It wasn't easy for us. You've been separated from us by the king's loyal territories and his forces all this time. I couldn't even risk sending a courier to you before this, there having been too many armies and warlords capable of waylaying couriers until now—who was to say they wouldn't have intercepted even a secret message and alerted Obsidian to our coup prematurely?"

The two women on the opposite side of the table shared a look.

"Very well," ruled the Himean commander. "Let us now clarify the contract conditions in brief. You propose to become a client king of Hime, with all the duties and privileges that status carries?"

"Yes."

"You agree to enter an alliance with me that places your troops as well as your person and powers at my disposal whenever I require it?"

"Yes."

"You agree to remodel your laws in such a way that they are commensurate with the law of the Province of Septentria, in order to keep the peace better between our respective areas of governance?"

"What will be the laws of Septentria?" he asked.

"In brief, those of Hime." Her eyes flashed. "We may inspect them later. But for now, a good example of what I mean would be a prohibition against human sacrifice."

"Ah!" He should have known she would light on that practice. Well, it little mattered to him: he was no partisan of druids and thought little of using a dying man's twitches to tell the way battles would go. Only the mettle of a general, the quality of his troops, and fortune could do that. "Done, no human sacrifice."

"You agree to submit to our methods and decisions in division of spoils and territories?" she said, adding before any of them could offer the quail, "Naturally, there shall be a special provision here concerning the exception, which is the allocation of the western territories to you and your barons. I shall not touch a single iugerum of land belonging to your fiefs. Nor shall I tamper with the lands you have recently claimed for yourselves following the events at Massae."

She glanced at Entei, then at the Baroness Athain: "I note that there was an enormous spur of territory previously belonging to the Lords of Vomaes separating what you now claim are your fiefs, for instance. I take it House Vomaes was one of those eradicated at Massae?"

Entei shook his head with a small smile.

"Your intelligence on us is remarkable," he told her.

"I think you shall find what I have to say next even more demonstrative of that," she said in return. "I confess I knew who your daughter was even before you mentioned her marriage to the king—or should I say King Obsidian for specificity, since you claim kingship as well? In any case, I was aware not just of her status but also of the rumour that she was left high and dry in the capital by her husband, who chose to winter and, it seems, summer elsewhere.

When did you last hear from her?"

"Before I set these events in motion," he said. "She was indeed left in the capital, which is bereft of Obsidian and his court."

"You summoned her from it, I expect, in preparation for your defection?"

He shook his head, although not as an answer to the query.

"I wish I had your sources!" he declared, drawing a self-deprecating smile from her.

"Not at all-that was merely a guess. Unless you wished your daughter ill, you would hardly have left her in Gorgo to suffer the fate meant for you after Massae. Where is she now?"

He hesitated just long enough to prompt her to add, "There is no danger to your daughter's life here, but to be sure, I do not need you to specify exactly where. Simply give me a general idea of whether she is in the central regions, in the east, the north, and so on."

"The central region," he said then, drawing a satisfied sigh from her. "Not that far away from us even now, but deeply hidden. Our intention had been to fetch her with some horsemen after the battle-although that has had to wait, obviously, as your legate has seen fit to hold down all our cavalry and commanders until our conference was concluded. He gave us no choice since we wanted a meeting arranged with you straightaway." A pause. "I had been hoping to ask you to permit us to fetch her directly after this meeting, before news of Massae finally reaches these regions."

"I shall have to refuse that request, I fear, but wait and hear me out first, please." She sat back in her chair and gave him another of her warm smiles. "You are a man of great ambition and political dexterity, My Lord Firens. I doubt you would have left your interests in the capital in the sole custody of your daughter."

He took the implied question and answered.

"My daughter Azula has her supporters in Gorgo, yes," he said. "Although all of those publicly known to support her have departed the city too and are with her in hiding."

Shizuru made a soft clucking noise.

"So they were left behind too; you have fallen from Obsidian's favour," she said.

"I have," he agreed. "Little wonder I came to you."

"Indeed. What I have to ask is actually the next condition for my acceptance of the alliance. How quickly can you return your daughter and supporters to the capital?"

The Mentulaeans stared at her, even Entei.

"Return her to Gorgo?" the Baroness Athain echoed dumbly. "You do not mean that now, General?"

"Why, is it impossible already?" Shizuru asked, glancing at her. "As you said earlier, news of Massae has not yet reached this place. The only reason it reached me was that my legate sent a messenger as soon as he could. I applaud your care, by the way-you must have killed every one of the other westerners in that battle to have prevented news from being spread by survivors. Well, my men helped, I am certain. The Ninth has a particular taste for falling on those who show their backs in battle."

She seemed to shift slightly in her seat: she was crossing her legs.

"At any rate, your concern must be with the unlikelihood of her returning to the capital based on her cover story. What pretext did you use to get her out?"

Entei cleared his throat to draw the Himean commander's attention again.

"No, it's not impossible to return her to Gorgo, I think," he allowed. "But I do think it will be a little tricky. We asked her and her supporters to withdraw to the west for safety, you see. Let the rest of the city's governing nobles think it was paranoia on my part and all that."

"Did they attempt to hold her back?"

"You think it a slim pretext?"

"Not at all. If I were in a position where my enemy would be someone such as myself, I daresay paranoia would be more akin to wise caution in the end."

He grinned at the twinkle in her eye.

"I believe you," he said. "But no, to answer your question. They didn't hold her back. If the king withdraws to his northwest quarters with the court for an extended period during war, why would they blame the queen he left behind for doing the same? Besides, they wouldn't go leaderless without her. The one really given authority over the capital is the leader of its defending army."

"I see."

She sent for a map of the empire's central region and had it spread on the table.

"Which way would she presumably-I mean as far as the capital knows-which route would she presumably take to get from there to Firens?"

Entei traced the route for Shizuru with his finger.

"Then I suggest you send her a letter saying this," Shizuru said to him. "Tell her to retrace her steps immediately and reinstall herself and her companions in the capital. Once she has, have her spread word that the messenger they sent ahead as scout found the western lords already gathering at Massae. Not strictly an untruth, so hardly unbelievable intelligence."

Entei nodded, still waiting for the real excuse that would let his daughter return to the capital without suspicion.

"And then," Shizuru continued, "I want her to say too that while travelling, they had word of a Himean army coming from Lasandre and marching the road to Berentum, which we all know leads eventually to Gorgo. Tell them they heard it from fleeing survivors whose homes were destroyed by the invaders. She promptly turned around and headed back to Gorgo to warn its army of the coming foe."

Now everyone around the table was staring at her.

"The road to Berentum, General?" Orgestes said.

"Yes. There is an army not too far from there too, right? Nysias, I think. Is it still there?"

He wondered again from where she was getting information and told her as much as he knew from his own sources.

"The last I heard-it was a month past, General-yes, so I cannot speak for it now."

"I see. Now we come to the most important of my requests, the reason I am asking her to reinstall herself in the capital in the first place."

"What is it?"

"I need her to persuade the commander of the army at Gorgo to head to Berentum as well. Have her convince them that they should stop us from getting nearer the capital, that is, and head out to meet us instead of awaiting us where they are."

Entei blinked.

"What you ask is easy enough, but I just need to give out a caution, General," he said. "In case you do meet them at or around Berentum, you should be aware that place is a wide plain like this one, with even fewer hills. It will be the kind of ground Mentulaeans, especially those of the centre, know best how to fight on. Without insult to your abilities, a full royal army is different from the sort of force you defeated to get Lasandre."

"I trust it to be," she said with provocative sangfroid. "Then you have to add the forces near the capital too, like the ones at Nysias, which could reinforce the Gorgo army as it marches. Large, no?"

"Very. Then you should think too of the Prince Calchis's army up north, which could be heading here as we talk."

"No, that one shall not be a problem for the moment," she said, befuddling all of them; they did not know that she had shut off the central lands from that army for the moment. "Nor shall the one at Nysias be a problem if your daughter tells the capital too that she sent for it to be brought up to Berentum, presumably to help halt the Himean advance there."

Entei caught the light in her eye and guessed at it.

"But she will not have sent any messages to Nysias, in fact?" he volunteered.

"Oh, she will! But they shall be ones demanding that the army there be moved post-haste to Rissetium."

Entei's eyes danced, his companions' laughter in his ears.

"Rissetium is in the opposite direction," he said.

"It is that. Do you think your daughter can manage it?"

"Azula isn't without influence yet-or cunning, for that matter," he said.

"That gladdens me," Shizuru said, and meant it. "So we can rule out the Nysian forces too for this battle, most likely. Still, not bad odds for Gorgo's commander. Do you know the commander?"

He eyed her with mock-suspicion before answering: "Do you ?"

She laughed and said she did not, inviting him to enlighten her on his superior knowledge here.

"And here I was beginning to think you knew everything about us already," he said. "Baron Terrigos. The king's half-brother-a bastard of Obsidian's father, really. The former king got him off some servant woman in the palace, so his lineage isn't remarkable on one side. The title he now holds was a gift from Obsidian, to whom he is most loyal. Not a politician, but a soldier. He's a veteran of war and one of Obsidian's better generals. The king's man to the death too."

"Which is why he was left in charge of the army at the capital, naturally," Shizuru said, directing a grin to her own cousin. "No doubt it is why he did not leave one of his sons instead. A bastard brother who cannot inherit the throne and whose claim to power is dependent on his favour. Not all that different from our own senators in their machinations, is it? Although blood ties are actually strengths in our case, as opposed to dangers."

The senior legate smirked.

"Unless you happen to be rich enough to be worth murdering for an inheritance," she said.

As Shizuru's fortune happened to be worth murdering for many inheritances, she raised an eyebrow askance at this.

"Very well," she said to the delegation, clapping both hands together in apparent contentment. "Let us wrap this up, then. As regards your daughter, I need her to act as soon as possible. She should not find her task hard if this Terrigos is as experienced a general as you say and if she still has some modicum of power in the city."

"I'll send her the message this very day."

"Excellent. Next, return to your troops in Massae and collect them for a trip to Resselium."

"Resselium." A pause. "I see."

"I am glad you do. After you take it and eliminate the Nysian army, wait for more instructions at that location. Do these things and I say yes to the alliance and your uncontested kingship over the west."

There was a simultaneous straightening among the Mentulaeans-or Firensians, as they now dubbed themselves.

"Very well, General, I've no objection to the terms," said Entei. "But if I may ask a question, do you truly plan to head to Berentum and engage them?"

"I thought I said as much."

"Don't you want our forces to join you for it instead of bothering with the army from Nysias?"

"Even if I did, it would be a vain hope." Shizuru lifted an eyebrow, the one he saw was cut in half by a fine scar. "I have no intention of waiting for you to bring in your forces from Massae, you see. Doing so might lead to squandering opportunity. Your daughter's strongest argument for persuading the Baron Terrigos to meet us at Berentum would be the relative security of Massae and the area nearby, at least based on her claim of the western lords rallying their armies there. Terrigos would only have one direction left to look to for threats then. The longer we wait to do this, the bigger are the chances of a survivor from Massae or some random onlooker delivering the news of your defection, in which case Terrigos will then have two directions to look to for enemies. He would not budge from his encampment if that were to be the case."

She checked the water clock on a desk against the wall and smiled a dismissal at her guests.

"We shall talk more afterwards. For now, please do enjoy our hospitality. We have prepared food and quarters for you and you need only ask us for something if you require it to make your stay more comfortable. I believe you have been riding very hard the past days-" A sideways glance at her cousin, who was smiling unabashedly. "-so we shall provide all we can to help you have a restful night later."

---

A restful night would be a vain hope for people in their position, the newly-minted Firensians noted when free of foreign surveillance.

"How can one rest with everything we have to think on?" groaned the Baroness Athain to her similarly wakeful comrades. They were in the capacious dining room of the house they had been given. They were not there to dine: they had just come from a dinner feast the Himeans had put together hastily in their honour. But digestion did not come with sleepiness for any of them tonight.

"A plot to draw a royal army to Berentum," Athain continued. "An assignment to occupy Ressetium. A promise to send over a portion of our harvest straightaway. A gamble of a battle, if I'm to understand her intentions for Terrigos aright. That youngster wasn't kidding when she said we'd pay a lot for this alliance. And the sum of it's hard to swallow!"

"Fortunately, you can't say the same of their cuisine," said the Baron Delior. "That stuff they served was right tolerable."

"You certainly ate a lot."

"If you mean I was unworried enough to fall to my meal with relish, yes, you're right." His eyes lit with pleasure as he recalled their dinner, licking his chops voluptuously. Such wonderfully roasted pork! How had they managed to impart that delightfully subtle sweetness to it? "Seriously, though, Athain, did you expect anything else? To be honest, I thought she might ask for even more when we were just on the way here. I'd say she drove a decent bargain today, at least for someone in her superior position."

"So you think," Athain said, "that we're not being asked to pay through the nose and on speculation?"

"I think we're paying things we can afford to pay yet," said the sandy-haired man, who was in fact more intelligent than his neckless, bullish appearance suggested. He had kept quiet during the actual conference out of respect for his betters, for he was the youngest of the lot. But now they were away from prying eyes and he was in a mood to chat, being much excited by all that had just transpired on this mission of great import.

"I don't see why you're so put out, to be honest," he said. "We don't have much to worry about since she was right in saying we've no choice but to submit to her demands. There's no more thinking that needs to be done on that score, so it shouldn't keep you up later. Although-yes, I'm unashamed to admit something will still keep me up tonight! I blame it on our new allies' faces."

"What do you mean?" the baroness asked.

It was the Baron Orgestes who answered for the younger man.

"You mean," he said, "because the Himean command was full of lookers."

"That it was," Delior whistled, slapping his meaty thighs. " Weren't they, though?"

Both Orgestes and Athain agreed without reservation, having been as impressed by it as their comrade. Who dropped an elbow heavily onto the table and propped up his chin dreamily on one hand. It was an airy pose incongruous with his bovine looks, but many things about Delior were inconsistent with his appearance.

"Stunning!" he breathed. "Absolutely stunning! And the colours on those women! I mean the three on the other side of the table earlier, specifically. I didn't expect them at all."

"I don't think any of us expected them either-particularly the general," interrupted their king, finally surfacing from his preoccupation with some meditation. "Especially because she's the general."

"How do you work that out?"

"Army leaders are always described with heroic good looks in the stories. Legends inflate the appeal of the victorious just as they fill out the gaps in them. In reality, we know it's otherwise, don't we? Most great leaders aren't beautiful people. They often have something that makes them eye-catching or impressive to look at, yes, but they don't actually draw people to them with their looks. They're a very far cry from the way actors would make them seem when they're resurrected in plays later. Do you remember that one production we saw in Comus ages ago, Orgestes, the one where the old king was played by that gorgeous buck the women all fancied?"

Old Orgestes roared with laughter, tears actually springing to his eyes.

"And the old queen reared up in her seat and demanded to know why her husband suddenly looked so much better after his death," he explained to the other two.

Entei was laughing as well.

"That's what I mean," he replied. "But what we saw earlier was something straight out of the play, wasn't it? I don't think any actor could ever fill in for her shoes later when they begin doing tributes to her-she's so beautiful even thespians will struggle to match it." He paused and looked thoughtful. "She was so good-looking, in fact, that I even forgot about her youth as we talked. I could see it the entire time, yet it was only afterwards that it even became something worth noting. It's hard to explain why that relates to her good looks, but I felt that it did."

"I propose," said Orgestes, "that it may have been because her looks were more of the divine quality than the human. And we know the divine is ageless."

The other three looked at him, Entei smiling broadly.

"You've the most eloquence of us all, as usual," he said to his old friend. "Yes, that's what it was, I suspect. And her eyes..."

They waited, but he left the sentence hanging.

"Don't they remind you of that brat of the king's?" Delior finally burst out. "The one they say is a smart one? I don't like him."

"Prince Nagi?" said Orgestes, who had met that prince on more than one occasion-and who had no liking to lay on the prince's altar either; that son of the king's, he suspected, was very hard to like, never mind love. "Not really. Prince Nagi's are a very pale pink and a little blind-looking. The General Fujino's are much more vivid. And I should think her eyes never look blind, if you know what I mean."

"Either way, a memorable woman," said Delior, drawing an emphatic hum of agreement from Athain. "So very tall too, and what a figure! The other woman, the one she said was her cousin, was another interesting character. Such hair on that head! I thought at first she was like Prince Nagi, but she wasn't at all. Not as colourless, somehow. And her face was as ravishing as the general's."

"I actually preferred," Entei said quietly, "the face of the general's mistress."

The others were stunned into silence.

"Who?" Delior demanded when he recovered. "What do you mean her mistress? Well, I suppose I should have known she'd swing that way."

"She's an army general," Athain said to him. "Of course she'd swing that way."

"That's true. Still, who's the mistress?"

Entei smiled at them from under his beard and tapped the table with a finger: "She's the other face in the trio of lookers from earlier, obviously."

They continued to stare at him.

"The Otomeian princess?" Orgestes whispered.

"Oh!" said Delior with a snap of the fingers. "I was about to get to her! That terribly austere girl with the raven hair."

"So she's Fujino's mistress?" Athain asked their king.

"I think so," said Entei.

"But how would you know that?" the baroness said. "No one said anything earlier."

"If you look closely enough, you won't need to listen," was his response. "I'm not sure of it yet, but I think a few enquiries tomorrow will tell you that I'm right. That young woman is in bed with the general."

"Intrigue already!" said Delior with an animated laugh. "I admit I prefer women who are quicker to smile, but there's something to be said for beauties of that Otomeian's type as well-if she's indeed Otomeian."

Orgestes grinned naughtily at his comrade again: he found the younger man's verve for the topic amusing.

"That type?" he asked.

"Yes," Delior said with authority. "There's a unique refinement that can come with that sort of austerity, my dear fellow."

Athain frowned up at the rafters: "What was her title again, poley-what?"

Entei blew through his nose to get their attention.

"I wonder that none of you catch on to it yet," he said, looking very wry. "There is a point to me bringing up her likely mistress." At their blank looks, he said slowly: "It might turn out useful if indeed the Otomeian is General Fujino's mistress. Or should I say, if indeed an Otomeian is General Fujino's mistress."

It was Delior who voiced the answer first.

"Oh, I see!" he said. "It means she wouldn't scorn to take a foreign lover."

"So I hope," said the older man.

"Does that mean you hope to slip her a new mistress from within our ranks?"

Entei tipped his head to the side as if to say it was a thought.

"Not to be negative," said Athain in her mild voice, "but I don't think that's very easily done. She doesn't seem the type to take on just any beautiful woman presented to her, the general, and besides... well... we all saw that Otomeian, didn't we?"

"I know," Entei said ruefully. "Even if General Fujino were the type, we'd have a lot of looking to do to get someone of that calibre, you mean. Even then, short of getting a professional seductress, who can really compel someone to be attracted to them?"

Athain looked helpless.

"I know," Entei said again. "It's not even as though we know she'd take someone in the unlikely event we find someone comparable. It was just a thought. Given that Hime-which means that woman, at the moment-is going to be our new master, it seems wise to pursue every avenue that could give us leverage in our dealings with her. Even something as ridiculous as trying to see if we could slip her a second mistress is justified, given how much of our future she holds in her hands."

He gave the other three a look they all knew. It was the same look he had worn when first he had come to them with his plans of betrayal.

"I still stand by this being the right decision," he said. "I don't even feel worried about whatever battle she's planning against Terrigos, though I see some of you are. This is a right decision! But even right decisions come with dangers, and we all knew that coming here."

The others sobered at the reminder. It was a colossal shift in life that they had just brokered and sealed over food and drink earlier. Even if it was now an inevitable choice for survival, it was nevertheless an act that would eradicate some of the realities of the present. One of which would be their indifference to the edicts and desires of a foreign nation.

To be sure, their old masters had subjected them to sometimes foreign rules as well: orders whose origins were bound to faraway places like the capital, or to social and dynastic battles that did not really involve western life all that deeply. But these rulers had still been nearer than the Himeans. They were also rulers who had been more obsessed with themselves than their subjects, which meant that aside from levies of food, tax, and manpower, their policy had been to leave western society and culture alone as long as its politics went their way.

Himeans were different.

Everyone knew Himeans made for different masters because they meddled into parts of life most other masters would not touch. They seeded colonies in new places and were famous for making "little Himes" out of their provinces; their culture and ways of life spread through lands almost like an infection. And while they could coexist peacefully with other peoples, they made sure it was under their own terms.

They Himean way was to excise whatever it found noxious for whatever reason. Take human sacrifice, in the Mentulaean case. It did not matter whether or not it affected them-for no Himeans had ever been used for ritual sacrifice by the empire's religious leaders. For that matter, no Himean immediately expected such a fate for himself. All that mattered was that Himeans took interest in it, so Himeans meddled. And Himeans took interest in everything.

No surprise that the druids of the realm were united in opposing their presence. Himeans demanded too many concessions that would touch upon the old ways. Himeans also brought an entirely new religion to the land, invaded the spiritual territories of their old gods with their southern ones. They were even unapologetically political in their approach to religion, their faith's curators being senators and sometimes generals. All of this made them a colossal danger to any native creed.

The druidic opposition to the invaders would have counted for more in the old days. But the druids' faction had already lost a great deal of its old ascendancy, which had seen them consulted for every matter of state in the past. Now, they were mostly just sops to those who cared for ritual: the kings' tightening grips on power had weakened their force.

They were not completely dismissible even so. Factions remained loyal to them and the old traditions, factions Entei himself had turned away from and even slain at Massae. It had not been very difficult for him to do this, as he was not a religious man. The druids were custodians of the realm's spiritual health, true, but he did not think that meant they had a right to decide matters best left to those who better understood governance. For a nation's spirit-or a man's-was the air bit of it, the part that soared and flew free. What had that bit to do with the fleshly part labouring on and besmirched by the earth?

---

Shizuru chose her path as always with a mind towards avoiding deception. She who wielded it so often herself was perpetually wary of others turning the same tool on her, which explained the route she made the army march as they moved nearer the enemy capital.

The Berentum road was one that traversed mostly countryside. It yielded few items of topographical interest to break up a wide and flat landscape. There were no mountains, few rivers, barely any large woods or vales near the path. It meant that Shizuru had few platforms to use to her advantage if they were attacked, but the enemy in turn had few nooks to use in laying an ambush.

The Fujino Army had set off from Lasandre as soon as the Firensians confirmed reception of their message by Entei's daughter. The senior legate took over Lasandre upon Shizuru's exit, and waited there for two of the legions coming from the River Holmys.

The army by the Holmys was returning because it had already achieved its purpose, preventing the Mentulae in the Northern Frontier from crossing the river while it had been fordable. But this late in summer, that great river did the job all on its own, engorged as it was with the melts finally trickling into its headwaters near the northern mountains. So the legions by the Holmys were finally able to pull out, half going with the legate Ushida to Shizuma's position. The other half were commanded by the legate Shohei, headed into the heart of the empire and towards the general. She very much doubted they would reach her or Berentum in time to help against Terrigos, but she did not feel that she needed them to win so it did not worry her.

She was confident as ever even though she carried only two legions: ten thousand foot, all told. But she also brought with her a larger number of horse than she had used for any battle in the war thus far, thanks to the new cavalry regiments sent in by the Otomeians. Those doughty allies had been mustering with enthusiasm, stung to it by the recent Mentulaean incursions across the border and ever nearer their lands. So it was with pleasure that their polemarch had presented her lover with several new cavalry regiments, all made up of battle-hardened Northern giants on their horses.

The Lupine Division was larger than before at two alae, although over half were still considered recruits by its original members. As for the horsed archers, these had swelled due to Shizuru's explicit request: she now had four alae of these to deploy. The cataphracts made up another two alae, and the light horse three more. The Fujino Army thus carried five thousand and five hundred horse on its march to Berentum.

So many horses might have been hard to feed during such a hot summer had they been elsewhere. But this part of the empire was horse territory, much of it spread or spotted with good grazing watered by small streams and underground tributaries. So Shizuru's progress was not too difficult as she marched towards Terrigos and Berentum, whichever came first.

They ignored nearly every settlement they passed, detouring or stopping only when they found opportunity to seize supplies. None of the small guard forces in the cities they passed accosted them, for the imposing size of the cavalry contingent deterred all comers. Again it worked in Shizuru's favour that she passed through horse territory-for many of the peoples here considered cavalry warriors far superior to infantry ones. In their eyes, only one of the royal armies could possibly have offered resistance to the enormous complement of cavalry travelling with her.

The Fujino Army thus slithered to its destination unimpeded, well aware the enemy was nearer the target and probably reaching it even as they strove to cover the distance. And indeed, the enemy was already sitting on the plains of Berentum when Shizuru's scouts sighted it and were sighted in return.

Straightaway Shizuru knew this would be a different battle from that the foe had thus far offered: Terrigos had not only deployed heavy scout numbers to watch for the Himeans but had kept his troops battle-ready as well. As soon as news of the Himean army's proximity reached him, he sent the order to mobilise. It seemed he had no intention of waiting for the reinforcements he believed coming in from Nysias, nor of letting the enemy settle down first. Aggressive, but not foolish.

It was fortunately still early in the morning, so the Himeans had not been marching long for the day. Shizuru sent orders out for a shift to defensive marching position. She rode out with the rest of command towards elevated terrain so that they could better see their foe. A gently rising hill was the best they could do, so it took some time before they could appreciate the enemy in its entirety.

It yielded some surprises.

"I don't understand," said one of her legates. "Are they missing most of their chariot or am I blind?"

"No, you see what we all do," Shizuru said, squinting into the distance herself. It was very bright, for the sun was not far from its zenith, and its glint off thousands of armour-clad soldiers was painful to regard steadily. "They have fewer chariot than we expected, unless they are holding some in reserve out of sight. What do the scouts say? They should be hard to hide on these flatlands."

But the scouts only reported what they saw, which was far fewer chariot than had been expected. For their new ally, the King of Firens, had himself warned to expect chariots with the royal armies. He could not have known the number of royal chariots that prior battles had already destroyed. Most of the empire's chariot was in fact gone: that there were none to fill the void was because the king had not yet levied to replace them.

The paucity of chariots still did not represent too great an advantage for the Himeans. Shizuru had worried little about those given the strength of her own cavalry units. Even from a distance, she could see that her cavalry bested the enemy's-a significant difference from the pattern thus far in the war, where her numbers had been constantly lower than the foe's.

Shizuru's estimate from afar was that the foe had a little over half the horse she carried. It was a good estimate: Terrigos had only seven alae to her eleven if the chariot were excluded. However, while she had only a thousand heavy cavalry-the Otomeian cataphracti-the enemy had a thousand and five hundred. The rest of Terrigos's horse was light cavalry, four alae to her three. The chariot added only a little over one ala to the Mentulaeen numbers, so sparse was its attendance.

The infantry was where the Mentulaean figures soared far above the Himean again. Terrigos had twenty-three thousand foot with him, over twice the number in Shizuru's two legions. It was clear she would need to use her superior horse to protect the outnumbered foot in the battle, which was why she had them assume a defensive line from the outset. The heavy infantry formed the main force, the lighter cavalry units protecting their flanks. And leading the way were the cataphracti, like a battering-ram-cum-shield in front of the line.

But the Baron Terrigos was apparently wary of the foe's horse too, and wary of the many strategies that would allow that cavalry superiority to bring about his foot's envelopment. So he deployed his army in much the same formation, with the heavy cavalry spread out over the front and the light cavalry defending the wings.

One look at the enemy's formation and Shizuru dashed off new orders. One legate, Toshi, stared at her in surprise upon hearing her radical changes in positions.

"But General," he cried, "what you want will change the whole plan!"

"Why, yes, it would," she said, giving him such a look that he clamped his mouth shut.

The beauty of imposing discipline on soldiers in the drill field, Shizuru had once told her lover, was that it made for an army capable of order even when subjected to sudden command changes. Her troops proved it as the new orders went out, the Himean line reforming along a slightly longer front and losing the cavalry on its flanks. She kept the cataphracti in front of the foot but had the rest of the horse ride ahead now as the new leading force.

"I've a mind for a cavalry battle," she told her mistress before leaving the young woman with some of the other officers. She had ordered the polemarch to stay on the hill with the stationary command, explaining that she herself needed to be nearer the troops in this particular battle: she was, after all, playing it by ear.

"This is my first time to command your horse, Polemarch," she smiled. "I promise to do it justice."

"Triumph and return," was the other woman's response, acquiescing to her demand for a 'kiss of courage'. "Anything else would be unjust."

And though the Otomeian's voice trembled faintly on the last word, Shizuru was kind enough to pretend ignorance.

She rode out to actually join the leading forces, intending to direct as much of this cavalry sally as she could herself. First she had all the free cavalry-which meant all but the cataphracti-charge towards the enemy line. But she had it bear gradually to its left as it galloped, intending to hit the foe's right flank. Behind the charge, the cataphracti and Himean infantry trundled on, a steadily approaching threat to the near-matching rows of the enemy's main force.

But the Mentulaean commander was no fool: he saw the danger as it developed. His cavalry was smaller and he had even been obliged to split it in half just to protect his line from pincer strategies. Or he had split it almost in half, as he had reinforced the two alae on his left flank with the ala of chariots.

So the weaker of his two cavalry flanks was the chariotless right. As compensation, he deepened the infantry wing on that side. Hence he had a fairly solid force that he could trust to resist encircling strategies by the numerous Himean horse.

But now what he was seeing said that the Himean commander would not bother splitting her horse for reserve or complex manoeuvre: they were going to slam into one of his sides en masse instead, in a belligerently dedicated attempt to crush one of his flanks.

As with everything else in warfare, the move was a wager. But given the disparity in cavalry numbers, it was a good wager for the Himeans to make. So Terrigos had to respond with a countering wager of his own to prevent theirs paying off.

The choices ticked off in his head with their benefits and drawbacks. Old army veteran that he was, it took him only a second to decide. The amount of information he actually processed, though, was more than might have been expected from that time.

If he moved his heavy cavalry to reinforce the imperilled right, he would be exposing his whole infantry line to the incoming foe. Not least to the imposing cataphracts in front of the enemy foot and which could try to make a dash at him.

If he did nothing and braved the assault by simply preparing the men for the attack, that swarm of Himean horse would still hammer into his right flank with shocking strength. They could annihilate half his light cavalry in one blow and devastate the exposed foot on that side before it could rally again. What was to prevent the panic from spreading all the way to the left at such a blow then?

If he detached all the cavalry and chariot from his flanks to engage theirs in a floating battle, he would spare his foot damage since it was large enough to meet theirs by itself without worry. But then that would mean almost certain annihilation for the light cavalry, which was outnumbered two-to-one. Unless the enemy horse was miraculously delayed in its assault too, his horse would not even be able to present a force of two-to-one against theirs upon contact. The cavalry from the left would still have to cross the entire length of the line to get there, so it would have to straggle into the fray long after the right had already joined battle. Add the fact that having his horse fight as a floating force would deprive it of infantry support. If his light cavalry perished, he would not be able to protect the infantry with just the heavy cavalry... so the outcome of this option would still end up being a stage for envelopment.

His final decision was of sufficient flexibility to show his skill as a military leader. He tore off his left flank's horse to rededicate to the right, which he kept where it was.

In order not to impede his centre's progress or make the transferring horse from the left vulnerable to attack, he made it go behind his lines instead of before them. Thus it sped safely and swiftly behind the Mentulaean army's rear, its purpose to aid its fellows on the right from the impending blow.

It was this move that led to the most incredible series of tactical responses he had ever seen spontaneously formed in a battle.

Shizuru was leading the horse herself, as she had promised her mistress before joining the fray. As soon as she saw the enemy's defensive manoeuvre, she slowed the cavalry to change orders yet again.

"Princess Alyssa, take command of this group," she yelled, splitting her horse into halves even as the enemy strove to recombine its own. "Turn around and cross behind our lines-the way his did. I want you to head for his left. I shall keep heading for his right."

Alyssa tossed her golden head.

"I understand," she said. "You want me to attack his left flank now that it has no cavalry to protect it."

"No, in fact."

She threw out the rest of her instructions in shouts to the Otomeians, who listened to the foreigner in amazement. Many of them already knew her mettle as a commander but had not honestly expected her to be capable of leading cavalry as well. Once she had delivered her orders to them, those selected to go with Alyssa peeled away. This left the general with half of the horse she had been leading before. She had kept the Lupine Division for herself, of course, and used it now to spearhead her new assault.

"We still ride to the enemy's right," she directed. "And then we ride a little further!"

She resumed the charge and swung their direction wide-so wide, in fact, that it soon became clear she had no intention of engaging the horse on Terrigos's right flank at all.

She was trying to go beyond it instead.

"Damn it," said the watching Terrigos, worrying his lip as he saw the way the two halves of her horse were going. "They are going for envelopment!"

Again he showed he was not the sort of commander who was paralysed whenever an enemy sally threatened his plans. He ordered his right wing to extend, stretching out so that the horse trying to pass it would not be able to reach the end before being compelled into engagement. Even his heavy cavalry fronting that side joined the extension, the front line presenting a still orderly-if more stretched-out-formation to the Himean advance.

The movements were so efficiently done that Terrigos barked out a laugh of triumph, knowing for certain that he had thwarted his foe's attempt. The enemy horse would not pass his right flank and would be forced to fight his own horse there now. And because it had split itself in its bid at a pincer manoeuvre, he now had less of the enemy horse to fight... while at the same time having more of his own horse to defend the right flank since the cavalry coming from the left had arrived.

And then, just as it seemed the two cavalry forces would finally clash, the enemy commander threw Terrigos another shock.

She changed direction again and swung her horse inwards. Instead of an outwards diagonal chasing the extending flank, the Himean horse drew a harsh slash into the stretching Mentulaean line, piercing it with the surprise of an arrow altering target midflight.

The Mentulaean horse was hard-put to follow, try though it did to go after the turn once it realised what was happening. For one thing it was still in the middle of riding in the opposite direction, redeploying as ordered to avoid being outflanked. For another the recently-arrived horse from the left were also still finding their places amidst the rapid changes of formation. So Shizuru's lightning charge into the Mentulaean line was uncontested by the cavalry forces she had originally set out to face-and the unprepared foot and heavy cavalry she actually met fared badly against the unexpected attack.

Shizuru's horse hacked into the foe's right wing and it flapped brokenly in the aftermath. Terrigos's cavalry leaders were quick, however, and their retort along with the depth of the Mentulaean foot on the right spared that part of that army from complete separation.

Until the other half of the Himean horse materialised, anyway.

Shizuru had sent these to the Mentulaean left earlier, but not to attack the temptingly unprotected left flank. Rather, she used the absence of enemy cavalry on that side to afford them an easy passage past that flank and around the enemy. They had been riding around and behind the Mentulaeen army, in effect, as Shizuru's half of the horse had been threatening it from the front. Not too long after her own hack into the Mentulaeen line, it was able to follow the last part of her orders: it turned suddenly inwards as well and drove into the enemy foot, instinctively going for the same point she had attacked but from behind instead.

And even as the Mentulaeen force floundered from the second blow, its crippled right wing finally snapping off, its front found itself dealing with a new source of pressure: the Himean pila.

While the cavalry faceoff at the Mentulaeen flank had been taking place, the two armies' main forces had been getting closer to each other. The cataphracti had been leaving the Himean front slowly the entire time, gradually trundling away from it during the advance. That was because it had been shifting into squadron formation directly opposite the now-horseless Mentulaeen left flank. To which it then rode at its heavy and steady pace, its officers drawn to that weakness like moths to a flame.

Of course, this had left the Himean legionaries open and vulnerable to a charge from Terrigos's remaining horse-which were perhaps the Mentulae's only hope at that point. If Terrigos could ride down the Himean foot with this heavy cavalry first, he could save what remained of the infantry by having it follow in the heavy cavalry's wake. The right flank and part of the wing on that side were nigh-hopeless now and he knew they were in too much disarray to save. So he had to get the still-intact left and centre away from the enemy horse, which was steadily outflanking him. He could do it if his heavy cavalry broke the Himean foot-which would also be demolished in the process.

He ordered the heavy cavalry to charge.

As Shizuru would explain to her mistress after the battle, Terrigos had a miscalculation in this strategy. While heavy cavalry could indeed overpower infantry on plains like the one they fought on, it was significantly harder to do so when the infantry concerned was prepared for the attack. There were ten thousand legionaries in the Himean army that day. Each of those legionaries was equipped with two pila . That meant that the remaining three alae of Mentulaean horse-one thousand five hundred armoured horsemen-had to suffer nearly twenty thousand javelins as they charged.

Now a Himean pilum was none too intimidating a weapon if one focused only on the size of its head: tiny and pyramidal, a thumb-sized arrowtip attached to a fragile-looking shank. Mentulaean javelins were more fearsome-looking, had larger and longer tips with sharp edges.

But like most heavy javelins, a pilum was in fact capable of going through shields and armour. Indeed, it had remarkable piercing power, as its small and dart-like head offered a smaller point and less resistance. It was why pila were used to soften up enemy ranks before the legionaries waded in with their swords. Pila would not cause devastation if the enemy was very heavily armoured, but they still did enough good to make them standard issue for Himean legions.

That they did more than good in the Fujino Army's case that day was due to Terrigos's own orders.

Heavy cavalry typically did not accelerate: it plodded along easily and relied on sheer strength and sturdiness. In a bid to cover the last few metres between the enemy and himself, however, Terrigos had his heavy cavalry accelerate towards the now open Himean front. It should have delivered a frightful shock to the Himean legionaries, had it worked. But the Mentulaean heavy cavalry's speed combined with the speed of the pila thrown to meet them saw the Himean javelins doing more damage than usual: it was like the intensified damage a man caused by lunging in to meet a punch.

Far more of the heavy cavalry fell in that charge than either side had expected. The cavalry's charge had also made it harder for them to keep up their shields-which often became impossible to wield properly once there were several pila bristling on it. So what should have been an overwhelming charge into enemy ranks turned into a debacle for the Mentulaean horse.

And now the Himean horse was redeploying again, archers circling the Mentulaean foot in harassment. There was nothing left for the Mentulaeans but to fight, and fight on until there was a victor.

The outcome had been clear the moment the Mentulaean heavy cavalry went down, Terrigos told Shizuru later after being seized by her Otomeians. The two commanders actually met each other during the melee and nearly exchanged blows. That they had not was due to several of the Lupine troopers forcibly getting between them and slashing the enemy general's steed to death. One even struck the animal so powerfully on its nose that he stove in the bone and crumpled its face. The maimed beast fell and so did its rider, who was then captured and borne away.

In the aftermath, Shizuru managed to reflect on this and realised she had been watched over on purpose: whether by outright command of their polemarch or instinctual understanding of that Otomeian's wishes she knew not. Either way she was pleased with her allies' dedication as well as their performance all throughout the battle. And they lifted their bloody swords and scythes to her to signal an equal approbation once the battle was decided, voices raised with the legions to celebrate their commander.

They won the battle only through her dynamic and inspired method of command, so much did all the officers know. Even the Princess Alyssa, looking upon her countrymen roaring in worship of a foreign general. She was one of the few who were silent, and perhaps the only one silent out of reasons other than awe. Not that she felt no awe for her cousin's lover, whose responsive leadership during the battle had impressed even her. The woman was inspired by the very gods of war, so much was certain. But Alyssa still felt uncomfortable being dazzled by someone else's achievements, and her discomfort was what kept her tongue in check.

As for the nucleus of all this praise, she was riding past the men and searching for someone in particular. She found that someone coming to meet her with some officers as they came down from their hill to share in the victory.

She pulled her steed into a vicious stop and leapt off it to bear down on the woman she had been seeking. Cheeks flushed and hot, happy beyond caring, she dragged the Otomeian off her mount and crushed the girl's lips to hers, wasting no time in breaking them apart with her tongue and her teeth.

The Princess Natsuki, dumbfounded, barely even put up a fight in her shock.

This was something new for both of them. Although they were free enough of brief affections in public, this was something they had never shown others before: it was a kiss of the sort Shizuru gave only when no other could see, the sort of kiss that they shared only behind the modesty of closed doors. Several officers thus stared at the display with stunned expressions, but the soldiers, drunk on their own elation and the victory, threw up a cheer at the sight. When it was finished they returned to their own celebrations and the task of stripping the dead.

Their commander did not let go of her lover once it was over and the officers had moved away to give them their privacy. Her hand still held onto the dark tail of hair after the kiss, her lips pressed against the heat of her lover's excitement and shame.

"Find Hermias," she whispered urgently. "Settle our quarters. I want a bath in two hours. Maybe less."

"But - but I must see to the auxiliary too, Shizuru."

"And dinner. I want it set when I get back, and you there. You see to it."

"But I-"

"Others will do that. Now do as I say."

"But I must-"

"Delegate, Polemarch!" Shizuru told her, sounding as though she would bite the other's cheek. The soldiers around them were still roaring at each other happily, and only Natsuki could hear the harshness of her words. "Put that authority to good use! I'm your general and I am telling you I want my quarters settled. I want you in those quarters when I return. Do that or Jupiter help me I shall have you wherever I find you later, Princess, even if it has to be in front of your cousin! Now go and get to it."

She pulled away from the red-faced woman and left her with a final glare: "Two hours, my tent!"

And when she showed up in her tent, two hours later as stated, she found a place in perfect order as well as a beautiful woman ready to box her in the ear.

She made a point of ignoring the Otomeian's homicidal glower, however, and simply walked past her.

"So you can follow orders," was what she said as she bent over a basin, there for her to wash her hands and face. "I was beginning to wonder if you were the only insubordinate Otomeian in my camp, my love."

Raising an eyebrow at the other's purple expression, she said, "It's all right, I told the servants to go away. You may scream at me if you like."

"Your love!" the other exploded, so angry that her whole body shook. "Huh-huh-how can you?"

Shizuru started stripping off her clothes, seemingly unaffected by the tempest she had roused. She had already divested herself of her armour in the command tent with the other officers, so she was clad only in the tunic and breeches all of them wore under the metal and leather. Her boots were already off, having been doffed upon entry to the tent. She shed all her clothing until she was naked and stalked to a table with various soldierly effects.

"Angry with me, are you?" she said to her lover. "Well, I congratulate you for at least holding it in until we were alone. Very thoughtful, meum mel, very politic. At least I know now that your pride does not outstrip your wisdom."

Natsuki was suddenly on her feet, fingers white on her cane.

"You-you should not speak to me as you have!" the girl spat out. "Yuh-huh-how could you, Shizuru?!"

Finally finding what she wanted, Shizuru took it from the table. She advanced upon her mistress with the thing in one hand and Natsuki attempted to retreat in response. But Shizuru caught her by the sleeve of her dress and slipped the knife at her collar and under the garment. Down came the knife until the dress was rent, all the way to the hem of the skirt. After which it seemed only natural to push the ruined cloth in a heap to the floor.

"The truth is that I can speak to you as I did earlier, even though I usually do not," she said with a look that stopped the Otomeian's protest at such rude treatment. She threw the knife away, not even looking to see where it would land. "You were being difficult earlier, mea vita, and I all I wanted was to revel in my victory with you . Instead, you kept coming up with reasons not to do what I asked. Technically, I was not asking, however. You seem to forget I am still your commander. That means I can speak to you any way I wish."

She lifted the nude girl and dropped her onto the bed so that she bounced.

"I can do to you anything I want."

She undid the straps on the girl's leg and threw the prosthetic to the floor.

"The question is, what can you do about it?" she asked, smirking at her furious lover.

Natsuki reached up and revenged herself with her mouth.

---

"Was it necessary," Shizuru moaned that night, "to bite and claw at me like that? Some of these shall sting later, Natsuki, I am certain of it!"

She peered at the upraised tracks on her arms, knowing the ones on her back were worse. She reached around to feel them and inspected her fingers, relieved that they did not come back with blood. But it still stung terribly and she could feel the bruise on her shoulder where the girl had bitten her.

Out came another complaint: "The battle gives me nary a scratch yet I go to my bed and nearly get torn to ribbons."

The other tried to get up but only managed to flop to one side. Shizuru glanced at her and smirked in triumph, perhaps a little childishly.

"You deserved it for being unkind," the prone girl finally muttered.

"You thought me kind enough when I was inside you."

She threw an arm up to block the pillow in advance.

"Oh, come," she said when the girl finally gave up trying to batter her to death. "It was mostly in play, love, surely you knew that. I was only playing, mea vita !"

The Otomeian dropped her head to the bed again and shut her eyes. The tears from earlier were still in them, and they rolled off the sides of her face. Shizuru watched them dribble onto the sheets, remembering how tears had dribbled out of another part of the girl earlier before she even touched her.

She would protest, she thought then, even at the indignities that set her on fire.

"Shizuru," Natsuki said, sounding confused and curious. "You play at being so harsh ?"

"Well, a part of it was fuelled by an honest feeling, I admit. We had not slept together in a while," Shizuru confessed. "I was getting frustrated, I suppose the word would be for it."

Natsuki's eyes shot open again.

"Was it on purpose?" she asked. "That we did not-on the march?"

"Of course it was on purpose," Shizuru scowled, disbelieving. "I hardly wanted to tire you out so much in the nights that you would find it impossible to march by daylight. So grant me some credit, please."

Natsuki scowled back.

"You did not even want me to come," she accused. "You tried to make me go back. Tuh-to the Atinu camp."

"I know," was the reply. "But I was obviously unsuccessful in my attempt to keep you back there. It was not as though I could have done anything else but keep you healthy enough to manage the march once we began."

She looked to the end of the bed where her feet lay and realised she had not even removed her socks when they began. One was still on- and gods knew where the other was by now. She sat up to remove the remaining sock.

"I am very glad you are here now, of course," she said to her mistress. "But I still do think I was right to have insisted you stay back, at least for your safety." A quiet laugh. "Much good my insistence did, though."

"Hahh... you can do what you like to me, you claimed?" Natsuki taunted, curling up around the pillow she had used as a weapon moments ago. "A false claim now, no? What do you call it-a 'bluff'?"

"Remind me again how you persuaded me to let you come along, Princess?" Shizuru sighed.

The retort came as she dropped her sock to the floor.

"I thought you wanted to forget."

Why would I want that, Shizuru wondered. She would rather remember the smile that had been on Natsuki's mouth when she had ordered the girl back to the Atinu camp instead of joining the march to Berentum. She had told Natsuki it was not a point up for negotiation. It had been worth remembering, that unique amazement and dismay, when the girl had responded by asking suggestively if Shizuru still wished to marry her.

"I cannot believe," Shizuru said now, "that I was coerced in such a manner. By you, of all people! I should have you tried in the Extortion Courts of Hime."

"If you ever please me enough to get me to Hime."

Shizuru looked over her shoulder.

"Careful with the cheek, Princess," she warned, "or I might please you enough to shock even the people sleeping three tents away."

Natsuki hissed that she was a shameless woman.

"You like it." A chuckle. "Besides, if the ones two tents away did not complain earlier, why should those further off?"

She got up and went to fetch herself some water. She was already heading back with a refilled cup when the girl sat up suddenly and grasped at the stump of her leg.

"What is it?" she demanded, splashing the water in her haste to return. "What happened?"

Natsuki was still holding onto her stump, but her expression was not the one Shizuru expected. The look on her face was not of pain or discomfort, but one of amusement.

Shizuru knelt beside her.

"An itch," came Natsuki's voice.

"An itch?"

"Yes." The eyes she turned to Shizuru were still filled with peculiar laughter. "I did not tell you before when first it happened, Shizuru. I thought I - oh, I thought it a dream! But I see now it is no dream. Or it is a dream of my flesh, not myself."

"What, Natsuki?" Shizuru asked, endeavouring make sense of what was being revealed to her. "What happened? I do not understand."

"My foot," the other said. "It itched. As just now."

She finally released her stump and even laughed.

"The foot that is gone," she said for clarification.

Shizuru looked at her and then at the stump, as though seeking the foot that itched but was not. She saw nothing, of course, but a faint shiver did run up her spine for an instant. It terminated in a crawling feeling around her jaw.

"You mean," she said slowly, trying to establish exactly what Natsuki was saying, "that you felt an itch in the foot that is no longer there?"

"Yes," the other grinned. "I am sure I do not imagine it, Shizuru. I think I do not. I was not even thinking of that foot when it happened. But I felt it! It was so strong an itch." She shook her head wonderingly at her own body's strangeness. "Did you see? I tried to scratch it before I remembered there was nothing to scratch."

Shizuru said nothing, wary of the phenomenon. Could Natsuki have been imagining things? And if she had been, what of it? Was this a premonition of something else? On and on the questions went, piling up within her so quickly that she could barely keep the concern from showing on her face-and indeed, the girl she was facing saw them and tried to put a stop to her fears with a laugh.

"My general should not be so fearful," the Otomeian said in good humour, her lithe hands cupping Shizuru's face. "It was an itch, Shizuru, not a pain. I know my body-it is not a bad thing. Only, I think, it is a memory."

"A memory, Natsuki?"

"Of a time when I had still my foot," she explained. "I think my body remembers... and sometimes forgets that it is no longer here. It is only a memory. It cannot hurt my body."

"I suppose not." But can it not hurt your spirit?

"Still," Natsuki said with a smirk, "I know you will worry until I tell the doctors of it, so I will tell them tomorrow. I do not think it is anything bad. I feel nothing in it that is bad. But I will tell them for you."

Shizuru eyed her with great tenderness, wondering at the amount of strength a single ( spare and crippled ) body could possess. Who else but Natsuki could laugh so easily at a reminder of this sort, a teasing remembrance of the time when she had been whole enough to run rings around even the best of her warriors? For Natsuki's laugh had been genuine: she who knew the girl's laughs like no other had seen that. She had heard it in the laugh, which held none of the bitterness of those still unable to accept a new reality.

Such strength in that laugh. A laugh like the one she had given when those cretins had insulted her from the tower in Lasandre.

She grit her teeth at the reminder of that incident, herself furious over it even if her lover was not. It had been at noon of that first day in Lasandre, noon of the first day the diehards spent in their tower. Shizuru and some of her officers had come to give instructions to the sentries assigned to the location. Eventually Natsuki had come too, to see what was going on.

Upon arriving, however, the polemarch had been obliged to find a seat so as to remove and replace her wooden leg. She had struggled while walking over to the location, and when she removed it they saw that one of its straps had been damaged. It had not seemed to trouble the girl a whit to have to remove the false limb in public-her focus had been more on figuring out why it seemed to feel more and more uncomfortable each step-and she had even managed a jest to Shizuru and her officers present that at least it had not popped off on the way and horrified onlookers. Not that any of the onlookers at the place had acted remotely horrified with what happened. Everyone present had behaved very graciously... with the exception of the Mentulaeans looking down on the scene.

Such had been the popular feeling then that Shizuru was not the only one livid when the Diehards yelled to "send the cripple up" and claim their tower.

"Shizuru. Shizuru!" Natsuki's voice wrenched her from the memory. "You must stop worrying."

"Who said I was worrying? I was simply being quiet."

"You are quiet when you worry." The Otomeian shook her head. "Worrying so much, it is not marriageable."

The tease worked: Shizuru was diverted.

"Marry me and I shall prove you wrong," she said.

"Marrying you would prove me wrong."

"And would you rather be right than happy?"

Natsuki's laugh soared out and Shizuru's heart lightened again.

"That is terrible logic," Natsuki scolded. "You should be ashamed."

She pressed her lips softly to Shizuru's cheek and asked if they should not bathe yet. Shizuru responded by slipping an arm under her lover's thighs, the other behind her back. They moved to the bath that had been set out for them much earlier, now no longer steaming but still warm. Both of them had performed minor ablutions like washing their faces and hands after leaving the battlefield, but that did not suffice for a true bath, which Shizuru always insisted on them giving each other when given opportunity.

"Yet," the ever-practical Natsuki said while being settled on a stool by the tub, "our baths would be quicker if our servants helped."

Shizuru aped horror.

"You want me to rush through an opportunity to molest you under pretence of innocence?" she said. "What a fool idea!"

"You are a fool idea," Natsuki snapped, cheeks pinking. "But, Shizuru..."

She was silent long enough to compel Shizuru to prompt her to continue.

"I am going to speak... hmm... seriously about something, but it will be in hypothesis," the Otomeian eventually said. Her noble brow was marred with a line, though not one of displeasure: whatever she had to say, Shizuru decided, probably meant a great deal to her. "I do not say anything for certain in what I say next, is what I mean, but it is something I wish tuh-tuh-to consider."

"Go on," Shizuru said easily, already smoothing oil over her lover's skin.

"I was thinking."

She could not resist: "You do that often."

"Of what would happen if we married," Natsuki clarified.

Shizuru hummed and smiled.

"If we marry," Natsuki continued. "Wuh-where would we live?"

"That depends on myriad circumstances," Shizuru answered, wondering what had brought this on and what it meant. Even if the girl said not to take it as confirmation of anything, it still meant something that she wished to discuss it. "If I still have a mandate here then we shall have to live here during that time, for instance. And exactly where here shall depend on the state of my province, the empire by then."

"Where would we live permanently, is what I meant."

Shizuru stopped in the act of rubbing oil over the girl's shoulders.

"Well, I thought it would have been obvious," she said. "Since I also already have a house there, why not Hime? Were you expecting something else?"

"No." A beat. "No, not no . But not yes either."

Now Shizuru frowned. "Why, what could be the alternative? Surely not Otomeia?"

Natsuki smiled at this.

"Surely not," she mimicked in good humour. "I would not force Otomeia on you, Shizuru."

"Then what is the alternative you were considering? For I would hate to force Hime on you, Natsuki."

Natsuki took her time thinking on how to phrase it. As she did, Shizuru started working on her with the strigil.

"It is only a possibility to - to explore," the Otomeian eventually said. "I do think you should live in your city. It is needed for your politics. I know this. But what perhaps if I stayed out of the city?"

"And thus keep yourself out of the public eye as much as possible?" Shizuru guessed. She sobered all of a sudden as a thought came to her. "Tell me honestly, my love. Do you fear it?"

Natsuki appeared torn.

"Not for me," she admitted painfully. "I am not-Shizuru, I do not say this again to vex you. I am only thinking on the best - the best way, perhaps, or execution for what you desire. If we are married, I mean, it is something to think on, no?"

"I understand," the other replied. "But if we were to live apart, it might worsen rather than improve matters. For it would make you appear a kept mistress more than a wife, do you not think so? And I already told you how I feel about that. Besides, if indeed you consented to be adopted by my best friend, I think she might have something to say as well about you portraying such an image by your absence. For why bother having adopted you then?"

Natsuki's brows lifted as she saw the sense of the rebuttal.

"Besides, it would be too much trouble, Natsuki," Shizuru said frankly. "I do not want to have to travel out of the city each time I wish to see my wife. What if I wish to dine with you immediately after a long day of senatorial work? Talk with you? Lay with you? Shall I have to restrain myself to taking you only to places in the country if I wish to spend time with you in public? For that would be idea, would it not: to hide you away from a public that might include my opponents back home?"

There was a brief silence as Natsuki thought on her words.

"Now you say this," the Otomeian eventually admitted. "Now... I see that my idea, it is silly."

"Quite silly, I am afraid. I have no intention of marrying a woman whose beauty would be the toast of the city only to hide her away in some provincial fortress. No, I would rather parade her until my opponents are green with envy. And I would make whoever is not jealous of me jealous of her by taking her to the Porticus Margaritaria and buying her enough jewels and silks to sink a ship."

The dark-haired woman was laughing at this comical plan.

"I hope," she said, "that the next thing you do will not be to buy her a ship."

"Well, if she asked it of me..." Shizuru said, laughing too. "Seriously, though, I would like to live in Hime. Both of us, not just me. Is there an objection you have against it that is not motivated by thoughts of protecting me? Because I would understand if so, I know it shall not be easy."

"Shh, I know this too," Natsuki said, cutting her off with a kiss. "Also, Shizuru, it is not as though I do not wish to live in Hime."

And then she added, smirking: "And if I were married, I would not enjoy having to travel so far to see my wife too."

Shizuru grinned and handed her the strigil for her turn.

"I do like the idea of leaving the city every now and then, though," she admitted. "Gods know we Himeans who can afford it often do to escape its less appealing traits. I already have two country villas I use often in provinces near the city, but I daresay I can purchase more if you find a particular part of the country appealing. Or have something built. Yes, I think construction of a new villa would be better. I want you to have a decision in it. I want something partly of my wife's imagining, a new palace not just made for her but wished into being from her dreams, no matter how lofty..."

Natsuki murmured teasingly that she should probably rethink her proposal now, given how quickly future expenses for their union were mounting.

"I'm no beggar," Shizuru shrugged, enjoying the exercise in planning her married life too much to be diverted so easily. "Yes, I like the idea. A new villa as soon as we return to Fuuka and find a suitable location. Cumae, probably, though I already have one there. Well, it should make for a fine holiday retreat for us, so I daresay we should look along the coastlines if you enjoy a view of the seas. Somewhere cool for the summers. I've no intention of letting you spend a single day of dies caniculares in the city, after all."

Natsuki asked if it meant the same thing as it did in the Greek.

"Yes, so it means you shall never celebrate the day of your birth in Hime, meum mel. The heat of August is such in Hime that it would kill you. And if we see one of those unfortunate years when it not only swelters but also rains, I would keep you out of the city even to the winter-for I swear there is no more disease-laden air in Hime than that we have during the summer rains. Even I am quick to escape the city at such times. Pater always insisted on it, in fact. He was even more fearful of it than Mater because his own brother's career was destroyed by that one disease-"

She stopped abruptly, realising what she had almost described. The malady that had ended her uncle's career as a promising military man had left him alive in exchange for a shrivelled limb. In others it was the arm it sometimes wasted, but in him it had been the leg. He had surfaced from that mysterious and all-too-common summer sickness a cripple, not unlike Natsuki.

"What was the disease?" Natsuki's low voice asked.

Shizuru glossed over it.

"Let us simply say something unfortunate, especially where his career was concerned," she said. "Anyway, it is just one of the many diseases that rampage through Hime in the wet summers. I would hate to expose you to them. You are not from our land either. The city's doctors always say people from vastly differing climes are often those most vulnerable to a land's native blights."

"Mm, foreigners are often worst-struck by native disease," Natsuki agreed, to her surprise. "What? We have visitors to our lands too."

Shizuru smiled.

"The wise men and women say it is because foreigners have not had enough time to build a resistance to our diseases," she said. "The way people new to the bow hurt their fingers because their skin is not thick enough yet."

"That is a good way to see it," Natsuki replied, still working diligently with the strigil. "My cousin, she has a different view. She says it is the land's prejudice against things alien to it."

Shizuru was sardonic. "What a kind view your cousin does take. This is Alyssa, yes?"

"Yes."

"No doubt she hopes the land will show its prejudice against me next I visit your country."

Natsuki defended her relative: "My cousin is not so mean of attitude."

"No, she is downright charitable," Shizuru said. "At least, sufficiently so to ascribe her own prejudices to the land, anyway."

The younger woman's sigh was telling.

"She does not wish you such ill, Shizuru, I am sure," she said.

"Even if you told her I asked you to marry me and you are considering it?"

That got the Otomeian to stop.

"Then..." she started with reluctance. "But one could understand then, in a way. It is the, um, situation." She leaned forward and said with sudden eagerness, "But what were you saying before? About - about Cumae, I think. I think you have said this place before to me."

Shizuru watched her, amused. She knew very well it was the other woman's poor attempt to change the subject. As she felt very charitable after this day of victories both in the battlefield and in bed, though, she let her lover get away with it and returned to their earlier topic.

"I did," she said. "I remember I told you about my villa in Cumae before. Cumae has some of the most expensive land in Fuuka nowadays since it is the most popular of the prestigious seaside resorts. Of course, I do think it would be wise to get a villa somewhere else-somewhere up and coming-so that we can have a good investment. Some places are going to be turning into the next Cumae soon, and I would like to get something in them before the prices climb."

Natsuki agreed, being someone of sound business sense herself.

"I was thinking of looking into Baiae," Shizuru said. "Right now it is mostly occupied by fishery concerns-excellent oysters from there, Natsuki, you should taste them-but some people are already beginning to build seaside villas there and I want to be among them. Or we could go for even cheaper places like Capri or Herculaneum, which are beautiful enough to merit the faith in that investment. Whatever the case, you can have whatever type of villa you like then, I promise. And the garden of your dreams too to go with it. I have just the man for the job, a brilliant fellow whose green thumb I set to putting up apple trees in my Himean garden."

Natsuki smiled. "So you like apples too!"

"Hmm? Oh, they are all right. I only had them put up for you."

A hand caught at hers almost convulsively and she met Natsuki's wide eyes, halted.

"What?" Natsuki demanded, seeming astonished by what she had just said. "When?"

Shizuru's brows drew together at the strange reaction.

"Ages ago," she said. "When I went back-when I was recalled by Senate. I had it done as soon as I returned." She laughed suddenly as she recalled something. "The funny thing about it is that I could not even see the results! I had to send Shizuma to see for me since I could not cross the boundaries of the city, being that I still had command of my army. She said it was very handsome, though you shall have to ask her for a more precise description yourself. I had trees instead of mere saplings planted: we should have fruit in the autumns."

She smiled at Natsuki, who only looked at her again as if finally figuring out a puzzle or some piece of it after long effort. Concerned, she asked if something was wrong or she had done something untoward without knowing it.

But the princess denied it.

"No," she said slowly. "You did nothing wrong, Shizuru. Keep talking, please. About... about these places and building villas."

The Himean stared at her closely for a moment more before finally deciding to let it go. She resumed her bathing and continued her talk, detailing other possibilities for their hypothetical property investment and even suggesting a unique marble found only in a special quarry somewhere in Fuuka.

For herself Natsuki was wondering at the woman before her, who made the plans as easily as if she were pitching them into the world without a care. Yet she knew Shizuru planned in earnest, and not idly. If ever she had doubts about it before, the apple trees in the woman's garden had taken care of that-for the planting of those trees said that Shizuru had meant every word she said even back then, when she had spoken eagerly of wanting Natsuki to come with her to Hime when she had been recalled by their Senate. It said she had wanted it still even after being denied it, even after the separation when her ardour for the idea might have been most likely to cool.

And think of that too: she had wanted even then to house Natsuki properly once it finally happened, not in a separate domicile or province like a mistress. She had planted trees for Natsuki in her garden... and she had planned for "autumns" instead of mere "days".

All of this in earnest, even before she had come back to find Natsuki crippled and eternally changed.

This mattered greatly to Natsuki, especially after a certain conversation with her fellow princess when they had begun marching towards Berentum. Alyssa had been warning Natsuki of the dangers she could face were she to continue her dalliance with the Himean elsewhere after the war, particularly in a specific elsewhere far south and across the sea.

"I'm sure she asked you to come and visit Hime when the time comes for her to leave," Alyssa had guessed, unaware that the truth was even worse than her suspicion. "I would be careful before I agreed to something like that, Princess, much though I know you hanker to see other lands. Even if she does mean the invitation when she gives it, you don't know what your life will be like if you go there. You won't have any of your countrymen if you need help and you will be completely dependent on a woman who can easily forget her promises once she finds other things to occupy her. And you said it yourself, she's a political creature living in the political heart of her world."

The older Otomeian had shrugged with one shoulder and added: "Or maybe she won't care for the promises she made at all, having declared them only in the heat of the moment. She might be doused into cold sensibility once she returns to her proper place. Who knows where your proper place will be then? Some discreet backwater in a foreign country so she can hide you away along with her shame?"

So undeserved had Natsuki felt the portrayal of her Himean lover that she had been goaded into response, telling her cousin that whatever her lover promised, her lover gave. She was a woman of honour, she had insisted, as well as someone kind to those she held dear. But the Princess Alyssa had given a response to that as well, lancing a secret fear festering in Natsuki.

"Yes, the other possibility, which is that she is in fact honourable," Alyssa had agreed. "And, more than that, is indeed kind. Because she knows, just as we all know, Natsuki, that some part of what she did contributed to your loss, she just might follow through on every promise she gives you and more. Because she owes it to you as a woman of honour. But you too are a woman of honour, and can you tell me that being treated like that wouldn't torment your pride?"

Because she would then feel compelled to offer what she offers to me now for honour, Natsuki thought, so revolted by the mere idea that her brows underwent a contraction. How painful the idea was now that she admitted it! Why should a missing leg and wounded heart buy her everything the whole had been unable to procure? Why would anyone-even someone like her, even someone who loved and wanted and needed as strongly as her-accept that which had come at the cost of pity?

But Shizuru had those apple trees planted even before they met again and Natsuki became pitiful.

She had planned for the two of them to live together in her Hime manor even before she proposed actual marriage.

She had made the promise of "autumns" even before there was a lost leg that could guilt her into it.

This was the woman who was now bearing her out of their bath and dabbing at her with a towel to dry her off, chatting happily about even more promises all the while.

"I will look forward to the apples," Natsuki said, cutting into her lover's chatter. "And autumn."

The Himean was arrested when she realised what the other meant.

"Do you mean-are you serious, Natsuki?" she demanded, sounding almost embarrassingly breathless. But there was no embarrassment on her face as she stared at Natsuki with that open face, its heartbreaking planes on the verge of vibrating from some great and held-back joy. "Do you mean what I think you do?"

"I do not say yes to marriage yet," Natsuki cautioned. "I must still think on it, if you will allow me. But I say yes to go with you. When the time comes for you to go, I mean."

Shizuru took a deep breath, held it for a moment, then blurted out, "But you will stay for good with me? You do not mean you are simply saying yes to a brief visit to Hime once I do have to leave this place?"

"Yes, if you wish it," Natsuki said, smiling. And then she thought of something and surprised even herself with a laugh as she said it: "But you ask this when it is possible I will say yes to us wedding-and then we have no choice but for me to stay, no, as we do not wish to have wives distant from us?"

Shizuru merely stared, for once in her life absolutely speechless.

Chapter 66

Good day again. Two things.

First, some sketches. Please delete the spaces after the full stops and replace the X below with C-O-M (absent the hyphens). The sketches are the first two on my profile page:

ethnewinter. deviantart. X

Second, an answer for someone who sent me a PM of enquiry: you may pronounce the Latin in any way you like, really. As this is a dead language, I suppose the only persons who shall truly take affront if you mangle it are the dead. However, if you are asking for the pronunciation I myself would use, it is Classical (Roman Republican Era) due to the time period I am most often referencing. Hence, servi poenae is roughly "ser-wi-po-eh-nai".

The "ai" in the phonetic approximation above is not French: read it as the English word "eye". G and C are always hard, as in "dignity" and "cat", respectively. Read gerae ("Nonsense!") as something like "gerai" or "kherai", iuventa (youth) as "yoowenta" or "yuwenta", ensor (the political office) as "kensor", and Acerrae (modern-day Acerra) as "akerai".

I mention this here only for those who want to look up a reference on it, naturally. It is hardly necessary if you wish to read the story.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Auspices and augurs, the College of Augurs - augury was a precise science for the Ancient Romans, who believed that it had to be practised by taking the auspices prior to all momentous events, e.g. before battle or upon a youth's ascent to manhood. The augur would observe the flight, calls, or behaviour of birds and then interpret them according to the precise rules of augury set down by tradition. Auspices were thus essentially rituals for taking omens, to see if a venture boded ill or good fortune. The College of Augurs comprised the state augurs (all of whom were senators) and membership in it was a great distinction.

2. capite censi (L.) - or Head Count ; the classless but most numerous component of Rome's population. They rarely touched politics-save when some demagogue roused them to threaten the other senators, typically doing so by appealing to issues relating to their hunger (like the subsidised state grain or lack thereof).

3. Cohort - an army unit composed of 6 centuries. Legions were subdivided into cohorts and cohorts within the legion were numbered according to prestige. The best cohort of the Eleventh Legion would thus be the First Cohort of the Eleventh, the second-best would be the Second Cohort, and so on.

4. Consular - a person who has served in the past as a consul of Rome (recall that the consulate is the highest magistracy possible for one to hold).

5. Cubit - ancient unit of measurement: the length starting from the end of the middle finger to the elbow.

6. Division (in Senate, relating to the Senate) - only a reminder in case some have forgotten it: the Roman Senate would often put proposals to their peers during sessions, and divisions were held as the means of obtaining decisions on those proposals. The Senate would divide according to their votes on the proposal, with some going to the side voting yes and others going to the side voting no.

7. Forbidden fire and water - this essentially means exile, usually phrased by the Ancient Romans as a sentence of being "forbidden fire and water within X kilometres of Rome".

8. Forum, or Forum Romanum (L.) - a forum is technically a space in a Roman town wherein the public may gather; the Forum Romanum was the centre of Roman political life, and it held such eminent public structures as the Curia Hostilia (Senate House), the Well of the Comitia, the Temple of Saturn (the Treasury of Rome), and the praetors' tribunals.

9. frigidarium (L.) - one of the pools composing the usual progression for a Roman bath: the frigidarium would be the coolest pool of those in which a man could soak.

10. Head Count - see note for capite censi ( L. ).

11. Inundation of the Nile - The Nilus (L.) watered the great agricultural plains of Egypt. Its inundations were taken to be indicative of the fortunes of the pharaoh or the gods' pleasure or displeasure with said ruler. Inundations were measured by the cubit [s.v] : instruments metered in that unit of measurement were used to see how high or low the Nile's waters would reach that year. Pharaohs enjoying good and godly fortune saw inundations whose waters reached the preset marks on the measuring instruments that were named the Cubits of Plenty-this meant the Nile would be sufficiently swelled to irrigate all the farms along its length, ensuring a plentiful harvest. Dry years saw the inundations measured at the Cubits of Death, when the waters would stay so low they would barely irrigate. Hence the name "Cubits of Death", for it meant low harvests and starvation.

12. Lictors - public servants in Ancient Rome whose presence I have severely diminished in this story. In the tale, I use them as a small group of public servants whom curule officials (magistrates with imperium) in Hime may summon to enforce a command relating to public order.

13. maiestas (L.) - a crime of treason against the Republic, often a crime committed in some military capacity. Arguably, the crime for which Takeda Masashi is charged here might be more appropriately classed as perduellio (high treason) given that the military loss was of an entire legion. However, as perduellio involves further complications (if one follows the procedure established during the time of Rome's kings) as well as a sentence of death for the period I am referencing, I am classing it as maiestas instead. Besides, I imagine Traditionalist power has not waned so far yet in the story that they would allow their old ally to be tried for a crime carrying the capital penalty.

14. medici (L.) - "doctors", or the legion's medical personnel

15. Our Sea - mare nostrum (L.), the Mediterranean Sea.

16. ovation (L.) – a victory parade, like the triumph [s.v.]. It was considered less prestigious than the triumph, however, as it was granted for lesser military victories, e.g. victories of the Roman army over enemies not representing other states, victories over slaves, victories over patently weaker foes.

17. pedarii (L.) - plural of pedarius (L.), the "backbencher" senators, who were less illustrious than their peers and accorded no right to speak in meetings.

18. praedium et pecunia (L.) - "property and money"

19. Porta Esquilina (L.) - the Esquiline Gate, one of the gates of Ancient Rome.

20. sesterces or sestertii (pl.), sestertius (s.) - a common coin in Ancient Roman times, worth a quarter of a denarius (it takes about 6250 denarii to make a talent of silver).

21. Shades - or lemures (L.); these were the shapeless, discontent, and wandering remains of the unhappy dead; it is faintly similar but still not equivalent to the modern concept of the vengeful soul.

22. triumph (L.) - victory parade enjoyed by a commander acclaimed "imperator" by his men after a battle; it took place when the commander and his army returned to Rome and would display the booty of the war as well as the captured enemy commanders.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The Mentulaean capital of Gorgo was a city surrounded by walls and wetland. As with most other Mentulaean cities of note, it sat on higher ground than its environs. North and east of it were fens watered by the rivers Agrius and Lernia. West and south were mostly plains. Dense settlements interrupted the western side near the city walls and the homesteads; farms and other out-of-city dwellers spread further out and to the south.

"Which explains, of course, why this would be chosen as the capital by the empire," Shizuru told her legates. "Lovely position. Not too easy to take."

"More like impossible," said Shohei, who had recently rejoined her. He had brought the Tenth and Twelfth legions with him along with the legate Zanki, coming down from their post by the River Holmys. They had caught up with Shizuru at Berentum, where the Eighth and Eleventh had fought the forces of Baron Terrigos. Having the Tenth and Twelfth to help with post-battle duties had afforded everyone a faster cleanup and resumption of their journey: the entire army had reached the Mentulaeen capital just as fall was beginning.

"Fens to that side make it impossible to mount attacks," Shohei observed, his brown face betraying enjoyment of the challenge he was discussing. "Those hills over to the west make battle hard-going too-see how some houses stand twice as tall as the others because of the rises and dips? There's only one side from which to attack-the south-and it wouldn't be a picnic from there either. Look at the way the ground slopes down, then goes up again. Right to the walls!"

Indeed, the earth sloped gradually downwards as it approached the city on the only side from which it might be assaulted, such that there was a natural ditch fronting the walls facing the southern plains. The ascent of the earth on the city side of that ditch was steeper too: to an assaulter, the walls might as well be rising straight from the earth as one faced the city. Later the Himeans would learn that the ground dipped so far in that ditch that Gorgo's walls were twice as high without as they were within.

The older senator, Toshi, took in the daunting topography.

"It's astounding," he said. "I can't figure out how anyone could storm it, much less take it. Thank goodness the Firensians are helping us. Otherwise, this might keep us in a siege for a year!"

Their general laughed at this, winking at the Otomeian riding by her side.

"Hardly a year," she said, which told her legates she thought little of the challenge they found so impressive.

"How would you do it, Fujino-san?" Toshi asked her eagerly. "A lot of siege engines, I guess?"

"I would not say a lot." She turned her face to the low sun, which was well on its way to dipping under the horizon. "But if you are contemplating a strategy that involves bombarding those walls to rubble, Toshi-han, I would advise that you think again. The lay of the land would make positioning enough catapultae for the work very difficult; any you do get close enough and on sufficient platforms to cover the range would be at high risk of retaliation. Besides, I can see from here that the walls are proper stone ones. We are approaching the Empire's quarrying grounds, so the masonry is a definite improvement on that we have seen in many of its other cities. I am sure the mortar is better too. Trying to bring down the walls would be a waste of time."

"But how could one take the city otherwise?"

She was unable to give him an answer as their escort reached them at that moment. None other than the queen of the empire- former queen, Shizuru amended quickly-rode out to meet the Himean general's party, accompanied only by some other riders whose clothes proclaimed them to be officials or nobles, not soldiers. Still, Shizuru brought the First Cohort of the Eleventh with them for safety while the others laboured on setting up camp outside, overseen by Zanki.

At first she toyed with the idea of commanding her mistress to stay outside as well-again, to err on the side of safety-but she decided against it upon seeing the deadly arch the polemarch's eyebrows were taking. Thus the party Azula led inside the walls included several daos-toting troopers, since the Princess Natsuki's retinue insisted on her having her own accompaniment. There were also noncombatants with them to see to their masters' needs; it was expected that the officers would commandeer more comfortable quarters than their marching tents in the city.

Shizuru rode with Azula of Firens at the head of the group. The former queen of the Mentulaeans had a great resemblance to her father, Shizuru decided, but also seemed to have replaced his impressive vigour with weariness. Entei of Firens had been old, yes, and both whitened and weathered by it. Yet there had been no mistaking the enduring vitality in the man, the fiery ambition still in his intelligent blue gaze.

Azula's eyes were as blue as her father's and, Shizuru guessed, as intelligent. If her blasé reaction to the polemarch's feline attendant was any indication, she held all her father's coolness as well. But under Azula's coolness Shizuru saw no fire still lurking, only the circumspection of a very resourceful but very weary survivor. For some reason the observer's suspicions fell upon the royal marriage. Was being wife to the Mentulaean Emperor so dampening that it had lowered Azula's fire to a barely-perceived ember?

The introductions were over very swiftly. Azula of Firens clearly disliked dithering.

"Those are my men," she told Shizuru as they rode towards the city, her finger pointing to the figures on the battlements and on either side of the gates. She spoke in the same highly recognisable, very lightly inflected Mentulaean variant of Himean the other Firensian nobles had, and Shizuru found it a simple thing to follow her speech.

"I expect you're eager to retire and we prepared lodgings for you in the castle, naturally. But if you don't mind, we should see the people first so they can acknowledge you as their new masters. I sent word for them to gather in the square outside the castle. Most won't show out of fear. Some are boarding up their windows and cowering in closets as we speak. Still, the nosiest will be sure to turn up because they can't resist, and I had my men assure the locals with the most influence and connections in the city that there was something in it for them if they appeared. Their gossip will take care of spreading the word for us afterwards, whatever it is you may want to say."

"Practical," Shizuru said, her grin showing the meaning was complimentary. "How did you manage it, informing them of the surrender? I was told that support of the king was strong here."

Azula nodded, lines carving beside her mouth as its corners turned downwards slightly.

"Yes, there were dissenters, or there would have been. I took care of them early," she said, throwing the younger woman a look that brought Entei to mind again. "I need to point out that I didn't know if you would defeat Terrigos, General Fujino. I had to act while recognising the possibility that you wouldn't win. In that case, revealing my true position would have made my situation invidious indeed, with an army of loyalists outside the walls and a group of the same in the city with me."

Shizuru asked her to continue.

"I summoned all those loyal to me. I informed them of the pact you and my father struck and they pledged their support to it. They also pledged their men for what I wanted to do with the city. But that still didn't provide enough manpower, as you may imagine how few one can trust in this snakepit. I couldn't use the guards Terrigos left behind either-who was to say they wouldn't betray me? The only guards I could trust were those I kept for personal service, the ones who came with me from Firens."

They were almost clear of the ascending slope leading to the city, and nearly at the gates. Shizuru eyed the dip of the land and tried to estimate the height of the walls from her position.

"So we found mercenaries," the former queen was saying. "We hired only non-locals and those who were still new to the city. This minimised the potential of them having prior allegiances strong enough to cause them to betray us. This meant too that we didn't need to inform them of what was happening-all a mercenary asks for is gold and his orders."

"When did you mobilise them?"

"Once the first of your disguised messengers arrived. First we closed down the city. No one could come in, no one could get out."

"How did you prevent the panic?"

"I told them it was for security."

"And they believed it?" Shizuru asked doubtfully. "I can see how denying entry to a city would be accepted by a populace as a measure of security against invaders. But denying exit is a little less orthodox a measure for that, I think."

Azula's answering smile was grim.

"Live under a tyrant and you learn to stop questioning the authorities." She patted the side of her neck gently at Shizuru's look. "All those lopped heads, General Fujino. Their owners weren't the only ones who suffered a serious downgrade in wits from the beheading."

"I see."

"Going back to the story, I started the arrests after that. All those we captured we did so quietly. Those I thought had a chance of being swayed to our side I conferred with. If they agreed to change allegiances to us I confined them to castle. I still didn't want to take any chances, after all. As for those who refused, I sent them to the dungeons along with all the others of note known to be loyal to the emperor. The dungeons are in the basement of the castle, so you can see them yourself should you wish it."

Ah, the charm of castle dungeons, Shizuru thought with dry humour. If the talk about beheadings was not enough to show her how different Mentulaean policies were, the talk about dungeons definitely was. Hime had no true dungeons and did not even have a jail. The best it could offer in this regard were the abandoned stone quarries of the Lautumiae or the damp little cell called the Tullianum. As neither were guarded or equipped with locks, anyone put in them could get out with just a little persistence. Even when guards were set to watch a prisoner, it was usually only for show: sometimes a prisoner simply walked past them and melted into the crowds of the Forum.

"I hope you have not harmed your captives too grievously," she told Azula, who held her gaze. "Or lopped off any heads just yet."

"I'm not Artaxi," the older woman replied with dignity.

The answer puzzled Shizuru.

"Do you mean the Prince Artaxi?" she asked Azula. "Who besieged Argentum?"

"The one you took captive," the other said in affirmation.

"What has he to do with our conversation?"

This time it was Azula who was puzzled, although slightly less so than Shizuru had been.

"I would have thought one of you would have learned of it by now," she said. "Whether from questioning him or just talking to him. It comes out, you know."

"What does?"

"His degeneracy." The Firensian noblewoman sighed deeply, scornfully. "The Prince Artaxi is by far the most hateful of all my husband's children, at least if we go from his pleasures in life. Nothing gets it up for him as quickly, I'm afraid, as the sight of someone being carved alive then made to eat pieces of his skin. I think he enjoys torture of anyone, although they tell me he enjoys it more when the victims are beautiful. Desecration of physical beauty was a particular obsession of his."

As Shizuru loved beauty, she was immediately revolted.

"No," she admitted. "I had not known that. But then, we are hardly about to indulge him in that sort of activity where he is now being held captive."

Azula's head bobbed.

"Anyway, I meant I'm not degenerate enough to enjoy torture for torture's sake," she told Shizuru. "And killing them would achieve nothing, except make you think me either a fool or someone with something to hide. No, they're yours to do with as you like. Whether you kill or torture them I don't mind. Although I imagine you'd prefer to torture them."

Shizuru's expression transformed into one of frank amusement.

"Do I seem that sort of degenerate?" she asked her host, who laughed as well, but rather more briefly.

"No, excuse me," Azula said. "I meant that you might want to do it to get information from them. It's true they're not the ones who'd know as much as you'd like-all those went with my husband when he left the city. Still, one never knows, does one?"

Shizuru agreed, taking in the city now that they were inside it. A lot of it was familiar enough, she thought to herself. Buildings upon buildings pushing up against each other in chaotic heaps; dirty and lightless alleys leading off from the main street; the smell of smoke and something rotting and the peculiar scent that one only finds in big cities, the scent of cramped but insistently thriving humanity. Yes, this was a capital city-Shizuru could see it. But to see it she had to imagine something first, which was in remarkably sparse attendance.

"The streets are empty," she remarked, which caused Azula to hum.

"As I said, most of them are either cowering behind those very windows or waiting on tenterhooks at the square. All these tenements are occupied, trust me." At that moment, as if to prove it, an open window in one of the buildings was drawn shut by a disembodied hand. "And these streets aren't like this on normal days. In fact, this street's noise is usually enough to deafen someone already hard of hearing."

"Then perhaps I should threaten your captives with exposure to it during my interrogations," Shizuru joked. "I daresay I shall not be resorting to torture, however. I think we have little to learn from them that you yourself could not tell us, given that Obsidian did see fit to leave them behind. And whatever little they do know is probably not important enough to justify torturing them."

She slowed and cast a look behind her as indication that she wanted the polemarch to ride up and beside her again. The officers behind her exchanged glances at this: they had been noticing how quickly their general got antsy if she knew her mistress was near but invisible.

"From my experience with royal courtiers of the type of monarchy your husband has," Shizuru told the silently watching Azula, "torture would be unnecessary anyway. Tyrants breed cultures of survival, not loyalty."

The tyrant's first wife frowned.

"That may be true of all of them," she said. "Save one."

"Oh?"

"A druid. A high druid, actually. One of those placed here."

"Placed here?" Shizuru echoed.

"To watch me and the rest who remained." Her upper lip thinned and curled in the universal expression of contempt; Shizuru supposed Azula of Firens was not fond of druids, or at least not of that one druid. "There are others and I imprisoned them too, but he's the only one worth speaking to if you want to know something. He's the one with the most clout, so he'd probably be privy to more knowledge."

"I see. And you think these druids were assigned- placed -here by your husband?"

The other woman laughed for the second time since their acquaintance, and it was a fuller laugh than the first. For a moment Shizuru wondered when Azula had last laughed that way because her weariness seemed to redouble afterwards-as though she were contriving it in order to regain the self she had grown more comfortable with over the years. The laugh had been so real that it seemed to have caused her embarrassment.

"My husband, assign druids?" Azula drawled. "No, he hates them and they hate him. It's his son who enjoys their support. The Prince Calchis."

"The one sent to subdue the rebels up north?"

"The very same. He and his sister, the Princess Faris, were all but raised by the druids. Their mother was a great supporter of the old ways-the druids latched on to that, naturally. Calchis and Faris are none too fond of my husband either, by the way, but they take care not to show they'd love to cut his throat at the first opportunity."

"So much for filial piety. I suppose I should talk to that druid. What is his name?"

"Cirnos. But we're nearly at the square. You can already see the crowd or the fringes of it."

Yes, Shizuru could see it. There must have been a few thousand of them in the square Azula chose for the meeting, and all of them were packed before a tall dais of grey stone. There were more Mentulæan guards around it-she supposed they were Azula's again-and they stuck out because of their armour and their curve-bladed spears poking far above the sea of heads.

"It doesn't have to be too long," Azula explained low-voiced as the crowd cleared a path for them; So meek, Shizuru thought, observing the people around them with care. "All you need to do is confirm that the city is yours now and what you plan to do with it... or what you want to tell them you plan to do with it."

"Are you saying this is my opportunity to throw a veil over their eyes if I want to?"

Azula's expression did not falter for an instant.

"The city is yours, as I said," she answered. "It doesn't matter to me what you do with it, since its ownership has passed to you."

"Again, so practical!"

"I also sent word out of Terrigos's defeat earlier." A beat. "Were his losses terrible?"

"Yes. It was a battle of annihilation."

"Was Terrigos slain?"

"No, we took him prisoner. I have already sent him to Hime to be held until the day of my triumph. He shall be returned to your custody after that, along with all the other army leaders we take captive in this war. Except for the supreme leader, of course, or those who are known to have perpetrated crimes against Himean citizens. The Prince Hanu, for instance, for the murder of Himeans living outside Sosia Citadel. Your husband."

"What happens to them?"

"They walk in my triumph too. But we strangle them at the end of it."

"That's good," said the former queen.

What could one say to that?

"If you don't mind, it would help me to know something," Azula said after they had dismounted their steeds and were making ready to ascend the dais facing their breathless, stunned-looking audience. "Do you plan to slaughter the people of the city or take them from their homes? Or do anything else along the same lines? I won't announce it here even if you do."

She said it so expressionlessly that Shizuru and Natsuki looked at each other in bemusement. They stood nearest the woman and were the only ones to hear her whispers.

"No," Shizuru said.

"I see. I don't mind either way but I needed to know it for my speech."

And up she went, leaving the lovers exchanging looks again.

"I had the heralds spread the news earlier," the queen said by way of preliminaries, her voice carrying clear and high through the crowd. The square had fine acoustic properties, which pleased the orator in the listening Shizuru. "I'm telling you myself again now, so no one doubts it. Terrigos lost. The Himeans won. I surrendered the city to them. They promise your safety in exchange. They also promise a partnership with me and the people of Firens that will secure the future of this city after the war. You will learn more soon. For now, just know this: you're safe. The Himeans are your enemies no longer. Here is the Himean commander."

Shizuru ascended the steps, though not without sending a humorous glance to her officers first: what an introduction!

"I thank the Queen Azula for her foreword," she said, directing the full force of her smile to the crowd. It was clearly taken aback by the sight of her, for all the murmuring and movement ceased the instant she joined Azula on the dais. "Everything is as she said. I, Shizuru Fujino, governor and general of the Himean armies in these lands, defeated the Baron Terrigos in battle. None of his army remains and those who lived we have already taken captive. Your city is open to us. But your queen opened it willingly."

"Because of this you will not be looted. None of you shall lose your property or your lives. If you cooperate. If you do not wish to cooperate, you may leave. We shall neither harm nor hinder you if you do this. However, you may not bring your property with you in that case. You may take with you only your life, the clothes on your back, and your dignity."

"Cooperate and we will not harm you," she stated. "We will not steal from you, and we will not rape you. And if you do decide to leave the city, we will not molest you. If a soldier transgresses these edicts, you may come to my provost officers to report it-provided you have witnesses and evidence for the accusation. If you have those, we will not ignore you."

"Aside from me, your queen shall remain your high authority," she said. "You may carry on with your usual business. You may even do business with us-you will find us exceptional customers, I think. Only mind that those who continue to live here do so under the protection of Hime and Firens. Which means those who stay here owe their allegiance only to Hime and Firens. Those who find that disagreeable need only walk out of those gates. I promise that their heads shall not be lopped off for it, although I can only speak for me and not some loyalist of the king. King Obsidian may harm you if he wishes, as I am sure he has done in the past on a whim; but from me and mine, as long as you act courteously, you are certainly safe."

Fierce murmuring erupted the moment she turned away.

"Want to bet they'll be so busy arguing if you're sincere that the idea of staging a protest will go clear out of their skulls?"

Shizuru turned to her legate.

"Always give people something to think on before they can think up something else, Shohei-han," she told him. "I assume we can enter the castle now, Queen Azula?"

"If you wish." A pause. "I'm no longer queen, however."

"I think you may hold on to the title for a while longer here, as a matter of convenience. The people are more used to you having the title as well. We can settle the issue it more properly later."

Thus they entered the home of the Mentulaeans, a large edifice of heavy design but not unhandsome despite that. Shizuru could see the expense that had gone into it from its size and the precision of the stonework on the façade. It could take a skilled stonemason a day to size, cut, and finish five stones for the sort of work she was seeing; one could only wonder how many such workers had sweated and slaved over just the front of the building. But then, she supposed, the empire's kings might simply have compelled all their vassals to send all the workers needed, exercising the traditional right of imperial rulers to demand unpaid labour and free resources.

Entering the premises, she saw even more evidence of wealth combined with skill. There was an abundance of tiling and gilt and several walls had draperies of heavy gold and purple cloth. The floors too begged appreciation, being done in a lovely red stone.

The pale red stone was very smoothly polished, Shizuru noted, sliding her hobnailed boot gently over it. She was right: the stonemasons here were skilled. She wondered just how well-built the walls were and how well they would take bombardment from heavy artillery.

"Before we go any further," Shizuru said, stopping the party in the enormous hall into which the main entrance opened. "Were any of the ones you took captive accountants, officials, or guards of the treasury?"

Azula's blue eyes were very cold, it seemed.

"Yes," she said.

"Good. I would like to know where the dungeons as well as the treasure vaults are situated."

Azula beckoned to one of the officials in her entourage: the woman came up, looking apprehensive.

"Benini can guide you," Azula said.

"Ruiko-han," Shizuru called, drawing one of her centurions out of their legionary escort.

The centurion stepped out, saluted, then stared into the middle distance and waited for what the commander had to say.

"Go to the dungeons first and collect the captives who used to work in a capacity related to the treasury or the treasure vaults of the castle. After that, go to the vaults themselves-I assume they are in the castle, Queen Azula? Yes? Good. You heard me, Ruiko-han. Go and secure their contents as well as the captives you will take from the dungeons. Take three centuries with you and await further instructions there."

"General."

The centurion brought her fist to the chest of her mail shirt, then snapped it outwards stiffly with the four fingers extended and held close together-the salute of the Himean army. The Mentulaeans watched it with the curiosity of those seeing an alien ritual.

When the centurion had left with her troops, Shizuru told the remaining legionaries to stay in the entrance hall with the exception of twenty men. These twenty she retained for escort along with the polemarch's imposing troopers.

"You're very suspicious," Obsidian's first wife observed. "I approve."

"Of my escort or my impending inquiries into the castle's treasures?"

"Both."

Azula understood why Shizuru had asked for treasury overseers or managers among the captives: the Himean general wanted to check their knowledge of the vaults' contents against what was actually found there. For all Shizuru knew, Azula could have spirited away for her own half the royal treasures before the Himean army's arrival-and though Shizuru might have promised to respect the people's personal properties, everyone knew that pledge did not extend to the properties of the state.

Thus Shizuru needed witnesses who could tell her if significant amounts were missing from the vaults. And as the witnesses were people Azula had imprisoned, there would be little worry of them getting the idea of falsifying remembrances just to protect the queen.

"We arranged a feast in your honour this evening," said Azula, resuming her walk. "If you attend it, you can meet all the nobles who pledged their willingness to join our shared cause. You can sound them out too and see if you dislike any of them enough to make them captives instead."

Shizuru tamped down her amusement: "Very well. All my officers shall be coming, as well as those of the Otomeians."

Azula inclined her head very regally, though it was a gesture she directed less to Shizuru than to her fellow royal, the princess from Otomeia.

"That's good," she said. "I expect you want to freshen up first and get settled. There's time enough for that. Should we call on you for when the feast begins?"

"Yes. But I want to do something else before that event. Would you have the druid you mentioned-Cirnos, yes?-sent to my rooms in, say, two hours, when we should have finished getting ready? I would like to speak with him as soon as possible, so as to get it out of the way."

They had turned into a long hallway lined with doors on both sides. Azula gestured to it.

"The rooms for you and your officers," she said. "If you need more, we can accommodate you. The best and largest room is the one at the end, on the right, so it's the one I had prepared for your personal use."

"Thank you."

"Another thing, if you don't mind advice about Cirnos?"

"I would welcome it."

Azula moved back a step as Shizuru's eyes fell on hers.

"Cirnos has more influence than he will let on," the queen warned. "He can arrange for a lot of things. I think he could even arrange a meeting between you and the Head Druid, Hiempnos, if you could persuade him to it. But I doubt he will, or if he does, that will be a meeting going nowhere. It doesn't matter what you offer them-the druids would never cooperate with Himeans because they don't want you anywhere in these lands."

"Because they see us as harbingers of apostasy?"

"I don't think we have that last word in our language. What does it mean?"

Shizuru explained.

"Then yes, but it goes further than that," Azula said, moving back again a half-step. "How much do you know about the druids?"

"Probably not enough. Why do you keep stepping away from me?"

A look of apology.

"I'm sorry, General Fujino, but you're very tall. It's hurting my neck to keep my eyes on your face."

Shizuru laughed, as did some of her company.

"Please continue about the druids," she invited the queen, and took a half-step back herself. "Is this better?"

"Yes, thank you. Long before the kings started weakening their influence during the formation of the empire, the druids held remarkable power over these parts. This was especially because they were the sole specialists in many essential crafts and trades. The druids used to serve as the lawyers, the doctors, the historians."

"And the priests," Shizuru said, attentive.

"Of course. So they were among the few links of the disparate peoples of this land back then. Because of their skills and knowledge, they were allowed to move freely about territories. And they were so revered that they could walk out onto a battlefield and cross it without once being hit."

Shizuru adopted the trademark patrician expression of incredulity: she raised an eyebrow.

"No, it's true," said the other woman, smiling a little. "It's very long ago, though, so we've all but forgotten it."

"Except for the druids."

"That goes without saying." Azula sighed and dropped her smile again. "They were clever about it. The reverence accorded them was because they shared their knowledge with no one. They put none of it down in writing and passed it on to each other instead by word of mouth and secret ritual. That wasn't strange, in a way. Our traditions were oral in the old days. Most of the written forms of our languages then were rudimentary, which was one of the big challenges when my husband's ancestors started uniting the tribes- allied tribes couldn't even send each other precise messages through writing."

She took a breath and continued.

"You know, of course, that we adopted your language as a solution to the language differences. It was a logical solution because your people had already been passing through this place for some time-and your Argus and Sosia Provinces were also already existing by then as important trading spots for those of us venturing east. We'd picked up a lot of your words already. But most importantly, we'd discovered knowledge previously unavailable from texts your people wrote... on farming, on medicine, on warfare and other things. The few Greek texts that found their way north-often through the ports of Argus, by the way-were too concerned with their own culture and poetry to interest us in learning the language. Himean texts, by comparison, were discovered to be about very practical things."

"Greek idealism against Himean practicality," Toshi offered quietly from behind Shizuru. "A popular theme."

Azula agreed.

"Besides, the Greeks never really took to our lands well, so there were few of them here," she continued. "It was your people who travelled more freely and interacted more willingly with us. So it made sense for more people to learn Himean instead, especially as many other peoples in this parts spoke it too-Argentians, Otomeians, travelling merchants, and even Greeks. And over time, enough people learned it to make its adoption as a common language possible. We still speak our dialects, the old tribal languages, you know. But for cross-border talks and everything official we use Himean."

"Go on, this is fascinating," Shizuru invited.

"There's not a lot more to say except the natural conclusion. With a common literacy and the knowledge in texts from your authors spreading, more of our rare non-druid specialists began to write down what they knew and what the druids wouldn't divulge. This meant widespread dissemination of specialist information and learning."

Shizuru nodded as she saw what the woman was saying.

"So the druidic monopoly on knowledge was broken and druidic power crippled," she concluded. "Yes, I see. The druids bear a grudge against us for the part our language played?"

"In a way," Azula responded pensively. "I've always thought they disliked Himeans in particular because of that link to their fall from power. Although of course it might also be that they just find your religion threatening."

"Yet everyone around Our Sea knows we do not impose our gods on those we conquer."

"I doubt that makes a difference to the druids, as they would be the conquered in this possibility. It's a matter of perspective, isn't it?"

Shizuru smiled again, finding herself liking Entei's daughter more and more.

"Does your husband know how keen a mind you have?" she asked, meaning both the compliment and the query. From what she remembered of her brief encounter with Obsidian, his first wife was the subtler-and likely more cunning-of the two of them. Had the emperor appreciated this or been threatened by it?

Silly question. Look where he left her.

"My husband doesn't know much about me except the reason I'm a disappointment to him," Azula said with surprising ease. "I'm the only childless wife he's ever married."

"I see."

"I'll leave these slaves outside in the hallway to lead you to the feast," she told the invaders. "You can have them lead you around the castle too if you want to see something else, but I hope all of you will attend the meal. We prepared the finest foods the city has to offer, and slaughtered only the best fowl, hogs, and cattle."

She stopped at the wincing on the Himeans' faces.

"Er... yes, you might not know," said their general. "Himeans do not eat beef, at least not if there is anything else to be had."

Azula's lips parted, forming an O. The slaves and officials behind her exchanged worried looks, at least until one of them regained his presence of mind and hissed at one of the slaves. He ordered her to run down to the feasting hall and tell the cooks and servants to remove all beef from the menu.

"That's something we never read from your texts, I suppose," Azula admitted, her weary composure returning. "It seemed to me that cattle were so common in your provinces. I thought you ate their meat as well."

"Not at all, or not if we can help it. They have other uses. Tallow and leather are only two of them."

"And milk, I suppose?"

"Only if there are no goats around," Shizuru said, with a sideways glance at Natsuki. The Otomeian returned it with a longer look of her own. "We prefer goat's milk. And even then only for cheese and other dairy products. It is a rare Himean who drinks milk happily."

"I see." A pause. "Are there any other foods you would find odious?"

"Why, what else have you served?"

"Various fowl-I can't be sure of all of their names, but I can send a slave to ask. Hen and pheasant, certainly. Pigeon. Pork too. Some venison. Fresh fish from the rivers-nothing too exotic."

"It sounds well enough. I'm sure we all look forward to it."

Azula bowed, which meant her retinue did the same, and swiftly walked away. That left Shizuru and her officers to choose rooms for themselves.

"Set aside one room for Zanki-han too," she reminded some of the tribunes before entering the room marked for her use with Natsuki. The polemarch's troopers were already in it and doing a thorough search of the place, looking out of the windows and opening closets. Some even ran their palms over the walls to see if these had doors skilfully concealed. When one of the troopers started sniffing the bed's pillows and squeezing them, Shizuru arched an eyebrow at Natsuki.

"Poisons and snakes," the polemarch said, prompting shivers among the slaves waiting for the inspection to finish. Shizuru shook her head.

"That would be imaginative," she said. "Why do you even check for that, Natsuki? Do not tell me it is a fashion for assassins in Otomeia."

"No. Still, one learns of such things. And remembers."

One of the troopers, a lanky blonde who reminded Shizuru of Alyssa, called the polemarch and nodded. Natsuki nodded back, but also inclined her head in a beckoning movement.

The other Otomeian approached. Shizuru saw that an ear was deformed: the missing flesh seemed to have been cut away, based on the scarring.

"They said there would be a feast," Natsuki told the woman in her nation's language. "Do as arranged in this case."

"Right," the other answered. "I'm leaving Cantel and Ivander to stay with Zidek."

The moment the troopers left it was the noncombatants' turn. Several were immediately directed to get a washing tub from the Mentulaeans outside and to find water while others worked on making the place more habitable for the general's purposes.

Meanwhile, Shizuru surveyed the space. There was more gilt and red stone flooring, and an elaborate gold statue occupied a prominent position on a wooden table that dominated a corner. It was a statue of a hunter bearing a slain stag on his back, and it reminded Shizuru that the Mentulaeans had originally been a hunting people living near their sacred forests. Many of them had since switched over to city living, but she knew that they still tended to choose cities with woody areas nearby. Indeed this was the case with Gorgo, where woods commenced on the other side of a stream on the westward plain.

She turned around to better take in the room. More scenes involving forests and hunters ran riot on one of the walls, the spaces between figures packed with the elaborate whorls and knots Mentulaeans favoured. The whorls and knots on the edges of the mural, supposed to be its border, were picked out in real gold.

"So this is the Mentulaeans' taste," she said. "What do you think, mea vita?"

"Garish."

Shizuru stifled a chuckle and waggled her eyebrows at her head servant. Aella's prim lips quirked up at the edges.

"Damned with one word," she said. "This shows us what we can look forward to in terms of booty, though. This is rich territory we approach, Natsuki, so perhaps we should forgive them a little ostentation. We are approaching the gold and silver sources of the empire, the mines up in the mountains to the north. Some of the mines are said to be so rich that my sources tell me they could be worked for a century and not run out of the valuable ore. Even some of the rivers nearby carry away some of the gold near their headwaters. I hear many Mentulaeans make a living out of panning the rivers for precious metals."

To her bafflement, Natsuki was chuckling.

"What did I say?" she asked.

The Otomeian gave her a naughty grin.

"Nothing," Natsuki said. "Only that you plan to own those mines when the war is done."

Her answering laugh was so loud some of the servants started.

"What?" she said, grinning hugely. "Did I really say that?"

"In so many words," said Natsuki, lowering herself to what would be their bed and smoothing a hand on the blanket. Her pet, finally let off its leash, decided to investigate its new environment and make a few of the slaves anxious with its snooping.

Then she spoke in Otomeian, quietly: "I feel strange here."

Shizuru looked up from a deeper inspection of the art on the wall:
"Why is that?"

Natsuki appeared to consider it. Since the return of cloudy days she had begun to wear dresses that left her arms bare again. Shizuru thought her limbs were very white and slender, their stark leanness all the more elegant against the profusion of shapes and colours in the room.

"This is their capital," the princess said. "The war is not near done, no, Shizuru?"

"Indeed." A sigh. "It will continue for as long as there are significant elements in this land that resist Hime."

"Yet we are to sleep in their palace. In their capital. It is a strange thing."

"Yes, it is a bit odd if you think about it. But none of us predicted that we would have the Firensians as allies-they gave us the means to achieve this."

There was an increase of noise by the door: the slaves sent to fetch a tub had obtained one. The polemarch insisted on it being scrubbed with oil first, then water was fetched so they could bathe. They had servants help them this time, so as to finish everything faster, and when they were done both of them shone.

"There are few things as renewing as having a bath," Shizuru told her lover while belting her tunic. She waved Aella away when the woman offered to do it. "Although I still do prefer to take my baths at a more leisurely pace, and with only one particular person helping me."

This time, the eyebrow that climbed belonged to Natsuki.

The Otomeian's eyebrow had not even begun to drop when knocking sounded on the door. A voice said that the druid had arrived. Shizuru made a remark on his impeccable timing and asked him to come in while giving Aella leave to exit.

"Greetings to you, General Fujino," said the druid when he entered, and Shizuru could not help but smile.

The chief of the captured druids was not at all what she had expected. She had thought he would be old and of the desiccated type she had observed most druids to be. He turned out to be neither.

Cirnos was still young, sufficiently so to retain all his curly, pepper-sprinkled hair. His eyes bore only faint wrinkles at the corners, and they were such wrinkles as one got by smiling. His expression was open or gave an impression of being so, and there was such a lack of misgiving in his face that one would have thought him about to be interviewed by a dear friend instead of an enemy.

But all these things were as nothing compared to his most remarkable trait. Cirnos the Druid took up a great deal of space. He was not grotesquely fat the way some overfed, half-catatonic wretches were who had nothing to do all day but attend to their meals and no exercise to delight in save that of their jaws. Which ground, ground, ground an unending supply of both sweets and savouries, all to be resolved as added stuffing for the dimpled and pendulous flab of their bellies and breasts.

Cirnos was not of that ilk because he was not flabby-looking or even heavily dimpled. Indeed, he was extraordinarily smooth-for the aspect he presented was that of a sphere, with all his evenly distributed flesh. His fat did not wiggle or waggle as he moved: it presented the most titillating little tremor instead, its ponderous inner mass held in place by taut white skin.

Shizuru glanced sideways to see what her lover thought of him and regretted it. The polemarch looked very much as if she wanted to produce a pin to prick the walking and talking sphere on its side. There was a terrible instant where she thought she would laugh at the image, but Cirnos spoke before that.

"You're so much younger than I thought you'd be," he said, obviously as fascinated by her looks as she was by his-thought for rather different reasons. "And so much more beautiful."

"You flatter me. You are rather younger than I thought you would be, yourself."

"But not," he smiled, "beautiful."

His attention transferred to the other woman. At first his smile was the same appreciative one it had been for Shizuru, but that changed when he saw the black shadow crouched behind the second woman's chair.

"This is the Polemarch of Otomeia," Shizuru explained. "The Princess Natsuki."

"Polemarch?" He had averted his eyes from the Otomeian now and seemed to make a point of trying not to look her way. "This is a foreign word to me. It sounds Greek."

"The origin of the title is. It stands for High Commander, to make it simple," Shizuru answered.

"Commander? It's not a religious title?"

Shizuru was bemused. "Why, did you expect it to be?"

It was his turned to look bemused.

"I-excuse me, I had thought it would be," he said, with a quick glance at the Otomeian.

Who fixed her sphinx gaze on him, Shizuru thought, in a perfect mirror of her now-awake cat's: unaccusing yet suspecting everything, glassy yet alive, unreadable, unmerciful, as real as it was part of the mist.

Ah, I see .

"You believe in the spirits of the trees," she said to him. "Of the sacredness of the great forests and the tall oaks. Do you believe in the spirits of fauna as well, and of the powers a select few have to commune with them?"

She could feel Natsuki's dawning comprehension even as the man answered.

"We do," he said. "We have some mystics among us and some with the talents you mention. But they are few and far between. Most of us are skilled at interpreting the acts of animals and not at inducing them."

"As in augury," Shizuru responded. "I hold religious office myself, Cirnos. I am part of the College of Augurs and thus am one of those empowered to take the auspices prior to formal undertakings of the Republic-studying the flights of birds and their patterns to interpret the will of the gods."

"Yes, I understand. It's not unlike what we do."

"Actually, it is, in at least one way. You sacrifice humans for it and we do not."

A flash of misgiving crossed his face: it sat ill on that round, amiable countenance.

"I was told you would be against that," he said.

"By whom?"

"Everyone who knows anything about Hime."

"Did everyone who knows anything about Hime tell you why?"

"No, they didn't. Why does the issue of human sacrifice matter to any of you? We use no free men for it, only prisoners or slaves. We don't torture them before it, even. Many other religions practise it besides our own-and even your people have turned to it in the past, I think."

"You speak the critical words. In the past." Shizuru crossed her legs slowly. "We gave it up when we learned better, as did most of the other religions you may be speaking of, at least the civilised ones. No cultured peoples or civilisations now practise human sacrifice around Our Sea."

"But it's your notion of civilisation, your description of it!"

"True, it is," Shizuru agreed. "But I argue that it is an infinitely better civilisation than the one a culture of human sacrifice brings. Our gods and our dealings with them reflect our attitude and dignity as a people, Cirnos. Any god that asks for human sacrifice routinely is not saying that human blood is more worthwhile than the blood of a goat, or an ox, or a sheep. That god is saying, instead, that human blood is as disposable as the blood of a goat, an ox, or a sheep- which I note you also sacrifice to your gods occasionally."

"Yes, but only for lesser rituals, in exchange for lesser boons."

"All the same to me." Her eyes flashed briefly. "Taking lives in war and on the battlefield is one thing. The circumstances render the activity understandable. But to use human life as a currency for bartering with gods outside of warfare promotes a culture of individual homicides justified by religion! The world is changing, Cirnos. And one of the changes shall be that human sacrifice shall be firmly outlawed in the future, all around Our Sea."

Cirnos opened his mouth, then underwent a peculiar expression that told her he had revised what he originally meant to say.

"It may be so in your world, General," he said. "But this isn't your world yet. The empire won't be so quick to succumb to your authority, I think you will discover. We have champions among us to fight you still, and the heart of the empire continues to beat. As it will continue to beat long after your people have left these lands and your nation has withered away."

Shizuru grinned at him.

"You've a taste for poetic drama," she said, though not mockingly. "Since you brought it up, though, tell me about the Heart of the Empire, Cirnos, and what he promised you or what you promised him. Or was your alliance one born purely out of shared ideology? No, I doubt it. Sane people are always motivated by self-interest and you seem sane enough to me. Only madmen can be impelled purely by ideology."

His confusion was almost convincing, she thought, though a glimpse of Natsuki told her the polemarch was very far from being convinced. But then, she felt that the girl had eyed the man with suspicion from the very beginning. She wondered if it was due to his physical appearance. Otomeians prized martial ability and health so much that they tended to look askance the less-than-fit-more so the round than the thin. What was that she had overheard one of them say, one of the troopers in camp? That flesh waxed fat on cowardice and opportunism?

"I'm sorry, I don't follow what you mean," Cirnos said obsequiously.

"I am sure you follow very well," Shizuru responded. "Tell me about the Prince Calchis and why the druids support him. Is it simply because he was raised by your chief?"

Her knowledge of the name and that detail unnerved the round man for just an instant before he composed himself again.

"It's true he has ties with the druids that way, yes," he said. "But we also support him because the gods are with him."

"What makes you believe so?"

"Various signs, not too different from those you probably follow when studying the flight of birds. Indications that they wished us to cast our lot with him. We saw them ever since he was young, so that's why we've taken care of him. It pleased our gods for us to do it."

"So the fact that he is one of the elder princes of the empire as well as one whose mother was a pious follower of your faith did not factor into it?"

"You try to make us sound conniving, General, but we did only as the gods willed."

As this reference to 'the will of the gods' was the sort of thing Shizuru hated people using whenever they wanted to shroud their motives, her smile swiftly turned ironic.

"And what do the gods will for him, then?"

"To take the throne and restore the glory of the empire."

"Which I take to mean that you also expect him to restore the glory of druidic influence."

"You may take it to mean anything you like, General Fujino."

"What of the king, then? This seems to say that you think he had an adverse effect on the empire."

Cirnos's lips pursed for a moment.

"The king isn't the wisest of men," he said. "It's said by some that he had been wiser before he was crowned, but that his brains began to harden the longer he sat on the throne. Who knows why? Maybe it was the strain. Or maybe it was the gods' will again."

Shizuru's eyes narrowed as she tried to make sense of what he was saying.

"Forgive me," she said. "What do you mean... his brains began to harden? Is this a disease?"

Cirnos drew himself up, pleased at the opportunity to school her in something.

"Those of us who focus on the healing arts say that one of the causes of foolishness in men is a hardening of the fluids or mucosa in the brain. A man's mind is at its best when these fluids flow freely, as they act like lubricants for the thinking process. For some reason or other, some men's brains either lack these fluids or see them ossifying."

Shizuru's brows lifted at him.

"Intriguing theory," she said, and then, turning to Natsuki: "What do you think of it, Polemarch?"

The polemarch's scepticism came through her eyes even before the words passed her lips.

"I have opened the skulls of many fools," the princess said. Her voice was haughty, direly authoritative. Shizuru realised with surprise that this was how her lover spoke when she deemed herself acting in a political capacity.

"Many of them poured the contents so that I could see," the polemarch continued. "I saw that each one had brains as wet as wiser men's."

After a beat she added: "I have also opened the skulls of many wise men."

The druid seemed amazed to hear the princess confess to such acts: he took his time replying.

"Yes, it would seem that way," he said in a friendly tone. "But it's an illusion. The brains liquefy upon exposure to the air."

The Otomeian's dark brows crumpled.

"So do men all become wiser when their brains are exposed to the air?" she demanded.

"Well, no, since they would be--"

"Stop. I know." Her tone was still calm but withering. "It was what is called 'sarcasm'. I think your explanation is convenient, but your premise is unproven. I remain in disbelief."

Shizuru's barely-suppressed chuckle drew the slack-mouthed Cirnos's attention again.

"Excuse me. The polemarch is... a little difficult to persuade," she told the man, who tore his eyes away from the Otomeian with difficulty. She could not blame him for that: she had been compelled to wrestle with herself too just to look away from her mistress, whose lips she had wanted to kiss into submission after all those haughty utterances. The superior little monster!

"We may be straying from the point, however. I think we come near the time for the dinner feast, so let us get to it straightaway, with no more detours."

She folded her hands gently over her lap and looked at him.

"I am told you have your share of authority, Cironos, among the druids. This tells me you might have some influence too on the prince. What would you say if I asked you to invite him to a formal meeting, he and all his supporters, that we might see if we could find a way to treat with each other? I am opposed to his father the king continuing to be king, but that is reasonable. The man did try to invade our provinces. The prince I may not look upon so harshly. If I understand you aright, he shares my opposition-he may not want his father the king continuing to be king as well. Does that not provide ample grounds for a conference between us?"

"I hope you won't think ill of me saying so, General," Cironos replied in a smooth voice. "But considering other circumstances, that may also provide ample grounds for suspicion between us."

"Even if we provided a guarantee of no hostilities for the duration of the conference?"

"Even then, as that guarantee would have to be taken purely on faith."

"I would have thought a druid would think a little better of things that hinge on faith. Come now, Cironos, we are hardly savages to murder dinner guests at the table."

As this was in fact something that had been done several times by the Mentulaean emperors, Cironos bit his tongue and said nothing.

"Surely it would be better for the empire and all its peoples were peace established more quickly?" Shizuru tried again. "Hime likes to deal with client-kings. If the Prince Calchis desires a part of the empire to call his own, that can be negotiated."

"As the queen's people negotiated with you?" the druid said. "That is what they asked for in exchange for betraying us, yes?"

"Yes, though I think you are not in the best position to speak of betrayals just yet, considering the druidic agenda."

At his incensed expression, she held up a hand to forestall protest and spoke.

"Let me say first that it is not a bad agenda, Cynos," she told him. "At its heart it has sense. I agree that a people's traditions need to be preserved. But they can be preserved without reducing your people to pitiful numbers through conflict. Think of the good you could do the many peoples of this land-Firensii, Mentulaeans, Carsini, Aexelli, all the others-if you were able to mediate an end to the war between us and the forces of the prince. And as for the king, what is to prevent all of us from simply removing him then, so that you may find a ruler more to your tastes?"

Cynos's round face seemed to lengthen as a scowl slipped over his face. And just as quickly as it had arrived, it went away.

"What indeed?" he echoed dully, before speaking in firmer tones. "You, General Fujino. You and Hime. You would choose all our leaders from then on, because you would want only puppets or catspaws in the ruling seat. We would have a sham of autonomy under threat of violence, not the peaceful liberty you would have me believe you offer. You'll bring your gods to this place and have us throw away ours-not overtly! You'd do it slowly, supplanting our deities and myths with your own until we forget that we ever had our own in the first place. That's what you people are good at, after all: slipping ideas into others' heads without showing that you're doing it. And after a while, what would exist of the Mentulae, or of the others you mentioned, the Firensii, the Carsinii, the rest? Nothing. You'd make of us a pathetic copy of Hime. No, I think we'll steer clear of your overtures for peace."

He made the word sound like a dirty thing he could not get out of his mouth quickly enough. Despite the coolness of the room his forehead gleamed gently, a thin layer of sweat forming atop it.

"You'll see, the prince has what this land needs: a true Mentulaean capable of uniting the many territories in a way his forefathers never could. He can forge it into a truly great empire, not the still-weak one it is now. If that goal is to be achieved, we need to achieve it without your help. The autonomy of the nation we form can only be true if it's achieved autonomously. So again, my answer is this: no."

She smiled at him without rancour.

"You touch on some truths there," she said. "But I think your passion for the subject blinds you to the positives of my proposal. Let us take them one by one."

"Yes, we would have greater influence on you than before, and we would be a factor to consider for your government. But you would be a factor to consider for ours too. Would that not foster a fine attitude of cooperation for our two states? One that could lead to more harmonious lives for all concerned, even? There could be more congress between us, shared learning, better trade. And though some may say such congress leads to pollution of a nation's cultural purity, I say otherwise: the best way to enhance a culture is to infuse it with new influences, expanding it and allowing it opportunity to reinterpret those influences in a way that would make them its own."

"As for the threat of violence, I shall not deny it... but only insofar as no state needs to deny its willingness to defend its interests by violence, especially if violence is the only recourse. Which we Himeans know is seldom the case. Otherwise, why would I be making such an offer to you as I do now?"

"And as for achieving autonomy independently, that may well be so- if it were possible . In your case, it is not. To achieve the idealistic goal of which you speak requires that you defeat not only the king but also the forces of the Firensii as well as of Hime and Otomeia. And possibly those of other local nobles and leaders finally realising that they can secede from Mentulaean rule very profitably after seeing the Firensian example. Consider the odds against you. I think I do not exaggerate when I say it would be very hard to overcome them, if not outright impossible. So no, I think the sort of autonomy you speak of is not achievable, only a dream."

"But still, some autonomy is better than none at all. It is certainly better than us reducing all of your peoples to slavery, in retaliation for the hostilities you began by assaulting our allies and our provinces. No use telling me it was the king's order to provoke us; kingdoms are always held accountable for the actions of their kings. That is the fact, Cirnos. We are here because your king as good as invited us here. And here we shall stay. So now you must all live with it, and there are comfortable as well as uncomfortable ways of doing that."

But the druid's full cheeks had set, his round jaw already refusing. Shizuru sighed loudly.

"A refusal again-as I knew it would be," she told him, watching disbelief spread over his face. "Yes, Cirnos, I knew you would refuse me. It looks better for the history to say that all reasonable overtures have been made, however. That way my opponents cannot claim me to be heedlessly and opportunistically bloodthirsty. I shall set down this entire conversation in my next reports to Senate."

The druid's eyes widened and he balked in outrage.

"So you provide proof of your untrustworthiness even here!" he cried. "You were only baiting me, General Fujino. Now can you still really wonder why I would refuse your attempts to arrange a meeting between you and our prince?"

"There is hardly need to raise your voice-the guards outside may hear you and come in. Besides, you are disturbing the polemarch's companion. That is never advisable."

The huge cat was on its feet, slinking against its owner's legs and peeking at him. The druid's mouth clamped shut; beads of sweat coalesced from the gleam on his forehead.

"And you misunderstand me," Shizuru continued. "I said those things expecting you to refuse them. But I said them too with every intention of seeing them through if you happened to buck expectation. You did not, so there it is."

She smiled suddenly, her teeth flashing in the yellow light of the torches. Her eyes seemed all the weirder to him after that flash.

"All the better for me that you refused, by the way," she confessed. "I shall have more lands to claim solely for Hime and more of your treasures to take than if I had been obliged to make concessions to another client-king. Your refusal tonight shall lead to an increase in my future glory."

She ignored his attempts to retort, holding up a hand again and flicking it to the door.

"Thank you for meeting with me, Cirnos," she said, her tone telling him she would no longer listen. "Though I suppose Queen Azula gave you no choice, you still answered me freely enough for most of our meeting. And thanks to you, I now understand the political force known as the druids a little better. But now I have said all I wish to say and heard all I need to hear. Now get out."

A click of the polemarch's tongue accompanied by the big cat's slow approach of him. The druid's exit was swift and his waiting jailers led him away again. The moment the door shut, Shizuru's mouth formed a sneer.

"Despicable," she told Natsuki, who looked at her curiously from the other chair. "Did you hear the man? It is one thing to do something out of self-interest, but it is quite another to pretend that you do it all out of obedience to some divine will. As though that could renounce one's motives or culpability! Even had Prince Calchis been reasonable enough to treat with us, the druids would never let him do it for fear of letting foreign influence in. They shall do all they can, I imagine, to keep him firmly opposed to all Himean presence as well. And not because they think it shall lead to national decay—rather, it will be because they think it shall be to the detriment of any chances they have for regaining their old ascendancy. Oh, even I am selfish, but there are degrees of it, Natsuki!"

Natsuki nodded and rubbed her pet's cheeks roughly. This set the animal rumbling in a transport of ecstasy.

"A toad," she agreed. "And such a silly. Dry brains!"

As she was still focused on her cat, she missed Shizuru's smile at this.

Another knock on the door, followed by a request for entry from a familiar voice.

"We thought you'd be done with the druid by now, Fujino-san," Shohei said once inside the room and pushing up his tunic's sleeves. He had washed himself, as had the others. As all of them had opted like her to go with military tunics, the entire Himean complement of the room's occupants was in a uniform red.

"I am indeed done with him," Shizuru answered her officer, with sufficient deliberation to hint to her legates that she meant more than one thing by it. "It is too bad you did not arrive earlier, however, as I fancy you might have enjoyed seeing him. He was rather against type for a senior druid, at least looks-wise."

"Pity I missed him then," said Shohei. "I'd have liked to see what you mean."

"Still young," Shizuru enlarged. "About Azula-han's age, I would say. And very plump."

It was Toshi who asked how plump.

"Perhaps as plump as Takahata-han." At her legates' incredulous stares, she looked to Natsuki. "Was he not as plump as Takahata-han, Natsuki?"

Who, the polemarch's look seemed to say.

"One of the scribes we left at the Atinu camp."

Again the look of enquiry.

"The biggest one, with the reedy voice," Toshi tried.

The pale face finally cleared.

"Ahh!" Natsuki exhaled. "The fat man? The so very fat man?"

Shizuru could not fault her legates for their poorly-masked laughter.

"I suppose some might see it that way," she said, trying to soften what she knew was a truth. "He does have some meat on him."

"A lot," the rail-thin polemarch agreed innocently.

"His weight notwithstanding," Shizuru coughed, summoning all her strength so as not to dissolve into giggles before her red-cheeked officers, "he is actually one of the best scribes in the army, you know. He works harder than most of the others."

But the polemarch gave her a strange look.

"I know that," the Otomeian said in her native tongue. "What has that to do with his girth?"

Shizuru sighed and abandoned Takahata's defence.

"Absolutely nothing," she admitted, getting to her feet. "Come, let us go already and see if we cannot enjoy the repast they have set out for us."

But the polemarch halted her even as she arose from the chair.

"Wait," was all she said.

"Why?"

A nod at the door. With unbelievable theatrical timing, a knock sounded from behind it.

"How did she do that?" Shizuru heard one of her legates murmur.

"Arania, enter," said the polemarch, and again her audience was treated to a theatrical touch in the accuracy of the spoken name.

Shizuru looked at her dumbfounded legates and shrugged, saying she had no idea either how her lover had done it. Arania-the trooper with the trimmed ear-did not linger but said a few words that Shizuru translated as All of it is done. Natsuki's response was more intriguing, and was delivered again in her country's language.

"Hold them and the room," she said to the woman, every word translated carefully by a listening Shizuru. "If one so much as coughs more roughly than you think acceptable, cut off their thumbs. Not heads. I wish all able to talk if talking must be done. And send someone to bring the Himean-" here came a word Shizuru did not recognise "-here, to be safe."

Arania nodded and left. Natsuki grasped her cane and rose from her chair.

"Now we can go," she said, and was followed by four mystified

Himeans on the way out.

---

Only after all had retired to their rooms that first evening in Gorgo did Shizuru learn the story behind the polemarch's strange orders to her subordinate.

The princess, ever suspicious, had been wary of the feast Obsidian's queen had prepared for them. She had commanded her troopers to round up several of the cooks and even some palace officials that evening. These they had force-fed with samples of everything to be served at the feast. Some troopers guarded the plates while others guarded the hapless subjects of the experiment. As they were fed two hours before the feast started, there would have been ample time to recognise the signs of consumption for the most common poisons. This was also why the polemarch had ordered the army's medici -it was the Otomeian word for these that Shizuru had not known-to wait in a room near the dining hall, just in case one of the Himeans did ingest something poisonous before detection.

"I was afraid you were already ordering a massacre of Mentulaeans in their capital without my consent!"

Natsuki was puzzled at her lover's reaction: "But you said nothing, Shizuru."

Shizuru sighed.

"Because I knew in my heart you would do nothing so precipitous, I suppose. Still, to have the notion lurking in my mind was fright enough." She took a deep breath and looked pensive. "You do realise, considering that our army occupies the area and her father's treaty with us is necessary for her family's survival, the possibility of foul dealing from Azula-han would be practically nil?"

"Still. Better to be safe."

"Paranoid, you mean. It appears I shall have something to say to Azula-han tomorrow."

Natsuki squinted: "She knows."

"Someone already told her?"

"We fed her too."

Shizuru stared.

"Ecaster !" she said, eyebrows halfway up her forehead. "So that was why she made a point of sampling the food on my plate under pretext of ensuring its quality for her guest of honour! No doubt that strange display was for you, meum mel. "

She stopped, looked winded, then laughed weakly.

"Well, she was still marvellously civil to you during the feast," she told the polemarch. "Especially considering what you did to her. You must grant that much, at least."

"Now I can grant it, yes," the other said. "But before that, I could grant nothing. We are in their city, Shizuru."

Shizuru whistled and put one hand to her cheek.

"It is wonderful how mistrustful you are," she told her lover with some humour. "You shall make a perfect Himean after all, mea vita ."

As the polemarch had no sense of humour when it came to suspicions of harm befalling her lover, her answering glower was none too charitable.

"Now we are here," she said after some moments, changing the subject in that obvious way that Shizuru adored. "Their capital city. Now what do we do?"

Shizuru smiled at this and pushed her lover onto the sheets.

"Many things," she answered, following.

Many things indeed. Most important of them was that the legions had to be spread out for the coming winter. Given the relative quiet of the south by now, Shizuru decided to leave only two legions there. The Fifth would winter at Asterion with Maiza Avaro; the Fourteenth went with Keigo Kurauchi three days' march away, overlooking a critical pass leading north and east.

Kenji Nakamura still commanded the Sixth and Thirteenth and moved further west with them into the lands now belonging to the Firensii. This was so they could depend on those allies for winter rations and possibly support if needed. The Ninth Legion, however, was removed from Kenji's command. The general had ordered it to join her in the Mentulaean capital. It would take the place of the Eighth, which she sent back east to winter by the territories of the Mentulaean peoples called the Carsinii.

The Eighth were led by Zanki Kiguchi and instructed to join the Third and Seventh. Those latter two legions were already working on subduing Carsinian opposition under the command of the general's cousin, aided Seigo Ushida. As the Carsinii were horse warriors, the general had sent part of her horse to her cousin immediately after the Battle of Berentum. The Eighth's arrival at Shizuma's autumn camp was thus preceded by the cataphracts and two alae of light cavalry. They were commanded by the Princess Alyssa.

The Fourth remained in Atinu Camp, which was left under the command of the logistics-loving Miyuki Rokujou and the similarly-inclined Taro Toshino. The Eleventh Legion Shizuru kept with her in Gorgo, along with Toshi Kumakura. Shohei Nagayama she sent off with the Tenth and the Twelfth: their task was to besiege the modest citadel of Bitur, which presided over a large town merely a day's hard march away from Shizuru's own position.

After learning of the capital's surrender, Bitur quickly capitulated. This was little surprise considering its citadel had no garrison-they had all been absorbed into Terrigos's annihilated army. Nevertheless, Shohei admitted in a letter to the commander that he did not "trust them a wink". They muttered terribly under their breaths, he said, and looked too sullen to trust. Still, their walled fortress made for a convenient defensive structure. They also had sufficient grain in their silos to support him and his two legions, so he would stay where he was.

The expectation was still for the remaining two royal armies and perhaps the forces of their supporters to approach from the northwest. The last reports Yamada's spies were able to get for Shizuru said the king had begun mustering again and was putting out a call for the barons and tribes to rally to his position. Of the Prince Calchis there was no word-only that he had supposedly taken the long path up the northern forests after being blocked by the Himean legions by the Holmys. Thus, Shohei's position was workable: it put her and one of her best legates in the way of any major enemy sally to reclaim captured cities and within close reach of each other.

For the most part the cooling months seemed to presage the usual military quiet of winter, however. Their new allies, the Firensii, sent her messages to say they had subdued the army at Resselium and would move themselves closer to their lands. This gave them easier access to their own resources and would let them defend their lands in the event of imperial attacks. As a token of assurance as to their continued loyalty, they sent all the booty from the city of Resselium to the Atinu Camp. The spoils from the army they defeated, however, they claimed entirely.

Thus Shizuru concluded her army's fall and winter arrangements. Obsidian might still be abroad and many of his supporters alive, but she had him on the defensive and she was ready for any response.

But that did not mean her work was done, for then she had to turn her gaze the other way. It was time to catch up with all her correspondence, as there were buckets upon buckets of it coming for her all the way from Hime.

The letters had accumulated throughout the march from Atinu Camp: Shizuru liked her couriers to be constantly moving and read every letter she received, even if it was only one from a gossip acquaintance back home. This meant that letters poured into the camps and checkpoints daily, ready for the next saddlesore courier to pack into his sturdy leather bags and gallop to the general.

Mail from Hime reached her more quickly now. That was owing to the roads her legions had been building. The via Fujino had been constructed the previous year and had seen so much traffic that she felt unusual maintenance arrangements needed. She contracted a team to lay fresh cement dust and water it down twice instead of the usual once-a-year routine; indeed, many of the well-used roads of the Republic got by very well on that once-a-year resurfacing. This meant that the via Fujino was considered an excellently-maintained road by comparison. But that was to be expected, said those back home who knew the woman whose name the via took. Anything Shizuru considered attached to her name and person, the woman always took great pains to keep immaculate.

The first news of note came to her from her close friend's cousin, who was becoming a friend herself. Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki had been asked by Chikane to write this particular news, she said, because the latter woman had feared it would bear a tone of petty vengefulness were she the one to write of it instead.

Although I don't know how that exempts me from giving it the same tone, wrote the patrician-turned-plebeian. Suou may not have been my sister, but she was still my cousin . And as I have no sisters of my own, she served that function in my life. I do not hesitate to tell you that I take great pleasure in delivering this news as a result, which concerns the accursed man whose bungling left her dead.

As you already know, he was brought to trial for treason, extortion, and essentially overall incompetence. I'll not run over the specific charges again, as we are both familiar with them. In fact, everyone within twenty kilometres of Hime could recite them at the drop of a hat.

Public interest was high from the outset and trial attendance was spectacular: it's been a while since the last treason trial and the People were eager to see the man who led a whole legion to ruin-the most terrible military loss we have had in decades. A great many of the families of the deceased were in attendance, I think, both for the slain officers and rankers. The fear for the crowd was that Masashi would run before any of them could lay eyes on him. That was his prerogative, of course, as every Himean is afforded the chance to go into voluntary exile if he wishes not to face a court for his sins.

Here I must confess something that I think you will not look on too harshly: I wanted that prerogative denied him. I wanted him to stay and face the court so he could be made to pay for what he did in front of everybody. I wanted them to see his disgrace: the people, his peers, the families of those his stupidity reduced to shades. Everyone had to see him fall, and to allow him to escape, I felt, was to deny justice.

For this reason I saw fit to round up some men, some of those I marshalled for your cause when I was still a tribune of the plebs. I placed them outside his house, hidden in shadows and dank alleys and ready to shadow the man the moment he stepped through his doorway. If Masashi tried to leave the city with his most precious belongings bundled, they would have forced him back into his house and kept him there until the trial. Perhaps I told them they could also rough him up a little while forcing him back into the building. This came to nothing, however: he didn't even try to leave Hime. I wish he had, since one of the men I had shadowing him has the largest fists I've ever seen on a mortal-it would have given me great pleasure to see Masashi with a blackened face after a blow from one of those buckets.

As it was he showed up for the trial looking presentable enough. Though that didn't last long, given how many members in the crowd were carrying foodstuff in their hands. The consuls had to summon the lictors from their quarters, just so we could get the crowd to let the man pass and make it to the Treason Court.

The presiding magistrate of the court this year is Natsuhiro Yoshinaka, who may come from solid conservative origins but is nevertheless a man of genuine integrity. For the prosecution Chikane lined up one of the most memorable lists of Military Men and Women also endowed with a talent for speechmaking; they were headed by none other than Jinto Urusawa, Chikane's old friend as well as a Military Man of no mean calibre.

The reason for getting so many martial personalities together is clear to you, I am sure: Chikane wished to impress upon the court and all listening that Masashi was deserted by Mars when he committed maiestas, if Mars even ever deigned to walk beside him. If ever there was a message of the gods willing someone to be condemned for military failure that would be it.

The defence wasn't short of personalities itself. Both Sergay Wang and Haruka Armitage were part of his defence, which I will admit made me like both of them better than many of the other Traditionalists. Most didn't even turn up at court and pleaded ill-though we all knew they were only scared the crowd would turn on them. Wang and Armitage clearly disliked their tasks too. Neither looked too fond of the man they were defending whenever they turned their faces to him. But it was their duty to defend him since they were the ones who got him the command you took back, and they put up with it.

I'll not repeat the speeches made, as I sent copies of them with this letter. Excellent though some of them were (Urusawa-san's deserves special mention), not a single one matters. What really caused all of those jurors to forget the existence of the word ABSOLVO was the wind-the wind the people blew across the backs of their necks, the threat of pitched violence that hung in the air. Had they wanted to get out of that place alive, the knights on the jury could only vote one way.

So the outcome is this: Takeda Masashi has been stripped of praedium et pecunia, forbidden fire and water within a thousand kilometres of Hime, and deprived of the citizenship. I am pleased to report that he looked absolutely wretched as he passed through the Porta Esquilina to quit our great city. But for all that he looked a broken man, I admit I still wished he had been broken further.

When Shizuru read this letter to Natsuki, the Otomeian turned away and hid her face. As the older woman understood her lover's need for privacy when it came to the topic of Suou Himemiya, she did not press her for a reaction. For herself, she agreed with Urumi in wishing Takeda Masashi even more ill than he had already received-although she also had to admit she was still pleased with the severity of the sentence they had given him.

The second bit of news from Hime was less pleasing. The hot summer had apparently not been unusually hot in the north alone. It had extended to the south as well, which had seen no summer rains at all and now seemed set for a drought all over Fuuka that would last the winter.

Or so say all the seers and soothsayers the Senate and grain merchants have consulted, Chikane wrote. But it is not so much what those have to say that makes me fear it to be a true prophecy than it is what the farmers are saying. I have sent agents to my farming estates to check the lands and sound out the managers and tenants, and the consensus is this: we are in for a terrible drought this year.

Drought is always terrible, of course. Droughts mean withered estates, no grapes on the vine, no profit for either the farming peasant or the rich landowner. Droughts mean bad harvests or even no harvest at all. That can only mean growling bellies in the Forum, which leads to the worst kind of trouble.

So yes, droughts are always understood to be terrible, even when the word is not explicitly mentioned. It must be explicit in this case, however, and due to various circumstances that I shall explain. Let us begin with the most irritating of them, which comes from our all-too-important, grain-growing province of Sicily: servile revolt is here again.

Another gang of Sicilian slaves, it seems, is running rampant on the island. Gang, I say, but that may no longer be the appropriate word. Now it has grown into a proper little army, at least going from the reports we have been getting. The first notice we had said the ringleader had only about a few hundred slaves with him, but reports since then have claimed numbers upwards of seven thousand!

The rogue running them seems to be persuasive: he gathers discontented slaves to him like flies to honey. He claims to be of North Fuukan extraction, alleges himself descended from noble stock in his native province, and is now calling himself the slaves' king. They acknowledge him too-which, if nothing else, serves to show that they are still slaves in their thinking. No true Himean would ever accept a leader claiming the title of "king". Not even a Himean of the capite censi, so my wife assures me.

I am certain their numbers have gone up since the last reports, so the figures above are likely already obsolete. Still, it does serve to show you how swiftly the group swells. You might be wondering how this is so, particularly when the great farms of Sicily all installed guards several years back. Well, the Senate certainly counted on that measure containing this revolt, especially when the reports of this particular rebellion were still meagre and its members the same.

What we did not count on, my friend, is the idiocy of the Sicilian landlords.

After all the previous slave revolts in Sicily, of course, everyone knew that farming operations in the province had to be run more tightly. The Sicilian landowners certainly knew it, given the losses they had been made to suffer by all those revolts over the years. So they did as advised by their peers and senatorial relatives, militarised their properties' defences by installing guards and armoured overseers to look over the labour force. And those of us who had opportunity to visit Sicilia nodded approval, murmured that at least a visible deterrent to revolt was now in place.

I think we would have murmured something else had we known that many of the armed and armoured guards on those properties were slaves as well.

I know, Shizuru: I can hardly believe it myself. It seems that our sestertius-squeezing, money-milking plutocrats decided to cut their costs again by using slaves for guarding other slaves. And why not, they reasoned, when that would mean they would not have to pay them proper wages as they would have to pay freedmen?

This is folly at its best, as you and I well know. What would be the point of using slaves with weapons to deter servile revolt? Indeed, it would only make it easier, as we would be putting arms in their hands from the start. As the Sicilian slaves found out these past months, to the Sicilian landlords' collective embarrassment.

So now we have an army of slaves tramping all about the place, with a good number of them bearing arms their masters gave them. As they raid more estates they come upon more weapons. There are some estates that try to resist: not all the landlords employed feckless slave guards, we must admit. But most of these were overpowered by the growing army. And you know each time an army wins a victory, it also recruits new members more easily.

Now I come to the sorriest part of this Sicilian story. When it was apparent that something had to be done-and you know that with the House, that means three steps later than the ideal time for action-the Senate ordered one of the current praetors to take a cohort of troops to the island and put down the revolt. Eri Toshino was the one chosen. I think she is a relation to one of your legates, although I cannot be sure at the moment.

At the time she was sent, the slave army numbered about four thousand, or so we think. Again, take all the figures I am providing as unverified. The lack of information here is shameful, especially when you consider how close Sicily is. We have more precision from the reports of your faraway campaign than we do from reports on a group of slaves in a nearby province-although, yes, that would be due to the difference in our sources for either case, would it not?

As I was saying, Eri Toshino went to face four thousand. Not all of those were fighting fit. There were of course invalids, pregnant women, children, and greyhairs among them. We could not expect all those able to fight to be equipped with arms either, as the farming estates on the island only have so much gear in their individual armouries. So it was expected that Toshino-san would subdue them speedily, even with only one cohort of troops.

How it happened otherwise is still much-debated in the Forum. Toshino-san and her legionaries were overpowered by the rebel army and she only managed to get away before being taken captive herself. She says the army was bigger and had more able fighters than expected. She also says more of them were armed than expected. I submit these may have been true-in fact, I am inclined to believing her sincere in her reportage, which leads to more questions for us-but I also submit that these would not have been problems for a commander of finer competence than the one we had sent. Nor would it have been a problem for finer legionaries than the raw recruits who were slain and stripped by mere slaves.

Whatever the case, the embarrassment was too large to bear. Not only did the rebels trounce our army and send our praetor packing, but it also captured two other officers who had to be ransomed by their families. The Senate is seething and has deputed no less than the outgoing senior consul to take two legions to Sicily.

All well and good, I can hear you say. Keigo Onishi is no flimsy general and will surely deal with the rebels more ably. But now we come to the matter that started my discussion of this in the first place. With all of this going on, Sicilia's fields are lying fallow. Even those that were sown and which managed to survive the drought have no slaves to reap the crop because they are either dead, have joined the rebels, or are too afraid to work in the fields.

In sum, whether or not Onishi-san does manage to put down the revolt before the year's finish, we may be assured of one thing: there shall be no grain from Sicilia this harvest.

Not good news when you consider that we now have three active armies to feed on the field (we increased the troops in Asia Province due to the unrest over there, by the way). And then there is the true worry, the population of Hime itself... for it is when the people begin to starve that they are most susceptible to rabble-rousers, who can manipulate them into all manner of atrocities against the senators and their fellow citizens. A starving crowd may crave wheat, but what it cries for is blood.

It goes without saying that we shall be importing grain from abroad—the Senate has already passed a measure authorising its agents to cast their nets as far overseas as may be needed. But you as well as I know that it is hardly a matter of money or even reach. Droughts tend to strike everywhere at once, and reports say that both Asia Province and Africa Province were hit by it as well. Egypt is similarly troubled. Alexandria is even in ferment once again because the Nile's inundation has stayed steadily in the Cubits of Death. The Pharaoh shall have his hands full, as shall we if we do not find enough grain to keep the Head Count quiet.

"Ye gods, what a headache!" Shizuru exclaimed after reading the passage to Natsuki, who scowled in sympathy. The Otomeian was an army veteran, after all, who knew the enormous amounts of food required to keep an army going. Even more in winter, when the troops had to remain stationary for months without much opportunity to forage or raid enemy storehouses.

She knew a large part of the grain that the Fujino Army consumed was brought in from Argus, and that most of it had been sent up to that port province from the grain-rich lands in the far south. If those lands had been afflicted by drought-just as this one had been, though perhaps not as badly-grain from them would be sparse. The Fujino Army would have to look to other sources to augment its food supply until either the drought or revolt ceased.

"I will send messengers," Natsuki offered. "Our provinces may be able to spare some grain. Your people can also buy from further east, from Rheia, using our agents. I will have them look even further."

"Thank you, I appreciate it," Shizuru said, accompanying the words with a peck to her mistress's brow. "I shall talk to our allies too in the southern cities and those in the west. The Firensians shall have to put up more of their harvest as well. Oh, a pox on the Sicilian landlords! This is what comes of having tried to settle too many former legionaries on an island. Himeans do not do well on islands, legionaries especially."

Natsuki's face spoke her confusion clearly.

"What?" she said. "I do not understand. How does the problem in Sicily connect to legionaries? I see no connection."

"No, I suppose you would not." Shizuru put down Chikane's letter and helped arrange the pillows so Natsuki could sit up too: they were in bed talking. "You know we settle our legionaries on land after they have served their requisite number of campaigns. The land is their reward for their service to the state and it provides them with gainful employment as farmers after the wars are finished."

"Yes, you explained this to me."

"One of the first places we carved up into legionary settlements in this way was Sicily. The reasoning seemed sound at the time. There were still some insurrectionist local tribes on it back then and it was a fine place for agriculture, with soil able to grow anything. Settling veterans of our armies on it would resolve the former and take advantage of the latter. Or so the intention went."

She looked rueful as she continued.

"But Sicily is an island and it was not even a very developed one back then. It is different now, of course-there is culture, there are proper markets, all the amenities Himeans expect from their cities. But back then, it must have seemed rather an awful, backward place to the first legionaries settled on it. Very few of them were pleased at the prospect of spending their lives there, separated from the rest of what they considered civilisation by the sea. It did not matter that it was a very short trip over the water to reach Fuuka's southern tip. They also thought the tracts of land they had been given, individually, to be very small."

"And were they? Small?"

"Only by comparison to the ones given some other legionaries in what was called Outer Fuuka at the time-but it was a foolish comparison, really. Knowing all we do now and having seen the productivity of both regions over the decades, everyone knows the allocations made by the senators of the past had been just: no soil in Outer Fuuka can compare to that of Sicily for sheer richness. So though the individual parcels of land were smaller, they were also of far higher quality for those given lots in the latter place."

Here Natsuki smiled with understanding.

"They did not see this, naturally," she said, "because they were too busy complaining to try to see it, I am thinking?"

"Precisely. The vast majority of the veterans assigned lots in Sicily never even planted a single harvest-they never saw the astounding potential of the land they had been given by the state. To be fair, that was not purely their fault. There were others of more opportunistic nature who saw what they could not and who contrived to get the veterans off those lands before they got a chance to see the same thing."

"Thus the rise of the great plutocrats and landlords of Sicily," she concluded. "Most of these were Himean themselves, and they saw in Sicily a wonderful opportunity for investment. Their agents quickly flooded the place, persuading the landed veterans to give up their lots for supposedly good bargains-though they say most of the lots were sold for far less their true value-and thus accumulating side-by-side lots until they managed to put together great estates. All for distant landlords based in Hime or Fuuka. So the veterans quit Sicily before they could ever spend sufficient time on it as stable Himean presences and the province fell into the hands of a few estate managers running large properties."

"This means that instead of many individual landholding free citizens, the inhabitants of Sicilian farms became large groups of slaves working for absentee owners instead. To be sure, the same thing is true of many other farms in many other places. Some of my own estates are run with similar arrangements. But Sicily seems to breed unrest among slaves more easily than other provinces, so large groups of slaves can be unwise on its farming properties. Due to its isolation, revolts also tend to pick up speed faster over there by virtue of being easier to ignore for the capital."

"How would one resolve this?" Natsuki pondered. "The troubles of Sicily?"

"Different persons might answer different things. For myself, I see two solutions."

Up came a fist: her thumb stuck out from it.

"First would be to defeat the current slave army and punish its members in a memorable way. The goal is that slaves everywhere would recall the example thereafter and learn to steer clear of revolt."

The index finger came out, the thumb staying as it was.

"Second would be to institute a law ordering Sicilian landlords to have freedmen make up a full fifty percent of all those in their employ, drastically reducing slave numbers on the great estates. The revolts seem isolated to slaves due to the sentiments fuelling them. So, let us reduce the number of slaves that can gather on a single property. This would also create more jobs for actual free citizens, diminishing unemployment. This measure would be hard to pass and enforce, I suspect, given the expense the landlords would have to suffer to implement it. But who cares? To be a Sicilian landlord is to be rich, so they should be able to afford it. They can cry foul all they like provided they foot the bill."

She put down the fist. Her companion nodded slowly, absorbing the solution with the admiration of someone appreciating good sense.

"Which solution do you prefer?" she asked Shizuru, who seemed to frown a little at this.

"Prefer?" the older woman echoed. "The two go hand in hand, Natsuki. I would prefer to implement both, although I would have to see the situation myself in order to be able to better evaluate it, naturally. At the moment, though, only Onishi-han can do that-and I do trust his judgment."

"She said he was... 'no flimsy general'," Natsuki recalled, screwing up her eyes in recollection.

"And I agree with her. But even so, who knows when he shall be able to end this? Too many eventualities exist. He might finish the matter by or before winter, which would be good. Or he might not."

"Which would be bad?"

"Definitely, and not just for him or for Sicily."

Shizuru smiled, but it was shaded with wryness and held little genuine humour in it.

"The reason I am glad for my five-year guarantee of command," she told Natsuki. "Once a politician exits his office, it is possible for someone else to take away any commands he gained during his term. Onishi-han is a political moderate, which means that while he has no great enemies, he also has no rabid supporters, no powerful backing party. And the officials-elect of the new political year, going from the list Chikane sent me, are predominantly conservative. In fact, both consuls-elect are conservative. My, but the scoundrels must have bribed right and left to get elected despite the stink of Takeda Masashi's association."

"Bribe? Will someone not catch them for this?"

"For buying votes?" The Himean laughed softly. "Certainly accusations of it fly every election, but it actually gets by more often than it gets prosecuted."

"And now that they have bought enough votes to win... office? What will they do?"

"Whatever they like, I imagine," Shizuru said, bisected brow lifting. "But as relates to our discussion, I have a strong suspicion that the Traditionalists will conspire to take the Sicilian command off Onishi-han at the first opportunity."

Natsuki looked displeased; she shifted against the pillows supporting her spine.

"And replace him?" she asked. "As they tried to do with you?"

"Yes-but they actually succeeded with me, Natsuki."

There was a scoff.

"No one could replace you, Shizuru," she said. "So they never succeeded."

Shizuru pretended to wince, though her grin peeked through it.

"Oh god, my ego," she said. "Keep it up and it shall grow to be the size of Greece one day."

"What makes you think it can become smaller, Shizuru?"

She pinched the Otomeian's arm and was answered with a slap on her own.

"Anyway! The Traditionalists would try to replace Onishi-han with a conservative consul-commander. I doubt it will come easily to them, especially with the Masashi fiasco so recent, but a consul taking over a command is a different thing entirely from what happened in our case. There is infinitely more justification for it because he is the elected consul, occupying the highest office in our state."

"But if one is consul, why want it?" Natsuki demanded. "There is no glory in fighting slaves. What commander-yes, what consul-would be interested enough in it to take the task from another?"

"One looking to use it as political leverage for something, Natsuki," Shizuru explained. "I imagine one of the consuls might want to use a win in it to demand a victory parade. Putting down slave revolts does not merit a triumph, but it can get an ovation based on precedent. And many a senator too flimsy at strategy to ever hope for the former would be perfectly happy with the latter instead. Are you familiar with the ovation?"

"Yes, I read of it in one of the books you gave me. It is a... lesser kind of triumph, no?"

"Exactly right. Less of a spectacle, true, but still a spectacle where all of Hime shall be celebrating the parading commander's personal glory. That makes it something to remember for the rest of one's life, as well as for one's descendants to boast of long after one's death. One could invoke it too later as a distinguished achievement, if one wishes to run for the consulship again."

She shut her eyes to rest them as she continued speaking.

"As for the Traditionalist cause, a conservative commander's victory in Sicily might become a stepping stone for them-if they can link it to their party, it could lead to further political strengths. Public support would go their way again. Indeed, they seem to be regaining some of their prestige even now. Haruka-han certainly is. Do you remember Urumi-han's remark about liking her better in that letter she sent some time ago? The one acknowledging Armitage-han's and Wang-han's courage in doing their duties in Takeda Masashi's defence panel?"

"Yes," Natsuki said.

"Well, you should understand then that it is possible for certain individuals to escape the taint of their fellows, often by appearing the best of a bad crowd. Even if Armitage was shamed too by the fate of her party's pawn, she still managed to come out of it a little better than the rest of the archconservatives, I think."

Here she started giggling uncontrollably.

"Wuh-wuh-what is funny, Shizuru?" Natsuki asked, looking at her as if she thought the Himean slightly demented. "This is not bad for you? I thought she was your enemy?"

"The most obdurate one in the whole of the Senate," Shizuru agreed, finally managing to control the laughter. "But oh god, one of the most hilarious as well. Come, let me read to you Chikane's latest letter. You may understand then why I am laughing."

Your beloved friend, Haruka Armitage, has been making a hero of herself again, and in that inimitably comic way she has made her own. I mentioned the drought to you in a previous letter. You should not be surprised to learn then that the water supply is lower even here in the city. Many of the aqueducts are still bringing water in, but since it is not as plentiful as it usually is, some arguments over rationing and usage are arising.

Now for whatever reason, Armitage-san has decided to make aqueduct upkeep her great cause this year. Certainly we need it, but why should she of all people tend to it? Some in the Forum are saying it is because she ran out of water in the middle of taking a cold soak in her own frigidarium-but we both know that story is fictional. Armitage-san being herself, no one who knows her could credit her doing something so decadent as to fill her private bath with fresh water in the middle of a drought.

Whatever the case, she began harassing the custodians of the aqueducts, insisting that they take more care with their duties. She started doing her own inspections of the pipes, checking the system for leaks or loose stones, and generally making life a headache for all the water wardens. You know what the woman is like once she has the bit between her teeth; she even demanded to see the records for the citizens' taxed piping.

Now we all know that pipes leading off the aqueducts are only taxed when they lead to private homes-as it should be, for to have water brought directly to one's house is a privilege. It saves one's household a great deal of effort as the slaves need not bring up water daily from the public wells and fountains.

But this generally means that only the rich get water piped straight into their homes: the amount of water needed to run a household daily can be very high indeed, and rises too with the size of the household itself. The bigger the water demand, the bigger the bore of the pipe leading to one's home from the main channels must become... and the bigger the tax collected by the state.

Still, the convenience is sufficient for most of us who can afford it to pay for the privilege. I say "most", since there shall always be misers trying to get something for free. And while we tend to assume that the worst of those misers are often part of the business community, imagine Armitage-san's surprise when she discovered that the biggest transgressor this year was a senator and not even a member of the pedarii. In fact, it was a consular of no less than the august Hida family.

It was Takeshi, uncle to the Atsuko with whom you worked on a case during your year in the courts. You might not know the man-I myself needed to search my memory to recall his year as consul-but it is said he lost most of his fortune after having bought so many votes for the office, as so many end up doing. If it is true we have an explanation for the miserliness in his transgression, people say. Even so, we have little explanation for the excess of it: the only reason Armitage-san noticed him was that he had the audacity to illegally install three of the biggest-bore pipes in the aqueduct and leading to his home!

One can only imagine what he was doing with so much water in his house. All manner of jokes are sprouting in the Forum, from talk of an orchard (as though one could fit into a Himean city lot!) to jests about him planning to renovate his home and turn it into a public bath. At any rate, Armitage-san cared nothing at all to speculate on the topic. All that mattered was that he was cheating the state of its due taxes, and he was getting free water at a time when every drop might mean a grain of wheat.

Armitage-san delivered one of her most powerful speeches to date. She hounded and harangued the House and our senatorial hydro-hoarder by turns. It was rather thrilling to hear, as she did not stop at Hida-san and kept disclosing more transgressors at every opportunity-the poor senators she named were forced to sit there for the entirety of the lecture. The best part, however, was undoubtedly her conclusion.

To understand what makes it so apt, I am compelled to disclose something being bruited about by our peers: that Takeshi Hida has a special fondness for initiating very young boys into matters of the flesh. Nothing too risqué in that, if one were to be hard-nosed about it, if only that were all... but the rumour goes on to say that his fondness is not only for young boys but specifically ones of senatorial blood.

It was a rumour that nearly lost him the race for the consulship, my sources claim. As well it might, considering the conventional distaste for cradle-snatching (despite the regularity with which it really takes place).

At any rate, whether or not the rumour about Hida-san's predilections is true, I cannot and obviously shall not say-and I cannot and shall not say either if Armitage-san knew about it or not. All I can and shall say is that her closing tirade in that day's session had half the House on the floor with laughter.

"And you!" she bellowed to poor Hida-san, rearing up at him like an outraged matron. "You're the worst, you criminal! Stop sticking that pipe of yours where it's not allowed! Go find a place where you can pay for it! How would you feel if someone stuck their pipe in your waterworks without telling you, eh?! What if someone sucked from it and didn't even have the decency to pay?!"

Had I still been consul, I might have granted her a division to test every one of those queries.

Shizuru burst into laughter again, Natsuki trying not to do the same and only succeeding by pressing her knuckles to her mouth.

"Would she?" the Otomeian demanded. "Give it a division?"

Shizuru let the giggles run out before answering.

"Perhaps she might," she said slowly. "Chikane has her share of mischief, despite what some may think."

Chikane's letter was rolled up again and deposited gingerly into the toughened leather cylinder protecting it from the elements.

"I wonder if it is possible to dislike a person yet like them at the same time," Shizuru thought aloud. "Armitage embodies many of the things I dislike in Himean politics-the relentless use of filibuster, the unthinking resistance to change, the opposition of personalities instead of their propositions. Yet one cannot deny that she has her share of courage. Besides, the things she says sometimes make me feel privileged to be able to hear them, all the more as she says them without knowing how others take the words. I very much doubt she understood the double entendre in what said, you know. How could one not like someone so accidentally on-point?"

Natsuki was shaking her head, although it was clear she was still amused from the way the corners of her mouth kept curling.

"That is your impossible humour, Shizuru," she told her lover. "If she is as troublesome as you have said before... and if she were of our people instead... she would have fought more than one duel by now. If she could live through the first."

Again Shizuru laughed.

"I am sure she could. They always said she was a good fighter. I never saw it for myself, though."

"Would you fight her in a duel?"

"I doubt she is that good a fighter, Natsuki."

"How would you know? You said you never saw."

Shizuru knew she was being teased but answered anyway.

"Please," she said with a pride that was only half-contrived. "I would only be in danger if yells could cause mortal injury-although hers do come close to achieving that, I admit. Besides, that midget would have to do a lot of stretching to even come close to touching me."

Natsuki was all agog, asking how Shizuru could have missed telling her before that her nemesis was so tiny.

"Well, no, I was only exaggerating," Shizuru admitted. "Blame the rhetorician in me. She is actually of average height for our women. But as you are so fond of telling me, I am very tall not just for our women but even our men."

"Yes," said Natsuki. "That must make her angry."

"What? The difference in our heights?"

"Yes." She paused. "She will say you always look down on her."

Shizuru blinked.

"Was that a joke, Natsuki?" she asked the Otomeian.

"No," Natsuki said.

But she flushed all the way to her ears so Shizuru knew the answer was really yes .

"Oh, it was very funny, meum mel. Very witty. It really was."

She could have dodged the pillow with her reflexes but decided to let the girl have that, at least. She put it gently to the side afterwards and tried to look contrite.

"Guh-go back to your politics, Shizuru," the still-fuming princess growled, her entire face aflame. "And do not think of sticking a pipe somewhere. The tax will be very high for it."

Thus she squirmed under the covers and turned away from a properly chastised Himean. It was a petty miff, however: forgiven even before the sun arose. It was forgotten too the moment new topics for discussion sprang up between them.

And discussion there always was. There was little else to do in those fall days aside from the usual military routine. Her legates had begun to show their mettle by dealing with their areas of concern and demonstrating their competence-their regular reports pleased her a great deal, as they confirmed that her faith in them, especially the new ones, had not been misplaced. As for her own area of concern and Gorgo, Shizuru preferred to work with a free hand.

Better to let its queen run it much as it used to be run, she told her lover, albeit without the terrors of the old tyranny. She wanted the people to see that Himeans were not the monsters their king made them out to be after all.

As a result of this and the good conduct of the legionaries-Shizuru's centurions kept her boys and girls on a firm leash-the locals gradually came to terms with the foreign army in their city that fall. Their good opinion was helped along by that presence's obvious economic benefits: legionaries on campaign made excellent customers for cooperative towns, so much so that Gorgo's more enterprising merchants got over their fear of the invaders in just a day.

The Himeans were pleased too by their present arrangement. Camp near a thriving city was always more agreeable as it meant they could have access to all the usual civilised amenities: markets, taverns, and-perhaps most importantly-brothels. The Mentulaean whores, male and female, very quickly learned to look forward to the foreigners in the red cloaks, with their friendly ways and generous purses.

It was the Otomeians who continued to intimidate the locals, ironically. It was a little strange, as these were also peoples of the north-but they had long turned their attention northwards and to the east. This meant they and the empire's denizens had seen scant congress before the war.

The Otomeians were a suspiciously taciturn people: they tended to keep to themselves. When they did speak to the citizens of Gorgo, they did it in a less recognisable Himean than the red-cloaks did. They did not seem to enjoy the loud business of bartering and some even appeared to find propositions from prostitutes offensive. They were uniformly tall and blonde and they seemed to insist on always wearing light colours for their garb-although there were a few hundred who gave locals chills, as they seemed to be in perpetual mourning. These particular Otomeians seemed to wear only black whenever they appeared. And to make them even stranger, they also seemed to venerate a very pale if beautiful character whose diabolical familiar made all the locals back away and cringe.

"They think she's a what?" Shizuru asked with a laugh when the queen of the city mentioned it to her as well as the character herself.

"A sorceress, one dealing in animal magics and spirits," Azula answered. "Are you, Princess Natsuki?"

The scowl said everything.

Azula nodded.

"I'll have people spread the word," she said. "Still, it shouldn't be too much of a problem even if they think it."

Thus fall wound down for into winter for Shizuru and her army, and through it most of her concerns shifted from the Mentulaean Empire to her home. By comparison to the north, Hime seemed to still be boiling with overt conflict and frank activity, and as political developments in it were ones Shizuru could touch only faintly from far away, it also seemed to promise more worries for her than her province-in-the-making.

One day, at fall's end, she went seeking her mistress with a scroll-cover in hand. She found the princess in one of the stables used by the auxiliary cavalry.

"I need senators on my payroll," she told Natsuki with a smile. "A letter from Shizuma."

Natsuki looked around: only three grooms were in the stable, it being the lazy afternoon hours when people and animals preferred to retire for a short sleep. She clicked her tongue to catch the grooms' attention and looked to the entryway. They bowed and made a swift exit.

"What is in it?" she asked her commander.

"First, her opinion that the Carsinii seem to be up to something, because they have gone completely quiet following the last battle she fought over one of their towns. She won that battle, naturally."

A smile. "Naturally."

"But she says that since then they have become too quiet for her taste. And the minor leaders-thanes and such-who agreed to sign alliances with her and Hime have been acting strangely as well. Shizuma smells treachery in the wind."

Natsuki's stroking of Aurea paused; green eyes asked the question.

"Oh, she says not to worry and that she has it in hand even if something happens. Besides, we are not that far away. A messenger can get to us from her position in a few days' time. What concerns me more about this news is that if it is indeed true about the ones who signed a treaty with her, we now have indication that the Carsinii do not find it difficult to break contracts of solemn oath. They are among the largest and most influential subdivisions of the Mentulæan people-that does not exactly bode well for our other treaties, does it?"

The princess looked dark: her culture despised oath-breakers as the worst kind of scum.

"That is a thing of shame," she growled, eliciting a smile. Shizuru approached and brushed fingers across the furry collar of the polemarch's dark cloak.

"Yes," the Himean said. "It is shameful to break oaths. But even if it does happen with the Carsinii, I shall have little choice save to hope that it will not with all the others. I want a province that retains the cream of its people, not the skeleton of one that I shall need to repopulate with peoples I bring in from far away. My goal is to have sufficient intelligent local leaders come to our side by showing them how much they have to gain from working with Hime. I can hardly achieve that by refusing to treat with them from now on just because I suspect one rotten seed."

"I have noticed," Natsuki murmured in Greek, "one rotten seed spreads corruption swiftly."

"So cynical at such a young age," Shizuru said in mock-dismay.

"Well, it is not as though there shall be no punishments made to deter traitors to alliances. Consistency and time serve as marvellous tools for enforcing many things. I suppose we shall see what happens when it happens."

Natsuki turned and moved to the stall beside Aurea's. An enormous black snout was already snuffling needily and reaching for her.

"Niger," she whispered, and gave the animal a titbit she had been holding. She looked to Shizuru and spoke again.

"You did not explain," she said. "Why do you need more senators in your - mm, in your pay? And how does it connect to Shizuma's letter?"

"Well, it was Shizuma who drew my attention to it," was Shizuru's answer. "News of yet another victory for the archconservatives: they have managed to win several divisions in a row within the senate against reformist proposals. I shall not bore you with the details. Suffice it to say that they really do seem to be recovering their popularity. So I may need some insurance soon. Shizuma has sent me a list of ambitious young men and women of senatorial blood and depressed finances."

"Ahh. I see."

"Good." She noticed Aurea's golden head coming her way, the animal's odd pale eyes pleading. "May I have some, Natsuki?"

The polemarch offered the pouch from which she had been giving the horses treats and Shizuru picked out one to let Aurea nibble on it.

"She is offering to broker arrangements with them," she told Natsuki, petting the filly's strong neck. "Better if she offers introduction to me first, after all, than having me approach them."

Footsteps approaching from outside made her look to the stable's entrance: it was an Otomeian, judging from the garb and looks of him. He took one look at the polemarch's head-shake, turned around, and walked away.

"We might actually have to let some of the grooms in here to check on the horses eventually, you know," Shizuru said, amused. "Should we move our conversation elsewhere?"

"Soon," Natsuki said, still stroking Niger. His nostrils expanded, trying to get more of her scent. "But not yet."

She did not look away from him as she added: "I do not understand. You say you will buy senators for your security. But the officials of the year... they are not already elected?"

"They are," Shizuru admitted. "But I am thinking of the future. It is still unlikely that they can really do much to hurt my command at the moment-remember the five-year guarantee. You might say I am merely buying several years early."

"Ahh."

"What I do find strange, though," Shizuru frowned, "is that it is my cousin who gave me a list of all the up and coming young senatorials in debt. Considering they are nearer to my age than hers, how does she know this much about them, one wonders? I did see her surrounded by quite a number of them when we were still in Hime, but I thought that only the usual mob of admirers for her, little more."

"It could be it was then?" Natsuki suggested. "Perhaps she is... cultivating them?"

A hungry grin: "I love that word."

Natsuki laughed and accepted the kiss.

"But yes, I think that may be what she is doing. In fact, I think she may be making a little posse of her own. Well, well, my politically apathetic cousin may not be as apathetic as she likes to appear after all."

"Or as ignorant in - ah, things military?" Natsuki supplied.

"She is definitely not ignorant of those things," the commander said with pride in her relative. "Those fools in senate were predicting she would turn out a terrible senior legate. What satisfaction it shall give me to show otherwise in my reports! I daresay many of them shall be green with envy once they hear of all my legates' exploits. It is not just Shizuma, you know-everyone has been doing splendidly!"

Natsuki smiled.

"So we stay here for the winter?" she asked, finally turning away from Niger.

"So it seems, unless something happens to require my presence elsewhere. But for now this place shall do, especially as it is capable of providing the food and supplies we need. Those who talk about war but do not actually play a role in it themselves never realise, I think, that supplies are often what dictates a lot of the prudent general's strategies. We could have pressed on all the way to the northern mountains this autumn... had it not been for the worries over whether or not we would be able to find sufficient grain on the way. And how could I expect the men to fight against a more numerous enemy with empty bellies? Food always comes first, whether in life or war. Spilling blood is secondary."

Natsuki nodded.

"But," she offered, "it may be that this drought lowers supplies too for the enemy."

Shizuru said that was true.

"So all in all, despite the drought, I profess myself fairly satisfied with our winter arrangements," she told her lover while putting an arm around the Otomeian's waist and leading her out of the stables.

"Though I do not mind saying, dear one, that I would give anyone a million sesterces if they could tell me exactly where and what the Prince Calchis was doing!"

Chapter 67

Replace the spaces with full stops et replace the 3 X's with "C-O-M" absent the hyphens.

ethnewinter deviantart XXX/art/I-N-II-Draft-of-Map-N-Campaign-547286150

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala, alae - The singular and plural forms for a cavalry unit. For this story, an ala is set at 500 horse troopers.
2. Boom (Eng.) - A cable used to prevent naval vessels from passing through a portion of water.
3. Denarius, denarii (L.) - The singular and plural terms for one of the more common Ancient Roman coins. Like today's coinage, denarii could (and often did) bear different designs based on the issue.
4. Dioscuri (L.) , dioskouroi (Gk.) - Refers to the twins Castor and Pollux, who were revered by Ancient Romans and Greeks alike.
5. Gemini pro geminis (L.) - "The twins for the twinned."
6. Nausea (L., also Eng.) - English takes this word from Latin, where it originally signified "seasickness".
7. Our Sea (Eng.) - A literal translation of the Latin term for the Mediterranean, "Mare Nostrum".
8. Sagi (L., pl.) - The singular form is "sagum". It is the standard cloak legionaries used for foul weather, described as thick and water-repellent.
9. Tirocinium fori (L.) - a term of apprenticeship at the Roman/Himean legal courts, undertaken by budding politicians.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Prince Calchis passed through the Ruviccan.

This was significant. It was not because the task involved epic effort, nor even epic persistence. It would have required both had his army been any other, for the Ruviccan was no small grove to cross with a mere intention. Beyond its breadth was the other obstacle: its holiness and all that came with it.

This was the most sacred of Mentulaean forests. In it Esus had strolled in the days before men, leaving behind as proof a footprint the size of a hut. Taranis's presence was more current: the god still plucked the woods with his fingers. In this forest an oak could be immolated all of a sudden, entirely sans warning and with cloudless sky. Even those trees' remains betrayed the magic afterwards, their blasted forms the silhouettes of horned man-things reaching for the sun...

Easy to believe the trees were the stag men and the green people. Easy, at least in the Ruviccan. It had preceded the empire in its establishment and flourished alongside it afterwards. The first druids were drawn there, enraptured by the myths already woven into its being. Later the druids also came from it, many of their leading members having established homes in its environs.

From this arose the settlement that would become the centre of druidic influence: Tasgetia, where the first "learned" people of the land congregated. This began as a small community of druids on the Ruviccan side of the River Harene. As the druids had been the specialists of knowledge back then, it took no time for it to turn into a town, and later still into a city of great education.

Though druids now established themselves far and wide, this city remained the seat of the fraternity. Every druid spent some years of his life there as part of his training. He could take instruction on a speciality from various elders living elsewhere. Yet only in Tasgetia could he learn the core knowledge that had always been reserved for him and his like.

The forest had a critical role to play in druidic production. It was a fundamental part of their training to perform ritual incursions into the Ruviccan. There the young druid visited the secret groves and sites of lore. He touched the trees of Taranis and Esus's footprint, and scented the fecundity of Toutatis around him.

Empowering to the druid, who established his connections to the gods in this experience. Hair-raising to the layman, who had learned to avoid the place for fear of being consumed by it. For druidic stewardship of the forest had ensured its unstinted growth, its regular obscuration of tracks with fresh greenery and savage assertion. Getting lost in the Ruviccan was all too easy. Who knew what followed after that?

The young druids themselves only managed to enter and exit with the help of the elders. These men, the foremost druidic minds, knew every path and sacred tree in the forest. No trouble for them to lead a few priestlings through its shaded depths.

Calchis's old tutor, Hiempnos, had once performed such duties for the apprentices. For him to do it with an army was more complex, but certainly not outside of his considerable resources-which included the support of his fellow priests when he sent ahead to tell them what he was doing.

"It may have been a nuisance to us at first," Calchis confided in him. "But now I think the hands of the gods in it. If we had managed to cross the River Holmys, who knows what might've taken place? We might've been caught between two or more of their armies before we'd found our feet on the other side of the river. Instead we get to gather ourselves before meeting them. Even the men's spirits are higher for having passed through the Holy Forest, though they were wary enough of entering initially."

"All to the good," Hiempnos said. "Your men will not make light of their accomplishment, despite having had little trouble in doing it. It enlarges your reputation that you managed to come through the Ruviccan with an entire army. People will be talking, and it will be good."

"They'll know you and the other druids were helping me."

"Not all will think of us as the makers of the achievement. The conclusion is the same-that the gods and their stewards favour the Prince Calchis, who is thus worthiest of this war's command and of the throne."

"We've a ways to go for that yet."

"We will go wherever necessary, My Prince. Are you certain you prefer to camp at Vedio? Tasgetia would be willing to take us for longer than a simple resupply. You know you have the support of all my brothers."

"I don't want to burden you for too long. Besides, Vedio is nearer where I want to go. If I camp the army there, I can't be accused of anything."

Hiempnos harrumphed thoughtfully: "Vedio is nearer the Himean positions than Kereia, where the king is."

"Harder to call me a coward if I'm standing between them and him."

So out of the Ruviccan went Calchis and his army, towards druidic Tasgetia for restocking before heading on to Vedio.

It was in the latter leg of the journey that Calchis parted ways with his troops, although only temporarily. He charged his officers with conveying the men to their target and detached a regiment of riders to accompany him on his detour. His intention was Kereia to the west, where he would have been called later anyway as word spread of his return.

Both Kereia and Vedio were very far into the empire's northwest. This was not the purview of the western warlords, whose territories covered only part of that boundary. Their part was referred to as the "Western Frontier" because it was bordered by a periodically-hostile state: the Kingdom of the Nervii, which abutted the south-western half of the empire's.

The northern half of the western boundary, though, was next to a less contrary neighbour. Celsor was ruled by a young king who had married one of the Mentulaean king's daughters. The Celsorian sovereign was friendly with the empire and occasionally aided it in its military ventures. The only reason he had not joined his father-in-law this time was that his troops were already engaged in conflict with another neighbour. Had they not been committed elsewhere, he would have sent Obsidian more than the five thousand Celsorian swordsmen currently with the latter's army.

So no-one called the northwest of the empire a "frontier" because it did not fit the situation. The word suggested an element of danger lurking just behind a very near line. Not the case for that area, which was more or less secure and reliably loyal.

Prince Calchis, in fact, considered it especially loyal. The lands of Kereia and Vedio were populated by the Mentulaean tribe known as the Ganni. Calchis's mother was a Gannian noble. The prince therefore had no fear of foreigners being in the area without his knowledge. He knew the people and knew he could rely on their fidelity to him.

Yet he was still a product of the court and the dangers it bred. He knew that there were other threats against his person besides foreign armies. Thus he appeared at Kereia garbed like the rest of his escort: in the drab woollens and green cloaks so common to warriors of the Ganni.

He found the city in a lather of concern, though his sister looked untroubled when she appeared. Then again, that was Faris. She could pretend a gale a breeze if it was more politic. It was a happy faculty given the general storminess of royal living.

"Gorgo's loss was bad enough," she told him, pulling off her own disguise as she inspected the room he had rented. It was on the ramshackle side and none too airy, but that suited their purposes.

"Then defection of Firens and its allies," she continued, subsiding into the chair he pulled out for her. "Everyone's biting fingernails.

You heard about this?"

He fell into his seat and pulled a harsh breath.

"How couldn't I?" he demanded. "The druids were gabbling about it in Tasgetia. A terrible business. Word has it they slaughtered half the nobles of the Western Frontier."

"Let's remember the nobles of the Western Frontier have been raring to do that to each other for years. Should I call for food and drink?"

"No-but while that's true, it's a different thing. To think I'd been hoping to rely on them!"

Her eyes showed true but measured sympathy.

"We could have," she said, emphasizing the second word. "The grievances between them and our father would have made them more likely to favour an alternative. But we were too slow on it, I'm afraid. The Himeans must have made them an offer first, and I can imagine how attractive it must have been. What a pity! I know we could have used their armies."

"Yes, we could. But we can't count on those anymore."

"Not for now."

He stared an inquisition, a line asserting itself between his mouth and one cheek.

"Not for now?" he echoed. "You think a time will ever come when it's otherwise?"

"Why shouldn't it?"

"They've slain their neighbours and made a pact with the enemy. No greater betrayal's possible here."

"We may be accused of betrayal in our own way, Brother Dear."

"On more than one count! But we aren't handing over our dominions to foreign rulers, are we?"

"I doubt the Baron Entei will be doing that either. Or should we now call him 'King'?" Her eyes came up and registered the surprise in his. "Oh, I don't know if that's the way the wind is actually blowing. I just think that's what he'd have bargained for with the Himeans, knowing him."

Calchis folded his arms and pulled his big head to his chest. He said nothing for a while, which she allowed comfortably. There was a companionship that did not always demand speech.

A chair creaked: his heft was straining it. He planted his feet on the ground firmly and looked at Faris.

"You're right, damn it," he grunted. "That's what he'd have negotiated, and they'd have agreed. He's a far craftier man than most people think him. A partial kingship-they'd not have promised him all of it. Rule of Firens and nearby territory, probably."

"Exactly what I think."

She tapped the table with her finger and looked at the dust she picked up that way.

"Anyone who betrays an ally once can do it again, I think."

"Of course they can," he said for reply. "But doesn't that just make them cursed unattractive allies to everybody?"

"We'll see. Anyway, it's only an option and may even cease to be that eventually."

He knew that tone. " Tell me ."

"The throne has sent Prince Nagi on more diplomatic duty," she said, her tone mocking. "This time, to the Kingdom of the Nervii."

This produced a change on the masculine face, a new colour and interest breathing life into it. The Prince Calchis was as dark of eye as the Princess Faris: where animation showed in hers as a gleam, however, it broke into a fetching sparkle in his.

"He was sent to spur them into attacking their old foes," he guessed, voice hoarser than usual from excitement. "The western warlords and their fiefs, which have divorced themselves from his authority."

"And his 'protection', or so he puts it."

His laugh hurled across the table and nearly displaced the dust on top of it.

"What a devious old goat!" he guffawed, chair creaking afresh with each convulsion of hilarity. "I wouldn't have thought he still had it in him. Inviting another player into the game! You must admit it's wicked-in the best way possible, I mean."

Her answering laugh let him know exactly how wicked she thought it.

"Father had one of his strokes of inspiration," she mused. "You know he only gets them whenever he feels his position in danger, like some animal instinct. Maybe it's necessary for anyone who would be king of a land such as this? I would admire it if it were more controllable, but I see no evidence of the same genius when his status seems safe to him."

Up shot his eyebrows: "Faris, wait. What did Nagi do to trigger this instinct?"

"That old thing." The pleasant, oddly sincere smile turned to him. "You already know. Nagi's success in retarding Himean action at the start of the war was a little too successful for our sire. I suppose it's been stewing in his mind for some time. He was just slow in acting on it."

"Still, Nagi?" He snorted his opinion of their half-sibling. "That lily couldn't threaten a virgin if you armed him with a phallus at the ready."

"Maybe not, but that part of him isn't what our father fears. He always fears plotters more than soldiers. It's a reflection of how he himself gained the throne. Why do you think the most favoured members of the court aren't related to him? He'd clap all his family members in irons if he thought them capable of plotting successfully."

"I thank the gods he doesn't see how much of a plotter you are then."

"That's exactly how much of a plotter I am, actually," she shot back. "The move is inspired, isn't it? We both know the Nervii will still be nervous about his invitation to attack the empire's Western Frontier. They'll take the deputation hostage as leverage for the future because of it. They'll think it a particularly attractive hostage party, in fact, since one of the members is a son of the king. What they won't know is that the king wouldn't want them to return said son to him. If the war did end with our side winning and father still in power, I think he'd provoke the Nervii just to ensure an execution takes place."

Calchis whistled with grim humour.

"He'll run out of sons at this rate," he quipped.

"I hope not, or he'll go through the daughters next." She waited for him to finish sniggering. "What are your plans, Calchis?"

Calchis felt the beard curling on his jaw and scratched at it. It had added to his disguise, but he was already tired of the way it felt on his skin. I plan to shave, he thought, before giving her the answer she was really seeking.

"It depends. What's the attitude here? Do they want him to meet the foreigners or aren't they worked up enough for that yet?"

"They're definitely worked up enough for it. I told you earlier - no nails left to chew here. And then there's the fact that we've nearly eaten Kereia out because of all the troops. This drought hasn't been forgiving on the crops."

"No, it hasn't. The harvest was thin even where I've been. Luckily that means it's thin too for the Himeans. Will he actually fight them soon, you think?"

"He's been thinking of it. Mind you, I use that appropriately: thinking.
" She looked rueful. "All their successes have been making him pause, along with the winter's onset. I think he thought that the Baron Terrigos at least would triumph against them, even if the others didn't. Before the baron's defeat he was talking about uprooting the army and sacking their bases. Gorgo took the wind out of him. But now that your army's here..."

"He'll want to take over it." Calchis sucked in his lips and blew them out angrily. "I can't give it to him."

"I think it's more like he'll have you accompany his army while still commanding yours, as a subordinate force."

"Either way, I can't do it. It's not just that I don't want to fight again under him. It would be folly to sally out with two of the royal armies in the same field."

He got to his feet, a big and impressive man with big and impressive energy that needed release. In that much at least, he and his sister differed: self-control did not come naturally to him. He paced to a shuttered window on the wall and stopped just short of reaching it.

"We've seen the quality of their leadership these past months," he said quietly. "This commander of theirs is no idiot, is she?"

Faris's expression told him she thought that person very far from it. He strode back but did not sit.

"So she knows how difficult it would be for us to keep both armies together," he concluded. "They're right in our heartlands, they saw the same drought and harvest we did. If their general's half as canny as she's shown herself, she'd just walk her little armies round ours until we ran out of stuff to eat. Never mind fighting. They'd just focus on our supply lines and leave us to starve ourselves with our own stupidity. I don't even know if we could run them down since they march at inhuman speeds. It's beyond belief! The druids said they took an army from Gorgo to Bitur in one day. You've seen our armies in motion, Faris. Could we do the same?"

"No. It's amazing."

"You mean frustrating."

"Also that. So what should we do?"

"Wrest back our rural lands swiftly," he determined. "We need to send the druids out to drum up trouble, especially in the areas the Himeans now count as their territories. I need to raise a fresh levy." A pause, during which there was a flash in his eyes that hinted of inevitability. "We also need to drive the king into facing the enemy."

She wrinkled her forehead.

"I thought you said you couldn't give your army and self to him."

"And I won't, I promise." He pushed a hand through his thickly curling mane. "But I will have to give him a part of it if I'm to avoid getting sent off like Nagi. That's why we'll need a fresh levy, aside from all the troops we've already lost. If anything's been made clear to me in the past months of this war, it's that he's a hopeless war leader. All that time worrying about threats to his crown have dulled the man. Sending his sons and barons and whomever to do all the commanding! It was different when he was the one on the offence. He seemed so vigorous then. But now that he's on defence, he's useless. Look at how much we've lost in territories while he sat here terrorising his council."

The chair creaked again: he was back in it.

"We'll lose the war if he stays in command. You and I will lose everything. Now, when we're so close! That would be the worst way, don't you think?"

"It would be," she agreed soberly.

"We have to get him out of the way now, Faris. And I think I actually know how to make the Himeans do it. They've been doing a lot for our cause this whole war. I think it's time we harnessed their menace for our ends one last time. Once he's gone the war effort will be entirely in my hands. Then we'll finally have the proper leadership for repelling these foreigners."

"But about father. You mean-finally?"

"Yes-finally."

He watched the dark vitality of her gaze reflecting his. He had missed her, he felt, as he did whenever they were parted for a while. One needed a conspirator in this deceitful world of theirs; that was what their mother had taught them.

"How lovely," she said. "I was sick of waiting!"

---

Shizuru thought waiting a perilous activity.

The trouble with invasive operations was that they bred an illness that took time manifesting. It was an itch that started under the skin, turning into a boil and then a carbuncle, growing more purulent under pressure, storing up ever more force until its outbreak. When it finally erupted it was always beyond simple remedy. Yet dealing with it before that required huge skill, lest the act of lancing turn the early boil into a wound of even greater infective quality.

"Annexations of this size drain you even as you win," the Septentrian province's governor-general said to Natsuki. The latter had just asked if she expected trouble from their foes during the winter. "Yes, I am expecting trouble. Not just from the royal armies and allies but from the areas we already 'control'-I use the word with reservation, to be clear."

The polemarch played with one of the coins she had taken from a purse, flipping the circular piece of metal into the air and letting it fall onto her palm.

"This one has two men on chariots," she informed Shizuru. "Who are these men?"

"I think that's the one with the Dioscuri. Let me see."

"Dioskouroi?" Natsuki showed her. "Dioscuri. Hm."

"Yes. They struck a denarius with Dioscuri that year. Astonishing you did not recognise them."

"It is a long time since we met," the other said archly. "But this trouble of yours, Shizuru. It is not really about the poor harvest?"

"It is-oh, is it ever!"

Shizuru sighed, letting her chin fall onto her palm. She had an elbow on the table and assumed a pose of contemplation as she reviewed her problem.

"The accursed drought halved the harvest from here to all sides of Our Sea, Natsuki. The far south and east has fared slightly better- your trade ally Rheia and parts of our own Asia Province-but little good that is to us over here, a whole world away! Besides, whatever food can be spared in those parts is better sent to Fuuka, most especially to Hime. After all... Sicilia."

After all indeed-Sicilia. One of Hime's chief grain sources on Our Sea. The servile revolt it hosted was still raging, the year's hopes of harvest consigned to the flames. Add the widespread drought and a conclusion was clear: much of Hime would go hungry.

The added difficulty the governor of Septentria faced was directly related to her war. It had siphoned able-bodied men and women from many Mentulaean farms into the armies, drafted as offerings from local aristocrats to the cause of the king. Even those who remained had been disrupted in their regular routines. Agricultural activities became harder when armies strode the land and clashed with each other for mastery.

"So there was really nothing else for it but to spread them out further than before," she sighed again.

She referred now to the new winter positions she had assigned her twelve legions. The ever-dwindling amount of grain the buyers brought in had triggered it. Winter had not even set in properly before Shizuru saw the necessity of reorganising.

"I would rather have them in trios or quartets at this stage. You know how understrength my legions are, Natsuki. Alas, that would be insupportable with this grain shortage. Concentrating too many of them in one place would starve them in tandem with the local populace. It is not even a question of money, as we can pay for all we need. The problem is the shortness of the supply itself!"

Natsuki dropped the denarius with the Dioscuri back into the leather purse. She flipped over on the bed and made for the edge.

"Do you want your-"

"No." The Otomeian rose and simply hopped the few steps to the other chair, the purse jangling noisily as she went. She dropped it in front of her lover and got into the free seat. "See."

Shizuru shook her head. "You look like a demented rabbit."

"I like."

"That?"

"Rabbits."

Natsuki was rummaging through the scrolls in a rack next to them. It was one of the many Shizuru's army carried and assembled or disassembled as needed. She reached into its top shelf, which was not segmented into several smaller shelves like the others. The scrolls kept in it were the widest, so they needed the most space.

She put a scroll on the table between them. It was a map of the empire and Shizuru helped her unroll it.

"Show me again," Natsuki demanded. "Where now?"

Shizuru knew exactly what the other was asking. She took up the purse the Otomeian had brought and spilled its contents.

"It always looks better with tokens," she explained, picking up one of the denarii and setting it down on a small square on the map that had been labelled 'Gorgo'. "We are here, of course, with the Ninth and the Eleventh as well as the bulk of the baggage."

The coin she put down was the one with the Dioscuri, and Natsuki seemed amused.

" Gemini pro geminis," she said, eliciting a grin.

"Quite so, mea vita. "

Shizuru still slipped another denarius under the Dioscuri one, though.

"Just to ensure we remember there are two legions here," she winked, plucking yet another coin from the purse. "Then we have Maiza-han and the Fifth, all the way across the Atinu again. They sit on the westernmost tip of Sosia Province."

Down went the coin right of the line representing the River Atinu. To the coin's own right was a square labelled 'Sosia', a thumb and a half away. This was the city itself, where the governor and all the major offices and establishments stood. Though the province and city had the same name-as was the case for Argus-they were not reducible to each other.

"They may be best-fed of us this winter given that they have both the cities Argus and Sosia near them. They may also be sufficiently far east to get whatever grain comes in from further lands."

Then another coin, this time left of the River Atinu and north of a series of contiguous triangles. The triangles were labelled 'Caledonian Alps' and they stretched horizontally over a significant portion of the map.

Shizuru put the coin on a square right above them. The square was titled 'Trogum'.

"Here we have Keigo-han and the Fourteenth." A tap on the coin on Trogum. "A bit distant from the other legions, but with an excellent position for defence. Kenji-han previously held his place in Trogum's citadel for weeks without trouble. Some of our first allies are also not far from there. Asterion itself is just a few days' march away."

"A month's, for everyone not Shizuru Fujino," Natsuki mimicked so convincingly that Shizuru stared.

"That was uncanny!" the latter said. She was pink with enjoyment. "You should do it in front of her."

Natsuki's was pink too-naturally-but her smirk was plain: "She says it so often, Shizuru."

"Along with everyone else in the army, I wager. Speaking of her, though..."

She picked out two denarii, one to set east of the Dioscuri coin; another northeast of it. The second coin covered part of the thick line labelled 'River Holmys'.

"Shizuma is at Lanius with the Third and Zanki-han is north of her with the Eighth, at Heluvio. They can support each other against the Carsinii, as indeed I intended even before the reassignments. These people need to be brought to heel, at least if we want to take away a critical component of the imperial soldiery."

The Carsinii were among the more numerous of the original tribal groups of the empire. Horse warriors and breeders, they were a huge source of cavalry troops for imperial levies. Their nobles ruled the fertile flatlands running from the city of Berentum-where Shizuru had defeated the Baron Terrigos-all the way to a long section of the Holmys near its confluence with the Atinu.

Lanius and Heluvio were two of their key cities. They had only surrendered reluctantly after successive Himean victories cut their areas off from the rest of the extant Mentulaean armies. Their reluctance remained after surrender, even though they had already signed treaties with their new masters.

Shizuru was wary of them, calling them the horse in her stable that had yet to be broken in. It was why she had kept the senior legate and the cavalry-experienced Zanki in their territory. The Otomeian cataphracti and light horse troops were there as well.

She put down another coin, this time at the convergence of the empire's two big rivers.

"Not too far away is our old Atinu base. There sits the Fourth, helping to rebuild Argentum. Miyuki-han has command there."

She picked up more denarii.

"Shohei-han should also be relatively near them by now," she continued. "Here, at Fregum."

A pair of coins went to the square labelled thus, situated west of Heluvio. Like Heluvio, it was positioned beside a line denoting a river. This was a smaller river than the great Holmys, however, and in fact a tributary of it. The Mentulaeans called it the River Dulio, and the town of Fregum controlled a part of this stream.

"Fregum is on the very edge of the Carsinian territories," she pointed out to Natsuki. "Shohei-han can keep an eye on the next territory as well as on them. With him are the Tenth and the Twelfth."

"Two."

"What?"

"Two legions you gave him." Natsuki squinted thoughtfully. "Where do you send him next?"

A puff escaped Shizuru's nose.

"I would be finished if my enemies predicted me that easily," she said. "I would actually like him further northwest than Fregum, but that will have to wait until spring and more grain."

Back to the River Holmys she went, pointing to a square nearly at its headwaters. It was just south of another cluster of triangles. These represented a range, although a smaller one than the Caledonian Alps lower down the map.

"Here is the Mentulaeen city of Arvern. Are you familiar with it?"

Natsuki answered negatively.

"It is a place of smithies," Shizuru said. "Near it are most of the empire's big mines. It is a town grown around an agglomeration of manufactories for metalworking."

"Ah!" the Otomeian breathed. "Armour and weapons. The source?"

"Yes, or one of the main ones anyway."

"We must take it."

Shizuru picked up another coin from her purse, rubbing its face. She knew all too well the figure on it: a winged Victory.

"I would like that, but it is quite far in. Winter forays are hard enough without a grain shortage. We need more information too about the forces near it, one of which is reportedly a full royal army at Vedio. Allegedly the Prince Calchis finally come out of hiding." She eyed the positions of the coins already on the map. "Either way, Shohei-han can be useful where he is. Fregum is not a bad start on that."

The next coin went to a square in the southwest. It was southeast of Massae, the town where the western warlords had executed their defection.

"And as for Seigo-han and the Seventh, they should even now be approaching Xidia, a city of the Roscii."

This was the name for another of the nation's original tribes. They were known for their footsoldiers, unlike the Carsinii.

"The envoys sent to Xidia said they were surrendering peacefully. Seigo-han can settle down with them for the winter and get those people used to us."

Seeing the laugh in the girl's eyes, she hastened to admit the objection.

"I know the man is stuck-up xenophobe, but he shall do nothing too stupid for fear of me. So I trust, as I made it clear that his purpose is to help me build a peaceful province, not a Hime-hating one. At any rate, on the other side of the river north of him are our western friends. He will have help if he needs it. Kenji-han is also with the Sixth and Thirteenth in Firens for the season."

Two stacked coins were placed on the appropriate square to denote Kenji and his troops. It was her finger's length northwest of Xidia.

"There are still a few feudal armies remaining," she said. "Here and here, for instance. But most have already moved back up to join with the two remaining royal armies. This tells us their command is genuinely concentrated there for the moment. A good thing, in a way. What do you think of the rumours that Prince Calchis crossed that sacred forest of theirs, to the northeast? The one they call the Ruviccan?"

The Otomeian seemed mystified by the query.

"Why think if he crossed it?" she asked.

"The locals believe it mystical and claim it has no paths for an army. They say what he did is wondrous."

"With a guide anyone can cross a forest. It is no wonder."

Shizuru chuckled: "Says a forest princess."

"And a mountain princess-you forget it."

"And a mountain princess, and a cavalry princess, and a Fujino princess-or soon, anyway." She suppressed a giggle at the other's cheeks. "At any rate, the prince's feat might cause problems for us in the spring. If they place enough stock in that petty wonder of his more of the locals might get up enough wind to join his army. I do not want them getting more recruits to replace the ones they lost already. I myself need a new levy, given that many of my legions are under four thousand!"

Natsuki smiled at this because she knew their foes would not credit it even if told the figures. It was difficult to believe, especially if you were Mentulaean, that such an outnumbered force could so often win.

"At least they are all blooded now," she said in her native tongue. "This is more important."

Shizuru agreed wholeheartedly.

"But I still need more, my bones tell me," she persisted.

"You sent for them already, no?"

"Yes, I did send Taro-han back home for it. Or back to the more northern parts of Fuuka, at least, since they are nearer. He can drum up enough fresh recruits from there." She scowled all of a sudden. "The Senate shall be certain to give me grief once they learn of it."

Natsuki was confused.

"I thought they said-you have a minimum of ten legions?" she recounted. "When they authorised this war?"

"So they did. But that was when they were still feeling our losses." There was a brief pause to shake off her own sense of loss, far more sincere than the fickle public's and Senate's. "Now that is a distant thing, as they have concerns looming larger in their eyes. Sicilia and its servile revolt, the scarcity of grain and the mutterings of the populace. The nearer concerns always rub out distant ones. They shall say I am depriving the land of its able-bodied."

"Of... soldiers? To fight in Sicilia?"

"Yes, and of farmers too. No matter that the thin harvest is primarily caused by an act of the gods, or that most of the farms are in fact run on slave labour already-to which I have contributed greatly, by the way. They shall try to pin some of the blame on me even so. Besides, I already have twelve legions on the field. More than their stated minimum, is it not?"

The shadow-banked eyes squinted again, the black lashes fluttering so close they shadowed the green behind them.

"But as you say, your legions are so understrength," Natsuki observed. "If not, all your soldiers would make only ten."

Shizuru said this was true: were anyone to reorganise her troops using the standard minimum of men per legion, the legions thus produced would number only ten.

"But the day the Senate allows logic to precede legalese may be the day it crowns a king again," she said.

The Otomeian had an expression Shizuru was tempted to classify as disgust, or perhaps as disbelief.

"How your people became great with such attitudes is beyond me," she said, again in her language.

"Sometimes it is beyond us as well," Shizuru confessed.

She leaned back and crossed her legs.

"There we have it, my spread-out legions. Most of them sitting in what is still largely hostile if currently-subdued land. All of the areas we 'control' are still brimming with problems. Often they are aristocratic loyalists afraid of their status under a Himean government. Others are not-quite-loyalists who just happen to be incurable dissidents. Considering how we are imposing on their meagre stocks of grain at the moment, that dissidence just might boil over soon. Although I wonder if any of them realise it would be so much easier to just seize all the contents of their granaries. It would be my right, technically, as the conqueror of their lands. Instead I requisition only part of their grain and even pay for what I take. Resentment flourishes for the moderate conqueror as it does for the extreme."

Natsuki's large eyes fluttered open.

"Such is war," was her response.

"And such is conquest. It takes time, a lot of time, because true conquest happens in the mind."

Shizuru narrowed her own eyes at the map with denarii.

"The task of my command means that I must take the war beyond the actual battlefield. Beyond the flesh. What we need to finish is the thought of uprising, of a Mentulaeen Empire or people, definitively. That is the true goal, I think, and not actually elimination of all their armies."

Natsuki frowned, although it was not so much in displeasure as in consideration.

"You are saying," she ventured, "we must finish their... their spirit, is it?"

"Oh no, not quite that, for that would be savagery. Their spirit they can keep. But it will need to be a new spirit, one with first allegiance to Hime."

A pause.

"I am saying we must finish their cause, as it currently is. Fighting and defeating their armies - even holding their cities - are only parts of this greater thing."

Natsuki spent a few seconds taking that in.

"How does one accomplish this greater thing?" she asked.

"With time, certainly." Shizuru exhaled and let her chin fall to her palm again. "Among other necessities. I believe we can also make a good start on it by ensuring they have nothing around which to rally. Excepting Firens, which we can use as a buffer between us and the Nervii, there must only be Septentria after this. There must be a province, not an empire. No realm and no kings."

"Difficult," the princess said, "when their king will not even meet us in battle."

"He shall," Shizuru promised. "It is inevitable for his rule, you see."

---

Until then there were other fights that chill season, just as she had thought there would be. The first was begun by Seigo Ushida when he marched the Seventh through the lands of the Roscii. He was on his way to Xidia, which said it was willing and ready to host the legionaries.

It was a mostly uneventful march. Seigo also conducted it with little urgency. If he had his druthers he would have stayed north, for that was where most of the empire's wealth lay. He thought of the empire's mines more than Shizuru did, but that was the difference between a would-be mine owner and an actual one. Oh, for a post near one of the big mining towns to the north of the country! Even Shohei Nagayama's draughty camp at Fregum would suit him better than Xidia.

Still he knew his place and followed the orders he was given. He doubted there would be a complete absence of pickings in the south anyway. Booty was like that: always there to be had in some form or other. Sometimes it just took more effort to find or even recognise it.

Seigo's need for money had been enlarged recently. The eldest of his younger siblings had written that he was commencing his tirocinium fori ; it would not be long before the next one came of age to serve in the army. Then there was his own career, which was on the up now he was attached to this campaign, but still had yet to peak. All of them needed money! They would not get far without it, even with all their good qualities-of which he knew there were many. Their ancestry and looks were at the top of the list.

Lucky that he had been posted previously with the senior legate and among the Carsinii. They were an unruly people, but their villages had held ample loot to confiscate. And with such would-be-rebels as governed them, it had never been difficult to find a pretext for confiscation.

But now his place was Xidia. Not entirely a Nowhere, but in it. Supposedly one of the chief cities of the Roscii, which was why it mattered: the Roscii were the only numerous southern people to have some affection for their imperial rulers. So he was there to show them that the legions were-what, also loveable in their turn? That Hime was both powerful and preferable to the alternative? To display the attractive reasonability of the nation conquering them?

Fine, then. That was doable. He could display reason, he decided. Even if his idea of reason was equivocal, as it was in everyone else.

The first reasonable thing was to actually get there. He had scouts along with the navigators the commander had hired from some Argus-based and firmly-Himean establishment. But when he entered the lands of the Roscii, several horsemen still came to meet him.

"We come from Xidia, General," they said upon introduction. "Our orders are to see you through these lands and safely to the city."

Seigo looked down the length of his sculptural nose at them.

"And why would there be any need," he asked, batting lashes as thick as his general's, "to see us safe? Are we in trouble?"

The riders exchanged glances.

"No, there's no trouble, General," one of them reassured him. "But some of the places around here still owe allegiance to the king. It's best to be on guard and our leaders were worried. We were sent to help you avoid the more dangerous routes on the way."

"I have my own navigators."

"Yes, we see that, General," they persevered. They could see his distrust of them. "But we're still locals and can come in handy. We know this land better than even your scouts."

One of the tribunes in his party leaned over to him.

"They might be right, Ushida-san," he said. "They might know things we don't."

Seigo said nothing, his face empty of feeling. Suddenly a smile came over it, and the smile was a beautiful thing.

"You're right," he said, and nodded at the additions. "You can help us get there faster, you said?"

"We can."

"So show us the way and work with my men."

They thus travelled for some days with the Xidian horsemen. These worked in tandem with the scouts and even gave them helpful advice on their duties. They also agreed unreservedly with the recommendations made by Ushida's navigators. One day, however, they rode far ahead of his scouts and returned dragging them back with difficulty.

"The path we're to take has soldiers hiding near it," they explained when asked what had transpired. "A lot of them, with their own scouts. We only managed to avoid them because these we know these paths better. It's why we dragged your scouts back with us, General-they would have alerted theirs."

Seigo frowned and eyed the faint mist ahead.

"How many?" he demanded.

They said they were uncertain.

"Men in hiding are hard to count," said the Xidians. "But we have other ways to go, General. Around that hill to the east, for instance, is another path. Probio checked it earlier and said it was clear of soldiers. We could just slip past them."

The one named Probio agreed.

"Around that hill, eh?" Seigo murmured, looking from one to the other. Suddenly his lips pulled up at the corners. It was exactly the same smile as the one he had shown the first day, when he finally acquiesced to having them join his party. "You boys really did make yourselves useful in the end."

Later that day he fought an engagement with a band of armed Roscii. He had quietly executed his Xidian guides right before it. That was because he had insisted on sending out his scouts despite their warnings, and thus discovered the scheme.

He had then marched the troops through the path originally intended. They made it through safe-as the army scouts had reported they would-then curved back and towards the hill the Xidians had urged him to round. That was where they found the ambushers and reversed the game.

On reflection later Seigo considered that it might have been better to spare some for questioning. But his legion was the restored Seventh, which had suffered more than its share of anguish from Mentulaeen treachery. He would have been hard-pressed to stop their butchery even had he thought of it at the time. The few ambushers who survived had been quick to slip away in the mist.

Three days later he reached Xidia with his army and summoned the leaders for questioning. They professed ignorance of the ambush and asked to see artefacts from the battle in case they could help identify the double-crossers. Seigo produced some items and they confirmed that these were of the Roscii.

"But this still fails to implicate us, Ushida-san," they pleaded with him. "Though we're also Roscii, all of the gear you stripped from the ambushers is for heavy infantry. There are swords and some heavy pikes here but absolutely no javelins. We Xidians are light footmen and we use the throwing spear. You can even check the town armoury. We've never supplied the king with heavy infantry, only light infantry all these years. In fact, we're celebrated for the quality of our spearmen."

Although that doesn't mean they didn't collaborate with our ambushers, Seigo wrote in his report to the commander. They say some renegades from other Roscian cities may've been in Xidia and picked up word of my coming. They say these might've been the ones who took that information with them and approached some other Roscian leaders eager to do us in.

Maybe, I said. But it's too pat for me. For all we know, these Xidian aristocrats are the very ones who plotted with those other cities. They didn't need to send Xidian troops to participate in that attempt. Even those horsemen claiming to be Xidians may have really been Xidians!

I'd like to teach them a lesson. Still, I wouldn't be comfortable doing something without your permitting it. My suggestion is that we arrest and replace all the city's leaders and aristocrats in office post-haste. That would make a striking example and they'd be sure to remember it.

Reading his letter, Shizuru knew that he also intended to seize the leaders' belongings. He was right in saying there was a possibility that the Xidians had conspired with the other Roscii. Still, there was no proof of it. Absent proof better than suspicion, she could not permit what he recommended.

"I told him that would be likelier to foster enmity than peace," she said after being asked by Natsuki what she had written in response to him. "Instead, I just told him to take hostages from all the likely leaders' families. No one has to die or be disgraced-at least not until we have greater certainty of that person meriting it. Why the fool executed the false guides I cannot imagine. Now he has no one to milk for further information supporting his theory. Mistakes come back with a bite, do they not, Natsuki?"

The younger woman chuckled at this.

"Your legate will be disappointed," she said.

"Let him," was the weary response. "The rascal is fortunate he is good at generalling."

Then something more complex developed in the opposite direction, with Shohei Nagayama at Fregum.

Shohei had camped two legions outside the walls of this riverside settlement. As commerce between him and the Fregans was regular, the gates of his camp and the town were always open. One night, however, the Tenth's watchmen heard a lot of unusual noise in the darkness. At first light, they discovered that all the locals outside the walls had either slunk away or slithered into the city.

And Fregum's gates were shut, for the first time since the legions' arrival.

The duty watchmen did not even pause to debate with each other on what had happened. They sent someone to wake the legate. He materialised within minutes of the call, disgruntled but otherwise alert. One look outside and he ordered the most senior centurion on duty to wake everybody.

Not long after, two heralds came up to shouting distance of the Fregan gates. Thrice they demanded these be opened. The first two times there was no response. The third time, however, the heralds were treated to a small warning volley.

The heralds backed their mounts from the arrows in the ground and rode away. Soon they rode back with a third rider. It was Shohei, who asked the Fregans for an explanation. Finally the Fregans deputed a herald of their own, and they called down an answer.

They feel that we've been deceiving them with our levies of grain, his report to the commander said. Apparently, they suspect our real intention to be to have them starve even as we pretend peace. They say they're close to siege rations anyway with what we're leaving them, so they might as well bear a siege rather than see us take the rest eventually.

You may imagine what I wished I could say to this, but I took the calm approach first. I reminded them of the treaty they signed with us, which bore oaths to their gods as well as ours. I recalled all the conditions in our contract, which included the benefits they were poised to receive as thanks for the alliance. I even reminded them of the fact that I have two legions, whereas they have no army in their walls or immediately within reach. To no effect.

I've already begun investment of the town. Zanki-san said she would send up a little spare grain that she managed to find in her territory. Shizuma-san also offered to send her auxiliary cavalry my way.

I declined the latter. Much of the land around Fregum turns out to be wet meadow and I emphasize the "wet" at the moment. It's so soft right now that cavalry won't be a help. It does explain why the more important Carsinian aristocrats are elsewhere. On the bright side, it also means I won't have to reckon with a relief force for the city. After all, the Carsinii are horsemen and they wouldn't be able to do much good here.

I'll write another letter soon and keep you updated.

So Shizuru was content to let events develop at Fregum without her intervention. When three weeks passed without the town falling, though, she went to Fregum herself.

Her first question to her legate was not actually about the progress of the siege.

"How are the legionaries eating?"

Shohei had expected this. One did not soldier for the woman without learning that she worried more about her soldiers' welfare than for her legates'. Her assumption being, he thought, that legates should be more than capable of caring for themselves.

"They're eating, General, though I'm rationing the grain. We're leaving the salt pork since there's fish. Fortunately, there's a lot of it in the river."

"No legionary likes eating mostly fish too long."

"None of them do." He was sick of it himself. Like the soldiers, he was already hankering for more bread to be put on the menu again. "We're also doing heavy foraging aside from the siegework. The entire Twelfth is out on forage duty this second, and some of the Tenth are fishing over there."

She looked at the group he indicated, which was below them.

Fregum was on a long and gently elevated stretch of land next to the River Dulio, but it was far from occupying the entirety of this plateau. There had been sufficient space for Shohei to build his camp on it, although his was farther from the river. Fregum-or part of its walls, anyway-actually appeared to touch the water, by comparison.

"We're still in good shape, despite it all," Shohei told his commander. "Even if some Carsinii do get it into their heads to relieve the Fregans-which I doubt, as I said in my letter-we shouldn't be in too much trouble. I reinforced the camp, to be on the safe side. It's also high up enough that we've a good view of what's around us, and I've scouts running tight patrols. That's why I've managed to dedicate more of the men to siege and forage operations than usual. Less worry about maintaining a heavy guard."

Shizuru hummed and started to walk.

"Tell me from the start," she ordered.

He followed her and her order. They did a circuit of the plateau's edge nearest the camp, which he knew was because she was checking what defence measures he had put up. She had agreed with him that the Carsinii were unlikely to try to relieve the Fregans. Still, she was a "just-in-case" sort of general. She naturally expected him to be the same.

"Then the Fregans dragged all of their stores inside with them," he said at the end of his account. "The structures, they left behind. We dismantled everything for materiel, but you can still see the tracks and pits where some bigger structures were outside of their walls."

Shizuru approved of how thoroughly the legions had stripped the plateau. Nearly everything aside from the town and the camp had been torn down.

"That is what you used to build those?" she asked.

She was eyeing the big towers he had put up by the river. There were two pairs of them, with a tower on either bank for each pair.

"Do the city's walls run right to the edge?" she added to her enquiry.

"Yes and yes, but not these main walls. These walls-they're pretty thick, by the way-go around the city on that side, well away from where the plateau slopes toward the water. But there are also smaller walls that start from that big wall and go down to the banks. The space bounded by those smaller ones makes a little protected port for their use."

Which explained why he had not infiltrated the city that way. There would be a second, bigger wall to reckon with even if they managed to land a party on the bank enclosed by the smaller walls.

"We built the towers just where the water enters and exits their stretch of riverside," he went on to say. "We manned them with bowmen and ballistae. They've stopped most of their attempts at sending boats out since they first saw the damage those can throw at them."

"Most?" she echoed.

He looked disconsolate.

"It's one of our problems, Fujino-san."

"Just one of them?" she asked, eyes twinkling. Relief filled him at the sight of it. "Take me around so I can see the work on the siege side. Did you ram the gate?"

"Yes, but they broke the rams' heads off with beams. You can see the winches they were using to drop the beams, at the top of those front walls. I would have tried firing the gate, but-well, you see the weather."

Until then both had been ignoring the weak drizzle. The mist-like spray was ice cold, but neither so much as lifted a hand to shield against it. Besides, they were in winter gear and sagi, both of which had seen many a legionary through torrential rains. A winter drizzle was nothing. Or had to be nothing.

Shohei would personally have preferred to get under a roof already, but was obliged to stay out of doors if the general was. He knew she was slightly off-colour because most of her responses thus far had been short, if polite. Now was not the time for him to betray any thoughts of personal comfort.

"Before you tell me about the river," she said. "I hear you summoned captives from Heluvio?"

She had encountered a courier from Zanki, the legate stationed there, while on her way to him.

"Yes, for use in the siege," he said. "We had some captives billeted there and waiting for their slavers. I asked for two hundred of the oldest or weakest ones and had them conveyed here."

"Go on."

"When they arrived, we forced them towards Fregum. Spread the cohorts in an arc around the place. If they got near the towers by the river or near the soldiers, I said, they would be killed. Their only chance to live was to run towards the town and beg the Fregans to grant them safety."

He smiled broadly at her expression, pleased because she was even just a little pleased.

"And did they let them in?" she asked, knowing the answer.

"They were fellow Carsinii-it was hard to say no."

"How sentimental! But how have these added mouths not made Fregum more anxious about its future?"

His smile dripped away with the rivulet of water running down his face.

"They have, but not enough," he admitted.

"Are you certain they are not holding out hope for a rescue party?"

"We can't discount it, Fujino-san, but I have people posted at the likeliest places. We should know if something's coming, and as of yet, I'm confident nothing is."

"Then there is something else from which they derive optimism."

"There is. It's the boats."

"Ah, so we return to the problem of the river."

She stopped and turned to gaze at it. The day was grey and greasy, with just a few scudding wisps of white. As a result, the river was nearly opaque and it looked a very dark blue from where the pair stood.

"Your towers look good," she assessed. "So do the other entrenchments, even from here."

To dissuade the Fregans from crossing the river for escape, Shohei had constructed three more towers on the opposite bank facing the settlement. These were linked to each other by wooden palisades. Similar palisades also linked them to the taller, paired towers Shizuru had eyed earlier. The effect was a long and walled section of riverside that was guarded by artillery- and archer-manned lookouts.

"They do not try to ferry people across with all that over there, I trust?"

"They don't now. Not after the first failed attempts."

She was walking again, this time towards the river, and he took a double-step to make up the space. He was not a small man, but she was taller.

"What they haven't given up on are the boats and whatnot coming in to help them," Shohei explained. "The little fishing boats they use in these parts can still come in at night. The shooting's tougher then, even if we light every torch we have on the towers. Usually the boats are bringing foodstuff, small amounts to supplement what the Fregans have in there. We think they're bringing weapons too, because there's been an increase in the number of bowmen on the walls lately."

He thrust his chin at the river before them.

"The Dulio flows into the Holmys north of here," he said. "Sometimes, the Fregans try to send boats and people there. We shoot arrows and plug them with as many artillery bolts as we can. The boom helps."

He was pointing to a thick cable floating on the water. It was strung between two of the taller towers, which explained why they were in pairs. Shizuru looked to the other pair, the one upriver of Fregum's port, and saw there was no boom there.

All she had to do was lift her eyebrow.

"There was one yesterday, General," he said. "They cut it down last night. Divers."

"I see. It would be hard to shoot those."

"Especially when it's gone dark, or even if only when the weather's cloudy, like it is now. It's one thing to shoot something on top of the water and another to shoot something actually under it. But we'll rig another boom there soon."

He frowned at the boom-less pair of towers.

"Trouble is, even if they don't cut them off, the booms don't do enough," he admitted. "They can't stop the divers, and there seem to be a lot of them willing to go in even in this cold to aid the Fregans. Oh, I hope their balls freeze and drop off in that water!"

Shizuru looked at him. "And if they are women?"

"Well, I suppose their breasts can go then."

"Fitting," she said. "From what you say, I gather some boats make it past the boom. I suppose the smallest ones can be lifted over or slipped under it?"

He affirmed her supposition.

"I hate naval warfare," he confessed.

A smile broke out on her face.

"You never did duty on a naval mission, did you, Shohei-han?"

" Edepol, no, General! Never!"

"Ah-is it nausea ?"

"Something terrible. I can't stand all the bobbing and swaying."

"Bobbing and swaying," she repeated mirthfully. "That seems as good an answer as any, now you mention it."

He turned to look at her, wondering what was going on in that unique mind now. She was looking at the swift waters and still ignoring the rain. Her hair was not plastered to her head but there was already enough wetness for it to be darkened. Even with water rolling down her cheeks she looked perfect.

"Go ahead with the boom," she told him, smoothing her wet fringe back until it vanished. "But before you string it up, bring in the other one too. Then have the length of each cable decorated."

"I... decorated ?"

"Decorated. People always did say I liked pretty things." She turned and made for the camp. Again he took a double-step to catch up. "Let us get out of this rain so I can tell you what decorations I fancy."

She fancied longswords and the blades on the Mentulæan falces, it appeared. She had the soldiers string up dozens and dozens of these on each boom with thick rope, taking them from the piles collected from the enemy dead in past battles and skirmishes. These were combined with the sharp and fire-toughened stakes that the legionaries called stimuli .

By the time the booms were fully ornamented, Shohei knew both the boats and divers were finished.

"All that 'bobbing and swaying' will actually make these more effective," his commander told him. "The current will keep those blades waving enough to be dangerous even for the cautious. No swimmer will dare come near them now-and in this cold and with that current, no diver will dare swim where it is low enough to fully avoid them."

She left shortly after the booms went up, but not before giving him another piece of instruction.

"I want this town taken, Shohei-han, and my boys and girls in it for the winter. I want every Fregan in those walls taken prisoner as an example. They broke their oath in broad daylight and my legions have suffered for it."

She walked him to a map of the town and area.

"As soon as I leave, get the Tenth working on a wall here," she pointed it out to him. "Four metres high, going this way. Work at the double, as though you plan to surround the town in your siege."

He looked at the imaginary lines her finger had ghosted on the parchment, then to her face.

"Only 'as though', Fujino-san?"

"Do it with frenzy enough and they shall surrender before you are four days in," she said to him. "Appearances, Shohei-han-you must appear willing to do anything and everything to win. When they see you going as far as that, they will give in. Then you can occupy the place and take whatever provisions or possessions remain. Time to show these people we take treaties seriously."

She learned later in Gorgo that Fregum surrendered after only two days of vigorous wall-building. Her legate did as instructed and emptied the town of its inhabitants. Unwilling to waste precious resources on their imprisonment, Shizuru sold the Fregans in a single wailing lot to one of the biggest slavers. The town's leaders were not among these, however: suspecting their fates, they had all elected suicide.

Harsh punishment, she told her lover, but just in light of the circumstances. All her work would be jeopardised if she let declared treaty-breakers pass with impunity. Added to which was the fact that Himean treaties were solemn contracts before the deities and spirits. The actions of the Fregans were thus also technically blasphemies. A double-violation had been made and accordingly punished.

Her auditor, who had a way of asking her things others would not, asked such a thing very simply.

"Would you still have sold them all if they had not made a treaty?"

Shizuru considered her lover with fiery eyes.

"No," she admitted. "Only the healthy ones between the ages fifteen and forty-five."

The younger woman hummed and went back to her reading.

"Such is war," she said coolly .

---

Not long after the episode of Fregum Shizuru got word from the senior legate. She had, the woman wrote, won a battle against the Carsinii. The commander rode for Lanius at once and left Gorgo in the care of her legate, Toshi.

"We trounced them. What did you expect?" Shizuma stated when asked of the happenings.

The commander eyed her cousin tiredly. She had ridden very hard to get to Lanius without any delay.

"I was hoping for rather more detail," she said, refusing the wine a servant offered. Her cousin sent the slave away and she demanded: "What manner of missive was that you sent? You only said there had been a big battle with them and you won, 'basically'!"

"It was the basics! Anyway, I thought you would understand what I left unsaid, which was that I was composing a more detailed account to send as soon as it was finished. That one you got was just the one I scribbled after the fighting was done. If you'd waited a little more, you'd have received this soon."

She dropped two very fat scrolls on the table, where they rolled apart from each other. One came towards Shizuru and she stopped it with a touch.

"Why did it take so long to compose these?" she asked more softly, mollified. "Did other events take place that had to be included in the accounts or are your scribes just especially slow at taking dictation?"

The other woman dropped into the chair opposite, still looking supremely sardonic.

"So long? It's only been a few days, Shizuru," she said disgustedly. "I know your obsession with speed, but you take it a touch far. Nothing could have been lost or was lost in the days of writing these. And I know your obsession with thoroughness as well, so I endeavoured to list every detail I could in these missives. That way you could add whatever you thought pertinent to the records you send the Senate."

She let a moment pass before adding: "Although I will admit that my personal scribe is still a little slow, actually."

Some moments passed before Shizuru caught it.

"Ecaster!" she said under her breath. Then more loudly: "I thought you were planning to seduce that girl, not train her to be a secretary."

"Who says I cannot do both?"

"I do. I am still commander of this army." The red eyes regarded her in exasperation. "I honestly do not mind you seducing her, Shizuma. That was the thought from the beginning. But could you not use someone more accustomed to scribework when it comes to taking down your reports or else scribble them yourself? That way you get letters to me faster. You can still do whatever you like with her outside of that, even if it does give you slightly less excuse to call on her company while discharging your duties. But you hardly need her company then, after all-I thought the point was to use her for something simpler."

It was, I thought it was, Shizuma nearly said, but what came from her mouth instead was this: "Very well, if you like. I have been using more than a few others of late with the simplicity you recommend, though."

A split eyebrow lifted: "Not my recommendation, but your habit, in truth."

"More so than usual, is what I was trying to say."

She thought her younger cousin's eyes could sometimes feel like drills in your brain.

"I see," said younger cousin answered. "This is related to what happened with the Carsinii?"

Shizuma bobbed her head.

"We knew of the Carsinii's resistance to our occupation," she reminded, although there was no need for it. "The trouble was that they seemed content to cooperate even as they grumbled, so we lacked chances to put the most truculent down. All keeping their heads low, the canny wretches."

Shizuru agreed and settled herself more comfortably in her seat.

"I remember I told you I suspected them of doing it to buy time," she replied, folding her hands on her lap. "I thought they were just waiting to get enough of their fighters mustered and armed before unleashing their true protest."

"And I agreed with you. I remember."

The question of the Carsinii had been troubling them all winter. Though calm and obliging on the surface, these people had caused the cousins much misgiving. Ghost wagons making tracks at night, conspicuously armament-free cellars and storehouses. Too many furtive glances behind too much acquiescence, horse herds occasionally doubling overnight at the local pastures. Something big was coming-they just did not know when or how big it would have grown by then.

In their previous discussions of it, both had agreed that it would be better for that thing to come sooner. The longer the Carsinii had to prepare, the more troops they would be able to field for a fight. That they were compelled to do it covertly helped, as it slowed down what might have otherwise been a rapid muster. Even so, it was their land and they had potential recruits always close by. By contrast, the Himean legions were not only far from reinforcements but under standard numbers.

This was the predicament Shizuru had assigned her cousin. Not unwisely, it must be said: she was no blind nepotist to judge her relative's abilities above where they were. Shizuma understood this faith in her and appreciated it enough to give the problem all she had. All she had was a lot-and it included an already notorious talent for seducing women.

"I included in my letters the names and positions of all those I took to bed," she said in telling her story. "Although I do think it would be kinder not to mention them explicitly in the official dispatches. Or do you think that necessary as well?"

"Oh, I think we can preserve their anonymity," Shizuru said with a tone of fascination. "So you focused on the wives and lovers of the Carsinii's leaders, you are saying?"

"Or their near female relatives. In some cases, I even went for the local leaders themselves. But that didn't always work out."

"How so?"

"They had to be the ones I wronged, as opposed to their relations or spouses. Thus I had to be sure to cause great offence afterwards to drive them away and into anger. But not all people turn to rage when their hearts are broken that way. Some just - how do you put it - they just become sad, don't they?"

The younger woman let a moment pass.

"Yes," she concurred. "Some just do that."

Shizuma lifted her hands and took the ribbon she was using to tie back her hair. The silvery mass settled on her shoulders like a cape. She combed it with her fingers, then retied it into the queue she had just undone.

"Well, at least it worked fine on the others, I think," she continued, drawling again. "Though it was a little troublesome. I had to sleep with them while concealing weapons. They could have tried to murder me in bed, for all we know."

Out peeked Shizuru's smile: "That would have been an explosive start to their revolt."

"Not one I would have welcomed, thank you very much." The senior legate looked grim, and in her standard legatal armour, Shizuru thought it made it her look very military. "Anyway, wronged women make excellent mouthpieces for denunciation. That much is the same here as it is back home. Opinions of the foreign legate-and by extension, her legions-plummeted faster than Vulcan cast into the sea."

She reached for her cup on the table and took a sip of water.

"When I judged the time right I sent a disguised rider to Heluvio, one of my best men."

"You were afraid the Carsinii would interrupt your courier? Had they ever done so?"

"No, they hadn't, but I wanted to be sure. In the letter I explained my plan to Zanki-san and asked her to march the Eighth on the double and to a location I indicated. Do it the first day of the week coming up, I said. I also asked her to send back as bedraggled a rider as she could after she got my missive. He had to be in military uniform and had to be carrying a note that he would proclaim to any soldier within hearing to be urgent and for the senior legate. The actual contents of the note I cared nothing about - I said she could draw a dirty picture on it if she wished."

A loud chuckle: "I doubt Zanki-han could draw anything dirty even if I ordered it."

"She's frightfully clean, isn't she?" Shizuma made a face. "Little wonder we'd never met until this."

The commander's grin was bright: "A self-arraignment, if ever there were one."

"I was heading you off on it. But seriously, I cannot get over how... principled she is."

"I think what you cannot get over is that you like her despite that."

"It's hard not to. She's principled but somehow not judgmental. Or is it 'honourable'?" Her sometimes-green-sometimes-gold eyes narrowed, but with obvious mirth. "Do you know what she wrote in the note she sent me?"

"Surely not a dirty picture?"

"Surely not. Let me think." She paused to rehearse it in her head before reciting: "'Let me not then die ingloriously and without struggle, but let me first do some great thing that shall be told among men thereafter.'"

Shizuru's grin grew even brighter at this.

"The Iliad," she identified with delight. "How apt. One does find in her the virtues of Hector-but, we pray, none of his fate."

"None of it thus far, as it turned out," the senior legate said in response. "After she sent me that note, I sent the auxiliary cavalry out. I'd already informed them of the plan, so they knew what to do and where to hide and wait."

"Next it was our turn, so I marched out of camp with the Third," she went on. "Helter-skelter we went, as though we were in such a hurry to get somewhere we had forgotten all our discipline. Can you imagine how tempting we must have looked to the rebellious Carsinii, the crests on our helms askew and our formation in apparent disarray? How could they have stood it, goodness me?"

Shizuru laughed at her cousin's lazy sarcasm.

"Going from what you said, they did not."

"No, they truly didn't. The first groups hectored the rear of my column the same day we marched. I ordered the Third to march in a tighter position then, as if frightened. Still they followed in our seeming retreat from Lanius, harassing us all the way. They'd been marshalled together so abruptly, though, that they only ever managed to make short sallies. The rest of them were still catching up to us, so we knew they could hardly supply a coherent attack."

"Soon we made it to the spot I'd marked out for the battle," she said. "There's a tributary of the Holmys a little way up from here. I took the Third there until we had the water on one of our flanks. Then we about-faced and stood ground to face the Carsinii lining up opposite."

Shizuru attempted to fill in the rest: "And when they tried to outflank you by riding for the side not protected by the river, the Otomeian cavalry showed up?"

"Yes, I'd had them behind a nearby ridge." Shizuma smiled in reminiscence, some wayward locks of whitish hair making her look somewhat raffish. "The Carsinii were in such a rush to catch up with us that they never bothered sending out scouts as soon as the first ones saw the Third's tail. The auxiliary cavalry, which they'd thought sent to Heluvio, was a nasty surprise when it appeared out of nowhere."

"Was it a hard battle?"

Shizuma took another sip of water before answering.

"Not at all," she said, and without conceit. "They had no notion that we could possibly be prepared for them. Since they were attacking far earlier than they had planned, they were badly organised. Absolutely no battle plan-the mere sight of the auxiliary threw them into chaos. Then Zanki-san arrived with the Eighth in the last hours of daylight. We rolled them up then, chasing them all the way back here."

"Numbers?"

"The Carsinii fielded four alae of horse and near six thousand foot."

Up went Shizuru's eyebrows. "Good numbers, considering circumstances."

"Very good for winter. Had we waited until spring, there would have been ten times more."

The Carsinii around Lanius would have been able to call on all their kinsmen and fellows in the warmer season, which would indeed have expanded the number of enemy troops drastically. But this latest defeat would make other would-be rebels think twice before orchestrating anything again.

For the near future anyway, the general thought. And a month later-who knows? It depends on so many things. I did tell Natsuki it takes time. At least this means the Carsinii will be lying low for a while. We headed them off before they could work up a good amount of steam.

It pleased her enormously that her cousin should have had such a victory. It had been intelligent and daring and not without Shizuma's brand of rakishness spicing it. It was something that she could write into her dispatches with relish. Such good material for reading out loud, and to such lovers of gossipy stories as the Senate! The senators would learn the quality of the woman they had apostrophised as nothing but an apathetic philanderer fallen by chance into a plum legateship.

Although she did cultivate that opinion herself before this campaign, she shrugged mentally.

"All of it sounds well done, Cousin," she said, before editing herself.

"No, forgive me, that sounded as though I were making light of it, and I am not. I think everything was brilliant, from the way you precipitated their premature attack to the way you ensured its miscarriage. I could not have done better myself."

"The highest praise from a Fujino," the other said in good humour. "But thank you, General. Shan't you ask what I did with the ringleaders?"

"I was about to. How did you catch them?"

"Merely in the course of battle," Shizuma answered. "Of course, we cannot be certain they were the true masterminds of this petty insurrection. Those might have slipped away when the battle turned. They might even have elected not to come. But if an aristocrat or someone considered a town leader is found in a battlefield, one may assume with fair reason that he is part of the command, can one not?"

Shizuru concurred.

"So all of those who could claim such high status among our captives I separated," the senior legate concluded. "I clapped them in chains, charged them with treason for conspiring in armed revolt, and shuffled them off to Miyuki's camp in secret. I would have kept them here until you arrived, but I had no idea when that would happen. It was a risk holding them here for any amount of time. Local feeling, you understand."

"Yes, it was wise to send them off." Shizuru angled her head to one side and shut her eyes. "When they signed those treaties with us they became subjects of a Himean general governing a wartime province-one still being carved out, at that. Exact precedents are thin, but if we go from similar ones I can carry out judgment entirely by myself."

"Shan't you?"

"I could. Or I could hold a formal trial."

The senior legate blinked. Then she cackled the laughter of the incredulous.

"Whatever for?" she cried, striving to negotiate the vertiginous heights of her cousin's odd reason. "You said yourself, this is wartime and an annexation! Military rule operates. There is no need for the usual civilian formalities."

"Perhaps, but I am attempting to build faith in a new state and government," Shizuru replied. "Although you are right-military rule is in operation. It is still too early for such things. Only a thought." A lift of her eyebrows. "Did you interrogate them before they went?"

"Yes, but they were stout rebels all. Refused to say much save to inveigh against our 'foreign oppression'."

"Local oppression being so much more preferable," Shizuru grinned.

"I doubt we could have learned anything too useful from them, anyway, that the battle did not already make clear. The upshot being that we were right in being wary of the Carsinii."

The senior legate paused abruptly and threw an indecipherable look at her cousin.

"You saw the wagons being brought in when you arrived?" came her query.

Shizuru had. These were the huge wagons with very tall sides, capable of carrying great loads and expressly made to be pulled by oxen. Mules could not have moved such wagons when they were at full capacity.

"A welcome sight," she said. She knew what was in them since they were fixtures of army campaigns. "Where did you get the grain, Cousin?"

"From the towns and cities of our captured aristocrats," Shizuma replied. "I levied double the amount of grain from these as indemnity, though I deprived none of their homes or liberty given that there was no way of proving their complicity with their leaders' attack. They may well starve, but at least they are alive to do something about it-forage and beg, for instance. Not fight, fortunately. Fighting takes a full stomach."

Shizuru said that was so and commended the senior legate again for her deft resolution. The next day, riding back to Gorgo with her escort, she mulled over her cousin's reply.

It's all temporary, the silver-haired woman had cautioned. These people still have more fight in them, and all I did was tamp it down until it comes shooting up again. You know who else agrees with me in that respect? The frozen salt lick-Natsuki's cousin. She didn't want to just double the amount of grain we were requisitioning. She was for taking all of it and burning down the towns I punished. In fact, she favours the idea of burning down every settlement in this territory.

Princess Alyssa had suggested to the senior legate that the Carsinii be wiped from future history. If they did not exist they would no longer cause problems, whether by supplying troops to the empire or by assaulting the legions themselves. It was true, Shizuru admitted, that it would be simpler: but it was not necessarily the right approach. There were Carsinii in the area who seemed to genuinely want to work with the invaders. There were even some who had suffered from loyalists for their support of the Himean annexation.

These had to be preserved, as far as Shizuru was concerned. They formed the backbone of the new province she was hoping to build. She was not incapable of denuding a land of its people and introducing new ones as replacements. But that was the last resort for dealing with recalcitrance, not the first.

I'd be stupid not to observe that the Carsinian territories are horselands, Shizuma had said. Or not to observe that the Otomeians are a people who love their horses. Or not to observe too, come to it, that the people next to us and on the other side of the Holmys now have treaties with the Otomeian throne. Do you observe these things as well or do I over-read your lover's cousin, Cousin?

As a matter of fact, Shizuru thought the senior legate read that woman perfectly.

Chapter 68

Vocabulaire:

1. Barca - A town in Lydia, N. Africa. The 'undermining alarm' tactic described by Shizuru is related by the writer Aeneas Tacticus, who alleged its use there.

2. Demetrius - Specifically Demetrius I of the Antigonids, also dubbed Demetrius Poliorcetes ("Demetrius the Besieger"). This title was bestowed on him in recognition of his titanic efforts to take Rhodes by siege. He ultimately failed, but some of his inventions for that venture gained him lasting fame. The best example is his Helepolis, the biggest siege tower in history. Some accounts claim that when the siege of Rhodes was abandoned and the Helepolis left behind, some of the materials taken from its deconstruction were used to erect the Colossus of Rhodes-one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World.

3. Curia (L.) - Specifically the Curia Hostilia, the Senate's headquarters in Ancient Rome.

4. impluvium (L.) (n.) - A sort of cistern that appears as a shallow pool in Ancient Roman domiciles. It was often in the atrium and employed for collection of rainwater (for household usage). While it could have drain holes, these were usually part of the cistern itself instead of located at a distance from it that required a canal.

5. scutum (L.) (n.) - The standard shield for an ancient legionary. As it was made partly of plywood, legionaries were obliged to shield it from moisture/the sun by means of a leather cover. This cover was only used outside of battle or on marches where there was zero expectation of running into an enemy.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

When Shizuru received the next news of interest, it came from an ally's lips instead of a legatal letter.

"Understand that I get this from a druid," Queen Azula-of Firens, no longer the Empire-cautioned her. "It's true the druids have rivalries among their septs, but they're still of one family. The trust I accord a Firensian druid would just barely set him apart from a Gannian one."

She looked a little less careworn these days, Shizuru thought, studying the older woman. Yet Azula now had more duties to worry her than ever before. King Entei's daughter seemed to have found her metier in her new role, which was to rule Gorgo according to Firens's and Hime's interests. Not an easy task and one Shizuru had wondered if the hugely-weary-seeming woman could handle. Now here was the same creature looking more instead of less energised.

"But it still sets him apart?" Shizuru asked.

"It does, despite that." No hesitation. "I don't think I'm merely being captious in putting down the Gannian druids here, but that's for you to judge."

Shizuru asked her to explain.

"The druids of the Ganni dominate the druidic brotherhood. They control all the important shrines in the faith and the Sacred Forest, the Ruviccan, is in their territory."

"Along with the centre of druidic training, Tasgetia. I know."

"The Firensian druids might be hoping to displace the Ganni from that ascendancy," Azula suggested. "Allying themselves with the new regime would make more sense than continuing to cleave to the old empire. My druid-averse husband would be scant help for their aims-his now-likely-heir, Calchis, even less. That prince belongs to the Gannian druids. They raised him, I told you before."

"You did."

"So the imperial side has never been a very cosy one for the druids from our lands. Nowadays, there's also the extreme awkwardness of their origins speaking against them."

"Yes, your secession must have cast a bad light on all Firensians where your husband is concerned."

"Part of our druid's news is that every Firensian in the king's camp was beheaded."

Shizuru winced. "My condolences."

At this two dark brows lifted.

"That's not necessary," Azula assured her. "Only a fool would have stayed within his reach once news of our defection broke. We Firensii don't encourage idiocy, so I wouldn't count those executions as losses for Firens."

Shizuru's mouth quirked at the assessment.

"I understand the context," she prompted, wanting to get on to the other news from the druid who had just ridden into Gorgo.

The queen acquiesced.

"There's a lot of activity on the other side again," the woman offered in preamble. "He claims to have caught it while passing through the towns northwest, where my husband is now quartered. Fresh levies are being called up in that area and at a great rush."

"We have been seeing signs of that ourselves. The king is marching," Shizuru concluded, having expected no less.

"He is-but I have more. Our druid claims to know exactly where the king is going."

"My! The key word in this being 'exactly'?"

" Exactly. "

No point in asking what that exact destination was: the man would doubtless tell her that himself when she interviewed him. What mattered more was whether or not Azula thought it reliable intelligence, so Shizuru asked this instead.

"Yes." A strong response. "But that doesn't mean that's all the information that matters, does it?"

"You think he might know more than he is telling?"

Here Obsidian's wife paused to think on her answer.

"I lean more to him knowing nothing else," was what she eventually decided. "Because if indeed we have someone feeding us information through him, it's likely they gave him no more than what he needed to convey. Whether he knows he conveys it to us for their purposes or does it ignorant of their intent, it would be safer for them. It's what he doesn't know that would matter."

Shizuru thought this good sense and asked to see him herself.

Their informant produced exactly the same answers for the Himean as he had for the queen. Yes, he was Firensian born and bred. Naturally, he thought a Firensian druid far superior to a Gannian one. Yes, he had been journeying home when he saw the king's agents. Of course he had it on good authority the king was going to take his army south very soon, hoping to separate the Himeans and their Firensian friends. Who was the good authority saying this? Another druid, a boyhood friend who had sheltered him during one night of his journey and hidden him from the king's executioners. This old acquaintance was now aide to the present chief of the druidic confraternity. Said chief was attached to the Prince Calchis's personal staff, so intelligence from people near him was generally to be believed.

"The question being," smiled Shizuru's legate, "if we're to be general in believing it."

Shizuru smiled too at this. "You think the idea has no merit, Toshihan?"

"Moving that way would put his army in a pincer! He'd have Firens on one side and us on the other, wouldn't he?"

Her chair creaked as she got up to loom over the map he was facing. A finger tapped on a spot marked as Kereia.

"You assume there are only three players in the game," she told him. "It is not entirely stupid if he leaves a sizeable contingent of his forces around this place, for instance. The same if he can somehow organise simultaneous uprisings in the areas we already control. Then there is the other thing..."

"The other thing?"

"The one lurking just outside our theatre of conflict."

Her finger drifted, scraping over the parchment without a sound. It fell on a spot west of that marked as the Western Frontier.

"We should not discount the possibility that Obsidian is expecting something from the Nervii. Surely they have not failed to notice the war keeping the empire busy. Why they have not chosen to take advantage of it thus far, we cannot know. But if Obsidian does take the route that druid claimed, it might finally rouse their opportunistic instinct."

"The Nervii." Toshi's eyes were wide, as what she pointed out had not occurred to him. "Why didn't I think of it? Have you been waiting for something from them all this time, Fujino-san?"

"More or less. More, now that Firens has defected to us."

It took only a second for him to apprehend the logic behind her suspicion. Now that Firens and presumably most of the Western Frontier's warlords had broken from the empire, the border Nervii could say that the truce between the realms no longer applied to those lands. After all, they were no longer part of the Mentulaean realm defined by the original signatories in that treaty.

"It would only be a matter of time before those people decide to lend Obsidian aid against Firens. In an unofficial capacity, so to speak."

"Yes, I see that," Toshi breathed, still calculating the added difficulties such an eventuality could yield. "And yes, I don't know why I thought he would immediately take all of his army. He could and would easily leave another behind for such a march, wouldn't he? He has two imperial armies up there now, after all. Why would he reduce it to just one?"

"Actually, he might." She cocked her head at him. "I only think he shall not leave another 'imperial army', such as they use the term here."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that he is very likely going to combine the two remaining, then leave a small part of one of them behind. That rear force will look like an afterthought compared to the one he shall be taking, I imagine. Were I he, I would split my forces into more than two forces to give me better coverage. But really, Toshi-han. Can you see that coming from this enemy?"

The pleasant face bloomed into a crinkly smile.

"No, I can't," he admitted. "So if he leaves a force behind, it would be a much littler one."

"I would stake my fortune on it. I daresay he would actually prefer to go without leaving behind anyone at all. But even the self-styled King of Kings cannot always bend reality to his wishes. It is impossible for him to bring his whole force where he goes right now. He could never feed it, you see."

"That's true, despite the claims of fresh levies of food. Still, should we make any moves yet?"

The cut-ruby eyes regarded him curiously.

"Why?" She sounded mildly astonished. "We know not whether this is true or false. Or when he shall march if at all."

He looked sheepish, fresh lines carving into his face as he pulled it into a smile-cum-grimace.

"I just thought you would want to take action now either way, Fujino-san," he explained. "Move to a better location to interrupt him or strike before he gets more men through his levy. Something like that."

Shizuru turned an amused look to him.

"Indeed?" she said. "No, much though I do prefer to act sooner instead of later. As it is, Toshi-han, the King of Kings and I share a weakness. Neither of us can bend reality to our preferences so easily."

He smiled back, privately thinking that she had a knack of compelling reality's flexibility despite what she said.

"There are other, more immediate concerns and objections," she was saying. "For instance, supplies are strained for us too, so there is little enough leeway for gambling."

He conceded that.

"Then there is the fact that our foes are great tortoises. If we send contingents to intercept them now, our assets might have pickled by the time they finally arrive."

That got him to chuckle.

"And finally..." she started.

"Finally?"

"All of this is arrant conjecture." She clapped him on the back with easy affection. "There is no sense in investing ourselves in something still so uncertain, you realise."

His shoulders sagged ever so slightly.

"That's true," he allowed, before casting her a doubtful look from the corner of an eye. "But we're not going to do absolutely nothing, I'm guessing?"

"Careful the Senate's rhetoricians do not hear you, Toshi-han," she teased. "Yes, we can afford just a little something. Send scouts to take up positions along every path from the vicinity of Kereia to the west and the south. Use ones who can blend in and load them with everything they might need for speedy transit in case of emergency. Money, passes where necessary, and two horses always for each man."

"Should I inform any of the other legates?"

"No. The only one who needs to be told right now is Kenji-han in Firens, but I shall do that myself."

He waited but she ventured no more. He took this to mean she was not going to make that particular legate budge from his present location either.

"What I'd like to know is what it's all about," he mused, looking over the map again for the alleged route their enemy would take. "If we believe someone really did put this druid up to it-and I think we both believe that-then who was it and why did they send us that information? Are they people looking to make friends or more enemies looking to gull us?"

She gave him a look that he felt before seeing it. Yet another odd question, the look seemed to say.

"Why should we care about that?" the slightly lilting voice asked. "Their intentions are insignificant because this information is practically insignificant. We already knew of renewed activity over there before this druid arrived. I do not doubt we would have known shortly too once our foe started a march, even had we not been informed of these plans. Was it to warn us or to gull us that our informant was sent, you ask. It matters not because we are neither warned nor gulled. What actions we do take are ones we would have taken presently, even without this specific prompt. Later on this druid's tale may simply be a very minor aid or a very weak deception. A pebble, but not a boulder. Not even a stepping stone."

She smiled at him kindly as he thought on that.

"Never allow things like this to fill your eyes, Toshi-han," she cautioned, stifling a yawn with one hand. "You end up playing into someone else's game if there is indeed someone else. Note things, by all means. But do not overthink them."

She was right that he might be overthinking it, he considered while enforcing the orders she gave. But he also felt that her relaxed attitude was a privilege exclusive to her rare ilk. Another general would be more troubled by the idea of a march cutting him off from two key legions and his allies. Shizuru Fujino, Toshi thought, could and would yawn instead. But that was because Shizuru Fujino's legions were always willing to march and her centurions always there to prepare them for any destination. Her scouts were among the most efficient he had seen and her veteran officers among the most loyal.

Most importantly of all, her mind was a veritable wonder.

These were not things the enemy understood just yet, even if it had begun to suspect the efficiency of the military machine it faced. Many things in the war might have changed were this otherwise. For instance, had the Mentulaeans truly understood the quality of this foe, a certain warrior-prince would not have sent a druid with news to lay at Queen Azula's feet.

Calchis informed the Himeans of his father's march to ensure their readiness for it. That he did not count this as aiding the enemy was because they would not be facing him. He was excluded from his father's march, ordered to command elsewhere with his own troops. These were now only a fraction of what they had been before his reunion with the king. As Shizuru had suggested to her legate, Obsidian would be leaving a small force behind: it was made of the skimpy remainder of Calchis's old army after it had been cannibalised to enlarge his father's.

In spite of this attenuation to his forces, the prince was untroubled at the moment. It was simply part of the plan, which was what mattered, even more than his army. Even the scheme to cut off Firens from Hime was part of the plan Calchis was authoring. Yet everyone in the know—including the king and Calchis—believed that particular idea to be the king's.

Well, the king did for the most part. Calchis believed it not at all, in reality. In spite of that he was the most assiduous in convincing people otherwise and saying the king had thought of it. That he could even do such a thing was thanks to his sister, whose courtly experience had guided him through it.

"The trick is to lead Father into saying at least one handy word each time he speaks," Faris had instructed. "That's all you need. One word you can seize and pretend to take as a hint."

Calchis had asked, "A hint of what?"

"Of his superior intellect's machinations, of course, which he's trying to get you to see. What has to happen is that instead of telling you what he's thinking outright, he's giving you clues to them. You shall be pretending that he's leading you to his thoughts, like a teacher who doesn't want to just spoonfeed his student. Like a father teaching his son, or a master guiding an apprentice. The idea is to voice your thoughts as though they're your interpretations of his hints and then praise him for what he's led you to realise."

"Sounds too contrived for me. A great general he isn't, Faris, but he's not entirely stupid. He'll think me taking him for a turn, like some of the courtiers he just had beheaded last week. He'll be even more suspicious of people right now. The Court's gone topsy-turvy again!"

Faris's smile had borne the complacency of an ironclad presence in the aforementioned council.

"It's true that he may suspect it," had been her response. "But if you do this right, he'll not suspect it as much. Knowing his ego, that'll lead to him suspecting it not at all, eventually. But let's talk first about why you can pull this off, as I see you're worried about it. You know you've spent barely any time as a courtier, Calchis? What time you have spent in Court has been spent mute yet compliant. You're considered a political lightweight in that regard, even if you aren't one militarily. I've contributed to that by regaling whomever I can with anecdotes of your moronic sincerity and obedience to the throne-peppered with the occasional true story of your stupider doings, for verisimilitude's sake."

"Hah! You're saying he'll think me too slow and too unsophisticated to mean much behind it if I'm the one doing this."

"Correct. He doesn't know you as a political entity. None of them do! So be the dunce they despise, Brother, as it's the only way to do this and live through it. He must always be the genius, and you a mere spokesman for the ideas he's producing."

"I'll be shockingly grateful for their production," he had smirked, already knowing what to say.

So when his father said "We will break our foes now", he loudly admired the idea of breaking apart their enemies. Such a move would weaken them and let the empire deal with them separately, he observed, which was something only a man of his father's great intelligence could possibly come up with.

When his father said "Your army will give us the size and numbers", he gasped at the enlightenment of using military bulk wisely. Taking the vast majority of the troops and leaving only a small skeleton behind would give the king the power he needed to overwhelm all before him, even as the smaller force helped protect his rear in case of emergency.

And finally, when his father said "Someone less important shall command the troops to be left", he nearly wept with amazement, prostrating himself before the throne's wisdom and charity. His gratitude knew no bounds for being allowed to serve his king thus, he claimed: there could be no greater glory for him than to protect the king's rear. At the same time, he also professed it more than meet that he should not take part in the southwest march. Said march should rightly reap glory for the king alone, who would command it.

"At least, that's what we want him to think," Calchis told his sister as they held their discussions in yet another dark and close room. "But the truth is, it won't earn him the glory he thinks it will. I'll do everything I can to make sure it doesn't, though I don't need to do a lot at this stage. I'll just withhold my best men from him and send a warning to the Himeans about what he's planning. That way they won't be caught unawares... although I do disbelieve they will given how capable they've proven thus far."

"We can leak information somehow. I'll talk to Hiempnos."

The prince nodded and continued talking.

"Also, talk to all our people here, Faris-find all the Ganni unquestionably loyal to us instead of him. Have them hide away as many of their resources as they can so he can't commandeer them for his baggage train. The same for their fighting fit. Give 'em all bandages and red dye and say they've disabling injuries! Or say there's illness going 'round and have them go about weaving in their tracks. Have them hide their warriors away and claim them dead if they have to, so long as they escape his press-gangs."

"Clever!" she said appreciatively. She knew it was so the Gannian warriors would get saved for his levies once the king had marched away.

"I see what you're planning," she added. "But do you really think it's enough to end him?"

"It's more than enough," Calchis responded with eyes blazing. The enormous energies within his person were tumbling about, all astir. Only the import of secrecy mastered the urge to shout that was welling up within him.

"Yet this stratagem to separate Firens and Hime does make some sense," his sister tried again.

"Of course it does. It's why he went for it. But it's... a conditional sense, Sister, and one he can't fulfil. Were I the one implementing it, it might even lead to victory. But he's the one doing it so he won't do everything that needs to be done for it to go that way."

"I suppose I'm concerned someone else might see that, Calchis."

The princess made a steeple of her hands and contemplated her own objection.

"He'll be commanding some of our oldest, most experienced generals on this march," she elucidated. "Not to mention all of his advisers and the totality of the Court-with my exception, given a timely illness that I can see in my future. Put all those minds together and they might be enough to counteract his failings. They might turn this into something fabulous yet by counselling him into what 'needs to be done', is what I fear."

"They won't, Faris. Trust me."

He bounded over, grabbing the smaller hands and pressing them with resolve. Even in his excitement, though, he was mindful not to crush them because of his strength.

"I know war," he declared hoarsely. "I know war! What's more, I know him even if he doesn't know me. Yes, he could have a chance with the scheme we've dreamt up for him. I admit it. That chance exists. He even has enough forces now to make a good sally with the right movements and decisions. But like I said, he won't realise any of those. He can't because they go against his nature."

He gave her a grin of confidence and she reflected it on instinct. There was an answering confidence in her grin too, yet he could see it was a confidence in him and not in his scheme. He could see her still waiting, unwilling to release her doubt until he gave her reasonable cause to do it.

It was expected; it did not sting him.

She always belonged to Esus, he thought fondly as he looked upon his sibling. Faris belonged to a god with an affinity for air so her mind and spirit ruled her being. Just as he belonged to Taranis, the lord who preferred passion and flame. No wonder they made a good team: air and fire mixed beautifully.

"He won't split up his army because he won't command anything that can't swarm over an enemy. You know this. You know he won't listen to anyone who so much as suggests it because he's also a bully to the bone. Bullies only understand what they want and how to overwhelm others to get it. They're impatient as children drooling over a sticky treat. That's what he thinks he's headed for, Faris. A great, big sticky treat! He thinks he can just waddle along as a result and let the enemy try to bash itself on him. Because he's so sure nothing can take down an army that big. Isn't that just like him? To think all he needs to do is be big!"

They traded smiles, both being familiar with the juvenile side of their sire's character.

"That big army won't last long, even if it does win something. He might get a piece of his treat at first. A battle or two if he's lucky. It won't change the outcome, you see. He's going to get dragged down by his ineptitude and that army's going to trip over itself, which will be the bully's ending."

"If he doesn't manage to run away before someone kills or captures him."

"Aye, there's the beauty of it. They don't even need to kill him, do they? They just need to show him up for the incompetent he is. After which all those still loyal to the empire will look for a better leader on which to pin their hopes for dealing with these invaders."

" Ah . Now I see."

"So what do you think of our chances?"

Her smile said she liked them a great deal.

"Even if we will lose many of the imperial soldiers this way," she cautioned, because that was her role: to caution him. "As well as most of the veteran imperial officers and arms, which is something of a pity. He'll take them along with him, you know, and won't leave you with much when he leaves."

"I don't expect anything else." Calchis broke into hearty laughter. "But I don't care. Let him! That way, all of the forces loyal to him will share his destruction. I want new blood, Faris. You need new blood to make a new empire. There will be new imperial soldiers, so why not new officers? There are hundreds, even thousands of other potential officers around us now. Just as courageous, just as experienced! They work for the nobles instead, for the small aristocrats, for the old feudal powers running their territories under our sanction. We won't run out of men to turn into imperial officers even if that whole army of his ends up dead. I'll build my own army with fresh men, ones levied from the Houses and tribes eager to side with us and ones who'll see me as the first king they've officially belonged to. It will be a better army than the old ones, I promise you... and it will be the one to thrash the Himeans when all this is over finished!"

---

A fortnight after the Firensian druid, reports began of a gigantic army in the northwest. It was supposedly the main imperial one, now rolling out of Kereia and geared up for conflict. Further reports said it was picking its ponderous way south and pointing its snout where the druidic informant had said it would after all.

Shizuru summoned the senior legate and told her everything.

"Do you want the Third?" asked that worthy, snapped to attention by the words "gigantic" and "army".

"No, I need you to retain command of it." Shizuru smiled breezily. "I am summoning the Eighth, Tenth, and Fourteenth already. Actually, I sent for the Fourteenth a while ago. It should be on its way here as we speak."

She took on a pensive look, but far from a troubled one.

"Do you not think Keigo Kurauchi-han has been proving quite capable?" she said suddenly. She was speaking of the legate leading the Fourteenth, whose stoutly Traditionalist brother had not been ashamed to ask Shizuru for a post on behalf of his sibling. "I confess I am a little astonished. He had only decent recommendations besides his brother's, so I did not really expect a lot of him."

"Yes, well. But about Obsidian-you shall go after him?" Shizuma persisted, wondering at her cousin's airy comportment. They were talking about a gigantic army here!

But "Who knows?" was all the answer she got, followed by a commander going off to talk to one of the lesser officers about something trifling. It was an unorthodox dismissal and not altogether polite, not to mention handed out by someone who had once been babysat by the one receiving it. Little wonder the volatile senior legate was near explosion when a touch stalled the blast she was raring to unleash.

"Ave," said the owner of the hand on her arm. "I am pleased to see you again, Shizuma."

Shizuma cursed her weakness for pretty young women, especially ones with sparkling looks of greeting. Against her will her scowl trembled. It finally fell away when two pink lips curved shyly.

Yet her irritation with her cousin was not so easily scotched on the inside, so her first words were less than charming.

"You're all oddly business-as-usual here despite the news." Her tone made it plain that it was an accusation as well as a critique. "Does she realise half your natives have barricaded themselves in their homes and the other half taken to furiously debating whether or not to decamp?"

"Yes."

"Yet still oddly business-as-usual."

"Yes."

Shizuma's back bent afterwards from the force of her sigh.

"You know she thinks I came here at her summons but I really came to see you?" she eventually said to the only person in the room apparently still willing to give her serious attention.

The Otomeian coloured as she had hoped, but did not lose composure.

"I am complimented," Natsuki said. "You will walk with me?"

Shizuma was taken off-guard and showed it. More and more oddities in her cousin's offices today!

"It would be my greatest pleasure," she said, recovering her gallantry.

She took the offered hand, which she knew by now to carry scars aplenty. Conspicuously glossy patches and lines ornamented it in an embossed and chaotic relief. Yet the colour on those disfigurements was the same as on the unmarked skin, which was ice-white and without blemish.

"But shan't they miss you?" she asked. "I know that cur I call cousin shan't miss me!"

"No. Come."

They walked out of the stuffy room and its choking, acidically-paper-scented air. Their exit took them to a colonnaded hall bustling with Himeans and bright with noon sunshine.

The Otomeian guided them through that and many salutes and numerous turns. Shizuma barely recalled their convoluted path afterwards. The route took them to a wide courtyard that was as bright as the hall outside Shizuru's offices. However, unlike that hall, the courtyard was devoid of bustle.

Shizuma took time to survey the place to which her escort had brought her. It was old, to judge by the wear in the floors, which were paved with slate-blue and purplish flagstones. The space was also a perfect square, each side of it the same length. There was a small recess in the centre that repeated the shape and reminded her of a Himean impluvium. She did not think it served the same purpose: canals ran from each corner and into drain holes at the courtyard's edges.

Natsuki stopped their promenade by the recessed area in the middle. Shizuma saw that it held only a shallow and scummy layer of water.

"This," the Otomeian said, which word Shizuma took to encompass the whole square. "Where they held many executions."

Limpid eyes regarded the cistern.

"Beheadings," she expanded.

And that was all.

A darkly amused Shizuma processed the words. That explained the concentration of purplish flagstones by the cistern, which she supposed was where the heads and blood fell after the axe dropped.

Shizuru's senior legate realised that it might explain the emptiness of the place too. Doubtless most of the locals associated it with a dark and headless nightmare.

"Have you been talking to the local executioner?" she asked.

Natsuki said she got her information from the Firensian queen.

"An upper-class local executioner, then," the Himean drawled back.

She ran a hand through spun-silver hair, wondering what had brought them to this place. She liked her cousin's lover-even fancied her quite a bit, to be honest-but the Otomeian was not really a model of comprehensibility. Sometimes she was easy enough to read, but at other times she reached a level of alienness that extended beyond her status as a foreigner. Shizuma for her part doubted she could resolve that without her cousin's help.

She supposed she could try the direct approach first.

"I am complimented too, Natsuki, to use the words you did earlier. This is the first time a girl has ever invited me to a walk that had a destination so grisly. I suppose you brought me here for a reason?"

"Spies."

The Otomeian said the word in a whisper, her natural register aiding the intended secrecy as well as gravity of the revelation.

"She asked that I tell you after you finished," she went on.

"Somewhere safe."

Hard to stop the laugh. "This place is your idea of safe?"

"Hm." A spark of humour. "The beheaded neither speak nor listen."

"True, although it's hardly as though we could behead someone for eavesdropping on us right here."

Shizuma folded her arms and took another survey of what surrounded them. The nearest persons appeared to be slaves carrying jugs a good distance away, likely too far for eavesdropping.

And she and Natsuki had been speaking Greek.

"She thinks Obsidian's spies are listening in on her own command room?" she asked, low-voiced too.

Natsuki asked if she thought it impossible.

"Of course it's possible," was her admission. "I suppose it's true too, in this place more than any other within the empire. Has anything happened to cause her to worry about spies? Aside from that episode of the Firensian druid-informant?"

The other's response was a denial.

"And you?"

"I?"

"Has anything happened to cause you to worry about spies?"

That put a twinkle in the green eyes. "You think me more alert on this than Shizuru?"

"I wouldn't know if I would word it thus," Shizuma admitted, dissecting her own reason. "Why did I say that? I merely imagine you've more experience with those than either of us, having been reared in a monarchy."

Natsuki actually grinned.

"But Hime," she retorted wickedly, "is six hundred monarchies masquerading as none."

"Brutal truth," the Otomeian's lover said later when Shizuma reported the opinion. "Although her choosing not to answer your other question really means she has seen nothing worthy of report. That is more or less how we feel about the spy issue, anyway. Highly probable but nothing so alarming yet that we cannot take easy precaution."

By which she meant having their talk in her private quarters, ostensibly away from prying eyes and ears.

Shizuma observed: "For this discussion you thought it better to be especially safe, evidently."

The other canted her head.

"I did not want anyone in the other camp getting the faintest inkling of what I shall do once I lead several of the legions out of this city."

The senior legate's eyes grew wide.

"So you are going to meet him after all!" Shizuma hissed.

"Yes, but not immediately," was the younger woman's response. "I am not about to oblige them with a direct confrontation from the get-go. I want to head up a bit first and possibly dog his tracks."

The shrewd Hanazono mind came to the fore: "You'll try to seize his supplies."

"Right you are," Shizuru said, winking at her cousin and friend. "If I know my Obsidian by now he shall be trailing a lot of baggage behind him. Getting all or even just part of it would be the idea. And who knows? I think I may take the legions on a romp through Comus too, just to remove another cog in the imperial machine. I hear it's one of the only two foundry towns really able to mass-produce the imperial army's falces. It takes a great deal of workmanship, most people do not realise, to get a piece of steel into the shape and sharpness of a Mentulaean falx."

Her expression changed into one of restrained displeasure.

"If there is a chance we can rid ourselves of those things, I shall take it," she added suddenly. "We may be able to get the upper hand when we hit them with ranged assaults or lock them up so tight they cannot swing the damned things about. It does not change the fact that those weapons often leave worse injuries than their swords when they do make contact. I am tired of seeing my men with shoulders and arms sliced like hams! Our only good fortune is that Hime has faced falces before. Otherwise the scutum would not have been redesigned and we would be seeing more casualties than we do now."

The fairer Himean said that was true, but then moved to warn her of something.

"One of your ideas comes with a share of risk," she submitted.
"You'll be in deep Gannian territory if you go to Comus, Shizuru. Terribly loyal to the imperial powers, our people say."

"I know, but it shall not be all that distant from Firensian territory either. Yes, the Ganni shall be informing Obsidian of our movements as soon as we enter their turf. Or shall they be informing the Prince Calchis instead? Either way, either one of them-he shall never be anything but short of finding us unless I wish it. A big army packs a punch, I grant, but it is a very slow one. What matters it if he knows our position when he shall always be too sluggish to get there in time?"

"What of local resistance?"

"I shall deal with it, although I do not expect anything significant. All our information indicates that he has spent his time dragging new men in to further stiffen his army. Most of the Gannian warriors shall already be within his ranks, I think. Fewer militia forces to think about if so."

"You don't think he'll leave a rearguard force to look after that area?"

Shizuru explained her suspicions about that.

"I can deal with it if ever," she concluded. "I would be more worried about what I am leaving you to, actually. You will only have five legions left to hold our current territory, Cousin"

The senior legate thought about that. She knew that would not be the sum total of her resources. Besides those five now-veteran legions were in fact other forces she could draw on, such as the Otomeian auxiliaries and the militia called up from the provinces of Sosia and Argus.

That noted, she was still a Himean of Himeans-and possibly even more of one than her cousin in one way. To her, victory was still something won by proper Himean legions, helpful though she conceded auxiliaries were.

"We're expecting new recruits any day," she pointed out. "Shouldn't Taro-san be sending up more legionaries now from Outer Fuuka, Shizuru?"

"He sent a legion up already for Miyuki-han's camp. He says he should have another in a few weeks, he wrote to me, and he shall bring that one up himself. I arranged for more artillery to be brought up too. One can never have enough of those, in my opinion."

A pause before she added: "The new legionaries will be raw, of course."

Shizuma had been about to sip from her cup and now put it down with a look of disgust.

"Oh, of course," she echoed with distaste. "Much help those would be, Cousin."

"They can be with time."

"Two legions of raw recruits, for Jupiter's sake!"

"It cannot be helped-you know what is going on over there," Shizuru reminded the other woman. "We should be able to find opportunities for getting them up to speed in the coming months. We all have to start somewhere, do we not?"

As Shizuma knew she would likely be the one blooding these novices, her response was a dirty look. Shizuru smiled in apology and amusement.

"It is not as though you shall be entirely without help," the younger of the cousins ventured. "I imagine Miyuki-han shall do a fine job of drilling them even before you can blood them right."

That was a thought. The senior legate had a vision of five thousand pimply youths fainting on a drill field, a remorseless Miyuki yelling their ears off. How that comforted her!

"Miyuki shall definitely take care of them," she purred, at which her cousin looked amused again.

"Toshi-han also forwarded a letter to me from the King of Caledon," Shizuru disclosed. "I wrote to him advising that he tighten watch over their mountain passes and post some troops on fixed guard near them for the duration of the spring and summer."

Shizuma's eyes cleared, the vision of Miyuki torturing the recruits fading away.

"I see," she told her cousin. "You're worried some of the more adventurous Mentulaeans might get the idea of emulating your march through the massif."

"I do doubt it," the other shrugged. "But better to be safe."

"I agree. The last thing we need is for this war to bleed southwards. He assented?"

"More than that. His letter offered to send a contingent of spearmen over as added auxiliaries. I accepted, of course, although I did advise against sending too many of them."

"Worried about the food?"

"Among other things, although I did ask that they carry their own," Shizuru replied. "It is not as though I cadged those spearmen off him, after all. He offered, so he feeds, is how it goes. No, Cousin, I think my chief reason may be slightly less prosaic, at least in the sense of the prosaic being immediate."

The fire in her eyes banked lower as she spoke her next words.

"Caledon's continued existence was always for our own protection, not so? Their pliancy as allies was a great factor too, but it was really out of defensive self-interest that we pursued an alliance with them in the first place. This area, the Far North, has long been a wild place in Himean imaginations. The people on the other side of the Alps-the Mentulaeans before they all became Mentulaeans-were also constantly embroiled in some manner of tribal or clan conflict. The Caledonian Alps served as a physical barrier against that even back then. The Caledonian Kingdom added a further layer of defence. Both were meant to stop nasty northern powers that might have been otherwise tempted to go traipsing down to our lands."

Shizuma drained her cup as her cousin mused aloud.

"That's so," she said when the younger Himean was done. She was familiar too with the political history of their lands, so none of what her cousin had said was novel. She knew that it was only Shizuru's roundabout method of saying something else.

So she said: "Is your descant on this your way of saying you don't want to siphon too many forces out of Caledon for Hime's sake?"

Shizuru said yes.

"Remember that it also serves as a near source of auxiliary forces," she told Shizuma. "Caledon's auxiliary armies are the closest non-Fuukan ones for Hime. Especially considering the worsening piracy on Our Sea and what we know of the unrest in Asia right now, I would feel better with Caledon's forces staying at home. They can thus be nearer Hime if something comes in over the waters-an insurance policy, just in case."

"I can understand that."

The senior legate put down her goblet and smirked at the distortion of her face on its reflective side.

"You do realise," she jested, "that this talk of keeping the Caledonian barrier still tempts me to think you do not trust me to control our territory in your stead?"

"Well, do not give in to the temptation!" Shizuru laughed, before suddenly sobering. "Though I do have my fears over that, come to it. Not because of you, Shizuma, but because of what you have to do and what little I have to leave you with to do it. You may have the more difficult task between the two of us, in one way. Do you think my uprooting so many of the legions will precipitate movements like the one you narrowly aborted with the Carsinii?"

A tangle of silver hair was smoothed back as Shizuma pondered the question.

"Hard to say," was her answer. "Despite their moments of savagery many of the Mentulaeen tribes are actually sophisticated, especially the Carsinii-sufficiently so to appreciate the reprehensibility of breaking a contract, which is what matters. There's also Fregum, which I think made clear how we view egregious breaches of our treaties."

She pursed her lips and made her conclusion.

"I think not at first, Shizuru. We shall have quiet at first. But later on? And even later on? The odds against peace mount the longer you and Obsidian stay on the field. Obsidian will have to go down quickly if we want no unrest at all."

"True."

"I am not about to wager on us getting unnaturally lucky in that respect, though."

"True again. You will get your own battles before I am finished, I think."

A pause as the two cousins sipped at their cups in silence, considering their respective tasks. It was the younger cousin who broke the silence.

"Can you handle it?" she said, which drew a smirk.

"Is a Himemiya blue-eyed?" Shizuma quipped.

---

It took time to get three legions up to Gorgo, but still less than it would for Mentulaeen troops to do the same. Even the queen asked how long ago Shizuru had summoned them when Shohei showed with the Tenth and Eighth in less than a week. Then soon after that, Keigo Kurauchi led in a very jaunty Fourteenth. These had wintered at the southern citadel of Trogum, a secure place surrounded mainly by allied townships. Owing to this, the men and women of that legion had seen less action of late than the legions of the centre and north.

It was why Shizuru had chosen them in particular for the march she was about to undertake. It was bad generalship not to sate troops so long hungry for battle. The Fourteenth was also one of her original legions from the first northern campaign. In fact, of the four extant legions from then, three would be coming for the march on Obsidian and the lands of the Ganni.

The auxiliary dispositions she settled early with her cousin. She would be taking all of the horsed archers, some of the foot archers, and part of the light infantry. To these she added some of the horsed skirmishers and the entirety of her favourite horse division, the Lupines. As for auxiliary leadership she bequeathed the Princess Alyssa to her cousin along with the remaining auxiliary. She would have done the same with the other Otomeian princess if she could, but said other princess had a very strong preference to the contrary.

They argued the matter for hours until one gave an ultimatum.

"Leave me," threatened the Otomeian, "and I shall marry my cousin."

So that settled Shizuru's defeat nicely. She surrendered on a condition, however, which she supplied with a look that said she was wrestling an impulse to break something.

"Fine, come if you wish. But if an arrow so much as grazes you I shall wed you to your horse, you accursed wretch. One arrow! Do you hear me? You wouldn't be so distant a pair-a mule is half-horse, is it not?"

"Yet it is not a nag," the other uttered defiantly.

This twisted Shizuru on the first days of the march, left her feeling an abrasive mixture of sourness and adoration. That was not how she wanted to feel when she saw that beloved face, but there was no helping it. This was no march on an open road, as it had been when they had headed to Berentum. This was a sally into enemy lands, with myriad enemy forces that were still unknown quantities. It was so unnecessary to take this risk. Only, what choice had she been left?

The stupid girl would have done it. She would have married that woman Shizuma called "The Frozen Salt Lick" in a sophomoric tantrum. She would have abnegated all they together had on a single frustration of her selfishness. The stupid girl. The too-wily, too-stupid girl!

Despite her fury there was a part of her that said this could be a good thing. There had to be such a voice in her, she supposed, else she would never have agreed even with that ultimatum. There was still no safer place than by her side anyway, this voice said to her objections on the danger. There were wounds too on Natsuki that only this could cure, the same voice said further on the topic.

She wondered if the voice was the Creature Martial in her sympathising with another. But why wonder about that-what more did it matter? They were on the march already, she and the stupid girl herself!

"Do not think," she said one evening, draped over the other's body, "that I have forgiven this."

The sigh cooled the side of her neck.

"I know."

Moments after, the elegiac voice appended: "But you will?"

She considered lying, but disliked being so petty.

"I will," she admitted. "Eventually."

It was fortunate there was much generalling to keep her busy. She had to keep the army trudging an evasive course, speeding west and north as the foe dragged its ponderous bulk towards the east and south. Shizuru erred on excess with her scouting parties for this march, intent that she should not blunder into the imperial host at too early a stage. What she intended to find first, as she had told her cousin, was said host's baggage so that the men could eat. Food was the desideratum still.

The Mentulaeans followed standard army practice by having their supplies and noncombatants pull after the soldiers. They were also standard in using oxen for their carts, which carried not only army necessities but also the many trappings required of a royal entourage in transit. There were many such carts with very heavy loads, and there were whole herds of oxen yoked into pulling them.

Oxen are very well equipped for dragging a lot of weight, of course, but not for doing it at speed. Even heavily armoured men will outmarch an ox wagon in a few paces. This meant that the Mentulaean baggage typically fell very far behind of the soldiers. They could be separated by sufficient distance to mean days passed between the army's crossing a marker and the baggage doing the same.

Now what Shizuru was hunting was a prodigious baggage train because it belonged to a prodigious army. It meant two things that she hoped to use to her advantage. First, it would be rolling very far behind the main force given its weight. Second, its guard would likely be either stretched along its length or limited to closely watching just one end of it. She rather doubted Obsidian would leave a full army just for the baggage, even with its importance. Even if he did, she suspected it would be smaller than the five-legion one she carried.

She had the measure of her man and knew he considered himself the most important thing in the army. Never mind the fact that he himself had a vested interest in the army's supplies: what came first and would need the most protection was his person.

That said, she still worked her scouts heavily as she progressed. If she knew anything of war, it was that naught was certain until it had happened.

So the search dragged on, the careful feeling about in the territory in search of an enemy's tail while evading its head. It was not quick given the distance between her force and the enemy's. Shizuru knew it would take weeks before the enemy's baggage came within sight of her scouts, which meant it would be awhile before she could feed her troops Obsidian's hoarded meat and grain. She was also travelling light. No heavy baggage for a Fujino army looking to capitalise on its speed.

She resolved the problem of supplies as most commanders did in times of great urgency. But she sacked only settlements or villages that did not give her army a welcome. Only those few-and these being loyalist lands, they were few-who readily greeted the foreign invaders were spared.

Pickings were meagre from the start. Feeding soldiers on the march was always a challenge in drought-riddled lands. It was even more so when said lands were still chiefly hostile. Then there was the fact that most agricultural activities had been halted by the war. In fact, most of the fields they passed were empty of both crops and dwellers. The latter had evacuated long ago, back when she penetrated the imperial capital and took residence in its vast halls.

While this was a good thing in that it reduced the persons noting and passing word to the foe on her whereabouts, it also meant less food for her army. Shizuru suspected too that Obsidian's levies had already taken a great part of the northwest's stores. So in addition to seizing food from hostiles, the legions were forced to put in a lot of foraging.

It was anything but an easy march, but she had known it would be so. She had been sure too to let the legions know it, even when they had still been in Gorgo.

"I shall not stand here and tell you this march shall be a holiday," she told them in her address before they set out. "The thing is, boys and girls, if we go we will not eat well. We know it for certain. But if we do not go, another thing is certain. We will still not eat well and will be besieged to add to it! That bloated cow our enemy calls an army will eat up everything on the field if we take no action now! It will try to lock us up here or do it to my other legions, your comrades in another city. Licking its lips all the while! Feasting while we starve!"

She had licked her own lips showily and fixed the troops with a predatory smile.

"So it's go or do not go, and neither will be comfortable. I still know which option I prefer. What of you? Which one would you take?"

Thus her legionaries were ready from the start to deal with discomfort. So set were they to take on the challenge that they even downed meals of pure protein with gameness and goodwill.

Her legate-on-loan from the Traditionalist camp (or so her cousin liked to call him between the two of them) observed this with amazement.

"Not a grumble-when others have mutinied for less!" he exclaimed to his fellow legate.

"Fujino-san doesn't invite mutiny," Shohei said.

"Nor even dissent, sometimes," replied Keigo with a weak smile. He was recalling an unpleasant memory: a terrified Katsu Hitagi cringing before the commander in the Curia.

Shohei was a Fujino man to the bone and looked puzzled.

"Why should she, when she's often right?" he asked.

And right she was. It took nearly three weeks from the time they set off, but they found Obsidian's baggage train. Her scouts confirmed its distance from the main force as more than sufficient for her purposes. The size of its guard was also reported to be manageable. The moment she had all she needed, Shizuru pulled a double march to catch up with her target.

She let the horsed skirmishers lead the assault on the train's rear. So large was it-and so poorly organised, in her opinion-that the Otomeian horse had devastated its rearguard by the time the escort at its head got word of the attack. These did not turn back, receiving reports that the ambushing army was no small fry. Instead, they hurried the front and middle part of the caravan forward, trusting that getting them nearer the army would afford better protection. In effect, the rear of the baggage was sacrificed with an alacrity even Shizuru had not expected.

She took the gift, although not as graciously as the escapees hoped. She sent the troopers out to harass the departing train for some time, which task the ever-bloodthirsty Otomeians found delightful. She would not let them follow the baggage all the way, though. She was mindful of the possibility that some of Obsidian's main force might have fallen back enough to take them by surprise. She also refused to leave her legions without horse in relatively open and foreign territory.

This was since they had now passed into what her Firensian allies called "The Greencloaks' Lands". These were avowedly unfriendly.

"It's harder to get information here," Shohei reported after Shizuru called a swift council. "Even our disguised scouts are regarded with suspicion. We'll be working with a shorter range."

"So no idea yet if he left another army here and where it would be?"

"I'm afraid not, General. We'll keep working on it."

She waved her hand: "I know you are doing all you can."

A look over her shoulder as she addressed one of the tribunes.

"Please fetch the primipilus of the Ninth," she asked the woman, who trotted out of the tent. Once the officer was gone, Shizuru continued her brief.

"Anyway, we have what we wanted, so we can cut back on foraging. However, what effort is spared there has to go into caution and speed. Obsidian should have word by now of what we did to his baggage and he shall be very unhappy. He shall also be deciding whether or not to turn back and try to punish us for our effrontery. I personally think he shall not turn around. In front of him is too appealing an opportunity, given that he now knows he can expect fewer enemy forces east if we are here. Even if he does decide to come after us instead, I have no intention to let him see so much as the dust cloud from our column. It is a forced march hereon. Firens is not that far away despite us being among the Ganni, so we have a fallback position we can try to run to in case something happens."

Her glare raked over the officers. Each one strove to look extra-attentive.

"Do not misunderstand me. As I told the legions, this is no holiday. We are in enemy territory and dealing with a gargantuan enemy. We have no idea if there is another nearby and whether or not it poses a problem yet. We are also near enough the boundary with the Kingdom of Celsor to make that Mentulaean ally a threat. Even if our last reports indicate that it is too busy fighting off its own would-be-invader to participate in this conflict, we cannot be certain it shall take no action. No one, and I mean no one, may slack off. If you see a legionary marching with his scutum covered, you may box his ears with my blessing. But bear this in mind-if I see you seeing that and doing nothing, I shall box your ears myself and return you to Hime in profound disgrace. Clear?"

Everyone said it was.

"Where are we heading?" Keigo dared to ask, simultaneously disturbed and thrilled.

"Comus." A quick nod to the tribune who had reappeared, primipilus in tow. "Kenji-han should be closing in on it with the Sixth and Thirteenth as we speak. So as I said, we need to hurry. I am not leaving those legions in a lurch if indeed the Ganni have something to throw their way!"

She faced the centurion just joining their party and acknowledged the crisp salute from the red-haired woman.

"Nao-han, I need you to get to work on the captives."

"What am I looking for?"

"Everything they can give, although I would specifically like to know first if there is yet another imperial army, where it is, and how big it stands."

The centurion's smile sent a shudder through the others, who saw in it more than a touch of eagerness. Despite their misgivings about her methods-and about her enjoyment of them-they all had cause to be thankful later. A carefully-controlled bout of torture managed to produce results. Cross-checking individual captives' disclosures yielded similar responses, so Nao reported that her torture specialists had good confidence in the information. Shizuru informed her officers that there was indeed another imperial army: the king had not fully absorbed his son's forces after all.

"To all appearances, it is a modest force," she continued. "How long it stays that way is anyone's guess. It should be at Vedio, so I have sent scouts to ascertain its whereabouts."

It was Keigo who spoke up again: "And in the meantime?"

"In the meantime we meet Kenji-han. Comus it is."

---

Shizuru had been sending missives to Firens even before her scouts found the enemy baggage. Written in Greek and always tucked into odd hiding places, communications sped to and from her legate despite the prevalence of enemy forces around the areas they traversed. Prior to the assault on the baggage, Shizuru sent another of these communiques. Her disguised courier carried a very tiny and folded-up letter inside a false patch sewn onto a waterskin. It instructed Kenji to march on Comus. That legate had ascertained by then that no major enemy force sat near the foundry city. It was therefore feasible for him and his two legions to try and take it by themselves.

His post being nearer the place and his route less twisted-as Shizuru's was of necessity, given that she was both pursuer and evader-he arrived there before the Gorgo contingent. Accompanying him was a complement of Firensian cavalry ready to war with yet another of their longtime neighbours. There would have been more of them had it not been for some alarming movements across the border in the west, which separated the now-Kingdom of Firens from that of the Nervii.

"It's mostly just skirmishing," the Firensian king said. "But there's the stink of something more about it."

"How so?" asked Shizuru's legate.

"It feels like they're testing us before something more serious. Do you know those pricks and prods armies often give each other right before a full-on engagement? That's what it feels like to me, Legate.

I may be wrong, but my old bones say I'm right and they've seen a lot of war already."

Kenji thanked King Entei and said he was grateful for whatever the man could spare him.

Thence Comus, the foundry city. It was a modest town once, but had grown fat over the years, all thanks to the imperial armies and the way they kept expanding. It went through growth parallel to that of its main customers, its mass even coming to sprawl over its walls and reaching far beyond them. Its borders as a young town were still marked by those barriers, which had grown larger and thicker over the years. However, they not been extended to encompass the new additions to the city. Now many of the foundries actually stood outside of these old defensive structures. They were joined by roads, homes, and the myriad other features of urbanisation.

Unprotected streets and buildings meant easy pickings for an ambushing army. Kenji rushed the Sixth and Thirteenth to Comus and began the assault with nary a preamble. That he did not give the locals a chance to capitulate was because he understood his General. She did not want Comus as a base or as an addition to the list of exemplary converts from the empire. She wanted Comus gone, simple as that, so terms were unnecessary.

Unfortunately, the place's destruction at his hands was not to be. The city was still existent when Shizuru showed up with the other legions and the part of Obsidian's baggage train that she had seized. Kenji had dismembered Comus by then but failed to still its heart, which was still beating. That organ continued to pump with the roaring bellows of the foundries sheltered by the old walls of the city.

What had saved Comus was its own sprawl. While most of it was easily taken by Kenji's assault, its core had more resilience as it was protected by the old town's walling. This central location also had more time to prepare for assault given that all the urban clutter surrounding it served as further defensive barricades. By the time Kenji managed to get the Sixth and Thirteenth to the gates of the city-interior, these had been shut and reinforced with heavy steel. Many of the people inside the walls had already been armed too with weapons of their own making.

"I wish I'd caught them all napping," Kenji related to his commander soon after she arrived. "But as you can see, it would've still been damned tough going. The city extends so far and so thickly from its old walls that the buildings themselves were obstructions to us as we progressed inwards. We had to wade through a lot of other structures before we finally made it to those gates. Many of the locals had shut themselves in by then."

She took a deep breath and searched the walls before them, no doubt seeking a weakness he had not yet discovered. That she would find it eventually he did not doubt. No one could rival her talent for tearing down defences, at least not among the generals he had known. Perhaps it was because of the way she approached it? Most commanders did not enjoy siegecraft and its exercise in willpower and patience. Whereas she revelled in its challenges and treated each siege as an enlivening game.

She'd take the title off Demetrius and bear it with more merit, he thought while watching her work. The problem was that a siege needed time-and he knew they were working on a short schedule. She did not want to stay in Comus long enough to give Obsidian a chance to turn around and catch up, but neither did she want to leave this crucial city unbroken as a symbolic win for the Ganni.

"What is inside?" she asked.

He rattled them off in a list: "Local nobility's houses. Also most of their public structures, governance buildings. Meeting hall. Temple. Storehouses."

He hastened to add something when the last word elicited interest.

"Not all of them, Fujino-san. The city's grown too big from its origins for the storehouses inside to keep all of their food. There were some outside the walls and we took them."

"Good. But it still means they can hold out if it came to a true siege."

Nothing to say to that, so he simply nodded. Then he indicated the ribs of a good-sized foundry, still being stripped down to raw materials by his troops.

"There are foundries inside the walls too," he told her. "Not to mention the warehouse. Well, a number of warehouses, actually, all managed by the same entity. It acts like a common depot, from what we gather, to spare the foundries the trouble of storing as well as delivering big orders. The foundries pay a fee for the service."

"Efficient system. I am guessing this depot also holds the bulk orders for the throne's armies?"

"Falces upon falces in there, our prisoners are saying."

She folded her arms and dropped her eyes in contemplation. Her foot scuffed the ground when she turned to look about them. The track of loose and dark soil her boot left caused him to voice an idea.

"Those walls aren't thin," he said. "But this is good ground for tunnel work. I was thinking of undermining."

Even as she shook her head he knew the objection.

"Too slow and it would not work," she stated with no small certainty. "I talked to your Firensian troopers and they say a lot of the locals hereabouts work the mines in the north and west. They would see it coming and dig countermines the moment you begin."

Undermining was a critical technique for destroying walls in a siege. The besieger dedicated some troops to digging tunnels and setting up pit-props of dry timber within them. Once a tunnel was sufficiently large and extended under the wall the besieger wanted to destroy, the diggers fired the timber props and swiftly got out. The result would be an explosive collapse of the ground above the tunnel and a consequent collapse of the wall on that ground. Done right, it was hugely effective. But it could also be easily thwarted, especially if the defenders knew someone was digging.

One way was for the defenders to do their own excavation. The hope was for their tunnel to touch the besiegers' enough for them to try several things, from smoking the enemy tunnel to causing a premature cave-in. Sometimes, defenders even sent armed men down to kill the diggers from the enemy.

Shizuru had seen such things happen, also against towns with a lot of mine workers in the populace. These were not only experienced enough to start countermines quickly but sometimes had ingenious ways of detecting when mining took place. She recalled a famous instance from faraway Barca where locals thwarted underminers by placing shields on the earth. The bronze on the shields had vibrated whenever there was tunnelling in the vicinity.

"The wrong enemy for it," she said in a soft voice, seeming to him very far away. "And besides, we just do not have the time, do we?"

It came back to that, he thought ruefully, feeling this failure keenly because he saw it as his. Perhaps Comus would survive after all, even if only as a core without its limbs. How the Ganni would gloat about it!

"Ah!"

The exclamation brought him out of his misery. She was bending over to pick up something, which she showed to him.

"I cannot be certain from this distance," she said. "But their walls look to be made of stone similar to this."

He frowned as he eyed it.

"It is the same stone," he told her. "Much bigger blocks up on the walls, of course, but exactly the same otherwise."

She turned the rubble around and around her fingers.

"You are certain it is the same?" she asked.

Her voice told him this was very important. He gave his answer with assurance.

"I promise you it's the same, General."

"Then let us have a little experimentation," she said to that, dropping the sharp rock onto the ground again. "I suppose you also tried ramming?"

A twist of his mouth said yes.

"There's a problem with that too," he said. "For one, we can only attack the walls. The area in front of the gates is liked a death trap right now, especially with those two towers they have over it. I don't put it past them to have heaped up iron beams and whatnot behind those gates either. They've materials enough for it in there, I'm afraid."

She urged him to continue.

"Now while we can attack the walls instead, there's still an issue," he said. "One, they're thick. Very old but thick, and made of large blocks that've been cut and mortared together properly. Granted, the age helps us, as it means some of the joins between blocks have been weathered and weakened over the years. Still, hitting them won't do much good unless we aim for the mortar and keep it up for some time. But as you said-

"We have no time. Quite so. Keep going."

"Defenders aren't shy about fighting back either, probably because they have a surfeit of weaponry all stocked up in there. We've had caltrops, spears, fire, and even molten metal and red-hot pieces of it thrown onto siege engines we bring near them. Iron sheets helped with the first three. Not the last ones. Horrid! The red-hot pebbles-they're usually bits of lead-are the worst. A handful eats through iron and even armour like a flame goes through paper. It doesn't stop there either. Just keeps going. Those poor men-

He blenched at the memory. She waited as he fought down his gorge, saying nothing.

"It's why our siege tower didn't work too well either," he went on later, still unable to forget the screams of the legionaries as the bits of hot metal sank into their skin. Deeper still, into the muscle, and even into the bone, where the evil things kept glowing. The way the flesh hissed! Who could forget that? Who could live through it?

"Getting it close wasn't the problem. Using it once it got there was. Aside from the molten metal they seem to have a huge store of incendiary material and pitch in there. Probably because it's a foundry town."

She looked up at the sky with her fine brows slanted. There were black spires rising from within the walls, no doubt signalling the defenders' ability to cast more bits of hot lead onto their attackers.

"So the tower burned," she guessed, which he affirmed. "And I suppose all the previous rams you made are gone too, then."

"Yes, though we could make more easily." He ran a hand through his ginger hair and gave her a wry smile. "The only good thing about seizing foundry towns is that you get a ton of iron to work with as long as you seize at least one foundry. We have enough sheets of iron to roof a dozen ram sheds if you wanted them. Even two dozen, easy."

"Good. Make them."

His jaw went slack. It stretched out his already lean and somewhat wolfish face, giving him the look of a man both astonished and hungry.

"Two dozen?" he repeated dumbly.

"Leave me two without iron roofs. Use only wood on those. Thick wood, of course, but dry. And capable of holding a fire. Not stuff that burns out too fast. In fact, find a way to fit chopped firewood inside. I want a lot of loose fuel that they can heap up."

The wolf's face grew even more astonished, became hungrier at this.

"You want those to burn?" he asked in bewilderment.

"Very much so," she told him. "Get on it now. Whom did you assign to sort through the stores seized here?"

"One of the tribunes, Hayao-I'll send him to you."

"Good," she said again. A wide smile came from out of the blue and was bestowed on him. "You did well, Kenji-han. Most of Comus's foundries have been destroyed, and the few remaining in those walls will not be able to produce nearly as many falces as before. Even if what I have in mind does not succeed, we can afford to let Comus survive as it is. You have taken away most of its value to the enemy already."

The long face looked its gratitude to her, yet the discomfort remained in the rangy body's movements.

"Maybe it would've been better if I had sent a party first to infiltrate it," he proposed, still trying to correct what he saw as his error.

She shook her head at his persistent self-critique, her eyes warm as they regarded him.

"Maybe," she said. "And maybe not. Either way, you have already done most of the work, as I said, so be of good cheer! I count this a victory. Now let us see if I can do any better before we leave this place."

She put a hand on his shoulder and led him away. Suddenly her smile brightened, something very close to mischief in it.

"Honestly, I have no idea if this will work at all," she said in a confidential tone. "But it seems a shame not to try it. How my girl shall enjoy this if it turns out right, though!"

The polemarch seemed to enjoy it even before that, as it happened. She followed the operations with red cheeks and an indelible smirk on her mouth. Both told Shizuru's puzzled officers that the Otomeian at least knew what the commander was trying and was wildly entertained. Not that any of them shirked their jobs for their own ignorance of their commander's plan. They did all Shizuru required, even if they had no idea what was playing about her head.

It took but a day for them to build all the rams she wanted and put together everything else she said they would need. However, it was already too late by that time to do anything but put inside camp for a good night's rest. Their commander said they deserved it.

---

They began with the morning.

It commenced with a quartet of rams sent to strike at a part of the wall. Two went ahead of the others, which appeared to move more slowly in the advance. The pair in the lead was conspicuously devoid of sheet-iron roofing but quite fast. They even sped up on the last few metres, so much so that their operators smashed the sheds into the wall in their enthusiasm. They did not bother pulling them back once there. They simply began working the rams against the old stonework, a noisy tattoo flagging the start of the battle.

The defenders were not slothful in their tasks. As Kenji had said they would, they mounted the battlements over the attacked section even before the rams struck the wall. Then they cast pitch and torches on the two already-working ram sheds, choosing not to bother with molten lead when they saw the naked wood roofing. The moment the defenders' bombardment took place, the battery from the engaged rams seemed to weaken. It became progressively more anaemic, until at last they ceased to swing entirely. In spite of that no operators came running out of the sheds, which had begun to smoke already.

Still more pitch and torches were cast. Soon both sheds' roofs were aflame right next to the wall. Still no operators had exited their confines despite it, yet no fresh battery had been delivered by the rams. The perplexed defenders were on the verge of calling for the bits of hot lead from their comrades when a great roar hit them, followed closely by a billow of heat. An eyebrow-singing conflagration licked up against the wall and the sheds burst into a terrible flame.

The defenders of Comus had to shelter behind their battlements to avoid being seared. When they looked over the wall again they saw several sooty legionaries running in the opposite direction. The two rams' operators, it seemed, had finally been ejected by the blaze.

The slightly-burned legionaries escaped to the safety of the two laggards in the original quartet of siege machines. This pair of sheds had apparently stopped moving and now sat out of reach of the defenders' firebrands. It was clear that the ones driving these sheds thought better of their venture after their precursors' spectacular failures. They hesitated, creaked, then turned back instead of pressing on.

The people on the walls raised a cheer, casting many a gibe on the retreat.

Comus had little time to bask in the small victory. More rams and a stunning array of siege engines were suddenly drawing up in front of the gates. As the rams approached the siege engines began fire, their intent clearly to prevent the defenders from venturing out from behind the parapets. Some of the first volleys from the little catapults were off, but Himean ballista-shooters were trained into expertise: they found their range in no time. Soon the bolts were picking off defenders as fast as the shooters could load them, giving the rams time to do some damage before the lobbed pitch and smouldering "pebbles" forced the rammers to abandon their work.

To the defenders and even many besiegers that day, the action at the gate was a maelstrom. Yet the commander of one side noted that war often only appeared to be chaos when the observer was in the thick of it.

"Participants experience fractured pieces of the whole, which is the norm for all events, to be sure," Shizuru told her princess as they watched from a distance. "The trouble is that all of them assume their piece central even if it is not. It leads to some constructing the totality around an insignificant fragment. One man's wound became the centre of the event, another's close call the turning point of the action. It leads to distortion of the greater picture and that means distortion of the pattern. In warcraft, one must always be alert to the pattern. Do you think the defenders of Comus see it now?"

The other took time to observe the fray some more moments before giving her response.

"No," she said. "I think not."

"It is what happens when there is no one truly functioning as the leader," Shizuru concluded, watching the same thing with interest. "It tends to happen most often in civilian-led actions, such as the one you see now. Lack of authoritative structure. No one is high up enough to see the motif in the maze."

This was true, for while the defenders were long on bravery and resourcefulness, they were short on military leadership. Most of the soldiers who lived in Comus had already been called up for the army when Kenji arrived. Nearly all the defenders the Himeans were now fighting were either civilians or merchantmen.

So when the flamboyant assault on the gates got under way, it blinded them to the possibility of grave assaults elsewhere and wrapped in less recognisable skins. So desperate had the unceasing volleys of the ballistae looked that even the ones masterminding the defence eventually sacrificed supervision for involvement.

There were thus few to notice that the rams at the gates always came in trios or quartets with at least one playing a slug. The leading machines would be the ones doing an attack and the men from the attacking machines were quick to exit their sheds once the hot lead came out. These men were always ready to flee under artillery cover and into the one shed hanging back. As this shed retreated to carry the men to safety, another set would advance, and the volleys would begin anew.

There were also few of the defenders to care that the first two rams to attack that day burned throughout the entirety of the battle. They burned so hard and so long that the wall glowed with their heat like a white ember. They continued burning even when they had been reduced to a heap of black wood smoking against the stone.

That was past noon, and it was when Shizuru gave the signal. A row of artillery that had been held in reserve materialised before the wall where the first two rams burned down. At first all the shooters did was hurl stones to find their range. Once they had the mark, though, they began a rapid bombardment with sealed crocks that broke in wet splashes.

The action at the gates was not yet finished by then. So concentrated was the defence on that area that one could count the defenders to take note of the fresh bombardment on the other side. Even then the gates seemed more important, the assault there being noisier and far more aggressive, not to mention unrelenting considering it had gone on for hours. It was difficult to care much about a place assaulted by crockery when the other side was taking actual bolts and rams. If the foreigners were trying something funny with the former, there would be time enough to laugh at it after the action at the gates had wrapped up. Some passing near the area with the crockery bombardment did think the dying fire stank of something tart and remarkably familiar, but there was still nothing to give them cause for alarm there. Besides, the enemy itself had put out the fire on that part of the wall.

Then more rams came, not for the gates but for the wall that had suffered the blaze. Cavalry preceded them, quick-riders carrying jugs, and these threw water against the embers that still remained. By the time the rams arrived there were defenders ready to ascend that part of the wall again. The chiefs of the defence had woken up.

But the defenders found it impossible to reascend the battlements above the now-dead fire. The blaze they had left there for so long had rendered the stone so hot that it burned them through their shoes. All the defenders could do was mount the battlements beside the steaming section of wall.

Still the new group of rams advanced. The defenders attempted to hurl their pitch and firebrands at the rams from a distance. These had proper metal sheeting on the sheds, however, so they weathered the attack. When one was finally close enough to the wall to strike, it did that and produced an ear-shattering crack.

The stone wall split from its bottom to very nearly the top.

The defenders stared at the fissure from the cooler battlements, nerveless. Where the rams had made barely a dent before, they now seemed capable of breaking down the wall completely. Their serried ranks clustered in that area, the legionaries in the sheds ignoring the great heat still in the already-watered ground. Powered by them the rams beat into the stone like hammers beating into chalk. Each blow the great logheads struck caused a new fracture, and the defenders had to watch the large stone blocks break into shards that splintered off in a heartbreaking defection. On and on went the pounding, the heartless beat, until a concerted strike ended the matter.

A fire, a crockery bombardment, a few rams. That was all it took for a century's worth of protection to crumble into wreckage.

The waiting cavalry stormed over the gap first, their steeds easily leaping the rubble. The legionaries followed later. The defenders of Comus were dragged down from their walls and slain with great efficiency. Their pans of red hot lumps were upended and their corpses fed into their still-glowing furnaces. Then the army's officers took control of the looting, seizing everything that could be of use before directing the destruction of each edifice and foundry.

Shizuru's officers quizzed her in the aftermath.

"Fire quenched by vinegar," she said to their question. "Followed by brute force to finish the job. Not original, to be sure. Hannibal."

She met several blank stares and one of dawning recognition.

And at the corner of an eye was that smirk, the red cheeks, the green eyes. How it had pleased her girl!

"Oh, I remember! During his crossing!" The one who said this was her old scribe, Aisuka, who babbled on before the others could say a word. "Who would have thought it would be true, though? I admit I suspected old Livius of fiction when I read that part of his work."

"Well, I thought I would test it first before doing the same," Shizuru said to him with a grin.

She turned to the others and gave the explanation.

"Hannibal was said to have done it with vinegar when a boulder blocked his crossing the Alps. I used vinegar too when I first tried it back home, to see if it was fact or fiction. I used far smaller rocks then but it seemed to me that there was no reason scaling up the other factors accordingly would not produce the same results on a larger rock. It does not work as dramatically on all stone, by the way. I noticed that in my experiments. But this type, limestone, always cracked."

She threw a piece of the rock to Kenji, who caught and eyed it with wonder.

"Oh, no one will believe this!" Aisuka cried, unable to keep still. "It never even came to mind as something to try in this sort of situation! That was-oh, I don't know-wonderful creativity, General!"

"Spare me the blandishments, Aisuka-han," she joked, entertained by his excitement: her eldest scribe had been reduced to hopping in place like a boy. "I am not lessening your workload no matter what."

"So that's why you had Hayao gather all the vinegar," Kenji rumbled out. He looked less hungry than before, despite the crooked grin seaming his face. "Damned if I could have guessed that was what you would do! What would you have done if there had been none of the stuff, Fujino-san? Tried the legions' wine? Most of it's gone sour by now."

She said it would have been her next option.

"Although I do not know if it would have worked as well," she conceded. "Ye gods, can you imagine if it had not? Our poor bibulous troops would have thought it a ruse from us trying to turn them teetotal."

Incredulity from Kenji as Shohei laughed his retort: "General, no one in the command is teetotal!"

"How does it work, Fujino-san?" Keigo cut in. His voice was softer than the other legates' and his eyes were still wide in a fixed fascination. Fire and vinegar to take down a wall? There was something magical about all of this; Aisuka was right when he said they would not believe it. He could not wait to write to his brother. Only how to do that without letting on his perpetually growing admiration of this woman?

The commander was answering.

"I am not certain either, Keigo-han. Part of it is I think due to the sudden change from hot to cold. A kind of shock to the material, I suppose."

A moment to give an order to a tribune, then back to them.

"They do the same thing when mining tough rock faces," explained the rich mine owner to her officers. "They set a powerful fire against the face and then cast cool water upon it. It cracks the rock face, renders it brittle and easy to chip away. But that still does not explain the more extreme reaction when it is strong vinegar instead of water that quenches the blaze. I can only guess here, but if I had to, I believe it may be something in vinegar's sourness-its biting quality."

Natsuki told her later that if this was so, she might as well have thrown the Ninth's primipilus at the blaze instead. Shizuru retorted that the hitch with that substitution was said primipilus's preference for fuelling fires over quenching them.

"One need only look at that hair," she said, laughing.

"You did not worry they would think of it?"

"Who would not think of what?"

"The people of Comus. Of what you were doing." The Otomeian narrowed her eyes and elaborated: "You said before they had many miners. You did not worry they would see you were, ah, you called it?"

"Fire-setting."

"Fire-setting. Yes."

"Not really. Or not very much." Shizuru displayed her even teeth.

"Why do you think we had that farce at their gates, mea vita? I keep telling my legates to give people something to think on before they can think up anything else. It is true of a lot of things-you should always keep them busy!"

She repeated it to her legates later at another quick council, after which they asked where she wanted to keep the enemy busy next. Where now were they headed, they asked their general.

"I would have thought it obvious," she said with upraised brows. "Is it not obvious to you, Your Highness?"

The young woman beside her squinted.

"Vedio," said the princess, her voice saying she found it painfully evident. "Where else?"

Chapter 69

Vocabulaire:

1. Aquiliferi (pl.), aquilifer/o (s., L.) - The standard-bearers of the legion, so-named for the eagle emblems on the standards. The standards themselves may thus be referred to as the E agles (capitalised).
2. Aquae Sextiae (L.) - Modern Aix-en-Provence, this was the location where the Ancient Roman general Gaius Marius defeated the migrating Teutones who threatened Rome (in the story, Hime). Marius was vastly outnumbered when he won, but also technologically superior to the foe. Among other things, his victory was due to the favourability of the field: Marius managed to entrench himself very solidly in a hill before the Teutones came. When an Ancient Roman said he wanted an Aquae Sextiae, it signified a desire for a place where the few could feasibly oppose the many.
3. Fronti nulla fides (L.) - "No reliance can be placed on appearances."
4. Octet - A clutch of eight men; a grouping often used in the Roman army, as in camp housing (there were generally eight legionaries to a tent).
5. Via praetoria (L.) - One of the main roads in a Roman camp; runs north to south.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

They took three more towns on the way, staying at each only long enough to revictual the army. What little the Mentulaean king had not seized Shizuru now took from those it would have stopped starving.

"We have scant reason for mercy," she said on the march to Kenji. "These are mostly the territories of the Mentulaeen people called the Ganni. The druids hold influence over them, as does the prince we seek, and neither party likes us very much. There was always little expectation of peaceful welcome here."

"Odd as it sounds, I'm glad of it," the man beside her said. His horse nickered and he smoothed a big hand over its neck. He and the commander were at the head of the Ninth's column, flanked by tribunes and followed by the aquilifer. Behind them, that lionskin-clad and silver-armoured soldier bore the legion's Eagle high above all heads.

"It probably strikes the wrong note to say that," Shizuru's legate continued. "What with us aiming to convert as many as possible, I mean. But well-we can use all the grain we seize this year!"

"As can the Prince Calchis," she said. "These are his stamping grounds, so every bit we take, he shall miss. Just another reason to seize it. I tell you, Kenji-han, I will be relieved when we finally run the prince to earth with his army."

Fresh angles on the lean, long face: Kenji's interest was piqued.

"Do you think him dangerous, General?" he asked. He had long ago learned to give all of her suspicions importance. "Is it because of his military reputation that you're worried?"

"They do say he is one of their best," she answered without actually sounding concerned. "But no. It is his connection to the druids."

"You think he'll use them to rally resistance," Kenji guessed.

"Or they will use him, which amounts to nearly same thing." The perpetually red lips pulled up at the corners. "Not yet, however, or not to a significant extent. If I understand all I have learned of the royal family recently, that prince shall probably save most of his resources for himself. Doing otherwise might reveal him a threat to the throne prematurely."

Kenji did not hide his amazement.

"You're not suspecting another Firens?" he demanded, which she denied.

"Let us put it this way," she said. "I only suspect the prince would rather he sat in his father's throne, as is true of many royal princes. I doubt he imagines peace with us to be necessary for such a thing. Did he think that, he would have reached out to us by now. A pity, but logical. Being in the line of succession means he would have more to lose to us than to gain."

"You mean kingship over his father's empire."

"Indeed. Monarchy over a smaller territory, like what we gave Firens, would seem less attractive."

They paused as a centurion nearby unleashed a blistering tirade. There were smiles all around at the diatribe; the cause could be anything from a legionary being out of step to having untidy gear. It was worse because this was the Ninth, reflected the listening Kenji. The Ninth was the general's favourite legion, the one with which she had worked the longest and asked for most often. So when she was in proximity, its officers were especially severe on rankers who made errors. The soldier being rebuked would surely get latrine duty when they made camp.

"Anyway," the commander resumed. "This is only supposition. I simply want the prince out of the way as soon as can be."

"Hence the march to Vedio instead of in pursuit of the king," said Kenji. "You didn't want Prince Calchis showing up suddenly when we fought the bigger army, did you, Fujino-san?"

"Among other things," she agreed. "I am not overfond of being prodded in the rear."

She said this because Calchis's splinter force served two purposes in the northwest. First and most obviously, it helped to secure that vital region against enemy sallies. The Gannian lands held the empire's two chief arms-producing cities-or it had used to, before Shizuru had sacked Comus-as well as the druidic stronghold of Tasgetia and its sacred forest, the Ruviccan. Shizuru had no intention of attacking the two latter locations any time soon, however. She wanted to subdue more of the other territories and Prince Calchis first, thereby depriving Tasgetia's druids of reason and means to resist. An agreement of surrender from the enemy's religious leaders was still preferable to a massacre of them, thought the canny commander. Were they to see that there was no other future but that offered by Hime, the druids might do a lot to help the locals make peace with the new reality. A reality under Himean governors, not Mentulaean kings or queens.

The second purpose Calchis served was similarly strategic. From his position in Vedio, his force covered the rear of the king's army. A venture like Shizuru's would have to contend with him when trying to outflank the king. He might not be an immediate threat, especially given the disparity in speed between the contenders, but he would have been one eventually. In rushing her forces to Vedio, Shizuru was avoiding the pincer by hastening the conflict.

It was therefore a surprise when Vedio capitulated the moment they entered its territory.

"Unconditionally?" Shizuru asked the messenger the Vedians sent. "Without suing for terms, at least?"

The woman started at that and looked ashamed. Her body bent and she bowed in that deep and fawning way people with kings did. It drew Shizuru's wince. Like most Himeans, she was uncomfortable with floor-scraping obsequies.

"Yes, pardon me-our nobles do request that you consider meeting with them," the messenger admitted after being asked to straighten. Her whole posture nevertheless continued to ooze unctuous timidity. "If you find that satisfactory, General Fujino. They will meet you anywhere you like, at any time you please."

She indicated again the gift she had brought, the one that had seen every eyebrow in the Himean command hiking its peak.

"They hope too that this gift is satisfactory in showing our eagerness for peace," she said.

Shizuru flicked her gaze at the object only long enough to acknowledge it. Her officers were less subtle, most choosing to linger in their stares. And why not? The offering was a curiosity to them, these people who had long cast off their royalty: an outlandish crown shaped like a tapering casque, its narrowing circumference inlaid with dozens of small but precious gems. So large and heavy was the thing that it had to be ceremonial. Shizuru imagined it was hugely uncomfortable and was not at all inclined to trying it out.

She asked the Vedian: "Who are your leaders?"

The messenger gave her five names. They did not include Calchis, who the messenger informed them had already quit Vedio with his army.

"When?"

"Ten days ago."

"To go where?"

"My apologies, General. I do not know."

"Very well," said Shizuru to this. "If they are amenable, I would speak to them in an hour's time. I shall send an escort with you if you wait a moment."

Thus dismissed, the messenger was led away by one of the many tribunes on the commander's staff. Said commander wiggled her eyebrows at her officers upon the woman's exit.

It was all the signal they needed.

"They surrender?" Shohei pretended to gasp, showing the rest a funny face. "And here I was hoping for a good siege! Is this real?"

"Would you really have preferred otherwise?" an equally perplexed Kenji teased him.

"Pah, I wouldn't have said no to it! But what-" Here was another funny face. "-did the Vedians eat to make them do this? Their walls aren't trivial and I'm betting they've bigger storehouses than the past three towns that we've taken. They could've held out if it was only that the Prince Calchis's forces left, as they claim. They could easily have waited for him to turn back and relieve them. Since the campaigning season has just started, in fact, they might have held out for relief from other loyalist forces. Or they could've tried to wait us out by themselves."

A barking laugh out of his fellow legate: "With Fujino-san here? They wouldn't have had long to wait."

Their general smiled at the compliment as the rest grinned.

"We know that, but they don't," Shohei responded. "I don't think they believe yet how effective our commander is at breaking a siege, even at this stage. And as Mentulaean strongholds go, they'd believe Vedio is still a challenging city to invest, isn't it?"

The others eyed the stronghold's imposing walls, the high-if-somewhat-ugly towers flanking it.

"So they should've thought of holding out, I think," Shohei insisted. He dropped his chin and looked burlier than ever. "Gods know we'd have been hard-put to keep up a siege for too long anyway. They'd have known that with the state of the harvest as it is. So why surrender, and so easily?"

Keigo Kurauchi put forward a suggestion.

"Maybe it's those towns we've been taking on the way," he told them. "Our successes could've rattled Vedio the way it did Asterion at the start of our campaign when Fujino-san came out of the massif. For all we know, that might even be why the prince took his force away. All the better for us, I think."

Their commander chose this moment to speak again, and all of them quieted instantly. Himeans were not a people who genuflected to their leaders, but they still knew enough not to interrupt when one of them was talking.

"I am not certain of that," their leader said. "So I agree with Shohei-han's bafflement-to some degree."

And to one of the tribunes nearby: "Primipilus Nao Yuuki, First Cohort, Ninth Legion. Quickly."

The tribune tore off to fetch the woman who had been named. Meanwhile, Keigo asked why the general thought the surrender not good for them.

"For one," she said, "since it allows the Prince Calchis another day away from me."

Here Kenji rumbled, recalling their earlier conversation on the topic.

"It's a nice crown, though, General," he shrugged humorously, with a nod to the Vedians' offering. The rest stared again at the reminder, obviously dazzled by its alien looks and obvious value.

"A bit grandiose for my taste, but then, I am no queen," their commander said, with a glance at the dark-haired Otomeian standing nearby. "As I said before, we are close to the gold mines of the empire, so this is unsurprising as a gift."

She pulled at her shoulders and slung off her cape to cast at a servant, who was told to stow it.

"Make camp. Half on guard, including all the cavalry not currently on scouting duty. What I saw of this clearing appears to be mostly grazing land. Is it sufficient to support all the auxiliary, Natsuki?"

A nod from the polemarch, whom the Himean officers had come to accept as a near-fixture of their councils.

"Good. That means we shall not have to keep the horse too far from the infantry."

She was all business now and her people took the hint: they stood just that little bit straighter.

"Do we suspect foul play, Fujino-san?" asked Keigo, intrigued by the number of guard she had requested for simple camp-building.

"No, but I never expect people to play fair either," she answered.

It was Shohei who clarified for the greener legate: "This is Ganni territory and they're loyal. Fujino-san doesn't get caught napping."

The centurion she had requested showed up just then. The commander called to another of the tribunes in her retinue.

"Futaba-han," she said. "Take five cohorts of the Ninth-bring Yuuki-han's century-and escort their messenger back into the city. Give the members of the treating deputation an hour, then bring them back here. My tent should be up by then."

She looked at the city again, seemed to decide on something.

"Bring an ala of cavalry. Seize and garrison the gates and towers with what forces you deem needed, then have the rest work on locating the city's storage. They may well have hidden most of it by now, but that does not mean we cannot find it. What do you think, Yuuki-han?"

The centurion was brisk: "I'll flip the city if I have to, General."

"Good. I have a feeling they would not have hidden it too far away, for reasons of convenience. Send for more cohorts if you need them. We have to do this as quickly as we can, or they may try to move it."

Her officers had been listening with interest and now understanding dawned on their faces. A grinning Kenji put it in words to her: "You think they'll try to pull the wool over our eyes, don't you?"

Their commander turned one of her dashing smiles to them.

"I'm no fool," she said simply, and turned to Nao and Futaba again. "Send soldiers to the homes of each of the leaders I am meeting, by the way. Two to three octets each, to be safe. No aggression, mind you, but permit no one exit or entry save the leaders themselves, even once the deputation has left. And someone put that thing-" This, of the crown the Vedians had sent. "-in with the booty."

The centurion and tribune affirmed the orders and left. The Himean command broke up too shortly. Their general did not like to see them dawdling before her troops had been properly bivouacked.

Fortunately, Himean camps all used one basic layout. Everyone involved in the construction more or less knew what to do from the start.

So by the time the city's delegation came, Shizuru's camp was under way. The troops had already managed to establish the main roads and ramparts in the hour that had passed. The Vedians thus had the privilege of travelling down an already cleared via praetoria. It was still a dirt track, of course, and not a proper Himean road as only Himeans could make it. But it was flat and kind to the feet and still leagues better than the roads Mentulaeans thought sufficient for their armies.

Treated to their first tour of a Himean military encampment, these particular Mentulaeans goggled and gaped. The sights confounded them, for they defied Mentulaeon logic. No Mentulaeon commander ever made camp thus because it would have wasted time and energy. They did not bother putting up such towers or erecting walls that belonged less to a camp than to a small city. Indeed, what was the point of the effort when one would be moving again shortly?

What seemed to befuddle the delegates most was actually one of the first things they saw of the cantonment. These were the fossae, or the outer ditches that lined the perimeter beyond the ramparts. As well they might gawp at those, thought their tribunician escort, who nevertheless knew the Vedians gawked at them for reasons other than hers. Hers was since most Himean commanders did not demand so many ditches, nor ones so deep. It was standard to have but one ditch when there was no immediate threat. But Shizuru Fujino believed in safety and thought digging good exercise for building up legionaries. So dig more fossae than normal the Fujino army always did.

They found the Himean commander in her tent, taking a report from a soldier. It was one of the primipilii, going from his crest and dress, but the Vedian deputation did not know it. Like most Mentulaeans, they still found Himean legionaries largely indistinguishable from each other. They were so different from Mentulaeon soldiery, where officers always had the more glamorous kits. Whereas the Himean centurions, the backbone of their armies, appeared to wear the same mail shirts their men did. Mentulaeon officers were more easily visible; they commanded the vision; they were dramatic. In that much the Himeans for all their uncanny organisation bred disappointment.

Until the delegation got a proper close look at the Himean commander and realised she brought enough drama for the whole company.

Said commander dismissed the primipilus and welcomed her guests. More Himean organisation followed: the company was efficiently seated and supplied with drinks.

"I am Shizuru Fujino," the commander said afterwards. "Senator of Hime, proconsular governor to Septentria-what King Obsidian currently thinks his empire, or most of it-and general of this army. Would it please you to introduce yourselves?"

The Vedians gave their names and titles.

"Where," Shizuru asked, "is the Prince Calchis?"

There was silence as the deputation exchanged glances at the candid inquiry. No alarm, however, and Shizuru marked it. They had known she would ask about him, and not merely because she had asked their messenger earlier.

"He left us some days ago, er-Senator Fujino," said the eldest of the group, a man named Quaro. Shizuru supposed he was the leader, as he had also occupied the middle seat in the five set out for them. "To all appearances, he was following the king's army, which had gone south."

"To all appearances."

"Yes."

"The prince did not say where he was going?"

"No." Quaro's eyes met her square. "He merely took the supplies he wanted, uprooted his army, and left one morning."

"So the prince did not inform a single one of you? Even the highest-ranking member of the local gentry?"

"The prince had no obligation to do that, Senator," another of the deputation replied. "It would have been impudent for us to demand that he do so."

"And impudence gets your head lopped off here," Shizuru said. "Or so I understand."

She paused to take the measure of them, the evaluation somehow carried out with courtesy despite its forthrightness. It did not take long and she smiled warmly afterwards.

"Now then," she said, "the surrender. I understand you wish to form a treaty of peace with Hime? One whereby you forsake all prior alliance to the Mentulæan king, Obsidian, and all his progeny or possible successors?"

"Yes-and ask you to spare our people and property as a consequence."

"Provided you stand by the terms of treaty, you need have no fear for either. We shall, however, requisition certain supplies and consider them part of your first tribute. Grain, meat, wine, iron, the usual. You probably know it by now, having enjoyed the presence of an army in your walls not too long ago."

"Yes, of course, yes," Quaro said with faint distress. It was explained in his next words: "But Senator, we have little that we can give. It was not only the prince who levied men and supplies from us. The king did the same. What little grain we had in our last harvest, much of it they also seized. We have only the merest scraps left, just enough to see us through the next planting. Perhaps you could allow us to keep it, in honour of the peace between us?"

Her smile had not fallen throughout his impassioned speech. She nodded now, looked understanding.

"Perhaps I could," she said. "It would not be meet for me to starve you out indeed, for that would not be concomitant with the spirit of our treaty. You still do want a treaty with us, yes? An agreement of friendship and shared interest?"

"Yes, yes, most certainly."

"Then in the spirit of shared interest, I suppose we can share."

There was a moment's confusion as the deputation struggled to process what she had just suggested.

"I mean your grain," she clarified. "I propose we take a third and leave you the remainder."

Some discomfort at this, but no great alarm. Again, this had been expected.

"Only a third, Senator Fujino?" Quaro asked with patent demureness.

"Only a third," she repeated.

"Then-" A long exhale, perhaps of reprieve. "We accept!"

"Good!" She smiled broadly. "I shall have my men fetch our share. You may observe the division to be certain of the fairness of our measure."

"I shall have one of my men lead you to it."

"Lead us to what?" Shizuru echoed.

A broad smile from Quaro: "Why, to the grain!"

"No, please do not bother," she replied. She was also smiling, her expression open, which was why they did not catch on to it quickly enough. "I already sent my men to seek it out, as a matter of fact. They should have been doing that in the city from the moment you headed here. Did you not notice them?"

The entire delegation twisted; its leader hurled out in appeal.

"Oh, there is no need!" he cried. "We can lead you to the storehouses ourselves, Senator."

"Call me 'General'," was her response. "As it is in that capacity that you now address me."

Quaro amended his discourse: "Forgive me, General! Please, allow us to lead your men to the grain stores. It would be much quicker, I assure you."

"Yes," she said with deliberation. "It would be."

A stillness fell in the tent. It seemed even the servants arranging desks stopped moving. The myriad sounds outside-barking centurions, thudding hammers, the usual symphony of camp-making-supplied the only commentary.

The Vedians realised it at last. The Himean knew they had hidden most of their grain.

"By the way, as is standard for such agreements," Shizuru resumed, "I am taking hostages. I am certain you know it to be commonplace for situations like these. They serve as guarantees that you shall stand by your words of alliance with Hime. Whomever is chosen shall be treated well and lodged in the utmost comfort, I assure you. They shall also be schooled by proper tutors if they are young, for however many years they have opportunity to stay in our care."

Again every one of the Vedians had expected this, so none took it with alarm. The secreted grain was still at the forefront of their attentions. What would happen if she found it?

"Of course, we expected hostages," Quaro said, striving heroically to remain equable. "We shall be happy to nominate them. Perhaps we can fetch them now?"

But again she asked them not to trouble themselves.

There was a glint in her eye as she clarified: "My men are still at your houses, watching over your families."

"What effrontery!" she complained later in the day, when the hard work was done and her ablutions finished. "Even if I believed that rot about them not being told where the prince was headed, they would have to be stupid indeed not to get a general idea of his direction."

Exactly how far should I suspend disbelief for the sake of diplomacy?"

She made her way to the desk in a corner of the tent, removing all the paraphernalia atop it to a cabinet. Once cleared, she hoisted the desk up and relocated it to the side of the bed.

"I forgot to tell them to move this here tonight," she said. "I need to catch up on my dispatches to the Senate."

The woman in her bed asked if she needed help. Shizuru turned in the act of arranging the desk, her crimson eyes twinkling.

"Why, mea vita, would you have lifted this for me if I said I did?" she quipped, aware it would have been impossible. Even had the slender arms somehow borne the weight, the slender legs could not: the Otomeian no longer bothered with her prosthetic once they had retired for the evening.

Said Otomeian now squinted, saying she would have summoned their servants to the chore. Shizuru smiled at this and set about retrieving her writing implements.

"My imperious Dominilla," she said in good humour.

She had already perched on the bed when offered a drink. There was a decanter of wine on their nightstand and her lover fetched a cup of it.

"They say you found the grain in tombs?" came the question after the cup's delivery.

Shizuru drank and responded in the affirmative. She would have licked her lips to catch a stray drop afterwards, but the other beat her to it.

"It was in crypts," she clarified. "The vaults we found are probably used by the entire city, at least from the size of them."

"They put with the dead?" her mistress asked again, with another kiss. "It is not, ah, unsanitary?"

Shizuru laughed and patted the fair cheek.

"They burn their dead, silly girl, so there were no slimy corpses if that is what you imagined. Only a lot of dust in a lot of urns... and they were not mad enough to mix the grain with those ashes, thank goodness. They merely hid the sacks with the pots. I suppose they thought we would be too afraid to tread on sacred ground to search there."

Natsuki asked if her legionaries did not feel such anxiety.

"Not really, or not in this case," Shizuru said. "Especially as what the tombs held was not that alien. It might have been different had there been dead bodies strung up like diabolical puppets in it. But we Himeans see mausoleums with regularity, you see. The familiar does not really inspire fear."

She put the cup away and eyed her mistress with a grin.

"Did you actually want to see?" she guessed. "The Vedian crypts? Had I known I would have brought you earlier, when I went into them."

Natsuki masked her curiosity poorly. As far as Shizuru was concerned, that settled it.

"I shall show them to you tomorrow, in the morning." A pause as she recalled something of note. "I shall have to carry you a good way down, all right?"

The other understood: there would be steps, with which she still struggled. She could actually negotiate a few by herself, but more than that became a trial, especially when there was no rail.

She told her lover she did not mind being carried, provided Shizuru did not mind the carrying.

"Hah. I would have you in my arms all day did you only allow it." Shizuru spread parchment on the desk and held the corners down with paperweights. "Although I warn you not to expect too much, Natsuki. It is really just a large basement stuffed with pottery. Some dusty keepsakes like weapons and clothes belonging to the dead, yes, but nothing too exciting. Certainly not the equal of an Egyptian noble's tomb if you are hoping for it!"

Natsuki promised to master her expectations. Her mind was on something else, it seemed, for she noted all of a sudden: "You took only a third."

"A third? Oh, of the grain?" Shizuru said, drawing a sound of assent. "Did you expect otherwise?"

There was a long pause. She could tell Natsuki was measuring how to answer this.

Finally, the words: "I - I do not know."

"Well."

She turned and reached. Her hands found her lover's body and dragged, manipulating it like a doll until she got what she desired. This was one pale leg on her lap and another at her rear.

"I wanted your legs around me," she said bluntly. "At any rate, I suspect I know what you really wish to say. Did you find it odd after their farce with the grain, my seeming leniency?"

Natsuki was sheepish.

"Only, I thought," the Otomeian admitted, "you would be angry."

"At their attempt to keep their own food?" Shizuru turned back to her desk and her writing. "Do acquit me of such hypocrisy, meum mel. Even if we did thwart their scheme, I cannot truly blame them for the attempt. They did suffer levies from two other armies previously and they too need to eat as well as plant for the next harvest. What bothered me more was that ludicrous tale they spun anent the prince. And for that, I did punish them."

"The hostages," Natsuki said.

Shizuru agreed.

As was usual when treating with former enemies, the Himeans had taken relatives of prominent locals as living security. What was unusual in the Vedian case was that Shizuru singled out certain clans to give up even more of these captives. In particular, she took nearly all the young members of the Vedian delegation's families. Returning from their first meeting, an appalled Quaro and his fellows had found their children and grandchildren already rounded up, guarded by legionaries. They were treated well, as Shizuru had promised: housed and fed as comfortably as any officer in the army. But to avoid shrewd parents slipping a slave child in the hostage's place, none was allowed any more private time with family.

The hostages would travel with them until she could send the lot elsewhere for safekeeping. It would not be unlikely, even, for them to end up in Fuuka for the duration of their captivity. Shizuru actually preferred this. It served her purposes to have the next generation of Mentulaean-nay, Septentrian-aristocracy reared and educated so near Hime that they ended up almost Himean themselves. Former hostages brought up thus were better able to see the risks of war with Hime. They were indoctrinated to it and in turn, also better able to see the benefits of being a Himean province.

There was a long period of quiet, and Shizuru knew her lover was mulling over her decisions. She was halfway into her description of the siege of Comus on the dispatch when Natsuki spoke once more, again mentioning the Himean-Vedian treaty.

"You think they will honour it?" she asked.

Shizuru shammed astonishment.

"Do you not trust our new allies, Your Highness, who despite their little trick now appear so submissive?" she asked.

"Fronti nulla fides. Shizuru. Do you?"

Shizuru emitted a low hum in response. She penned a few more words as she considered the idea, the scratching of her quill audible in the night-time quiet.

"I can only hope," she finally said. "But even with the hostages we have taken, I admit to my doubts. As you seem to, I see. They did lie to my face about Calchis. What do you think, Natsuki ?"

Natsuki said that she thought the Mentulae a difficult society. Shizuru asked what she meant by it.

"They treat oaths lightly," was the answer.

"Well, it might boil down to technicalities," Shizuru grinned. "They might not consider oaths made with us to be worth keeping. Different people have different views on honour. Perhaps they believe that there is no honour in agreements with or to the benefit of the enemy?"

A response in loftiest Attic: "That reeks of convenient casuistry."

Shizuru had to put her quill down to avoid defacing her script.

"Well, and why not? All people incline to that which is expedient," she chortled, turning her upper body so she could look the emerald eyes direct. "Another reason I preferred not to sack the city. It would have served little purpose at this juncture. I cannot yet allocate resources to this region-at least, not until I have dealt with the king's current forces. All I could spare to garrison Vedio, had we indeed taken it for our use, would be a single legion, two at the most. Not enough, for they would then be surrounded by some of the empire's more recalcitrant people and a good way from the nearest allied base."

Natsuki absorbed this as Shizuru resumed writing.

"Besides, it demonstrates the extent of my generosity. They still surrendered, in spite of it all, and did not resist even after we discovered their secreted grain. I know we are at war, but I want the future to hold a settled province. If I want a chance to prove Hime the right master for this land, I must give the Mentulae a chance to be part of that. This is Vedio's chance. Should its people bungle it, I shall eradicate them. But not before, and not so lightly. We still invaded them; should they be annihilated now simply because they did not trust us at the first instance?"

Natsuki denied that, although she admitted to having thought otherwise, previously.

"I thought to kill was simpler," she put out in tones of regret. "But now I see. There is more to this, more than their lying. I ah-I am hasty still, Shizuru. You still teach me."

Shizuru had put her quill down again the moment she heard the self-recrimination in her lover's voice. She was aware the girl worried about her grasp of the Himean attitude sometimes, occasionally grew anxious over what she perceived to be her distance from it. Personally, she thought Natsuki already excellent in her comprehension. It was simply that her culture-one that espoused capital punishment often and prioritised honour always-ruled in this one case.

She stroked the limb on her lap: it was the abridged leg and she palmed the rounded stub gently.

"Oh, do not worry so much, mea vita," she said. "Certainly your solution would have been simpler, so it is understandable that you arrived at it. Even other Himeans would. And who knows? Perhaps a day will come when we may wish we had employed it instead of mine. No one is ever perfectly certain of their actions' rightness. But for now, for the future of my province, this was the only judgement I could reasonably make."

She waited for a smile before starting on her report again. But she kept her free hand on the other's leg, enjoying the warmth beneath her palm. After a while she asked if her companion should not already be sleeping.

"I need you rested as we shall march again presently," she warned. "And very swiftly, if we are to catch our prey this time. The Prince Calchis may have escaped but, gods willing, the next foe shall not be so fortunate."

The next day their scouts confirmed what Shizuru had suspected. Instead of bearing south, as the Vedians claimed, the prince had gone in the opposite direction. Little though the Himeans knew it, the prince himself had told the Vedians to lie on that topic. It was a desperate recourse to delay the enemy, whom he had not intended to meet so soon. His expectation had truly been that they would go after his sire's much more conspicuous forces first.

But the capricious Himeans had bucked his expectations. They had dogged his father only long enough to harass the royal army's supply line, then shot like a calamitous comet into the northwest. Where he and his resources should have been safe, waiting comfortably for his father to weaken.

An embarrassing position, all of a sudden. Calchis's army was nowhere near as large as it had been since his sire had appropriated so much of it. The king was still alive and still the rallying point for the empire's defence. He himself had not even managed to intrigue with the other Mentulaean tribes yet, had not secured all the alliances he needed for his great scheme.

Avaunt from Vedio, then, and to retreat; Calchis was playing the long game now. Part of why the Vedians had yielded to the invaders: Calchis had told them to do this as well. They were of his mother's tribe, the Ganni, so they obeyed despite misgivings. In this way the stronghold of Vedio would be spared and remain a viable resource for the prince in the future, whatever became of his royal sire's great army.

Shizuru might have suspected some of this, but had no way of proving it. There was also no way she would pursue the prince, not now that he had retreated into the stamping grounds of the druids. The further northwest the Himean snake had marched, the more forest it had encountered. Vedio itself was still bound by clearings, but beyond it were the tall green edges of oak groves in the distance. To pursue the prince into forest territory he knew best would require time and care-as well as the creation of new roads, going by the miserable tracks all over the empire.

No, Shizuru had neither time nor care to spend now on the wily Calchis. Another day she would find him, she decided, and possibly show him her own wiliness. But for now there was the king's army, which she could no longer ignore, and had always intended to face.

So from Vedio curved the Himean army, back towards the centre of the empire. Their foes had been crawling deeper into it the whole time, lumbering towards the capital city. If they had made good time- not something all that probable-they would have reached and invested it already. Not a problem even then, as they would be assaulting a place that had spent over a month preparing for a siege. Besides, Gorgo was widely considered impregnable by the empire's denizens. Shizuru knew what to do to take it, but rather doubted they did.

And as for defection by the city's inhabitants, she doubted the chances of it. Her cousin was no fool and neither was the Firensian queen. Both would have instituted law martial at the first opportunity and ensured all knew where the dice fell here. Were Obsidian to regain the capital, he would be expected to order executions for those who had surrendered to the invaders. That meant just about all of them, as the only dissenters had been locked away from the beginning. Even the Mentulae of Gorgo knew which master made a better gamble for their skins.

The real difficulty was not in Gorgo but in the other legions. The scantiness of the past harvest had obliged Shizuru to spread these out over the empire. What she disliked was the idea of the king's big army falling upon one of these by itself. Her legions were fast and her legates trusted, but were the Mentulaean peoples around them to be inspired to truculence by the nearness of the king's forces... well, then there might be some problems.

She needed to come to grips with the king, and before the remaining Mentulaean lords raised fresh armies to add to his. Which meant taking the shortest route back to the heartlands, walking right in the footsteps of the enemy.

---

They found the foe earlier than expected, at a valley their Firensian guides called Aggir Hagor. To be precise, it was only part of the enemy. Obsidian had seen fit to leave another splinter force behind him, perhaps as a response to the havoc Shizuru had wrought among the Ganni. It was a goodly army too, only a little smaller than the Himean one. In this the latter got a sense of the enemy's full size. Shizuru now marched with seven legions: just about thirty-two thousand men, as some legions were understrength. If their numbers-obsessed foe could afford to leave a splinter force that almost matched this, the whole block had to be truly titanic.

The splinter force at Aggir Hagar was clearly there to look out for them. It had been installed into the choicest part of the area, a high plateau that permitted sight of all comers while granting a nice defensive advantage.

Smart, she thought to herself upon surveying their position. Practical too, as separating them would have lightened his main force's logistical burden. Some of the king's people have been thinking. They knew we would pass here to get to him quickly. A good idea to leave a pin.

For pinning her was the chief purpose of the army in the valley. She knew she could slip past and save herself the trouble of taking their hill. They would be obliged to give pursuit and thus abandon their advantageous position. But Shizuru was too cautious a commander than to assume this army was alone. What if the king had left one more splinter force behind in case the one at Aggir Hagar was insufficient? She might end up between two enemies instead of baiting one down from its perch. And even were that not the case, she knew the army in the valley would follow her all the way to the king did she outrun it. It would be slow but it would catch up once she reached her destination. Again she would be in the pincer, not a prospect she relished.

Someone clearly had brains in the royal retinue. In fact, several did. Shizuru only guessed at it, but the king did have with him most of his remaining court generals. He was gearing up for a big engagement, so it had served him well to bring his big talents with him. They were the ones who had advised him to break off this smaller force to keep another eye on his rear.

The Himean general understood. Better to finish this splinter where it squatted, right in the valley.

"We need to get them off that plateau," she told her legates. "Otherwise, we shall waste a lot of manpower fighting them. Form up a standard battle line and let the Eleventh lead the way. Have them take that lower camp-" A smaller encampment on a lower hill, for the enemy cavalry. "-to provoke a defensive manoeuvre. When enough are involved, let the Eleventh fall back along with the rest. Tempt them down from their perch with the retreat. If we get them far enough into the lower camp, they will follow the rest of the way."

Things transpired much as she wanted for most of the engagement. But when the order to retreat came, something happened that not even Shizuru could not have anticipated.

The order blared by the army bugles roared out and was snapped up by the valley. The great cliffs of Aggir Hagar now showed an unforeseen menace: they formed a massive, natural echo gallery. Sounds like those of the Himean army's horns were taken up and reformed into new compositions before returning. Round went the echoes, the music of the buglers squeezed through a thousand crags, the now misshapen notes thrown back again and again in a bizarre cacophony.

The sound was one that the legionaries could no longer recognise, never mind interpret accurately.

Instead of retreating, the Eleventh pressed. The other legions too pushed nearer and nearer the enemy's camp, which meant they moved nearer and nearer unfavourable ground. Shizuru and the officers, realising what had happened, took to their horses to turn the men around. Only by dint of speed and sheer discipline did they prevent the near-debacle, one that had Shizuru scowling furiously in her tent.

"Well, that was unexpected," she said to her officers, disgust curling in every syllable. "Our position has become untenable, so much is clear. I have no intent of subjecting the soldiers to that absurdity again!"

Her legates agreed to a man, knowing generalling would be impossible in such a place. How could one direct soldiers without sounding out orders to them?

"Shall we get the army ready for a march, General?" Kenji asked, his low and gravelly voice as deferential as he could make it. He was keenly aware this was the first time the general had ever been forced to retreat from a field. While far from a defeat, it was nevertheless a draw-and that would grate anyway on someone of her ilk.

"Yes," she told him now. "But not all of it."

Her upper lip curled and displayed fierce teeth.

"So be it," she said. "They think me pinned? I have a lesson yet for the Mentulae."

She had the army throw up a camp at the mouth of the valley. It was large enough for half her force and she promptly installed the Fourteenth in it under Shohei's command. She bolstered them with the Firensii Kenji had brought to besiege Comus, then slipped away with the rest of her army as soon as the sun's light vanished.

It was a bluff, but a strong one. The Mentulaean army could not know how many of its foes had actually left. They could not know if what occupied the enemy camp was a piddling rear guard or still a sizeable army. They could come down to check... but then they would lose their advantage. Their position up on the plateau was sturdy, safe. Down there, where the camp's inhabitants waited, was much more of a risk.

In effect, it was as the Himean general stated: the lesson for the Mentulaeans was that those who sought to pin could also be pinned. Whereas she was free to go after the enemy's main force again.

Which I need to do soon, she mused, riding once more at the head of the column. Soon enough to head off others from further swelling it, but not so soon that I oblige the foe by blindly entering the field. A delicate balance. My scouts will see to it, as I have all of them seeking what I need. I need an Aquae Sextiae, for I shall take no more chances after Aggir Hagor. Who could have seen that coming, that freak phenomenon? Even our Firensian guides were amazed. They said that though they had known the valley echoed, they had not known it would have that effect on our bugles. I believe them: it was a freak. A freak of nature sent me into retreat. But I still think I should have been aware of it.

So deep were her ruminations that she failed to notice her mistress watching. They rode alongside each other and were surrounded by other Himean officers. So when Natsuki finally intruded upon her cogitations, they were the only two who understood the words, at least in that company.

"Even you cannot command the earth, My Commander. Nor can you the wind."

Shizuru turned to look at the girl, startled. The green eyes were open and intelligent and she knew there was no hiding from them.

She sighed with a little ruefulness.

"I do know that, Polemarch," she admitted, using the Otomeian language as well. A pause, and then: "I suppose it was childish of me."

"No," said the other. "It was unforeseen and you are annoyed."

Some beats passed before she added, " I would be."

Shizuru nodded and was quiet. Her lover permitted it.

"Did I still look annoyed just now?" she asked of the Otomeian some moments later.

"No."

Shizuru asked how the other had known her annoyance, if that was the case.

"You said yourself," the younger woman explained, "that you are impatient. You dislike things to be this - to be unfinished . So this, after the prince? It would have rankled more. I need not your face to know it."

The Himean was watching her closely, it seemed. Natsuki channelled the question mutely.

"Only marvelling," Shizuru declared. "How easily you see through me."

The Otomeian had something to say to that too: "Then it is fortunate, My Commander."

"What is, My Polemarch?"

The smile she loved, so thoroughly scotching annoyance that Aggir Hagar was already only a memory: "That you do command me."

---

While the Himean general had been terrorising the Ganni, her cousin had been at work. Her charges were to strengthen hold of their controlled territories and to prepare for the foe's advent. The former she did by having the legions assault dissident townships and the latter by doubling scouts all over the west. She also followed Himean procedure for stiffening fortifications. That meant finding the artillery's ranges and laying in siege spears, hoarding stones for ballistae and literal tons of food for the warehouses.

"Should I be worried about treachery?" she asked Obsidian's former queen. "The locals still know the city better than I, which means there may yet be passages some enterprising defector can open for the king's agents."

"At the risk of being discourteous, Legate, I think you forget that I am a local," Queen Azula told her. "I know every passage in Gorgo myself and my men are already stationed at them. Whatever you may think of the city's denizens, we Firensii are less prone to stupidity. Obsidian would torture by inches every one of my people here were the city to fall to him. My men won't chance it."

Shizuma had the queen show her every single opening in the city anyway. These she showed to her fellow officers in turn, along with the Third's centurions.

"I want men on these," she told them. "In octets round the clock. And let them know that this counts as legionary watch duty. That means anyone caught shirking or napping on his time at these posts will be bludgeoned without appeal."

Then there was the matter of informing the locals, all of whom already knew anyway.

"Your former master approaches and may intend a siege," she announced at the square, before a great crowd of the city's distraught inhabitants. "As you should have seen from our preparations by now, we are more than ready to deal with such an event. None who stay shall lack protection, thanks to the legions and the Firensii. Nor shall you lack food, given our heavy stockpiling. That said, we shall force no one to stay who wishes otherwise."

"Those who wish to leave may leave," she said, "but must do it now. They may carry away any property of theirs that they so desire, but all they leave behind is instantly confiscate. We may shut the gates at any time, at which point no one may be allowed entry or exit. So decide now! Stay in the city and we shall defend you with our lives. Exit and you take yours in your hands."

There were very few takers, she later observed. As her amused officers noted, many of the city-dwellers were too reluctant to give up their property to chance it. Besides, where would any refugee truly be safe? There were still armies fighting it out all over, in between the more "settled" locations like theirs. At least if they took their chances in the capital it would be at home, in a place they knew well.

While all of this happened, the king's army crept nearer and nearer them. The senior legate's scouts caught him early, so they tracked his progress the entire time. Like her younger cousin, Shizuma had no fondness for being caught napping. She was determined to know the precise moment the foe came near enough to be a true menace.

What she had not counted on was that said foe would be arrogant enough to send his menace ahead of him.

King Obsidian of the Mentulaean Empire sent a troop of envoys to the capital. They rode well ahead of the king's forces, having been sent to warn Gorgo of what would happen should it resist. They drew up outside the city gates a full week before the king's army even came in sight of the nearest watch-station.

They accosted the soldiers at the gates but were refused entry.

Indignant at such treatment, they then demanded to speak with the "High Commander" of the Himeans. But the high commander was not in residence, the tribune in charge stated; they would have to content themselves instead with her senior legate or second-in-command. Whereupon the emissaries demanded the senior legate, but prefaced that meeting with a notice.

"Tell this senior legate," the lead envoy sneered at the gathered legionaries, "that His Radiant Majesty the King Obsidian, Emperor of the Mentulaean Empire and rightful ruler of Argentum, Argus, and Sosia, gives her and her army a single day to quit the city. Those who do so and lay down their arms may be allowed to live. Those who do not shall be tortured until they perish. Your very leaders shall be dragged off the battlements, to be roasted upon our spits. His Majesty comes with a great army and those who do not surrender shall be devoured by it!"

So much did the envoys bid the soldiers tell the legate, whom they intended to beard further during the meeting. But the senior legate was a greater aristocrat with a more bilious constitution than the deputation could have predicted. No sooner had she ridden through the city's gates than she told them to 'stuff it up their yaps' and tell the king to come and take Gorgo if he wanted it.

To add insult to injury, she also had her armed escort take three of the king's delegates. Whom said escort bore off into the city, all screeches and kicks.

"You see how easy it is?" she told the remaining envoys, who gazed at the madwoman with fear. "I wanted so I took, none of this palaver or posturing. Only the weak expend themselves on threats. Be sure to tell His Radiant Cockalorum I said this. So stuff it up your yaps, you damned curs, and get you going! Get!"

"Unexpectedly direct," the Firensian queen observed when Shizuma returned. The woman was thinking of the what she knew of the Himean general and comparing it to the senior legate. She thought the cousins were rather different.

"That popinjay only sent that lot to try and intimidate us," the cousin in front of her answered, supercilious Himean nose up in the air.

"Not to mention to lie to my face. As though I thought he would actually spare anyone surrendering! No wonder Shizuru gave him a verbal spanking when they met. Rightful ruler of even our Argus and Sosia provinces, eh? Aaah, what a poseur! How did you stay married to him, exactly?"

Azula was succinct: "With great effort."

"I believe it."

"What should we do with the emissaries you seized?"

"Whatever you like," said the senior legate, opening her beautiful eyes wide. She actually appeared to have forgotten about her captives. "Keep them in the dungeons if you want or push them right out of the gates again. Cook them over a spit like they threatened to do to us. I suppose you can torture them too, although I doubt they have any information we can use that we do not already know. I honestly do not care, Your Highness."

"Why did you take them then?"

A wicked smile: "I thought it might be amusing."

Oh, but the cousins really were different!

"But now that we know Gorgo is truly his object, I must act." A frown to the queen. "I have to get to the lands of the Carsinii where most of the Otomeian auxiliary are encamped. My cousin will need all the cavalry she can get in these flatlands, and it's in these flatlands I think she shall find her great battle. Your former husband wouldn't be game to meet her elsewhere, would he?"

The other woman smiled sourly, knowing what the other was saying.

"No, he wouldn't," she agreed. "He's a bully."

"So he will want to bully her with his army's size," Shizuma confirmed. "The best way to do that would be in the wide flats in this area. My cousin will be looking for a place around here. She knows he wouldn't be tempted otherwise."

She was already moving around the command room, rapping out orders to her staff. After issuing a summons for the rest of her officers, she addressed Azula once more.

"I need to move the other legions too," she stated, "in case the king moves faster than we expect. I'll be leaving Toshi-san and the Third to support here, and you also have the Firensii your father sent. Is that enough? Can you hold out against them?"

The woman's look was telling.

"I would have to suffer my former husband again if I didn't," she said.

Contented that Gorgo was in good hands, Shizuru's senior legate took a band of cavalry and rode northeast. There she found several thousand Otomeian auxiliary brooding over the Carsinii with the Eighth and the First.

"You already know, but Obsidian's coming, Zanki-san," she informed the legate in charge of them. "And so is my cousin. Which means she'll want some more troops to even out the numbers, at least if we can bring them to her. If I had my druthers, any reinforcements we send would include Himean legions. But I'm not certain those can march to her unmolested by the time she reaches the heartlands. Too many plains and too exposed, especially with the threat of that horde. We shall look sitting ducks if we take the soldiers west already, especially if we've no notion of where to go yet. Shizuru wouldn't thank me for risking them."

"The heartlands," the other echoed, latching on to that part of her speech. "So you think she'll force an engagement near their capital?"

"Near enough, as the king shall be parking around there. He wants it back badly, you see. Anyway, he'll want to stay on the plains too."

At Zanki's enquiring look, she expanded: "He'll only meet her somewhere that looks like he could throw all his weight into it. But she'll only meet him somewhere she can make her weight count for more than what it is."

"Some might say those two conditions are incongruous."

"Do you think they are?"

"For someone like Fujino-san? I doubt it," the other woman sighed, knowing their commander-in-chief. "She'll find herself an Aquae Sextiae, Shizuma-san, nothing surer. She'll also want the cavalry. They'll be ready."

"Good, because that may be very soon and they're the only reinforcements we might be able to send. How are they, by the way?"

Zanki had been working with their cavalry in the past months and had enjoyed every second of it.

"Spoiling for a fight as always," she said.

"Just the way we want them." Shizuma grinned at the other legate and proceeded with her concerns. "I know my cousin and she'll want to draw the king as soon as she finds a battlefield. But before that happens, we need to be defensive. I think I dislike having the legions so spread out. If what's coming is the big one, then Shizuru will want most of them within reach of each other too. I already sent messages to Miyuki and Maiza-san. As for Seigo-san, he should be practically among the Firensii now, so the Seventh's distant but safe."

Zanki asked where she should take her own group.

"I think the Twelfth and the First should move a little nearer the Atinu Camp," said the senior legate. "Lasandre might even do nicely. I've already sent word to Miyuki to inspect that base, so they should be ready for anything."

"We can march today if you want it," Zanki offered, but Shizuma demurred.

"Not quite yet," she said, "because I've no intent of letting Shizuru march back here without doing what I can to disoblige the opposition. My worry is that some of the places we've already subdued shall revolt afresh. What are the odds of the Carsinii and the Arvetii-" This was another of the subgroups of the Mentulaean nation, their territories abutting the Carsinian ones. "-attempting another muster once the king's forces get close enough to serve as, shall we say, an inspiration?"

Her auditor was grim.

"Pretty high," Zanki admitted. "Even with that engagement we fought, they've fighting people left still. Everyone knows by now that the king is marching. Though that's only stirred up mutters thus far, things will change the closer he comes." A hard look at Shizuma to show her own concern. "There will be trouble."

"So we head it off again. The question is," Shizuma said, "how do we do it? You've spent even more time here than I have, Zanki-san. How do we force these people into fighting us precipitously again? I doubt what we did before shall work another time. Even with the threat of the king's army marching, I think these louts have learned enough now not to assault two full legions with auxiliary support. We need a new stratagem."

"I think the old one might work again, actually," Zanki responded. "If we pair it with an affront. Aside from the land itself, what do the Carsinii have that we consider of great value right now?"

"If not the land... oh. You mean its produce?"

Zanki averred.

"The last harvest's thinness still has them on edge," she reminded the other woman. "And you know we've been levying more tributes of food from their lands compared to others."

"Only natural, as they have more to give," Shizuma reminded her in turn. "Many of the empire's richer farmlands are in the Carsinian lords' holdings."

Zanki did not contradict this.

"The thing is, they're still touchy about it," she said. "Remember what happened at Fregum? They were quiet enough at first, but they turned on Shohei-san the moment they got a hunch of being cheated with the wheat. Never mind that their hunch was actually wrong. I think if we do another requisition here, we'll finally push many of them into an early rebellion."

Shizuma took that in for a moment.

"So you think we should commandeer, what?" she said. "Another third of their grain?"

But the other woman had another notion.

"I think we should take almost all of it," she proposed.

The senior legate lifted steely eyebrows and looked hugely entertained.

"That would precipitate rebellion, all right!" she hooted. She eyed the other senator afresh, taking in the tranquil and friendly face framed by dark hair. A delicate face, for certain. But what she had proposed was anything but delicate.

"And here I thought you would counsel something subtler, Zanki-san," she said. "I was just beginning to think you an eagle-you might be more of a wolf!"

"As I see it, Shizuma-san, the move is necessary either way," Zanki insisted, smiling at the jest to her character. "If their king does come near these territories, that resource-all the foodstuff, grain, and herds still available here-will be one of his goals. We can't let him have that grain for his baggage. Nor can we let the loyalists among the Carsinii bring it to him or use it so they can bring more numbers to him."

Shizuma saw the good sense of this.

"As for subtlety, we don't need it," the other legate stated. "They're hotheads who've been boiling all winter and who have very short memories. Now that they think they have allies coming, trust me on this: it won't take much to run off some steam."

Shizuma took some time to think about it and decided it was worth a try. She voiced a final concern to other legate, however.

"The Twelfth is ready, I know, as are the Otomeians," she noted. "I'll also have Miyuki send up the Fourth to be safe. But will the First do? It used to be raw."

"Oh, that was months ago!" was the dismissive answer. "They've been blooded more than once, thanks to the raids we've been running on the holdouts. They've a lot of steel for being so young, Shizuma-san. Your cousin would be pleased."

She would be pleased, thought Shizuru's senior legate, when the First actually vied with the Twelfth and Fourth in thrashing the enemy. Because they had shown violent resistance to giving up their grain, the Carsinii provided Shizuma and Zanki with a casus belli. The pair rampaged, running an unsparing circuit among the eastern townships that saw the emptying of countless granaries, the overturning of homesteads, the seizure of herds and poultry. The campaign was so fast that every attempt to fight back was crushed under the legions' heels.

Zanki had been right, Shizuma thought. Short tempers and hopes of the king's return had shortened these Mentulae's memories. Again they had failed to mount a proper resistance by waiting to collect all their fighters before launching an assault. Of course, had they waited, they would likely have lost all the foodstuff they were fighting for anyway. A cleft stick for the Carsinii, and a neat one. So the two legates only had to deal with pockets, disarranged swells of rebellion that they put down with hard-bitten efficiency.

Thirteen days of this saw the east bruised and battered, its people exhausted. The Carsinii would not be able to agitate again any time soon or marshal forces in aid of the king.

"Didn't I say they had a lot of steel?" Zanki asked Shizuma as they watched the First loading up yet another baggage train bound for the Atinu camp. "They're lovely boys and girls, these!"

"They are, by the gods," the senior legate responded. "Proper veterans now, I think. After all that, it's time we got them to a safer place. We've done our part, for what it's worth. Now for the real challenge, which is all up to my cousin."

Chapter 70

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.), alae (pl.) - A cavalry unit. For this story, every ala shall be equal to 500 horsemen.

2. Aquiliferi (pl.), aquilifer/o (s., L.) - The standard-bearers of the legion, so-named for the eagle emblems on the standards. Aquiliferi were chosen from among the ranks with a view towards personal bravery. They and the Eagles could become rallying points for soldiers, so aquilifers were respected and paid more than the rankers.

3. Aquae Sextiae (L.) - Modern Aix-en-Provence, this was the location where the Ancient Roman general Gaius Marius defeated the migrating Teutones who threatened Rome (in the story, Hime). Marius was vastly outnumbered when he won, but also technologically superior to the foe. Among other things, his victory was due to the favourability of the field: Marius managed to entrench himself very solidly in a hill before the Teutones came. When an Ancient Roman said he wanted an Aquae Sextiae, it signified a desire for a place where the few could feasibly oppose the many.

4. Auspices and augurs - Roman augurs were state priests. Augury was a precise science for the Ancient Romans, who practised it by taking the auspices prior to momentous events. The augur would observe the flight, calls, or behaviour of birds and then interpret them according to the precise rules of augury set down by tradition. Auspices were thus essentially rituals for taking omens, to see if a venture boded ill or good fortune based on divine approval. In the story, Shizuru is an augur, having "inherited" the priesthood from one of her relatives.

5. Cannae (Battle of) - A battle between Carthage and Rome. Numbers are only approximate due to lack of verifiable sources, but the Carthaginian Hannibal may have faced as many as 85,000 Romans (in this story, Himeans) with his 50,000-strong army (about 30,000 of which were heavy infantry). The Romans were massacred despite being numerically superior.

6. Cataphracti (pl.) - A cataphract is a type of heavy cavalry, a fully armoured man on a fully armoured horse.

7. " Ercle!" - "By Hercules!" A Latin expression.

8. Fabian Strategy - The classic war of attrition, named after the Ancient Roman commander Quintus Fabius Maximus Cunctator ("The Delayer"). The idea is to avoid/delay pitched battle and attempt to wear down the foe by interrupting his supply lines and depriving him of actual victories. It is especially useful against foes with limited resources.

As a side note: Ancient Roman names are often replaced in this story with Japanese ones in a (half-hearted) attempt at consistency. For example, were the story of Aquae Sextiae (s.v.) in the text itself, "Gaius Marius" would be replaced by a Japanese name. "Fabian" is left alone because the name itself has entered the English lexicon. The names in the ancient or founding legends are left alone too, because they are already so well-known, e.g. Romulus, Remus, Aeneas, etc.

9. Verpa (L.) - Latin obscenity; refers to the erect male organ with the foreskin drawn back.

10. NOTE on positions in battle - Keep in mind that the right flank/wing (consider these terms interchangeable) of each army faces the left flank of its opponent, in the same way that your right shoulder fronts the left shoulder of a person you are facing.

Thus, if Army A's right flank marches forward while it and Army B face each other, it would be marching to meet Army B's left flank.

Next, the commanders in this chapter divide their infantry forces into distinct corps. If you have difficulty assigning visual position to the terms in the text, follow the legend below. Assume that the army (denoted by LFLCRCRF) is facing the exclamation mark:

!

LF LC RC RF

[Legend: LF = left flank, LC = left centre, RC = right centre, RF = right flank]

Now assume that the exclamation mark represents north. If we reorient the army to face east instead, it should look like this:

!

LF

LC

RC

RF

In this new arrangement, if we say the army's right centre [RC] was attacked from the south, it signifies an attack on the side adjacent to the right flank [RF]. In a similar fashion, an attack on the left flank's [LF] north side would signify an attack coming from the direction of the exclamation marks. Furthermore, if I wanted to attack any of these corps in the rear, I would have to attack their west sides.

Finally, let us say the army's general has a squadron of horse [SH] in reserve. Say he places it to the rear of the left flank for security. If the army still faces east, it would now look like this (the ellipses denote empty space):

!

SH LF

... LC

... RC

... RF

11. NOTE on Terantrum - It can be difficult to visualise topography.

For convenience's sake, imagine Terantrum as a great plain bound by a "U". The left and right (vertical) lines of the U are ravines and the bottom (horizontal joining) line is the stream. Naturally, these are vastly more irregularly shaped in the actual location, but it serves to give a bare idea of the place.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

It was not quite an Aquae Sextiae but it would have to do. When Shizuru's scouts came back with news of the king, he had begun a siege of the capital. Undaunted, she continued making smokeless camps and hunting for her battle theatre instead of trying to relieve the city. Her scouts were thorough, her decisions rapid; it took only three more days to find a serviceable place. She hustled her troops to it, steering north of the capital and forcing march all the way.

The King of the Mentulaean Empire was none too happy when his own scouts found her again. Obsidian's hope had been for the Himean army to come to Gorgo's defence. This was why he had entrenched his own forces south of the city, on favourable ground for so many men. So valuable did he-and most of his subjects-consider their capital that they believed she would not leave it long endangered. But their priorities were not those of the invaders, so much was obvious. The Himean commander would rather abandon Gorgo than risk engagement on so open a turf. She had even stolen a march on him and found herself a better place to make a stand.

The site into which the Himean army had fled was known as Terantrum to Obsidian's subjects. This was a great expanse of mostly flat land interrupted at its far edges by imposing ravines. The northern side was the most open, with few points of interest to the military strategist. But to the east and west it was fringed by deep gullies that ultimately ran into Terantrum Stream.

This meandering watercourse was a tributary of the River Agrius; it formed the southern border of Terantrum Plain. The stream could be forded by an army at one place and it was that crossing the Himeans had secured for themselves. This put their camp on the southeast side of the stream and the gulch.

"A good position for them, My Liege, as it makes retreat feasible."

This was from one of Obsidian's highest-ranked generals, a man who had won more than a dozen battles for the crown. He had been summoned to this meeting along with the other senior military members of the king's cortege.

The man now pointed to a map and indicated the land west of the gully, north of the stream.

"They have their army drawn up here, although their camp is on the other side of the watercourse. This is because we can only attack them from the west, on the plain of Terantrum itself. Fortunately, there's enough space for us on that plain. We shall be able to deploy the whole army easily, in spite of their position."

Obsidian worried his lip at this, asking, "Why can't we just attack their camp itself by coming at them from the south or the east? We would then be on the other side of the stream-and the gully-too."

Every one of the advisors clustered around his war table knew the answer to that but tried not to show it. The man who had been speaking took on the task of answering, as the king's eyes had settled on him.

"Alas! It would be unfeasible, My Great Lord," he told his ruler. "The land east and south of their camp is unfavourable for a large force. It holds even more ditches and canyons. Their smaller army would hold better than ours in such terrain as they could use the natural impediments to avoid a pitched battle. Further east is also the River Agrius, which we would have to cross in order to attack from that direction. And after what we have seen of these Himeans, I have a feeling they may have already downed the bridges at that waterway."

A menacing silence followed this elucidation. The king sat in his travelling throne, an eye-popping affair of carved wood inlaid with jewels and gilt. Now he creaked in it, his armour straining against the many gems at this back, and demanded to know how best to proceed.

"I see that much!" he said, talking through a glower that boded ill. He did not like to have a weakness shown up, even at his own prompting. "What I want to know is what best to do next. I want these foreigners gone! I've had enough of them-and all of their blasted allies-cavorting about my territories. You said we could end them if they came here to try to save the capital city. It looks like you were wrong."

His audience's necks prickled at the indictment in the air. They bowed their heads to propitiate the man still swelling in the carved chair.

"Now you lot are saying we should go to Terantrum," he eventually rumbled. "They chose that location themselves. Are you certain we can finish them off if we go there?"

"Lord King, Wise Sovereign, I would lay my life on it," the advisor who had been speaking returned, even while knowing he was doing just that at the moment. He looked at his fellows around the king's war table and received unanimous head-bobs. "There's more than enough space to engage them at Terantrum. The great ravines to its west are sufficiently far from the field."

Another of the advisors requested permission to add to this and received a cantankerous nod.

"It is all as Vinthurios says, Your Highness," said this other advisor. "More than that, Terantrum's western ravines present a barrier not unlike the eastern ones. They may only be crossed safely at a few places, most important of which is the Bridge of the Wasp."

Her finger pointed out the said structure, which supposedly took its name from the crest of the lord who originally built it.

"So what the Himeans have done east, let us do in the west," she continued. "I say we establish our camps on the western side of the western ravine. This grants us our own defensive advantages, as we would then have a path northwest and to the lands of both the Ganni and Celsor. An important option should anything untoward occur."

A baleful spark from the royal eyes at this.

" Not that it would, Your Most Excellent Majesty," the woman amended with speed. "But Your Majesty is of the wise kind who arranges for all eventualities. Besides, having access to that route is not merely a safety in case of retreat. It can also give us access to further resources from those loyal lands, like reinforcements, for example."

Another request to speak from someone else was impatiently granted.

"As theirs gives them," the new advisor put in, gaining strong nods at the statement. "This is the other problem with the Himeans having managed to encamp where they are, My Lord King. They effectively control a route to the east that opens them up to reinforcement from their farther camps. The very first camp they established in our lands, the one by the River Atinu, is in that direction. So is the citadel of Lasandre, which their forces currently inhabit. It means we risk their numbers swelling the longer we hold off on attack."

The speaker looked his king in the eyes in a rare fit of daring, knowing the urgency of the situation merited it.

"Now is the time, Great One," he implored. "We must get them before they can call up more legions. They may already have done so! But it will take those time to reach Terantrum and we are very much nearer. Even at the speed they march, we could still crush that army before more of these Himeans came."

He turned to seek support from Vinthurios, whom they knew the king favoured most of them. Not only was the man undefeated as a general, but he was also shockingly low-born, coming from peasants. He would never be able to present a claim to the throne in spite of his many victories. That he owed all he had to the king made him valuable, for it made him a tool that could not be insubordinate.

Vinthurios agreed, as did the rest.

"We can be there in mere days if we go now, Your Highness," he put forth. "We can even attack the very day after. And though their position is better than it would have been had they come here, it will still not be good enough to fight our forces. We have an army the likes of which no one has ever seen! It dwarfs theirs so badly that even their renowned discipline will be for nothing. We can annihilate them at Terantrum, My Liege, I swear it. But it is more certain the earlier we go there. Each day's delay is another chance for them to swell their army."

Thus King Obsidian followed the Himeans to Terantrum, establishing camps on the far side of the western ravines and pouring his army through the crossings and into the field. They arrived in the noontime, and there were so many of them that it took the rest of that day to get them sorted. In the meantime, they formed upon the plain in their thousands upon thousands.

South of Terantrum Stream was the one significant elevation in that place. It was a knoll just ahead of the Himean camp. The day the Mentulae established themselves in their new location, the Himean command ascended it to better see the enemy.

"Edepol!" Keigo blurted when he joined the others on the rise. "That's not an army-it's three!"

It was breath-taking, to say the least. The Mentulaean king had aggregated an army even his foes had to view with reverence. With him was still a big part of Calchis's former troops, along with fresh ones levied during his progress to the capital city. With him too was the bulk of the royal cavalry as well as the empire's last complement of bladed chariots. In that great mass all those falces, swords, and shields flashed so brightly that they made the Mentulaean side of the plain look like an unsettled sea.

Little wonder, thought the gawking Himeans, that their enemy had indulged them at Terantrum. This stretch of land was among the few nearby capable of sustaining that vast throng. It would support not only the king's cavalry but also his infantry, the bulk of his force. Of the latter, he had brought more than ninety thousand. He had once told the Himeans' commander that he could bring a hundred thousand to bear on her if he wished. It appeared he had finally managed to make good on that promise.

The incredulous Himeans surveyed this colossal menace, feeling suddenly like ants about to bite an elephant.

"Edepol," Keigo said again. The word croaked out of him. "Tell me again. We're supposed to fight this?"

His commander's look was calm but she vouchsafed no response. It was her cousin who answered; and, Keigo noted, with a throat that sounded as dry as his.

"We're supposed to beat this," Shizuma told him with a shake of her silver head. She was latest in the party, having just arrived at Terantrum the previous evening. The moment her own scouts had sighted her cousin approaching the capital, she had detached all the Otomeian cavalry in her command to send the woman's way. At first, she had toyed with the idea of sending a tribune to lead them. But the import of the task had seen reconsidering the delegation: she ended up leading the troopers herself.

I thought you would need them, she had said, at her cousin's delighted welcome. A pity she had not realised how many more of them said cousin would need, she now mused.

Keigo's uneasy voice intruded upon them again and she frowned at him.

"How many, you think?"

Shizuru's other legate answered this time.

"You said it yourself," he told Keigo. "If they don't outnumber us three to one in foot alone, I'm no judge of the battlefield."

Their general finally contributed her piece.

"Then it was our good fortune we pinned that other force at Aggir Haggor," she told them. "It might well have been four to one otherwise, or near that number."

Again more shaking heads as the rest digested this incredible quantity.

"That's true," Keigo said shakily, still trying to wrap his mind around the idea of facing the horde before them. What a horde! What an enemy! He knew his history and knew there had been such multitudes in history: Aquae Sextiae's Teutones were just one example. But the Teutones had been a whole people, migrating south with their spouses and families. They were trounced by a smaller Himean force, but they had also been rank savages. They had barely even known how to form up a battle line, never mind a siege tower. Many had not even worn proper armour!

These were not Teutones milling about Terantrum. They had properly soldered armour and weapons. They knew what army lines were and had the sophistication to employ tactics in battle. These would not be beaten simply out of technological backwardness-and there were enough of them to counter with their numbers what technological advantages the Himeans did indeed possess.

"This is-is-why, it beggars all belief!" he burst out. "Jupiter and all the gods! Have you ever seen the like of this? Have any of you, in any another campaign?"

No need for anyone to answer: even their commander was silent.

"Hannibal faced so many of you at Cannae, they say."

This was from a voice no one had expected.

It pursued: "He won then, no? Though you outnumbered him."

Every eye turned to the speaker of the comment, every face projecting bewilderment. Even their general looked amazed that the polemarch of their auxiliary had spoken. She barely spoke in councils, save when a question had been directed her way or if exigency required she add to the dialogue. So for her to speak now and so coolly of such an enemy had them all forgetting their tongues for an instant.

It was Keigo again who managed to recall his first.

"He wuh-yes, yes he did and we did," the legate said to the foreigner. His eyes bulged at the strangeness: their general's mistress had never before spoken to him. "But, Ercle ! That was a different time! With different circumstances. And armies!"

"And generals?" she sniffed.

The Otomeian pressed on to general amazement, ignoring their looks but flashing colour on her cheeks.

"Now you are the smaller army," she observed. "A Cannae in your favour this time, maybe?"

Their commander finally recovered enough of herself to reply at this.

"Hannibal still had rather more than we do here," Shizuru pointed out mildly. It was a tease: the amusement in her eyes was discernible to the whole company. "True, they say his infantry numbers were not that far off what ours are at the moment. But he had with him two times the number of cavalry."

The Otomeian polemarch's response was uttered with crackling disdain.

"You Himeans like to say your legions are why you win your battles. If so, the auxiliary cavalry should not count for much here."

Several laughed at the flagrant jab, their commander included. It was true, after all: most of them still believed battles were won by their legionaries, not the auxiliaries.

"And Otomeian cavalry, of course, count for twice what Hannibal's did," the commander now allowed.

She reached for her mistress's hand and lifted it for a kiss, ignoring the flash of alarm the gesture earned. Their eyes met and her thought was clear: Had we been alone it would have been your mouth and your lips, and my teeth.

"So," Shizuru said, having reduced her lover to crimson silence once again. "You heard the Polemarch-Princess, my friends. Surely we cannot balk at that challenge! Shall we turn it into a Cannae in our favour, then?"

Her cousin sighed and looked her usual irony.

"This would be the best time to try it," she told the general. "But look you there first, Shizuru. Would you say they have more cavalry than ours or less?"

"More, I should say," Shizuru answered, and with a mindful look at her lover, added: "But not better. Anyway, the difference in numbers is not as great as it is with the infantry-if I had to guess they have only three alae more. Which means they shall be banking more on their foot than their horse. All the more as they now have a healthy wariness of Otomeian riders."

"A sound strategy, with that many footsoldiers," the senior legate responded. A hand came up, clenched at the air. "How I wish I had brought some of the legions! Even only one more."

"Yes, but you might have arrived after the battle had you done that," her cousin said. "The cavalry you brought are help enough. We shall make do."

"Are you sure we can't delay them enough to wait for Zanki-san to catch up?"

This was since she had sent a message to that other legate midway through her dash to Terantrum. Upon learning of Shizuru's exact position, she had sent Zanki an order to bring up more legions.

"Three legions would make a big difference," she said now. "You really think the Mentulae won't hold off a bit?"

"If they did, I would prod them out of it," Shizuru answered. "Every day we wait would increase the chances of those extra legions making it to us, but so would they increase the chances of the remaining feudal lords bringing reinforcements for the king. Anyway, I never intended a Fabian strategy. We neither of us can afford it."

Shizuma agreed with that, knowing there was nothing for it but to have the battle.

"Well, I'll admit to curiosity about what you shall do here, Shizuru," she said to the general. "Many's the time I've heard and read about your fights against foes who are larger. This shall be the first time I get to participate-though I confess my bones do itch about it!"

The fiery eyes regarded her laughingly, the setting sun caught up in their depths. An arm wrapped about her shoulders.

"I promise your bones will feel better soon," Shizuru said to her, squeezing her close. "Have faith in me, Cousin! I knew what I was about when I led them to this plain. Now to council, for I believe our enemy will oblige us tomorrow morning in his eagerness."

The next day proved her belief correct. Dawn showed the Mentulaeen host formed up and ready for combat. They spanned almost the breadth of the west, file after neverending file of soldiers revealed by the sun in ascent. It was a line the likes of which even Shizuru had never seen in its scale.

The Mentulaeans had attempted (rather effectively) to cover the plain. Their infantry line spread the span of a full eleven kilometres. It was not a continuous line despite that. The Mentulaeen commanders had still been obliged to leave large gaps to achieve such frontage. Since the army faced east, their line's left flank was tactically the most exposed. The right flank, on the other hand, was just a little over a kilometre north of the stream.

The gaps in the line showed that the Mentulaeen commanders had quartered their army. This was partly for manoeuvrability and partly for the command structure. The Himeans would not learn it until the end of the battle, but Obsidian had assigned five generals to Terantrum's command. One of them was named High Commander, which put him just below the monarch.

In reality, the king did barely anything for the duration of the combat: he ceded the real work to these five generals instead.

It was a wise decision, for the king was no battle strategist. His chosen generals, on the other hand, more than made up for him. With so many military minds working together, it would be harder to lose-although they all agreed that losing was unlikely.

Save for the high commander, who oversaw the whole, the generals were assigned one out of four corps. There were over twenty thousand soldiers under each of them. This meant that two of the corps already numbered more than the whole Himean army.

The Mentulaean horse was distributed evenly among the corps. It too had been split into four. Hence there was one cavalry unit for the left flank, one for the left centre, and so on; each one simply took position behind its respective infantry group. The placement told the observer that the horse would be in reserve, a safety measure against flanking attempts. The only anomaly was the small chariot contingent, which was placed between the left centre's horse and right centre's horse.

Shizuru took one look and knew this would not be another Argentum.

Part of the Himean success at Argentum had been due to Mentulaean overconfidence in numbers. The Prince Artaxi had taken a look at the paltry foe and decided only a third of his army was enough to do the job. Accordingly, when battle opened, he had sent in merely a third. Only when the first corps failed had he added a second-and still only another third of his total force, even then. The final third of his army had not actually met the Himeans in battle, having fled when the first two waves failed.

Himeans had won Argentum by battling in detail. It had been a lesson to the Mentulae in the fallacy of numeric superiority.

Since Argentum, there had been many such lessons. To the foe, all opportunities for learning. And while the Mentulaeans continued to believe that numbers were decisive, they had absorbed part of the message. They had begun to learn that numbers were not absolutely everything.

So Shizuru knew this battle would be more dangerous than Argentum had been. So much did she explain to her officers the day before the conflict.

What she did not want, she said, was to allow the enemy a general attack along the breadth of their line. That would grant the Mentulaean army all the advantage its enormous numbers could bring. Yet she could not compact her line to avoid that. To do so would risk envelopment by the gigantic enemy.

So while she deployed her troops in a four-corps formation matching the foe's length, there was a significant (and to the enemy, peculiar) difference: she echeloned her line from northwest to southeast.

This meant that instead of drawing her line parallel to the foe's, Shizuru drew it diagonally. One flank was thus much closer to its enemy counterpart than the other, at the start of the battle. Adding to the irregularity, she stacked that nearer flank with more troops than her three other corps.

"Today I wield the hammer," she joked. "Not the rod."

The 'stacked' corps or hammer, the right flank, she filled with men and women from the Ninth and Thirteenth. The Ninth was expected: it had been her legion before this campaign and now held her most experienced soldiers. As for the Thirteenth, it was the other one she had taken on her famous trek through the massif. Not only was it heavily blooded, but it had long gained the confidence intended when she granted its now-talismanic, no-longer-disastrous name.

Next to those was the right centre, made up of the Sixth. This was another of the old legions she had at the start of the Northern Campaign, nearly as steely as the Ninth. That it was not was only since its deficiencies had been filled out with raw troops after Takeda Masashi's interim command. But these too had been blooded many times since and had grizzled veterans reinforcing them.

The left centre was held by the Eighth. The left flank, by the Tenth. Both had been accruing heavy experience during their time in the lands of the Mentulaean Carsinii. They and the Sixth were further stiffened by troops from the veteran Eleventh, which Shizuru seeded across the three corps to improve their steel. Only the stacked right flank did she leave as it was.

She divided her horse too into four units. Unlike the foe, she did not have them corresponding to each corps of her infantry line. Rather, she placed one unit behind her right flank, one behind her left flank, and one behind both the left and right centres.

The last cavalry unit she placed behind the third. This kept it free of an infantry counterpart and in reserve. It was the Lupine Division, now a thousand strong, and more than ever an instrument of terror.

"I am not assigning a tribune to your brigade," she informed its captain, the Otomeian Kyo. "This is since you shall be getting your commands direct from me again. Yours is the most powerful cavalry unit on this field, so I shall treat you as a floating resource, to be used wherever I find opportunity. However, there may be times when I have to give the rest of the army my full attention. At such times, you shall have to lead your troopers in my stead."

Kyo looked to his polemarch first, then bowed to the Himean general.

"Kenji-han shall take command of the infantry's right flank," Shizuru proceeded. "Shizuma will have command over both right and left centres. I shall try to help you with those where I can, Cousin, but I need you to try to watch both when I am busy."

"I'll manage."

"I have no doubt. Keigo-han, you have the left flank."

This was the refused flank, which meant it would meet the enemy last. She informed him that she had put more of the cataphracts in the cavalry unit behind his corps.

"Only for safety, as they would be a big help for defence," she said. "But I doubt you shall need them, especially given that you shall have the stream on your left."

Keigo voiced understanding and promised to hold the left against all comers.

"I have no need to say we are outnumbered," Shizuru went on. "But we all know we have the better people. The Mentulaeans have not our discipline, nor have they our leadership. We know a good number of them are also freshly levied, which means they are likely still green. Whereas every one of our legionaries is by now the veteran of several successful battles. The same for our auxiliary-which I think all will admit to be capable of riding down the best the foe has to offer."

Smiles and murmurs of assent at this, which the few Otomeians at the council took with fierce-if-quiet pleasure.

"Quality, not quantity. We will win today because we have the former in abundance!"

She touched them with her eyes and each one straightened up at it.

"Listen to me say that because it is true. We will win! You must place your faith in that because I cannot have a single one of you falter. Our enemy today is not even that horde we are facing. Our enemy is doubt. You cannot doubt, you must believe. You must believe in the quality of our men, of our leadership, of this whole army. You must believe in our victory even before you see it."

And unspoken but clear to all of them: You must believe in me.

Kenji's gravelly voice answered the moment she finished.

"You can chain me to the Ninth's aquilifer, General," he offered. "That's how much I believe it."

There were smiles at the proposal, including a snort from one of the senior primipilii attending the meeting.

"You'd slow Yozora down, dammit," Nao grinned at the legate. "General, don't let him do it."

There were more grins as the other officers relaxed enough to join the ribbing. Shizuru's ginger-haired legate took it, although he did sham a frown at her ginger-haired primipilus.

At length, Shizuru demanded her officers' attentions again.

"I am going to talk to the legionaries tonight," she said. "I suggest you all do the same. Focus on the legions to whose corps you have been assigned and talk to both the rankers and their officers. Stiffen them up and assure them of our impending triumph. I shall give an oration before battle tomorrow, to be sure, but I want them to receive the assurance from their direct superiors as well. I shall have no cowards for this battle! Apply yourselves to ensuring that. If I see a single terrified face in the legions tomorrow, I shall blame his officers and court-martial the lot of them!"

---

She saw no frightened faces on the day: her people had done their work. To further encourage them she performed the auspices herself, and pronounced the omens "resoundingly positive" in her pre-battle address. Her lover, ever-insightful, asked if they were ever not positive when she was the augur presiding.

"Not yet," she said with a grin. "But as I am undefeated, that seems to support my interpretations."

Before the battle she left the young woman on the hill south of the stream. She installed her there with a sturdy chair, under an awning and with a trio of big and armed slaves. The Otomeian's hulking body-carrier joined them, which made the girl's retinue a quartet.

"I have no intention of losing, you know," Shizuru told her, smiling very brightly.

That got a lift of the eyebrow, to her amusement.

"Do I need assurance?" the polemarch sighed.

Shizuru chuckled. "I suppose not."

"I know you will win. Save it for a fool."

But when she acquiesced to Shizuru's request for a kiss she followed it by burying her face into the golden hair. This despite the fact that they were surrounded by people, most of whom tried unsuccessfully to appear as though they were not watching.

"Then I shall simply promise to fetch you from here later," Shizuru pledged, turning her smile to their unsubtle audience. There were coughs and apologetic nods. "I hope you like what you see while you wait."

"A fool," came another rebuke. "You know I will like it. You need assurance too?"

Then it was time to go down to the army and prepare for the battle anew. Impatient to get started, Shizuru toyed with the notion of having her horse get into skirmishes to provoke the king into attack. But such was the confidence of Obsidian's people that they needed no great incitement to start. They only waited for dawn's weak mist to lift, then went for their enemy.

The Himeans met them. As expected from the formations, Shizuru's right flank met Obsidian's left flank first. These bodies met so far ahead of the others that it took nearly half an hour before the corps next to them finally engaged their opponents. These flanks' soldiers therefore fought the longest-and had the most casualties-for either army at the end of the day.

Now the right flank was Shizuru's strongest, it being made of two legions. But this still put it at only half-strength compared to its opponent. So outnumbered was it that it actually stalled the moment it met its Mentulaean counterpart. It took a shocking amount of struggle before the legionaries at the front even managed another step.

They forced it even so, these legionaries Shizuru loved best. They strained sinews and muscles and unearthed in themselves new reservoirs of strength. The legate commanding them helped, rallying tirelessly with the rest of the officers. Soon the outnumbered corps was pushing back its opponent-at a tortoise's pace, yes, but without pause.

How do they do it, wondered the general commanding Obsidian's left flank. They should've been unbalanced and outnumbered, but they weren't and now they're pushing me. Pushing me, with only half the number of troops! How do they do it? It can't just be training. Or is it something they're trained to believe?

He was aware of his responsibilities even in his wonder, however, for he quickly rattled off an order for a cavalry sortie.

"Send in our cavalry reserve," he ordered his officers. "Have it attack their infantry from the north."

"Yes, General."

"And tell our officers to wake up. They're slacking! The Himeans shouldn't have pushed us back at all."

It was with satisfaction that he observed the Himean push come to a stop. The cavalry attacking the Himean right flank had done its job. The Himeans were still fighting valiantly, but the two-pronged assault had pushed back their right flank. They lost ground slowly but steadily and it seemed as if the Mentulaean left flank would soon overcome them.

Unfortunately for Obsidian's army, the Himean commander was prepared. In went her right flank's cavalry reserve, which stopped the Mentulaean one by engaging it. Thus relieved of pressure from the north, the Ninth and Thirteenth were rallied again by their officers and redoubled their efforts. Their backward drift was arrested and they dug their heels into the ground.

It was at this point that Shizuru sent the Lupine Division into its first engagement. It passed through the gap between her right flank and right centre, and crashed into the Mentulaean left wing's south side.

Shizuru had not exaggerated when she described her lover's old cavalry squadron as the most powerful. Beyond the skill of its fighters was the horror they continued to engender in the Mentulaeans, who still could not make sense of the lot. They rode with the barest regard for reins, often even dropping them to attack with both hands. Then there were the great sickles, allied to those chains they liked to use to tangle enemy arms. And to make things worse, the black-clad troopers also had a weird propensity to produce all manner of darts in the middle of slashes.

So when the Lupines slammed into the Mentulaean left flank, they cast the whole side of that corps into screeching alarm. Never mind that the Himeans were outnumbered, that they had been losing ground. These facts left the Mentulaean infantry's minds for a few moments in their dread.

Those few seconds were sufficient for Shizuru's right flank to exploit: the Ninth and Thirteenth pushed forward again and regained much of the ground they had lost.

The fighting at this point had been largely isolated to the armies' north flanks. With the rest of their corps in march, the Himean right centre and Mentulaean left centre would be next to fight.

Here the Mentulaean chariots made an appearance. They issued from the rear of their lines and passed between both Mentulaean centres. From there, they drove steadily for the Himean right centre. Their goal was obvious to anyone: they wanted to soften up the foe before the infantry met.

But Shizuma, commanding that corps, had been warned by her cousin about these units. She let them accelerate first, then ordered the legionaries to part when they neared.

The move was one the Himean officers had been drilling into the rankers. Mentulaean bladed chariots, like most other wheeled conveyances, could not turn at a rush. As a result, the chariots at Terantrum passed harmlessly through the Sixth for the most part. The soldiers simply reformed the lines and closed up the gaps once the chariots were beyond them.

The sally actually cost the king his chariot units in the end. For in passing through the Himean right centre, they emerged right in front of an unengaged Otomeian cavalry squadron. Which quickly dispatched them, Otomeians having learned how slow and unwieldy the carriages were compared to mounted horsemen.

The polemarch of the Otomeians, watching from the hill, said one thing: "Good."

She was not the only Otomeian among the battle's spectators, but she was the most prominent. Every Himean on that perch knew whose mistress she was and who had troubled to set her up in such comfort. So, though there was a lot of moving about on the knoll, no one was fool enough to impede the polemarch's vision.

"Got the bastards there," one of the spectators whooped, a scribe for one of the legates. "They didn't think our soldiers would be ready for their chariots this time."

"Well, but there aren't that many chariots anyway," someone else said. "They're not the problem."

"Not any longer. The cavalry's finishing them. Let's count our blessings those are gone."

"I guess you're right. But we're not even halfway."

The pair suddenly quieted along with everyone else on the hill. The Mentulaean left centre corps and Himean right centre corps had just met.

"Pluto's cock, it's too fucking thin," one of the Himeans spat shortly afterwards, before lapsing into further curses. "Those cunni are more than double them."

So large had been the Mentulaean left centre compared to its Himean counterpart that it had pushed the latter back upon impact. The legion forming that corps, the Sixth-and several cohorts of the Eleventh-rallied bravely, but only just managed to hold their ground.

"Hanazono-san is commanding that section, isn't she?" the spectator who had lauded the Otomeian defeat of the chariot spoke. "Why doesn't she send in her cavalry reserve to relieve them?"

"Because the Mentulae will just do the same thing with theirs," someone answered. "Besides, she only has one cavalry regiment to cover both that section and the one beside it-the one with the Eighth, I mean. I think she wants the enemy horse out of it as much as possible."

"They're struggling. Damn, damn, damn ! They're in trouble."

"No," the watching polemarch whispered, so quietly that none heard it. "She comes."

While the Sixth struggled to come to grips with its much larger adversary, the Himean commander had been pulling out the Lupine Division from its first fight. The situation at her right flank now having stabilised, she could afford to put her elite cavalry back in reserve.

Just as she was doing that, however, the general commanding the enemy's left centre decided to bring out his own horse. Eager to push the flagging Sixth back completely, he threw his cavalry unit at the harassed corps from the south. It was a move not unlike his left flank colleague's earlier.

The attack rocked the Himean right centre, but not for very long. Seeing the danger headed for the Sixth, Shizuru had ordered the Lupine Division out of reserve and into the fray again. This time, though, she split it into two groups first.

"Take this group-" The larger unit, carrying about two-thirds of the whole division. "-and engage the cavalry attacking our right centre from the south," she instructed the Lupine Division's captain. "The smaller group I want to attack their left centre corps itself, from the north."

The elite cavalry's pincer clamped very hard and very fast. It repulsed the Mentulaean cavalry and caused bedlam in the enemy's foot. This reprieved the Sixth from their deadlock.

To the jubilation of the spectators on the hill, the Mentulaean left centre was suddenly the one being driven back.

The polemarch of the Otomeians said it again: "Good."

Her sweating slaves nodded to her, hands convulsively clenching on their sword hilts. The other spectators continued to cheer, although their enthusiasm flagged as time went on. All corps of both armies had now entered the battle, and the whole field was a logjam. Minutes turned into an hour and still the desperate fighting yielded no side an advantage. The Himeans, it seemed, were too pigheaded to be truly pushed back; the Mentulaeans, on the other hand, were too numerous to drive off.

In that great mass of men and women on the field, though, there were still several conspicuous pockets of inactivity: the enemy cavalry no longer seemed keen on attacking the Himeans and contented itself with guarding the enemy corps' rears.

One of the watchers on the hill noted it.

"Way this is going, they won't need to," someone else grumbled to general dissent.

"How you can say that?" one demanded, sounding ready to punch in the other's teeth. "Look, our entire line's holding! They've not pushed us any less than our boys've pushed them!"

"We're not moving either! Our boys are all on defence-they'll swamp us if this keeps on!"

"Oh, aye? Want to say that to my fist?"

Another voice intruded before there could be any clouts.

"Ahh, pay that verpa no mind, Sendou-he's just bitter because Kurauchi-san wouldn't release him to ride for Atinu Camp alone yesterday. Said he could follow up on the call for reinforcements, as if Hanazono-san hadn't already done it! You'd think we didn't know spinelessness when we saw it."

And to the author of the unpopular remark: "What would you know about combat, you filthy coward? Shut your mouth or leave! You'll ill-wish our lads with your ignorant grumbles."

Others joined in and threw their own diatribes. As they berated the hapless man into silence, another voice put forth a query.

"Why don't they use their cavalry? They outnumber us even there, so I'm surprised they won't throw them in any longer."

"I think," someone suggested, "it's because of the manoeuvres earlier. With our elite cavalry, I mean."

A pause as the speaker seemed to recall the presence of the Otomeian polemarch and directed a quick nod to her out of respect. She blinked back.

"I think it's showed them they can't match up," he continued explaining. "Not to those, anyway. They might be wary of provoking our cavalry into more engagements after that, so they're keeping their horse in reserve again. Well, it could change. Just what I think."

"Well, ours is-hold on, what's this?"

The crowd on the hill quieted, all focused now on the field.

"Well, by Jupiter!" one eventually said in a voice full of confusion.

"Where's our cavalry going?!"

To his side, the Otomeian polemarch broke out a grin.

From the start of the clash, the general of the Himeans had been watching the enemy cavalry with wary eyes. Like her audience on the hill, she had just come to conclusion that the foe now preferred to play it safe. The Mentulaeen commanders would keep their horse in reserve unless she used hers to draw it out. That was good, it gave her an idea: and it was one of extreme daring given how outnumbered her troops were.

She sounded orders to peel off her cavalry from the corps whose rears they protected. They drew further and further north, riding behind the legionary corps to converge on one location. This was the rear of the Himean right flank, where they paused to reorganise themselves.

Shizuru moved the moment her horse was properly concentrated. The whole mass, ten alae strong, rode out of the battle line and past her right flank. It went west and cleared the legionaries of the Ninth and Thirteenth-then shot south and hurtled into the enemy's left wing like a battering ram.

To be precise, it smashed into both the Mentulaeen left flank and its cavalry support. The Otomeian horse was now in a group so large that Shizuru was able to deploy it against multiple targets without trouble.

A full half went barrelling into the Mentulaeen left flank's cavalry reserve. As this half was now not only larger than its enemy but also led by the elite horse, it took very little time for the Mentulaeen cavalry squadron to fold. Most of its members went flying north in a panic, the elated Otomeians snapping at their heels.

During this slaughter of their cavalry reserve, the Mentulaean left flank saw its own share of peril. The Himean general had divided the remaining half of her horse yet again in attacking it. She sent one group-a quarter of all her horse-to take the corps in the north. The other-the remaining quarter-she sent to take it from the west.

All of a sudden, the left flank became the worst corps to be in for Obsidian's footsoldiers. Assailed from three directions and with no cavalry support, it yielded to the inevitable. The whole corps crumpled into the only direction it could go.

South, smack into the Mentulaean left centre.

Pandemonium ensued on the whole left half of Obsidian's army. When its northernmost corps bolted into the one south of it, it disarrayed the lines in the latter group. To make things worse, the reason for the Himeans' battle formation had just become manifest. The "stacked" Himean right flank-Shizuru's hammer-had been steadily eating into its enemy. Now it pursued the Mentulaean left flank's flight by wheeling a full ninety degrees. This southward turn was executed in formation and saw the reoriented corps pummelling the Mentulaean left centre in its now-defenceless north side.

Obsidian's left centre was suddenly in a situation not unlike the one that had collapsed its left flank. The only difference was that it faced pressure from only two sides.

This was because the Otomeian horse troopers were too busy to assault its rear. Not a cause for celebration among the Mentulaeans, for what occupied the Otomeians was an even bigger blow to the king's troops. Shizuru's horse, massed again, charged towards the remaining Mentulaean horse reserves.

When Obsidian's high commander had noticed Shizuru's huge cavalry move, he had sent out an order for his own cavalry to concentrate. A fair counter, had it only been made much earlier in the battle. But by the time the buglers blew it out, the Mentulaean left flank's cavalry was already lost. And the Otomeian troopers had begun to regroup yet again.

So while Shizuru's infantry hammer had been turning southwards, her horse was already reconcentrated and heading for an enemy cavalry still in the middle of adjustment. It caught them unprepared and miserably disorganised. A third of the Mentulaean riders were still riding to formation when the thrilled Otomeians fell upon them.

They did it with horrific tumult, actually picking targets before they struck by yelling their claims. As these yells were all in their language, the Mentulae only heard it as insane babble. The Lupine Division was still in the lead and contributed their share: the limbs they had caught in their chains and lopped off foes earlier they now hurled at the enemy. All the while yelling that insensible, ululating whoop that sent every Mentulaean hackle flying.

The Mentulaean horse was routed and dispersed north in terror. The Otomeians were so deep into the blood-rage that they nearly followed in hopes of running them down.

It was their Himean commander who held them in check: she refused to let her own troops spread beyond control. The moment she was certain that the enemy horse was beyond salvation, she pulled the Otomeian troopers away from that enticement and sent them east instead.

Which had them riding into the rear of the Mentulaean left centre, already en route to perdition.

The legionaries knew they were winning now and hewed carnage on all sides: the Mentulaean left centre's fate was foregone. Some of its soldiers fled southwest, scrambling to get away from its eager assailants. Others did as their comrades from the now-defunct left flank had done and fled into the corps beside them. As had happened with the left flank and left centre, they threw their fellows into disorder in their flight. The Mentulaean right centre buckled, its length rolling up like a carpet. Retreat was not long after. Very soon the right flank followed and then the contest was done.

The massive army Obsidian had brought went into full collapse, most stampeding south to the stream and others to the ravines and their camp. The former leapt straight down the gulch in a bid to reach the current. It was a move of utter desperation.

Terantrum Stream actually deepened as it wound to the west. Its waters should have been higher had it truly been later in the spring, but the calendar was early and the melts late. The gorge into which the Mentulae dove had banks thirty metres above the water at the shortest drops.

Some made it into the waters, and thus managed to take with them the heartbreaking news for all defenders of the empire. But the gorge was so steep and so rocky that more died than succeeded in these attempts.

The Mentulaean forces who fled west fared even worse. These had only one clear route through the ravines and this was where most of them headed. It was the chief bridge crossing the chasm, the Bridge of the Wasp.

They found no succour there, no escape. The Wasp's bridge had become a Himean one. The Himean commander, foreseeing that this would be the main avenue of escape in the west, had disengaged half her cataphracti midway through the battle and ordered the bridge seized. This sealed off the clearest escape route for Obsidian's forces, destroying their chief hope of refuge.

Otomeian cavalry wreaked havoc to the north. Chasms and enemies to the south and the west. And still the relentless Himean infantry, its beautifully ordered line closing in.

Of the hundred thousand the Mentulae brought to Terantrum, sixty thousand perished. The Himean losses, by contrast, numbered only twenty-seven hundred.

Chapter 71

Vocabulaire:

1. Dominilla (L.) - This is the diminutive of "domina". Just as "domina" signifies "mistress" or even "madam", "dominilla" signifies "little mistress" or "young mistress".

2. The Eighteen - The original eighteen centuries of the Ordo Equester ( Equestrians, s.v. ), meaning the original eighteen divisions within that group in its early days of existence. As time passed, more divisions were added to the Ordo Equester to accommodate the expansion of the knight class, but these eighteen centuries were kept untouched. Hence, The Eighteen were the most influential knights of all.

3. Equestrians (pl. E.), Equites (pl. L.) - Members of the Ordo Equester , called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank-in fact, they were often related-but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

4. "Imperator!" (L.) - The cry of approbation Roman soldiers give their general after a great victory. It entitles the commander to petition Senate for a triumph (s.v.).

5. Triumph - A parade of floats with actors depicting scenes from the campaign, entertainers, carts bearing spoils, the army, the commander, and prisoners of war. It was a celebration of a general's victory and could only be granted if his army had hailed him "Imperator!" after a battle. The parade went around the city of Rome.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

The governor of Septentria found her nascent province significantly quieter after Terantrum. In defeating the empire's former king she had crushed the fountainhead of opposition to invasion. More than that, she had furnished undeniable proof of the invaders' power. None among the Mentulae had genuinely thought them capable of defeating the king's army, despite the previous losses of Artaxi and Terrigos. An army of a hundred thousand, it was said, was another kind of monster. An army of a hundred thousand could not lose on a plain. Yet it had, which gave every other resistance-minded Mentulaean sudden reason to hesitate.

In the days after the battle, Shizuru found more and more locals suing for peace. Mentulaean magistrates and lords sent heralds loaded with gifts: all for the Himean general, all asking for treaties of friendship-and, of course, permission to keep their titles and estates as subjects of Hime's newest territory. Those who had raised small armies to guard their cities in the war demobilised them as well and sent their arms to Shizuru along with their gifts and heralds. It was with great satisfaction, in the latter half of June, that she instructed her cousin to continue treating with the locals in her place.

"I daresay you already know what to do," she told the woman, "so I shall only say to continue it. Clarify their obligations as new members of a Himean province, take hostages, log gifts as part of the official booty, and so on. I am leaving some of my staff clerks to help yours get settled."

The other woman's green-gold eyes roamed the room interestedly. All the room's other occupants were Himean and very busy, not a single one without at least two scrolls or wax tablets. Unsurprising, because they were her cousin's people, and she knew her cousin ran a tight ship. Yet had it been any other commander there would have been more slack, especially considering their recent victory.

"Generous of you to add their presents to the army's spoils," she told Shizuru. "Along with the contents of the vaults from several cities.

Gorgo alone had, what-six thousand talents, I hear?"

"Almost that much, yes," her cousin answered. "My rankers will find themselves very much wealthier once this is finished. As will all my officers, naturally."

The senior legate, already a wealthy woman, smiled at this.

"It makes a greater difference for some than others," she said.

"It does that. But it makes a difference nonetheless." A flash of impishness in the red eyes, one of them winking. "Did you actually expect me to set aside some of the treasure just for myself?"

Her cousin was actually more familiar with the law than most would have believed; she showed this in her response.

"Legally, you can with most of the gifts," she pointed out. "Provided it shall be coming from a member of an allied town that also pays tribute, it would be above-board if its value is not deducted from the tribute itself."

"Perhaps, but these are just newly allied. It seems to me wiser to accept personal tokens only after the treaties have been signed and the first tributes paid. Anyway, I was actually referring to the treasure gathered from the cities we took or sacked. I wondered if anyone thought I spirited away a few bags of gold from the booty."

Shizuma laughed at the tease.

"I certainly did not!" she retorted. "I know you too well. Even so, you have to admit anyone else would have. Such speculations are only smart, not to mention customary. Besides, you know as well as I do that as long as the Treasury gets a bag of gold for every one you keep, its clerks say nothing."

"I know. Would you have done it?"

A shrug.

"Probably," Shizuma said with unapologetic honesty. "But not if I had as many people watching me as you have watching you."

It was her younger cousin's turn to laugh, red eyes twinkling.

"And there you touch it!" Shizuru said to Shizuma, who grinned. "You know my opponents would only be too quick to prosecute me for a misdemeanour they forgive of absolutely everyone else. So I think I would rather behave with circumspection rather than give them a chance. At any rate, it is not as though I am not swiftly adding to my fortune as the campaign proceeds. I have already begun looking into local mining concessions. There is also my perfectly legal share of the total spoils as well as the sale of our captives. I recently made over three thousand talents from the sale of Lasandre's people alone."

" Ecastor !"

Jolted out of her usual languor by that number, Shizuma tried to process the figures. How many thousands upon thousands of slaves was that? And how many millions of sesterces when converted?

"You're a Croesus, Shizuru," she told her cousin and general. "With the shrewdness of The Eighteen. What is this I hear about you forming a consortium of Gorgo's businessmen to travel down to Sosia and Argus?"

Shizuru nodded at the question, having intended to mention it at some time during this meeting.

"It is only the first step," she explained. "In the future, more consortia and meetings between The North's plutocrats may have to be convened. Our war has gone on long enough to depress the local economy significantly. Even cutting out my first term here as well as Masashi's interim, do you realise this land has been at war for three years? For those three years we have been stalking up and down the land with our armies, interrupting agriculture, overland trade, and other industries. At the same time, the empire's lords have been sucking it dry of manpower and resources to build and finance their own forces. If we are to have a salvageable province at the end of this, we would do well to start rebuilding the financial structures of at least those areas we have already claimed."

She proceeded to explain her other measures for breathing life into local businesses. They included fostering new trading agreements between Hime's other northern provinces and the cities and townships that now made up Septentria. Perhaps most importantly, the local leaders would have to be improved. Which was to say that the more reluctant local authorities were to be replaced by ones more willing to cooperate.

She had already done something like this after the Battle of Terantrum, when she had led her victorious army to the edge of Carsinian lands. Terrified by the prospect of a greater walloping than the senior legate had recently given them, the Carsinii had sent a deputation of welcome that all but prostrated itself at Shizuru's feet. Whereupon Shizuru demonstrated that her senior legate had informed her of all that had gone on in her absence: she promptly stripped several barons and baronesses of their titles and authority, then sifted through the deputation to find more tractable alternatives. From these she obtained fresh treaties of friendship and allegiance as well as a promise to get their estates and communities back in shape. Of particular importance were those lords with great farming estates. These she exhorted to get people back on the fields as soon as possible.

She had not expected mere treaties and promises to be sufficient to enforce her orders. She had also peeled off two of her legions along with the legate Keigo Kurauchi to see to them. Two more had been left in Terantrum to clean up the battlefield. Another two of the five remaining-Zanki Kiguchi had joined her with more legions after the battle with the king-she sent with the Third out of Gorgo into the northwest. Their purpose was Aggir Haggor, to relieve Shohei Nagayama and the Fourteenth.

Another pair of legions she had march to Lasandre Citadel and the Atinu Camp, led there by Shizuma and Toshi. She had summoned the latter from Gorgo at the end of the battle and charged him and the senior legate with consolidating their authority over the central-eastern roadways. Such had been the effect of Terantrum on the local resistance, however, that the paths connecting the capital to the eastern bases were now largely safe. Most of the action the two legions ended up getting was road construction and repair.

"I left Toshi-san to it, although I also had him keep the legionaries ready for battle," Shizuma told their general. "He was very happy-I think he actually enjoys roadwork! Taro-san should have joined up with him now with some of the auxiliary. They'll ensure the integrity of the whole thoroughfare from here to our Atinu base."

"I'm glad," Shizuru said, and meant it. "I need as many roads as possible safe and in top condition if I am to restore local as well as interprovincial commerce."

Her companion hummed.

"Are you setting up permanent base here?" she asked. "For the governorship? It would make sense."

"Yes, I suppose it would. Certainly any of Septentria's later governors would likely choose this palace as well. Besides which, Queen Azula has formally separated an entire wing for our exclusive use, since we have installed so many offices here already. You stayed here too during your tenure, did you not, Cousin?"

"Yes, although not in the suite you and your girl now occupy."

"I see." Shizuru looked around her command room with apparent contentment. "Well, the place suits, so let this be the official base of Septentria's governor. But I have no intention of just staying put here, I can tell you that!"

"I never thought you would, even if Terantrum does seem to have quieted all local protest." A pause. "Where do you go next?"

"Northwest again. I still owe some cities there a visit."

"Will Tasgetia be among them?"

A grin: "Certainly!"

They stopped talking as a tribune walked up to snap a salute.

"Pardon, General, Legate," he said, passing her a scroll. "A message from Legate Seigo Ushida."

Shizuru thanked him and cracked the seal on the missive.

"He is heading back east," she told her cousin, poring over the short letter. "I want him at Asterion, where he shall rendezvous with Maiza-han and the Fifth."

She went on to explain to her cousin her opinion that the old Mentulaeen southlands had long been left to languish. With ruler after ruler choosing to ignore the region, the place had become a backwater, with only the flimsiest of ties to the rest of the country.

"It worked to our advantage," Shizuma stated.

"That it did," Shizuru quickly agreed. "Nevertheless, I am determined our tenure should see it flourishing. I want more congress between it and the rest of the province. Moreover, I want it to have more congress with Sosia and Argus as well."

She then outlined her plans for improvement, including the enlargement of the current bridge connecting that region to the Himean side of the River Atinu. She also noted that she had already sent orders to another legate to march down south and build new and better roadways.

Shizuma was intrigued: "Is that what you want him and Seigo-san to do all spring?"

"Not entirely-as you know, there are still towns down south that have not sued for a treaty," Shizuru said. "They can distinguish our friends from our enemies as they go along."

"So that's the Seventh, the Fifth, and the First," the senior legate listed, before frowning. "If you want Maiza-san and Seigo-san to join up, whom are you deputing to take the lead?"

"Neither, as I expect them to work together as equals," Shizuru answered. "Anyway, the two are friendly, so I believe it should be fine. But I did specify in my letter that I want Maiza-han in charge of matters of diplomacy."

Shizuma grinned. "Worried about Seigo-san's distaste for the locals?"

The commander grinned back.

"Let us say, rather, that it would be a waste not to exploit Maiza-han's political skills," she said, to her cousin's further amusement. "Try to keep tabs on their progress from here, Cousin. I also want you to keep working on the more seditious places. Again, do what I have been doing. And pray do not neglect the local business community."

Shizuma was already wincing: unlike her cousin, she had little taste for matters monetary. Her own fortune, inherited from her parents, was cultivated on her behalf by several very well-paid financiers.

"Being your senior legate gets more and more thrilling, doesn't it?" she snipped, to Shizuru's laughter.

"So call up Miyuki-han to handle that part of it!" Shizuru said. "I heard she acquitted herself very well when she was a quaestor of the Treasury, so she should manage financials well. Taro-han can hold down the Atinu camp by himself now that he has returned. Anyway, he shall have Toshi-han and even Keigo-han within reach if he really needs support. I doubt he shall, given how peaceful the eastern province is getting."

"There may still be holdouts," her cousin reminded.

"Not for long," was her verdict.

She took her leave shortly. Then it was out of the army command's headquarters and up two storeys to her private rooms in the palace. An entire suite and all the rooms on its hall had been dedicated to her use. Thus she was able to establish not only herself but the chief figures in her army household in comfort. She met one of them while moving down the corridor.

"Hermias," she said to her steward, who strode up in his lithesome style. "Has the Dominilla returned?"

"Over an hour ago, Domina," he answered. "She is using the reception room at present."

She eyed the door that led to what was now her study, which she also used when consulting individuals in private. She had told her lover to use it if she ever needed a reception room when discharging her duties as polemarch of the Otomeians. To her knowledge, Natsuki had not taken her up on that offer before today. Her eyebrows asked the question of her steward, who revealed the identity of her lover's guest. The name set a mischievous quirk to her lips and she asked if they had been attended properly.

"We served them some refreshment, Domina," he said. "But no wine, as they declined it. Would you join them and have some yourself?"

She said she might and he left to see to it. Opening the door to the room, she breezed in swiftly, enjoying the faint surprise her entrance incited. The two she surprised were seated at a large and oval ripple-grained table; while she walked up to them they remained silent.

"My apologies," she said in tones of blatant insincerity. "Do I interrupt something?"

Alyssa got in before Natsuki could deny it: "Yes."

Out came Shizuru's teeth.

"Excellent," she purred, drawing up a seat and falling into it. She made sure to push her chair right beside Natsuki's. "It has been a while, Princess Alyssa. How goes it?"

"Good, for the most part," the blonde Otomeian said. "Your war is the same, I've been told. I heard how you won Terantrum. Outstanding generalship. I'm very sorry not to have witnessed it."

Shizuru's eyebrows lifted a little at such generosity. She thanked her for the compliment.

"I had the tale from the other barons," Alyssa enlarged. "As well as Natsuki here, who saw the entirety of it."

"She observed the battle from a hill with command of the field."

"Yes, I heard that too." The wonderfully blue eyes blinked, their yellow lashes flapping. "I wonder at the wisdom of situating your lover so near the battleground. She may have been on the other side of the stream, but it amazes me you even took the risk."

Shizuru accepted that calmly and even spoke in moderate agreement; it disappointed Alyssa, the Himean was amused to see.

"I would have placed her farther away and in a more secure location, myself," Shizuru said. "But she refused, so if you take issue with that you should blame her, not me."

Alyssa's eyes slid briefly to Natsuki's incensed ones before returning to the Himean.

"So you cannot even control her, then?" she asked, addressing Shizuru again. "That militates against your alleged ownership."

"You think you could do better?"

"Unquestionably, if this is the best you can manage."

"Oh, you would not like to see my best."

"Perhaps because there would be little to see?"

They were interrupted by a harsh exhalation from their subject, to whom they turned.

"Neither of you," said subject hissed, eyes ablaze and chest heaving, " controls me."

Up came Shizuru's hands.

"I did not say it," she said to the polemarch, who nevertheless looked ready to knock both older women's heads on the table. "It was the Princess Alyssa who did."

There was a frigid look from that princess. "Only theoretically."

The younger princess was still infuriated. Shizuru wisely changed the topic.

"Shizuma said you have begun making changes to Pascera already," she said. She was speaking of a great stretch of land west of the Atinu that she had granted to the Otomeians: Hime would retain ownership but the Otomeians would have use of it on an indefinite lease. The purpose was to ensure these doughty people had a ready place to quarter and keep training horses for the auxiliary. As the area was prime grazing terrain, their horse-loving allies had only been too glad to take over it.

"Another batch of materiel and provender should be reaching it shortly," she said. "As well as more of the horses we have taken from the defeated Mentulaean cavalry. Can the place fit all the structures you need?"

"For now, yes," Alyssa said, going along with the new subject. "But most of the cavalry is not actually on it. Many are afield."

"You think you would have difficulty accommodating them otherwise?"

"I think it would be wiser to expand it or choose another place." The cold eyes, direct yet unforthcoming, met Shizuru's gaze. "I actually came here to ask the polemarch to say it for me, but now that you're here, I might as well do it myself."

"And here I thought you would exploit my fondness for your cousin," Shizuru grinned.

"Were that possible, I would have let her say it instead," Alyssa admitted. "But you and I both know she would have told you the idea came from me anyway. Princess Natsuki's honour can be inconvenient that way."

Shizuru loosed a laugh and tried to ignore Natsuki's dour face.

"True!" she said. "It can be inconvenient."

"So here it is. Things would go better for you were you to install my people where the Carsinii currently live."

Hermias entered to set a flagon of watered wine and a fresh cup on the table. He poured some of the beverage in the cup. Shizuru thanked him and he absented himself again.

"You still suggest we expel the Carsinii entirely?" Shizuru said, to continue their conversation.

"Given how much of a headache they have been from the start to your annexation, I think you would profit from such a move," Alyssa argued in her cool and calm way. "Say you kick them out and let us take over their territory. Instead of worrying about their loyalty, you have in their place allies of whom you're assured. If we settle enough of our people here, we might even discourage most thoughts of rebellion among the other former Mentulaeen peoples. I know you Himeans settle your own army veterans in conquered regions to discourage local revolt."

The other woman conceded that, saying, "That we do."

"It would also make it easier for your nation to call up more auxiliary forces," Alyssa went on. "You would have an even nearer base from which to draw them, instead of having to send for them all the way from our kingdom. You already tried to achieve this by giving us Pascera, true. But if you actually let us settle properly on an even larger property, we could improve whatever gains you hope to achieve."

Shizuru took a sip of her wine and seemed to think seriously about it.

"You make some very good points, I admit," she said. "But I would still like to preserve some of the local horse territories before taking so drastic an act as what you propose. For one thing, having your people at Pascera is already a powerful deterrent to any rebellious Carsinii due to proximity-enough so it seems unnecessary to install a more drastic deterrent so quickly. For another, this is only the beginning of Septentria Province. Even the Carsinii may yet prove more tractable once they realise Hime's inevitability. Who knows? Perhaps they may eventually supply auxiliary horse for us as well."

Even her lover looked askance at that, she saw. She smiled at both Otomeians and held up a hand to forestall their protestations.

"You will say your cavalry is much better-and I wholeheartedly agree!" she declared. "For myself I have no desire to use any other cavalry in this war. In fact, given the option, I would use only your cavalry for all my wars! But I was thinking of my fellow generals posted in other provinces. You know we are forever sending to our allies for horsemen. It may be that once people like the Carsinii, Arvetii, and Aexellii spend enough years in Septentria, they shall be supplying such horsemen too for future generals of Hime. Look at the Numidians of Africa, for example. Or the Thracians of the East."

The two foreigners exchanged looks of comprehension at this, the high-strung protest going out of their faces. Although Alyssa reserved some doubts as to the wisdom of the idea, as she proceeded to express more clearly.

"That would be a good outcome," she said. "The difficulty is that good outcomes rarely come out of the disloyal. My cousin here has observed it herself: these people have no honour, no fidelity."

"I understand the concern," Shizuru answered. "But my decision stands. As I told your cousin here-" A wink for the polemarch. "-let us give them one more chance first, given that they were only trying to repel what they saw as violent invaders before. If, after demonstrating the benefits of our governance and providing them with ample opportunity to thrive under it, they persist in being dishonourable..."

She shook her head, knowing that said it all.

"Anyway, perhaps the first test of their honour is coming soon," she told her audience. "I plan to have messages sent to every city whose allegiance we now have. The smaller towns and villages shall have to be overlooked, but every place with a baron or feudal lord of note shall be included. Each city shall be invited to send delegates to an official meeting between us and local leaders... perhaps early next year, I think. Perhaps in March. In the future, I shall have all the Septentrian Conferences at the start of spring each year."

Alyssa made no secret of her bafflement at this speech.

"The Septentrian whats?" she demanded, sounding as though the words stuck to her palate.

"The Septentrian Conferences," Shizuru repeated. "I would like to institute these as an annual event, each conference lasting several days. They would offer a venue for both us and the locals to determine what sort of place Septentria should become. Ideally, they would also offer a chance for us to solve misunderstandings and adjudicate grievances. Thus you might consider them an opportunity for both former Mentulaeans and Himeans to work together for the common good."

Shizuru observed that the Princess Alyssa's expression could be very flat when necessary.

"What else would they work together for, naturally?" Alyssa drawled.

Shizuru barely managed to hold the smile at bay.

"As I see it, it would be of help to all of us," she argued. "We have a chance to prevent conflict by using diplomacy. The same for them. It also makes it clear that we intend to treat them as true members of a Himean province. It tells them they can influence their own future, in spite of having switched to a healthier, more reasonable master than their old one."

For a moment she thought Alyssa would laugh.

"You expect," the woman said instead, radiating disbelief, "people like the Carsinii to attend such a conference?"

"I actually think they shall, if only because they shall believe it mandatory at first. Most of them are still wary after Terantrum. The year after? They might still attend out of curiosity... and probably to make sure none of their neighbours gets the jump on them politically."

Alyssa's eyes narrowed and slashed to the still-silent Natsuki's. This foreigner of yours, they seemed to say, does some hugely unreasonable things.

"This seems a Himean concept," she said. "So I'll not try to understand or argue. I see it would be futile anyway."

"Not necessarily, but I suppose I feel the same about convincing you of it."

The Princess Alyssa inclined her head to that and took her leave, promising to call on her cousin again when opportunity afforded.

"Perhaps we may even be able to continue our conversation uninterrupted then," she said before she left, which had Shizuru smirking as the woman finally made her exit.

"Want to lay a bet on the odds of that happening?" the Himean quipped to her lover subsequently.

Natsuki's weary look made her chuckle, and she leaned to the younger woman so as to kiss her on the cheek.

"I wish..." the girl began, before shaking her head and thinking better of it.

"You wish what, Natsuki?" Shizuru prodded humorously. "Come, you know I wish to know all your wishes so I can grant them."

A dry look: " I wish the two of you would be civil."

Shizuru's eyes were very large and innocent.

"Did you see us tearing out each other's hair?" she said, causing the other to sigh about small mercies.

"I will admit, though," Shizuru added, "that I was a little astonished by her willingness to compliment me about Terantrum. Unless she was being sarcastic."

Natsuki said Alyssa was not, with which Shizuru privately agreed.

"No one could be sarcastic in praising that battle," the Otomeian expanded. "To attempt it would make one seem mean."

"Suggesting the Princess Alyssa would never let herself seem mean."

"She would not," Natsuki said. "She has too much pride for it."

"Something of which you have accused me too, I think."

"Because it is so," answered the Otomeian. "It is why you two often argue. You are in some ways very like. So you would find reasons to dislike each other without me."

She stopped to point out something before Shizuru could find an answer to this. Her finger indicated a bucket of scrolls on another table, an ivory-legged one in the middle of the room. The table itself was low and long, being meant to serve the two large couches next to it.

"Hermee brought earlier," she said. "Letters from Hime."

Shizuru rose to get to them. She hovered over the table for a moment, looking over the seals and initials on the missives. She chose one at length and left the rest, then walked over to hand Natsuki the leather canister. Back she went to the bucket to sift through the contents again, while the Otomeian stared at what she had been given.

"What?" the latter eventually said. "Why did you give me this, Shizuru?"

Shizuru stopped examining the scrolls in the bucket and turned around.

"Well, that is for you," she told Natsuki. "Look. It is addressed to you."

Natsuki turned the cylinder about and saw that it was so. And then she deciphered the initials below her own name and realised who was the sender.

She blanched.

"Well now," Shizuru said, unable to help smiling. "I am fairly sure Chikane did not hope for that reaction."

The face turned to her was all eyes, a sketch of merged befuddlement and terror. Shizuru read the questions in the emerald maelstrom and answered the ones she thought most important.

"I believe she wrote to you as a gesture of friendship," she began. "Chikane is a courteous person, so it might have struck her odd to take part in planning your future when you two have never even had a conversation. I am sure that if I open my own letter from her it shall say that scroll is her attempt to rectify that. I think too that she shall expect you to reply. Do not worry about that, for I shall help you with it if necessary. As for what she could have to say, the best way to know is to open it and read for yourself, mea vita."

But Natsuki continued to stare at the tube in her hand, viewing it as one might a box from Pandora. Shizuru thought the polemarch looked all of thirteen when afraid, and by now wanted only to smother her in kisses and hugs. She understood that it was not the right time to make light of Natsuki's anxiety, however, so she settled for offering something more constructive.

"Do you want me to read it with you?" she asked, being curious herself about what her friend had written. "We can look at it together and I can read it out loud."

The other agreed quickly, then just as quickly caught herself.

"Would-would she mind?" she asked.

"I doubt it. That cylinder feels light, so I suppose that message is mostly greetings," Shizuru said, coming back to her seat beside the girl. "It would be a short letter in that case, you see. I expect everything there is innocent enough to be shared beyond its intended recipient."

She asked Natsuki to do the honours and open the canister. The latter did so with pronounced delicacy, as though afraid the contents would break on contact with the air.

"Duh-did you tell her to do this?" she asked while breaking the familiar Himemiya seal. "Um, to maybe write to me?"

Shizuru denied it and took the letter.

"I confess I was about to, but she beat me to it," she said, as she unrolled the costly parchment. "She always did have a knack for reading my mind. Well, now, let us see what she has to say to you."

She ran her eyes over the first lines and instantly separated words and sentences, reading aloud and seamlessly the way only she could.

Greetings to Princess Natsuki, Polemarch of the Otomeians, Heiress to the Late Throne of Ortygia. Doubtless you are familiar with my name: I am Chikane Himemiya. I have no grand titles to come after it that may begin to match yours, but perhaps you can take in their stead some relationships of which I can boast. I claim the title of Friend to your paramour as well as that of Sister to one you once called friend.

I write because it seems passing strange that we should not be on more intimate terms considering all we have in common. By now you shall have learned too of my offer to adopt you into my own family. Would it not be odd to take someone as a daughter without ever having met them, even if only through a letter?

So I hope you shall understand why I dared to send this missive. Perhaps we could strike up an acquaintance with each other this way? You are under no obligation to agree, of course, but I would ask most politely that you consider it. I would deem it an honour were you to respond, and I know it would gratify your lover, and would have gratified your late friend.

Until then, please accept my compliments for all you have done for our cause in the north and my wishes for your good health. My wife Himeko sends hers as well-she would be your other mother were you to consent to the adoption. I believe you would like each other: Shizuru told me that you like art and my wife is an artist of no mean order. Even if she does have a penchant for sculpting me in haughtier lines than I would be prepared to admit for myself.

Shizuru concluded her recital with a laugh and an explanation.

"She only says that because she has no notion of how haughty she looks," she told the girl, who smiled back a question. "Every one of the busts Himeko made of her is faithful to the subject-who does tend to look down the length of her beautiful nose without knowing

it!"

Natsuki was looking again at the letter.

"She does not sound... so haughty," she said as she rubbed a finger over the parchment.

"Oh, she is not, really," Shizuru assured her. "She looks it, is all-she looks it terribly. But as you may have gleaned from that letter, she is a very nice person. Very likeable and not at all haughty."

Her smile softened as she added: "Much like her sister, actually."

She saw the swallow before Natsuki could conceal it. She reached out for the smaller hand, an attempt at comfort.

"It was nice of her to write, was it not?" she asked and got agreement.

"Suh-should I write?" Natsuki asked a little later. "A reply?"

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow. "That is your decision, as she said."

"But you think," Natsuki persisted. "I should?"

"Yes, definitely." She squeezed the slender hand and relinquished it. "But again, do not let my desires dictate your actions. Do it only if you want to, Natsuki."

The answer was surprisingly definite: "I do."

"Then write," she said, pleased.

"Buh-buh-but, Shizuru."

"Yes?"

"What should I write?" Natsuki asked, looking terrified again.

Shizuru chuckled at the Otomeian's consternation.

"Anything you like!" she said. Apprehending that this did not satisfy the younger woman, she offered something more specific.

"Perhaps you could accept her offer of friendship first and send her and Himeko your own greetings. Then you can mention something you two might have in common and see if she takes it up in her next letter. That would start the conversation."

"Wuh-what have we in common?"

The same thing came to their minds, but neither voiced it. It was not exactly ideal to start a conversation with a new acquaintance on the basis of a grief still raw.

"Literature and poetry," Shizuru recommended. "Chikane is a voracious reader of both, like you. Legislation. I know you were interested in hers and even read my copies of them, so you can put any questions about those to her yourself. Philosophy and rhetoric. She actually spent two years in Athens to polish her knowledge of both when she was only an adolescent. Art, music, culture, and anything and everything of interest to a person of exquisite refinement. Start a dialogue with her on any of those things and you can go on for days and days. You may write in Greek if you wish, by the way-hers is excellent, and I daresay she would love an opportunity to write in it. We senators only ever write to each other in Himean."

The Otomeian was very still, but Shizuru could see in her splendid eyes the beginning of excitement. She reached for the girl's hand to squeeze it again and made a final offer.

"You can show me your letter before you seal it if you wish," she said. "In case you are worried about it being suitable, I can go over it for you. Is that good?"

The fair face sported splashes of pink and Natsuki's head bobbed.

"It is good," she decided, taking the epistle now to spread before herself. She started to read it again, silently. Shizuru leaned over to nuzzle her temple, then got back up to go over her own letters. She finally settled on two of the scrolls from the bucket and lowered herself to one of the couches. She waved the cylinders at her lover when the young woman looked her way.

"Look, I got one from Chie-han today," she announced as she opened one of the scrolls she had chosen. There were some minutes of silence as she took in the contents, followed by a delighted laugh as she reached a certain passage. "Oh, good news! Senou-han has finally accepted her engagement!"

Natsuki smiled, diverted from her rereading. She knew how long the former senior legate had been pursuing said engagement and asked how the woman had finally managed it. Shizuru hastened her reading to get the answer.

"She says Hikaru-han-that is her betrothed's tata -narrowly escaped the Bankruptcy Court! Ecastor!"

She dove back into the letter; Natsuki was fully diverted.

"Bankruptcy Court," the Otomeian murmured. "This says what? She paid his debts for him?"

A few moments later, Shizuru confirmed it.

"Apparently," she said. "She says she covered the principal on his biggest debt as well as the interest on it. He can provide his daughter no dowry, of course. Naturally!"

She read a little more until Natsuki drew her attention with another query.

"The dowry," she said. "It is done among you as it is among my people?"

Shizuru took up the topic with equal curiosity: "Is the family of the one accepting the suit the one to provide the dowry for their child among you?"

"Yes."

"Then we are the same." She regarded Natsuki drolly. "Why, worried about which of us should be coming with a dowry when we get married?"

The other laughed, seeing the funny side of it too: what difference did it make in their case since both of them were fabulously wealthy as well as devoid of parents to quibble over the matter?

"Anyway," Shizuru said, "this is news indeed. Rarely do suitors have the persistence and loyalty Chie-han displayed. Oh, did he ever make Chie-han pay through the nose for her betrothed, though! Canny old Hikaru Senou. So all that patrician snobbishness does not discriminate against plebeian cash when the creditors come a-calling!"

Her young lover summed up the story: "So this - he sold his daughter in marriage?"

"More or less," Shizuru admitted. She was still scanning as she talked; it gave her no hardship to read while holding up a conversation. "It is not all that unusual. Arranged marriages too are still common in our society, and most of them are arranged for financial expedience. But at least in this case the buyer is someone who loves the person being bartered away, as well as someone said person loves herself."

She put the letter down so that she could beam at Natsuki. A naturally generous woman, she took great joy in knowing those she esteemed were happy. She was also still pleased by Chikane's letter; she truly had been on the verge of suggesting it to her friend, just to prod Natsuki into accepting both adoption and marriage that much faster.

"What a pity I cannot attend their wedding," she said to her would-be bride. "But I can at least take satisfaction in the fact that I helped make it possible. It was the booty she made during my first campaign here that bought Pater Senou's acceptance. I feel like this deserves a celebratory drink, at least."

She made to get up and fetch the wine she had left on the table beside Natsuki. The Otomeian halted her with a hand, however, and told her to remain in her seat.

"I will bring," she said, for which Shizuru gave thanks happily. What the girl actually did next stripped away Shizuru's happy mood, however. Natsuki rose from her seat in one smooth motion-and promptly toppled to the floor like a statue kicked off its pedestal.

" Jupiter !"

She stared at her lover after the utterance, her scraped knees shrilling pain. She had only managed to save the girl from smashing into the tiles by diving recklessly down herself. Natsuki's body had fallen into hers instead, and she stared at the young woman now against her breast.

The Otomeian looked as astonished as she felt.

"My god," Shizuru whispered. " My god! What happened?"

To her further shock, the response was a rich torrent of laughter.

"Stupid!" the Otomeian gasped. "I-Shizuru, I was-"

She gurgled again, ignoring the Himean. Shizuru waited in silence and eventually Natsuki calmed enough to get out a proper sentence.

"Thank you, Shizuru," she said, eyes wet with mirth. "You saved me."

"Indeed I did," Shizuru replied, more flabbergasted than ever. "And glad I am of it, but what was that? Why do you laugh? You had my heart tripping when you went down. If it was a joke, I fear I did not enjoy it."

Natsuki's hilarity had subsided enough by now to allow her to drag herself into a better position. She curled an arm about Shizuru's neck and used the other to point to the base of the chair she had just vacated.

"I forgot I removed it," she said, index finger aimed at the prosthetic leaning against the chair. "I forgot and-ah, I stood up and walked. It was a surprise also to me."

Shizuru stared for another moment. Cautiously, she drew the white arms about her neck and got to her feet, bringing Natsuki up as well. She guided the Otomeian back to the chair.

"Well, could you please be more careful?" she asked, still a little shaken. "I doubt my heart could live through another such scene."

She put a hand to her brow and ran it backwards, pushing it through her hair. A glance down at the polished stone flooring put in her mind's eye an image of how Natsuki could have been hurt. Bruises would have been the least of it; the fool girl could have broken her nose!

"Jupiter and all the gods," she muttered, perturbed by the thought of the other being harmed. "That was too close for my taste. Now I need that drink even more."

The other straightened in her chair as if to get up again. Shizuru froze her with a glower.

"Stay there!" she actually snapped. "I can sit at the table and get it myself."

The Otomeian seemed to find her anxiety entertaining.

"I wanted to sit there," the young woman grinned, gesturing to the couch on which Shizuru had been seated before their little drama. "I can put on the leg first."

But the Himean would not let even let her do that and carried her over instead. Natsuki waited patiently while Shizuru went back for her cane and prosthetic, as well as the cup of wine that had started all of it. Shizuru drank down half of the beverage when she returned, sitting down heavily beside Natsuki.

"Surely you can check if you have it on before you rise," she murmured. "That much is doable, surely."

"I forgot."

"Well, do not forget."

Natsuki had not yet managed to lose her grin. She shifted on the couch and edged nearer her lover.

"Sorry," she said with a brush of her mouth against Shizuru's jaw. It was followed by another on the cheek, and on the corner of the lips; the older woman was weakening. "I am sorry I scared you, Shizuru. I will take more care now, see?"

The answer was wry: "You could not take less, Scamp."

Fingers scratched at her scalp with another "Sorry."

Shizuru turned towards the kisses, soundly defeated. She was not really angry, only unsettled by the near-accident, but she supposed the woman in her arms knew it. Still she was tempted to ask if this was the Otomeian's revenge for Terantrum. For whatever anxiety she had felt just now was probably nothing to what Natsuki had felt then.

Little though she showed it at first, she thought, and held the pale face in both hands. A grave starkness of line gave Natsuki her astonishing beauty, but it sometimes made reading her difficult. Even Shizuru—who could read the polemarch best by now—occasionally likened it to teasing out fresh feeling from an already-carved statue. She had seen at Terantrum, for instance, that Natsuki had been worried before the battle. Yet she had not seen the true complexity of the girl's apprehensions until after she returned with her victory.

She had gone back to the hill where she had installed her lover with the screams of imperator still ringing behind and around her. What joy she had felt! What glowing warmth! What pride in herself and her indomitable army! All of which had fled from her body at the polemarch's actual greeting.

It shocked me so much I forgot about my accomplishment, she remembered, shaking her head. For upon Shizuru's approach, the polemarch had smiled wincingly—then dropped her face to her hands and issued a heartbroken sob.

So outrageous was the incident that Shizuru was not the only one confounded. Both Himeans and Otomeians nearby had fluttered in a panic at the polemarch seemingly in anguish. Shizuru's own thought was that someone beloved to her lover had fallen, although she wondered who that could possibly be. Neither of Natsuki's cousins was in the battle and she had known it. Even Mino was safe, for he had not been part of the fighting!

She had shepherded the girl away from the rest, cooing and clucking to her.

"Why now, what is this?" she had spoken. "Why the tears, mea vita, when we have won here?"

"I knew," Natsuki had said, dashing away tears. "I knew you would win."

Shizuru had smiled, held her closely.

"Then," she had asked, "why are you crying?"

"Because," the other had growled, looking as if she would thump her, "you did win!"

It had been fear, Shizuru had apprehended, of the irrepressible kind those who love always feel. She knew Natsuki had been telling the truth when they parted before the battle: that the girl had possessed every faith in her generalship. Yet she saw in those tears afterwards the equal of her own intolerable worries-the ones that said, even had Natsuki not been crippled, that she would still have banned the polemarch from all future battlefields.

How good to be able to tell her afterwards that the worst of the conflict was finished! What she had put down at Terantrum was the biggest and stiffest single army the enemy had left. It would be years before they would be able to raise and equip another such again. That meant years during which she would be able to work on pacifying her province. And in the process, lower the chances of resistance recrystallising.

"It is over now," she had told her lover, laughing a little but kindly at the embarrassed girl. "That is likely the last gigantic army in this war for many years, mea vita. You have no more reason to fear for me, as it is unlikely I will need to take such risks again. Even if I do, remember this day and what I did. I crushed a hundred thousand on the field! What need would you ever have to again be worried?"

Thus had she assuaged her lover's ragged nerves that day. The real challenge had come after: how to reassure Natsuki that none would think less of her after that outburst on the hill. The polemarch had been so mortified by her lapse that it had taken all of Shizuru's verbal skill to convince her she could show her face again to the army.

"If you've not noticed," she had told her then, "some of my own men are crying. For that no one will blame them. Do you understand, meum mel ? No one will ever forget today, not in Hime or in these territories or anywhere else once word spreads of it! Why not cry, then, when they know they achieved that thing of which others can only dream? They have written themselves indelibly into history!"

She was eminently conscious of the prominence her own name would have in that history. Inspecting the enemy's camp following the battle, her mind had raced with ideas of how she would represent the battle in her triumph, when the time came to have it . Some of those impressive bladed chariots would have to be put into storage; several alae of the Otomeian cataphracts and Lupine riders borrowed for the parade; perhaps a few hundred actors hired to don the looted arms and armour of the Mentulae; the blinding gold furniture in what they discovered to be the king's tent collected against the day.

Although that furniture would have to be refurbished, the Tyrian purple tapestry sections removed and probably replaced. She doubted the bloodstains marring their lustre would ever go away.

If there was anything that dampened her pleasure in Terantrum, it would have to be that one mystery. When her troops had taken the enemy camp, it had been entirely deserted. The soldiers meant to guard it had obviously fled the moment their great army folded. Even the Mentulaean army's slaves and noncombatant members had vanished. When they saw their side was the loser, they had scattered far to the north and the west.

Only one tent among all those thousands had not been devoid of inhabitants. This was the largest shelter, almost a pavilion, an impressive production in finest cloth and leather with gilt wooden poles. Going inside, the astonished Himeans had found a strange tableau of bodies: corpses still in their armour and strewn all about the floor, stained by their bleeding. They had been caught in the middle of packing for escape, one could see from the scene. These were probably among the first to have bolted the battle, little though their haste seemed to have served them, ultimately.

It was a scene of assassination, the Himean officers determined, and the story likely of treachery. For how else could each body in the tent have sustained such localised injury, such clean cuts to the neck and stabs to the kidneys? Whoever had slain them had been trusted enough to get close to the victims.

As there were no living people left in the camp, there was no way to tell the identities of these killers. The mystery was only made greater when the Himean commander arrived to form her own impressions. At the centre of the slaughter was a large man she identified without difficulty. It was the late king of the Mentulaean Empire, his neck cut so deep that the white of the bone showed in it.

Chapter 72

Vocabulaire:

1. Ancilia (pl., L.) - Singular ancile ; these were among the most sacred of Rome's/Hime's possessions. The story goes that one shield fell from the sky and at the feet of King Numa Pompilius (s.v.). A voice proclaimed that Rome would rule the world so long as this shield lay safe and in Rome's possession. To thwart those who might wish to steal it, Numa Pompilius had 11 replicas created. The original shield was stored with these in the Regia (s.v.), rendering it impossible for any potential thief to tell which was the real thing.

2. Augur - A Roman priest of divination, belonging to the College of Augurs. It had 12 members, half being patrician senators and the others plebeian senators. Note that to be a member of a priestly college was a distinction, and in the present setting, members are co-opted by their fellows, usually with a view to keeping the priesthood in the same families. Augurs were entitled to wear a toga trabea (a purple and red toga) and a lituus (a curlicued staff) when performing their duties.

3. Diadem - Here, a white ribbon worn by sovereigns around their heads, not a metal crown.

4. Flamen dialis (L.) - The priest of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. He had a great many prohibitions on his person, which made the priesthood invidious for those with political ambitions. Among other things, he could not ride a horse or even come into contact with iron.

5. Numa Pompilius - This was the second king of Rome (Hime), preceded by no less than Romulus himself. He was supposed to have ordered construction of the Regia (s.v.), although it is disputed whether or not he actually used it for what the Ancient Romans believed (as a royal residence), given some of its features.

6. Regia (L.) - One of the oldest buildings in Republican Rome's Forum, this was supposed to have been erected by Numa Pompilius and served in much later times as the meeting place of the pontifices for certain occasions as well as a repository for some very holy objects (see ancilia ).

7. Rex sacrorum (L.) - A patrician priest who, like the flamen dialis (s.v.), could not pursue political ambitions. Even though he was not the head of the College of Pontifices, he was nevertheless revered as one of the holiest of Rome's priests.

8. Tace (L.) - "Shut up!"

9. Vestal Virgin - Women of typically august birth consecrated to the goddess Vesta at a young age. They tended the goddess's sacred hearth and were expected to be chaste for the duration of their service, which lasted 30 years. After that, they were released from their vows and new vestals would take their place. The chastity they maintained during service was held to be necessary for Rome's existence.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Shizuru waited for Zanki to return to Gorgo with the Eleventh and Twelfth, then rested those legions for four days before again setting out. She was heading back to the northwest and the echoing valley that had forced her to retreat.

Her march was broken only by the intermittent appearance of more embassages. These were always from towns or feudal lords nearby whom she had not yet visited. All came loaded down with gifts: often bags of gold and silver, sometimes jewellery and pieces of art. In one case it was six slabs of pure gold cast into rough ovals no one man could carry. When Shizuru had them weighed each was found to be worth a little more than three talents. Half a million sesterces from one baron alone!

"See the riches of the mines in the northwest," she told her lover when the latter came for a look. The two of them dissolved into laughter for reasons none of her officers could understand.

She struck treaties almost without pause now, but took care to have insurance. Any town of size she encountered she pressed for noble hostages and weapon caches. Let any rebellious Mentulaeans in the future worry about where to find more gear! For one of her objects in returning to the northwest was to settle the matter of the remaining foundry city in that region: Arvern, shaded by the land's northern ranges and near the easternmost edge of the Ruviccan Forest. But first there were the legions and that enemy force at the echoing valley.

The second legate she assigned there actually rode out to meet her. Thus she knew he and Shohei had been victorious even before she reached Aggir Hagor.

"Nabbed some twenty-three thousand of them just yesterday," he revealed, ranging his horse beside hers. "We were going to have the Firensian auxiliary escort them down to the Atinu camp today."

She lifted an eyebrow at the number. "Do you mean to say there was no fighting?"

"We made them surrender, Fujino-san. You'll see how when we get close enough."

"I daresay I will." She studied his face. "If there was no combat, what gave you that scratch?"

He touched the long scab on his jaw with a grimace.

"My own clumsiness," he sighed. "And that idiot the buglers have for an apprentice! The oaf puffed his horn while passing my tent. My shaving razor slipped."

His commander laughed, eyeing the cut afresh.

"You keep it sharp," she told him.

"Very, or I actually get more scratches. Women are lucky in that sense," he said. "You don't have to worry about cropping your jaw every day. I'm blessed in that I've smooth skin, but I've a cousin for whom it gives problems, as the poor fellow has acne. So he's never without a bit of beard."

"Troublesome indeed," she said, wondering what he would say if he knew about all the pains she actually took to keep hair off her body. Considering she often plucked instead of shaved-when the slaves she used to do it were available, anyway-she thought she went through more trouble than he did.

She asked if he had punished the hapless bugler yet.

"Put him on shaving duty for all the officers," he grinned. "Every scratch he makes goes into a tally. If he reaches five we're shaving his head."

The Otomeian beside his commander murmured something and Shizuru grinned.

"I believe the prospect of that punishment just horrified the polemarch," she told her legate.

"Baldness isn't as bad among us as among you, Natsuki-san," said Kenji, addressing that young woman and marvelling again at her side-saddle seat. How did she control the horse like that?

"It's not ideal," he said, "but no one would consider it shameful either. Besides, we wouldn't be shaving off all of his hair. Just enough to leave an embellishment on it."

The polemarch's eyes asked the question. Kenji grinned at Shizuru and hoped she would not make him answer.

"Let us just say they plan to put another head on his head," Shizuru offered.

When they arrived at their purpose the flush had quite vanished from the polemarch's cheeks. Shizuru went off with Kenji to see her other legate while Zanki drew up the troops in a square.

Shohei and Kenji led their commander to a high ridge from where she could see their work. The camp she had built herself and left in the care of the Fourteenth was still there. Fortifications spread from two sides of it like wings: they ran perpendicular to the shoulders of the valley. A similar camp and line of earthworks could be spied at the other end of the vale. Whereas the ramparts on the Fourteenth's camp covered much of the valley's maw, though, the ones at the other end extended barely a kilometre in either direction.

"Oh, you are men after my own heart," she told her legates, who laughed. "I suppose they came down screaming surrender when they realised they would be penned in?"

"We also sent heralds to inform them of your victory at Terantrum," Shohei said. "Just to pile it all on, you know! After that, it took only an hour of fortification by Kenji before they came spilling out of their camp. I expect they debated first about whether or not we were being honest about Terantrum. Took all the fight out of them when they realised it must be true. Else how could you have had the confidence to send away another three legions to us, Fujino-san?"

The other legate chuckled low in his throat.

"Although we know you would have had the confidence for it anytime, Terantrum or no Terantrum," he said, getting a grin out of Shizuru.

"Did you see much action before Kenji-han arrived?" she asked Shohei, who shook his head.

"Very little, since it was a stalemate," he said. "We declined to go in there and they declined to go out. Just a lot of prancing about and occasional skirmishing, with both of us trying to get the other abandon his territory."

"So now we have all these prisoners," she said, glancing at the great mass of men and women under guard in front of Shohei's camp. She noted their wan, rather lean faces. "Impressive they lasted so long, though. I suppose they ran out of things to forage after the first month, or that you made it harder for them later?"

"As far as we could, although even that was difficult," Shohei admitted. "No way I was committing too many men to fighting in that sound trap! No, most of it's just that they ran out of forage eventually, as you say."

"Anyone interesting from their command tent?"

"A baroness and some other minor aristocrats," Shohei answered. "Awfully snooty for all that they surrendered! They also came with some nice little moneybags. All the coins have old Obsidian's face on them."

"Of course they do."

"The curious thing is," Kenji interjected, "that our captives seem to have no idea of what happened to the Prince Calchis either. I brought him up when we were interviewing them, but it seems they had in fact assumed him to be defeated. By us when we first came to Aggir Hagor, no less. We would have been coming from his direction, after all."

"The prince is supposed to be among their finest commanders," Shizuru noted. "Did they not find it at all difficult, such an assumption?"

"They say the army he had left was very small-probably twenty, twenty-three thousand-so I suppose such a defeat would have made sense to them. I don't think they're lying, General, for what it's worth. They said it was difficult to accept, but what else could they have supposed had happened? No one expected him to dissolve his army, as our informants are now saying he did. Nor did they expect him to go like a bubble-the man just vanished into thin air!"

Shizuru looked at Aggir Haggor's cliffs and inhaled luxuriously.

"Well, the mystery of the prince shall keep," she told her legates. "How many mysteries Obsidian's dynasty casts to us from beyond the grave! Anyway, to get back to business: we need to get these to Atinu Base and the slavers as soon as possible. Their leaders will be war prisoners, of course. They were part of the king's army. Our Firensian allies need not handle the delivery by themselves. The Fourteenth has earned a little light duty and can see to it."

They asked her whom she wanted leading the cavalcade.

"Kenji-han, I think. You have earned a little light duty too," she told that legate.

The taller of the two men stretched his arms out before him, the reddish-blond hair on them winking in the sun. His fingers laced and flexed, the joints popping.

"If you say so, Fujino-san," he said. "Although I wouldn't have minded more heavy duty, if that's what you call it."

"Wouldn't have mind- tace !" the other legate exclaimed, startling both Shizuru and Kenji. "I was stuck babysitting some ninnies too cowardly to venture out of their crib while you were fighting the best battle of the campaign! What I wouldn't give to have been in your place! Wouldn't have minded more heavy duty, he says. I'd chair Fujino-san around the Forum for a year if only she'll throw me such duty! With Natsuki-san up on her lap, even!"

His two auditors had doubled over laughing, both shaking their heads.

"Oh, Jupiter," Kenji wheezed out. "I can actually see it!"

"I cannot, thank the gods!" Shizuru had one hand over her cuirass's belly. "I shall certainly try to find you some heavy duty, Shohei-han, so you need not stoop to so inglorious an act. Although I should note that I doubt you could actually have done what you offered. I am much heavier than I look, even if the polemarch is not."

Shohei lifted two hands the size of buckets and clenched them, with a complacent look down at his gladiator's frame.

"Always up for a challenge," he said. "And after spending the last few weeks just prancing before an enemy camp, I'd welcome a bit of real work."

Shizuru obliged him with a tough job: she had him build a road from Aggir Hagar all the way to Vedio. She gave him three legions to do it and a very tight schedule.

"I want you at Vedio by the second week of August and no later," she said. "So you shall have to hop to it! For myself I plan to take the Second and the Twelfth over to Arvern to see if it will open its gates to me. After that I shall either meet you at Vedio or send you a message about where to go next."

"Tasgetia," he guessed.

"Probably," she hedged.

Thus she beat a rapid march to Arvern. She had torn down its sister-city two months past and was prepared to do the same to it should it be uncooperative. But Arvern had trembled when Comus fell and had also heard of the Battle of Terantrum.

When Shizuru reached it with her two legions, the city's gates were open and the members of its council waiting outside the walls.

Shizuru showed them that she was inclined to be merciful.

"Because you opened your gates there shall be no sacking," she said. "You may keep your lives and, for most of you, your titles. The same for your property, which I shall not touch save in cases where merited. All caches of arms and the contents of your armouries shall be confiscated, for instance. This is in the interests of peace, which you say you wish to exist between us."

"However, a great many of the weapons used by your late king came from here," she went on. "And I know you were paid for them. You have thus profited from a war waged against Hime. I shall levy a war indemnity of both materiel and coin from you, as a result. This shall be held separate from your first tribute."

"I also need hostages," she stipulated, "from the families of every member of your town council. In addition, I require hostages from the families of the twenty biggest or most influential businessmen of the city. These may well overlap with the council, so people who belong to both categories will only be counted once. If they are on the town council, they cannot be counted among the twenty businessmen."

"You shall be prohibited from crafting arms or armour in bulk for the next five years. Bulk orders shall be those that exceed ten units per item. The only way to get past this prohibition is to obtain a dispensation from the governor. That would be me for at least the next couple of years. Should I be unavailable to receive the request for an exception, the governor's senior legate shall suffice. Obviously, any bulk order coming directly from me or my senior legate shall also be granted exception."

She also demanded every finished piece of armour and weaponry from every smithy in the city. She exhorted them not to despair at the economic costs of her measures towards disarmament: she would help them obtain new business from the rest of the province and beyond.

"In fact, you can create a consortium of representatives this moment," she said. "As soon as you can, send them to the capital. My people will assist them in gaining new contracts for metalwork-although, for the next half decade at least, it shall be for other types of goods than armour and weapons. You shall have to adapt, but given what I have seen of your smiths' talents, I daresay it should not be too difficult."

That this was true could be seen in the gifts her army carried away when they left the city. Arvern's leaders had presented to her five different crowns and three sets of gilded armour when they came suing for peace. One crown in particular drew her admiration. As opposed to the heavy circlets she had thus far seen, it was instead a delicate wreath of silver wire and golden leaves.

"A shame it must go into the army's spoils," Shizuru said to her mistress. "It may end up just being melted down to make more bullion for the Treasury. That is unless I can have it entered as a donation to one of the temples, of course. But I shall have something similar made one day, with finer leaves and little emeralds for berries. I want you to wear it, mea regina. As a present from me."

Though the other woman was of a people Hellenised enough to prefer a diadem to a crown, she thanked her lover and said it sounded beautiful.

At Vedio, Shizuru found her other legate right on schedule. There they recombined the legions into one army. The great Himean war machine swung north and made for Tasgetia, skirting the Ruviccan Forest the whole way. With five legions roadwork was faster than ever, and still the messengers from the northwest's nobility kept coming. By late August they had settlements of peace from the majority of the Gannian aristocracy. At the same time they drew up outside of the city that was their destination.

The centre of druidic learning was a veritable metropolis, Shizuru decided. She had not actually imagined Tasgetia to be so large or so urban-looking. Oh, there were still enough details to lend it a sort of wild appearance! There were groves and gnarled trees all over, for instance, growing right next to structures like shops and houses. But the jumble outside the city's gates-which were open, she noted-was yet more reminiscent of Gorgo than she had thought to expect. The walls of the city-proper also appeared to be of stone, in some places surmounted by towers.

They may style themselves magicians out of the trees and the mist all they like, she ruminated. But all of this shows me that the druids have grown beyond their earthy roots. They have been urbanised by the growth of the empire and its societal development. Which means they have grown too in the sophistication of their aspirations. They shall say they serve the Mentulaeen People and their gods. No doubt they believe it, what they say. But Tasgetia shows me that they will also always serve themselves. After all they have lost and all they have managed to hold on to, I do not blame them.

Shizuru eyed the city from a distance and told her officers to make camp. For several hours they toiled about the business until every tent and palisade stake was in its proper place. Having thus established her force right in front of Tasgetia, Shizuru then proceeded to do something not even her officers had expected: she sat back to chat with her mistress and twiddle her thumbs.

"Let them sweat it out," she said, when asked if her officers should send a herald. "If they are in earnest they shall send one themselves."

Which they did not half an hour later, complete with two of their higher-ranked druids and the noble whose family ruled the city.

Shizuru treated them with all due courtesy when the embassy was brought to her tent. She even stood up to make introductions and conduct them to their chairs. And when that was done she herself put drinks in their hands.

The Mentulaeans were patently bemused by her friendliness. They had expected her to be rude and standoffish given that she had forced them into seeking her out. The truth was that Shizuru had never intended to be rude or standoffish. It simply had not been in her plans to gratify the druids' sense of importance by being the one to approach them.

"Well, then," she said when all were seated. "What may I do for you fine people?"

That scaled up the ambassadors' befuddlement. One of the two druids in the group spoke up, a woman Shizuru estimated to be some forty years and with a scholarly look about her. Her name was Raethis, and like most of the druids they had seen thus far, she was in predominantly white robes.

"Please excuse us, Fujino-san," she said, showing she was familiar with the proper methods of address for Himeans. "But we were under the impression that you came here for Tasgetia. Certainly one cannot think otherwise when you not only encamped yourself outside of the city but also built a new road to it."

"I have improved the existing roadways, it is true," Shizuru conceded. "Does this offend you?"

"By no means," Raethis replied. "Although it strengthens our impression that you have grave business with us. You would not have bothered improving the road had you not thought it possible that you would need to use it again."

"Oh, well said!" Shizuru answered. "I see now why your people used to consider the druids their chief intellectuals."

"They still do that now," Raethis replied with some dignity.

"Of course, please pardon me. Nevertheless, there are other sources of learning for your people now, are there not? As well as other scholars and tutors."

Raethis admitted the truth of this. Her fellow druid, a man of the perhaps the same age named Sendral, took it upon himself to say more.

"But there are those who continue to regard us the best sources," he said in tones that made clear this was the only acceptable view.

"They come to our city for edification, for healing, for guidance and advice. To this day many of the nobility of our land prefer to send for druids from us when they need tutors for their children. Some even request our presence at their councils, as our familiarity with law and tradition make us valuable advisors. Tasgetia remains a centre of culture and learning for the Mentulæan People."

"Which may well be why I decided to pay it a visit, do you not think so?"

The pair of druids exchanged glances. Shizuru eyed the other members of the deputation. All were nobles, including one they had introduced as the leader, the Baron Marlus. But they said nothing and made no signals, content to let the druids take the reins.

"Then you came here for that reason?" Sendral asked. "You came to visit-to see the city?"

"I did, of course. Am I allowed?"

Raethis held out her hands in a supplicant's gesture.

"There is no reason you should not be, General," she said, quickly amending: "Provided you intend the city no harm."

"Why would I?"

"Several Gannian towns-including the once-great city of Comus!-would say why."

Shizuru sighed out a breath.

"I would that people would not paint me so procrustean," she uttered. "Surely you know by now that I spared many other cities.

Those settlements you mentioned closed their gates to me and harboured enemies of Hime. I note that your gates were open the moment I arrived. Although, of course, I cannot note so swiftly whether or not you harbour enemies of Hime. Are you suggesting now that you do?"

"We do not!" Raethis and Sendral said simultaneously.

Shizuru grinned at the two for their duet. She saw now that these two were the only members of the deputation who mattered. The Baron Marlus might be the greatest noble of Tasgetia-as well as the source of the bags of gold they had presented to her earlier-but he was not its leader, so much was patent. The druids pulled his strings.

"I have no reason to wish any of you harm," she pronounced. "Only those who declare themselves my enemies or enemies of my people merit my aggression. It would be wonderful to see the city, if you are indeed willing to have me visit."

The members of the deputation appeared to relax just the slightest fraction.

"Then please permit us to serve as your guides," came the offer from Raethis. "Our chief druid is also in residence and would consider it an honour were you to consent to meeting him."

"I echo the sentiment," she said. "Has he any grand rituals planned or is this a straightforward consultation?"

"I believe all he intends is a friendly interview. Unless you wished him to perform a ritual of some kind? Perhaps of blessing? Or of prognostication?"

"Oh, no," she said. "I was merely curious, as it might be more proper for me to don my own augural vestments and trappings in that case."

There was a brief silence as they took that in.

"Augural vestments... What are those?" Raethis enquired curiously.

"They would be the toga trabea and lituus," Shizuru answered. "The traditional clothing of augurs when performing their duties."

"You wear them?"

"Yes."

"Do you mean... you perform auguries too, yourself?" Raethis said smilingly. Her expression had the faintest air of indulgence. Shizuru recognised it as the tolerance a professional grants to the inexpert dabbler. "You know how to do it?"

Shizuru smiled widely.

"Of course I do," she told them. "I am a member of the College of Augurs of Hime. That makes me not only an augur of the state but also a priest of Hime's official religion."

That wiped the indulgence from the druids' faces. Their jaws went slack.

"A priest?" Sendral gasped, his astonishment speaking for the rest of them. "Formally? A recognised priest?"

"Yes."

"But you're commander of an army!" one of the nobles cried, finally jolted out of silence.

"Yes, and a proconsul, governor, and senator besides," Shizuru said. "These offices are not exclusive."

The Mentulaeans still looked shocked by what they saw as an incongruity. It was clear she had transgressed some boundary with her offices and she wondered what she had said. One of the druids finally revealed it.

"A priest cannot command an army in our world," Raethis explained. "It makes no sense. To us."

"So I see," she replied. Inside, she was wondering. The druid Cirnos had not reacted this way when she had informed him of her augural status. Or had it been because she had not clarified that her being a state augur also made her a state priest? She had not thought it necessary to clarify that, because all Himeans understood it. Not so a Mentulaean, then? Perhaps Cirnos had dismissed her as a dabbler in the way Raethis initially had?

"I understand this confounds you somewhat," she told the deputation soothingly. "But my being a priest surely should not be seen as a disadvantage in our dealings. At least you know I am not blind to the importance of religion."

The two druids nodded, obviously still chewing on this fresh intelligence. As for the Tasgetian nobles, they were silent again.

"Is your chief ready now to meet me?" she prompted, eager to enter the city. They agreed.

"Hiempros-that is our chief druid-also said he would be glad to come to you here," Raethis added. "Although he did think you might want to see the city, in which case it would be his pleasure to have you as a guest in his home. As you see, we have been prepared to admit you as guests to our city from the beginning."

Shizuru said she was obliged to them for such hospitality.

"I would like to see the city, as a matter of fact," she said. "As would some of my officers. Perhaps one of you would be good enough to ride ahead and inform your people thus? Some of my soldiers shall be coming along and I would not like to alarm your people at the sight of them. I come in peace, as I said. Make no mistake, however: I shall be obliged to act should anyone so much as cast a stone at my men."

---

Wily as ever, Shizuru brought her mistress when she entered the city. Since said mistress emanated her usual otherworldliness and also came accompanied by her pet, the locals (especially the druids) were impressed from the beginning.

"You knew they would stare," Natsuki accused her in the Otomeian language. "You wanted to use me, use their fear."

"I would rather term it awe, or even reverence," Shizuru replied, also under her breath. "Does it trouble you that I employed you and Shizuki so, Princess?"

Natsuki took the philosophical tack: "It is no less than what I expect. But if they ask me to conjure up a spirit, My Commander, I shall have to leave you to it."

They made no such demands of the polemarch, although the chief of the druids did request to meet Shizuru in private. Which meant in the reception room of his residence, a two-storey edifice that looked more like a town hall than a private dwelling.

The chief druid himself let Shizuru through the front doors-which were of bronze plate old enough to have turned verd-along with some of her officers, the polemarch, and a group of soldiers peeled from their three-cohort escort. The polemarch brought her own security detail.

While the rest of her party settled on some prepared benches within the entrance hall, Shizuru walked with the chief druid to a central courtyard. The chief druid's home looked almost like a Himean mansion, she thought, at least in its basic layout. It was the details that localised it. There were the rough drums of wonderfully mottled stone that made up the peristyle's columns; the weird knotted patterns on the ceiling; the recognisably-Mentulaean tableaus painted on the walls. On the grassy dirt floor of the unroofed courtyard was also a sculpture one would never find in a Himean home: a great slab of stone over two large boulders, like some primitive and archaic table.

Interesting, she thought, taking in all these things together. Very large and not unhandsome.

She was not awed by the chief druid's dwelling, whether for size or for beauty. Her own house in Hime was even larger, and-though she supposed architectural taste varied-by far the more attractive. Even allowing for regional differences in design, though, there was no question that her house was the more striking, its materials the more precious. Even the handsome mottled stone of the chief druid's columns paled before the coloured marble sheathing of her own pilasters and pillars.

Still, she could appreciate what the chief druid's house suggested. From it any visitor to Tasgetia could see that the chief druid was important, was an institution of ancient background and current potency. One needed only a few changes to transform the house into a temple, which she supposed was part of the point. This was a place that supported both spiritual reverence and earthly gathering.

She stopped short of the peristyle and turned to her host.

"It reminds me," she said, "of the Domus Publica."

His head cocked to the side.

"What is that?" he asked with genuine interest.

"The official home of the pontifex maximus," she said. "That is the head priest of our state."

"Oh, of course," he said. "He would be something of my counterpart, would he not?"

"Yes-although like me, he is a senator. Which means he could technically command armies were it ever necessary, just as I do."

That reminder of her oddity caused him to frown, although more in confusion than disapproval. He went on to reveal a degree of knowledge about Hime that was not common among Mentulaeans.

"I knew before that you chose your priests from among your senators," he told her. "But I thought those who were so chosen functioned from then as priests in the main. Are there no restrictions upon them intended to preserve their sacredness?"

"It depends on the priestly office," she said. "The priests we call the rex sacrorum and flamen dialis have a great many constraints hedging them round. The latter, for instance, cannot touch anything made of iron. But these are special priesthoods, quite unlike the minor ones. My own priestly college-the Augurs-has no such requirements of its members. The priesthoods forbidden martial careers are decidedly the exceptions, since Himeans generally do not see martial enterprise as incompatible with holiness."

"And your Vestal Virgins? Are they also exceptions?"

"They are indeed sacred, but not considered pontifices," she said. "Rather, they constitute the luck of Hime itself."

"By their chastity, I heard."

"That's right."

He looked mildly puzzled.

"Your religion is curious," he concluded. "You forbid intimacy to some women and say it constitutes a nation's luck, then permit your priests-the leaders of your religion!-to lead armies without seeing a problem. Our own priests do not command armies, General Fujino. It is a solecism to our kind, what your priests do so casually."

"So you say, Hiempnos," she grinned. "Yet I would challenge what you say about your priests not commanding armies. You may not have done so as the generals, for most of your history, but you have nevertheless led them as the people pulling the strings or as key counsellors."

"Yet not as the direct commanders," he said. "In that capacity you mention, we merely guide the military commanders. We offer insight when required, we try to guide them towards the side of right. We do not give the actual orders that see men deprived of life. That is different."

"Is it different too when you deprive men of life as human sacrifices instead?"

The watery blue eyes gleamed. "Ah! The great taboo."

They had drifted to a bench facing the open court and settled themselves on it, Hiempnos doing so rather creakily. Shizuru studied the stone table again as they spoke, wondering if it was where Hiempnos himself made his sacrifices.

"I have already had arguments galore about it," she said cheerfully. "With the druid Cirnos, for example."

"Cirnol! How is he? We heard he was incarcerated."

"Yes, in the capital and under the Queen Azula's orders."

His smile turned very slightly bitter.

"Queen no more, surely," he said. "If her secession from the empire was not sufficient, surely the king's death is."

"Queen of Firens," she clarified.

Still the bitter smile: "I see. I'm astonished you gave the capital to them too, though."

"We did not. She acts as an administrator of it under our authority, as well as our liaison to the king."

"The King of Firens."

"Yes."

He drew a long breath through his lips, the air stirring the hairs of his beard as it whistled in.

"I had no idea," he said, "that you were a priest."

Shizuru was intrigued. "Does it make a difference?"

"It might," he answered. "You are technically a fellow religious. As such you have some knowledge of how to tap into the energies of the aether, into the will of the divine."

"Do not all people, in a way?"

"Yes, but a layman's connection to the spiritual is much more tenuous. Else why would there be a need for people like us?"

This time, she laughed outright.

"I fear that in the Himean case, the answer is chiefly for prestige," she said. "It takes a long time to produce a true druid, I am told. Twenty years, was it not?"

"Yes," he agreed, unsurprised that she would have done some research. "Even longer if they pursue a difficult specialization. Those of us who study medicine can spend as much as twenty-five years on our study."

"Well, it can take as little as an hour to make a priest of our state," she countered. "In some cases, even less. I believe I was made an augur in no more than ten seconds."

He was stunned and she explained it for him: "When a priest dies in one of the priestly colleges, the vacancy is typically filled by one of his relatives. All the remaining members of the college need do is vote for which relative they believe best suited to it. In my case the voting was so quick because the vacancy I was filling was my uncle's. He had no offspring and there were no other senators of the name Fujino, so I was the obvious choice."

"But is there no training at all?" Hiempnos enquired. "Is there no formal preparation after you have been selected, no attempt at a religious education?"

"Not really, or not of the kind you druids undergo," she said. "Most of us know the usual rituals and motions, so all we really need to do is brush up on them with a quick peek at a manual if we do forget. Most of our religious activities are already codified anyway. There is a chart of omens for the College of Augurs, for instance, so that those who cannot bother remembering our longer manuals can quickly glance at a list of the most common signs instead."

At his aghast expression, she added: "Pray do not misunderstand. Our priests may not undergo the training yours do but they are priests of the state nonetheless. Whatever rituals I perform in my own priestly functions are sacred. Our lack of lengthy training-and our military careers, come to it!-do not make us any less authentic. I have taken the auguries for every one of my battles in this war, for example, and every one of them was categorically positive. As you can see, my readings have been correct thus far. This should suggest I am no less an augur than, if you would permit comparison, yourself."

But he was still confounded by all she had revealed to him, especially the differences in training between their two peoples' priests. His creased-paper brow was more lined than it had been at the beginning of the meeting.

"I fear I have confused you," she said, observing his mental struggle.

"No, please do not apologise," he responded, with a strong shake of his venerable old head. "I did ask, and it is not your fault if I am slow to comprehend. The ways of our people are not like, so much we can see now."

He let some moments pass before he spoke again.

"So you have defeated His Majesty, King Obsidian," he said. "You and the Firensii, who now claim their own kingdom." A short pause. "They say you burned the king's body at Gorgo?"

"To be precise, Queen Azula did. She said it was the practice of his ancestors."

"It was," he confirmed. "Did you place the ashes in the mausoleum at the capital as well?"

She said they had and added: "If your concern is whether or not it was actually the king we cremated, you may ask anyone in the capital. We permitted all the inhabitants to approach the bier before we burned it, to pay their respects."

The faintest smile from Hiempnos.

"And to make sure everyone knew it was actually Obsidian lying dead there," he said.

She smiled back.

"I do have several thousand witnesses," was her answer.

He nodded, untroubled by his former king's end.

"You and the Firensii have triumphed," he said. "Between the two of you, any final elements loyal to the old dynasty will certainly be too afraid to offer any more resistance. You are now essentially master of the empire-or Septentria, as I hear you prefer to call it. This much is clear to anyone with eyes. No one would dare oppose you for the moment."

Though Shizuru found that qualifier-"for the moment"-intriguing, she did not interrupt.

"This means we cannot afford to oppose you either," Hiempnos finished. "You see we did not even attempt to resist when you marched here with your army. Tell us then what it is you demand. What would you have of the druids, Shizuru Fujino? And of Tasgetia, which has long been the Mentulaean People's central place of culture and education?"

"Only your cooperation," she told him. "Tasgetia now falls within my fief, which means it must adhere to the laws of my province."

"Which will see druids like me and our faith banned."

"Not at all!" she said, sounding astounded. "Save if a tenet of your creed were the assault of Hime and Himeans, there is no reason your faith should suffer under my aegis. It is not our way to tamper with the religions of the peoples we take into our fold, Hiempnos. Ask the people of our other provinces. We respect your history and your traditions as a people, and the druids are the acknowledged authorities on those. I would see you prosper and continue to spread education among the people of my province."

"Yet you would bar us from human sacrifice."

"Yes, I would." Her smile remained but her voice was firm. "That is one thing that must change. It shall now be unlawful to sacrifice people in the name of religion throughout the entirety of Septentria."

His face was already of the sort that always seemed slightly fretful, being of small and pinched features. It tightened further at the injunction.

"So many of the things you say seem to be contradictory," he told her, albeit without a tone of argumentation. "You say you are a priest of your people's religion-yet you command armies yourself. You say you will respect our history and tradition-yet you outlaw one of traditional ways of sacrificing to the gods. How can these things be reconciled with each other? I find it difficult to believe your assurances to us as a result, you understand."

She nodded to the words.

"I can see that," she said gently. "But the fact remains, as you stated earlier: I am now master of this land. I have already told you that the druids may continue to exist and even thrive under my governance provided they cooperate. That means giving up some things and modifying others."

"You are saying our faith will no longer be as it was."

"Is any faith ever as it was?" she asked. "Our own changed over the centuries and continues to change today. We learned which practices served both our gods and Hime best, and which ones were better left by the wayside. We learned what could go together-like our founding god Mars and our traditional war goddess, Bellona-and what did not. We learned compromise, Hiempnos, just as you must now. Learn to change what you must so that you can survive, so that the core of your faith-its deepest, most precious teachings-can be carried over into the new age. Even Hime's religion had to make compromises and evolve as the years went by. And now here we are, stronger than ever, because we saw the truth. Everything must change, but not everything must be lost."

He had sat with eyes shaded, gaze trained on the ground. Now he looked up and met her red eyes without fear.

"Is this when you threaten to burn down Tasgetia," he asked, "if we fail to comply with your regulations?"

That amused her and she showed it.

"Actually, this is when I invite you to the first Septentrian Conference," she said, before proceeding to describe what this was and what it entailed. He listened with interest, she thought, and perhaps a touch of confusion. She concluded by saying she would send a formal invitation to it once she had already fixed the date and place.

"I assume the Baron Marlus and the other nobles shall send delegates as well," she concluded. "The most important thing is to ensure that your city is properly represented."

He seemed to regard her anew, as if what she had just said required that reconsideration.

"You mean what you say," he said after a moment. "About this conference you are planning."

Shizuru noted the wonder in his tone and took him to task for it.

"I would hope you realise that most will be suspicious of your plans," he explained. "Not just because you are an invader but because of our own rulers' pasts. The late king himself once invited some opponents to a banquet only so he could have them cut down at the dining table."

"Most politic of him," she said dryly. "But you just showed why I believe your order valuable and worthy of preservation. You are among the best repositories of your people's history, the professional intellectuals and scholars! You have much yet to teach your people, especially in your function as the aristocracy's tutors. For instance, I hear you tutored the Prince Calchis, Obsidian's son."

"I did," he said simply.

"Did you tutor his sister, Princess Faris, as well?"

It did not seem to discompose him at all that she knew those names and his acquaintance with them. His voice when he answered was calm.

"Yes. The siblings were much of an age and took the same lessons together." He looked out at the stone table under the sunlight, the simple earth floor. "They were very bright."

She hummed a soft sound.

"We were tracking him recently," she said with cool detachment. "As we had wondered where he betook his army. Our scouts learned that he went north from Vedio and should have ended up here. Yet our scouts also say that no army fetched up outside of Tasgetia when it should have. This leads me to think he disbanded what remained of his army and fled, anonymously. Did he happen to visit you or seek your aid? Perhaps send you a missive?"

"No," he said. "Else I assure you that the whole city would have learned of it. The prince's face and seal is known here. You may ask anyone if they saw him recently. We have no notion of where the prince has gone. Perhaps, given his father's fate, permanent anonymity?"

She bobbed her head to show she saw the sense of this. The topic of the prince was shelved away, but not -so the glint in her eyes told him-forgotten.

"As Tasgetia is now a Septentrian conurbation it must observe my gubernatorial edicts," she said, returning to their true business. "One of which we have already noted: there is to be no human sacrifice. Furthermore, I shall require hostages as well as the contents of your arsenal."

"Our arsenal," he said with some asperity, "is found in our minds."

She nodded to that approvingly. "Even so, you take my meaning. There are surely weapon stores in the metropolis."

He said he understood and asked what other demands she would make of the city.

"My officers are already seeing to it," she said. "I instructed them to do so while we had our interview. Now I think I had best see how they have been faring. We shall remain here until at least tomorrow, Hiempnos, so do feel free to approach us or send to me should you have concerns on anything. You will find me more reasonable in that respect than your former rulers: I believe in giving people a fair hearing. If you are wise, you will learn to take advantage of it as well as all the other changes my governance will bring. Cooperate! In doing so, you may even see your old ascendancy over the local peoples return."

"And if we do not?" he asked mildly. "Cooperate, that is?"

"Ask the people of Comus."

He took a deep breath.

"We are your subjects now," he said. "So we will do as you say. But fair warning, Shizuru Fujino, from one augur to another."

"What is it?"

"You said yourself that everything must change. That means even Hime's reign over us will not last forever. Our gods too are powerful. They will someday take exception to this."

"If that happens, our gods will be prepared," she replied evenly. "I should know-I'm descended from two of them."

She got to her feet and helped him up gently, one hand taking his, the other holding his elbow. After saying a farewell, she turned and went back to her retinue, who had gotten to their feet too. Her officers clustered around her as they exited the building and joined the rest of their comrades.

"I sent Ikue-san to empty their armoury and Natsume-san to grab hostages," Shohei said as they walked down the street. Though it had been paved with flagstone and bordered by a stone hedge and gutter, there was as much green on it as there was grey. Grass sprouted from every tiny fissure where soil and seeds could find a way to exist.

Little wonder, Shizuru thought, considering how much of the city's interior was actually bare of paving. The paths and buildings lay skewed at haphazard angles because they ran around stretches of earth dominated by greenery. Many of the bigger stretches actually had small copses. She supposed they were sacred because of the obvious age of the trees, which were so tall they shaded most of the nearby buildings. The first lords of Tasgetia had probably decided to build the city around these rather than commit sacrilege by levelling the place.

Hiempnos might have suspected her of thinking Tasgetia's urban planning barbaric had he seen her naked surveillance of the city. Yet the truth was that Shizuru had no such critique to make. The Forum of Hime itself held some bizarrely planned buildings, as earlier Himeans had required sacred structures to be oriented between north and south. There was also the outlandishly shaped Regia, which contrived to have no side facing any of the major directions. Yet it had been part of the city since King Numa Pompilius and was so sacred that it housed the ancilia of Mars.

She wondered where the Tasgetians housed their sacred artefacts and whether or not they had anything like the ancilia. She resolved to investigate the city more closely the next day, for the rest of today would likely be spent dicking with the druids. Perhaps she could ask them about their holy relics? One suspected the chief druid's house held some of these. She rather suspected the stone table in the latter's court to be one. How odd it had seemed surrounded by all that manmade architecture, by the predominantly red walls with tops picked out in gilt! Inappropriate, in a way. It should have been in a forest, shrouded in blue mist.

Hiempnos too was a bit of an oddity. So old she fancied his hair and beard having cobwebs, his joints popping with arthritic effort whenever he levered himself off a chair. Yet the man was obviously no dotard, going by the clarity of his conversation. Actually less visibly-cultured than the pair he had sent to meet them at her camp, the ones named Sendral and Raethis. Devoid of ornament as well, although she had seen enough metal on the others to know that druids were not forbidden such vanities. Physically small and almost timid of movement. Someone temptingly easy to dismiss unless you spared time to talk to him.

She had a strong suspicion that what she had met was a mask. The true Hiempnos was probably the image she had kept seeing in her mind while they had their conversation: a wizened and wise man leaning over a stone slab in a forest. A man who chanted a lay of the ancients while plunging a dagger into a man's heart for in exchange for a glimpse of the future. Ancient and archaic, a creature with its own laws. Did that make it incapable of following someone else's?

Outside of Hiempnos's abode there had been perhaps a hundred other druids clustered to see the invaders. As they marched down the street and towards the city gates, Shizuru found even more of these holy men and women out to observe them.

"We were actually talking to Raethis and some of the other elder druids while you conversed with their chief, Fujino-san," Zanki told her. "And as you asked, we probed for Calchis."

"Let me guess," Shizuru said. "Nothing?"

Her legates confirmed it.

"Although I don't believe them, obviously," put in Shohei. "Of course he passed through here! There was only one way for him to go when he fled."

"He might be here right now, you know," said Zanki.

"He might even be one of those druids," smiled Shizuru.

"That would take balls!" Shohei laughed, eyeing the faces of the locals with increased suspicion. "D'you think we should've brought Nao-san to do some searching?"

"I doubt it would have worked here," she said. "They have too much invested in the prince. I disbelieve any of them would have betrayed him. Hiempnos himself invited me to question anyone in the city. That either means they are all in on it or that the prince was so heavily disguised when he passed through that none of the local population even noticed it was he."

She beckoned her mistress nearer and the latter acquiesced with a cluck to her pet. It slunk after them, seemingly unruffled by all the attention it was getting from the locals.

"What a curious city," Shizuru said. "Ruled by the religious, which gives its leaders the wherewithal to shroud even their politics in sacred motive. They were critical of my generalship in light of my being a priest. Yet they can condone the sort of slaughters I hear their beloved prince perpetrated among the peoples north of the Holmys. Even that deputation they sent was interesting. They send three nobles and only two druids, but every one of the nobles is a cipher. It is the druids who run the place. I wonder... Is that the sort of thing they would like to happen with the Prince Calchis? And would he permit it?"

She was speaking very quietly and in the middle of their escort, which meant they were separated from the nearest Mentulaeans by several lines of soldiers. Her legates and the polemarch listened to her observations, murmuring agreement with several of them.

"Well, we have done what we must," she said. "We can expect them to send another deputation to settle the terms of their treaty with us before the sun sets. That should see us out of here the day after tomorrow. I want to be away as soon as possible."

"Where to next, General?" Shohei asked her. "Fancy taking a gander at Kereia just yet?"

She smiled dreamily at him.

"I fancy a small stroll further west instead," she said. "Do any of you feel like taking a peek at the Kingdom of Celsor?"

Chapter 73

Vocabulaire:

1. Aquiliferi (pl.), aquilifer/o (s., L.) - The standard-bearers of the legion, so-named for the eagle emblems on the standards (called the Eagles). Aquiliferi were chosen from among the ranks with a view towards personal bravery. They and the Eagles could become rallying points for soldiers, so aquilifers were respected and paid more than the rankers.
2. Consuls - The chief magistrates of Rome, elected each year in pairs. The senior consul is the consul elected with the most votes, and thus the more prominent of the two.
3. Friend and Ally of Rome - This is taken from a title the Ancient Romans granted some non-Romans in recognition of a service done to the Republic. It carried significant prestige, especially as it was formalised by a decree of the Senate. A lot of foreign kings lobbied to have it applied to them. Some even spent impressive amounts in bribes for that purpose.
4. Helepolis - The biggest siege tower in history, built under the orders of Demetrius Poliorcetes for his siege of Rhodes. It was more than 40m tall.
5. Hispania Citerior, Hispania Ulterior (L.) - Two of the more important Roman provinces, the Spains. Spain was divided into two parts back then, and the one that was nearer Rome was called Hispania Citerior, the one more distant, Hispania Ulterior. H. Ulterior or Further Spain was more important because its mountains were rich with ore. Modern-day Cádiz lies there.
6. iugerum (L., pl. iugera) - A Roman unit of measurement for area, specifically for farmland; one iugerum would be a little over 2,500 sq. m.
7. Knights - Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks.

8. Nausea (L.) - English takes this word from Latin, where it originally signified "seasickness".

9. Praetor - The number of praetors elected in a year varies from six to eight. They serve as magistrates of the city second only to the consuls (s.v.). Among other things, they serve as judges in the law courts. The praetor urbanus or urban praetor as well as the praetor peregrinus or foreign praetor are the most important since the former deals with all civil litigation in the city and the latter deals with all litigation concerning foreigners.

10. Princeps Senatus (L.) - Leader of the House. In the Roman Senate, once someone is chosen to be Princeps, he or she retains that title for life, and thus has a very important say in discussions. He is also traditionally the senator who heads discussion on foreign affairs. To be Princeps often means one is a very remarkable speaker. Here, it is Reito Kanzaki.

11. Scutum (L.) - The Roman legionary's shield, roughly oval in shape and convex. It was made of wooden planks covered by canvas and leather and bordered by iron. It was well over 100cm tall and around 45cm wide.

12. Sestertius (s. L.) - In plural, sesterces or sestertii. This is a common Roman/Himean coin; made of silver. The conversion is thus: 25,000 sesterces = 6,250 denarii = 1 silver talent .

13. Tarpeian Rock - The traditional place of execution for traitors and murderers who were Roman citizens. The more radical tribunes of the plebs (s.v.) liked to make threats about getting the People to cast others from it, as that was how traitors used to be executed.

14. Tribune of the Plebs - One of the most important offices in Ancient Rome, reserved exclusively for plebeians and purportedly existing to protect plebeian rights; in truth, by the time referenced, they had mostly become associated with demagogic antics . They were a prime law - making body, though, and vested with the power to veto just about anything.

15. Wolf-fed Twins - Shizuru refers to the founders of Rome/Hime thus because of their legend: Romulus and Remus (who were sons of Mars) were supposed to have sucked milk from a she-wolf. The history she recites is that of the Iulii Caesares, which is replaced in this tale by her family.

16. NOTE on the bridge - For the sceptics. Like some other seemingly ridiculous things in this story (e.g. Shizuru's little trick at Stych Gorge), this is actually based on history: Caesar bridged the Rhine thus. A few historians still challenge his alleged method of construction, but most engineers concede his claims to be feasible.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

She did end up going to Kereia first, as it was already so near. Here they found another surrender instead of a siege. That great city was like the rest, disinclined to resisting the woman who was now the most feared power abroad the country. It furnished everything she asked of it, from information about the late king and his court to noble hostages and supplies aplenty. The drought of the past year was no longer, and the Kereians were only too glad to oblige their new foreign governor.

Although none of them could still tell her the location of the missing prince.

"So the mystery of Calchis goes on," Shizuru chuckled after another fruitless investigation.

"Maybe he really has absconded permanently," Shohei contemplated. "It would make sense, Fujino-san."

"Would it?"

"I'd say so. He has no more imperial armies. We also captured practically all of the king's court, including most of the surviving royal offspring. Prince Calchis knows he's alone and a wanted man."

But Shizuru said she disbelieved his position as hopeless as Shohei described it.

"For one thing, we did not capture the Princess Faris," she said. "And I have my suspicions about where that other royal sprig has her true allegiances, wherever she is! The prince is not as devoid of potential allies as one might imagine. I know we have treaties now with most of the Ganni, but if the prince were to ever come offering an alternative, they would not be so quick to refuse it. For as long as the prince is at large, he is an alternative. I want ears to the ground constantly looking for him. That is one fugitive royal I do not deem inoffensive."

"Are fugitive royals ever inoffensive?" her other legate, Zanki put in. "Gods know the Senate gets its share of deposed kings seeking help to regain their thrones every year."

"I can remember one or two times, but I wouldn't say it was yearly," retorted Shohei.

"We have one in Fuuka petitioning the House for that right now!"

He looked to Shizuru for confirmation of this.

"Ariobarzanes of Cappadocia," the commander specified, smiling. "But it is understandable that you would not notice, Shohei-han. Most of the Senate does not! They only remember foreign deputations when those come bearing heaps of gold to spend on senatorial lobbyists... and I fear poor King Ariobarzanes would not have that with him. Cappadocia is not a rich land, even if it is strategically important. Kanzaki Princeps Senatus shall have to remind our fellows of this and flog up a little interest in the king's plight."

"I don't envy him," said Shohei, not at all embarrassed. He could not feel put out by his own ignorance as he truly was typical of the members of Senate. Who could really drum up much concern in the doings of a distant king from somewhere around Asia Province? Why, they could barely drum up interest in the Mentulae before Obsidian's attempted invasion-and the former Mentulaean Empire was much closer to Hime than Cappadocia!

"At any rate, we should count our blessings," Shizuru told them. "Prince Calchis and any other members of Obsidian's dynasty still at large do not have a Hime to run to for help! This makes our impending trip to Celsor more important. After all, its current sovereign is married to one of Calchis's half-sisters."

Shohei asked if she expected Calchis to be seeking sanctuary with them.

"Not really," she said. "But as we are already so near the border, why not take the detour to check? It is but a hop and a skip from here to the river boundary."

Before they took that hop and skip some messengers from Firens found them. From these Shizuru learned more about the conflict Firens had been having with its neighbours. As she had herself predicted, the Nervii west of Firens had launched attacks not long after the latter seceded. This had kept her allies busy while she herself had been trying to deal with Obsidian.

"We've reason to think the Nervii were even egged on by the late king," one of the messengers said when asked for details. "Some captives we tortured for information claimed it."

"Crafty old King Obsidian," Shizuru said, knowing she would have done the same. "If it is true, he must have sent them messages while he was still quartered here in Kereia. That would have kept Firens busy the entire time he was moving his army east."

"Yes, or we would have sent you reinforcements earlier," the Firensian in the lead, a distant relation of Entei's, said apologetically. "My cousin asked me to convey his abject regrets for it, Fujino-san, but we were beating off an army ourselves when you were dealing with Obsidian's. He also charged me to send you his earnest admiration for Terantrum. It's in honour of that battle and all your victories that we tender this gift to reaffirm our alliance."

He beckoned to two of the men accompanying him. They brought forward a large flat object bundled in rough woollen fabric. That it was heavy was clear: a third man had to assist them in placing it on the table.

Shizuru and her officers watched, dying of curiosity, as the Firensii finally untied the ropes holding the cloth wrapper. All that revealed that was another cover of hide, however. Removing that too, the Firensii finally unveiled their king's personal gift. This was a huge shield the size of a Himean scutum, its silver surface a riot of chased metal sculpture. It was superb work and obviously worth a fortune: even its border was ivory with inlaid gold.

"His Majesty was also very pleased by the confirmation of his status," the group's leader explained, referring to King Entei's formalisation as a Friend and Ally of Hime. This title had been bestowed to him by Shizuru upon his daughter's delivery of Gorgo, but it had been more in the nature of a promise by then, still requiring as it did the ratification of the Senate. Before leaving Gorgo again for her second northwest trip, Shizuru had received a letter confirming that ratification. Thus Entei of Firens now had his name inscribed in the list of foreign powers and individuals granted privileged position by the government of Hime.

His ambassador now enlarged: "We also sent a fresh train of provisions to Gorgo for your legions two weeks past. It should be reaching the capital soon."

Shizuru thanked her Firensian allies with warmth, asking if they needed assistance in dealing with their troublesome neighbours. She knew from her informants that they had been managing competently, but it was customary to make the gesture.

"As it is, we've had victories of our own," Entei's ambassador said with quiet diffidence. "Though nothing to compare to yours. We're fine for now, Fujino - san. We've not held the Western Frontier for centuries without learning a few things. The Nervii are completely back on their side of the border and our lands as well as yours are safe."

Shizuru commended them and their king for their martial performance and promised to come should they ever be pressed enough to need her.

"Although I have a feeling that shall never happen," she confessed to Natsuki that evening, the two of them retiring to the bedroom of their tent after having dined with the Firensian envoys. "It would take a great deal of pressure before His Majesty King Entei decides to ask for my help."

For once it was Natsuki who had taken her work to bed that evening. She was looking over some papers, so it was a few moments before Shizuru got a reply.

"Because," the Otomeian proposed, "he prefers that you see him as capable?"

Shizuru flapped a hand in good humour.

"Oh, they would all prefer that, to be sure!" she said, before asking about the stack of paper on the other's lap. She was told that it was the latest endorsements for the Otomeian army's promotions.

Before the creation of Natsuki's title, promotions had been reviewed back in the capital-or, in the case of troops stationed in one of the kingdom's other provinces, in one of the regional capitals. Prior to each review, recommendations would have been tendered by the officers to their current or last general. If approved, the recommendation would be escalated to a conference.

This was a discussion of the relevant officer between said general and the officer's superiors. It had to be held in one of the Otomeian capitals because it was overseen by at least one member of the Otomeian High Council. In cases where the Otomeian army was distant from the kingdom's capitals, a significant amount of time could pass between a commendation and a decision.

Now that there was a polemarch on the field, however, she acted as both the commander receiving the recommendation and the councilmember reviewing it. This was since being polemarch gave her the status of a general as well as a member of their monarch's High Council now: the Princess Alyssa had clarified this soon after creating the position and gaining her father's approval. Most of the Otomeians thought it excellent. The polemarch's presence made the creation or preferment of their officers much faster.

"But why then?" the polemarch prompted, recalling Shizuru to their earlier subject. "Why will the Firensian king not ask for help?"

"Put yourself in his shoes, Dearest," Shizuru said. "Imagine all you know of me is what he does. Do you really think he would be so keen on having me traipse all about his land? Oh, I do not say he misdoubts my faith as an ally! I think, rather, that he would prefer not to present a temptation to a one he essentially views as a conqueror. It is why he would be quick to claim the Nervii across his border manageable. Were he to truly have trouble fighting them, he fears it would give me a pretext for establishing camps in his kingdom."

"But you would do so to protect him."

"Indeed, but it would grant the beginnings of a foreign foothold all the same. What is to prevent us from keeping those camps there for years afterwards, citing defence against the Nervii as the cause for their maintenance? Sooner or later those camps would turn into towns, and those would, by the terms of our agreement, be considered Himean settlements even if they are in Firensian lands. Not too savoury a prospect for a king still establishing his realm."

Natsuki nodded, seeing the danger.

"You are not the problem," she said, "but those who come after."

"Yes," Shizuru answered. "Although I do hope that a little more time in my acquaintance shall see him trusting me better. He is a client of mine now. Even once another governor takes over Septentria, I am obliged to look after the interests of King Entei and his offspring."

Natsuki put down the paper in her hands.

"His offspring?" she echoed. "Like Queen Azula?"

"Yes."

"And whoever becomes his, ah, successor?"

"If they are of his House or have been adopted by him or Azula, they remain my clients, as will any successor of their line by blood or adoption."

The Otomeian was fascinated. "It goes on so long?"

"If you mean the patron-client relationship, yes," Shizuru told her. "And it passes down the line on my side too. For example, my great-grandfather was the governor responsible for pacifying most of Hispania Ulterior and even parts of Hispania Citerior. In establishing most of the communities there and granting the Extended Rights to several, he made a great many clients, sometimes whole tribes. Now those tribes-the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of my great-grandfather's clients-have me as their patron."

She stopped to point at the sheets of paper again, having been studying what Natsuki was doing.

"What does it mean," she asked, "when you fold the upper right corner?"

Natsuki explained her method: "It is for consideration. Upper left, I approve it."

"And if you fold not at all, you decline it?"

"Yes."

"I notice most are for consideration," said Shizuru. "I suppose that means you wish to do more digging to see if they deserve to be promoted. But why do you decline a promotion, usually?"

The polemarch laid out her reasoning. Some of the Otomeian officers, she said, still tended to promote for reasons of bravery and skill in combat-natural, given their culture. But Natsuki knew the truth that not all great warriors made for great leaders. Some great warriors served the army best by staying among the regular soldiers.

"I tell the officers to give bigger shares in the spoils or decorations," she said. "But still some insist and try to promote them. Stubborn. And stupid."

Shizuru asked the question just out of curiosity: "You do not think good fighters should ever be promoted by virtue of their skill in combat alone?"

"Not if the promotion is to command," Natsuki answered, before elucidating that it might be permissible if the promotion were to something like Shizuru's own aquiliferi. She also imagined a possibility of stationing such warriors in locations of greater tactical import or prominence in battle. In exchange, they could be granted higher pay and shares of plunder. Still a promotion of a sort. But they should not be granted powers of command, in her opinion.

"That will put the many at risk," she said, "simply so one man can be improperly honoured."

Shizuru agreed wholeheartedly and said so, secretly marvelling at the wisdom in the girl. For at only three-and-twenty years-she had her last birthday on their way to Tasgetia-Natsuki was still very much that. Her Girl.

"But Shizuru," the Otomeian said, drawing her back to their earlier topic, "about the patronage."

"What of it?"

"Does this mean you will be patron of the Men-no, I mean the Septentrian communities?"

"Certainly," said Shizuru. "It is the inevitable outcome for situations like this."

Natsuki folded a corner on another sheet and moved it to the bottom of the heap.

"In-evi-table," she repeated softly. "Hmm... for governors of a new province?"

"More or less," her lover answered. "Technically, I already am the patron of all the aristocrats I installed as local authorities. The same for all the ones I allowed to retain their positions and charged with rebuilding their fiefs. It is simply too early in the war and in the province's history for them to articulate the relationship the way a Himean would articulate it. Even so, I predict that within a couple of years the Septentrians will be sufficiently aware of Himean socio-political mechanics to actively claim or seek patronage from me."

Natsuki thought about it for a moment, looking up from the sheet she had been perusing.

"You will have many clients," she concluded.

"I already have many clients," Shizuru corrected.

"In Hime too, no? Besides the Spains?"

"Of course. As well as in Campania and Capua. And, as you know, even some in Argus and Sosia. You did watch me enlisting clients in those provinces, after all." A start, followed by a laugh. "Oh, and all around old Alba Longa in Latium, naturally! I always forget to mention it because it seems self-evident."

Natsuki asked why it should be.

"The Fujino hail from Alba Longa, in Latium," Shizuru explained. "To be precise, my ancestors used to be its kings and queens. When my forebear Aeneas fled Troy-he was the son of Venus, you know-he fetched up there and his son established the dynasty. Later, the kings of Hime warred with and conquered Alba Longa. Instead of exterminating its royalty, they co-opted it into their own nobility. In so doing they enhanced their own claim to pre-eminence, you see."

"Because," Natsuki ventured, "they wanted to say the blood of Venus was now part of Hime's royalty?"

"Indeed. Besides, the mother of the Wolf-fed Twins was in fact from our clan. The blood link was there from the beginning."

Shizuru reached for a handful of black hair. It fell through her grip.

"Well," she went on, "my family might have turned Himean, but we continued to own tracts of our ancestral land throughout the centuries. Some of our first clients were from those areas, when Hime went from being a monarchy to a republic."

The Otomeian had put down her work completely, engrossed in this recital of Shizuru's family history. She transferred the stack of recommendations to an end table and asked if Shizuru still had much of her ancestral properties.

"I do," was the answer. "Pater and I actually added to them. Before my great-grandfather revived my family's failing fortunes, the five hundred iugera he owned in the Alban Hills was just about all he had left to his name. For the Fujino after him, it is a hereditary possession that we must strive to keep in his memory as well as for the sake of our illustrious lineage."

Then she consciously demolished the loftiness of her sentiments by supplying a wicked addendum: "Besides, the Alban Hills are so close to Hime and so fertile that real estate there will only get more valuable. I can get a million sesterces right now for every hundred of the two thousand iugera I own."

Natsuki had already dissolved in hilarity by the time she reached the price quote.

"You will take me to see this valuable real estate one day, Descendant of Venus?" she chortled.

"Why, naturally!" Shizuru scooted closer to tickle some ribs and had a shoulder nipped in retaliation. She pushed the girl down and covered her, purring when legs wrapped around her waist. "This is one of the things I did promise you of our marriage. I shall take you exploring to places you have never been. If anyone asks you, that is why we are going to Celsor, by the way. Tell them we simply felt like doing a little sightseeing."

Natsuki scoffed and said no one would believe a Himean senator with an army would cross an international border for the sake of tourism. In fact, Shizuru counted on that disbelief. She even slowed her march to the waterway separating Celsor and her province so that any lookouts posted there would have time to warn the Celsorian sovereign. By the time she drew up her legions beside the river called the Flundanus, she knew the other bank was already full of scouts monitoring her progress.

She walked out with her officers and those of the Otomeians to see the river. This had been the boundary between the Kingdoms of Celsor and the Mentulaeans for more than a hundred years. That it was mighty was not in question, for it was past ten kilometres wide where they stopped to view it. It was also very dark and fast, which told them it was dangerously deep. The shore on either side of the water was a verdant slope, trees and other well-watered flora thriving.

"What do you think?" she asked her lover, smiling at the dark blue expanse before them.

"I have seen bigger," was the verdict.

Shizuru chuckled her on the chin, laughing.

They marched further south to where there was supposed to be a bridge connecting the two banks. Not so, however: all the Himeans found was a ruin. Even the piles had been dragged out of the riverbed in a thorough demolition.

"I doubt they did this in just a few days," she said to her legates. "They probably tore it down months ago, perhaps after they got word of Terantrum. Nothing for it but to march on."

Down the river there was a small community of rural Mentulaeans dependent on the waters for their livelihood. They sold fish happily to the marching army and spoke of their king's recent demise with only passing interest—an indication, the Himeans thought, of how small and rural their community really was.

"Are there no other bridges nearby?" Shizuru asked the leader of the settlement.

He denied it, saying the great bridge they had found demolished was the sole means of crossing until it had been torn down. She asked when that had happened.

"Two, three months, give or take," he said and pointed to the other bank. "Them Celsorian soldiers did it. Sold them fish too, we did."

She thanked him and his people for their help. Before she left he offered the use of some large rafts their community used to cross the river.

"Take a lot of going back and forth," he warned. "But we can get all your soldiers across. We'll charge only a small price for it."

But Shizuru disliked the idea of having her legions ferried over the waters in such a manner. It would be harder to keep them organised and in defensive order if the transfers were so piecemeal.

She marched further south until she found a place that looked viable for a crossing. Her engineers were summoned and they performed a survey of it.

"Two hundred and eighty metres," they said of the distance between the shorelines. "So around nine hundred forty feet. The depth is easier at this place, though, General. On average, five metres. We can bridge it, easy."

"Well and good, but I want more than an easy bridge," she told them "I want a bridge that will let my men pour through it so fast they spend barely any time getting from one bank to the other. I want a bridge that tells the King of Celsor, Look, we can walk right over to your backyard whenever needed. I want a bridge that can scare a king, so you can scrap all your plans for one only the usual five metres in width."

They conferred quickly with each other.

"We can double the usual breadth of the deck," they said. "We'll also use foot-and-a-half-thick logs for the piers. Is that acceptable, General?"

"How long shall it take?" she asked, whereupon the engineers crossed their fingers and gave their speed-obsessed general the lowest estimate they could furnish.

"If we work fast, thirteen days," they said hopefully, "with another thirteen for gathering materials."

She dashed their hopes with a shake of the head.

"Do you know," she said, "how many bridges I have had you demolish? How many I have seen you build? Some of you were with me during my first generalship, so you should have an idea of how many that is."

"Dozens by now, General," one answered.

"Dozens," she agreed. "And that is without counting all the other, far more difficult engineering tasks we have worked on together. Mining towns, building siege ramps, cutting off the water sources of many an enemy city. You are the best engineers of Hime by now, with years and years of experience! Enough so even a city engineer would flush with envy."

They were starting to smile, buoyed by her praise. It meant more to them than another commander's would have because they knew she herself occasionally performed engineering feats. It was that particular talent of hers that had earned her a reputation for very fast siege.

"Now this is only one more simple bridge," she told them. "Not a tower to beat the Helepolis. It will be large, yes, but still only a bridge. You have built dozens of these already! Others would take thirty days to build it. But you are not ordinary engineers. Surely we can throw it up faster than those of average skills! My boys and girls will fell trees and build as fast and well as you can direct them. So direct them better and faster than all other engineers can!"

They looked at each other and started new calculations. One of them brought up one last hurdle that had to be surmounted.

"The current is a problem, General," he told her. "If you want it to stay up safely both during construction and even after we go over, we'll have to make much stronger piles. That's what will take longer."

"Because the current acts like a ram," she observed.

"And can carry down tree trunks and the like that can knock down the piles," he expanded.

"Not if we put shields on them," she told him.

She had them put together the "shields" she wanted: huge and angled buttresses made of seasoned planks and branches of oak. These went into the river and sheltered the pillars, dividing the current with their wedged points as it reached them. This took the pressure off the piles and gave the structure added strength. In what seemed no time at all, Shizuru had her bridge over the river. It was so large that she was able to march her army in the normal eight-men-wide column without filling it, and she led five cheerful legions further west into Celsor.

It threw the monarch of the kingdom into a pother when his lookouts ran up to tell him.

"Ten days?!" he gulped. "You're telling me this woman bridged the Flundanus in ten days?!"

The men he was facing winced, having debated amongst themselves how best to say this. It was so incredible a story they might even be executed for lying! The only reason they dared deliver the news was that other reports would soon substantiate their statements. The Himean army was marching fast, even if it did it somewhat curiously. The lookouts had seen the glittering column swerve around the first farmlands it encountered, for instance. There had been no columns of smoke either, no screams on the wind. Absolutely none of the usual signs of pillage. What did these foreigners want, in that case?

Celsor's king, Leontes the Second, boomed: "No one could bridge the Great River in such a time! It's impossible and you fools know it!"

"Yes, Your Majesty," said the baron in charge of the lookouts, sweating. "Nonetheless, she did it."

Leontes grabbed at his beard and gulped again.

"But how did they even get the materials?" he asked. "Did they bring all of it with them?"

"They gathered those in ten days, Majesty," the baron related. "Then they spent another ten days building the bridge itself."

"But how could they even build against that current?"

"They constructed what looked like small dams, Majesty," the baron said. "These kept the current and whatever it was carrying off the structure's legs."

"But-the river! The depth!"

"They built something that looked like a crane, Majesty," the baron said, trying very hard to keep the awe out of his tones. "They placed it on a raft and thus managed their work without being troubled by the waters."

The king chewed furiously on his cheek and looked panicked.

"What is it they want?" he asked of no one in particular. "Why have these southerners come here, so soon after King Obsidian's defeat?"

To that there were many possible answers, of course, but none in his company dared vouchsafe them. The king had been a nervous man ever since he got news of Terantrum. The first reports of a Himean army loitering about the other side of the Flundanus had seen him shouting for his generals. He had marched an army straightaway to a citadel near the great river. There he had been waiting ever since for the least indication of assault. At a mere four days' march away from the boundary, he knew he could head off the enemy before it reached any of his more important cities. The problem was, said enemy was not really acting like an enemy!

To attack them or not to attack them. His pride said to attack while his instincts said to leave be. The Himeans had all but conquered the Mentulaean Empire in a run of battles that had every strand of his dense body hair standing on end. Outnumbered and on foreign lands, the southerners had prevailed against all expectation. It made his situation hugely unpleasant, as he was not only married to one of Obsidian's daughters but had also sent some of his own soldiers to join the Mentulaean-Himean War. Something the Himeans probably knew by now and which might explain their current presence. But how was he to have predicted they would be the victors? Everyone had thought they would lose!

Well, it was why he had taken the precaution of tearing down the bridge on the Flundanus two months ago, was it not? It would have made the passage of Himean armies into his kingdom so much harder. That had been the intention, much good though it did him in reality. Ten days to bridge the river-was it possible, truly? His mind said no while his bones said yes: these southerners were masters of the impossible, he was starting to see it.

Oh, all the decisions! To attack them or not to attack them. To flee or not to flee. Every choice could make the difference to whether or not the southerners would go after his lands too. Eventually what made up his mind for him was the news from the scouts who came after the first wave. The Himeans, they said, had been conducting a perfectly peaceful trek. They had sacked none of the settlements or buildings that they had encountered. They had even been buying food from the locals, paying for grain and meat with hard cash!

This heartening news saw the king ordering his army to march towards the foreign one. He met it just a day after having set out and certainly much earlier than expected: like the Mentulaeans, he had no conception of the speed a Himean army could achieve.

The two forces stopped on a wide field, staring at each other from across the green. At first sight of those serried ranks, King Leontes found himself too impatient to wait for heralds. He did not deem it beneath his dignity to be first to approach the foreigners, particularly when they were in his kingdom. Up he went on his parade car, a wondrous conveyance that flashed and flickered under the sun. It was so bright that his own men were obliged to shield their eyes: no silver for Leontes when there was a possibility of gilt!

The team of white horses pulled his car up and towards the Himeans, where a small group seemed to be detaching from the rest. Their officers were coming to meet him. He drove on, eager to finally face these strangers, and swelling with pride as he imagined how they took his presence. The Himeans were coming out on foot and all in the same red and brown costumes, which meant his own group was by far more impressive. Flanking his car were his royal guard in their yellow-and-red outfits, the long yellow tassels on their helms trailing behind them. As for himself-well, he had enough gold on his armour to know he looked nothing less than a vision. He had made sure to have his shoulder-length locks brushed back carefully before this. His dark beard too had been meticulously barbered into a jaw-hugging trim.

Then the two groups were close enough to talk to each other loudly. Both stopped, knowing their leaders were expected to meet. Here the king of Celsor parted from the usual by getting down from his car to do it. Most kings would have insisted on staying in the car for the meeting: it put them higher than the ground and therefore higher than anyone on it. But Leontes deigned to walk on the grass of his kingdom like the foreigners, for he was a tremendously tall man and tremendously proud of that. To his amazement, however, the surprisingly young woman who met him had eyes level with his. And what eyes she sported! And what a face to go with them!

"Hail, King Leontes the Second," she said, speaking something that sounded like Mentulaean but with a crisper accent. "I am Shizuru Fujino, proconsular governor of Hime to Septentria."

He stared, unable to help himself. Her looks had taken some of the wind out of his sails.

"Procons-governor to what?"

"Septentria," she repeated, drawing out the syllables. "What you formerly knew as the Mentulaean Empire."

So that was what they were calling it? What cheek! What temerity! What southern presumption!

"I see," he said, aware he still stared but still unable to help it. His eyes dropped to roam her whole length and ascertained that her boots had no heel to explain all that tallness. "And what do you think you are doing here in my lands, Himean?"

"Paying you a visit," she said, sounding friendly. "You are now my neighbour and it seemed appropriate for peace."

He forgot himself enough to snort rudely at this.

"Peace?!" he said with an incredulous glare. "You brought an army with you for a visit!"

"Well, of course," she said, looking at him as though that did not merit explanation. "I had never been here before and had little knowledge of you to go on. How was I to know whether you would be sophisticated enough to greet me civilly or launch immediately into attack like a barbarian?"

As he had been debating that matter with himself on the way to this meeting, he cleared his throat and tried to look (sophisticatedly) nonchalant.

"Here I am," he said. "What do you want?"

"Only to say that I hope you shall be a good neighbour to my province," she told him. "We already have treaties with all of our other neighbours: the peoples of the north, the east, and the southwest. You are the only one left uncertain."

He had seized on one of the directions she mentioned and now sought to clarify it further.

"The southwest," he said grimly. "Do you mean the Mentulaean Empire's Western Frontier?"

"I mean," she said, "the Kingdom of Firens."

His fair face darkened with blood at the correction; a scowl materialised under his beard.

"You accord a measly baron a kingly title," he grumbled lowly, uncertain why he could not seem to summon up his usual roar. Something in him said the Himean would only laugh at him were he actually to shout at her-and that would be insupportable. "Entei has no right to be called that. My own wife has greater claim to what he calls his lands, as she is an actual daughter of the late King Obsidian."

The tawny gold eyebrows lifted; she regarded him with steady dispassion.

"King Entei has been named Friend and Ally of Hime," she stated. "It means he is entitled to our allegiance and support should he require it. Be warned that any action you may take against his sovereignty will be read as provocation to Hime as well."

"I didn't say I intended any such thing!" he snapped, baring his teeth briefly. The peculiar red eyes regarding him betrayed no emotion at that either. He realised she had no awe of either his title or his presence. Was it because of what she had already done to the Mentulaeans with her army? Was it because she had the felicity of knowing she had beaten a hundred thousand with only thirty thousand?

He had thirty thousand in the force now standing behind him. Obviously more than what she had brought with her to his kingdom, but probably not enough. The army in front of him did not really look that impressive, but he had to weigh its looks against its deeds. A hundred thousand ground into the dust... What was it like to claim such a triumph? To lead an army with such power, with such ability?

Like most kings who had claimed their thrones for themselves, Leontes had a brain beneath all his bluff and bluster. He weighed all he knew of the southerners and their doings against all he knew of the former empire and its king. He studied again the woman before him, the extraordinary stretch of her from shiny golden head to leather-booted feet.

Leontes made a decision and reversed positions faster than even his Court could have expected. His Mentulaeen wife might not like it when she found out, but he had to look out for himself.

"Are you here to make a treaty with my kingdom too, then?" he asked, licking his lips. "One that will settle peace between us?"

He had the uncomfortable feeling she was laughing at him behind her eyes, though her voice was still level.

"If you are amenable to it, certainly," she told him.

"So if I agree, shall I also be named a Friend and Ally of your people?" he pressed.

Now her expression changed, seemed just a little apologetic.

"We generally name only those who have done us great service as such," she said. "Witness another of your fellow northern kings with the title, for instance: King Kruger of Otomeia."

"Otomeia." He had heard of this kingdom many times before, of course, even if he had never set eyes on any of its territories. The late king of the Mentulaeans had spoken often of it, and none too favourably. Leontes suspected he had seen it as a serious rival to his power, especially as it was reportedly full of ferocious peoples. "The mountain kingdom in the far east, is it?"

"Quite so." She gestured to her army. "Some of their people are here right now. As well as one of their princesses, their Polemarch."

It was on the tip of his tongue to ask what a "polemarch" was, but he decided not to lest he seem ignorant. She already had him at too many disadvantages.

"Did you make their king Friend and Ally because he helped you invade the Mentulae?" he asked.

"He had the title even before that," she revealed. "We have a long history of alliance with the Otomeians."

"But not with Firens."

"No, not yet. But as you can see, that is set to change thanks to their king's new status."

He nibbled on the inside of his lip and looked out at the Himean army again.

"So what should I do," he prodded, "if I wanted to gain that status as well?"

She flashed a smile that rather dazzled him. The woman was beautiful, even if hers was a foreign sort of beauty.

And even if she was much taller than any woman had the right to be.

"You can start by proving yourself a peaceful neighbour," she said. "And by not aiding those whom we call enemies. You donated forces to that end before. There were Celsorian swordsmen among the King Obsidian's soldiers."

He was not at all surprised by her knowledge of it, but it did grate on him to be in a position where he might be expected to make an apology.

"My late father-in-law requested that I send him men, yes," he said a little lamely. "But I had no say in how he used them."

"Indeed. Perhaps you should have been a little more discerning before you gave him that gift. At any rate, provided you do not do any more things counter our interests, Hime will be pleased to give you a treaty of friendship. Not Friend and Ally status just yet, but perhaps that may come, in time."

That beautiful smile again.

"I imagine you would prefer to have your advisors participate in drawing up the treaty," she said. "Please be so good as to send a delegation of your choice to the capital for it, being sure to empower them to sign it in your name."

"Where," he said, "is the capital?"

"Where it was when your father-in-law was still king."

She looked as though she would turn away, but stayed.

"Oh, before I forget," she said. "One of King Obsidian's sons, the Prince Calchis, has gone missing. You would not happen to have had word from him? Or had him actually turn up for a visit?"

He frowned, not having heard of this.

"No," he said. "I don't know that prince very well. I had no idea he was missing."

She took a long time looking into his eyes.

"Very well," she sighed. "I believe you, King."

He frowned at her, nettled.

"If he does turn up?" he asked. "What exactly do you expect me to do then?"

"As someone who would be a Friend and Ally of Hime?" she said. "There is only one course of action. You take him in custody, then turn him over to us as soon as you can. Otherwise, you harbour one of our enemies and will be considered similar."

"He's my brother-in-law!"

The Himean looked amused-and proceeded to demonstrate that she was not as ignorant of his own doings as she had claimed.

"I hardly think that should matter," she said, "to someone who hunted down and executed his blood brother so he could have no rivals to the kingship."

His mouth went slack; he gaped for a moment, then recollected himself and shut it.

"The men who killed him misunderstood my words," he said stiffly. "They were punished! They were beheaded for it!"

The red eyes twinkled, seemed to say they could see right through him.

"Then let us hope you do not misunderstand my words, Your Majesty," she said.

And she inclined her head, swept around and away.

---

The Celsorian king's army shadowed hers until she returned to the Flundanus, right to the very place where she had built her impossible bridge. He sent her ten bags of gold with some envoys before she crossed over again. When she loosened the thongs tying one of the bags closed and peeked inside, she discovered that all of the coins were Mentulaean.

"I guess Obsidian had Celsor on a leash," Shohei said when she showed them to him. "It was because of his support that Leontes ascended the throne, wasn't it?"

"It was a big part of it, yes," Shizuru said. "Little wonder they are using Mentulaean coinage! Obsidian must have seen Celsor almost as a protectorate. Anyway, his grandchildren shall become its rulers, unless Leontes is supplanted."

"Do we have any intention of that?" Shohei asked playfully.

"No," Shizuru said. "Provided dear Leontes behaves himself."

After crossing the bridge and returning to her side of the river, Shizuru had the army tear it down.

"But not the piles," she said. "Might as well leave them there as a reminder to Leontes and in case we need to cross the river again."

From there they beat a rapid march back to the centre, having effectively spent over two months in Septentria's northwest. She did not bring all of the legions back with her, for she installed four of them with Shohei and Zanki outside of Arvern. They would be wintering there while she marched the remaining legion, the Second, back to the capital.

They reached Gorgo with winter already nipping at their heels, every one of the men in cold weather gear. Shizuru's cousin was among the first to welcome her back and filled her in while the officers settled the happy legionaries. These were looking forward to the usual winter comforts: warm taverns and shops, pretty locals and brothels. With a winter billet at a metropolis like the capital, they were assured of a bigger selection of such comforts than the other legions.

"I've collected treaties from near every noble or petty aristocrat-magistrate left in the territories," declared Shizuma triumphantly. "You were right when you said defeating the king would take the fight out of them! There was one little oddity-a small fortress called Hapsa, southwest of here-where we thought we'd have to do a siege, as the aristocrat in charge very loudly proclaimed he was locking his gates and daring us to come and get him. But we barely even got a legion near it before the gates opened up again."

"What happened?" Shizuru asked, adjusting the girl in her arms carefully. They were going up the stairs of the imperial palace. "I have a feeling the town itself turned on the aristocrat you mentioned?"

"Pretty much," her cousin grinned. "Considering just about everyone else was getting off light for surrendering, they were not about to risk a solitary rebellion!"

"Especially not a pointless one."

"It would have been pointless indeed! Since the people of Hapsa turned over both the fortress and the rebellious aristocrat, I did little more than name a new head magistrate for them. I did the same in a few other places, by the way."

"Tell me more about them later," Shizuru said.

They cleared the stairs and she set her lover down, making sure the girl was steady on her feet. Fair fingers scraped the back of her neck in silent gratitude.

"I have things to tell you too," Shizuru said to her cousin, "about Tasgetia and Celsor."

The other's face lit up. No Himean senator had ever set foot on Celsor before Shizuru's venture.

"They said you bridged the Flundanus in ten days," she said.

"And talked to Celsor's king face to face."

"How was he, their King Leontes?"

Shizuru stopped walking and thought about it.

"I think he did not like my being as tall as I am," she decided.

"Many do not like your being as tall as you are," Natsuki murmured all of a sudden.

The cousins looked at her.

"Are you perhaps one of them, meum mel?" Shizuru demanded.

"No," was the candid reply. "I like your being tall."

She let a moment pass before adding, "Very much."

Shizuru laughed along with her cousin.

"You're lucky she enjoys climbing mountains," the senior legate teased. "But speaking of mountains, you have some of them waiting in your quarters, Shizuru. I've been having your correspondence sent up there, I think to your study. I daresay they've accumulated into proper heaps."

Shizuru groaned at the reminder. "No rest for the weary."

"I am afraid not. But if it helps, I sent a message to your steward the moment the scouts sighted you coming. He's probably gotten everything ready for you and Natsuki."

Retiring to their quarters, the pair found this to be the case. Hermias had prepared a repast as well as a warm bath in honour of their return. They availed of the latter first, and followed with a quick scrubdown aided by their servants. Once they were clean and fresh again they ate a little. It was some hours later that they finally repaired to Shizuru's study. It was not so much the work that they were eager to return to as the news they would glean from the waiting missives: Natsuki had her own correspondence from the capital as well as from Otomeians stationed elsewhere.

They found that Hermias had still managed to impose a sort of system on the letters. Those meant for the polemarch were ranged on a table in the middle of the room while those for the general—far more numerous—were set on a larger counter near Shizuru's desk. A quick look showed they had been lined up from left to right in order of arrival.

Natsuki settled down on a couch to look through her buckets, turning each scroll she picked and frowning when it was not what she wanted. Shizuru watched for a few seconds, then went to rummage through her own buckets. She suspected that what the girl sought had been placed there by mistake.

Eventually she found the desired cylinder and strolled up to Natsuki, presenting it to her exultantly.

"She wrote back," she announced, savouring the flush that suffused the other's face. "I told you she would, Natsuki."

The Otomeian took the cylinder but did not open it, the pleasure in her clear even though she said not a word. The older woman bent down to peck her on the brow and bade her read the missive she had been waiting for so anxiously.

"She must have written to you soon after getting your reply," she told her lover, going back to her buckets and looking through them more carefully. She found a cylinder very much like Natsuki's and brandished it. "I have a letter from her as well. She wrote these in August."

To her astonishment, the smile in Natsuki's eyes vanished.

"August?!" came the gasp.

"Yes, you can see it on the tag. Chikane marks her missives with dates."

"But-then I am so tardy!" the Otomeian cried in dismay. "Shizuru, she will think-she will think-"

"She will think we have been marching," Shizuru hastened to reassure the young woman. "She will not think you impolite if you reply only now, mea vita . Chikane knows what army life is like."

The other was chewing on her lip, still downcast by this worry. Chikane's opinion of her, Shizuru saw, mattered a great deal.

"Really?" she asked again. "Shizuru?"

"Yes, so do not worry about it. Look now, I have known Chikane a long time, have I not?"

"Yes."

"So trust that I know her well enough to wager my fortune on this. Read that and reply at your leisure, Natsuki."

She went to the chair behind her desk, knowing Natsuki would want to read this latest letter herself. She waited for the younger woman to start on that before she opened her own cylinder. Out of the leathery cover slid a fat roll of finest parchment like the one Natsuki held; Chikane rarely sent letters on paper.

She checked her lover one last time before she started reading. The girl looked content. There was a lamp on her desk and she pulled it close to her own parchment.

I am rushing a little as I write this, so pardon if my script looks hurried. I have my reasons for haste, but more on that anon. I shall try to pack all the latest news here even so. Harada-san offered to write to you in my stead, by the way, but I am the better source for some matters-besides, she is still much occupied by her household arrangements, being newly wed. And deliriously happy!

You shall think this a letter full of surprises, Shizuru, so I suppose we should commence with the best. The Senate voted to have a day of thanks in honour of your latest victories. The defeat of the imperial army at Berentum and your seizure of the Mentulaean capital has everyone feeling that some justice has been achieved. Hime has not quite forgotten the attempt to take Sosia Province and the slaughter of the Eighth.

Public sentiment was such that even the Traditionalists voted for the thanksgiving. I suspect it was also because they were genuinely impressed. You should have seen their faces when Harada-san read your booty tallies-six thousand talents from one citadel? Half the House contemplated killing themselves! They would have reported only three thousand talents and kept the rest, of course, had they been in your well-worn hobnails.

Unfortunately, one of our colleagues has not fared nearly so well. Keigo Onishi is probably going to be recalled from his Sicilian mission and eventually replaced. How can that be, you ask, for a man of his capability? A lot of reasons, really, but it can be distilled to two simple things: several of our more rapacious fellows want a chance at his command and the present grain shortage has everyone blaming whoever is handling Sicilia.

I suppose this is because it is from where we get most of our grain, but Onishi-san's culpability for the famine hardly follows, does it? For one thing, the slave rebels preventing the harvest should be the ones getting the blame. For another, Sicilia is not the only cause of the shortage. Even were Onishi-san to put down the revolt in a day, the famine would persist. Ah, but you know what people are like when they are hungry. Common sense goes into hiding.

One of this year's tribunes of the plebs has made a lot of trouble on the subject. This fellow, Eiichi Kiyosaki, worked the people into a lather of resentment for our grain merchants. He claimed the grain shortage was really all up to them.

Everyone with a shred of intellect saw the falsity. The shortage is due to the drought, as well as the troubles of Sicilia, and the pirates incessantly preying on our grain ships. But that made a complicated answer of a simple question, so none of the People wanted to believe it. Easier to believe the simple answer and blame the grain merchants. Which also meant blaming the Senate, since so many of us are related to or patrons of the grain merchants.

Feeling was foul in the Forum, Shizuru, and the city was gearing up for a throw. Such was the agitation Kiyosaki-san was causing that some feared he would soon be calling for either knights or senators to be cast off the Tarpeian Rock! Some of our meeker senators actually fled to the country. Things came to a head in June and several of us dreamt up a way to divert the People's from Kiyosaki-san's demagoguery. The House created a special commission for a campaign to clear Our Sea of pirates.

You perceive why we did this: to create a hubbub to distract Kiyosaki-san's audience; to show that the state was doing something to combat the grain shortage; and to draw attention to another cause of the famine that people could curse as easily as the grain plutocrats. Besides, the pirates really have been doing a lot to interrupt our meagre grain supply. It was high time we dealt with them.

But when we offered the commission to our consuls, would you believe it? Both declined! Our current senior consul wants to govern Macedonia next year, and thinks the special commission will not be finished in time for him to take a province. As for his junior colleague, he has been a most vocal critic of Keigo Onishi. One guess what that one is planning; the only sea voyage he envisions in his future is the one taking him to Sicilia as the new commander against the rebels.

So the next logical recommendation was to make a selection from one of the praetors. Alas, there were troubles here again! Part of the difficulty is that this is only a six-praetor year. Of those, only four could properly be considered as the praetors urbanus and peregrinus have landbound duties. The viable four were further reduced to two due to another pair pleading nausea.

When it came to choosing from one of the pair left, we found an added headache. The best option-which is to say the one with the better military history-was found to have once been abducted by pirates himself! They held him for ransom the way they do most Himeans of good family whom they catch on the seas. Oh, he was burning to take the commission as a way to avenge that past insult, but the House refused him the opportunity. The feeling, I think, was that it was not the best showing for us to appoint an admiral the enemy once held as a victim.

At this point public interest in the commission had grown enough that appointment of the remaining praetor would have been a problem. It happened to be a very undersized and somewhat unimpressive member of the plebeian Kawaguchi family. Not enough clout in the House and not enough fame among the People. So the House had to look elsewhere.

To make a long story short, they ended up appointing someone out of office for the campaign. And now for the biggest surprise of this missive: they actually appointed me!

Shizuru emitted a sound. When she looked up the green eyes were already fixed her way.

"Natsuki," she said. "Did Chikane say anything in her letter about being appointed to go on a campaign?"

Natsuki denied it. Shizuru returned to her reading.

It feels like a jest since I was one of the originators of the commission when we dreamt it up as a way to divert the People from Eiichi Kiyosaki. Oh, I believed in the significance of the problem it was addressing even then! I simply had not thought it would fall upon me to address it.

Well, I refused it too, at first. But only, as I explained, for some of its uncertainties. The original commission we drafted was admittedly rather weak, as we had envisioned it largely as a distraction. More fool I had I accepted it as it was, a command with a bare minimum of teeth! So I haggled with the House into giving me a better mandate than the one with which we had started. Fortunately, the People and a lot of our colleagues had gained sufficient interest in the idea to help. The result is that my current commission is now satisfyingly toothy.

I am to have the authority to raise fleets from all of our seaside provinces, and have been granted proconsular imperium with which to do it. My command shall extend to all ends of Our Sea and as far as twenty kilometres inland. Even more interestingly, I have been given two years to clear away the pirates. Sergay Wang himself actually suggested it... for obvious reasons, think you not?

Shizuru could not help a dry laugh. It was indeed obvious, even if it was also cleverly opportunistic. For in contriving to have Chikane away from Hime for so long the Traditionalists probably thought they had removed her most powerful supporter. She had other known allies and friends in the House, but few were of sufficient dedication as well as clout to protect her the way Chikane Himemiya did.

She imagined they would try to bring up discussion of her province before the stipulated five years were up. The bill granting her command made that illegal, of course, but there were ways to get around it. Such as by discussing something related to it instead of the command itself. Well, she had one of the tribunes of the plebs in her pockets, so she would have someone ready to veto that. She would need another one for the next year: her agents in the city should have found her someone appropriate by now and bought whoever it was. And as for Chikane, she had left her own mastermind to watch over her back.

Unfortunately for our enemies, our dear Urumi shall remain in the city. As shall our tribunes of the plebs. I predict both will earn their wages in my absence. Whom did you choose from among the new candidates? They are yet candidates, by the way, as the tribunician elections have not been held yet: but I have run on long enough so I think I shall explain this delay to you in person instead, at least if none of your other correspondents does. I am putting in at Argus middle of January of next year to raise a fleet there, and I hope we can meet. I would be delighted if you can bring your Otomeian princess along, of course; what beautiful Greek she writes, incidentally!

Time to conclude this: I have just about everything prepared for my mission. But if our friends in the House think I shall need two years to do this task I shall shortly prove them mistaken. I have no intention of being apart from my wife so long-for without the woman, I am entirely at sea!

Shizuru paused to smile at the pun, lifting her head when she heard her name.

"Something happened?" the Otomeian calling her said. "Tuh-to her, Shizuru?"

Shizuru set down the parchment and explained Chikane's commission. She left out the part about the woman's invitation to meet in Argus, however. She had a feeling the girl would work herself into a lather of anxiety if she told her now.

"Can she do it?" Natsuki asked. "Finish the pirates in two years?"

"Very likely," Shizuru said. "For all that she pretends astonishment at the appointment, the choice was patently good thinking. Chikane is one of the few people in the current House with a background-and a successful one!-in naval warfare. Her legateship to Suzuhara-san saw her commanding our fleets for eighteen months, and victoriously. Later admirals actually continued to seek out the crews and captains she had in her navy. They are widely considered the best veterans to call up for naval duties-which tells you a lot about the woman who started them in the service."

Natsuki agreed. As she was getting used to the way Himean politics worked, she went on to ask another question.

"But if she takes this commission, Shizuru, what does it mean for you?" she said.

Shizuru grinned and got to her feet.

"Not much, really," she told the younger woman, and strode to the door to call for her steward.

"Tell your servants they should be packed by tomorrow, meum mel," she said, casting a look over her shoulder. "We need to leave for Argus in two days. I have to pick up something that was sent for me there."

Chapter 74

Vocabulaire:

- 1 . Aedile - A valuable magistracy or office responsible for many things including the care of Rome's public buildings, streets, games, and the state's grain.
2. Aventine - ( Aventinus in L.) One of the 7 hills of Rome/Hime, southwest of the Palatine.
3. Canis Melitaeus (L.) - A very old dog breed still in existence today: the Maltese toy dog.
4. Censor (L.) - Elected every five years, there are two of them elected to serve in tandem. Among their tasks is to monitor the list of senators and enrol new members.
5. Consular - This may be either an adjective or a title. If used as an adjective, e.g. "the consular chair", it modifies the word after it by saying it is "of the consul". If used as a title, e.g. "Chikane Himemiya is a consular", it signifies someone who has been elected a consul in the past.
6. Curia (L.) - Also Curia Hostilia ; the place where the Roman Senate had their meetings.
- 7 . Equestrians (pl. E.), Equites (pl. L.) - Members of the Ordo Equester , called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank- in fact, they were often related-but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.
8. Eri Toshino - A senator mentioned in Chapter 66 . For those who cannot recall, she was a praetor deputed to put down the Sicilian servile revolt using a cohort of legionaries. She faced 4,000 slaves, about half of whom were women and children, and not all of whom could fight. She lost.

9. Extended Rights - Taken from the Latin Rights, a sort of second-class citizenship the Ancient Romans granted valued allies. Remember that not all Fuukans (being the equivalent of Italians in the story, just as Himeans are the equivalent of Romans) are actually Himean, so the ranks of citizenship by privilege are basically thus in the country, from highest to lowest: Himean, Extended Rights, then Fuukan. For more details, see Chapter 34, hit Ctrl+F, and type "Extended Rights".

10. Flamen dialis and flamen martialis (L.) - In plural, flamines ; these were two of the major priesthoods, highly revered but also saddled with restrictions. The flamen martialis was a little freer, but the flamen dialis had no prospect of a military career. They were often chosen young and occupied their priesthoods for life. They also gained instant entry to the Senate once they took up their priestly positions.

11. Games & celebration of ancestors - Ancient Romans of august families often gave games to celebrate their honoured antecedents. Part of the purpose was to remind others of the prestige of their families, as well as to canvas political support.

12. Garum - A fishy sauce or essence very popular among the ancients.

13. Latifundia (pl. L.) - Singular latifundium ; a great estate often used for agricultural purposes.

14. Lex frumentaria (L.) - Plural leges frumentarii ; laws relating to grain.

15. Macedonian Wars - A series of conflicts that eventually led to Roman power over the eastern Mediterranean. The history given below is in line with what you will find in most of the history books, albeit with Rome in place of Hime.

16. Mare Nostrum (L.) - "Our Sea", or what the Romans called the Mediterranean Sea. Its westernmost end was called Mare Ibericum because of the Iberian Peninsula enclosing it from the north: this is now known as the Alboran Sea.

17. Modius (s. L.) - Plural modii ; 1 modius is equal to 6.67kg.

18 . Pindar - One of the great lyric poets of Ancient Greece, distinctive for his powerful (even off-putting, to less serious readers) imagery.

19. Punic - Carthaginian, or from Carthage. The term comes from the Phoenicians, from whom the Carthaginians descended.

20. Quaestor - Primarily a fiscal officer. There were many quaestors at various sectors of government. The quaestor of Ostia is a particularly important position, as it manages the docks where Rome received grain imports.

21. Sestertius (s. L.) - A common Roman/Himean coin; made of silver. The conversion is thus: 25,000 sesterces = 6,250 denarii = 1 silver talent .

22. Triumph (L.) - A parade of floats with actors depicting scenes from the campaign, entertainers, carts bearing spoils, the army, the commander, and prisoners of war. It was a celebration of a general's victory and could only be granted if his army had hailed him "Imperator!" after the battle.

23. Tribune of the Plebs - Members of the Plebeian Tribune; to avoid confusion with other "tribunes", this office shall generally be referred to in full. Ten are elected yearly. Only plebeians can be elected into this college and only plebeians can vote for election of these officials. A tribune of the plebs could veto virtually any decision of fellow government officials (except for the Dictator). As they could enact or veto laws, they were important when it came to legislative action. Being elected as one also grants a person automatic entry into the Senate.

24. Well of the Comitia - The standard venue where the tribunes of the plebs ( s.v.) held their meetings, which were restricted to citizens of purely plebeian status (i.e. patricians were forbidden from attending such a meeting, and would often limit themselves to watching from the steps of the nearby Curia Hostilia).

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

While Shizuru Fujino had been carving out her northern province, last year's senior consul had worked on regaining Sicilia. The island's servile revolt had already swelled to impressive size by the time his ships docked at its harbour. From the four thousand the slave army had been when Hime sent the praetor Eri Toshino to put it down, it had become twenty-five thousand strong.

The House had learned its lesson from the earlier debacle, however. As a result, the consular Keigo Onishi had three full legions with which to end the revolt. He did this much in the same manner he had handled his consulship: with methodical competence and a minimum of fuss. The slave army met him at a place named Scirthaea and fought hard, but lost the best of its generals. Whereupon the rebels folded and scrambled off to Triocala, a fortress-town some kilometres away.

The Himean consular did not pursue them to that location immediately. Instead, he lingered in Scirthaea with his army for one more week. After which he proceeded to Triocala to lay a siege.

"The queer thing is that it's our victory, yet they've little good to say about it!" Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki marvelled to her cousin at the end of May that year. "You can't bring up Sicilia to a senator now without his lamenting Onishi-san's sloth in finishing the servile army. The majority seem convinced Onishi-san should have run his legions over to Triocala after the slaves fled to it. Yet when I talk to the senators whose military records I respect, I end with thinking that's not such a certainty."

Chikane smiled and indicated herself playfully.

"You have not spoken to me," she said.

Her cousin laughed.

"Because I knew I could do it any time," Urumi answered, "so I put you off for last. And yes, I do respect your military record, Chikane, before you ask it! So, did Onishi-san really do the wrong thing by lingering at Scirthaea instead of running down the rebels?"

The dark-haired woman contemplated the question, the fingers of her left hand toying with her senatorial ring.

"'Tis difficult to speak when I was not there, Urumi," she began. "You know the qualifiers one must make."

Urumi asked her to proceed.

"Given what we know of Scirthaea," said Chikane, "I incline to the opposite opinion from the majority. I know Onishi-san and I submit that he would not have lingered there had he thought it pointless. In his dispatch, he mentioned that he stayed at Scirthaea to clean up the battlefield and restore order to some latifundia. He might not have said it explicitly, but that probably meant putting down bands of rampaging slaves distinct from the servile army."

"He probably should have been explicit about it, given our colleagues!"

"He probably should have," Chikane echoed wryly. "As for fixing what farming estates he could first, it still sounds like good sense. The sooner and the more of them he could get up and running again, the fewer worries he would have about logistics. I hear he actually troubled to install new bands of farmworkers. Not such an odd act when you recall most of the crop is still in the fields. No general with soldiers to feed would ignore that. Why not put people to collecting it, then, especially when you know your enemy has retreated to a place from where he cannot access it?"

Urumi loosed a sigh and dug her heels into her couch.

"Yes, that's what many of the other military senators I've talked to said," she informed her cousin. "From what I hear, the servile general killed at Scirthaea was also the rebels' chief strategist."

Which means that their so-called slave king, Gakuto-although, yes, I hear he's very aptly retitled himself Akihiko!-would be feeling the pinch even in Triocala."

She pushed herself up to a seat. A table's offerings were within reach and she started picking again at them.

The nice thing about eating at her cousin's, she thought, was that even the midday meal was as grand as a dinner spread. Chikane's parents had employed one of the best chefs in the city because they were forever entertaining august visitors; their daughter, also a magnet for the august, continued that happy tradition. Today the kitchen had sent up sliced ostrich in a sauce of wine and garum, soft-boiled quail's eggs glazed with peppered and herby honey, a minty salad of cheese and the freshest coriander and parsley...

"The real trouble is that couch generals make up two-thirds of the senate," Urumi declared, dainty fingers still plucking. "Most of them have gained little military experience besides cadet duty, yet leap at every chance to declare how this or that battle should have been waged."

A pause to chew and swallow a quail's egg, followed by a moue of approval.

"It's not self-aware speculation, mind," she went on. "They really do believe they could do better! That's why they harp so much-they all want to be given the command instead! Onishi-san will be another victim of this, I predict. Our junior consul, Dai Yoshida, is angling to replace him. A pity if Onishi-san is actually doing a fine job of it."

Her cousin agreed.

"You say our fellows love to criticise generals," she said after, "yet I notice no one has taken it upon himself to rewrite Shizuru's battles yet."

Urumi's mismatched eyes danced at this, her face showing disbelief.

"But Shizuru-san's clashes tend towards the spectacular," she protested. "Probably because she's facing a foe that has the same tendency."

"Numerically, do you mean?"

"Among other things, but yes, chiefly. We all do prate about our legions being worth more than a dozen foreign armies, but we still break into a sweat when we actually face a dozen foreign armies. Shizuru-san doesn't. She just shrugs off the numbers and proves what the rest of us can only say. So her victories are more difficult to criticise, because they're won in battles most of us wouldn't even dare. Whereas... well... a slave army doesn't nearly sound as daunting a foe as an empire, does it?"

"So then," her companion said, "you impute the unassailability of Shizuru's military performance to the impressiveness of her enemy?"

Another look of disbelief enhanced by a roll of the eyes.

"Oh, not only to that!" Urumi said plaintively. "She's a prodigy. That last battle alone was proof positive. You recall even the Traditionalists joined the applause when the dispatch was read."

The dispatch she mentioned was the one detailing Shizuru's battle at Berentum, against the Mentulaean Baron-General Terrigos. While the Battle of Terantrum had already been fought, no one in Hime knew about it yet-or about the demise of the Mentulaean king.

"On that note, her accounts add to it," Urumi enlarged. "It's her lovely prose, so clear and crisp, yet so exciting. Now compare them to Onishi-san's awfully prosaic missives. He lacks her talent for conveying an atmosphere, and so the opinion of him suffers further."

The older woman thought of something and said it: "I would still prefer his style to the masturbatory accounts of our other generals."

The two of them chuckled, knowing the description warranted.

"I don't mind those so much," Urumi confessed. "They tickle me, the way they leap to aggrandise their tiniest achievements. But that's another way Shizuru-san's dispatches work for her. She never actually praises herself in them. Strangely, that makes it more instead of less obvious how brilliant she is."

"Her deeds speak for themselves," Chikane replied. "Besides, Shizuru is more the type to expend praise on others. Notice how popular her legates' names have all become."

Urumi said that was true, although she also allowed that it was easier for a commander to praise her subordinates when they had the quality of Shizuru Fujino's.

That earned a grin from her older cousin.

"Pardon, but you were not in Senate yet during her Numidian Campaign," she told Urumi. "You would not know that Shizuru always commends her legates in public. Her scribes will vouch for this."

"Do you mean even the less worthwhile ones get compliments too in the dispatches?"

"Yes. But she sends them home early, so we end up knowing the truth despite her praise."

Urumi grinned: "Shame that in Onishi-san's case, both the truth and praise elude our colleagues."

The other woman sat up too and picked up her goblet. A slave waiting in the corner rushed to fill it, and she smiled at the man for the attention.

"The real trouble in Onishi-san's case is what has everyone so on edge," she told Urumi after wetting her lips. "All of this goes back to the underlying crisis, which is not the servile revolt, in reality."

The other had the answer prepared: "The grain supply."

"The grain supply," Chikane agreed.

Everything had come together to distress the grain supply for the year. First the drought, then the slave revolt in Sicilia. Yet, Chikane pointed out, both of those together should not have depressed the state granaries to their current levels. Her young cousin asked what she found at greater fault for the famine.

"You find something else at greater fault for the famine?"

"A thing we have long ignored," Chikane uttered. "Piracy."

At this point the steward of the Himemiya mansion entered the room. He apologised for the intrusion and announced the other senator they had been expecting.

"Gods' sakes, Reito, you took your time," Urumi moaned to this eminent personage. "I thought you were having your midday meal with us? We finished an hour past!"

"Ah, but the food is still here-and I have a good reason for being late," the Princeps told her as he chose the only free seat in the trio of couches. His eyes, scanning the table, lit up with naked enthusiasm. "Oh, goody! You have dormice!"

Their host reached for the plate with the plump and stuffed meats.

"There you are," she said, handing them over. "Someone might as well enjoy them."

He was already crushing one between his teeth.

"Do you not, Chikane?" he asked, all scepticism.

"I do, actually," the domina of the house admitted. "But my wife thinks them too adorable to butcher, so I end up eschewing them too out of guilt. The only reason I still have the kitchen staff prepare them is that my guests all seem to expect it."

"Thank goodness for your wife's overly tender heart, then," he said, still eating with relish. "As one of your guests, that means more for me!"

The two women were content to let him munch for a bit, seeing that whatever had made him tardy had prevented him tending to his appetite.

"I was on the Curia's steps," he revealed, "watching a very interesting meeting of the plebs."

"Called by whom?"

"Eiichi Kiyosaki. Do you know him?"

That Chikane had once served as urban praetor showed in her response, which revealed good knowledge of the city's legal happenings.

"Not by sight before he was elected a tribune of the plebs this year," she began. "By name, though, I think I had heard of him prior to it. Is he in fact the same Kiyosaki who got in trouble over his debts not so long ago?"

"That's the one! Explains why he chose the plebeian tribunate as the means through which to enter the Senate. Cheapest way to make a splash, provided you're a plebeian. Mind you, I admit I knew nothing of him before his election myself."

Deep blue eyes flicked to their blonde companion at this and he took the suggestion.

"True, our cousin here might be better informed in that respect," he said, feeling the oil on his lips. A dig into the sinus of his toga produced a snowy handkerchief. A striking man of citified good looks, he knew it became him to be scrupulous about his presentation. Not for Reito the dishevelled coiffures or untucked tunics worn by some younger males of the Senate!

He now dabbed at his mouth while asking, "Do you know anything of him, Urumi?"

Their young cousin was frank: "A desperado."

"That bad?" Chikane said.

"He's on his way," Urumi shrugged.

"I think she's right," Reito announced. "As it is, Kiyosaki called his assembly today to discuss-what else?-the problem of the grain."

Urumi clapped playfully.

"We were just talking about that, in fact, and what Chikane perceives to be the real root of it."

Reito asked what that would be and they told him.

"Piracy is one of our great scourges," he said, settling himself more comfortably on his couch as he pondered the digression with sharp interest. "But no one really mentions it any longer since it's always been there. That's how it feels!"

"To us, yes," his young cousin told him. "Yet it would not be so had our ancestors only been more temperate in their time! The flourishing of piracy on Our Sea is our own fault, you do realise?"

Her two auditors asked how Urumi drew that disagreeable conclusion.

"It all goes back," she said, "to the Macedonian Wars and to Rhodes."

---

South of Hime's Asia Province and northeast of Crete, the island of Rhodes lay cradled in the Aegean. The stiffest naval power there after Athens's decline, the city-state it harboured had weathered many of history's great storms. It survived the invasions of both the Persians and the Anatolian Carians. It preserved its status long after the great Alexander's rise and fall. It even negotiated much of the Macedonian Wars safely.

That last was especially interesting given that it had started one of the aforementioned wars itself.

The Second Macedonian War came in times of great upheaval. It was after Hime's victory against Carthage. A weakness had just appeared in one of the great realms of the age: the Pharaoh Ptolemy Philopator of Egypt had died in precipitous style. No one was prepared, including the abruptly-deceased Ptolemy. His legacy was a son who had only turned six.

Six-year-olds made for soft kings. A nearby king, Philip the Fifth of Macedon, was far older and harder. He saw his chance in Egypt's new boy-ruler and began seizing all Ptolemaic properties within his reach. His mad march of appropriation took him through Thrace then Asia Minor, his successes bringing him even almost to the Kingdom of the Seleucids. That this third realm feared not his incursions was owed to a treaty canny Philip had struck beforehand with the Seleucid king.

To any state around the Aegean, the balance of power had suddenly become very frightening because of three things.

First, two of the great kingdoms-Macedon and the Seleucids-were suddenly in league.

Second, the great kingdom of Macedon was very aggressively expanding.

Third, one of the few other great kingdoms that could have checked Macedon was led by a boy-king.

The danger was vast and all too immediate. Rhodes felt the threat, being one of the few other powers in the area, along with Pergamon. Banding together in a panic, both states sent envoys to the only force they thought remotely capable of helping.

It was thus that Hime entered the fray, albeit reluctantly. It was a different Hime at that time-just newly ascendant after finally defeating its old Punic nemesis, and so young that it did not yet have a single overseas province. In fact, before the Second Macedonian War, Hime had never even probed that far east. Thus the mildness of its initial response to the cry for help: all it did was send investigative envoys requesting that Philip cease besieging its new allies. Philip was a Macedonian and assuredly capable of appreciating sophisticated diplomacy. Surely he would see the wisdom of leaving Rhodes and Pergamon alone, at least?

Philip said he would leave Rhodes and Pergamon in ashes, at least.

The ensuing war ended with Philip's defeat and the inception of Himean interest in the East. One of those to have invited this new master into its territories, Rhodes prospered with the new Aegean's politics. In fact, it used its ties to Hime to dominate the surrounding waters for over two decades.

But then Philip's heir started another Himean-Macedonian war. It was then that Rhodes made a colossal blunder no one saw coming.

Rhodes being a commercial city, it had suffered from the Third Macedonian War despite not participating in it. Conflict hurt trade and sent money into hiding. A sooner end to the war would have been ideal for the Rhodian economy. Still, the island state could do nothing to secure such an end. It was not strictly a military power, even if its ships ruled the seas. It was also not even directly involved in this new conflict.

So how could it have become embroiled in it? As with most things around Mare Nostrum, it all went back to a Himean.

This particular Himean was a senator-as they usually were-and in fact, one of very high rank. Unfortunately, he allied it to a wandering mind and unruly tongue. While conversing with some of the Rhodian high leaders during a visit to the island city, this senator enquired whether or not they were still on communicating terms with Macedon. To be precise, he asked if said terms would make them capable of arbitrating a truce between Macedon and Hime.

Now this was only one Himean, no matter his rank. Certainly his inquisition about a possible truce could not be construed as representative of the whole Senate's will.

Yet for some reason this was exactly how the Rhodians read it. Blinded for a moment by the circumstances, spurred by the universal element of greed, they saw in this a double-chance for economic and political gain.

So, soon after that one senator's enquiries, Rhodes sent an incredible message to Hime.

We wish to tell the Senate and People of Hime that we are tired of this war, they announced. We will tolerate no more of these pointless hostilities. In fact, we are at the point whereat it seems justified to be hostile ourselves against any party unwilling to negotiate an end to this senseless conflict.

To that purpose we have allied ourselves with several of the Greek states, including our neighbour Crete. With this alliance, we do promise to fight any power that refuses to discuss peace.

It was an extraordinary message, especially from a state that was not a military power, as well as trade-dependent on the entity it was threatening. The senators receiving it had been stunned into silence, riveted to their ivory seats. They could not plumb the meaning of so daring a bluff coming from so-long-friendly an ally.

The Rhodian hope had been to force Hime into having them arbitrate peace with Macedon on its behalf, just as that one senator seemed to have hoped for them to do. This would have seen an end to the war, which was good for the Rhodian economy. But more than that, it would also have put Rhodes in a prime position for negotiating truce conditions that would benefit itself. That this was considered a feasible outcome of their message was owed to more than that one senator's idle query.

First, there was the fact that Hime had lost most of the major engagements in the war thus far. To Rhodian (and most of the Aegean's) eyes, Hime was looking a bit desperate in the conflict already.

Second, there was the fact that Macedon had continued to treat Rhodes as a friendly neighbour throughout the conflict. To Rhodian (and perhaps only Rhodian) eyes, no one was better-positioned to arbitrate a truce than Rhodes itself.

But soon after that message rang within the walls of the Curia, the Battle of Pydna took place. There Hime's legions crushed the Macedonian army so firmly that the latter's famous fighting unit, the phalanx, soon became regarded as obsolete. Macedon's king surrendered, Hime quartered his dominion, and Rhodes found itself in very bad odour with a colossus larger than its own.

The victorious colossus took revenge.

All of the Rhodian Asian mainland possessions were taken away, so the state was left with only its chief island for geographic property.

Import and export products vital to Macedonian-Rhodian trade were forbidden, crippling a large part of its economy.

Worst of all and to Rhodian shock, the island of Delos was named a free port by Hime.

This last punishment was a heavy blow. In the war with Carthage more than three decades earlier, Hime had unintentionally strengthened Rhodes by weakening its major competitor. After the Third Macedonian War, it did the opposite: it created one.

Indeed, Delos became so appealing a trade centre that Rhodes never managed to recover its former glory. This bled into its navy, which it could no longer fund as lavishly as before. Rhodian power in the Aegean was over, all because of one ill-timed bluff after decades of friendliness. Hime had taught a hard lesson-one in humility.

Unfortunately, that lesson came back to bite it.

In the days of Rhodian naval supremacy, the Rhodian ships had not only plied but patrolled the eastern parts of what Himeans called "Our Sea". Their expert patrols had been effective deterrents to piracy. The Rhodians had also applied naval law with a justice that far outshone the usual protection rackets other naval powers liked to run at the time.

With the decline of their power came inability to sustain such policing. So Rhodian chastisement by Hime started a new age for pirates-one that, by Shizuru Fujino's time, had already afflicted Hime for more than a century.

To add an extra dash of bitterness to the irony, Delos had since become a favourite port for pirates. It permitted them to sell without fear the very goods they had stolen from lawful vessels and merchant ships. This often included even the grain bound for the ports of the Tiber and the granaries of Hime.

"Such a pity we didn't let Rhodes off then with just a slap on the wrist," Urumi cooed to her relatives. "We overdo our revenges sometimes, you know. First there was the strewing the earth of Carthage with salt bit, then this ruination of the best self-appointed police navy we've ever had around Our Sea. It makes our history look so spiteful, and us so petty."

One of her cousins lifted an eyebrow. The Himemiya back then had been among those most intent on revenge against the island; Chikane knew this, as did the other two senators in her dining room.

She rebutted: "Both of those examples were preceded by great offences."

"Oh, I know it! Maybe it's simply the situation that has me assessing the records so harshly. Anyway, I've not heard of Shizuru-san salting Mentulaean earth yet... and you must grant they've caused her great offence!"

"But it's not exactly comparable, is it?" Reito interjected. He was anxious that they should not have time to pause and recall their other relative, Chikane's late sister. The offence of her loss was still too raw for all of them. "The aim of Shizuru-san's campaign is for Hime to inherit the former Mentulaean Empire. We had no such aims with Rhodes or Carthage. Hence the apparent intemperance of our postwar punishments in those earlier cases."

"My point stands," Urumi insisted. "It was our own excess that led to so troublesome an inheritance. One reaps as one sows."

That reminded Reito again of the reason for his tardiness. He leapt to his feet and called to the slaves ranged down one wall, wagging the fingers of both hands to show what he wanted. They brought the washing bowl to him and he availed of it.

"Reaping and sowing," he said. "That's the heart of it! I told you I was tardy because I paused to listen to an assembly. But I think I'd rather you heard it for yourselves than have me summarise my recollections. Do either of you fancy walking down to the Forum?"

His cousin protested that the meeting was probably finished.

"Not necessarily," he objected. "It had only been convoked when I stopped to listen. I did not stay there overlong either, just enough to get the gist. I've a feeling it will not be over quickly."

The elder of his auditors observed that the plebeian assembly could not have been what had made him late to their meal after all, if that was the case.

"Oh, I had some other errands earlier too," he said in dismissal.

Urumi shrugged and called for a washing bowl of her own. It was Chikane whose gaze stayed on him; Chikane whose azure eyes started a pricking on the back of his neck. He cast his sweetest smile her way and tried to ignore the odd sensation those eyes elicited.

"Shall you not come with us, Chikane?" he asked.

"What gave you the impression I would not?" she returned.

He gestured to the food on the table and their cousin, drying hands on a towel.

"Would you not need to wash your hands too?" he responded.

She gave him another neck-pricking look; Reito felt the urge to shuffle but suppressed it.

"My hands are clean," was what she said.

She slipped her sandals on and leapt off the couch with a call for her steward, thus depriving him of the opportunity to probe her statement. She left her household instructions for what to tell her wife-herself out visiting some friends-should she be late in returning. Then she led the way out of her mansion and eventually into the street.

"So tell us," she said to him, looking less neck-prickingly penetrative since she was occupied with surveying their surroundings. "What exactly has you so intrigued by Kiyosaki-san and his assembly?"

"I believe he's working up to a lex frumentaria providing the poor free grain."

To his side, Urumi said: "We have that already."

"We say that, but it's not really free," Reito answered with eyebrows climbing. "The only times when the poor actually get grain completely free is during special occasions, as charitable public donatives made by some nobleman or other to celebrate something like an august ancestor along with the requisite games."

"Or to spice up an otherwise dull triumph," Urumi continued for him, nodding. "Like Takeshiro-san and Satoyuki-san, I think? People told me their triumphal parades were so boring they had to bribe the people with free grain to get any applause going."

"Exactly. Otherwise, grain still costs the poor something. Right now, for example, those who are entitled to the grain dole get it for just over two sesterces per modius."

The only blonde in their trio snorted aloud, heterochromic eyes dancing.

"Practically free," she insisted. "That is less than half the market price of a modius of wheat during a bountiful harvest year, you know!"

"I agree-but you know how commoners are. They quibble over even that little."

Their other companion, thus far silent, chuckled low. She herself had thought it odd in the past how Hime's poorer denizens could still complain about so cheap a rate. Then she had met her wife and become more intimately acquainted with the radical economies of poverty.

Although not all who avail of the dole's economy are worthy of it, she allowed to herself. The grain dole, though originally crafted to support the indigent, was in fact available to every free Himean citizen. Provided said citizen was willing to take the trouble of registering, then collecting his voucher from the aediles and presenting it at the state granaries, he could collect up to five modii of cheap wheat monthly.

Most who could afford better preferred to save themselves the trouble. Registering took a long time, as did voucher collection-the lines were incredible-and trading in the vouchers for grain at the state silos. The silos were also all the way up the Aventine. A long walk, another long wait, and a difficult trek back with over thirty-three kilograms of wheat as a burden.

For those with the means, much easier by far to buy from the private warehouses. Or to have a servant do the buying; those on the dole had to collect their grain in person.

Thus most of the people on the dole truly were among Hime's poorest. But there were still people from the middle classes and above who occasionally availed of it. Most of them were incorrigible misers, although some were simply out to make a point.

Which is that they would rather lose five hours of their day than buy grain at a price they could well afford, Chikane supposed.

"Anyway, the price itself is not the issue at the moment, is it?" Reito was saying to Urumi. "It's the scarcity, which has reached such an extreme that even those on the dole have been affected. If nothing else serves to mark this a year of famine, that should suffice by itself!"

In that he was correct, thought both his auditors. Normally, even years of poor harvests saw the citizens on the dole getting their wheat cheap. This was because the state tended to buy more grain than was needed during the good harvest years. There were still more of those than bad ones, so there was usually enough surplus to see the state silos full when times were lean.

But there had been several middling harvests before the last one, which was paltry. So now the state's silos were so low that they had not served all those on the dole this year. Those so passed over could not afford the grain being sold by the private merchants-who, given their also-low supplies, had priced their product at a premium.

The rich would survive. They could still buy grain, even if they grumbled at its costliness. The poor, on the other hand, could not even afford a tenth of the current going rate of wheat . This meant there were a lot of hurting purses and roaring bellies on the streets.

"But as supply is the concern, no lex frumentaria can solve the problem," Chikane pointed out. "Even if it actually goes so far as to make the grain entirely free."

Reito's thick black brows wriggled: "Now do you see why I found the assembly interesting?"

They were going into the Sacra Via. A turn took them around the open Shrine of Venus Cloacina, with its once-pristine figures begrimed by years of rain and pigeon droppings. Eventually they made it up to the tall steps of the home of the Senate, the Curia Hostilia.

There were two reasons the trio did not head down to the Well of the Comitia, where the tribunes of the plebs held their assemblies. First, two of them were patricians and thus disbarred from a plebeian meeting. Second, the plebeian assembly they had come for had obviously finished. There were still enough stragglers around the Well, however, to show them many had attended.

"I told you it would be done," Urumi groaned to Reito as they went up the steps of the Curia. "All that way for nothing!"

"I'm sure these good fellows caught enough to inform us," he responded and waved to the senators at the top of the stairs.

There were eight senators in the clutch they approached. Three were no less than the heads of the Traditionalist faction: Haruka Armitage, Sergay Wang, and Chikane's former consular colleague Yukino Kikukawa. The other senators were less distinct in allegiances but had some prominent names nonetheless. One of them was of the Jinguuji clan and another was of the Ootori family. Both had blood linkages to some of Hime's most powerful equestrians.

The group made room for the new arrivals, exchanging greetings.

"You lot missed a rip-roaring meeting," Sergay told the newcomers. "It went downhill after you left, Princeps, so they ended the assembly early to forestall violence. I have a feeling young Kiyosaki wanted to go on longer, but sentiments got too high for it."

Reito lifted his expressive eyebrows at Urumi.

"He did it, didn't he?" he asked. "He proposed a lex frumentaria."

"As good as promised one," Sergay answered, his own sandy brows close together. "And what a lex frumentaria he's offering! Grain at a mere sestertius for a modius and all the costs to come out of the Treasury instantly!"

"And how exactly," said Chikane, "is he hoping to find sufficient grain to distribute so liberally when our agents have had poor luck all around Our Sea?"

The woman who had been her junior consul answered.

"There's the trouble," Yukino said with a dry smile. "He's claiming it's really a manufactured grain shortage and the plutocrats are just hoarding stock to keep prices up."

"And what, the piratical attacks on our grain ships have been staged as well?"

"He's claiming the pirates are in league with the plutocrats, if you please!" Haruka brayed.

Chikane looked disparaging along with the others.

"Of course," she said, "the people believe him."

"I'm starting to think he believes himself!" Natsuhiro Ootori snapped; everyone knew he was touchy because he had close relatives among the grain merchants. "What I don't understand is how they can credit his allegations. Everyone knows about the drought and the rebels in Sicilia. Yet when he speaks it's as though these facts don't exist! Everything becomes the fault of the merchants!"

"The drowning man grasps at the straw," Reito offered. "My own questions have more to do with his motives. What does Eiichi Kiyosaki hope to gain? The leges frumentarii have generally been used merely as platforms for popularity. On what would he spend the popularity he collects from this, given how tenuous it is? The moment we grant him his lex frumentaria, everyone will realise he can't deliver on his promise because there's really no grain. What good is your popularity when the people are going to turn on you the moment you fail them?"

To that, there were no answers. The Princeps threw up his hands.

"Well, whatever his motives, I think we can all agree he's mad," he determined. "Only a lunatic would rile up a mob without any real hope of satisfying it. They won't stop at tearing him to pieces once they figure out he can't deliver on his promise. They'll go for all of us! He must be stopped, for everyone's sake."

There were sounds of concurrence.

"I couldn't agree more," Haruka thundered. She blazed her purple gaze onto Chikane's cousin and demanded: "What can we do? Can't you talk to your people about disbelieving him?"

Urumi barely stifled her grin. Haruka had been among those most critical of her use of the lower classes during her tribunate; in fact, the woman was enormously critical of it still. But this particular matter apparently had even the ultraconservative worried enough to suspend criticism.

"I'm sorry, but I doubt even I can do much," she admitted to the group. "The people are starving, and that always makes them less sensible. The only thing they can think of right now is how to fill their bellies, so they won't listen even if I tell them what Kiyosaki is offering is a vain solution. When you're at rock bottom, even a vain solution is better than nothing, isn't it?"

"Then what can we do?" Haruka cried, her harsh voice clanging frustration. She looked to Urumi's female cousin, lips bared in fury. "It's trouble, Himemiya! You can see it as well as I do! But we've nothing to solve it!"

Chikane smiled at the woman who so often butted heads with her best friend. They themselves did not see eye to eye often, but that was not about to stop them working together when needed.

"I think that may be a premature lament, Armitage-san." She placed a hand comfortingly on the shorter senator's shoulder. It was thick with muscle, which was no surprise: she had always known tough shoulders needed to carry so bullish a head. "I think we can begin by offering them hope."

There was a barely suppressed scoff from Sergay.

"Pardon me," he said, "but I think the situation already calls for something less abstract!"

Chikane's smile widened.

"I was thinking of something concrete, as a matter of fact," she explained. "Pray hear me out. I might have an idea, if you would listen to it."

---

From that one chance congregation of senators had come Chikane's commission to fight piracy. While the kernel of the notion had been hers, nearly all of them that day had contributed something to it. She had told Shizuru the truth in when she wrote that she had not expected to be the actual admiral selected. Yet now here she was, leagues from wife and home, spending winter raising fleets all over Mare Nostrum.

"'Tis something of a relief that I can do it without worrying about the bill," she confessed to the Argus governor in January. Midori Sugiura had been prorogued yet again, practically a record: it was testament to how effectively the province functioned under her tenure as well as to the power of her many senatorial connections. A good number of the current senators had once learned their core political history under her guidance.

"I take it the Treasury has to foot it without complaint?" the Argus governor now asked this latest senatorial commander to drift north.

Chikane answered positively.

"The terms of my command are not without hitches," she said, "but I made certain at least to waive a cost limit. 'Tis fortunate the Treasury is stuffed to bursting at the moment. Moreover, the clerks are feeling generous thanks to the booty Shizuru has collected."

Midori let out a small whoop as she recalled the numbers herself. Like every other person in the North, she had been following Shizuru's exploits with captivation.

"That friend of yours is a wonder," she told Chikane. "She'll have plundered more than the cash contents of the Treasury by the time her governorship is completed. Plenty of the senators must be eating their hearts out with envy."

There was that beautiful Himemiya smile: slow to develop but incredibly rewarding.

"They never stop doing that," Chikane said.

"It's the senatorial pastime," Midori agreed. "Well, I'll grant all the help I can give to your campaign, definitely, although I don't think I can donate our current flotilla to your navy. I don't think it's big enough for what you have in mind, you see. It doesn't help that they're old. We're actually planning to replace them this very year."

"I imagine they have seen much service?"

"Oh, yes! We use them to keep the pirates off this part of Our Sea. Otherwise, the wretches would come sailing right up to our ports! They've been getting awfully bold since no one's gone after them for so long. Is it true they seized some grain ships right off the docks at Ostia last year?"

Chikane's smile took on a rueful expression. The incident had been an enormous source of chagrin in Hime, and not just because of the grain shortage. The true point of pain was that the pirates had not even had to raise a sword to achieve the robbery. They had sailed in, found ships and docks wonderfully unguarded, boarded the ships along with their own, and cheerfully sailed away.

"It did happen, in late August," she admitted. "The city was seething, more so over the ease with which it was accomplished than over the stolen grain."

"I damn well hope they would seethe," the other senator said, face nearly as red as her hair. "It's bloody embarrassing! And where was the quaestor while all of this happened?"

"Apparently at home, under the impression that the ships were due the day after."

A flabbergasted look from Midori. "He should be prosecuted!"

"He probably will be," Chikane sighed. "Although I do think he would have made little difference had he actually been there. What can one quaestor do against a fleet of pirates?"

"Yes, I guess he would just have been kidnapped himself," the other sighed back heavily. "And then we would've had to ransom him too, on top of having lost the grain. I read the Senate dispatch, so I know about the numbers you discovered. To think we've had to ransom twenty-seven senators from pirates in the last ten years alone! No one notices until the figures are totted up... and then, it just 'mazes the mind!"

"As does the discovery that only half the grain ships we send out make it back safely," Chikane said, recalling her own shock when she had ascertained these statistics. "It shows you how long overdue my commission is. Ostia was perhaps the culmination of all those years of us ignoring the issue. Though on the bright side, it added to the general support for my mandate. Besides hoping for my commission to see more foreign grain safely to our ports, everyone in Hime is currently burning to see us avenge the insult at Ostia."

"Count me among them!" Midori cried, finding that humiliation as hard to live down as the rest of her countrymen. For what was the point of being the greatest nation in the world when pirates could snatch food right out of your people's mouths? And what was the point of calling it Our Sea when those naval thieves made free to frolic on its waters at your expense?

"I said I can't give you my little navy, Chikane-san, such as it is," the Argus governor said. "What I can and will do is help you raise a better, much bigger fleet. I'll get you all the introductions you need. All the shipyard owners, the local captains, the big plutocrats who live off sea trade. I guarantee they'll fund and help you build your fleet if you get them to see that they'll benefit off it-which they will! I'll even help you beat it into their skulls, though I doubt we'll need to. Fewer pirates means safer seas. Good for commerce, and they know it."

Chikane had been hoping for this. She gave the Argus governor her gratitude and was waved away.

"Only doing what I should," the elder senator said. "I'll send you a message as soon as I've arranged a meeting with all of them, probably over a dinner or something. And speaking of meetings, I suppose you're planning to see Shizuru-chan here? I don't imagine she'd let you pass through the North without seeing her."

Chikane said that she had already sent Shizuru a message.

"I expect," she told Midori, "that she will send one too any day."

She got it the next morning from one of Shizuru's army messengers. When quizzed how far behind him Septentria's governor-general was, he said it was by three hours. Chikane went on with her work, recruiting sailors and seeking more influential locals who could contribute to her campaign's resources. She knew her friend would find her once she reached the city.

Shizuru did that four hours later. She stood on the road outside of the upscale tavern Chikane was leaving with a pair of shipping magnates and called the other patrician's name.

They strode into each other's arms, smiling so widely it hurt their faces. It was Chikane who pulled back first.

"You look better than the last time I saw you," she observed. The slightly haggard, thirsty look of years past had gone away. The Shizuru she saw now looked very fit and happy. And even golden of skin! That made sense: the younger senator had spent most of the last year marching. Chikane supposed she herself would be seeing more sunlight than usual for her upcoming campaign.

"You look very well, old friend," she said, squeezing the sleeved arms and feeling the hard strength in them. "You have no idea how good it is to see you!"

"I know how good it is to see you !" Shizuru returned. She kissed Chikane warmly on the cheek and was pulled in for another, briefer embrace. "Come, where have you been quartered? We need a place to talk at our leisure and without fear of eavesdroppers."

"I suspect we are staying in the same place, in fact," said Chikane. "Did Sugiura-san invite you to occupy one of the gubernatorial palace's other guest suites?"

"My servants are moving in there this very moment."

"Then let us go to the palace. We can talk in my office while your rooms get settled."

Shizuru threw an arm about Chikane's shoulders and hugged her friend to her side; an arm wrapped about her waist in return. Many watched them as they walked, for both were extraordinarily tall and attractive women.

"I was afraid that I would not catch you," Shizuru said. "But my luck is still with me, it seems. When do you leave?"

"Not for at least a week," Chikane replied. "My legate Tamaki Fujita will manage the fleet here after I sail."

"I understand. At least it gives us ample time to catch up with each other."

Chikane concurred and enquired after the other's lover, whom she had expected to meet.

"Off pretending to be busy," was the answer.

At Chikane's quizzical face, Shizuru elucidated: "The poor girl is petrified at the thought of finally meeting you. I thought I would grant her some time to herself first, especially as we did just conclude a journey. Let us give her an hour or so to rest, Chikane. Later I shall bring you to meet her somewhere private. She may then be less prone to her fears that you shall find her a disappointment."

"She mentioned Pindar in her first letter," Chikane mused. "Anyone who leads a dialogue with Pindar is unlikely to be a disappointment."

Her friend laughed out an agreement.

"Was it perhaps something I wrote that so worries her?" Chikane enquired, now fretful. "I strove to be pleasant without being too presumptuous, but--"

Shizuru hushed her and said it was unlikely to be anything in the letters.

"You have to keep in mind that she's very young," she said, causing Chikane to wonder if she had forgotten she was that herself. Why, Shizuru had not even turned thirty yet! One sometimes overlooked it, admittedly, because she had been in the Senate so long. Only two others in the present House had become senators in their adolescence-and unlike her no one really thought of them, for both had become senators by being chosen as the flamines dialis and martialis. The flamen dialis and to a lesser extent the flamen martialis did not have much of a political future, and hence did not matter. Whereas Shizuru would never not matter.

"Her youth makes her tender, Chikane," her young friend was saying, still speaking as though she had hit middle age herself. "She also esteems you because of who you are and what you mean to me. Personally, I doubt either of you shall find anything to dislike. But you will see for yourself soon. For now, tell me all the news. Start with this naval campaign that they have forced upon you and how exactly you came into it."

Chikane did as bidden, detailing everything she had not managed to put into her last epistle. By the time they settled in the room designated as her office at the governor's palace, she was explaining Eiichi Kiyosaki's scheme, which had been the catalyst for her mission.

"His plan had been to appear as the only hope for solving the famine," she told Shizuru as a slave served wine. The man also set a platter of pastries and fruit between them before leaving the room under Chikane's orders. "By making it seem as though he was the only one who cared enough to fight the grain merchants-the ones he claimed responsible for the famine-he also made the Senate look like an enemy for its apparent negligence or, in some cases, collusion."

"I am astounded they believed him," Shizuru said.

"So was I, at first," the other woman admitted. "Granted, it may be harder to think things through when you have to put up with turnips and rough millet instead of bread! Yet even allowing for what Reito called the desperation of the famished, it still made little sense. Until I gave it some more thought and realised exactly who the problems were: our urban poor, as always."

She lifted her cup off the table and drank from it.

"The core of Kiyosaki-san's following was made up of them," she enlarged, putting the cup back down. "For a cogent reason. No one from the countryside would doubt for a moment that there was a grain shortage. The rural peoples themselves saw the worst of the drought and its effects! They would have been less swift to credit Kiyosaki-san's allegations. It was the city folk who lacked that first-hand experience, and thus were faster to latch onto any possibility of the shortage being fabricated."

Shizuru agreed and asked her to continue.

"Kiyosaki-san's claims about the grain merchants essentially polarised the field," Chikane went on. "It placed him on the side of good and the knights and the Senate on the side of wrong. That way, when he unveiled his true aim, any protest coming from those sectors would be registered by populace as evil, so to speak, and fought by them."

Shizuru had learned some details from her other correspondents, so she filled it in: "His true aim was to get elected tribune of the plebs a consecutive year?"

"Indeed."

The two of them shook heads at nearly the same time. It was not completely unheard-of for tribunes of the plebs to seek consecutive terms, but it had happened only a couple of times before. Those precedents had also been tremendously controversial-so much so, in fact, that those twice-elected tribunes had ended their terms by being murdered.

"I do not often agree with the Traditionalists," scowled Shizuru, "but I think I do when it comes to that particular tradition! It sits ill to have a person seek a seat in the Plebeian Tribune for successive years when his chief agenda is fomenting a riot. What would he have done with a second tribunate, anyway?"

"Going from the gossip Urumi gathered, put off his creditors," Chikane revealed. "Most of us already knew Kiyosaki-san was being hounded by usurers, but he had apparently traded too with some genuine loan sharks. By this I mean the toothier species of that particular city fish."

"The ones who break your bones aside from snatching your property."

Chikane said that was it.

"Had he been re-elected, it would have guaranteed his protection for another year," she allowed. "Even our sharkier citizens have to respect the sacrosanctity of a tribune of the plebs, especially one with a big following."

"And, given that following," Shizuru proposed, "he would then have become the most powerful of the ten members of the plebeian tribunate's college. Would he have offered his legislative services to buyers?"

"I imagine so. All he needed to do was keep people worked up until the elections in July. Such was the feeling in the city that none of the other tribunes would have dared to veto him if he declared himself a second-time candidate. It would have been life-threatening to contest it, he being the Hero of the Hungry! He would then have sailed in at the top of the poll."

Shizuru was grinning, knowing what had happened to prevent that from taking place.

"But you never even let him get there," she told her friend. "You told your tribune of the plebs to veto not his candidacy but the elections themselves."

The other woman smiled slyly.

"Well, he could not be let to do as he pleased!" she said.

Shizuru shook her head in amusement, knowing from her letters that Chikane's man had kept vetoing until nearly the end of the year-to the consternation of even the other candidates.

"And that was when the House put forward your naval campaign," she now said. "Did you also have Urumi-han's agents whispering among the people about what a pain the pirates were being to our grain ships?"

"Of course, starting with the lower classes." A blue eye gleamed, a sea in itself. "As the whispers were no less than truth, it took very little effort for it to spread. Many of our sailors and dockside workers actually know how bad piracy has become. They added their voices to the chorus of people saying it was the pirates who were truly the problem. Since this was one issue where most of the Senate was united, many of our fellows had their own agents lending support."

She tucked a lock of black hair behind an ear, smiling as she concluded the story.

"You know the rest," she said. "All of a sudden, fury at the pirates waxed and interest in Kiyosaki-san waned. I instructed Tsunekazu-san-" This was her tribune of the plebs last year. "-to continue vetoing the elections as long as Kiyosaki-san seemed likely to declare candidacy. For all the trouble he stirred up, Kiyosaki-san did not actually last that long once there was a rival story: by September he no longer had sufficient support to try standing, and so abandoned his scheme."

Shizuru hummed long and contentedly.

"So that is what has been happening," she exhaled. "I knew about your man's vetoing the elections repeatedly as well as about Eiichi Kiyosaki's demagoguery. Even so, you are never truly certain how it all links up until you talk to someone who was actually there to see it."

"If you knew about those things, do you also know the results of the elections?"

Shizuru knew what result Chikane was referring to: "I know Haruka Armitage has been elected a censor, if that is what you are asking."

"She might do well," the other said, "given her meticulousness."

"Not to mention her intransigence."

"It may be all to the good in this case," Chikane replied, suppressing a chuckle. Her young friend's face was taking on the sardonic look it often did when speaking of her nemesis. "Allow that it means we shall be unlikely to see unworthy additions to the ranks of senators during her term!"

This was because the censors maintained the rolls where all Himean senators were listed. To become a senator, an elected politician-like a quaestor, for instance-had to be admitted by the censors into these rolls.

The censors checked first that the person met all the requirements. These included a means test as well as a cursory examination of assets. Senators were required to have a yearly income of at least a million sesterces. They were also required to observe the restrictions on senatorial businesses.

By and large, however, not all of the requirements were met. Most censors were perfectly willing to overlook a deficiency if the would-be-senator came from an established senatorial clan. There were also censors who looked the other way if the would-be-senator tendered a bribe. The censor so strict as to discriminate properly was very rare.

While this allowed even impoverished Famous Families to remain in the Senate, it made it possible too for all sorts of pernicious characters to become senators. It also explained why so many senators were in debt to moneylenders: the censors were supposed to eject them from the House-it was illegal for a senator to be in debt-but hardly ever did.

"Armitage-san is not the type to wink at a deficit in any of the prerequisites," said Chikane. "Nor shall she let her fellow censor get away with anything shady, I think. Her intransigence, as you term it, may actually serve the office well."

Shizuru's eyebrow lifted, its split all the clearer against her ambered skin.

"That was what I meant by my remark," she said.

She followed by asking about the older woman's naval command and plans for it.

"I have even more legates than you do now," Chikane revealed, readily taking the change of subject. "This is due to the sheer size of what we have to cover. I know many expect me to do as my predecessors in anti-piracy campaigns by limiting my exploits to a single part of Mare Nostrum. For them, it seemed impossible to do more, so they settled for clearing just small stretches of water. But I actually worked a solution for that problem long ago. I may not have wanted this command initially, but the pirates have been on my mind for years. You recall when I was a legate for Suzuhara-san that I engaged some of their armadas."

"Yes, only your duties prevented you from going after more. I remember."

"As do I. One might say I have never truly forgotten. Hence I have long been forming, in a casual way, an idea of how to go about what I must now execute."

She paused to sip from her cup, very delicately.

"My plan is to station a legate with a fleet and militia at every region of Mare Nostrum," she continued. "I have split up the area into twelve-possibly thirteen regions, depending on the fleets I can get."

"Twelve to thirteen fleets," Shizuru echoed. "Plus whatever fleet you intend to reserve for yourself. That shall take time to get together, Chikane."

"Yes, but less if I have my legates building their fleets all at once," Chikane answered. "I already have legates sailing to every major port in Our Sea and commandeering vessels from all of our provinces' shipyards. I have some going to inveigle fleets off our allies with coastal properties too, like Bithynia and Rhodes. Every province that already has a fleet will have to turn it over for the moment, although I am sparing Argus that measure because it would serve my stratagem to leave its fleet untouched. That way, I can station my legate for this region further south in the Adriatic and let the Argus flotilla clean up anything that slips through his blockade and to the north."

"Where will you be yourself?" Shizuru asked, fascinated.

"Once all my legates have their fleets in their regions, I shall begin working around the Mare Ibericum, in the westernmost end of Our Sea. My ships will start there, sweep eastward, and keep sweeping until they hit the seaboard of Syria and Cilicia."

Shizuru saw the strategy in an instant.

"So each time they make a break east for a safer port than the one you are attacking, they shall be running smack into your legates' navies."

"So runs the intention," Chikane told her. "I shall have land troops too, of course, though I think they shall be concentrated in Cilicia."

"Where most of the pirate admirals have their strongholds."

"Precisely. It shall take some doing to get everything in place. But it shall be done, even if I must have my officers heckle every coastal provincial governor we have into cooperation."

"You may have trouble with a few of them," Shizuru warned. She knew the tensions that could arise when senators with imperium got into a question of who was the superior power. Entire legions-even entire armies - had been lost in the past, just because two overhaughty senators had refused to work together.

But Chikane continued to look sanguine.

"This is one of the times," she said, "when it is preferable to be me instead of you."

Shizuru succumbed to a fit of laughter. She knew exactly what Chikane meant by that and knew too that the woman was correct. They might be equals in aristocracy, in clout, even in political acumen-but when it came to patience, she freely admitted Chikane the better. The woman brooked lesser lights with unbelievable tolerance and was not as prone to showing up their inadequacies as Shizuru was. Perhaps as a result, most of their peers found her the easier to like of the two of them. Oh, everyone knew they were both predators! But the scent of peril stole off Chikane less. It would stand her in good stead when she haggled with the other governors.

"They shall work with me," she said simply, and Shizuru knew it would happen.

"You are right," the young woman concluded, contemplating the cleverness of Chikane's plan with delight. Hers was the pleasure of a great strategist talking to another, equal intelligence. "You will sweep Our Sea clean of thieves even before the two years are finished. Dearest Himeko shall have to manage without her spouse for less time than she might think."

"I bought her a dog."

Shizuru smiled at the sudden admission.

"You bought her a dog?" she near-parroted.

"A pup, to be precise. I had the idea from you, Shizuru."

Chikane crossed her legs and rearranged her tunic over her knees.

"I recalled that you had given your lover a pet," she explained, "and I wondered if perhaps that might salve some of her loneliness when you had reason to be absent. It was a good idea."

"I see," Shizuru said. "But do you not already have pet birds in the manor?"

"Yes, but Himeko said one cannot hug them. I suppose that translates to 'they do not count'. Pray do not ask me why." Chikane shrugged, looking indulgent at her wife's little foibles. "So I bought her one of those small white lapdogs, a canis melitaeus. She took to it instantly and it did the same to her. As she seemed to find it satisfactorily huggable, it was a good investment."

Shizuru laughed, having no trouble imagining Himeko Himemiya with a lapdog in her arms.

"I am glad I inspired you to it then," she said. "Although it is amusing to think of Hime-chan with the same dog the snobbier ladies back home are toting. Now all you need is a spoiled brat of a child for her and she shall be the image of a proper Himean matron."

"I am offering to adopt your lover, whom you once called a child," Chikane reminded.

"Yes, but she is not spoiled-though she can be a brat, actually." Shizuru flashed a grin. "Did I ever write to you about how she forced me to bring her on several marches?"

Chikane asked how Natsuki had done it and Shizuru told her.

"Can you believe the impudent little monster trounced me thus?" the younger woman said as the two of them laughed after the story. "Threatening to marry someone else indeed! I should have turned her over my knee!"

Chikane dabbed at the corner of an eye, still chuckling.

"I am pleased she has sufficient courage to defy you," she said. "That takes mettle, Shizuru."

Her friend's expression suddenly softened. Shizuru said: "She actually went pale when I told her you were here, do you know?"

"That anxious! Is there aught I may do to soothe her once we see each other?"

"Just be nice. Oh, and ask her to go riding with you sometime," the other said with a wink. "She loves it and I guarantee you shall find it quite an experience."

Chikane was mystified. "But... has she not lost much of one leg?"

"Quite an experience," Shizuru repeated, which the other woman took to mean she would have to figure out the secret for herself.

Her eyes glanced to the chronometer on a console table; she indicated it to Shizuru.

"We have spent past an hour here by now," she said. "And while I am immeasurably eager to hear of your own news-such as Terantrum, which I insist you narrate to me in detail-I do think putting off our meeting further would be torture for your Natsuki. Should we not yet go to see her, then?"

Shizuru said they probably should.

"Although I do think it would be better for me not to be there," she said, and explained: "She tends to do best when she has no spectators beyond the person she directly addresses. She may feel stilted if I play a chaperone, although I certainly will join you two later. I merely think it shall go better for her if she does not have me hovering like a mother hen at the start."

A slightly smaller voice as she added: "She is also currently a little displeased with me, so..."

"Why would she be?" Chikane asked. "Did you do something to her, Shizuru?"

"I did not tell her we were meeting you until after we arrived."

Her friend laughed and assumed a reproachful expression.

"So your decision not to chaperone is really more out of self-preservation than maturity," she said. "Sometimes, Shizuru, even you act your real age! Did you not consider that she might have wanted more time for preparation?"

"Well, I thought it better than having her worry the entire journey! Surely you can see why I would have wished to spare her that anxiety."

"I wonder. I myself am not overfond of surprises, so I understand her displeasure ."

"Even so. Anyway, you might try to speak in my defence when you get her to warm up to you."

"Why should I?"

Shizuru seemed to find the question a surprise.

"Er, because you are my friend," she pointed out, with a look that said it should be obvious. Chikane smiled serenely back. "And you know I only spared her the news earlier out of good intentions. She truly would have worried herself to perdition had she known ahead of our arrival."

Her friend took a delicate sip of wine.

"Do you remember when I instructed my steward not to accept Oogami Souma-san in the house if I was absent?" she asked all of a sudden. "It was right after my marriage and I was afraid that something unpleasant might pass should he see Himeko without my chaperonage. Rejected suitors can be unpredictable, or so I argued when Himeko discovered my orders to the household. Yet my lovely wife believed I had the measure of the man incorrect. Worse, she was angry because she said I had not trusted her enough to leave it in her hands."

She smiled sweetly at Shizuru, who stared back, mouth open.

"Do you remember how you sided with her then, my friend?" she asked.

"Chikane, you would not," Shizuru pretend-gasped, trying not to laugh.

"I have waited long for this day," Chikane sighed dreamily.

She only just managed to avoid the kick aimed at her foot. She traded a grin with her friend before sobering again and asking one last question about her imminent meeting.

"Have you any advice for how I should start the conversation? I would like her to feel comfortable sooner with our topics."

"Tell her about your commission." And at Chikane's amused look, she went on: "Natsuki has an excellent strategic mind and a better grasp of our politics than you can imagine. You can probably tell her the story of how you got your command and it would absorb her as much as it would a Himean senator of intelligence. You shall see it in her questions. My girl is shrewd, even if she is not a talker."

So by the time Shizuru urged her into the sitting room where the Otomeian waited, Chikane was just as eager to meet the young woman. She was wise enough to allow that not all of Shizuru's claims might be true, but she recalled too her late sister's equally complimentary letters. Was she really so impressive as both Shizuru and Suou had made her out? Or was it merely that the two giving her praise had been charmed into the illusion? For Chikane had a suspicion that her late sister had liked Shizuru's mistress more than she had actually admitted, possibly even to herself.

The room she entered was empty of people, save for a figure seated on a couch. She took her in quickly during that instant before the figure's head lifted. Oh, she was young! And as beautiful as gossip and supposition back home already had it. Perhaps even more so because her beauty fell short of being properly Himean. That small difference made her strange, added a suspicion of the otherworldly pretending to be familiar. A beauty, but neither comforting nor approachable. She drew with disturbance, which meant admirers would be spellbound longer. Her looks were a burden to her, then; Shizuru had said she disliked attention.

Their eyes met.

For a painful instant the wide eyes filled; the girl looked down swiftly and rubbed at them. Chikane let her be for some moments, knowing her own throat would betray her too were she to speak. She had seen the look of recognition and understood. It had lanced through her own heart.

When enough time had passed for both to compose themselves, she came over to occupy the empty couch beside the younger woman.

"Ave, Natsuki," she said with a smile. "You said in your letter to call you that, did you not?"

Chapter 75

Vocabulaire:

1. Aedile - There were four of these: two were called the plebeian aediles and two were called the curule aediles. They were responsible for the structures of the city, among other things, but more importantly were also the organisers (and to a large part the funders, given the Treasury's parsimony) of the Roman public games. It was considered a good thing if the aediles were rich, because it meant a better chance of seeing fantastic-and very expensive-games.

2. Denarii (pl.), denarius (s.) - A Roman coin, often made of silver. The conversion is thus: 6,250 denarii = 25,000 sesterces = 1 silver talent.

3. Flamen dialis & flaminica dialis (L.) - The flamen dialis is the state priest of Jupiter Optimus Maximus; his wife is the flaminica dialis. It should really be the flamen dialis attending the type of marriage ceremony Shizuru describes here, but in this text, the flaminica may assume his duties.

4. Hyperboreans - A mythical people supposed to live far to the north. They were also described as giants.

5. Hypocaust - A heating system in use even during ancient times. It relied on a furnace usually held at a lower level than the ground floor and a series of pipes that circulated the furnace's warm air around a building. More complex hypocausts even used pipes to bring the heating to upper storeys.

6. Pontifex maximus (L.) - The head of the College of Pontifices; high-priest of Rome.

7. Rosea rura (L.) - The fertile lands outside of Reate, or modern-day Rieti. This was where they bred the best mules in Italia.

8. NOTE on gladiatorial schools - There may be some who have seen the Starz series Spartacus and imagine Republican (not Imperial!) gladiatorial schools to be as portrayed by the show. It can be dangerous to take history lessons from the television set. The description of gladiatorial schools and service Hermias gives below is accurate for the time period. There were some "bad" schools with poorer living conditions, but they were the exceptions. Note too that gladiators in this time generally fought exhibitions and did not kill each other. Simple moneymaking arithmetic: the cost of hiring them (the main source of revenue) would not have recouped the investment lost if a gladiator died. Remember too that people attend matches for free.

9. NOTE on geographic adjustments - Those paying attention to the geographic descriptions should have figured this out by themselves: most of the southern map of Republican Rome's world is intact in the story. The northern parts are those that have undergone alteration. The northern end of the Adriatic Sea is extended further upwards, for instance. This insinuates Argus's coast somewhere around where real-life Noricum was. Most of Germania is replaced by the Kingdom of Otomeia, just as most of upper Gallia Comata is replaced by the Mentulaean Empire. Substitutions are not exact, however, so do not expect, say, a Danuvius equivalent just because the Danuvius is on the Republican Roman map.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Chikane spent only eight days in Argus, but it was a fruitful eight days for her newest acquaintance. Mistress and friend had taken to each other as Shizuru had predicted. They had even spent nearly every moment of Chikane's free time together, discussing everything from their respective cultures' politics to the Pythagorean preoccupation with numbers and fava beans. Costly gifts of friendship were exchanged, as were oaths to continue their correspondence. Thus it was that when Chikane's ship finally sailed away, Natsuki joined Shizuru in regretting the shortness of her visit.

"Although in some respects, I am a little relieved," Shizuru confessed privately to her cousin, who had also journeyed to Argus to see Chikane. "For the way they got along, what if she had liked my best friend more than me?"

Shizuma grinned, knowing the other was joking.

"I'm relieved too, but for a different reason," she said. "Frankly, I could stand no more of them chattering the way they did. You'd think you weren't with beautiful women! All you get is mounds of philosophy and that awful arithmetician's Attic, enough to make you think you're sitting in an agora with two unattractive and gabby old men!"

Shizuru adored her lover's scholarly bent and was astonished: "Oh, but I enjoyed listening to that."

"You would!" the other said, goaded.

She had often been part of the pair's conversations, although she had also allowed them time without her. She had felt that it would further their budding friendship and might even work well for her own causes. She was proven right when, near the end of Chikane's visit, her mistress confessed that she was starting to think adoption by the woman not so disquieting.

"That is good news indeed!" she said to that. "Is it because of a conversation you two had?"

"Yes."

"Well! And what was it you talked about?"

"You."

"Oh. You two talked about me?"

"We talked of you a lot."

"I see," Shizuru said thoughtfully. "That sounds terrifying."

Terrifying discussions of her aside, she truly was gladdened by the liking between the two. She knew Natsuki would need all the friends she could get in the future, once they finally moved to Hime. Especially after they got married, they would face social opposition the likes of which Natsuki had not yet seen. But there was little point worrying about it for the moment, save to prepare by finding more friends like Chikane.

It would be nice if those I find are also friends in the political sense, she thought wryly. Chikane's visit coincided with other factors that recalled to her the other part of their world she had been keeping in the background. She had spent three years just watching events in Hime and Fuuka from a distance, too concerned with her governorship to do more. Now that her province had settled down into the beginnings of peace, it was time to point her attention and abilities south again.

She wanted to start the fourth year of her governorship with a plan for extending her command. Obsidian might be dead and cremated, but Septentria was not in fact fully pacified. She knew the local aristocrats had gone quiet and seemed eager to cooperate. Yet her bones warned her not to trust in them yet, especially after their experiences with the Carsinii. Experience and military cunning told her to trust in her bones instead of the locals' promises; she needed to keep her army and command a little longer if she was to see her campaign properly concluded.

New provinces also had growing pains and flare ups-Shizuru needed to guide Septentria's people into the future or the whole would fall apart. She still had to satisfy her long-time supporters: the knights and plutocrats looking to expand trade northward. Then there was the idea she had long cherished as a way to secure the province's future: the establishment of legionary veteran communities in the land. Such communities would provide a nucleus for the growth and dissemination of Himean culture in the North. They would also make it easier for future governors to put down revolt in Septentria, for it gave them instant sources of legionaries nearby.

In order to do all of that she had to restore normal commerce and administration to Septentria's many regions while turning what had been an empire into a properly Himean province. That meant integrating Hime into every part of Septentria's new socio-political structure. An arduous task.

If everything went according to plan, she could do it all in the time she had left. Two years was more than enough. The problem was that nothing ever went according to plan. Every smart general or politician knew that. So she would have to dicker with the Senate again to get herself prorogued, even if only one more year beyond the fifth her mandate granted. That required adding more names to her faction, bolstering the list of people who gave her support.

It was in musing on these things and other political news from Hime that she went searching for Natsuki in their quarters, two days after her best friend left.

"In the sitting room, Domina," said one of her slaves.

She stalked there and found the Otomeian stretched languidly on a couch, occupied by one of the scrolls of poetry Chikane had given her as a gift. Shizuru paused to appreciate the lissom catlike sprawl of her first.

"Can you have your servants put your things together by the day after tomorrow?" she asked. "I just finished talking to Shizuma about having her take over for the moment. I fear I shall compel you to suffer another voyage in winter, mea vita."

Natsuki said she would have her servants pack promptly and asked where they were headed.

"Fuuka," Shizuru said, which got her a chuckle. She kept her eyes on the girl and said it again. "Fuuka. Why are you laughing?"

The other's smile faded; bottle green eyes stared, darted away, then stared again.

"Fuuka?" Natsuki breathed. "Really?"

Now it was Shizuru who chuckled.

"I have been saying so this entire time!" she said, bending down to bring her head nearer the girl's. "Why, what is the matter with the idea? I thought you would be excited to finally see that land?"

The look she got was so complicated she made no sense of it.

Eventually Natsuki exclaimed, "But how can you do this?!"

Shizuru was a little taken aback.

"How can I do... what?" she said. "I'm sorry, but what do you mean, Natsuki?"

"I mean, is it allowed of you?"

Shizuru heaved a deep breath and perched by the young woman, who was now sitting up too.

"Let me see, because I am having trouble understanding at the moment," she said deliberately. "This news seems to confuse you in some way, Natsuki. Why is that?"

Natsuki explained her confusion, at length. She had thought Shizuru debarred from returning to her home until her governorship was over. While Shizuru told her this was true, it only meant she could not return to Hime. Fuuka was an entirely different matter.

"You have to remember that one does not mean the other," she said. "I may not be allowed to enter Hime while I am still a governor, but that is only because a senator with command of an army cannot cross the city's sacred boundary, which we call the pomerium. This does not forbid me access to the rest of Fuuka, you perceive."

"Then," said Natsuki slowly, "you can go back?"

"Of course I can. I could have done so at any time before this, had it not been for my duties. Did you think I was stapled to the north simply because I was named governor of Septentria?"

Natsuki's face showed she had thought exactly that.

"I can actually go whenever I wish. I did not simply because I was still in a wartime province. The moment things are relatively settled-which they are right now-I can pack up and travel elsewhere, provided my people know what to do in my absence. Shizuma can handle matters for me while I am away. It is unlikely any great emergency shall happen anyway, at least while it is winter."

She waited for a nod to tell her the girl understood.

"We are also only going as far as Ravenna," she continued. "That places me within summoning distance should I be needed. Missives sent from both Septentria and Hime shall still reach me quickly. Letters from the latter, in fact, will reach me much faster, which is partly the point. There are things beckoning my attention back home."

Natsuki was scrambling to put on her prosthetic. Her hands were so twitchy that she botched the buckle twice and finally gave it up for to call for her crutch instead. A servant ran to hand it to her and she got up. Shizuru watched, riveted, as the Otomeian limped her way nimbly to a desk. She snatched a big scroll from on top of it and just as quickly hobbled back.

She plopped herself next to Shizuru and spread out the scroll on their laps. The amused Himean helped her keep it open.

"Ravenna?" she demanded, practically vibrating. "Shizuru, Ravenna? Where?"

Shizuru pointed it out to her. One long finger rested on the town's location on the map, a point almost exactly halfway between Hime and their Atinu Base. Natsuki exhaled one of her cooing foreign sounds, unconsciously fitting herself closer to her lover.

"It is a town?" she asked, nestling deeper when Shizuru's arm went around her waist. "By water? Like Argus, maybe?"

"Yes, and yes, although its port is nowhere near as large."

"How long? The travel?"

"Not long at all," Shizuru said. "We are going by sea. It may be a little bit rough given the season, but the North Winds are blowing everything to the south. They will drive whatever vessel we board so fast that I doubt we shall spend more than five days on the water."

"So fast?" Natsuki gaped.

"Yes, if we are fortunate," Shizuru told her. "I hired the ship earlier-a good craft, still new and built for speed. We will not even need to take a second team of rowers, so we should be even lighter. That means faster travel. I would not subject you or my staff to the agony of a week at sea, for not everyone stands it easily."

In the end, they spent only three days on the Adriatic. The voyage staggered Natsuki for its speed, as she had never before seen what a ship could cover with a steady wind and a captain willing to travel straight instead of hugging the coast. She also managed to enjoy most of the journey, turning out as immune to nausea as Shizuru herself. They spent most of the voyage in the bow, thrilled by the ship's speed and the sea spray in their faces. Many in their retinue unfortunately lacked their immunity to seasickness, however. These spent the three days drooped over the side of the ship like rags hung out to dry.

They put in at the modest ports of Ravenna early and so managed a smooth disembarkation. Hired carts and carriages were plentiful in the daytime and brought them past the part of the town that stood at sea level. They headed instead to the less settled swards in the west. There one found the country villas like Shizuru's, which were only inhabited at certain times of the year. Given Ravenna's northern location and climate, that usually meant the warmer seasons, when southern Fuuka became so hot it was intolerable. But it was winter when Shizuru first showed it to Natsuki, so they had fewer neighbours than if they had come in summer instead.

The owner of the villa guided her mistress through it while their servants saw to their possessions. She took her deep into the villa first, wanting to start her tour at the master's bedroom. This was the biggest of all the sleeping areas in the villa, because the rest were only traditional cubicles. The villa had been built fifteen years earlier, before the trend for larger bedrooms had developed among the very wealthy. When Shizuru bought the property she had a contractor expand the already sizeable master bedroom to a proper bedchamber. The old room had also been traditional in that it had lacked windows: her contractor had been ordered to change that as well.

"This is where we shall sleep," she told Natsuki, opening the solid oak doors but not entering. The slaves were still busy moving furniture and items like fresh pillows. "The other doors down the wall are to guest suites and a sitting room. And out here you can see the loggia end of the peristyle immediately. The latrines and baths are on that side of the courtyard, by the way. Come and see the garden."

The peristyle garden before them was spacious and cleverly landscaped. Like most Himean villas its size, it sported a central pool ornamented with statues and fountains. It being winter, the fountains were not running and the pool was empty. Little frost crystals speckled the pool's rim.

"This villa actually has a hypocaust," Shizuru said, "as you probably felt when we passed through the atrium. But the original architect never extended the heating system to the pipes for the fountains, so at present they are not running. I wish you could have seen them in summer instead."

Natsuki ran a thumb over the outstretched finger of a marble naiad. Her eyes when she turned to Shizuru were brighter than ever.

"Even now," she said, "they are beautiful."

Shizuru extended a hand for her to take.

"If you like this, wait until I get you back home," she told the Otomeian. "I have actual bronzes from Lysippus and Praxiteles in my pool there."

Natsuki asked how she had acquired such precious artworks.

"Grandfather was a big art collector," she explained. "As was Mater, in fact. Pater less so."

"And you?"

"Well, I have not added much to their collections-though I did purchase an Appelles for the atrium, way back before I met you-but perhaps we can change that in the future."

She led her from the courtyard and through the peristyle, then toward the gallery that led to the atrium.

"Over on that side of the atrium is the triclinium -the dining room," she said, "and over there is a suite, the passage to the servants' quarters, and the kitchens. On this other side we have the reception room, and beside that is the study. I told Hermias to move in one more desk so we can use it together."

She led Natsuki into the large room as she continued.

"There is only one study here," she said. "But back home there are two, as both my parents were senators and often conducted business separately. I was already using Pater's, so that can stay mine when we do live there. You shall have Mater's and can have it remodelled to your liking. It already looks good, but I would rather you had something in which you were perfectly comfortable."

Natsuki looked up from the pigeonholed wall she was perusing.

"I thank you, Shizuru," she said. "But, um, why do I need a study?"

"Why, shall you not write any letters the entire time we are in Ravenna?"

"I will, yes, but... why will I need one in Hime?"

"For one thing, so that you have a room all your own," Shizuru answered. "For another, because you will need one, between your correspondence and whatever else you find to do once we live there."

Natsuki squinted and looked through the iron lattice of a window. It threw thin bars of shadow on her face.

"What will I find to do?" she wondered.

"A lot, believe me. But on that note, I was wondering if you would not like to invest in some rosea rura land in Reate."

Natsuki turned her way.

"Invest?" she said. "In land?"

"Yes, to start up your own mule breeding or horse breeding concern here. I know you already have one such in Otomeia, but that would make it even easier to create another here. You can replicate your Otomeian business, for the most part. Reate is the best place for that as it is the most wonderful grazing land in all of Fuuka, with the result that the breeders there turn out the best animals. I actually get mine only from them when I am sourcing mules for an army."

As she had known it would, the pretty face grew earnest.

"The mules you brought north," she said. "They came from there?"

"Yes. All are good animals, as you have seen."

She could see from the other's eyes that she liked the idea.

"Reate," said the Otomeian. "I can see this place too? Someday?"

"Of course. I will take you there myself. Not right now, though, as it is a way off from here... although it is very near Hime. Just one more reason to set up a business there. You can monitor it very easily when we live in the city."

A moment of silence as she considered Natsuki's face in the light from the window. So beautiful! It was five years later and she still could not get over it.

"So you like the idea I just proposed?" she said, clearing her throat. "Of setting up your own breeding concession?"

Natsuki's head bobbed thrice to show her keenness.

"Excellent!" Shizuru grinned with a little guilt. "Because I already bought one such enterprise for you and put it in your name."

Natsuki stopped her poking about the room and stared.

"But you-you put- why, Shizuru?" she blurted.

"Well, I intended it as a gift to my betrothed," Shizuru confessed.

"And while I know we are not yet legally affianced-though you should just surrender to the inevitable!-we shall be soon and you know it. I had my banker look for such opportunities early last year. After he found a good option, he sent me the details and I reviewed them. The investment was already beckoning, so I went ahead and made the purchase before your last birthday. The earlier I bought, the sooner you could see returns. And with armies being mustered all over Our Sea at the moment, you will see a lot of returns early indeed."

She smiled at the younger woman.

"I kept all the original staff," she said, "so they could keep running the business for your sake. I set one of my most trustworthy agents as overseer, though, just to be safe. I also set up an account with my bankers in your name, so the proceeds from the mule breeding have been going there since I bought it. It is your money, just as the business is my gift."

Natsuki walked over as swiftly as her prosthetic and cane permitted.

"No, Shizuru," she said, reaching for the older woman's face. "It is too generous. I cannot accept."

"All the legalities have already been settled."

"But-the profit should be yours! Let it go to you instead."

"Impossible. It is already arranged and it would look dubious if property under a foreign national's name suddenly started sending cash into my account."

Natsuki looked around her blindly, overwhelmed. Her hand worked into Shizuru's hair.

"Then," she decided, "put it in your name!"

"I cannot do that. And do not bother offering to reimburse me for it, when you do not even know how much it cost. Anyway, once we get married and share most of our assets, it would not be so great a distinction which of us actually owns it, think you not? So you might say it would benefit me even if it is supposed to be a gift to my wife."

My future wife, that is to say."

"Ah, Shizuru!" Natsuki groaned. "My people would say you should not spoil a wife thus. It makes them difficult to live with."

Shizuru chortled, knowing her people would say the same. In fact, they said it more often of wives who were considered beauties, as everyone knew beauties tended to be wilful and used to being pampered unreasonably. She doubted this particular beauty could be that way, though. Witness the difficulty of getting her to even accept a gift!

"Only think," her beauty was saying. "If after we marry, we may fight one day and you will want it back. But no, it will be in my name."

Her lips quirked: Natsuki's eyes were laughing.

"So what?" she said, playing along. "We would be married, as you said. Whatever we fought about we would have to get over it in the end."

"And if we cannot?" Natsuki murmured into her neck. "If we divorce, you will never get back the investment!"

Shizuru giggled, tickled by the lips and teeth on her skin.

"So you think," she said. "But we shall marry confarreatio, so the joke is on you then."

Natsuki pulled back to look at her.

"Con-confuh-say it again," was the demand.

" Confarreatio . "

" Confarreatio . What is it?"

"A form of marriage in our society, mostly practised now only by the older patrician clans."

"Why does it put the joke on me?"

"Because it is a nearly infeasible marriage," Shizuru said. "In other words, it is the most binding marital tie our society can create. It used to be absolutely indissoluble. Nowadays, there does exist a method to divorce from it. But so difficult and protracted is the rite that it becomes essentially impossible anyway. We would be married for life, Natsuki."

"You would bind me in such a contract?" Natsuki smirked.

"It would be expected," Shizuru said, looking innocent. "All the Fujino have always been married thus, so I should keep up the tradition. Even my own parents were married that way . "

"Mine were not."

"Well, that is no longer a requirement anyway. And besides, Chikane is adopting you, so you would be counted as her daughter for the purposes of Himean law. Chikane married confarreatio . So in Himean law, you would be a patrician whose parents had married confarreatio too."

Natsuki murmured the word again.

"If-if we married so," she said. "Is there a ritual? A special one?"

"I should say so." Shizuru quirked an eyebrow at the girl. "It turns the wedding into rather a production. We would need ten witnesses, as well as both the pontifex maximus and either our flamen or flaminica dialis . Probably the flaminica, as she is more inclined to showing up for marriages. So in addition to ten goggling spectators, you would have to suffer a cantankerous dumpling and a creature with a disquieting similarity to a freshwater bass."

Natsuki was obliged to hold on to her to stay upright.

"Bass?" the younger woman said, barely able to speak through the mirth. "The-the fish?"

"Yes," Shizuru said, turning Natsuki about and leading her out of their study. "Something about the eyes and her lower face-you need to see her to understand. But for now, let us see the rest of the place! I have yet to show you the view from the exterior loggia, which is really the best part of the tour."

Shizuru's villa was on a high piece of land that overlooked the coastal lagoons. To take advantage of the elevation, the architect had incorporated a ground floor loggia on the east side of the house. As the land fell away sharply on that side, the loggia was partly supported on enormous pillars that extended some sixteen metres to lower ground. It made the loggia a magnificent promontory from which one could take in the view.

From it one saw the sweep of lower seaside Ravenna, with its ant's nest of houses rising from the lagoon. The buildings were held above the shallow waters by numerous piers and bridges. The houses thus seemed to stand right in the cerulean of the Adriatic, extending all the way to the west where they stood on land again.

Shizuru led Natsuki there through a corridor off the atrium. She guided her at first, but when the sky and sea were visible, Natsuki took the lead. She hurried to the balustrade, foot and cane clicking, all agog when she made it to the end. She stared out at the Adriatic and kept her free hand flat on the rail; it made her seem as though she would push atop it at any moment. The time of year meant it was squally and cold, but Natsuki was a princess of the even-colder north: she smiled when the wind lifted her hair.

Eventually the Otomeian had stared enough. She turned to Shizuru, who had followed and waited in silence.

"So this," she said, with a gloating air, "is the South."

Shizuru could not help it: she laughed.

"Perhaps for you, Little One," she said, putting both hands under her lover's arms. She lifted her until the Otomeian sat on the wide marble rail running around the loggia. Natsuki twisted to one side, eager to see if the view was better from this slightly higher angle.

"It only seems so since you come from the land of the Hyperboreans," Shizuru said. "The truth is that this is still very much north for a Himean."

Natsuki turned back and showed a smirk lifting her mouth.

"I know," she said. "But I am not Himean."

"Not yet."

"Mmhm."

She looked out at the sea again and said, a luxurious inhalation of air later, "This is the most south I have been, Shizuru."

Shizuru was intrigued.

"Really?" she asked. "Even in your forays before we met? What was the furthest south you had been before this, then?"

"Argus," the Otomeian answered. A sly peek: "Also, about our journey..."

"Yes?"

"It was my first time to sail in a ship."

Shizuru gawked at her. "Ever?"

"Yes." A smirk. "Also, logically, my first time to cross a sea."

Now Shizuru had a frown.

"You did not tell me!" she said.

"I tell you now," Natsuki responded, still pink with delight. She had never thought to see any part of Fuuka before the end of Shizuru's governorship, or do any of the things she had just mentioned. Not yet, anyway, and certainly not so easily. So she had good sea legs! Who could have known it? How nice it was to learn such things about oneself!

"Why tell?" she asked now. "What would you have done for it?"

"I do not know, to be honest," Shizuru sighed. "I just feel as though we should have recognised all these first times in some way. I never even imagined. So you had never been in a ship before then? What about a boat, Natsuki?"

"Oh, yes," said Natsuki. "We have lakes too, Shizuru. I have even rowed a boat."

"Have you now?"

"I am good at it."

"Yes, I believe you would be." She sighed again, looking at her lover regretfully. "I still wish we had marked the occasion a little better, even if only for your maiden voyage."

Natsuki's eyes were on the sea again.

"You were there," she said with simple honesty. "That is all I need to mark occasion."

The hands rucking up her dress at the thighs twitched; Shizuru asked if she was finished looking.

"For now," Natsuki said.

Shizuru urged the slim legs around her waist and lifted. Natsuki looked at where she was being carried and asked what Shizuru was doing.

"Making love to you for the first time," the older woman said, "in the South."

---

She woke rumped and deliciously sore much later, with the sun already beginning its plunge down the western horizon. Her lover was missing but there was a panther by the bed. It was due to its snuffling that she had woken. She spared some moments to greet it first, patting the furry jaw and pinching the thick whiskerpads so that the animal pretended to nip at her fingers. Shizuki continued to nudge her when she pushed herself up and tried to find her clothing.

She saw then the chair pulled up beside the bed. On it was a fresh dress and-this made her laugh-a very pink apple.

She dressed herself and put the apple on top of her pillow. Her leg and cane were by the chair too and she donned one and stood using the other. The bedroom doors were not shut, but not fully open either. She made her way to them with her pet padding after her.

The first person she saw gave her a bright smile.

"Dominilla," said her lover's steward. "I was just about to check if you were awake. Would you care to dine now? The Domina has eaten already, and Shizuki too has been fed."

She made a negative gesture and smiled. He understood that meant she would do it later.

"We are lighting the lamps in the villa now, Dominilla," he said. "Shall you stay in the bedroom or is there somewhere else you wish to go? I shall have the lamps lit there first."

She answered him in his mother tongue.

"I go to the loggia," she said.

"An excellent notion, Dominilla," he answered, guessing quickly at her purpose. "The houses below us should be lighting their own lamps and torches about this moment. The lights are picturesque above the lagoon's water. Please allow me to conduct you to your destination. Shall you be watching the view long, perhaps? I can have braziers brought out by the couches on the loggia."

She declined the braziers but thanked him for the thought. She let him lead the way as he knew the villa better than her.

"Hermee," she called quietly as they walked. "The Domina?"

"She is in the reception room seeing an agent," he replied, gesturing to that direction. "His name is Choei Saitou. He manages her gladiatorial school here in Ravenna."

They passed a slave with a lamp to whom Hermias addressed a quick order. He explained it to Natsuki after the other man left.

"Domina asked that she be informed once you awoke," he said with deference.

"Shall it not interrupt her meeting?" she asked, still in his homeland's language.

"I believe she and Saitou-san have already concluded their business, Dominilla. They were only speaking of social matters by the time I left them."

They stepped out onto the loggia and towards the open end of it.

"I knew not," she said, "that Shizuru had a gladiator's school."

"Yes, Dominilla," he said. "I believe her father began it and she kept it up."

"It is permitted?"

"Permi-oh, of senators? Yes, Dominilla, it is a legal business for them if they do not run it themselves. The Domina also owns the premises of the school."

She hummed deep in her throat.

"Gladiators," she said. "Remind me, please. Are they slaves?"

"Some are," he said. "But others are freedmen. The Domina gets most of her own gladiators from the military assizes."

At her puzzlement, he said, "Deserters to the legions are offered a choice between losing their citizenship and bondage as a gladiator. Those who choose the latter are sold to the gladiatorial schools or, as they call them, ludi."

He stopped to call to another slave passing near them and carrying a basket. He excused himself to Natsuki, trotted off to grab something, then sent the other slave away and came back to offer Natsuki what he had taken. It was a clean wrap of finest, gauziest linen. She thanked him and threw it around her bare shoulders.

"The Domina has Saitou-san sending buyers to the assizes," he said, continuing what he had been saying. "They purchase only the finest of the crop. These are then sent to the school here-or the one she has in Capua."

"Does it mean," she said, "she owns them?"

"Only for the terms of their service," he answered. "That is around five or six years per gladiator, depending on how often they fight."

"Five or six years of fighting. It is akin to army service."

"It can actually be a more comfortable life than that, Dominilla. The Domina's money feeds, trains, and houses them. They are allowed to go wherever they please outside of matches and training, and are never forced into more matches than they can handle. In exchange they need only perform in matches six or so times a year. These matches are all exhibitions, so they never risk anything approaching genuine injury. Their lot is even better than it would have been had they stayed in the legions and been on active duty."

"A strange reward," Natsuki murmured, "for desertion."

"Perhaps, but they do not keep most of the profits from their matches. Much of it goes to the Domina instead, as the owner of the school or ludus. Besides, what the Domina really wants of them is their future."

She made a sound that he interpreted to mean he should explain.

"After their time is done, she offers them a choice: they may go as they please or enlist as her trainers. If they choose the second option, they serve in either her gladiatorial schools as instructors or, if she has a campaign, as training officers in her army. They are paid very well then. The Domina also benefits by having excellent fighters-men who have spent years learning to fight so well that they can do it without harming themselves or their fellow gladiators-training her rawest recruits. Ironically, she ends by turning former deserters into proper officers."

Natsuki was looking out at the houses down in the lagoon. They were as picturesque as Hermias had claimed because of the many candles and lamps beating away the darkness: that part of Ravenna looked like a sparkling city floating on black waters.

One green eye rolled to its corner and studied Shizuru's steward. He was standing with his slender chest out because his hands were clasped at his back.

"Will not the Domina be displeased," she said, "that you have told me so much of her business?"

His beguilingly faun-like face lit up.

"The Domina actually instructed me to do so if you enquired," he answered. "She said that every question you place is to be answered without hesitation, Dominilla. We shall also strive to grant every wish you make."

The green eye rolled away, but not before he saw it twinkle.

"So," she said, "if I wish you to jump into the sea?"

"I would be compelled to jump then, yes," he said equably. "But if I may, I would beg you not to wish that of me, Dominilla. I do not enjoy the Adriatic in winter very much."

The small dents deepened on either side of her mouth.

"There you are! And with Shizuki too."

Shizuru had found them. She joined them on the loggia and tickled the supine panther first, then came over to wrap her arms about her lover.

"Why did you not bring out braziers?" she asked her steward. "It is cold here tonight. I do not want the Dominilla to take a chill."

Natsuki explained before Hermias could apologise for the oversight.

"I said not to," she told Shizuru, who was propitiated. The latter sent her steward away with orders to prepare Natsuki's meal in the dining room.

"Was your nap refreshing?" she asked, only to feel a snigger in the body against her. "Yes, yes, I know I wore you out right before it, but I was hoping you got to rest while you slept."

"I did," Natsuki said.

"Good. I was talking to the agent for my gladiatorial school just now."

"I know."

"Hermias told you, then?"

"Yes," Natsuki said. "Among other things."

Shizuru grinned.

"I suppose that means I need not explain anything more on that subject," she said. "Did he happen to mention what I shall be doing in the next few days?"

Natsuki asked what that was.

"Seeing people, to put it simply." Shizuru urged her to a couch nearby, one of the many for use by the villa's inhabitants when they wish to linger in the loggia. "I already told you we were coming here so I could be a little closer to Hime for the winter. This would let me tend to those aspects of my business that I have had to leave in agents' hands during my northern campaign."

Natsuki nodded to show that she remembered.

"You said," she ventured, "you might see clients?"

"Yes, as well as some of my agents and my banker, naturally. I sent messages of my arrival this morning, but they should have started travelling even before today. I sent word ahead of our ship when we were still in Argus, you see."

Natsuki nodded again.

"Most of them shall seek to see me in the mornings," Shizuru said. "Saitou-han today was an exception because I summoned him here expressly. But the mornings, before noon, are traditionally the time when Himeans conduct business."

This time Natsuki quirked an eyebrow at her.

"This is how you say you shall be busy," she said, "tomorrow and other coming mornings?"

Shizuru said it was.

"I apologise for it," she said. "It does not mean I shall not see you at all in the mornings, just to be clear, but it does mean there may be some days when I shall be very busy during them. I have not been able to see to my clients personally in literal years. So those nearby who have an urgent need of personal attention shall come rushing here in the coming days, I expect."

"I read," Natsuki told her, "that clients present themselves to the patron very early?"

"Yes, almost the moment the sky is fully lit. My steward admits them into the atrium and they all wait until I am ready to join them there."

"So I cannot go to the atrium when they are present?"

Shizuru frowned and said she could do that if she wanted.

"I wish you would stop forgetting that you are the mistress of my household," she said. "You can go anywhere in the villa. I am only warning you that there may be a great many strangers soon coming to visit. If you have need to pass through any room they are in, you may do so without concern. If you wish to eject them from a room, in fact, you need only say it to Hermias."

The other smirked at the idea.

"I do have some requests, however," Shizuru went on. "For example, that you grant me sole use of the study when I bring some clients there. I only use the study to meet people when privacy is of the essence. The study door shall be closed at such times, so you know it. I shall have Hermias set up another desk in the sitting room so that you can do your writing even then. This does not mean you cannot talk to me, however. Should something urgent require my attention, you can either send for me or approach me yourself."

Natsuki said she would not intrude on Shizuru's meetings.

"But," she ventured, "I want to see outside. I can explore Ravenna?"

"Of course!" Shizuru exclaimed. "In fact, I will tour you around when I can. But since I know you shall want to make some trips while I am occupied, I have some requests there as well. First, please be sure to inform me or Hermias before you leave the villa. If you have an idea of whereabouts you are headed, specify it. It will help me find you if there is an emergency."

The Otomeian said that made sense.

"I also require that you take at least four of my slaves with you," she said. "One to serve as a guide as well as interpreter, just in case. The local argot occasionally departs from the Himean you know. The other three slaves should be taken from the bodyguards and porters, and should be armed as well as cuirassed. This is in addition to any servants you may bring from your own retinue, like Zidek."

"Is Ravenna dangerous, Shizuru?" asked the younger woman interestedly.

"No, on the whole," came the answer. "Because of my gladiatorial school, everyone knows me here too. By tomorrow, the whole town will be aware in whose house you are staying, so they should bend over backwards to accommodate you if you do business with any of them. That said, I would prefer to be safe. There was a drought and famine recently and that usually sees more of the provincials turning to banditry. You should be safe provided you stray not too far from the town itself. Remember that we do not have my legions here, nor your troopers, mea vita."

Natsuki agreed with the conditions and said she understood.

"I may introduce you to some people, by the way," the older woman continued. "My banker in Hime, Sosius, for instance. He is your banker now too, so I think we should have a dinner with him at least."

But if you wish to speak to anyone visiting the villa even before I introduce you, be assured that you may do it. Only keep in mind that they are probably my clients and that they have never seen anyone like you."

The green eyes demanded an explanation.

"In what way?" Natsuki said. "Anyone like me how?"

Shizuru smiled helplessly.

"Well, for one thing, anyone of your beauty," she said, causing the other to flush and mumble a rebuke. "No, that is not flattery, Natsuki. Fuuka may have beauties even in Ravenna, certainly, but not of your ilk. Many here will think you exotic, so prepare for a lot of stares. If anyone goes further than staring, though, please tell me."

Natsuki nodded, still wrestling with her blush.

"Also, people will not have seen anyone before in your position," Shizuru sighed. "One who is still a mistress but-as people are fond of telling me-treated more like an actual wife. Then there is your being a princess of an allied kingdom."

"And my having a wooden leg," Natsuki continued for her, "and Shizuki and my Otomeian servants."

Shizuru looked at her closely to see if any of this discomfited her but found no evidence of it.

"I do not envy you, Shizuru," the girl said suddenly, "when you try to introduce me."

There was laughter from Shizuru at this, as she had been thinking the same.

"It is all your fault-what a pickle!" she said mirthfully. "Had you married me already, I would know better what to say. I could say, here is my wife, pay her respect, and you know the rest. But now I must figure out how to tell them you are the woman my household sees as my wife even if we are not affianced yet. And that you are the Polemarch-Princess of Otomeia, into the bargain!"

"So say only that."

"Which one?"

"The titles I have from Otomeia." Natsuki leaned forward to fix her hair for her, as a gust of wind had thrown some locks into Shizuru's face. She stroked said face afterwards. "Chikane told me the gossip is so that they will know I am your mistress from just that, anyway."

"And it does not trouble you to be seen as essentially my courtesan?"

"If it troubled I would never have been with you in the first place."

Shizuru gazed upon her dotingly.

"I do wish I could tell everyone you are my wife," she said.

"You say it is inevitable," came the amused answer. "So maybe you only need to wait."

She spared Shizuru the challenge of introducing her by avoiding the atrium most mornings. She still met some people, as Shizuru had promised. They dined with their banker one evening, for example, as well as a man Shizuru introduced as head supervisor of her foreign deposits. Here she collected some interesting nuggets of monetary information. For instance, she learned that Shizuru was preparing large amounts of liquid assets. She thought at first that it was for further investments the older woman wanted to make in the North. Listening closely told her the money was to stay in Hime however: that gave her a few suspicions about their purpose, although she decided it was better to wait until Shizuru chose to finally explain it.

She also discovered that Shizuru was moving the moneys she had banked in Asia Province. Both financiers at the dinner professed themselves worried about the unrest in that area. They also advised the Princess Natsuki to take similar measures if she herself banked there. Natsuki confessed her own deposits concentrated in the North, however, save for the new account Shizuru had opened for her with Sosius.

She also got to meet one of the managers of her new mule breeding business. He was one of the persons Shizuru had summoned to the villa ahead of their trip. Natsuki turned the sitting room into her office temporarily as she quizzed him to her heart's content. She also looked over the account and order ledgers he brought for her perusal. Good with numbers, she saw instantly that Shizuru was correct: the business had been turning her a steady profit.

The manager himself was very pleased by his new employer. He had been concerned when told she was foreign, and had come to the summons full of misgivings. These had not been allayed by first encounter, as he thought the new proprietor too young and too beautiful to understand the trade. But Natsuki's sound business head and obvious familiarity with breeding concerns worked on him quickly. The two of them were so deeply engaged in a discussion of possible improvements to the operation that both jumped when Shizuru entered the room and announced her own business finished.

Still, it was Shizuru who had far more to deal with. The number of morning visitors for her increased daily. On the sixth day her mistress rose to see if she could arrange a trip out for herself and heard the buzzing of people all the way from the atrium.

She moved there and found Hermias passing through the curtain Shizuru had ordered strung over the entrance to the gallery. The older woman was concerned that the guests might wander towards the peristyle otherwise. That was normal behaviour for waiting clients, but she was conscious of her mistress's discomfort with strangers. Natsuki liked to read on the couches by the peristyle, and Shizuru would rather no one troubled the girl then.

"Good morning, Dominilla," said Hermias. "Shall you break your fast in the sitting room as usual?"

She nodded, then flicked her eyes at the heavy drape behind him.

"It sounds," she said, "busy."

"It is," he agreed. "A big group of them came almost at dawn. Would you like to see?"

He pulled the drape back with delicate fingers. She edged up to it and peeked through the gap. There were more than forty persons talking in the atrium, most of them snacking on fresh bread and light mulled wine supplied by the servants.

"She grows more popular daily," she said, earning a light chortle.

"These are still sparse, Dominilla," Hermias said while releasing the drape. "You should see the busier times in the city."

She lifted an eyebrow which he took to mean How many .

"She would have at least a hundred a day. When she was elected curule aedile she had three hundred clients coming each morning for a week. It will be worse when she returns after her governorship."

Natsuki's eyes were large as she imagined it. As Shizuru had explained to her before that the clients at Ravenna were a departure from the norm-in the sense that they all came out of need-she did not ask how her lover had managed to see to three hundred clients in one morning. She knew most of those would have been present simply to reaffirm their dedication to their patron and would have been dismissed with just a word. So her question to Hermias about the three hundred clients was concerned with more banal practicality.

"How did they fit?" she questioned.

"The Domina's house in Hime is much larger," he explained. "The atrium there puts this one to shame, Dominilla."

She shook her head.

"And all of these desire something," she sighed. "As I do."

He asked what that would be and how he could help. She told him about her intentions.

"Only to walk by the sea," she explained. "Shizuru said I would bring some slaves?"

As he had been instructed beforehand on such a matter, he said he would send the appropriate fellows up to the peristyle as soon as she wanted them. She retired to the sitting room after getting him to promise that he would inform his domina of her plans as well.

"Which of you," she asked the three Otomeian servants tending her, "wants to walk on the coast?"

All three immediately volunteered. They had all gone down to the lagoon and beach themselves, of course, during the times she released them from service. Nevertheless, a trip there during their working hours had the quality of a special holiday.

"I've been twice, myself," Zidek told her. "But I wouldn't mind going again, Princess. I should be there in case you or the girls need some heavy work done."

Natsuki eyed him strangely after the statement.

"Kavine and Therin told me about your trips, Zidek," she said dryly. "I know you want to go down to the beach more than any of us."

He grinned at the women who had told on him and were laughing.

"It's something, isn't it?" he said. "Their sea."

Their princess agreed quietly and took another bite out of the crisp roll in her hand. Her chewing paused at her body carrier's next words.

"I'm going to tell everyone back home I swam in it," the man announced gleefully.

She gazed at him and worked on the food in her mouth.

"When did you swim in it?" she asked him eventually.

"Well, I haven't yet," he admitted. "But I will later, if you'll let me."

Her stare flattened, mouth going thin.

"That sounds," she said, "like heavy work indeed."

The other two laughed again and started ribbing him. At this point her Himean lover walked into the room; the Otomeians fell silent, bowing to the woman shyly. She acknowledged them with a grin.

"Good morning, meum mel," said Shizuru, coming over to sit by her. "Hermias told me you plan to go for a walk. I thought I would see you before you left. Are you going down to the town or the market too, perhaps? Be sure to take some money for safety."

She dropped a purse heavy with denarii on the table. Natsuki demurred, saying she had her own money.

"I know, but most of it is in the Otomeian currency," Shizuru pointed out. "They accept that in Argus and Sosia, but you will have a bit more trouble using it here. Unless the currency concerned is a drachma, Fuukans are wary of foreign coin. Take mine for now and remember that you can always ask for more. You can just pay me back some other day, especially now we share a banker," she added, though she had no intention of letting the girl do it.

Natsuki thanked her graciously and asked how her business was going.

"It goes," Shizuru sighed. "Although I do have some very disgruntled Spanish clients out there in my atrium. I shall tell you about it later. First, I have something to ask. We shall be having dinner with a senator later. Would you mind it?"

Natsuki said it was fine, although she also eyed Shizuru wisely.

"This is why we came," she guessed. "To see this man?"

"He is one of the reasons we are in Ravenna, yes," Shizuru affirmed.

"Someone to buy, maybe?"

The older woman stretched her spine lazily and seemed to ponder it.

"Sosius-han seems to think so," she said, "as he arranged the meeting. I generally trust his advice on such matters, but there are things causing me to hesitate here."

"Trustworthiness?"

"I doubt that would be a problem. This senator is of a very old and respected family, meum mel. Were I to buy him he would certainly stay bought. Most Himeans find no shame in that. What would be shameful, especially for one with a name like his, is to betray the one who bought him."

"It is a kind of honour."

"Yes."

"Then why do you hesitate? Not ability, no? Sosius would not have recommended him otherwise."

Shizuru smiled at this perspicacity.

"No, he would not have," she answered. "And I agree in that respect. My hesitation has to do with the man's history. Let us simply say he has never been a partisan. Well, you shall meet him later and perhaps tell me what you think."

Natsuki said she understood and asked what time they would have dinner.

"I think a little early today, maybe the fourth hour after noon. The two of us should get most of our business done by the time you return. I wish I could go with you, though."

She turned to Natsuki's attendants and asked them to see if the slaves accompanying them to the beach were ready. They were, of course: she had passed them in the peristyle herself. The Otomeians knew what she really wanted, however, and tripped off to leave the lovers alone.

"Do you think," Zidek said to his companions as they left, "the princess will let me swim?"

Shizuru threw the princess a comical expression when they were alone, having caught the big man's words. Natsuki blew through her nose.

" Will the princess let him swim?" Shizuru teased while moving closer. She sought a lower lip and held it in between hers.

"He can do as he likes," Natsuki whispered, scratching her lover's nape with clipped nails. She repeated the motion at the sound of the other woman's pleasure. "But I will not fish out the lummoX if he drowns."

"Ah, the princess is unkind," was the answer to that. "Mind you do not get any wild ideas about going in the water either, please. Which beach is it you visit?"

Natsuki told her it was the one just north of the town. Shizuru would be able to see them from the loggia balcony of the villa itself.

"I had the carriage prepared nonetheless," the older woman revealed. "Use that to get to the beach itself. You can walk all you like once you are already at the coast. I suppose you shall pick up even more seashells?"

Natsuki grinned, having already accumulated a dozen, all of different types.

"Hundreds," she jested through another kiss. "Thousands."

"You will rob Neptune of his riches, Princess," Shizuru sighed, inhaling deeply and finally wrenching herself away. "Have a good excursion, mea vita, and try to think of me a little during it. Perhaps you might even pick up a shell for my sake . "

Natsuki promised to find the best shell just for her. Later she deputed her attendants to help in the search as they strolled down the shore just above the water line. She hoped to find a larger murex than the one she already had, or perhaps an intact specimen of the shell like a stepped cone glazed yellow as if by melted butter. She knew Shizuru would like any shell she brought back, but she still wanted the woman to have something better than all the others.

She walked while turning over shells in the sand with her cane. The sounds and scents of the sea were pleasant to her. They formed a good backdrop to cogitations of the kind she had.

The past weeks had given her much on which to cogitate, from Chikane Himemiya's visit to her first trip to Fuuka. So many surprises! And providentially, largely good ones. Though Chikane's visit had initially terrified her, for instance, she had found the woman a valuable fount of both wisdom and information.

Chikane had helped make more sense of her feelings about marriage to Shizuru. The woman's experience with her own unmentionably-lower-class wife had been related and discussed in unsparing detail. Natsuki knew it was Chikane's way of preparing her for what she might face did she accept betrothal. She appreciated that: it made decisions easier when you knew more about their possible consequences.

"You will not be ostracised outright, if you imagine that," Chikane had warned in Greek as impeccable as Natsuki's own. "Himeans have rather more exquisite methods of expressing disdain. They shall likely do what they did to my wife, soon after we got married. Just about every upper-class party saw her on the guest list for months, even for parties hosted by my political opponents. It was in hope of having their critiques proven by example, you see."

Natsuki had inhaled a sharp breath: "They invited her for their entertainment."

"Just so. Is it not an exquisite technique for scorn?"

"It is pathetic."

Chikane had told her most elitists were that. She had also predicted that Natsuki would at least fare better than her own wife had at situations of that sort. Someone raised to be a princess, even if foreign, would still have a better sense of how to conduct herself around hostile snobs. Whereas Himeko had been raised in such abject poverty that it had taken weeks for her to make peace with just having the use of servants.

"Those first months were hard for my poor wife," she had recalled. "They will be for you as well."

"Hardship is not new to me," Natsuki had stated.

"I know."

"What worries me more..."

"Is Shizuru? Naturally."

Chikane had said her own wife also once worried thus. However, she also clarified that her Himeko had feared only the harm that others might cast Chikane's way for their liaison. She had not feared too, as Natsuki did, the harm that Chikane might cast back.

"I am considered more temperate than your menacing lover, you see," Chikane had jested, which got Natsuki to ask if she truly was that. Chikane said she was, in the main.

"Although I remember the first time a fellow senator put down my wife to her face," she had added. "I berated him for his bad manners and took my wife home from that party. I called some friends over and we had our own revelry. It rather cheered her up."

Natsuki had thought that a very nice way of solving the situation. But then Chikane had continued.

"During our merrymaking, I made some inquiries among my guests about the senator who insulted Himeko. They revealed he was deeply in arrears. So the next day, my agents bought up every one of that senator's debts from the city's usurers. I demanded repayment of them all the following afternoon. 'Twas a shocking amount, you know. I still wonder how people can run up arrears of over two hundred talents with illiquid collateral."

Natsuki had stared at this serenely-supplied anecdote. For she understood what Chikane had not gone on to say: the man had been instantly ruined. Then knowledge of Shizuru's world had intruded.

"But was that legal of you to do?" she had asked. "When senators are not supposed to be in the business of usury?"

"It was perfectly lawful," Chikane had smiled. "You see, I may have bought all of his debts from principal to interest, but I only charged him for the principal when I demanded repayment. Not usury then, is it?"

Oh, the woman was clever! Invested with as much resource and cunning as Shizuru, which meant one had to be truly stupid to dare her antipathy. Yet Natsuki understood that for all the fierceness of Chikane's revenge, the woman was truly more temperate. Natsuki could well imagine Shizuru stuffing a man's feet into his own throat for uttering the same insult that had provoked Chikane's reprisal.

Chikane had told her not to worry about that.

"Shizuru's temper will be tried by more than critiques of you throughout her life," the woman had declared. "Please do not concern yourself with thoughts of her losing her temper with our peers only on your account. Do you remember what I told you of her speech after one accused her of various low crimes in a Senate session? So awesome was her fury that she stilled even Haruka Armitage's tongue! They will test her often, I submit, with or without you for a wife. Why not go ahead and give her more support at home then, by agreeing to the engagement?"

Natsuki had accused her humorously of playing her best friend's advocate. Chikane had avowed it, unabashed.

"I do want my friend to be happy," she had stated. "You already make her so, but you know her-she is happiest without half-measures! Besides, iconoclast though she may be in some ways, Shizuru wants the things nearest her core to be beyond reproach. That has to do with her ambition."

"To be the First Citizen of Hime."

"Quite so. You know what it entails?"

"Some of it," Natsuki had admitted. "But surely a foreign wife is not among them."

"You forget," Chikane had cautioned, "that you would no longer be foreign by then. You would have the citizenship before you wed her, as well as membership in my family. I believe I may be acquitted of some vanity too if I tell you now that there are few families in our society who may bestow upon you the sort of Himean irreproachability we can. You would not be alien, as such."

"But only by law."

That had gotten the older woman to chuckle.

"Which is where it truly matters, do you not see?" she had said. "Shizuru needs her wife to be legally irreproachable. It matters less what blood flows through your veins, especially given-if you would permit the concession to traditional Himean thinking-the faultlessness of her own. The procreative objection is not present either. The fact that you are both female means your children would have to be adopted, and could thus be of pure Himean blood."

"Besides," the expert on unconventional senatorial marriages had added, "you would not be the first of your kind anyway. There have been other 'shocking choices' for wives in our Senate's past. One of them was my wife, as you well know. But if you want one truly astonishing, there is Koizumi the Censor. One of the most revered senators of our history, yet he actually married the daughter of his slave!"

Natsuki had asked if a senator could marry one who technically belonged to him already, as the children of one's slaves did. Chikane had explained that the woman had no longer been a slave during the time of the wedding.

"She was manumitted first, so she had the citizenship when they exchanged vows. It caused a commotion at the time. Yet now, their offspring have been members of the Senate for three generations. Koizumi-san also retained his dignitas to the day he died and now lives on in history as one of the most venerated figures of our political and literary tradition."

As Natsuki had a talent for homing in on chinks in armour, she had asked if Koizumi the Censor had been the First Citizen of Hime.

"No," Chikane had answered with a smile. "Yet that had to do more with his own weaknesses than his marriage. His family was not yet of magisterial stock in his time, you see, and that is expected of the First Citizen of Hime. Though he was a brave fighter, he was also no military genius. Again something expected of the First Citizen. Shizuru has everything he lacked and has a far better chance at the title. But the more of our laws she breaks, the harder it becomes. She has already broken an unwritten law by loving you, the way I did with my own wife. That is not something we could or would revoke! So now she asks you to marry her partly because it is the least she can do, to abide by no less than the written legislation. Our laws matter greatly to people like us, Natsuki. I submit you now know that too."

Even with that, however, Chikane had stressed that the choice remained hers. The patrician senator had exhorted Natsuki to learn all she could of the life of the Himean elite. Were she to marry Shizuru, Chikane had cautioned, she would have to take on such a life.

"You will gain many things," she had said. "Yet there are costs in return. You shall have to live in an entirely new country where your people are still rare. Your wife shall be one of that city's most controversial and noticeable individuals. You by extension shall be the same, which means there shall always be eyes upon you. Yours shall be a life where Shizuru's career shall rule every decision. You must think on these things for yourself. Have you the capacity to adapt to such a world as Shizuru offers?"

Natsuki had been pondering that herself ever since Shizuru's proposal. This trip to Fuuka had even helped: it had given her a small taste of what life in Hime would be like. People seeking her wife at dawn, company invited to dinner for political reasons. Days spent watching the Senate, huge sums outlaid to gain control of it even from afar. Wine bibbed at near every occasion, garlic and pepper never absent from the dining table.

A strange new world, to be sure. Yet not dislikeable even so. She supposed part of it was the newness: the freshness of novelty limning experiences with excitement. Would she stand matters as well once they were no longer new?

She was pulled out of her thoughts when her wooden foot caught on a depression in the sand. She lifted her leg higher to compensate.

That tended to happen when she negotiated uneven surfaces. She wondered if there was a way to put a joint between the vertical shaft and the foot part. Only a trifling range of flexion, for the sake of gaining better shock absorption without losing control.

She walked around a grey piece of driftwood. One of her escorts, high-spirited, leapt over it. She looked away with only faint wistfulness.

There had been a time when she could do that, she remembered. She had been widely praised for her agility in the past. Shizuru had used to admire her for it as well.

Well, Shizuru still admired her now-though for different things, of course. Chikane had told her they were even things more important for the wife of a senator than two whole legs. She had told her to cultivate them, especially if Natsuki was genuinely considering Shizuru's proposal.

Natsuki had replied that it was impossible not to consider it, given Shizuru's persistence.

"She speaks of it to me as though it is inescapable," she had told Chikane. "And pretends it is because of her arrogance that she speaks thus."

"Is it not?"

"Only in part. The other part is ingenuity."

In reply to the older woman's mute question, she had expanded: "If she speaks of it often enough that way, she causes me to think the same. It becomes harder to decline something to which you have already resigned yourself, no?"

Chikane had taken that with laughter and asked if she would tell Shizuru she saw through the plan. Natsuki had denied it; after all, if Shizuru enjoyed it, why take it away?

"Besides," she had admitted with some mischief, "it is working."

Whoops and mirth intruded on her recollections and pulled her once more to the present. Her body-carrier had finally acted on the permission she had given him on their way to the coast. The rest of her escort called to gigantic man mirthfully as he swam in the blue sea. Natsuki stopped to watch as well, unable to control her smirk.

"He shall regret this shortly," she told the Otomeians still next to her.

"He might not survive to do that, Princess," Kavine sniggered.

Natsuki let Zidek do another short lap before telling her attendants that it was probably time to fetch him. They walked nearer the frothy edge of the water and called for him to return.

"You'll turn into ice, you great oaf!" one shouted. "You've dunked yourself already. Surely that's enough!"

"I want to make the most of it!" he shouted back. "We mightn't come back here again!"

Kavine fulminated before calling to him again. "Don't be stupid, of course we'll come back! Now get back here before it has to be the princess calling you."

Natsuki watched them persuade the other Otomeian back onto the beach, hugely tickled herself by her servant's brazen assertion. So it was stupid to think they would not come back, eh? She wondered if that was Shizuru's ingenuity also working on them or her own unspoken desires. Of course they would come back! Did no one doubt it, then?

She stepped to where the big man stood dripping, his body twitching all over when a breeze passed. Shizuru's slaves were snorting uncontrollably, as entertained by Zidek's folly as his own countrymen. Zidek gave the princess a shaky grin.

"I did it!" he cried, both hands held high above his head.

Natsuki smirked and started towards where they had left their carriage, handing her cloth bundle of shells to Kavine as she did so. The group followed her, the wet man in the middle grunting at every puff of wind that slipped past.

"You have General Fujino to thank, Zidek," Natsuki said, "that there are tunics and towels with us. Otherwise we would go home to tell people you died because you could not wait to swim the Adriatic in summer."

Chapter 76

Vocabulaire:

1. Calda (L.) - Warm and watered wine flavoured with spices, usually taken in winter.
2. Censor (L.) - Elected every five years, there are two of them elected to serve in tandem. Among their tasks is to monitor the list of senators and enrol new members. They can also expel senators from the Senate if those senators violate a requirement. Senators were not supposed to be in debt, for instance, even though most actually were. Most censors simply did not care... or were in arrears themselves.
3. Centuries - Banri's reference to the Centuries here is about the Centuriate Assembly, which marshals the people in their economic classes. Recall that Shizuru gained her current command by having that Assembly vote her into it. Since voting in the Centuries is weighted such that the upper classes always have more voting power, voting in the Centuries is basically voting done by the knights and senators.
4. Corona obsidionalis (L.) - Also called the corona graminea. The highest and rarest military award possible for Romans/Himeans, it bestowed membership in the Senate instantly.
5. Dignitas (L.) - A person's personal worth, his public standing, his prerogative to respect and treatment as a human being. It was the most sensitive asset possessed by a Roman/Himean. Almost anything was risked to defend dignitas, whether it be one's property, one's name, one's life, or even one's family.
6. Imago (L.) - A likeness made of wax and crafted as a mask, generally used for ceremonial purposes, e.g. ancestral parades during rites like funerals. They were passed down generations and reproduced a person's features with faithfulness, from their wrinkles down to the shade and quality of their hair and even their eyes' colour. Imagines (plural) were thus exquisitely lifelike. Banri suggests it here as a compliment to the prospective model's beauty: he is suggesting that it deserves to be preserved for later generations' admiration. Only notable people (like war heroes, politicians who reach curule office, etc.) were technically allowed to have imagines, but it did not stop others from having them made even if they failed to qualify.

7. Insula (s. L.), insulae (pl. L.) - The literal translation is "island", but it actually refers to an apartment building.

8. Laurels - The reference is to victory laurels, or laurel wreaths hung about an army's standards after it has won a battle.

9. Mos maiorum (L.) - The established custom, tradition; the way things had always been done and "should" always be done, according to the conservatives & the "Traditionalists".

10. Pomerium (L.) - The sacrosanct boundary encircling the city of Rome/Hime, which could not be crossed by soldiers or generals for the duration of their service in a military mission or capacity.

11. Quaestor - He/she is primarily a fiscal officer. In service to a provincial governor, he is often the manager of said governor's funds. In extremis, a quaestor can be called upon to perform duties like leading armies, however.

12. Subura - One of Rome's poorer districts, known for its squalor and population density.

13. Vir militaris (L.) - In English, Military Man; one whose career revolves around the army. He enters the political arena by relying on the reputation forged by his exploits in the military field.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Banri Ueda was uneasy. He sat in the study of a woman he sought to have as patron yet had heretofore opposed in most motions within the Senate. Banri came from an old and noble family of plebeians with a solid tradition of conservatism. The Ueda had always been supporters if not outright members of the Traditionalist faction, which logically put them on the opposite side of change-bringers like Shizuru Fujino.

His own father, Kanetsugu Ueda, had reviled the woman. The old man had voted against the bill releasing her from urban praetor status, and voted too against the bill granting her current gubernatorial mandate. For, Kanetsugu Ueda had pointed out, a countervote was the only right act against such violations of the mos maiorum. Banri had done the upright thing for a son of his family: he had voted too against both propositions, much good though that did the conservatives.

This trend to conservatism was furthered by his distaff connections, for Banri's mother had been a patrician of the august Nakao clan. She was even sister to Yuzuru, the man who once paid the tribune of the plebs Katsu Hitagi to attack Shizuru in a Senate session. The same Yuzuru who lost his command after an army supposedly elected to follow his youngest (red-eyed) legate instead. Yuzuru Nakao was Shizuru Fujino's enemy to the death, which meant the rest of his family was the same.

Myriad motives of consanguinity should therefore have driven Banri Ueda to the Traditionalists. That he went to Shizuru Fujino instead was due to increasing dissatisfaction with the way the archconservatives conducted their politics. Look at the way they had resisted when Urumi Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki had tried to resolve Fujino's controversial candidacy and election. Banri himself had seen the point behind her solution and appreciated what it meant for Hime's citizenry. Yet the archconservatives had maintained their stance against it, which meant he had had no choice save to vote as his father did. But he had not wanted to!

Banri believed in the sacrosanctity of Hime the Republic. What he was beginning to doubt was that the conservatives gave it as much thought as they claimed. When Chikane Himemiya had restructured provincial taxation they had shrieked and called it radicalism. The same when Shizuru Fujino had instituted a pay raise for the legions. But what had tradition to do with the details of economics? Why should there not be changes to fiscal custom when even the sestertius had been retariffed? And why should the legionaries not get a wage hike when they had been paid the same amount for more than a century?

Even the latest cause célèbre back in the city had him thinking. It was with archconservative support that Keigo Onishi had been recalled from Sicilia and replaced by last year's junior consul. Who had then demonstrated himself a whinging ineptus unfit for the command he had hijacked. And now had his allies prosecuting Onishi for being the alleged cause of his failures. Shabby!

Banri began to see the virtue of change. But change of the reasonable, intelligent sort. Change made, in other words, for the betterment of Hime. His own father might have said there was no such thing: Kanetsugu Ueda had believed all change a peril. But Banri was of a different mould from his old man, even if filial piety had compelled similarity while the old man had lived. Banri possessed something his father never had too: a top-class mind chafing for stimulation.

While his father had lived, Banri passed the time as many bored young men of good family did. He indulged in a short but ruinous run of gambling and good-timing meant to substitute for more serious excitement. Then his father died two years ago and Banri thought it time to come into his birth right. He would clean up his act, find his true place in politics, and distinguish himself as a notable member of a notable family.

It did not happen thus because Pater Ueda's death revealed something Banri's old man had kept secret. What Kanetsugu had not told his son was that he himself had huge sums unpaid to the usurers. So instead of inheriting a fortune, Banri inherited more debts instead. Which gradually ate up all his assets, leaving him with only a few extant properties-all of them heavily mortgaged.

To make matters worse, Banri was desperate to marry. He had loved the same person for seven years but could not bring himself to propose yet. For the man he loved was of a situation that shamed the debt-riddled Banri, at heart an honourable man from a proud family.

Losing the fight against compound interest, about to be kicked out of the house his parents had left him, Banri determined his only hope: he needed a patron. He picked Shizuru Fujino because hers was the name that first came to mind. Unsurprising given her current fame. And while it might have been surprising for someone of his family's tradition, it was not for one of Banri's judgement. He knew that hitching his wagon to hers was the best way to get to the top of the heap. Oh, there were rich conservatives too! But none nearly so impressive, so seemingly incapable of defeat. Banri's intellect was drawn to her brilliance. If he had to take a patron, then why not someone worthy of it?

So when he chanced upon the great banker Sosius at a party, he had been quick to take the man aside and request introduction to one of his more famous depositors. Sosius had divined Banri's purposes and assured him of a meeting. Banri had waited on tenterhooks since then, until some days ago when Sosius had invited him to Ravenna. Which brought him to where he was now, sipping calda and having a very late breakfast in Shizuru Fujino's study.

She returned sooner than he had expected, but long enough for him to be on his second cup of wine. She told him to stay seated when he tried to get to his feet.

"My apologies for keeping you waiting," she said, patting him on the shoulder. "All the others have gone now, so we may talk at our leisure. I presume you shall share my dinner later, by the way? I would be disappointed if you decline."

He avowed himself delighted by the invitation. She seated herself on her side of the desk and smiled.

"Neither of your late parents would have been pleased to see you under my roof," she said with just enough puzzlement to keep it courteous. "I hope you shall excuse me if I say that I find this visit unexpected, Ueda-han, though not unwelcome."

"Banri, please," he requested. "My friends call me by my first name."

The speculative look in the red eyes intensified.

"Then I am indeed honoured," she said. "But no less puzzled, I fear."

He smiled at her and came right out with it: "I'm sure Sosius already told you I'm in need of money."

"Of course," she said. "But permit me to be more specific. I am puzzled by the fact that you came to me. You are a plebeian of august ancestry and promising ability. If money were all to it, any of the wealthier conservatives would surely be better patrons. What I cannot quite figure out is why you approached me in particular when I seem to stand for all that you and your family have thus far opposed."

"That's true in my father's case-and possibly my mother's," he allowed. "But I wouldn't say you stand for all to which I'm opposed, Fujino-san. I see the virtue of many decisions you've made."

"Such as?"

"Such as the choice to take the question of your command to the Centuries."

"What, no outrage for my having deprived the Senate of a prerogative?" she said, grinning.

"I'd rather you hadn't, it goes without saying," he answered honestly. "But I also know the conservatives gave you little choice but to do it. What really surprises me, though, is that none of them realised you could've done much worse. You could've taken the matter to the Plebs instead, for instance, which would've been truly disastrous for the Senate."

She agreed, knowing that granting that sort of authority to the Plebs would have been deemed catastrophic by her peers.

"You voted against that motion, though," she reminded.

"And a few others, I'm sure you know. I was bound to, being my father's son."

She tilted her head. "Are you no longer that now?"

"I still am, as we can't choose our parents," he told her. "But we can choose what we become beyond their clutches. I'm my own man now, the paterfamilias of my branch of the Ueda, and if you agree, I'll be your man too. In both the Plebeian Assembly and the Senate."

The manifestly aristocratic face looked interested, he was relieved to see.

"You have already served as quaestor," she recalled. "But you are offering to run as a tribune of the plebs to serve my purposes?"

"Yes, for next year, which is when you'll need me," he replied. "You will need me then, Fujino-san, as that's when the Traditionalists will come baying for your blood. The law barring discussion of your command will be running out, and you'll need a great tribune to look out for you."

"You believe you can be that tribune?"

"I know I can be," he said without conceit.

And looking into those strange eyes, he saw that she agreed.

"This is an attractive proposition," she said with honesty. "I believe you when you say you are your own man nowadays. Still I must ask this, I fear. What about your mother's side of the family? For I guarantee they shall have much to say about you allying with me!"

Banri's mouth quivered into a grin.

"Especially Uncle Yuzuru, you mean?" he said.

"Most especially him."

"Oh, he'll call down the wrath of the gods on me!"

"This does not concern you?"

"Why should it?"

He smirked and contrived to look impish, in spite of his face being the type that looked more at home being grave. It was the dark and peaked eyebrows responsible for that, along with the resolute and thin lips. Banri's was a good face, and in some lights, an appealing one, even. But he was aware that his attractions paled to insignificance beside his potential patron's.

"He's been calling down the wrath of the gods on you for ages," he told her. "Promising hundreds of sacrifices and honours if they see you fail. Yet here you are, a proconsular governor before you're thirty, and still-as far as I remember-undefeated in battle. I'd say Uncle's curses aren't very effective, so they're probably not worth concern."

She smiled thoughtfully, the expression extraordinarily fetching on her splendid countenance.

"I wonder how much he has spent in temples," she mused, "trying to buy my defeat."

"A fortune, I believe. He never did forgive you for what you did to him."

"What I did to him?" she repeated.

"Well, taking his army and command, that whole thing," he said indifferently.

She looked curious.

"I wonder now, Banri-han," she said. "How much do you actually know about it?"

He laughed and shrugged his shoulders expressively.

"How much does anyone who wasn't there know about it?" he burst out, hoping she was willing to take this particular topic further. "I know the official story, of course, which is that Uncle Yuzuru and his legates took sick in the middle of the Numidian Campaign and you took over most of their duties. Later, the Senate formalised your appointment and elevated you to command of his army until the war ended. Thus runs the story in the Senate dispatches and transcripts."

Her queer eyes were very bright and alive, he thought. He had never before been near her long enough to really appreciate them.

"Compared to that, how runs the unofficial version?" she asked.

"Far more tortuously!" he replied. "There were talks of everything you could imagine, from insubordination to fisticuffs in the command tent. You set the Himean rumour mill afire then, Fujino-san. I don't think anyone really knew what to believe anymore, come the end of the year."

She laughed with him, remembering the improbability of some of the gossip herself. There had even been talk of her having wrested the Numidian command off Nakao and his legates at sword point. As though Himeans duelled to the death for positions! She supposed Natsuki might enjoy that version of the tale, though.

"I meant," she clarified, "how runs the unofficial version in the Nakao family?"

Banri said he suspected she had already heard it. She asked him to tell her anyway.

"Uncle Yuzuru claimed that you incited mutiny against him," he admitted. "He said you joined his command with that express purpose and defamed him to the rankers the moment you reached his camp."

Her smile grew wider at the charge. "Is this the version that says I became a legate too by blackmailing the war's commander-in-chief?"

"It is," he grinned. "It's a thrilling story, you must admit."

"Oh, I do! And I such a villain in it." She settled herself more comfortably in her chair. "Go on, it has been a while since I heard the account, and it really does amuse me."

He related the tale as much for his own enjoyment as hers. It had been the year after Shizuru's term as curule aedile, which meant her name was on everyone's lips. The war in Africa had broken out all of a sudden when the bastard king Jugurtha murdered his way to the Numidian throne. Resentful of Hime's earlier refusal to support his claim to the kingship, he now marshalled his forces against Hime's Africa Province. There was already a senator governing said province-Yuzuru Nakao, actually-but all he had under his command were three veteran legions. Numidia boasted larger armies and had gained the support of the nearby Kingdom of Mauretania as well. If Hime was to keep Africa Province, she had to send in more forces.

The Senate charged the senior consul, Rikiya Soujiro, to raise another army. He would take it to Africa and work with Yuzuru Nakao to bring Numidia to its knees.

Shizuru Fujino was just one of the senators who volunteered for the campaign. Where her peers volunteered as military tribunes, however, she audaciously sought position as a legate. And because of certain secrets she knew of the senior consul-someone her father had known well, which was probably how she had come by such sensitive intelligence-she got her wish and was appointed a legate despite being barely out of pubescence.

Nonetheless, Rikiya Soujiro had a plan to rid himself of this overambitious, unworthy legate. The moment he set foot on Africa's shores, he packed her off to serve under his junior co-commander instead. That was how Shizuru Fujino found her way to Yuzuru Nakao's army, a castoff ready to wreak further havoc in her ambitions.

She started by seducing the rankers and eventually the officers through deception. She slandered the commander and even the senior legates to all who would listen. The Fujino snake was good with words. In time, she persuaded the army that its high command was unfit to lead it.

Matters came to a head when Nakao's army marched to meet the Numidians. The army mutinied and declared itself willing to follow only the young Fujino legate. Who seized her chance and took over, only to order a retreat in a fit of nerves before finally getting up the courage for an engagement.

After the battle, Yuzuru Nakao and his chief legates attempted to get the army back to its senses. Unfortunately, the men had taken the victory they lucked into as a sign that Shizuru Fujino was their only suitable leader. Concerned for the poor deluded soldiers, Yuzuru and his legates returned to the provincial governor's palace. There they wrote to the Senate that they had contracted a local illness and were therefore incapable of leading. This would spare the easily-tricked legions the horrific punishment for mutiny... even if it did keep the grasping Fujino in the commander's seat for that theatre of the conflict.

In spite of Shizuru Fujino's villainies, the war had thus far gone Hime's way. Rikiya Soujiro had conducted his part of it magnificently. But then fresh disaster struck: Soujiro suffered a fatal apoplexy.

His panicked legates sent to his co-commander for instructions. As the letter went to Yuzuru Nakao's former camp, it was the usurping Shizuru Fujino who actually received it. She proceeded to join her forces with Soujiro's now-headless one, thereby taking command of the entire Himean army in Africa.

The Senate had by then received Yuzuru Nakao's missives. It understood from his words that he wished his command passed formally to his young legate. That was the only way to legitimise her coup and therefore scotch the taint of mutiny from the history. So Shizuru Fujino was made Rikiya Soujiro's junior co-commander-even as Rikiya Soujiro's ashes sailed back to Hime. In short, luck and sedition manoeuvred Shizuru Fujino into sole command of a plum campaign against a foreign enemy.

The Numidians and their allies were exhausted at this point in time, however. They had been standing on their last legs before Rikiya Soujiro's unexpected death gave them a break. Still, Shizuru Fujino had the felicity of an all-but-done-with opponent; she took advantage of it by simply cleaning up what few enemy forces remained. Thus she did the least work of all three commanders but gained credit for supposedly ending the Himean-Numidian War and expanding Hime's Africa Province.

"It certainly goes down well," Shizuru said at the end of this recital. "Even I confess the appeal of having me as the antagonist!"

"You make a compelling scoundrel," Banri joked back. "So which parts are true and which aren't?"

"Are you saying you do not believe that version?" Shizuru said merrily, taking a sip of her drink. "Your uncle himself stands by it."

"Even my father thought much of it fabricated, Fujino-san," he revealed. "And you know how he felt about you! I also know Uncle Yuzuru. He's got more self-importance than sense. I wouldn't be surprised if the legions had mutinied even without you there."

"So you do think they mutinied."

"Didn't they? It's what everyone thinks."

She grinned at him, ruminating. The Himean-Numidian War had been the campaign where she established her status as one of the greats of Hime's military history. How long ago it seemed! A lifetime away. Yet there were parts of it she could still summon up in amazing detail. Like the interview with Rikiya Soujiro, former general and senior consul of Hime-and her father's old friend, to whom she had readily volunteered her military services.

"I know you're applying as a military tribune, Shizuru," the heavysset, perpetually ruddy man had told her back then. "But I'm not accepting you as one because you're too good to waste in such a position. I'll take you on as a legate instead."

She objected, knowing as he did that no one of her youth was made a legate.

"Especially in an army led by a consul," she said. "It would be more appropriate for your legates to have at least reached praetor in their political careers. I have only just wrapped up my term as aedile, by comparison."

"But you have the corona obsidionalis," was his rebuttal. "You've also been pushed into situations where you led armies, both when you won your corona and when you quaestored in Macedonia. Your age notwithstanding, you have more actual experience than most of the senators at the right age to be legates. You've great ability, Shizuru, and I want to avail the army of it. That would be difficult were you a mere tribune. If I appoint you a military tribune, you will still have to answer to a legate... and that would subordinate you to someone of inferior aptitude. Besides, you must be a legate in order to do what I want you to do."

That stayed the protest in her throat and she cocked her head to show she would listen.

"I'm head commander of this war," he said, "since I'm the senior consul. But the Senate also gave me a subordinate commander in Yuzuru Nakao. By rights he should have been directed to give up his legions for my use. But his supporters worked to prevent this and managed to name him something of my junior partner in the endeavour."

He heaved an enormous sigh that made clear how he felt about that detail.

"He's useless, and so's his staff, by the judging," he stated. "Four months to take one small fortress, and not a strategically important one, even? No, Nakao won't be a help. The problem is, he has three legions. All veteran, so ones we can use. Given how short of troops we are at the moment, we even need them! What I'm afraid will happen before I get to Nakao is that his stupidity'll get those three legions killed before I can take them off him."

Her brow contracted; she saw where he was heading.

"You want to send me to serve with Yuzuru Nakao," she guessed.

"Yes. That's why I need you to be a legate. It's the only way you're high up enough to whisper strategy or tactics in his ear."

"But why not Asao Todoroki?" she demanded, naming one of Rikiya's senior legates, also a vir militaris. "Or Daisuke Maki, even? Either of them could do what you want me to do. Probably more effectively too, Rikiya-han, as they would not be regarded suspiciously due to their ages. Both have also been praetors in the past."

Rikiya shook his head with decision.

"They won't work," he responded. "Nakao's one of the old-fashioned, uppity aristocrats. Neither Todoroki nor Maki is of august-enough lineage to make an impression on him. He'll likely just send them right back to me and say he doesn't want my castoffs. Whereas one can't refuse a patrician Fujino, even if one is a patrician Nakao. Oh, he won't like your youth! None of them will. But they won't be able to do a thing about it because of your name."

"Even so, they may very well try to ignore me."

"Then make it so they can't ignore you."

"But their authority will always supersede mine."

"Then make sure that's not the case when it comes to the soldiers."

Rikiya looked at her severely and frowned.

"You're good at wooing soldiers, Shizuru," he stated. "It's not just the corona. Soldiers find you worth following! Look at what happened in Macedonia when your general fled. Your troops didn't panic though their leader left them! They knew they still had you."

"It's because you're a commander worth your salt, you know," he concluded. "Make sure all of Nakao's army knows that. Because the way Nakao runs his command tent, you'll be on your own. Half his legates were only appointed because they're family! Not a jot of military talent in them! Make no mistake, you'll be the only chance those legions have to survive. Even Nakao and his idiot legates will be dependent on your talents for their survival."

"Surely you cannot be telling me to seize command of his troops!"

"I'm not," said Rikiya. "But if you have to in order to save them, you will."

He went on to explain how he planned to eventually get Nakao's troops added to his. And Shizuru, painfully conscious of the burgeoning envy for her career's leaps, contemplated with a sinking heart the new leap she would have to take for Hime. Rikiya Soujiro was right: Yuzuru Nakao and his feckless legates would get his troops killed down to the last man. He needed someone with actual ability to tell him what to do and how to do it. But he would not entertain advice from anyone with a name less august than his. It left very few options for advisors, a Fujino who was also a Hanazono being one of them.

"They will hate me for this, Rikiya-han," she said.

"They already do," he replied unsympathetically. "They did the moment you won the corona obsidionalis in your first battle . If your father were here he'd tell you to make your peace with it. You'll always stand up and out of the crowd, so they'll spend their lives trying to cut you down to their level. Don't try to crouch down and convince them you fit."

So she had gone to Yuzuru Nakao with a directive to make her a legate. Rikiya Soujiro was right: Nakao scowled at the order but followed it. No one did turn away a Fujino, especially one with her military record and a corona obsidionalis.

"I applied as a military tribune to Rikiya Soujiro," she told Banri as she emerged from her private remembrance. "He insisted on taking me as a legate, however, for various reasons including the corona obsidionalis. Even had I sought that legateship myself, I would not have extorted him for it. He was my father's friend, something people seem to forget when telling that story."

Banri said he believed her.

"Blackmail doesn't really suit your style, does it?" he said. "Nor did being blackmailed suit Soujiro-san's-I remember him still. No one could have twisted that man's arm easily. As for his sending you packing once he reached Africa Province... I'm more inclined to think he sent you to Uncle Yuzuru to spy on him."

That got her to laugh heartily. "Something like that."

"I knew it!" He regarded her with satisfaction. "What about the rest of it? The mutiny no one officially admits was a mutiny, for example?"

"So you disbelieve your uncle's unofficial account on that point as well?"

"Most of the Senate does," he claimed. "We just don't know how exactly the mutiny happened. Or why, for that matter."

She told him what had truly taken place. It had been several months into her service in Yuzuru Nakao's army. She had spent the time getting to know all of his officers below the rank of legate. This was not standard practice for the occupants of Nakao's command tent. Huge aristocrats with little practical experience of warfare, Nakao and most of his legates simply assumed everyone below them unworthy of notice. Only when there were orders to give did they bother remembering them, and then only as dumb creatures who moved where you wanted when you wanted it.

Shizuru, on the other hand, had seen enough action to know the value of the subordinates' respect. She committed every centurion's name to memory and made friends with most of the tribunes and even some of the legates. As she was also the first Himean to win the corona obsidionalis in a century, all these people were predisposed to admiring her from the start. She cultivated that admiration by doing everything the other officers would not, from taking her turn digging ditches to marching alongside the soldiers instead of riding. In no time, it seemed, admiration turned to worship.

So when the orders to march into enemy territory were issued, the whole army took notice of Shizuru's objections. Every centurion by then had learned to respect her opinions, as did several of the other legates. Suddenly people at every level doubted the wisdom of their general's plan. If Shizuru Fujino was carping so much about it, surely there was a problem?

Before the mutiny-that-was-not-called-a-mutiny occurred, Nakao had marched the army to a location even the greenest officers knew impossible to defend. He had then issued instructions that they were going to defend it anyway.

An aghast Shizuru had tried to talk Nakao out of it, had even begun doing so on the way to the place. By the time they reached their destination, however, the general had stoppered up his ears to her complaints. So it had ended with Shizuru blatantly contesting his orders in front of the other officers in a desperate bid to get him to acknowledge the problem.

"Even his more loyal legates had grown restive," she said to Banri. "I admit partly because of my protests, which I had taken to airing before the whole army. Eventually the centurions massed together to see their tribunes, who brought the matter to the higher-ups. The decision was made to see the general all together. The goal was to convince him to retreat from the place immediately."

She winced lightly to show Banri how that attempt at reasoning had fared.

"Nakao-han declared," she continued, "that he would have nothing to do with an army that had betrayed him. So he sequestered himself in his own command tent and ordered the legates still on his side to have nothing to do with the retreat. For want of other options, the remaining officers elected me to lead it."

"Which you did," Banri said.

"Which I did, albeit not in the fit of nerves Nakao-han would claim. We would all have fallen had we stayed where he wanted us to stand, believe me."

Again Banri said he did, having read the official dispatches. No one with a shred of sense could have failed to see that their position had been untenable.

"Anyway, you annihilated an army twice your size right after you evacuated," he said. "I read that you moved just ten kilometres away?"

"Ten kilometres can make all the difference," she responded. "As you know from the results of that battle. It was only a matter of finding the right place to mount a challenge, you see."

He looked at her keenly. "Does it never worry you?"

"Does what never worry me?"

"Being outnumbered. I think near every battle with you commanding has seen you undermanned compared to the enemy. Then there's Terantrum." A long and emphatic exhalation to convey what he thought of that engagement. "I'd have been plenty worried, I'm not ashamed to say."

"You get used to it," she said, smiling.

"I know you have," he said with candid admiration. "So after that battle and your victory, Uncle Yuzuru tried to regain control of the army and failed. What happened, really?"

She ran a hand through her waving golden hair and rolled crimson eyes to the ceiling.

"He got up on a dais in his whitest toga and verbally abused the rankers," she narrated. "Your uncle did about one of the worst things any commander can do, I fear. You can call the legionaries all sorts of names-you can even call them cunni as a joke and they love it. But you do not get up on a stand looking like you never raised a sword in your life and then call them beggars and cowards who never should have been accepted into the military. This, after they won a great victory! Oh, that uncle of yours really did himself no favours. It was painful to see."

Banri paused to imagine his uncle doing what she described and saw it in his mind clearly.

"They didn't hurt him, though, did they?" he said.

"No, not bodily. It truly was a nonviolent mutiny."

She blew out a breath that told of enduring exasperation over those events. Banri experienced a flash of insight that said she had actually tried to stop his uncle making that self-destructive speech. So much for Uncle Yuzuru's claims that the woman had been out from the start to destroy him!

"To the legions' credit, none of them tried to throw a thing at him," she said tiredly, continuing. "Other legions might have, you realise."

But those were good troops we had in Africa-the flower of our men and women! They simply let him run on until he lost his breath, then deputed their centurions to inform the tribunes and legates that they still refused to follow him, even if they were going to be executed for insubordination."

Banri nodded, guessing: "This was when Uncle Yuzuru finally gave in. He took the legates still loyal to him and holed up in Africa Province then, while you-what? Marched to combine forces with Rikiya Soujiro?"

"Yes," she told him. "Who was unfortunately felled by his illness before we could get there. Your uncle's letters made it to the Senate and delivered his 'official' version of the story, then persuaded the House to give me a mandate as a co-commander in the war. That much was generous of him, I admit."

"They all thought you would lose your next battle, is why they gave you that mandate."

She chuckled with genuine mirth. "I know it! Unhappily for them, I am not given to losing. Otherwise, they would have stripped me of the command instantly and summoned me home for a prosecution. Not for mutiny, mind: your uncle's dignitas could never have suffered an official admission that his army turned away from him in favour of someone my age."

Banri concurred. "It would have killed him forever in politics had it been confirmed. Even the rumour alone did him serious injury, actually."

"True. So that was why he bothered with that fiction about him and his legates being too ill to command. We all went along with it, of course-better to spare the legionaries the penalty for mutiny. At any rate, when your uncle's supporters lobbied to give me leadership of his troops, their ultimate goal was to get me into the Treason Court. Had I truly gone down in the defeat they forecast, they could have tried me for it and sent me to exile, while having another senator replace me."

Banri moved to refill his cup but she beat him to it. He thanked her for the courtesy and drank deeply, licking his lips afterwards.

"It's astounding," he said, "how young you were when you found yourself in sole command of a war against a foreign enemy. And how quickly you concluded it! The House barely had time to decide on a replacement for Soujiro-san before you started racking up victory after victory. It does disgust me how some of them still maintain that Uncle and Soujiro-san did all the work and you just claimed their laurels. Uncle didn't do a thing-we all know it. And while Soujiro-san did win two battles, they were never ones of the importance yours had once you took over. He never even met an army led by King Jugurtha! Whereas you sent the Numidian king running to save his life in three consecutive engagements, and took every citadel he had that was worth owning."

He realised the red eyes were filled with laughter.

"What is it?" he asked, whereupon she chuckled quietly.

"I simply never thought," she said, "to hear Kanetsugu Ueda's son speaking well of me."

"I've spoken well of you before, though in private," he admitted. "I had to consider my father."

"I understand. You did your duty."

"Yes. And that's that too for my mother's side of the family."

She got to her feet and towered over him-even when he stood, for Banri was of only average height for a Himean male. Looking up at her he recalled something his own father had once said of the woman. What was it? That she was "disgustingly tall"?

Well, his father had only been of average height too, so he supposed that explained the disgust. Not so much his remark about her "hideous eyes", however. Once one got over the irises' strange colour, one saw that they were as beautifully formed as the rest of her: set apart the perfect distance, thick-lashed and lidded just enough to intimate flirtation. Hideous? Even had she still been a political opponent Banri would never have called her eyes that. How people did like to blind themselves when it came to their enemies!

She asked if he would mind moving elsewhere for the rest of their talk. He acquiesced and she led the way out of her study. She told him to bring his cup, as she did hers.

"We have been cooped up in there too long," she said, guiding him with a gentle touch on his shoulder. "There is no one we need to worry about here anyway, so we can talk by the loggia balcony. At least we can get a little fresh air for a bit, if you do not mind. I have a fancy to take in a bit of the sea breeze."

He said he would welcome it and they set forth, ambling along unhurriedly. She invited him to tell her more about his current circumstances.

"I want to get married," he said, getting a grin.

"What happy news!" she replied. "To whom, if I may pose the question?"

"Shinji Terauchi."

Two fair eyebrows shot up.

"I know," he said quickly. "You're going to ask why I don't simply go ahead and marry him. He's wealthy enough to pay all my debts, in any case. Then I wouldn't need a patron."

The eyebrows lowered just enough to ask him why he did not take that course of action.

"I can't," he said. "I can't have him think I married him for his money."

Her face seemed to soften, its beauty losing some patrician hauteur in place of sympathy.

"I suppose you would not want anyone else to think it either?" she offered gently.

"Yes, but not just for my pride," he told her. "Though I do have my pride, it's a given. But more important is that I don't want people to think Shinji's husband only married him because of his money. I couldn't do that to him."

She brought them to some couches on the loggia. Her steward materialised out of nowhere-an excellent fellow at his job, thought Banri-and offered them braziers as well as socks for warmth. They elected the braziers, as the loggia was airy enough not to be suffocated by the fumes.

"Very well," she decided after the braziers had been lit. "Pardon the frankness, Banri-han, but does Sosius-han know all the details of your debts?"

"Yes, but I don't mind frankness, Fujino-san. I can tell you what they are, before we go further."

He heaved a huge breath and looked apologetic, screwing up his courage.

"I'm three million sesterces in debt," he said, "so I'm afraid I'll have to ask for at least that much."

"I understand," she said, not even blinking at the amount he had stated. "I shall have him move five million into your bank this week. The deposit will be managed discreetly, so no one should suspect you of taking a bribe or anything untoward. Settle your debts first, then use the remainder to start your life over. Make some smart investments, such as buying land you can rent out or even some insulae. In fact, I shall have my banker help you there. Armitage-han has just been elected censor, and I believe she will be unforgiving about most senators in arrears. I want your position safe in the senatorial census from now on, so you need a steady source of income. If I understand you aright, you have no intention of using your beloved's fortune to save your own status. So you shall need a little seed money."

Banri was conscious of his face glowing with heat. Up, up went the blood from his neck, creeping over both cheeks and even his ears. Only iron control stopped his jaw falling to the floor. Two million more than he had expected! He would be able to turn over a new leaf! Able to hold up his head when he proposed to Shinji! He would be able to start his family the way an upright man should. And his new patron would see to the rest of his career, he knew that. For Shizuru Fujino knew value when she saw it and would cultivate it with all of her considerable resources.

"I'll be your man for life, Fujino-san," he promised fervently.

She told him to use her first name.

"Since we are going to be friends anyway," she teased. "I am very happy to have you on my side next year, Banri-han, although that does not resolve the problem of my tribune of the plebs for this year."

"I thought you might say that," he told her, putting his cup on a table. "I have a suggestion."

She put her cup down as well and asked him to go on.

"My friend Fumi Katou was just elected a tribune of the plebs," he revealed to her. "If you can get her on your side, she'd be an ally worth having. Smart! Young and vicious, just the type we need."

"Katou..." she murmured. "Would she be related to my legate, Toshi Katou?"

"Yes, although it's not a close relation." He called up his knowledge of senatorial blood trees-which, like that of most others in his class, was considerable. "Fumi's from the branch of the family that's mostly country-dwelling, based in Picenum. Your legate's from the city-based branch, which has produced more senators but is considerably less well-off."

"Now I see. So how do you propose to get her on my side?"

"By giving her your support," he replied. "She isn't after money because she doesn't need it. The Picentine Katou are wealthy. What she wants is to make a reputation in the office, preferably as a defender of the people and the future of the Republic."

"To make a splash."

"Precisely. Fumi's ambitious, so she'll like the idea of taking you as a patron too."

He drew one short and stocky leg up on the couch, folding it for warmth as well as comfort. A good thing he had worn his thickest riding trousers! Ravenna was cold this time of year-though he noticed that it did not seem to bother his new patron, clad only in a dress without a wrap or toga. He supposed it was because of all that time in The North. Those fabulously fit arms held nary a chill-bump on them!

"The thing is, she'll like it better if you already have some ideas to help her," he went on. "If you have ideas for laws that could distinguish her time in the office, for example. She has some of her own, I know, but she told me she's still looking for something that can light a real fire under senatorial arses."

Shizuru emitted a chuckle. "Standard aims for a tribune of the plebs, then."

"Well, that's it. If you like the idea, just tell me and I'll talk to her for you."

She had been in the middle of reaching for her cup and froze all of a sudden, arm still outstretched.

"Ecastor !" she exclaimed. "I know how to do it! Can you get her to see me here, Banri-han? As soon as possible."

He said he would, asking what she had come up with. She said she would tell him if Fumi Katou agreed to it, and steered the conversation to other topics. They spent the rest of the time discussing the latest news in Hime, at least until her discreet steward appeared again.

"Is it time?" she asked, to which the man answered in the affirmative. "And the Dominilla?"

"She has returned and is changing, Domina," was the answer.

Shizuru dismissed him and turned to Banri, whom she invited to the dining room.

"We shall have some company for dinner, if you do not mind," she said. "I am hosting a foreign dignitary at the moment. I shall introduce you later."

They moved to the triclinium, where a rich repast had already been laid out. Banri's mouth watered as he took in the plates of assorted shellfish, sweet and fat sur-mullets dusted with herbs, and large crabs piled up to look as though they climbed each other. He and Shizuru seated themselves, whereupon some slaves offered water basins for their hands. That done, they started on their meal and continued their discussion: it was on the perpetuating debacle of Sicilia and its servile rebellion.

"I know that Keigo Onishi was recalled," she told Banri. "And that last year's junior consul, Dai Yoshida, was responsible. He got what he wanted, which was Onishi-han's command against the Sicilian slave rebels. He then proceeded to bungle that command. What I do not understand is how he can argue in a court of law that his bungling was Onishi-han's fault."

Banri gulped down an oyster hastily so he could answer.

"Didn't your sources tell you what Onishi-san did when he got his letter of recall?" he asked.

"If you mean his payment and demobilisation of his legions, I know," she replied with a smirk. For Keigo Onishi's act had tickled the vengeful spirit that also lived in her. By disbanding his troops and even paying them ahead of his successor's arrival, Keigo Onishi had denied his successor their experience and talents. Nor would it be a simple matter to recruit them again. Once a legionary received his pay, he tended to steer clear of the military recruiters until his purse was empty again. Onishi's successor would therefore have to find his own troops for Sicilia... and would have to put up with raw, adolescent soldiers, into the bargain!

"While that was undoubtedly a blow to Yoshida-han-the dunderhead probably thought he could take over someone else's army without even having to ask!-the fact remains that it was legal. It is a general's prerogative to disband his troops, save if another general has requested them formally or if the Senate itself has forbidden disbandment," Shizuru said.

"Yes, that's true," Banri said. "Unfortunately, Onishi-san didn't stop at disbanding his legions when he was recalled. Before he disbanded them, he actually set them to removing every siege tower, flattening every rampart, and filling in every ditch they had dug around Triocala."

He picked up another oyster.

"You remember," he reminded Shizuru, "after Onishi-san pummelled the slave rebels at Scirthaea, the slaves ran to hide out in the fortress-town of Triocala. Onishi-san followed them there and besieged the place thoroughly, so much so that the rebels would have perished this year had it not been for Dai Yoshida's interference."

"No doubt he wanted to waltz in and claim the laurels after others did the real work!"

"Onishi-san thought so too, evidently. So instead of letting someone else claim the victory he had worked so hard for, he demolished it. Ripped out every bit of fortification his army had made to ensure the slaves stayed penned in Triocala. He also sailed back to Hime with all the provisions he had gathered for his army. He turned them in to the quaestors himself and said Yoshida-san probably wanted to find his own provisions anyway."

Shizuru shook her head but looked impressed.

"Which left Yoshida-han helpless as a babe when he landed on Sicilia," she said. "No wonder he is having Onishi-han prosecuted. Onishi-han destroyed his chance at stolen glory-beautifully, I daresay!"

Banri concurred.

"And since Yoshida-san is completely hopeless," he said, "Sicilia is controlled by the servile army again. They just walked out of Triocala and regrouped after Onishi-san left. Yoshida-san wasted a shocking amount of time before he recruited a fresh army! He must have spent weeks sending letters to the House whining about how Onishi-san should be prosecuted and demanding that the House find him more troops. Since when does the Senate have to recruit soldiers for a general they've already appointed? He couldn't be bothered to take care of it himself!"

"Well, he did get an army together eventually. How has he been doing lately?"

"Miserably, from the last dispatch," Banri grunted, tearing through a crab. "The slaves trounced him in the last two engagements he fought. So he now has a record of three losses out of three encounters."

"Is he so poor a commander? I thought the slaves had already lost their best general."

"Ah, yes, about that."

He took a drink to clear his throat, then grinned with absolutely no humour.

"It turned out the slave general had not actually died in the battle with Onishi-san," he said. "The man had only fallen from his steed. Some slaves spirited him away from the battle at Scirthaea and nursed him back to health. He has since resurfaced and resumed leading the rebels. Since the quality of his opponent is now much lower than before, he's also enjoyed increasing fame and success."

Shizuru made a face in exasperation.

"This Servile War is rapidly devolving into the farcical!" she exclaimed. "Even with the drought over, Sicilia remains our breadbasket and should be regained as soon as possible."

At that point, the most beautiful foreigner Banri had ever seen walked in. No question she was a foreigner, with that alien eye paint and the gold decorations in her hair. Nose too small to be Himean, though it was of Praxitelean straightness; enormous eyes of unnatural green set deep in the orbits; astonishingly pale skin for her hair's blackness, the only colour atop the cheekbones and the hollows beneath them; slender jaw and secretive mouth; small but strong chin. Wonderful!

"This is the Polemarch of Otomeia, the Princess Natsuki," his new patron told him. "Natsuki, the Senator Banri Ueda."

The young princess nodded but said nothing. He spoke a courteous greeting himself, having just realised she was the savage mistress of rumour. Ah, but she was different from what he had imagined! He supposed it was because so much of the gossip emphasised her barbarity. Yet he had seen far more barbaric women in the Subura's streets. And to add, he discovered some minutes later that she even spoke marvellous Greek!

"The Polemarch speaks Himean but favours this language," Shizuru revealed. "So if you are up to it, perhaps we could use it just for this evening."

Banri's Greek had been drilled in from youth by an excellent pedagogue; he agreed.

"I had no notion you had such a title," he admitted. "Does polemarch connote the same thing among your people as it does among the Greeks, Princess?"

She said it did, then told them not to mind her and continue with what they had been discussing before she joined them.

"It was actually the Servile War in Sicilia," Shizuru told her. "You know about it yourself, even up to the part where Keigo Onishi was replaced by Dai Yoshida. You do not know yet how that substitution worked out, however."

"I can speculate," the princess answered in her fine and low voice. "I know how the Northern Mission's first substitution worked out, you see."

Banri stared at the foreigner while his patron laughed. This was no barbarian, truly!

"As it is, poor Keigo Onishi may have the worse outcome of the two of us," Shizuru said.

She proceeded to fill in their Otomeian companion with the particulars Banri had given her earlier. Banri interjected only to add another detail or two. At the end, the foreigner looked understandably appalled.

"And this shall pass?" she enquired. "Keigo Onishi shall be prosecuted?"

"More than that," Banri answered. "He'll probably be found guilty. Yoshida-san's faction is eager to pin the blame on him for their man's mistakes. The president of the Treason Court is also one of their allies-our courts have senatorial presidents overseeing them, Princess."

"She knows that, Banri-han," Shizuru said gently. "What I think the princess finds difficult to believe is that this farce of a trial is permitted to continue when we all know Keigo Onishi is the wronged man in the story."

Banri nodded and sipped at his drink.

"Quite so," he said. "It can't be helped. Because of what Onishi-san did to his fortifications and military camp, Yoshida-san's allies can prosecute him for destruction of state property. But you never know. Maybe Onishi-san's supporters will be able to get him off yet."

It was clear the princess found that as reassuring as he did. Her scowl was still pretty, though, at least in his opinion.

"Meanwhile, that incompetent is let to chase his own tail in Sicilia," the woman reputed to have taken her as a lover sighed. "What are the odds of him being recalled too, in his turn?"

"The way things are going?" Banri said. "High, I'd say. But I wouldn't be surprised either to see him come sailing back of his own volition. He never wanted to fight a war, you see, and that's what he got. All he had intended was to finish out Onishi-san's siege and then claim the victory."

"Either way, I suppose Hime can expect no grain from Sicilia again this year."

"It looks like it, so we'll have to rely on foreign grain, which has the Treasury clerks nervous. But with any luck, Himemiya-san will have cleared enough of the seaboard to help our grain ships by then."

He was about to explain to the foreign princess again whom and what he meant by that when Shizuru stopped him with a grin.

"She knows what you mean," she assured Banri. "Although I am certain she appreciates your etiquette in trying to explain."

The princess smiled shyly at him as if to support that statement. He smiled back, now even more interested in his patron's not-so-barbarian mistress.

"The Princess follows Himean politics, then?" he prodded.

"Quite a bit," Shizuru answered for her sake. "She and I even saw Chikane recently at Argus."

"Oh, right. Was she there to raise a fleet?"

"She was indeed," she told him.

From there they launched into a discussion of Chikane Himemiya's antipiratical campaign, being sure to include the princess in their dialogue out of an inbuilt sense of good manners. She spoke little herself, but evinced a mind behind that face in the rare times she did. Banri for his part had already apprehended that the dinner was a test: Shizuru Fujino had invited him chiefly because she wanted to see how he would act around her mistress.

Well, he was not by nature a discourteous man, even had he disapproved of their affair. Would she cut him loose if he chose to be uncivil? He did not put it past her. People did say she made much of her foreign paramour. One only had to watch her. Her eyes constantly roamed the foreigner's face as if trying to commit to memory every detail. One would think they were only in the first stage of their connection! Yet Banri knew they were years into it already. Shizuru's conspicuous and powerful affection fascinated him almost as much as her affection's object did, for he recognised both as genuine rarities. So it was with regret that he took his leave of them following the meal.

The princess excused herself while his patron saw him to the stables. The slaves who had accompanied him on this trip looked warm and happy: he guessed they had been entertained and fed by her household. Very well, going from the colour on their faces.

"You are certain you shall not stay the evening and leave instead on the morrow?" Shizuru asked. "It would not put us out in the least. We have rooms aplenty."

He demurred again, saying he had already rented lodgings in an inn a little way south. He also wanted to return to the city as soon as possible, so that he could finally settle matters with his creditors. And to see Shinji, for whom he had a question.

"Besides, I think I don't want to intrude on you and the Princess," he said in a burst of audacity.

He held his breath afterwards until Shizuru smiled at him, seemingly unruffled by the tease.

"You know who she is, then?" she asked.

"I do."

"And what do you think?"

His dark eyes held hers, opening wide as a way of answering.

"I think," he said, "you should have someone make her imago !"

That saw both of them laughing, his patron even harder than him.

"I am immeasurably pleased by our new friendship," she told him before he finally left. "It is not just the value you promise to me, but the fact that I have been given a chance to help someone of your ability and ancestry, Banri-han. I see clearly now that Hime would have been the poorer had you been ejected from Senate due to debt! Your father might not have appreciated my intervention had he been here, but we are the living and we need to live by our own creeds. Stand by me and I shall ensure you make it to the consulship and beyond it. Through you I promise to keep the Ueda where they deserve to be."

Chapter 77

Vocabulaire:

1. Contio (s. L.), contiones (pl. L.) - Preparatory meetings convoked for assemblies (like the Plebeian Assembly) to discuss any of various comitial matters, including the promulgation of laws. In this setting, 17 contiones are required to pass before the vote that decides if proposed legislation shall become a bill.
2. Curule chair - This is the seat magistrates with imperium (s.v.) used. It was foldable and had an ivory veneer.
3. Dictator - An office rarely granted and granted only on special occasions, when Rome was considered to be in such grave danger or facing such peril that such a political animal was deemed necessary. The Dictator was appointed by the Senate and had a fixed/limited term; he could not be prosecuted for any of his actions afterwards (all other officials could be).
4. Equestrians (pl. E.), Equites (pl. L.) - Members of the Ordo Equester, called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank-in fact, they were often related-but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.
5. Hispania Citerior (L.) - Nearer Spain, one of the Republican Roman/Himean provinces. Spain was divided into two at that time, with the nearer half being called Citerior and the other Ulterior.
6. Imperium (L.) - A complex idea, possible to express as the degree of authority owned by a magistrate of Rome/Hime. Governors and generals have imperium, but they lose it if they cross the sacred boundary of Rome and enter the city.
7. Latifundia (pl. L.) - Singular latifundium; a great estate often used for agricultural purposes.

8. Pilum (s. L.), Pila (pl. L.) - The name of the Roman military spear.

9. Publicani (L.) - Tax farmers who make contracts with the state (through the officials called "censors") to collect taxes from a province. For a more comprehensive explanation, see the 4th paragraph in the 4th part of Chapter 13. Note that "parts" of a chapter are separated from each other by the breaks.

10. Prorogue - To prorogue is to extend someone's term. Therefore, were Shizuru to be prorogued in her governorship, her gubernatorial tenure would be extended beyond the original five years granted her original mandate.

11. Tribune of the Plebs - Members of the Plebeian Tribune; to avoid confusion with other "tribunes", this office shall generally be referred to in full. Ten are elected yearly. Only plebeians can be elected into this college and only plebeians can vote for election of these officials. A tribune of the plebs could veto virtually any decision of fellow government officials (except for the Dictator). As they could enact or veto laws, they were important when it came to legislative action.

12. NOTE on gubernatorial excesses - Again for the sceptics. Cartoonishly evil as the character of one Himean administrator seems in this chapter, most of the deeds ascribed to him (slightly modified, in some cases) were actually attested of at least one Ancient Roman provincial governor. Said governor was famously prosecuted by arguably the greatest rhetorician/advocate of Republican Rome.

13. NOTE on the standing courts - For the historians, amateur and otherwise. Anachronisms and temporal rearrangements already abound in the story. Hence the seeming error of the standing courts being age-old establishments here even if some other synchronous events (e.g. Ariobarzanes's first ejection by Mithridates, the second servile war of Sicilia, etc.) would suggest that they should not yet exist. Simply suspend your knowledge of the historical timeline, as this story is not strictly historical anyway.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Thirteen days later, the villa at Ravenna hosted another plebeian senator. Fumi Katou came to Shizuru at Banri Ueda's advice, eager to see if she could build an alliance. She was just as Banri described: smart, young, and terribly vicious. She had less of Banri's subtlety and polish but that was probably to be expected. The Katou were not yet as secure in their tenure of the Senate as the Ueda. They had only entered that august body in the last century and had not yet produced a consul. Fumi was intent on changing that.

"I can't say how happy I am to be here," she told Shizuru, who found this new acquaintance bracing. All that unvarnished, ruthless energy! "I tackled Banri to the ground when he invited me. Couldn't even believe you were back in Fuuka, in fact. Not a lot of people know back home, do they?"

"No, they do not," Shizuru said. "It would have served little purpose, so I did not bother to advertise it. I am returning to my province shortly."

"Then I really am glad you saw me before you did!"

"I am gratified by your enthusiasm, in return," Shizuru said pleasantly. "May I know what could have caused it?"

"All you've achieved!" Fumi grinned wide and fiercely. As she had a chip missing from one front tooth, it made her look like an unruly youngster. In actual fact, she was around Shizuru's age, which still made her one of the younger members of the Senate.

"I'm an admirer, Fujino-san," she declared. "Long have been. Both of your politics and military doings."

Shizuru smiled back. "A bit of a surprise you and Banri-han became friends, then!"

"You mean because of how he used to vote against you all the time in Senate?" Fumi pulled a face to show what she had thought of that. "It was his folks working on him. Oh, he's a few traditional leanings too by himself, but he's still more than your average stick-in-the-mud conservative. He'd have voted for your motions some of the time if it hadn't been for that old man of his."

Shizuru said that could have been the case.

"What did he say when he conveyed my invitation?" she asked.

"He said you might want another tribune of the plebs this year to help you with some legislation."

One word begged attention: "He said 'another'?"

"Actually, no, now that I think about it. He didn't need to. Kenichi Sasaki is yours, isn't he?"

"What makes you think so?" Shizuru asked Fumi.

Fumi wriggled friskily in her seat.

"He vetoed the bill Yamamoto proposed that would have limited prorogued provincial governors' terms to five years at maximum," she told Shizuru. "There are only two provincial governors who would have been immediately affected. Midori Sugiura-who I've heard is eager to settle down as a simple overseas senator next year-and you, because of your special mandate for a five-year command. After all, if the bill had gone through, you couldn't be prorogued any further, since your original term had already hit the cap! Everyone knows Yamamoto's in the pay of the Traditionalists and that they were really targeting you with that bill. It seemed logical that the owner of the vetoing tribune would therefore be the Traditionalists' nemesis!"

She made a conciliatory gesture with her hands.

"Kenichi-san hasn't admitted to being your man," she added. "Even so, I doubt any of the archconservatives is fooled. But that's exactly why you bought him, eh?"

"How so?" Shizuru asked, enjoying herself.

"He's an obvious man, is Kenichi-san," Fumi stated with a shrug. "Steadfast, but not a law-making genius. Actually somewhat like the tribunes of the plebs the Traditionalists themselves are always getting. No earth-shakers among them! They don't need to be when all their masters require is for them to be able to pronounce the word 'veto'. All the Traditionalists want is to limit change, of course, so that's understandable. In your case, though, you wanted Kenichi-san precisely because you wanted a tribune who'd be obvious or visible."

She gave Shizuru a gleeful look and went on: "You always wanted to get another tribune of the plebs besides him this year, didn't you? You want someone to actually pass legislation for you, but you want it done-sneakily, I'd say is the word. If the Traditionalists are focused on Kenichi-san, they might not notice that another tribune is doing your work. That might be why you didn't try to get a tribune elected just for the job either. That would mean people would know from the start which tribune you were backing... as opposed to a tribune you just bought following his election."

Shizuru chuckled and refreshed the other senator's drink.

"Not bad at all," she said of the other's deductions. "Does this mean you want to be the tribune I buy to act for me invisibly?"

"You won't need to buy me with cash per se, though I'd like to know first what law you want passed so badly this year."

"I would rather tell you after you agree to act in my interests."

"Oh, I will!" the other exclaimed, looking astonished. "Regardless of whether or not I can come up with a way to get your legislation passed unnoticed, I'd still like to form an alliance-if you'll have me, Fujino-san."

A gleaming look, sent to Shizuru in earnest.

"I could use support," she confessed. "I want to reach the consulship."

Shizuru spoke favourably: "The first of your clan. You would ennoble your family."

"Yes, I think I can make it."

"I believe you will, Fumi-han," Shizuru admitted. "Very well, then. I want a land bill."

Fumi's excitable, mischievous face fell.

"Aahh, that'll be grim," she said, which had Shizuru smiling. "I want to make the conservatives scream, but I don't want to get killed doing it! Land bills get the Senate up in arms."

"That they do," Shizuru said. "Why is that, you think?"

Fumi threw up her hands.

"Lots of reasons!" she exclaimed. "In your case, because it means a general looking to gift her veterans with a bit of land as a pension. Those soldiers end up thanking the general for that land, even if it technically comes from the state. They become beholden to one senator instead of being beholden to Hime. And the Senate already sees you as a threat these days. What more with several thousand veteran soldiers who believe they owe you for the lands on which they settle their families? That'd be like giving you a solid pool of adherents for a private army."

Shizuru concurred and told Fumi to continue, as she knew that was not the end of it. The other, traditional objection came from the Senate's view of the ager publicus or Hime's public land. This was land held in a communal ownership by the Himean State and People. The government leased it to private individuals or corporations, with the rents from that going to the public purse.

"There's all the equestrians and Himean companies who make money off the ager publicus," Fumi said. "Hime leases tracts of it to them for a nice price and the businessmen make even more money in their turn, often by running the properties as latifundia. The policymakers, both among the Senate and the equestrians, don't like any law that tries to give away public land! It's not even just that the State makes money off it. It's mostly because it goes against tradition. Some of the dyed-in-the-wool conservatives even say it's against our unwritten constitution!"

"True enough," Shizuru told her. "So what, perhaps, if the land bill I wanted was not phrased as one of 'giving away'?"

Fumi stared at her, intrigued. "What d'you mean?"

"The land bill I want passed has to do with my veterans, as you guessed," Shizuru answered. "I want land for them in the territories I currently govern and am opening up."

"As I said."

"Yet I do not actually need to grant my veterans land right now. My command is not finished, and if I have anything to do about it, will not be finished next year either. This means my soldiers are not about to be discharged soon. Hence all I really want, at this point, is to know that the land I want to give them when they are discharged is still going to be there for me to give, far in the future."

She waved her hand to forestall Fumi's protest, knowing what it would be.

"Yes, yes," she said. "I can set aside the land for them now, being governor of the province! I can nominate it as part of Hime's new ager publicus in Septentria and the Senate will ratify that decision without any hitches. My problem is what happens after. I need it to stay unused, even if it is part of the ager publicus, at least before I can get my veterans to settle on it. I want to know it shall not be bought or taken on lease by some knight-businessman with strong senatorial supporters the moment my governorship of Septentria is over."

The other woman had nodded rhythmically throughout this speech.

"That it'll be untouchable until you can push the legislation that will actually grant it to your soldiers," she rephrased for Shizuru.

"Precisely."

"I see." Some moments of silence, during which Fumi drummed her fingers on her knees. "I see. Yes, that makes it different."

"And far more doable, think you not?"

"Oh yes." She looked up from her study of her feet, face animated. "Yes, I think I can do it! And I can even do it in a way that won't make anyone think it's you behind me. Just tell me which territories they are, Fujino-san. I'll push a bill in the Plebeian Assembly that says these unimportant, none-too-attractive lands should nonetheless be set aside and saved for Hime's future, in case we ever need them for gods-know-what-reason. When I say they should be saved, I mean just that: bound by legislation in a way that prevents their sale or lease until such time as new and specific legislation would permit it."

She actually giggled from her excitement, although her chip-toothed grin this time was more feral than youthful.

"I won't need to say much more than that, you know," she told Shizuru. "The policymakers like anything that seems to add to the ager publicus, even if it also makes that addition technically unusable. What matters is that it's addition, not subtraction ! What's more, they'll let it pass specifically because I'll seem to be stepping on your toes with the bill. They won't suspect a thing!"

Shizuru laughed appreciatively.

"It shall seem that way indeed," she said, "what with you legislating to make some tracts of Septentrian land untouchable instead of letting me grant them on lease to my equestrian clients. Yes, good thinking! The conservatives themselves shall rush to get it approved, just to annoy me."

The other senator rubbed her hands together.

"Oooh, this ought to be fun!" she hooted. "I'd still rather put something forward that'll have the House squawking. But this is nice work too. Sticking it to them without them knowing it."

"Have you any laws you yourself want to put forward?"

"I've a few," Fumi responded, and described them. As Shizuru had suspected, they were all about righting wrongs or oversights in the state. A bill proposing stricter penalties on bribery during elections-that would be vetoed given how many senators bribed, but it would get attention. A bill banning those convicted of electoral corruption from again seeking public office-that might be allowed to pass, as it required one to be found guilty of bribery first before being subject to the punishment. A bill forbidding omnibus laws, which meant unscrupulous lawmakers would no longer be allowed to tack together unrelated matters into one piece of legislation-that would probably pass, being of patent good sense. All frank and altruistic legislation! All in keeping with Fumi's character too, Shizuru decided.

"No real zingers yet, though, as you can see," Fumi said afterwards. "Got an idea for me?"

"I do, actually," Shizuru said. "But it is not strictly legislation."

She explained what she wanted from the other woman, who listened with mounting interest. They spent another hour cloistered in Shizuru's study, after which, a couple of hours past noon, Fumi decided to take her leave. Pleased by the work they had concluded, Shizuru provided the woman with a letter of introduction to another senator: Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki, who would be an excellent acquaintance for any ambitious tribune of the plebs. Chikane's cousin would also supply Fumi with support for the other task Shizuru had assigned her.

Re-entering her villa after waving off Fumi, Shizuru found her lover in the atrium, along with their giant cat. The younger woman stopped walking and waited for her, head held up for a kiss.

"Good?" she asked afterwards, to which Shizuru assented. She brushed her lips against the taller woman's again before pulling away. "You asked not this one to dinner."

"I would have," Shizuru said. "But she arrived so early that we finished early as well. At any rate, she was eager to get back to the city in order to prepare for our plans."

"She will be an ally?"

"Yes."

"You will tell me of your plans?"

"Don't I always?" Shizuru chuckled. "I would like to hear what you think of them, after all. But first, do you feel up to taking a walk? Not too far, only around the villa. I feel like stretching my legs."

"We will take Shizuki?"

"No, she shall only get wet outside." Shizuru bent down to scratch the panther's head. "Let her stay here and lounge! This pampered beast will only be too happy to nap as we walk."

Natsuki agreed and asked if they should go already. Shizuru advised her to change her clothing first, in favour of something more covering.

"It is cold outside," she said with a grin.

"This cold is nothing," Natsuki said in lofty dismissal.

Shizuru smothered the laughter and wondered how to tell her. She finally settled for the direct route: "Indeed, but you may want to wear a scarf or something that covers your neck and shoulders."

Two green eyes studied her face with sudden suspicion. Then the girl took the hint. She rushed out of the room, bolting for the gallery and the private section of the villa. Her pet followed her at a lope. Shizuru herself kept up a casual stroll, humming one of the tunes her buglers played on the march. A minute later, her mistress hobble-hopped out of their bedroom and joined her on the peristyle loggia. To Shizuru's amusement, all the slaves in the vicinity suddenly found reason to slip out of sight. Even faithful Hermias abandoned her, the lout!

"Shizuru!" Natsuki cried, actually shaking a little. Her face was full of blood. "You did not tell!"

"Why should I need to?" Shizuru said with authentic surprise. "I thought you would see it in the mirror for yourself this morning. A pity I overestimated your vanity. You do not look into the mirror often, do you, meum mel?"

"Others have seen!" A purple look, followed by a flutter of one hand to indicate the red marks all over the fair shoulders and neck.

"Others have seen this!"

"What others? Since these are only a day old, that would only be our servants."

"Still!" A fist was shaken in the air. "Look at me!"

Shizuru hummed again and issued an apology. It failed to placate her lover, however, who noted that she still had not stopped smiling.

"Well, I am in a good mood," Shizuru said. "Anyway, I did warn you off from displaying them to anyone outside of the villa just now. That was why I said you should change your clothing, mea vita. Now forgive me if I failed to inform you properly before you awoke. I genuinely thought you would see it yourself in the mirror. Come, please, if you change now you can cover them. I want to take a walk while the sun is still high up enough to make the wind a bit warmer."

It took some more cajoling, but she eventually persuaded the younger woman to do what she wanted. While Natsuki changed clothes with the aid of her servants, Shizuru tendered a possible excuse she could give.

"I do not see why it matters so when no one else has seen or will see them," she said, watching the pale skin disappear under more clothing. "But if someone does and asks you what happened, you could always say you were attacked by lampreys while swimming."

Natsuki was still miffed and scowled at her.

"No one sensible swims in winter," she said. "I was attacked by a senator."

"Good luck getting redress for that here," Shizuru quipped. She threw an arm around the panther sitting on the couch with her and got a furry snuggle back. "Senators get away with murder in Fuuka, remember? Himean justice at its best."

"Justice. Hah!" A moment to fiddle with a hem. "What is the other thing? What you say could have attacked me?"

"Lampreys."

"What is that?"

"Lampreys is plural. Lamprey is the singular."

"What are they?" Natsuki amended.

"They are fish rather like eels, but they lack jaws. Round, toothy mouths, bodies about this large." She illustrated with her hands.

"They do not bite so much as suck, or rasp. Have you none in the rivers or seas of your lowland provinces?"

The other was thoughtful at this new puzzle. She taxed her servants, but the other northerners professed to being unfamiliar with the stated creature as well.

"Lampreys," she said. "I think I have not heard of such fish attacking anyone back home."

"Well, I do not think they attack people all that often, truth be told."

"And you would put the blame for your acts on them," Natsuki sighed. "I pity this fish."

"You might not if you saw it."

"Let me see it?"

"I shall send to the town to see if the fishmongers have some. Now are you done?"

She was, and their servants put their cloaks on them as they walked out. Shizuru was cautious as ever and had several brawny slaves along with Natsuki's body carrier follow them. They were far enough to let Natsuki feel comfortable with an occasional nuzzle, however.

"So," Natsuki said, once they were some metres from the villa. "Tell me of this new ally?"

Shizuru did just that, describing her conversation with Fumi Katou in detail. Before telling Natsuki about the last thing she and Fumi had discussed, however, she asked first if the younger woman recalled the issue brought forward recently by some clients from Hispania Citerior.

This was yet another of the reasons Shizuru had decided to journey south for the winter. Towards the last quarter of the past year, she had received missives from clients in both of the Spains. They had reported colossal peculations and villainies committed by the governor of the nearer of the two Spanish provinces.

A measure of corruption was expected of every Himean provincial governor, to be sure. It was one of the ways ex-praetors and ex-consuls made money for themselves after their years in office. A canny governor could pinch a little off the top of provincial moneys. He could take bribes in exchange for granting powerful entities some small favour or concession. He could be paid by Himean usurers—usually also the publicani for that province—to help collect outstanding sums by sending troops to intimidate debtors. He could offer communities or corporations tax exemptions for a cost. He could even sell the citizenship to rich non-Himeans, although in moderation. If the province involved had barbarian tribes, he might also fight some battles and collect booty.

The problem was that some governors did not stop at the typical corruptions. The past year's governor of Hispania Citerior, for example, had gone above and beyond his predecessors. His list of peccadilloes included such beauties as demanding more of a farmer in taxes than the man's farmsteads produced every year and condemning to death a prominent local who refused to yield up his only daughter for bedtime amusement. He pillaged works of art from a dozen temples and even from private collections. The latter he managed by having legionaries grab the object, then forcing the owner to write a bill of sale that saw priceless sculptures "sold" for a handful of coins.

Disobedience to his whims he treated with predictable malevolence. A man was scourged across the eyes—not even the back!—for voicing a critique of his administration. In one memorable case, he strapped a local magistrate on top of a bronze horse statue in the town square during winter. This was after the town's magistrates refused to turn over a work of art adorning one of their public buildings. As the magistrate was stripped naked before being bound to the bronze horse, it took little time for the locals to cave. They gave the governor the masterpiece he coveted the moment they saw his victim's flesh start congealing to the bronze.

"The man was a rare villain," Shizuru told Natsuki. "Would you believe that during one banquet given by an influential native in his honour, he ordered his troops to purloin all the gold plate on the table before they had even finished the first course?"

Natsuki squeezed her arm and turned pink with outrage.

"But how can he do this?" she demanded huskily. "Why did no one stop him?"

"For one, because he was the governor," Shizuru sighed. "We Himeans have few checks upon governors when they are still in their provinces. It is only after our governorships are done-and our imperium is no longer-that we can be brought to trial for any crimes we might have committed."

There was another squeeze on her arm.

"This should not be," Natsuki muttered. "Shizuru."

"I know." Shizuru smiled down ruefully at her lover. "Little wonder I started getting letters about his doings as early as the middle of last year. More of my clientele is actually in Hispania Ulterior, but many of those knew of what was taking place in their sister province. Some have family in Citerior who have been affected by this scoundrel as well."

"Will other senators get complaints?" Natsuki asked her. "Maybe those with clients there too?"

"Yes, I expect so."

"Then how could he do this?" Natsuki hissed. "Does he not have other senators to fear?"

"Not as many as you think," Shizuru admitted. "The truth is that most senators do not like to convict their fellows, especially for things like these. That is partly because most of them practise extortion themselves, of course, although not to this degree. Then there is the fact that our ranks tend to protect each other. For the conservatives, for instance, it would generally be deplorable to see a senator convicted on charges of extortion. This is because they see it as an admission to the world that the Senate is just as fallible, as weak, as corrupt as the average man on the street."

She looked at the white-laced cerulean of the Adriatic below them and pointed out two ships scudding on it, bearing south. Natsuki watched them avidly.

"This corrupt governor we are discussing also happens to be a Sumio Fujimoto," she continued. "Brother to Nana Fujimoto, who is married to the current junior consul. One of the praetors this year is also a cousin named Minako Fujimoto."

Natsuki looked away from the ships and made a small sound of comprehension.

"Now then, a minor digression," Shizuru said. "You already know that the praetors are the magistrates who preside over our standing courts. Did I ever explain to you how praetors get assigned to specific courts?"

"Mm. You said they draw lots."

"Indeed. Well, the consuls are usually the ones who perform that lottery. It tells you which officials could most easily rig the drawing, think you not?"

Natsuki stared at her following the insinuation and guessed at it: "You mean... Minako Fujimoto is president of the Extortion Court this year?"

"Exactly."

This so incensed Natsuki that she tossed her head with a loud "Grrr!"

"So you see why our dear corrupt governor felt relatively secure," Shizuru explained. "He is very well-connected, even without all of his relatives occupying those positions this year. I do think he banked on his brother-in-law being one of the consuls for this year—a good wager, you know, since said brother-in-law comes from another august family and also happens to have a good military record. After that it was just a matter of ensuring someone sympathetic got the Extortion Court's presidency. With a cousin happily available as one of the elected praetors, well... you see where I am going. That promised him safety for this year, which is technically when he would be most vulnerable."

"Then," her still-disgusted lover offered, "why do your clients not use another court? Not every court's president is corrupt, maybe?"

Shizuru tutted a little.

"First, let us be clear that they are not all my clients," she said fastidiously, which got a brief smile from the woman beside her. "As for why the Spanish plaintiffs should not lodge their case in some other court than the Extortion one, it is because the majority of the charges fall under extortion. Were they to use another court instead, they would have to dramatically shorten the list of offenses. Even if they secure a conviction, it would then be for a much lighter penalty."

"But-but then! He shall go unpunished!"

"Indeed. Yet senators get away with murder, as I told you earlier."

Natsuki stopped walking and faced her. Shizuru ran her palms over the fine black hair, holding it out of the pretty face sulking in dejection.

"You can do nothing?" the young woman asked, her large eyes sad and confused. "You will do nothing for this?"

Shizuru smiled soothingly at her lover, whose own noble sense of honour was predictably distraught by so much wrongdoing. Oh, how she looked at you! As though you were the only hope, the one light on a dismal and dark horizon. Who could stand to disappoint anyone who looked at them thus?

"I will do something," she said. "Some of my own clients were affected. Of course I will."

Some of the sadness in those eyes left, to her relief. A slender hand held one of her own, still stroking the dark hair.

"This is why I brought it up while we were talking about Fumi Katou," she said. "She was seeking something that would gain attention while tweaking conservative noses. I advised her that prosecuting Hispania Citerior's former governor would be the answer. But, given the man's connections, doing so in the standard procedure would be little more than symbolic. There would be little chance of getting a conviction for him in the Extortion Court, as you yourself guessed."

Natsuki nodded her head up and down eagerly, waiting for it.

"So, instead of through the courts," Shizuru said, "I suggested that she arraign him instead in the Plebeian Assembly."

The Otomeian frowned and asked if that was possible.

"The Assemblies have always had the power to hear trials," Shizuru told her. "We have not done it in a long time, is all. We established our current standing courts-the ones for bankruptcy, extortion, embezzlement, and the like-about four decades ago. Since then, practically all our trials have been conducted in them. But before that, we had ad hoc courts, or if a case was important enough, the Assemblies."

Natsuki asked if the institution of the standing courts had not formally removed the power of trial from the Assemblies.

"No," Shizuru said, pleased by the legal intelligence of the question. How quickly Natsuki was learning her world! "The laws establishing our standing courts actually never repealed the Assemblies' rights to hear trials. So Fumi-han can arraign Fujimoto-han there, and probably for all of his misdemeanours, if she phrases the charge broadly. Charging him with gross mismanagement and corrupt administration, for example, will let her cover the gamut of his sins from murder to extortion. She would have had to restrict herself to only one type of crime had she used the regular standing courts instead, given their limits in scope."

Natsuki absorbed this for a moment. Shizuru pulled her nearer, enjoying her warmth through the layers of linen and wool.

"So," the younger woman finally said, "the, ah, conservatives, they cannot stop the trial?"

"Certainly not, as it is perfectly valid. Well, they could try to have one of their tribunes of the plebs veto it, I suppose. But not even tribunes of the plebs can veto trials without facing serious hostility. Especially when it is an extortion trial, which the Plebs love to watch. I also sent Fumi-han to solicit support from Urumi-han, Chikane's cousin. She will work up so much support for the trial beforehand that no conservative tribune of the plebs will dare a veto for fear of their lives. I think it safe to say the trial will happen, despite all the Fujimoto connections."

"You think he will be convicted, maybe?"

"In the Plebeian Assembly? There is a good chance of it, although it shall depend on several things. The political climate, for example. The abilities of the prosecuting and defence advocates too."

Natsuki linked their arms together again and they resumed their walk.

"Fumi Katou will prosecute?" she asked Shizuru. "She is good?"

"Yes, she will, and I admit I know not. But I have a strong feeling Chikane's cousin Urumi-han shall join the arraignment, so that should make a good case for the prosecution. Urumi-han is never short of brilliant."

"And the defence?" Natsuki asked.

"Well, I think we can take it for granted that it shall be impressive," Shizuru allowed with a twist of the lips. "Sumio Fujimoto shall get the best defence advocates he can find to speak for him. Given all the pieces of art he allegedly stole, it shall not be difficult to fund a defence panel!"

She explained to Natsuki that advocates in Hime were not supposed to be paid for their service. Canny advocates had long gotten round that rule by soliciting "gifts" from clients instead. It was par for the course to grant an advocate some small piece of artwork that he could peddle for a cash sum later. The better and more august the advocate, the more expensive the artwork tendered.

Shizuru herself had been offered a Protogenes by one senator during her courtroom years. Despite her youth, sheer oratorical skill had made her one of the greatest advocates, hence the value of the offering. Since she had disliked that senator, however, she had declined; it contributed that she had known him guilty of all charges as well.

"Most of the conservatives will take his side," she told Natsuki of Fujimoto. "Again, for the reasons I mentioned earlier. He also has blood ties to some Traditionalists, including Sergay Wang. Wang-han will not be able to act as a defence advocate here, however. He is a patrician and will not be allowed to address the Plebeian Assembly."

"Then," she added, "there is the strength of the evidence Fumi-han can furnish. I shall send some letters to Hispania later that may aid her in obtaining all the records and witnesses she needs. The faster she gets it all together, the sooner the trial can be held."

Natsuki asked how long collecting evidence could take.

"That shall probably take two months, if she is swift," she determined, remembering her own months of research for cases she had defended or prosecuted in her youth. "And I think I have the measure of Fumi-han right when I say she shall not let the grass grow under her feet."

"Then," said her lover, "this man will pay, maybe?"

"I and my allies shall certainly do what we can to see to it."

"Good," Natsuki said simply, the word as strong as it was meaningful.

They walked a little further before turning back, chatting on smaller matters as they did. An hour after their return Shizuru got word that the kitchen staff had procured the fish she had requested. She brought Natsuki down to the kitchens to see the lamprey. She picked it up herself and beckoned her lover nearer for a look but the Otomeian objected. The girl appeared put off by the animal's disc-like mouth and the rows of fangs stuffed into it.

"That is not a fish!" she yelped, which had Shizuru laughing so hard she nearly dropped the creature. Later at dinner, Natsuki even had to be persuaded to try the dish made from the lamprey. She pronounced it tasty enough, although her lover noted that she took no more bites after the first.

"Did it unnerve you so, its looks?" Shizuru asked the girl later in their bed, turning her over and working at her shift. "I never thought to see you quail at a creature, Natsuki."

Natsuki grabbed her hand.

"I did not quail," she snarled.

Shizuru smiled and said that was right.

"I used the wrong word," she said, freed to complete her task. She moved down for a taste of what belonged to her. "All you did was give a little tremble."

Natsuki was gasping so much she could barely speak the protest: "Did... not."

"If you say so. But you will now."

She brought her through several quakes and suffered two of her own. Afterwards she lay back on a pile of pillows and allowed Natsuki to clean the sweat off her. As the younger woman did so with her tongue, however, there was very little actual cleaning that progressed.

"We go back north soon," Shizuru told her. "So you should do everything you want to do here before then. Is there anything I can help with?"

Natsuki paused her ministrations and hummed into Shizuru's collar.

"There is anything we have not seen yet?" she asked, which Shizuru denied. She had taken the Otomeian to see everything there was to see in the area. As for doing everything there was to do in the area, they had done that as well, with one exception. Natsuki had wanted to ride around the Fuukan countryside but Shizuru put an embargo on that. Natsuki's steeds were not with them and she did not want the polemarch trying her side-saddle mount on an unfamiliar horse. Though that had distressed Natsuki a little, she had surrendered the point: no horse could have thrown her when she was still whole, but things were different now.

"Ravenna is a bit on the idyllic side," Shizuru said. "Besides, all of Fuuka is quieter in the winter. The only significant festival at this time is the Parentalia, and as you saw, it is not exactly known for jollification."

Natsuki purred: she had found said festival interesting, even so. Parentalia was when Himeans celebrated their departed ancestors, often by making offerings of garlands, wine, and bread to their tombs. As Shizuru's family sepulchres were far to the south, she made do with an offering to a shrine she had set up within the villa. Natsuki had helped her weave the garlands and place them on the shrine. She had also let Shizuru persuade her into making a shrine for her own clan.

"Still," she said now. "It was interesting. And the quiet is nice."

"Yes, it is that." Shizuru swept a palm over a slender white shoulder. Natsuki was tracing one of her breasts carefully. "Well, I am going down to town again tomorrow. Come with me? We can have another look at the shops and the market."

"Mmhm. I will go."

Later she felt a ticklish sensation on one arm and looked down. Natsuki's head lifted and showed that the younger woman had sucked a red mark over the taut skin of a bicep. Shizuru lifted an eyebrow when Natsuki smirked.

"Now you have one too!" she exulted, proud of the achievement. "Hrrm. You hide that!"

Shizuru studied the mark.

"Why should I?" she asked. "I care not if people see it. It looks well done, by the way. Top marks for you there, mea vita. "

The Otomeian was astonished.

"But it is-you will not hide it?" she asked.

Shizuru said again that she would not.

"It is not as though anyone would wonder who was responsible, anyway," she added. "If I turn up with marks of this sort, everyone knows only you could have been the cause."

"Only I."

"Of course."

The green eyes shot wide, panic bright in them.

"Shizuru, hide it!" she said, which had Shizuru gaping at her in astonishment. "You must hide it!"

" Why ?!"

"Because-because-everyone will know!"

"That you did it?"

"Yes!"

Shizuru gave her a look that asked what was wrong with that.

"Of course they will know! Did you forget you are my only lover?" she asked with mild exasperation. She already knew what was the problem, of course: it was her foreign mistress's prudish nature, which leapt out at the oddest moments even at this stage. She rolled her eyes at it as the girl grabbed her arm and rubbed at the mark with a thumb as though that could remove it.

"I do not see," she sighed, "why it should trouble you to have people see such a mark of your creation. Even without seeing such reminders, a lot of people know that we sleep together! I swear, Natsuki... you can be a terrible prude at times. People know you touch me too, for god's sake. So what else do you want me to say if I meet someone ignorant enough to ask who gave me this mark?"

"Maybe," the other suggested anxiously, still scrubbing, "you can say a lamprey?"

Shizuru covered her face with one hand and cried with laughter.

---

Shizuru did not stay long enough to see Fumi Katou's agrarian law go through the preliminary contiones. She trusted in her new ally to deliver as promised, and herself decamped with her army household to make their way back north overland.

"And just in time," Shizuru sighed, eager now to get back to her gubernatorial work. "I love the countryside as much as anyone, but were we to stay there any longer I would have started writing eclogues, by god."

A tickled Natsuki had asked if she possessed any talent for poetry.

"I compose poems about you all the time," had been the response. "I just never show them to people because your prudish taste would deem them too racy for public consumption."

Known among her peers for her speedy travel, Shizuru could have easily chosen to journey back at her usual tearing hurry. She could have left her mistress and household staff to follow at a much more comfortable pace. But Shizuru detested being away from her lover, especially if the latter would be on the road instead of stationary during the separation. So she made arrangements at first for a slower journey than normal. To her surprise, however, it was Natsuki who demanded she change them out for speedier ones. They thus made good time going back to her province. If the polemarch suffered a little from the pace, she took great pains that Septentria's governor would not notice.

While they were still in the upper part of Fuuka, they received a missive from Shizuma. The senior legate reported that all the invitations Shizuru wanted sent had gone out. These were to the first Septentrian Conference she had arranged for April. The conference would run for a week and would be held at Gorgo, where the senior legate had been preparing for it all winter.

Shizuru had no real expectations of trouble for the conference but knew it better to be prepared for anything come the springtime. After getting Shizuma's letter she asked her travelling companion, the polemarch, to send her own. It was to Gorgo, where the Otomeian Lupine Division was bivouacked; the polemarch ordered them to meet their party at Pascera. When they arrived at the site, they found an unexpected surprise: Natsuki's fellow princess was among them.

"I've come to request release of the Otomeian infantry," explained Alyssa. "I've just received word from Rilkian-that's my sister, the regent of Valens-that the Mugilones have banded with the Helisii, the Harii, and a bunch of others to attack our lands. It sounds serious. Rilkian, you know."

"The Princess Rilkian does not often send for help," Natsuki expounded to a carefully listening Shizuru. "Her army is very experienced. They have fought those tribes, the ones Princess Alyssa mentioned, for many years."

"So I'd like to send our foot over there to help, and stay on the safe side." Alyssa faced the Himean general. "I don't think you need them here anymore, anyway. You already own the Mentulaean Empire, or what used to be that."

Shizuru agreed and asked if Alyssa would lead the reinforcements herself.

"Only part of the way," Alyssa said, her hair even yellower than usual because she had woven large blue and red beads into some of her braids. Shizuru thought the ornamentation made her seem fiercer instead of less so. "My second, Baroness Miyu, will lead them the rest of the march. I'm only headed east to go to the capital."

"Please send my warmest regards to your father," Shizuru replied.

Alyssa asked the polemarch if she had any messages of her own to convey.

"I only just wrote to His Majesty," Natsuki answered. "Before we left Fuuka."

That got a curious gleam to the cool eyes, whose owner asked how she had liked her holiday there.

"It was nice," the other princess said, before announcing: "I rode a ship."

Two pairs of golden eyebrows arched at the abrupt disclosure. Alyssa turned out to be as tolerant of Natsuki's petty eccentricities as Shizuru herself, however: she asked about the experience with courteous seriousness.

"It was very fast," the polemarch said with pride.

"That does sound nice," was Alyssa's solemn reply. She asked her cousin to tell her about it when she returned and said a farewell. As was the custom for friends among their people, she kissed her cousin on the lips to do so. She ignored Shizuru's malignant glance after that.

Natsuki did not.

"You kiss your cousin and Chikane on the mouth too, Shizuru," she reasoned when Alyssa had left.

"My cousin and Chikane have not asked me to marry them," was the withering response.

They made it to Gorgo right before the Ides of April, which gave Shizuru only one more week before the first Septentrian Conference. During this time she explained to her staff and legates exactly how she wanted the conference to proceed.

"The conference will run seven days," she told them. "The foremost intention is to reconcile our guests to the new shape of their future. On the first day we shall commence with a welcoming oration that I shall deliver. This shall be followed by formal introductions-announcements-of the titles and names of all those present. We can have one of the tribunes handle the list, Shizuma, but be sure to introduce the Himean officers present first. Our guests must know with whom they are dealing."

"Shall you need an introduction too before your oration?" Shizuma asked, half-teasing.

"No, I think I can manage, thank you," Shizuru replied. "Be sure to omit me from the later introductions as well. I am not officious enough to demand a second announcement of my name after having already delivered one."

"After the introductions have concluded," she continued. "I shall outline in brief what the conferences are meant to achieve. Specifically, to convey to them what we expect of them in exchange for them being allowed to keep the privileges of their aristocracy and local leadership. I shall also make it clear that the conferences are bilateral. In other words, they can use the days to lobby for certain changes or even judgements they feel would be of benefit to the province. They may ask us for clarifications on certain matters. They may even debate previous decisions I made shortly following Terantrum, provided they do so in an orderly and logical way."

"Oh, I see!" said Kenji, whom she had summoned from Atinu Camp to be part of the talks. He had brought fellow legate Toshi Katou with him. "What you want, Fujino-san, is basically a blown-up version of a town leaders' council, where the magistrates determine resolutions and bring in other big stakeholders to contribute their mite. Almost like a town senate."

"Albeit under a Dictator," Shizuma jibed.

"A Governor, if you please," her cousin said with a lift of the eyebrow. "But yes, you are getting the idea. The high barons will function as high magistrates of their lands more publicly than ever. This conference is chiefly intended to ensure those high magistrates see eye to eye. Part of this is to distance them from their old imperial culture, take note. An empire is supposed to think as one and therefore acts as one. This was why there were members of nearly every tribe in their late king's imperial armies."

She smiled, perhaps a little mischievously and went on: "But if we get them used to thinking and speaking of themselves blatantly as individual tribes in one shared province, we may break them of the old imperial attitude faster than we could through war. With the imperial attitude will go the imperial loyalties. This will make it harder than ever for reactionary powers to foment another rebellion for resurrecting the empire."

She let them murmur among themselves before continuing.

"We shall very likely have to settle grievances too between our many aristocrats. Even if I do want a sense of distinction cultivated between the tribes, I do not want outright animosity! You are not the only legate, Cousin, who has written to me this winter of squabbles between our local leaders. Toshi-han here even said there were squabbles between those of different territories?"

Toshi said this was true.

"The baron of Asella's saying the baron of Diomatrix has moved the territorial markers between their lands," he said to the roomful of officers. "To Asella's detriment."

It was Miyuki Rokujou who answered: "What does Diomatrix say?"

"Diomatrix's baron says he only did so to make it easier to defend his land," Toshi said. "The markers in dispute used to be on a plain. Diomatrix moved them to a stream. Since he'd allied with us earlier than Asella, he's saying it was his prerogative to look out for his people while their neighbour was still fighting for the empire."

"But Asella's allied with us too now, so why not move the markers back?"

"Because Asella allied with us only after the Battle of Terantrum, which was many months after Diomatrix had. Diomatrix's lord says his longer faithfulness to us deserves at least that small expansion of land as a reward."

"It grows more complicated," the senior legate interjected, "because Asella and Diomatrix belong to two different tribal peoples of the Mentulaeans."

"Septentrians," Shizuru corrected.

"My apologies, Septentrians. Asella is a Carsinian township whereas Diomatrix is an Aexellian one. They can't go to a higher-ranked aristocrat to adjudicate the grievance because their superiors are of two different tribes."

"In fact," Toshi summed up, "if the argument is allowed to go that high, it might even blow up into a conflict between the Carsinii and the Aexelli. There's a lot of tension between their subgroups right now because of what the Carsinii perceive as Aexellian celerity in profiting from their early betrayal of the old empire during the war."

"This sort of thing is natural when a country undergoes the shift we have caused," Shizuru sighed to her officers. "Septentria and its political structures are still being reshaped. To be precise, the superstructures are being reshaped. It is the foundations we are seeing in this squabble, the internecine tensions that have long existed between the former empire's tribal subgroups. I predict they shall come to the fore often in the conference, especially as we have just removed the higher power that used to suppress them."

"Exposed the antipathies between the tribes, you mean?"

"And grudges that we may have worsened in some ways," Shizuru responded with a slight smile. "Territory, I think, will be the chief concern for the conference. We need to settle all these squabbles this coming week! I also want eyes and ears open to look out for guests who seem tetchy. We do not yet know if all those we set as or allowed to remain lords are worthy. We may have to replace a few more of the local leaders."

Shizuma gave her cousin an ironic eye. "You wouldn't do it right at the conference, would you?"

"Of course not." The younger patrician smiled. "I shall have troops move near such a leader's hometown, though. A legate can give him the news when he returns from the conference."

"With the threat of five thousand pila glinting in the background."

"Obviously," the other replied. "If a baron is difficult during what are essentially peace talks, can you imagine how much worse he might be out of them?"

She inspected her cousin's preparations herself and found very little to change. She only ordered more of the local mead and hogs, besides augmenting the list of hired staff with over a hundred local entertainers.

"We want them properly feasted," she explained to Shizuma. "While these talks are serious, we cannot assault them with grimness all of the time. Let them have entertainments aplenty in between the actual assemblies. I am told it is normal for their aristocracy too to have theatrical entertainments and singers while they eat."

"Well enough," Shizuma responded. "But why would we need so many entertainers? A troupe or two of actors would have been enough, along with a small selection of bards."

"The rest are for Gorgo's inhabitants. Let us give them a little entertainment as well. That way, they shall all look deliriously happy when the delegates start arriving. It shall give our guests a more, er, positive view of the situation."

The senior legate rolled her eyes and went off muttering about her cousin's typical flamboyance. If that was what she wanted, then very well: Shizuma would arrange a festival for Gorgo's denizens. If her cousin fancied fanfare, she who had once tended a reputation as a degenerate could supply that!

Come the first day of the conference, her cousin was both pleased and disheartened. Every tribal subset of the former empire had sent representatives, which was cause for pleasure. What disheartened was the composition of some of the embassages.

The group from the Tasgetia, for instance, was depressingly thin. It did not have the Baron Marlus and had only two druids, neither of which was the Chief Druid Hiempnos. The delegations of the Arvetii too were mostly unimpressive, with one major city sending only an inconsequential magistrate of minor nobility instead of an actual member of the ruling clan. As the Arvetii were among the biggest tribal subsets of Septentria, the choice of delegate was significant. Fortunately, their also-powerful neighbours the Carsinii and Aexelli were better represented. However, Shizuru suspected this was also because those two tribes had axes to grind against each other.

Most of the other delegations were respectable. The peoples of the centre-the Senonae, the Movicae, and Aequani-were best represented, perhaps due to proximity: they sent their actual ruling barons or their right hands. Most of the others sent high-ranked magistrates belonging to the aristocracy.

Firens sent a single embassy because it was a unified kingdom as opposed to a tribal people owning several cities and adjacent territories. It was still a big delegation even so. Besides the Queen Azula and her supporters, no fewer than ten barons and baronesses also travelled from the kingdom just for the conference. These included the important lords Delior and Orgestes. Both had been sent with King Entei's apologies for his absence and yet another artefact-gift for his Himean patron. The two explained that the king was obliged to stay back home to repulse renewed Nervian assaults brought on by the onset of spring.

"Despite that, he managed to represent his kingdom better than some others here," Shizuru murmured to her cousin during the first feast of the conference. The two had initially been at different tables, but the seating arrangements had been discarded towards the later courses. This was when enough mead and wine had flowed to loosen up even the more rigid ambassadors. The dancers and actors had hit their stride and taken to playing shamelessly to their increasingly raucous audience. The local aristocracy apparently found it no disgrace to rise with food in one hand and pinch the entertainment playfully on the bottom with the other. The Himean officers, most from a social class that tended to rather more controlled dinner parties, shrugged their shoulders at their guests' antics. They occupied themselves instead with heading off any brawls before they could advance.

"Firens isn't really the problem we need to address with these conferences," Shizuma told her cousin, also speaking in Greek. "It's the others who need reining in."

"Try reining them in now," Shizuru chuckled as an Aequanian delegate started a drunken chorus by the Aexellian tables. The bards nearby took up the song, which Shizuru realised was a dirty one.

" You wanted a festival."

"Indeed, as it works for my purposes. You should be mingling with them, Shizuma! Get them to open up. The more at ease they are, the sooner we can get to their true sentiments. Not to mention their true grouches."

"Azula says some of them will be airing those grouches tomorrow."

Shizuru looked away from her guests and regarded Shizuma attentively.

"She says some delegates from the Gannian cities accosted her earlier," the silver-haired woman explained. "They wanted to know why the old tribe of the Mentulae isn't represented in the conference."

Shizuru dragged her eyes heavenward.

"There has been no tribe of the Mentulae for centuries," she said. "Obsidian's predecessors actually spread the old Mentulaean people so far across the empire-often seeding them in positions of authority over other peoples-that they ended up identifying themselves with other local tribal subsets. More so once their old subset became the identifier for the whole nation, which meant it lost much of its value as a subgroup's title. Most of the people who used to call themselves Mentulae in the old tribal sense have dubbed themselves part of the Senonae or Movicae or even the Ganni for generations."

"Nevertheless, she says the Ganni are insisting that there should have been at least some members of the old ruling dynasty present to represent it."

This time, Shizuru laughed softly.

"Every single lord with a blood link to Obsidian worth mentioning fought against us," she reminded. "The majority who survived the war were taken as captives, for obvious reasons. Do they want us to free them all of a sudden?"

"Azula says they might try to make a case for it-appealing to your clemency," her cousin answered.

"I am clement, not stupid," Shizuru responded. "I suppose they shall ask too about the royal wives and children whom we captured?"

"Of course."

"I do love how they have the audacity to raise the topic of Obsidian's surviving relatives when not a one of them even came here for their former king's funeral."

"As most of them still believe you had him killed," drawled Shizuma, "I think they weren't too keen on seeing your alleged handiwork so clearly."

"I wonder what they would say if I told them my suspicions about the assassin having been someone in Obsidian's closest circle. At any rate, I know how to deal with the question. Thank you for the warning, Cousin."

"Thank Queen Azula."

So when the Gannian embassy put the demand to her the next day, Shizuru had an answer ready for them.

"The old tribe of the Mentulae is already represented as it currently exists," she declared in the strong, clear voice she used for oration.

It carried beautifully in the large hall they were using. "When your previous rulers conquered your local tribes, they spread their bloodlines across yours. Many of you here are even descended from the original nobles of that tribe. Surely that should suffice, given that it reflects the state of your tribes these days."

When the Baron Aduatris of Tasgetia asked instead-with glances to the druids-about the surviving nobles related to Obsidian's line, Shizuru had an answer ready as well.

"Had those nobles been amenable to peace talks, they should indeed be here," she said.

"Unfortunately, as their actions during the war showed, they were not. Furthermore, by the rules of warfare, they are my captives. They shall walk in my triumph back in Hime after my governorship. This means you should not worry about their welfare for the moment, for they are housed in good comfort in Fuuka until then. After the triumph, they shall be returned to Septentria as well. You will have your kinsmen back in time, I assure you."

The baron subsided but one of the druids stood up to take his place.

"And what of their fiefdoms, Governor?" said the woman.

"What of them?" Shizuru responded, seeing but pretending to ignore the disquiet in some of the other embassages.

"You have granted many of the fiefs previously ruled by those captive nobles to other ones."

"I defeated them in war, so their fiefs were mine by conquest." Shizuru smiled at the druid, who did not smile back. "I was therefore at perfect liberty to treat those fiefs as I wished, including by granting several to others who promised to prove better partners in my governing enterprise. Those I gave away thus shall stay in the hands of their new rulers... at least, for as long as those rulers prove worthy of the gifts."

The dark expressions lessened on several faces after this assurance, but seemed to grow on a few others. Most of the displeasure was from the tribes who had seceded later from the empire. Since Shizuru had given most of the newly-freed territories to those who had allied with her earlier, the rest now tended sour grapes over their own lack of reward.

Shizuru turned slightly on her curule chair: just enough so that it was clear to all that she was facing and addressing the Gannian delegates in particular.

"Do not forget," Shizuru said, "that I technically defeated your people in war too. I simply allowed you-and by this I mean the druids as well!-to keep your fiefs because I thought you might prove worthy governing partners over time. So perhaps you should prove yourself worthy of that trust first instead of worrying about how I have dispensed with conquered properties."

She moved slightly again to encompass all the rows of seated delegates. She let her smile vanish and felt more than saw the resultant stiffening. The Gannian druid bowed and sat again quickly.

"These are conferences held in a spirit of peace, my good magistrates and druids," she said to them. "But do not imagine that my wish for concord overrides either my memory or my steel. I remember which of you did or did not fight against me. And, at the end of the day, I am still your conqueror. I defeated the very best and greatest of your armies! Yet because of my clemency, you have not been sacked and not been sold to slavery. Because of my reason, you have kept your duties as well as your privileges and properties. All you have today, you have by my grace! As your governor, I am still the ultimate word on everything. And I am not above using my armies to enforce decisions should it ever prove necessary."

"She expects them to 'open up' after that?" Shizuma muttered to her best friend as she prepared to take over for her cousin. "The rascal has them all on edge again. Each one looks as though he just took a poker up the podex!"

Miyuki Rokujou smirked. "They'll loosen up once more come the mealtime."

"After which she shall go and give them another fright, I wager."

"It won't be necessary," said her friend. "I think they'll mind themselves a little better after the reminder your cousin just gave them."

Miyuki was proven correct. The rest of the conference proceeded with fewer questions about Shizuru's post-war decisions, although there were squabbles aplenty among the delegates themselves over those decisions' consequences. Still, the talks ran well enough for the Himean governor to deem them a success. They would definitely be repeated for as long as she had tenure of Septentria Province.

On the fourth day of the conference Shizuru retired early from the evening feast. She left the delegates and festivities under her cousin's supervision. It was to her quarters that she herself went, seeking her lover. She found the princess at their bedroom balcony, enjoying the breezes of eventide. Shizuru thought her a delightful sight, dark hair up to show her neck and her slim young body sheathed in a dress of blue and white. Two bracelets Shizuru had given her were on her wrists: wide bands of vermeil with lapis lazuli badges smoothed to reflective polish. They reinforced her already-strong air of royalty.

Shizuru joined her at the railing, leaning both elbows on it.

"Enjoy looking down on people, Princess?" she teased.

"I ask that of you, Senator, given your height."

"Indeed. What has you so riveted by the view, though?"

Natsuki shook her head as if to say it was nothing.

"How was your conference today, Shizuru?" she asked later while turning to look at her companion. The latter noted a smile in the green eyes: the polemarch had noticed the rings on Shizuru's fingers. Save for the senatorial one, all had been her gifts. Even the signet ring Shizuru now used regularly was from her.

"It was good, I think," Shizuru started. "We settled a few more disputes between barons. No one ended up perfectly satisfied, which tells you the judgements were just."

"Or that you are very cautious."

"We have long established that. What the past days suggest is that you can be too."

Natsuki frowned: "Why?"

Shizuru regarded her with indulgent eyes.

"Come now," she said. "Surely you did not think I failed to notice those troopers hovering near me ever since the conference started? I simply did not comment on it until now because I wanted to give you time to tell me yourself. I appreciate the thought, but you should know that I am never unaware of my surroundings. Even should some fool think to threaten me in a city I fully control, I could defend myself."

A moment's silence from her companion, whose gaze had fallen to the floor.

"You wish me to remove the escorts?" Natsuki asked.

"I do not." Startled green eyes stared into hers. "I understand it makes you feel better, so it is fine... provided they remain unobtrusive. In the future, I would prefer that you told me first, though, mea vita. It troubles me not to be so watched over, but I like to think you could tell me all of your own concerns first."

There was a long and gentle kiss to her neck. Shizuru smiled and closed her eyes, although she did warn that she might be sweaty: the feasting hall had been warm. Natsuki ended the kiss with a nuzzle.

"I like your sweat," the Otomeian said in honest innocence.

Shizuru opened her eyes again and stared.

"I wish you would wait for me to take a bath before you say things like that," she said in a voice full of persecution. "I actually came up early just to talk, you know, though you may not believe it."

The younger woman looked puzzled before suddenly laughing.

"Later," she promised Shizuru with a rosy grin. "We can talk for now."

Shizuru surveyed her lover again with enjoyment. Natsuki prodded her into speech by asking if she had found any potential troublemakers yet among the hosted ladies and lords.

"Perhaps a few," Shizuru admitted. "Some of them tend to glower quite a bit when they think we are not watching them."

A sly peek from one green eye: "Are you ever not watching them?"

"Perhaps when they have to heed the call of nature," came the laugh.

"What will you do?"

"Nothing." She grinned at Natsuki's puzzlement. "I cannot really do anything until they make trouble, can I? It makes little difference, though. I doubt I shall have to wait that long after the conference is over. Perhaps a week after it, we shall see the first troubles, maybe even insurrections."

Her lover fixed her with a look of concern.

"But you said..." Natsuki said haltingly. "You said your conference goes well."

"That I did. And it does, truly."

"Still you expect trouble soon after?"

Shizuru nodded and looked undisturbed by her own prediction.

"The fact is," she told her companion, "that a peaceable province is unlikely to be a reality so soon. The only way I could ensure zero chance of trouble after the war was to literally denude the land of its people. I could do it, is the truth. Were I to have no other choice, I would do it without hesitation. But..."

Natsuki's hand found hers.

"But there are other choices?" Natsuki ventured.

"Fortunately, yes," Shizuru smiled at her lover. "It would be horrid were it otherwise. Do you realise, Natsuki, how many have already died at my hands in Septentria alone? Perhaps two hundred thousand, with even more sold into slavery far from home. That includes maybe fifty thousand children who shall never know the land of their ancestors. To fully put down all chance of trouble in Septentria's immediate future, I would have to multiply all those numbers by a factor of four, if not five, for such is the size of this land. Of deaths alone I would need nearly a million, all so I could spend the rest of my governorship in a quiet province."

She saw the girl blink rapidly at this merciless accounting.

"And it would be quiet then," she continued, "if not haunted in its silence. But the sad truth is that even then it would not last forever."

Natsuki's hand squeezed hers but the girl held off replying just yet.

"Eventually," Shizuru said, "that unsparing massacre would probably return to bite Hime. Not me, for there would be another governor of the province by then. Yet what matters it to me that it would be someone else's problem by then, the seed of wrath I planted during my tenure? For I would remember that I planted that seed. I would know I slew a million without giving them a chance first, without exhausting clemency and reason before I took to slaughter."

She smiled when the hand left hers in favour of her face as she concluded: "I believe I would not enjoy that knowledge very much, even in my later years. Better to know I did what I could to spare that cruelty first, even if it proved the harder road."

The woman chafing her cheek looked at her with something like awe.

"If those fools down there knew their luck," she said, "they would know not to try you."

"I think they would have thought it luckier not to have fought a war at all," Shizuru joked.

"It would have come, with or without you," was Natsuki's bald snort. "You know this, Shizuru."

The Himean lifted her stroking hand and kissed it: "So I do, my smart girl."

"When I suggested them lucky it was because it was you they fought," Natsuki explained. "You ended the war fast enough that they did not suffer as much as they could have. And after it you treated them well, so again they suffered not much." She shook her head. "Now you tell me some of them will waste the chance you grant?"

"I fear I think so."

"It is so one wonders at people!"

Shizuru laughed at her lover's vexation.

"They do often cause such wonder," she said, feeling the knots in her back start to loosen in spite of their topic. Natsuki's presence was relaxing her. "Yet people sometimes cause surprise too, do they not? They might prove me wrong yet in this matter."

Another snort. "You are not proven wrong often, Shizuru."

That brought on another laugh. Oh, thank all the gods for this woman! No matter how weary Shizuru ever got, her lover always lightened her mind and body again. Natsuki was a gift straight from the immortals, most especially Fortuna. A gift she had been obliged to be away from for too much of the day. She kissed her in apology for it.

"Well, we shall see what we shall see, Darling," she said, leading her lover back into their room. The Otomeian followed her with willingness. "The weeks after the conference shall be the trial. For now, however, let us forget about these petty lordlings! I have had quite enough of them for the past few days. Tell me about your day instead, Honoured Polemarch. What of your business or pleasures did you get done?"

Chapter 78

Vocabulaire:

1. Contubernalis - This is an army cadet, normally aged 17. Here, it typically refers to a cadet from a senatorial or upper class family. Cadets of senatorial blood were often requested by relatives or friends of the family who were military officers. This kept the youths safely looked after in their first experience of war. They rarely entered battle, being used mostly as bureaucratic staff.

2. Keigo Onishi - A character in the story. For more on his history and trial, see the latter half of Chapter 76 . A synopsis: At the end of Onishi's consulship he was appointed to put down the Sicilian Servile Revolt. While he was in the middle of doing that, the Senate took the command off him and granted it to Dai Yoshida (the junior consul the year after Onishi's term). Onishi followed the Senate's decree but also disbanded his army, destroyed his own camp, and denied Yoshida his resources before returning to Hime, in retaliation for Yoshida's attempt to steal his laurels. The thwarted Yoshida prosecuted him for treason afterwards.

3. Knights - Also called the equestrians (E.) or equites (L.), these are the members of the Ordo Equester, the plutocrats of Ancient Roman society. The knightly and senatorial families were often related, with the former choosing business careers instead of political ones.

4. Latifundia (pl. L.) - Singular latifundium ; a great estate often used for agricultural purposes.

5. New men / new man - A parvenu, what one would call someone just newly ascended to the higher social classes. The Latin term is properly "novus homo", and has a pejorative sense to it because of the Ancient Roman esteem for august ancestors.

6. Tribunes - Most of the tribunes being referred to as part of Shizuru's army are military tribunes . They are usually youths of senatorial family who have not yet entered the Senate themselves, often in their twenties.

7. NOTE on servile revolts - There is ever a temptation to see past events through a modern lens. Many tend to imagine that slave rebellions in Ancient Rome (the Servile Wars) were wars against slavery itself, partly thanks to Hollywood's usual spin on the story. In actual truth, we have no historical data to prove that those revolts were fuelled by modern emancipatory rhetoric. There may even have been more pillaging and killing than actual unfettering going on. The servile rebels killed other slaves too.

8. NOTE on the Otomeian polemarch's role in promotions - Some of it may be gleaned below, but more information can be found in Chapter 73 . Hit Ctrl+F and search for "Before the creation".

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Shizuru's prediction was a week off. The first insurrection took place more than a fortnight after the Septentrian Conference. While the report of it did draw a frown from her, it initially got little more. The incident was confined to a single city and not a very important one either. It was also in the deep south and fenced by Firens and some of Hime's very first Septentrian allies. Therefore, unworthy of much alarm.

What later heightened Shizuru's concern in the incident came to her attention through the gossip grapevine. Something of an irony, perhaps: she had the news of the insurrection first of everyone in the capital, thanks to the legate dealing with the incident. That was Seigo Ushida, assigned to the southwest territories among the peoples of the Roscii, Trocarii, and Padurci.

A military man of significant competence, Seigo sent her a speedy courier the moment the city rebelled and another after he began siege. Shizuru read through his messages and decided to leave the matter in his hands. She was still engaged in more demanding tasks, specifically ones that would knit up a new structure for Hime's latest provincial possession. Her legates had to be capable of solving minor problems by themselves if she was going to get her true work done on schedule.

For six days she held to her resolution and gave the defiant city of Durigala no more thought. Then six days after Seigo's missives, the regular couriers delivered letters from his army to the capital. While these bundles naturally included messages of a military nature, there were also private letters among them.

Literate Himeans loved to write. One of the most popular hobbies for the upper class was in fact simple correspondence. Even those among the common people who could write often did-and given Shizuru Fujino's insistence on her troops being taught their letters, that meant a lot of her rankers wrote as well.

So various members of Shizuru's army were constantly sending out and receiving dispatches. They wrote to people back home, naturally, but also wrote to fellows in other camps. The Septentrian Province was so large that months could pass before friends stationed in different regions met again. This was why people in one part of the army were always writing to and getting letters from people in another part of it.

Shizuru herself got an update from Seigo Ushida with the regular mail. It told her that he was making good progress and would break Durigala very soon. Such was his ability that the impression was shared by most of his officers. At least, Shizuru gleaned as much from the members of her staff who corresponded with members of his.

She also gleaned, however, that there was a detail in her legate's account that did not match up with his underlings' narratives. She discovered this while listening to two of her own subordinates chatting in headquarters, two days after the mail's arrival.

"What did you bet on the pot for how long before Durigala falls?" one tribune asked the other. It was common for the officers to gamble among themselves on topics like the length of time a town could last after it had been invested. "I put it down for twenty-five days myself.

Now I'm thinking I should've bet lower."

"I bet just a day earlier than you did," the other tribune answered. "Why do you want to change your bet, though?"

"I got a letter from Ryuichi," was the reply. "He says Ushida-san already got them on their knees only a few days in. He's also sent for the hostages we got from that city. He'll get them shouting for surrender soon, I tell you."

"He might not be able to break them that easily."

"I think he will. Ryuichi says Ushida-san's keen on making an example of Durigala's town leaders, which means the siege will have tightened up even more since we last heard of it."

"Well and why shouldn't he make an example of them?" came the response. "These barbarians need to learn that they can't just break treaties whenever it suits them!"

True, though it hardly encourages their fidelity to call them "barbarians", thought their leader, still eavesdropping as she finished off a letter on a wax tablet. Afterwards, she smacked the back of her hand on it so that her signet ring struck the wax and left an impression. She handed the tablet to a waiting clerk.

The two tribunes were still chatting in low voices to each other.

"Of course these barbarians need to be taught a lesson!" one of them said. "But it's not the breaking of the treaty that has Ushida-san so irate, Ryuichi said. It's that they had their heralds shout out insults against him when he had his own heralds call them to surrender."

"Oh, that!" the other tribune said with a short laugh. "Miyumi wrote to me about that too. Said Ushida-san was hopping mad! Don't know what could've possessed the Durigalans to carry out such an affront. Even if they say they've been mistreated badly, that's no way to secure a future in case your standoff fails, right?"

"Well, Ryuichi said it was done just to spite Ushida-san," was the sigh. "They were angry with him themselves for his recent treatment."

Claimed it was why they rebelled in the first place."

"Still, it's not smart to antagonise the opponent when you're the clear underdog in the game."

This was when their listening commander saw fit to interrupt them.

"Pardon," she interjected, calling their names. "I could not help but overhear your dialogue."

The two stopped setting up their desks and stood perkily to attention. Most of the tribunes vied with each other to be noticed by their awesome general. Competition to get assigned to her staff was already rough, so those who actually won a place were enthusiastic about seeing to her needs. That included filling her in on the latest army gossip if she desired it.

"You said that the Durigalans rebelled out of dissatisfaction with recent treatment," their commander said. "From whom did you get that information, precisely?"

The two exchanged looks and revealed their sources.

"Ryuichi Yoshida and Miyumi Takashi, Fujino-san," they said. "They're tribuning for Ushida-san."

"Both of them said it was the reason for the rebellion?"

"They claimed so, Fujino-san."

She looked thoughtful.

"Could you tell me exactly what they said?" she asked the two pre-senatorials, both of whom were in fact a scant two years younger than her. They obliged her in that as well as her next request, which was to send her way any other tribune or officer who had just received a letter from Seigo Ushida's army. There were a few more of these and she questioned each one as he reported to her desk. After talking to the sixth such person, she switched to riding togs and had her cousin take over.

"I am riding to Durigala," she told the woman. "If I get everything done quickly I shall return around the middle of next month. Would you try to keep up what I have been doing, Shizuma? My staff will help yours find their places and Aisuka-han can tell you everything to do with my schedule."

There was a short pause as she seemed to recall something and though it worthy of a remark: "Keep an eye on the aristocrats some of the tribes left behind here after the conference, by the way. I do not want them getting up to trouble in my absence."

"Very well. What of petitioners you are supposed to meet? Shall I see to them for you or push back the meetings?"

"If you think you can see to them, do so. If not, push back the appointment. I trust your judgement, so do as you will."

"How cavalier! You know several are claiming knowledge of some insidious plot against us, right?"

Shizuru's face took on a wry look.

"I also know those plots are claimed to be by their enemies," she said. "In most cases fellow lords whose territories are conveniently next to the informant's. Old imperial politics in a new Himean province, Cousin. They are trying it out on the new regime to see if they can profit from working on our paranoia."

"I shall set them straight, never fear."

"Good, you can hold down the fort for me." A heavy sigh as she came to what she would miss most. "Look after her too, of course."

"Did not need to be said." Her older cousin eyed her critically. "Why do you need to go to Durigala yourself, Shizuru? Seigo-san can surely manage the rebels well enough for you. If it has to do with the gossip that the Durigalans rebelled out of mistreatment, what difference should it make now? The ram has touched the wall. Surely you wouldn't reprieve the city's leaders, especially as they've actually assaulted legionaries in their rebellion?"

"Of course not," Shizuru answered. "But I do need to scrutinise the rumour. You are not the only one who shall be setting people straight shortly."

She set out from the capital with a small army of cavalry. Some tribunes and legionaries-the best riders of their legion-served as the Himean complement of her guard. The rest were all Otomeians of the Lupine Division. There were a hundred of these and they had been handpicked for the mission by their polemarch. If Natsuki had been permitted her true preference she would have demanded that her lover bring the whole division along. As Shizuru wanted to travel quickly, however, she made do with sending just a tenth of the whole.

As well this was so, because they travelled faster with fewer animals and riders to consider. Their progress was a smooth one, for the rebellion at Durigala was truly isolated. The rest of the former empire was quietly trying to settle itself into the world's new rhythm. This meant no armies impeded Shizuru's journey on roads that her own legions had built. Nor were there bandits to reckon with, as these were often made up of deserters to the imperial troops. Like their former comrades who had stayed in the service, these had long since learned to leave anything in a Himean mail shirt and helmet alone. Especially when accompanied by blonde giants on horseback!

When Shizuru reached Durigala, the siege had already finished. Seigo had broken the city in the second week of besieging it. He told her how it had all worked out as they toured the walls.

"They couldn't have lasted long from the start," Seigo explained as they walked on the battlements. He was especially voluble because he was pleased with the siege's quick resolution. "They hadn't really planned for a siege when they rebelled. It was all done on impulse! So they didn't even get to hoard food in advance. That's how I knew I could break them in just two weeks. All it took was to let them starve a little. The hostages I sent for never even made it here before it was over!"

"Where are those hostages now?" she asked, which he had not expected to be her first inquiry.

"Still on the road, I suppose," he answered. "I'll send a missive to have them conducted back to where they were being housed."

"You might have done that as soon as the siege was concluded," she said, but lightly enough so that it did not sound too much like a rebuke. "That would have spared them the discomfort of further and unnecessary travel."

He stared at her with a look of astonishment. Who cared about Mentulaean hostages' comfort in such a situation?

"It slipped my mind," he admitted without regret. "I'll get to it right after this. Anyway, after the Durigalans surrendered, I had to separate all those instrumental to the rebellion from those who had been mere sheep following orders. That way I could be sure of avoiding any more rebellious shepherds. All the magistrates of the city were replaced. I also got my replacements from lesser aristocratic families. Family loyalty made the old leading families suspect, I thought."

She nodded, which he took to mean he should continue.

"The rebel leaders I took captive," he said. "I sent them all under guard to the Atinu Camp. They went with hostages I got from the new leaders installed in Durigala. As for the townsfolk, I kept in mind what you told me in your missive: that unless I could prove they'd all participated in the rebellion from the start, you'd want most of them spared but still taught the lesson. So I took all those of fighting age and did a decimation."

That got a lift of the eyebrow from her. Decimation was one of the punishments the Himean army used on its own members: typically for cases of either mutiny or desertion. A large group of offenders would be sorted into groups of ten or dectets. Each dectet would perform a lottery wherein one offender's name would be drawn out of the ten. That offender would then be executed by the other nine, often by being clubbed to death.

It was a horrible way to die, but also a horrible way to live. One remembered one's executed comrades and the way their bones and skulls felt under the clubs. No one truly "escaped" a decimation in that sense. It was why it was reserved for the worst military crimes that could be committed. Shizuru herself had never found occasion to order one.

"You have been thorough," Shizuru said to her legate.

"I thought you'd like things settled cleanly," he said with an attractive smile: it displayed his teeth, which looked bright against his naturally honey skin. "It was just a trifling incident anyway. We've no casualties except the few soldiers they managed to rough up a little before shutting themselves up in their walls. You didn't need to come here for yourself, Fujino-san."

But his commander was on the crusty side, it seemed, for she responded to that with a cool remark about being the judge of her own needs.

"So now several hundred Durigalans are dead, battered to death by their own," she summed up. "Their former leading nobles and city magistrates have all been sent away in manacles. Another treaty has been struck with new head aristocrats, who have yielded us even more hostages."

He asked if she had any complaints about his performance.

"Only the fact that an insurrection happened in the first place," she decided.

"That's... not really something you can lay at my feet, General," he replied, baffled. "I didn't put it in their heads to make a stand that required me to besiege them."

She kept on walking, leading them to a stretch of wall that was unmanned. There she stopped and looked down at Durigala outside the walls. Nearly all of the structures there had been torn down or damaged during Seigo's siege of the place. She surveyed the wreckage clinically.

"You may not have put the idea of it in their heads," she said. "But you have contributed to the issues that made the idea possible. Did you really ransack the locals' houses under argument of seeking hidden weaponry?"

Seigo's soft brown eyes went large at the question. There was no alarm accompanying his astonishment, however: he knew his actions were still defensible.

"I received tips in each case," he told her in a voice oozing with sincerity. It did not fool Shizuru, who had once been a courtroom advocate and had therefore cross-examined dozens of witnesses and defendants already. Forensic experience had taught her that the guiltiest perjurers oozed sincerity.

"They said," Seigo argued, "that all those Durigalans I raided were holding secret caches of weaponry on their properties. Given our policy of local disarmament, I had to act on that intelligence."

"Our policy of local disarmament only applies to caches significant enough to present a threat," she replied to that excuse. "Not a measly pair of sword-and-shield sets or a clutch of daggers that look more like kitchen knives. Our policy with informants is also to act with circumspection. Not to trust every snitch who comes whispering in our ears. And most especially not to trust those who have been proven wrong before, as some of your informants seem to have been given the scantiness of the weapon caches your raids have actually discovered."

He seemed to have diminished slightly, she thought after this. She knew he was drawing himself in and preparing defences. He was obviously wondering how she could have known about the details she had just given, considering her recent arrival.

The truth was that she had only delayed her appearance at his camp: she had in fact reached the area earlier. His own lookouts had found her but got orders not to report her advent. She had also charged them with fetching several of the centurions she trusted most in Seigo's legion. These had ridden out covertly to meet her squadron and had been put through a careful debriefing. They were not her first sources of direct information, however.

Before going to Durigala, she had stopped by another city on the way. It was ruled by one of the high barons of the tribal subgroup called the Trocarii, to whom the Durigalans belonged. The man had been shocked to find his new Governor-Conqueror suddenly on his doorstep, but had been wholehearted in accommodating her requests. That included relating to her the Durigalans' call for assistance in reducing the raids conducted on their homes and warehouses.

"I actually did petition Legate Ushida, Governor," said the Trocarian baron to Shizuru during their talk. He was anxious that she should believe him, for he had a sharp fear of her and her army. "As I understood from our recent conference at the capital, the legate was our administrator in this region. Hence it was him we approached. I didn't bring it up at the capital because I thought it really was for security purposes. Even when we talked to the legate he told us he had no choice but to conduct the raids, as he'd received intelligence claiming the affected properties to be holding contraband war materiel. I didn't really know what more to do after that. I was afraid I'd be accused of rebellion myself if I tried to take the matter further. And I would never rebel!"

"You acted rightly," Shizuru soothed the baron. "Did the legate tell you from whom the intelligence was coming?"

"No, Governor, although I did ask. He said he had to protect his informants."

"I see. And what do you think of the owners of the searched properties? I am trusting you now to give me an honest opinion, Baron, so please be truthful. Do most of them strike you as the type to be holding on to significant amounts of contraband?"

"Some might be, Governor," he said after a long pause to think it over. "But I wouldn't say most. A few of the properties raided were actually owned by some of the most peaceable of our local aristocrats. At least, that's what I would think. I couldn't say for certain, I'm afraid."

She thanked him for his candour.

"Please avoid mentioning this interview with me to others," she told him. "As Legate Ushida himself said, one does need to protect one's sources. I do not think he would be too fond of you if he learned of this meeting. Do you understand me?"

The baron agreed passionately and promised to hold his tongue. Before Shizuru left his city, he also brought her a few of his own people who had experienced the searches themselves. Several were affluent natives with businesses that would prosper under Shizuru's plans for the province. This meant they had greater interest in seeing the country peaceful than in fomenting further resistance to Hime.

She thought of that now as she spoke with her legate, who explained his actions.

"I'll grant my informants haven't always been on the spot," he said. "But I believed it safer to search instead of doing nothing, Fujino-san. If I wasn't lucky enough in the searches to find the caches, I had to take what weapons I did find anyway, or risk looking like I was persecuting the natives for nothing. I had to act on the intelligence I received! We didn't always find the arms, yes, but it's not easy finding things others intend to keep hidden."

"It might have helped had you known what you were actually searching for," came her response. "I think your people got arms confused with art. Why do I hear that some of the searched houses had items of value missing subsequent to the events?"

Her fellow senator was indignant and professed his innocence.

"If they're claiming we took them, it's all lies," he told his commander. "They probably just couldn't find all their things where they used to be after we did our searches. Though it may not seem like it now, Fujino-san, I turned each place upside down during investigation. If we left a mess they had to clean up afterwards, what of it? That was their problem to deal with, as are any missing artworks they say we could've taken. The savages probably just misplaced them themselves! Or worse, they could've hidden them away and blamed it on us out of revenge."

"Indeed?" she said. "I would suggest you stop giving them cause for revenge then."

He looked confused. "Do you mean I should stop all security searches?"

Her response was prefaced by a look that communicated the subtlest bite of contempt.

"It does not entertain me," she informed him, "when people are deliberately obtuse. I mean that you should exercise greater discretion in which information you act on. I learned you have conducted dozens of searches by now, yet only discovered a handful of contraband for all that effort. This suggests you have been wasting not only your own time but that of my legionaries, who could be doing more constructive work than terrorising mostly innocent people."

"I think," he hazarded, smarting enormously from her words, "that Durigala's revolt just showed they aren't 'mostly innocent people', Fujino-san."

"So you believe most of the townsfolk had truly been hoarding secret caches of weaponry?"

"Yes, as you can see from the amount of weaponry we gathered after the siege was over!"

" Non sequitur. That does not prove most of them actually contributed to those arms. For all you know, the entire hoard could have come from just a single Durigalan who shared it out during their standoff. Even were we to assume that most of the Durigalans had participated in the concealment of weapons, that would still not say they had always intended on using them against us. Nor would it say that most individual Durigalans held arms in sizeable enough caches for them to be considered contraband. Do you know the only thing that the hoard you collected actually says? That you have been vastly ineffectual at unearthing hidden weapons in the area."

He bit his tongue to avoid retorting to this fresh reprimand. What could he even say to that face anyway? How unfriendly she could look, for all of her celebrated beauty! Had she been some lesser senator he might have dared to challenge her for the admonishment, but she was a patrician like him... only with much better blood. And blood mattered a great deal.

"When you wrote to me about the rebellion," she went on, "you told me it was simply out of the typical unrest when a new regime and an inability to accept change. What everyone else has been saying, however, is that the Durigalans rebelled because of what they perceived as mistreatment. And whether or not you spirited away the items said to be missing, you appear to have indeed mistreated the persons themselves."

He tried to protest that he had not actually harmed anybody during his searches but was waved off for his pains.

"Turning over someone's house violently is harming them!" she bit back. "You cannot ransack quiet peoples' properties on the say-so of every informant who dins in your ear! This is not how we do things in my province. We maintain equipoise between confidence and paranoia. We do not strike up treaties of peace and friendship, then proceed to walk all over the self-same treaties ourselves."

She exhaled wearily and lifted the queue of hair from her nape. The back of her neck was sweaty from the summer heat, and she found herself eager to conclude this conversation so she could wash her face. Seigo too looked to be sweating, although she was uncertain how much of that was due to the weather instead of her.

"It is true they are people we have conquered," she said to him. "But now, they are also subjects of our great Republic. Contrary to most of our fellow senators' interpretation of that status, it does not mean we have the right to rape them and their land at will. It means they are also under our protection, even if they are under our authority."

She bored her gaze into his, wondering how much of this was truly sinking in. He was listening to her, that much was obvious, but that was because every bone in his body was shrieking alarm at the peril her eyes were communicating. Could lessons like this truly be learned in fear, she wondered, and was annoyed anew by the fact that she even had to act the schoolmaster.

"Do not embitter people we must bring into the Himean provincial fold gently, if firmly. Perhaps you are right and they have been hoarding arms with intent of using them against us. Perhaps you are even right in claiming they accuse you of stealing valuables out of vengeance."

In spite of those allowances, her next words were stern: "Even then you would have inconvenienced my governorship, and I will not have that. I would have no choice save to assign you to other duties that would divorce you from the army."

She paused to let that sink in, knowing he would despise the idea. Seigo was not a man who did as well behind a desk as he did in a command tent.

"Perhaps," she enlarged, "you would become a sort of logistics legate based in Argus or Sosia, seeing to the brass tacks of the troops far away from the actual field. Neither of us would enjoy that very much as it would preclude opportunity to use your best talents. Yet it would be necessary because my plans for a settled province do not admit the sort of unrest you seem to have elicited."

The dread on his face said everything. She finished in a milder voice than before.

"I gave you command over this place to ensure its peacefulness, Seigo-han," she told him. "You managed the siege of Durigala efficiently, and that does please me. But as I said from the beginning, I would rather there had never been a need for siege at all. Keep in mind our dialogue today whenever another of your 'informants' comes again. I want no more indiscriminate raids. Otherwise, you and I shall have even more words, and they shall conclude far more unpleasantly than they will now."

And that would have to be that, she thought on her way back to the capital. She would allow him to retain command of the Seventh because he did command it effectively. But any more errors like the raids on the Trocarii and he would truly find himself relegated to a clerk's desk. What was the matter with the man that he had thought it permissible to pillage the locals under such flimsy pretences? Those people were members of a Himean province now! Many had even allied with her before Terantrum.

The trouble with her fellow senators, she decided, was that they were not very educable when it came to regard for provincials and foreigners. The provinces were just there to be milked, not tended and made fruitful; the people in them were pawns for senatorial pleasures. Just think of Hispania Citerior and Sumio Fujimoto! And perhaps ninety percent of the provincial governors they sent out from the Senate each year!

Her legate probably did not even understand how much trouble he had caused her. She would have to orchestrate a formal trial for the Durigalan leaders, especially as they were already operating on the assumption that peace was the norm now. The outcome of the trial was inevitable, of course. They had broken a peace treaty and tried to kill legionaries and nothing could change those facts. But what a farce to have to condemn people who had been helped into their crimes by her own legate!

By the time she returned to Gorgo, she had made a decision: Seigo Ushida would not be asked to stay on next year. What a pity that the man could general! He was truly competent in that arena, so she had thought he would at least exercise more caution than he had in his attempts at self-enrichment. Indeed, he had seemed to control himself quite well before this. But she could not spare time to keep an eye on him for the remainder of her governorship. A little corruption she could have forgiven, but not the sort that led to cities rebelling. Her fellow patrician would learn that soon.

Her cousin greeted her return with more upsetting news, though not for Septentria. Their senatorial colleague, the respected consular Keigo Onishi, had been convicted at his trial.

"Can you credit it?" Shizuma scoffed, only of casual acquaintance with the man herself yet outraged by his fate. "The worst of it was the sentence the court pronounced. They did not stop at fining him his fortune and thereby stripping his poor children of their inheritance. They actually stripped him too of citizenship and exiled him from Hime and Fuuka! To what depths have we devolved when even our most promising members are booted out of the land? He nearly concluded the war in Sicilia had it not been for the Senate's meddling-and here is his reward."

"Ye gods," Shizuru breathed as she fell into her chair and looked stunned. "I had not thought the court would actually go that far."

"Believe it! Onishi-san apparently quit Hime for Smyrna the moment his trial was over. His brood saw him off and people say it was tear-jerking. His youngest is only five."

Shizuru shook her head. "So are Onishi-han's children now to be beggars and orphans just because one incompetent wanted to blame his failings on their father?"

"Not exactly, for their father's wits extended to providing for that, thank goodness."

Upon Keigo Onishi's return from Sicilia, he had apparently moved all the clan assets out of his ownership. A truly able if understated man, he had cherished no illusions of getting away scot-free with his vengeance. He had upset Dai Yoshida's plans so badly that he fully expected retribution upon his return. And as he had not tried to conceal what he had done-how satisfying to have punished Yoshida so blatantly, though!-they could triumph if they brought him to trial.

Thus knowing his position vulnerable, he had chosen to secure his children's futures instead of his own. Even in the middle of his prosecution, Keigo Onishi had already been a pauper: this was because everything he could give away had already been legally transferred to his offspring.

So while the Yoshida clan did succeed in exiling their enemy, they failed nonetheless to confiscate his fortune for the State. In effect, they left his brood with the means to continue the Onishi family's future. The children were devastated by their father's exile, but had inherited much of his strength. The two adolescents had already taken public vows of revenge against Dai Yoshida. The youngest, the only daughter, was too small yet to know exactly what had happened. All she understood was that she no longer had a tata.

"I got the news from their late mother's friend, who is a relation of our own mothers," Shizuma told her cousin. "Chikao Shimizu-san, to be exact. Do you know him?"

"A little, but go on."

"He wrote to ask if we could take on another contubernalis, even if the war does seem to be over. At least the eldest of Onishi-san's children can start his career properly if we do, although he would already be past the proper age. He was supposed to have volunteered for one of the other governors-or even Chikane's naval campaign!-last year, but his father's troubles engaged their family at the time. The lad is already late by a year, Shizuru, and it would be a shame to make him wait another. Shimizu-san says he has much of his father in him."

"Of course we can take him on," Shizuru said feelingly. "Send a letter for him as soon as you can, Cousin. Unless you already have?"

"I already have."

"Excellent. I think my staff is full right now, but I can make space for him if you do not want him seconded to duties with you yourself."

"Oh, I'll accommodate the boy. It's a disgrace that the House allowed this to happen to their father. What are the others about that they couldn't stop it? What about the Princes?"

"It was not for want of trying, I wager," Shizuru answered. "The problem is that the Yoshida are a powerful clan with a lot of powerful allies right now. Especially among the knights in the city, who make up the juries in our courtrooms. And you know how reliable knight juries are!"

"Bribeable down to the last man," her older cousin sneered. "Damn them all! You're right, the Yoshida would've bought every one of the jury members. Onishi-san's own knightly support is in the provinces, and so would have been slower to act. Gods, but I feel for the man."

"A gross miscarriage of justice," her young cousin nodded, before asking what had become of Dai Yoshida himself.

"Did your correspondents say anything on how he has been doing in Sicilia?" she asked.

"He's no longer in Sicilia," Shizuma said with an acrimonious smile. "The Senate replaced him too after he lost yet another engagement. Even with all their clout, the Yoshida couldn't possibly have kept the commission for him after four straight losses! Serves the fool right, I tell you, even if I want those wretched slave rebels done in already. Do you know what they've done over there with the farm workers Onishi-san installed in the latifundia he repaired? They've abducted them and turned them - not into more servile rebel warriors! - but into slaves for themselves! Only their idea of slavery is not very Himean. They reportedly keep them chained at all times, as though they were wild dogs."

"That island is a madhouse," Shizuru scowled. "Whom has the Senate sent to replace Dai Yoshida over there, then?"

"Ah, the only possible good bit in this battery of bad news. They sent this year's junior consul, which they probably thought a deft touch of irony. Yoshida was also a junior consul when he stole the command from right under Keigo Onishi, after all."

To her surprise, that news seemed to please Shizuru very much. Shizuma could also read her cousin well enough to know that whatever about it pleased her, it was not actually to do with the fate of Sicilia and its servile war.

"So Nana Fujimoto's husband is away from Hime for the rest of year, eh?" the younger woman mused aloud, which had Shizuma sniggering uncontrollably into a hand. "Hm? Why do you laugh?"

The other woman shook her silver head and continued to chuckle.

"It's just," she said in a strained voice, "that sounded more like something I would say. Why the interest in Nana Fujimoto and her husband being away? Should I tell Natsuki about this?"

Her cousin rolled red eyes but grinned back.

"Do not get me in trouble with her, for god's sake," she replied. "No, it has to do with another Fujimoto, in fact. If you cannot guess yet, that means what I am thinking of has not yet happened. It should very soon, so you shall know presently."

She returned to their true topic: "At any rate, you are right about the new commander against the slave revolt being better. I only hope they shall allow him to do his job without replacing him in the middle of the action again."

"We can hope," the other woman sighed, wondering what the aside about the Fujimoto meant but knowing Shizuru would not tell her. The wretch enjoyed her surprises a little too much! "The Sicilian farce has gone on long enough. Almost the same length of time as our war now, and the opponents there are mere slaves on one small island!"

"It may be as good an example as any of what happens when the House interferes often in matters of command," Shizuru said, knowing the five-year security of her own mandate had allowed her to wage her own war with superlative efficiency ever since the Masashi debacle. "No doubt my own mail will tell me more on the topic when I go through it. Now what about over here, Cousin? Any news worth mentioning while I was away?"

She did not ask about Natsuki because she had already seen her. The young woman had been her first stop, not even her senior legate or her staff headquarters. So now she waited instead to be informed about the local happenings in her absence.

Shizuma's expression had transformed at her last question. From the grimness over Onishi's fate and Sicilia's future, it went into a giddy amusement.

"Do you remember," she asked Shizuru, "what you said about watching the representatives some of the nobles left behind after your conference?"

"Indeed," Shizuru said curiously.

"Do you remember too," Shizuma said with a twinkle in her eye, "the friction between the Arvetian and Aexellian nobles at the conference? You said it was due the to the former's concurrence with their other neighbours the Carsinii that the Aexelli had been too quick to betray the empire for personal gains."

"Of course. I presume this friction came to a head?" she asked her cousin, interest piqued by Shizuma's pink cheeks.

"It did, though not in the way you might have expected," said the senior legate. "We both know these people's lingering delegates have stayed here more to keep an eye on each other than to actually get contracts or concessions established. Well, they knew it too. I suppose it was inescapable that they would have it out at one point or another, yet the way they did it was a genuine surprise."

It seemed that the Aexellian and Arvetian aristocrats in particular had been compelled to suffer each other's presence in close quarters last week. It was during a dinner party held by one of Gorgo's chief plutocrats. Shizuma being the senior legate, she had naturally been invited along with some of her officers. Thus when the two Septentrian tribal representatives clashed, she had front row seats to the spectacle.

"This was at the end of the dinner, when both had drunk enough to loosen their tongues," she narrated to Shizuru. "The company was talking about the future of the former empire and our Arvetian had just delivered a tipsy speech about the crucial part his people had to play in it. Our Aexellian had been fidgeting all throughout that speech and gave his retort as soon as it ended. He accused the Arvetian of missing the point of the conversation, which was that every people had a crucial part to play in Septentria's future. Whereupon our Arvetian aristocrat eyed his corpulent opponent sourly and proclaimed that the man had nerve to talk about missing points when he couldn't-he said this exactly-even reach his penis to ensure his piss's accuracy."

Shizuru laughed, calling up an image of the enormously fat Aexellian in question and understanding why the Arvetian's rude jibe was apt. But Shizuma told her the Aexellian had offered a retort that had nearly knocked over the Arvetian with rage.

"He said," chortled the senior legate, "that our Arvetian's wife reached it easily enough for him."

"Good gods," Shizuru chuckled after most of their laughter had worn itself out. "Is this when they got into the real fisticuffs? I doubt anyone could have taken that insult without throwing a punch."

"Oh, did they ever go at it! It was brilliant. Neither man's a warrior, you see, so they went about the business in the most unorthodox manner. A lot of slapping and wobbly punches with some odd contortions of the body in the middle. I can't describe it, even. Let's just say I wouldn't have been surprised had there been licking! In the end, the Aexellian won the day. He just sat on the Arvetian until the other stopped wriggling."

"Most dignified," Shizuru said amidst giggles, still trying to imagine a fistfight so inept it could have included licking. Licking!

"No one can be dignified in a fistfight. I wish you could have seen it. It was-delightful! You'd never seen two worse pugilists put up a better fight, Cousin."

Shizuru laughed again and asked what had happened to the contestants when the alcohol had fled both their systems.

"What do you think?" Shizuma said. "They hate each other even more now, so the whole city's absolutely dying to get them together at the dinner table again. No fewer than three of the local bigwigs have thrown parties trying to get both to attend. Unfortunately, the two seem to have sworn off all liquor, so they've been holding to their tempers better. Not that it's stopped the native bookmakers from taking wagers on who shall be the next fight's victor. My money's on our Aexellian friend. He makes an unlikely boxer just to look at, but that fat really does serve him well as padding."

---

Yet neither the Arvetian-Aexellian match nor Durigala seized the army's attention that season the way one Otomeian did. The members of this people stationed in or near Gorgo were occupied by organisational matters all of the spring and summer. Most important of those matters, for most of these fierce people, was the promotion or creation of officers.

Position in the army influenced one's social prominence in their world. It tied into the fact that most of the higher-ups in their military structure were people of elevated rank from the start. That was because the higher offices were afforded only to their nobility, just as political offices in Hime went only to the senatorial families.

Yet like Hime's senatorial families, Otomeians had a way of taking in New Men. New aristocrats were created every now and then by the crown, for example, usually as a reward for notable service performed. Most often, that service was performed on the battlefield, given the nation's esteem for military talent. In order to qualify for such a reward, however, the Otomeian involved had to be of at least officer's rank. Otherwise, a promotion to officer's rank might be the reward offered instead.

Position in the army command was therefore important for ambitious Otomeians. Even without seeking such a high prize as elevation into the aristocracy, the common people already viewed promotion to officer as a huge step up in social status.

So when it seemed the former Mentulaean Empire was quiet enough to permit more bureaucratic business, interest in the promotions swelled again. The Otomeian polemarch was sensitive to her people's desires. She issued notices to those leaders whose commendations had been marked for consideration.

These were actually commendations submitted the previous year. Events had intervened such that the polemarch had only managed to confirm a few promotions before her trip to Fuuka. Inborn chariness caused her to perform investigations first into most of the persons being recommended. Only after that did she feel it possible to determine which endorsements merited escalation to a deciding conference.

The leaders who had submitted the endorsements would bring themselves and the prospective new officer's other direct superiors to the conference. There they would debate with the polemarch the qualities of the man or woman being promoted. They typically advised the subject too of whether or not they had received notices for such a conference. Hence the warriors knew beforehand if their promotion had a chance or not.

There were thus some anxious warriors as well as downcast ones in Gorgo that summer. Yet even the latter were not too put down by the denial. Most soldiers could be recommended twice before finally being granted a promotion. It was only those who had been denied twice or more who were truly dejected by the news of the latest refusal.

One such warrior was Bemys, a trooper of the Otomeian cataphracti. As might be expected of a member of this force, he was among the largest warriors of his already-large people. Bemys had hams the size of tree trunks and shoulders that could seat a grown woman. Nor was all that size just for show: Bemys was a great fighter too, and feared nothing on the field. He had downed dozens of men in single combat and participated in the slaughter of more in actual battle. Not once had he been given anything approaching a life-threatening wound by an enemy. If anyone was ever meant to be recommended for promotion as an officer, most of his comrades thought Bemys was it.

If, that is, Bemys had not been afflicted with a great flaw to go with his great blessings. The trouble was that Bemys was known among his peers as a hothead. Bemys was quick to pick up a fight and slow to abandon it. Worse, he had a tendency to talk back to officers when in his moods. This meant the last two commendations submitted by his commander-the Baron Eilren-had not even been granted conferences by the High Council.

Chastised by two successive refusals, Bemys had finally paid attention to his superiors' counsel. Which was to get a better hold of himself and to resist getting into brawls so often. At twenty-five and twenty-nine that had not seemed feasible. But now he was in his thirties and still just a common cataphract trooper! For someone of his size and obvious capabilities, he should have been promoted much earlier into one of the captains. Time to take the matter more seriously, thought the desperate Bemys, for he was no longer as young as he had been.

He kept close watch on himself for several years and found it easier than ever before. He chalked it up to a heretofore unearthed virtue of patience, failing to see that it was actually more because of occupation. There had been so much to do in the last three years that had barely found time to get into trouble. Oh, he had the occasional brawl here and there, but it was rare and still within the permissible rate of occurrence for most soldiers. And he had managed to avoid getting in trouble with the officers too! For the most part, at any rate. Sometimes, they simply needed a little assistance from their more experienced subordinate.

Immensely satisfied with his recent performance, Bemys had asked his baron to give him another shot at advancement. The man had agreed, for he was proud of the improvement in one of his best fighters. He sent a rare third recommendation in Bemys's honour to the new arbiter of promotions, the polemarch.

To Bemys's shock, the recommendation was denied yet again. But how could that be when he had already corrected the only real objection to his advancement? And this was his last chance, at least unless he managed some unbelievable feat that gained him a fourth commendation. And how often did things like that happen? Only twice in the last ten years!

He knew who had spurned his latest commendation, of course. It probably added to his fury since he had never been asked to join her old elite division. Bemys told anyone who asked why he was not in the Lupine Division that it was because he preferred the cataphracts. He said it so often that he managed to convince even himself of it over the years. The truth he had forgotten was that he could not perform one of the feats considered necessary of a Lupine: to fight effectively on a horse in gallop and without holding on to the reins.

Well, her rejection now called up all his outrage at that earlier slight. Not enough that she had once deemed him second-rate: now the polemarch had compounded her insults by finishing his hopes for an officerial career. And for what reason? Was he not one of the longest-serving warriors in their forces? Had he not gained decorations and honours aplenty for his feats among the troops?

The only conclusion one could gain, he announced, was that the high command—most especially the polemarch—would not promote him because of some grudge, or perhaps because of his common birth. But what had become of the Otomeian army that its elements should now be raised or lowered based on personal issues? What had the world come to when a man could no longer raise his station in the military by fighting well?

His temper might have run itself out had been given some other duty to keep busy for a while. Unfortunately, these were quiet days in Septentria Province, and the people still up for commendation were also yet awaiting the results of their conferences. Every one of them who was given good news only worsened Bemys's temper. He would see this man promoted-and know he could best him in less than five seconds. He would see that woman advanced-and know he could outstride her without any difficulty. The bitterness only worsened. Hence in a mere three days after learning of his rejection, he got up enough indignation to actually confront the polemarch.

He found her in the middle of seeing more officers for the promotion conferences. She had just concluded one such meeting to the apparent satisfaction of one jubilant trooper-now a captain, the lucky sot!

"Why was my commendation denied a conference?" he asked, having marched up unceremoniously to the centre of the throng.

There was a moment's astonishment at the rude demand. One did not interrupt one's superiors in the middle of business and certainly not in such a tone as he had. When the surprise was broken, some of the officers asked Bemys what he thought he was doing.

"I'm asking her why I was rejected," he barked back. "I have a right to know, don't I?"

"No, you don't!" retorted a cavalry officer, looking like he wanted to kill Bemys right there and then. "Your superiors made a decision and all you need to do is accept it, Idiot!"

"Oh, is that so? You're my superiors?" Bemys jeered, getting even angrier. He had duelled and killed people for calling him worse. "I could whip the lot of my superiors with one hand tied behind me! So I think I deserve to know why I wasn't even considered when so many weaklings get to become officers of the army!"

There were shouts of outrage at this and the already gathering Otomeians pressed closer to Bemys and the woman he was confronting as a result. There were some Himeans too in that crowd-most were visiting the auxiliary camp on army business-and these also moved nearer to see what was the cause of the spreading unrest. The polemarch herself looked annoyed and raised her hand for silence. It took a while, but with that many officers in the crowd, the order was eventually enforced.

She met Bemys's greyish eyes with her green ones.

"You ask why I denied you promotion?" she said.

"Yes!"

She fixed him with an expression that communicated the answer: look at what you are doing now. So speaking was her face that he felt his own suddenly scalded by a blush. Something in her countenance had forced him to remember all the recent times he had spoken less than politely to his officers. But that was normal, was it not, when you knew better than your own superiors? Was he supposed to have pretended to be a military dunce when the truth was that he was a better leader than his actual leaders were?

So Bemys told himself, trying to outstare the green-eyed officer currently glaring his way.

"You've no cause to deny my promotion," he declared, with just a touch of insecurity in his voice. She apparently heard it, for she had an answer ready.

"Some captains told me you spoke back to them," she stated.
"Cause enough."

He set his jaw and tried again to outstare her, willing the blood to drain from his cheeks.

"Which captains?" he asked.

The strange green eyes finally left his, but only to roll around.

"You know," she said. "Do not pretend otherwise."

He blinked rapidly, because he did know. It was on the tip of his tongue to profess the contrary but she spoke again before he could do that.

"You intrude on your betters, so go," she said with lofty impatience.

"You will be punished later."

Bemys flushed even redder at the dismissal, his lips curling back from his teeth. Even the Baron Eilren did not speak to him that way!

"Who's going to punish me, then?" he demanded. "All I did was ask why you lot won't give me what I deserve! How long have I fought for the kingdom without being given my just reward?"

"Your reward," said the scowling polemarch, "was given to you in the form of spoils. As for promotion, you may cast off all hopes of it. This show ensures you shall never be promoted. I shall see to it."

The promise got his grey eyes bulging, the cords of muscle on his neck popping out as his temper went.

"You'll see to it, eh?" he brayed, grinning nastily at her. "Oho! Is that a promise?"

"Yes."

"So now a cripple gets to say which warriors can or can't be promoted!" he bristled, putting on his ugliest expression. Several Lupines nearby growled at what he had called their erstwhile captain. "Oh, piss off, you mongrels! You lot don't scare me! I'm as good a fighter as any of you and you all know it!"

"Is that a challenge?" one Lupine captain demanded, pushing his way to stand beside the polemarch. "Because I'll take you on, Bemys, to see if you can prove it."

But a new thought had entered Bemys's increasingly desperate, enormously angry mind at this other Otomeian's words. He barked a strange laugh now and turned from the man to glare again at their highest-ranked superior in the area.

"It's a challenge, all right!" he crowed, pushing his chest out and visibly swelling in size. "But not for you, Lickspittle! The one I'm challenging to a duel's the polemarch!"

There was an outburst of sounds and movement after this, with a voice several recognised as the man's baron yelling for him to shut up. Bemys ignored that call along with the others threatening to attack him, however, and repeated his audacious challenge. The mad idea in his mind grew larger and firmer. Why should he not challenge the polemarch? According to the rules of their world, would that not grant him an even greater promotion than the one she had denied him? Duels had long been fought among their people over disputed positions. It had been a long time since the last such challenge, of course, but that only indicated to him how slow his countrymen were. Someone should have thought of this before! Especially with a polemarch who could no longer fight at her top condition.

He bellowed his challenge to her again, demanding that she face him as a true officer of their army would. The noise escalated further, with more and more of his countrymen crowding in. The Lupine captain who had threatened him earlier advanced, as did some other officers.

Before they could actually come within fighting distance, however, the polemarch's voice ordered them to stay. She stepped out from behind the men shielding her, her gait measured because of her leg and cane. She held the other hand up again and waited patiently for the crowd to quiet. She dropped her hand to her side and-encouraging sight to Bemys!-seemed to tug a little anxiously at her dress.

"Bemys," she said, once she could speak again at normal volume. "You wish to duel me?"

"Haven't I said so?" he roared back, standing with legs wide apart. "You rejected my promotion, which I deserved, Polemarch. Now, I'm going after it myself. So face me! If you're truly worthy of your title."

"When do you wish to fight?" she asked, hushing the officers protesting frenziedly around her with an irritable snap. "You have a preference?"

"No! I'll take you on anytime and anywhere!"

"Anytime and anywhere?" she echoed, sounding very calm.

"Yes!" he blasted back.

"You are certain?"

"How many times do I have to say it? Anytime, Polemarch! Anywhere, I'll take you on!"

"Then," she said, "now."

She flung out her hand in a sweeping movement that propelled the dart in her fingers at him. The shard of metal was so fast all he could do was blink at its approach. It sliced through the weak obstruction of the eyelid before parting the cornea underneath, cleaving both the grey iris and the lens, then demolishing the rest of the vitreous orb until it finally struck bone and was arrested.

Bemys screamed.

In the supervening confusion, several of the Otomeians drew weapons-though all who did so faced the wounded man instead of the polemarch-and the Himeans in the area started yelling, some rushing off to get legionary assistance. Bemys covered his ruined eye with a hand, the other going to his sword.

But his assailant was not finished. She had another dart in hand and cast it again his way. This latter projectile appeared worse-aimed. It touched his neck on the side opposite the destroyed eye and kept going, sailing past to eventually strike the wall of a shed. He roared again at this second wound nonetheless, spittle flying from his lips.

The polemarch eyed him indifferently and called to the other Otomeians gathered around.

"Take him to the surgeons," she said. "Now, or he will die."

Bemys barked incredulity at her order. The dart in his eye was still lodged in, and the blood and watery jelly leaking onto his cheek made him a ghastly sight. Nevertheless, he was upright and had his sword now in hand.

"Die!" he roared. " / will die? It'll take more than a blind eye and scratch on the neck to down me, you treacherous bitch!"

"That scratch is killing you," was her answer. "If you want to live, go now to the surgeons."

He roared again and made to charge, but was halted by several of his countrymen stepping in front of his target. Most but not all were from the Lupine Division, and they brandished their own weaponry in his face. He laughed again and without humour at this. The sound was huge but hollow.

"Too cowardly to fight now I've my sword, eh?" he yelled in full-throated disdain. "Step out from behind those bastards, Polemarch! Face me in a duel, damn you!"

More people only got in front of her at this statement, although she did push one aside so as to address the man again.

"I already defeated you, Fool," she said. "Stand down and go to the surgeons. Is it not enough?"

She named one of the barons nearby and repeated her earlier order.

"Take him there, I said," she said briskly. The baron roused three of his men nearby and advanced on their bleeding comrade. He fought them off but stumbled to his knees on the tenth swing of his sword. They bent over to seize him and divested him of the blade.

To Bemys's surprise, he was too lightheaded to get up without their assistance. His opponent had been right: the scratch on his neck was killing him. Her dart had caught him at an oblique angle that sliced open the smaller of the two jugulars on that side. The steady stream of wetness down his collar and chest had been his very life-force leaching away.

His captors bore him off to the surgeons in haste, practically carrying him so that his feet dragged on the ground. The crowd let them pass, still chattering amongst themselves, until the polemarch's voice lifted itself from amidst the gabble once more.

"Baron Eilren!" she called. "Biorix, Siguilse, all of you step forward!"

All three were there and fought their paths to the centre of the mob. They stood to attention and looked apprehensive, for they knew exactly why she had called them up.

"You three are Bemys's direct superiors at the moment," she observed. "Baron Eilren, you recommended him for a promotion thrice, having resubmitted the proposal after it was denied the first two times. The first rejections were not by me, as I was not yet polemarch. Is this so?"

"It is, Polemarch," he said painfully.

"This man you recommended to be an officer," she said in mordant tones, "challenged to a duel not only your polemarch but also a person with only one leg."

She lifted the hem of her dress to show off her wooden prosthetic in case any of them had forgotten about it. They had not. The three officers in front of her glanced at it only once, then fixed their gazes into the middle distance, jaws held tight.

"I see now, Baron and comrades," she said to all three of them. "That such behaviour is what you deem appropriate to our nation's officers. Otherwise, none of you would have permitted Bemys to cherish more hopes of being part of command. Shall any of you challenge me too in turn? I wish to conclude all my duels before night-time. Come, let us have at it."

Such was the sarcasm in her voice that all three flinched at the invitation. They had flushed to the roots of their fair hair the moment she called them out. Now they bowed their heads to show recognition of their oversight. The Baron Eilren in particular loudly denied intent of challenging her himself. It was truly anathema, and not merely because it would have been disgraceful for a challenger given her handicap: she was also a princess of the blood and, as she had pointed out, their very first polemarch. One did not duel persons of her ilk-unless of a similar social rank and under far greater provocation than Bemys had claimed during his own shameful performance.

"I had no idea he would do that, Princess Natsuki," Baron Eilren avowed, his face wrenched into a tight grimace at the situation into which his subordinate had placed him. "On my sword and my title, I swear I had nothing to do with his challenge. I would have challenged him myself had he told me beforehand."

She regarded him crossly, unmoved.

"Maybe," she pronounced. "All the same, insubordination arises when officers do not have their men under control. Perhaps you three need lessons in how to command others. We shall review your competence later."

The Baron Eilren flushed even redder at this haughty putdown, delivered to him by a girl twenty years his junior. He had the good sense not to reply save by murmuring another apology, however.

The polemarch ignored him. Natsuki's mind was on something else already: something of greater importance than this petty tragedy she had been forced to enact. She issued a quick directive to some other barons and officers to clear the area, then turned to look at the Lupine troopers all around her.

"Zofel-and three of you, come with me," she said to them. "The rest, go about your business. I am fine. And none of you do anything rash. If Bemys dies, it will not be because one of the Lupines attacked him in the surgical tent."

She waved them away when several pressed for inclusion in Zofel's group. She then beat a path out of the mob. Because of her wooden leg her walk turned jerky when she rushed, which was why she tried not to rush too much. The impending crisis required her to put her self-consciousness on hold, however: she started a bouncy almost-jog that got them quickly away from the area and into the cavalry stables. There they found their mounts, which they rode out of camp and into Gorgo itself. It was a short ride given that the camp was right by the city. They had to dismount again near the town square, however. The roads after that were too crowded to permit comfortable passage for their horses. They left the beasts to some other Otomeians they saw there and continued on foot.

"Lift me," Natsuki demanded when her group came to a flight of steps. Two of her companions did as ordered, each man taking an arm and side of the waist. She resumed her jerky hobble as soon as she was set down again and instructed them to clear a path for her through any crowds they might encounter. After a while her companions realised they were heading for the royal palace, the gubernatorial seat of the province.

"Princess Natsuki," said Zofel, striding along next to his polemarch. "Are we going to tell General Fujino of what happened?"

Natsuki shook her head and looked perturbed.

"She may already know," she said.

Their group pushed past busy shoppers on a street and got a chorus of hollers and complaints.

"Then why are we going to the palace?" Zofel asked after that.

"Because," Natsuki huffed, "she may already know."

She asked to be lifted over another set of cobbled steps on the path.

"Touch her not if she gets angry," she told them when they were close enough to look up at the red flag waving from a centre tower on the palace. When the Himean commander was absent, that flag would be taken down. "Never touch her. Even if something happens or if she pushes me."

"Would she push you?" a shocked Zofel asked, his face speaking for all the members of their group.

"Not deliberately," Natsuki answered. "But even then, touch her not. Even should we appear to struggle."

Zofel exchanged looks with the others and said, "We could help you, Princess Natsuki, if you're worried she'll do something impulsive. You know we'd be gentle."

"I know," Natsuki agreed. "But she will not be. To anyone besides myself."

They entered the palace with a nod to the legionary guards, whom Natsuki noted to be unexcited by her appearance. That gave her hope that she had beaten the news to her lover. In reality, though, she was just a little bit short of that goal. She found the Himean commander at her staff headquarters just as the woman was getting the news from a tribune. The man had been one of the Himeans who had witnessed the incident, specifically the first parts of it. Shizuru was already on her feet and moving around her desk though the man had not finished his tale. She looked up and saw Natsuki come in; she ran towards the younger woman, pushing the tribune unceremoniously away.

"What happened?" she demanded, taking Natsuki by the shoulders. Natsuki's companions stepped away warily as Shizuru turned the polemarch from one side to the other. "Are you hurt? What is this about a duel? Kusakabe-han said someone challenged you!"

Natsuki settled her hands over the ones on her body. She held them tight to try and calm the older woman, whose eyes still darted all over her with alarm.

"I am fine," she said, trying to smile. "I came here to tell."

Shizuru glanced at the Lupine troopers standing by one wall, then back to her.

"Tell me now," she said, her tone making it clear that Natsuki should take it as an order.

The polemarch launched into a rapid narration of the incident, trying to hasten it to the point where her antagonist had been wounded and lugged off to the surgeons. Unfortunately, she only managed to finish with Bemys's declaration of willingness to fight her at any time when Shizuru wheeled about and made for the doorway. Natsuki seized the older woman by the arm to prevent this abrupt exit and dug in her heels. To her dismay, Shizuru barely seemed to register her imitation of an anchor.

She was towed three steps forward before the woman finally stopped walking.

"You stay here," the Himean said expressionlessly, plucking Natsuki's hand off her sleeve. She tried to stride off again, but Natsuki quickly threw an arm around her waist. Again Natsuki was towed forward by a force she could not have resisted even at the peak of her physical fitness. Had she not been so worried she would have found it humbling.

Shizuru stopped again just after bringing the two of them out into the hall.

"I told you to stay here," she repeated, trying to get the arm holding her back to let go. Natsuki felt the scarcely controlled rage in the woman's fingers and knew she would lose this battle unless she tried something else.

She dropped her cane with a clatter and threw her other free arm around Shizuru too.

"Shizuru, wait," she enjoined again, practically kissing her lover's nape. Stiff muscle shifted under her fingers and she held on tighter, hoping the woman would not decide to just march off with her thus attached like some sort of tick. "Wait! Shizuru, wait. I need you to talk with me."

Shizuru stopped moving long enough to spin around. Natsuki's arms loosened but squeezed again in an instant. She looked up at the taller woman and found her voice drying in her throat.

"I will talk with you later," a soft-dangerous!-voice said. "If you let go of me now, Natsuki."

Natsuki found it in herself to shake her head.

"I have to take care of something first," Shizuru said, again with soft and slow menace.

"I already did!" Natsuki cried, before lowering her voice again. "He is felled. The surgeons have him. I tried to tell you."

That seemed to release some of the tension boiling in her lover's body. It did not relieve hers. She was aware that this did not settle Shizuru's anger, and that she had only bought herself a little more time to argue her own preferred resolution for the case. She was also acutely aware that this whole scene had been played before a captive audience: her skin felt the many eyes boring into them from Shizuru's office as well as the hallway.

The Himean commander's entire staff had dropped what they were doing the moment they heard the tribune's panicked report earlier. Then the Otomeian princess had shown up with her entourage; they had immediately frozen in hopes of being allowed to see what would happen. Now most remained stock-still at Natsuki's glance, although several did seem to tilt very slightly forward. It was an attempt to catch the words of their general and her lover better.

Natsuki's own accompaniment had moved nearer during her struggle with Shizuru but now watched helplessly. She was glad they had at least recalled her orders. The whole wing of the palace seemed to have gone utterly silent, however, and she knew it would take little time for this to be added to the latest army gossip. She had to get Shizuru to herself.

"Please," she repeated, pressing herself once more to the other woman. The knowledge that people could see her doing it coloured her face, but she could feel the waver in the body against hers and so persevered despite the embarrassment. "Come to our quarters with me. I will tell all. Please, Shizuru? Will you come now?"

The other spoke a single word to this request: "Felled?"

"Yes, felled," she repeated against Shizuru's cheek, both tantalised and alarmed by the warmth radiating from it. "He is no danger now. Please, will you come with me so I can tell?"

It took only a few more tender pleas from her before Shizuru relented. Both the room they had left and the hallway were utterly still during their exit: the only movement came when one of Natsuki's troopers retrieved her cane and handed it to her as they passed him.

Although both of them knew the way to their destination, Natsuki steered her lover by keeping a hand on the woman. She knew Shizuru was far from calm just from the way she looked, as well as the fine tremble that would not leave the Himean's fingers. She felt it even when Shizuru carried her up the stairways of the old imperial stronghold. How stiff it had become, that long neck she loved for its grace!

When they reached their quarters she took Shizuru to their bedroom with a shake of the head to an alarmed-looking Hermias. They left him out in the hall without a word, although he shut the bedroom door for them. There she sat on the bed and was made to deliver the full story to her rigidly listening lover.

When she was done, Shizuru made for the door. Natsuki shot up from the bed so fast she staggered into the woman. She grabbed her to avoid falling down.

"Wuh-wait!" she cried out. Shizuru turned around to help her regain her footing and Natsuki clung to the Himean anxiously again. "Do not leave so, Shizuru."

The older woman guided her back to the bed.

"I was not going to-I was only going to call for Hermias," she explained with a frown. "But I suppose he is just outside the door anyway. Hermias! Come in!"

The door opened and Hermias's epicene countenance appeared, rather less peaceful in its cast than usual.

"Domina, Dominilla," he uttered with faint apprehension.

"Send someone to the army surgeons," she said, holding up a finger to Natsuki to prevent an objection. "Tell them to monitor the status of the Otomeian soldier named Bemys. Report to me as soon as there are major developments."

Hermias bowed and rushed off to see to her orders. He shut the door behind him again.

"As you see, I did not order him killed yet," Shizuru announced to the room.

Natsuki questioned the last word.

"Yet? You will order it later?" she asked, and got an instantly affirmative response. She stared at her lover in a tizzy of concern.

"Do not do that! Please, Shizuru!"

Shizuru stared back. "Do not punish a mutinous soldier with the prescribed penalty?"

"He was my mutinous soldier, Shizuru."

"All of you are my soldiers, Polemarch. I outrank you all. Never forget that!" Shizuru swallowed a growl, hands flexing at her sides. "I am having that fool decapitated if he recovers from the wounds you gave him. After he has been flogged. As for his direct superiors, they too shall be chastised."

Natsuki protested swiftly that she had already done that. Or begun to do it earlier, she explained when that got her commander to pause for a moment.

"They have received already the first punishment. I shamed them before the others earlier."

"You shamed them?"

"Yes." A short and thinking pause. "I pointed out their failure as officers before the others. It is disgraceful for an Otomeian to be scolded so, Shizuru. They were very, um, very hurt! Shamed!"

Shizuru's jaw was clenching hard again. Natsuki cast about for more but the woman beat her to it.

"Perhaps shame is some penance!" she snapped sarcastically. "But it does not satisfy, mea vita. "

"I will do more later, Shizuru," Natsuki promised. "I will take care of them."

But Shizuru shook her head, lips curling back over her teeth.

"They failed to contain an unreliable, insubordinate element," she said with tight control. "I cannot accept that in officers of my army. So I claim the right to chastise these idiots in the appropriate manner."

Natsuki asked uneasily what was the appropriate manner. As soon as the other got out the first syllables of "flagellation", however, she cut her off with an incredulous cry.

"They were not even the insubordinate ones!" she rebutted. "They only overlooked one who was a problem."

"And tried to have him promoted."

"Yes, but still! Please, Shizuru. Be reasonable."

" Reasonable! "

The word exploded from Shizuru in a shout. She sucked both her lips in at Natsuki's flinch and strove again to rein in her hugely frayed temper.

"First you tell me that I cannot inflict the traditional punishment for insubordination on that wretch who had the temerity to challenge you to a duel," she ground out, every word a sliver of broken glass in Natsuki's ears. "Next you tell me I cannot censure the people who made his temerity possible either. Are you telling me next that you control my army in my stead, Natsuki?"

Natsuki shook her head frantically.

"I plead with you, Shizuru," she said, finally apprehending how best to get through to her paramour. "I can censure them myself. I do not tell you buh-buh-but I beg! If you censure them it shows only that you control the army-which all already know. But if I censure them it shows that I control the Otomeian auxiliaries-which I must remind all now, after what Bemys did. I ask you to give me this power because my position suffers if I do not do it."

Her heart lifted when that finally sparked a calmer light in the red eyes. They still glared; those hands still shook; that tall body still dominated the room. But Shizuru had listened to her passionate plea and now stood quietly in consideration. Natsuki resisted the urge to slap herself on the forehead; she should have essayed that line of argumentation earlier! The easiest way to get through to the Himean was when something was for Natsuki's sake, not her own.

Perhaps this way she could be prevented from venting her spleen on Bemys's poor superiors. Even if they deserved some punishment for failing to have reined in the man, they did not deserve to be flayed to ribbons, which Shizuru would very likely want!

When Shizuru spoke again it was with a somewhat calmer tone: "And Bemys? Can you give me a reason not to execute him if he survives?"

"Because if you do, it will seem like you do it because I asked." Natsuki put all her heart into the next words. "It will seem as though I could not finish the task. If he lives, I can finish it still by sending him to Otomeia in shackles and reporting his actions to the High Council. That will prove I finished him myself, even if I did not kill him in our fight. But if you do it, it will be as if I lost the duel and you took over. So please, allow me this and do not kill him. Fuh-for me, I ask?"

She saw the faint sag in the other's stance afterwards and wanted to sag herself: she had prevailed. Her frustrated lover put a hand up to massage golden brows in a rough gesture that lacked her usual grace. She shaded her gaze in the process and Natsuki waited for those wondrous eyes to show again.

When that happened, she received a furious stare from them.

"I did not drag you back from the grave only for curs to throw you back into it," her lover snarled with deep vexation.

Natsuki pushed herself up off the bed. She came nearer her lover and reached out tentatively for one of the clenched fists. She found she could lift it and coaxed it open.

"I am not in the grave," she murmured pacifyingly. "You see? I have no injuries, even."

A kiss to the horned palm in her hand got her a murmur.

"See, Shizuru," she repeated. "I am unhurt, no?"

"You could have been hurt," Shizuru remonstrated, brow crumpled.

"No, I could not," Natsuki replied, knowing what her lover needed to hear. "While you look out for me, that will not happen."

"I was not there earlier." Shizuru sounded unhappy now; Natsuki inched closer to her. "How was that 'looking out for you', mea vita?"

Natsuki told her there had been Himeans aside from the tribune who had reported the event to her. She reported-truthfully-that several had gone to run for help in breaking up the fight. Those who stayed had also moved nearer her with a view to being part of her defence.

"They did it because of you," she told her lover, whom she tried to soothe further with gentle strokes on the shoulder and arm, with touches of the nose to the collar. "And your tribune came to inform you as soon as he saw, remember? They knew what to do. Even when you are not there, you look out for me. I am glad for it, Shizuru."

The body in her arms was loosening further. She guided it to the bed and made it sit down, after which she settled herself upon its lap. She wrapped an arm around her lover again and resumed the caresses with the other.

"You always protect me," she stressed, speaking the words into the older woman's ear. "Like my troopers and all my own officers. And see? I am safe, Shizuru."

Shizuru regarded her with a strange expression. Natsuki realised the woman knew what she was doing but was too fascinated-and affected-by it to interrupt. She did not protest even when Natsuki's fingers pinched her on the lip to get rid of her already-diminished frown.

"You really felled him?" she eventually sighed.

Natsuki smiled with a little pride and confirmed it: "I really felled him."

"He might survive, you know."

"He will still be punished." Natsuki looked the older woman in the eyes. "Shizuru. You do not trust me?"

"I do! Of course I do." Shizuru's hand grabbed hers. "But-my god, Natsuki! How would you feel in my place?"

Natsuki agreed. She would have cut the man open had it been Shizuru he threatened.

"So I am very grateful," she said. "I ask much of you, I know."

Shizuru nodded to that, because it was true in this instance. She let Natsuki's caresses continue, however, somehow stilled by them in spite of the rage.

"Keep him well away from any of my armies should he live," she said later. "My hand shall not be stayed a second time."

Natsuki said again that she would ensure the man's relocation if he survived. Her lover looked at her in a way that said her next words should be taken in earnest.

"If I see him again, I will tear out his tongue myself." Shizuru's voice was soft in her ears. "Only after that will I execute him in front of the entire army, mea vita. And I shall not flog and decapitate any longer. I shall flog and crucify, and have it done by inches. Nor shall his knees be broken to spare him the misery of a slow death on the cross. Even your king could not stop me from doing this if I see that man again."

"If we see him again," Natsuki agreed, soothing the monster once more with a kiss, "even His Majesty would not try to stop you."

Chapter 79

Vocabulaire:

1. Hannibal's trick with the snakes - A tactic employed by the Punic Hannibal in one of his naval engagements. He launched hundreds of clay pots at enemy ships from the Pergamenes. When the pots broke on the ships' decks, they were revealed to have been stuffed with live snakes. It caused chaos aboard the Pergamene vessels.

2. Insula (L.) - Literally "an island", although it can also mean "an apartment building".

3. Mare ibericum (L.) - The Alboran Sea, or the westernmost end of mare nostrum (s.v.).

4. Mare nostrum (L.) - "Our Sea", which is what the Ancient Romans called the Mediterranean.

5. Tuatha - The pantheon of the Celtic/druidic religion.

6. NOTE on the barge - The one described by Shizuru actually existed. There were not actually that many men per oar, by the way: the number in its name is taken instead from each "column" of oarsmen. Even so, it was a colossal vessel.

7. NOTE on Chikane - For the historically-savvy readers. While some circumstances do seem to liken her to Gn. Pomp. Magnus (vis-à-vis Shizuru's ostensible Caesar), there need be no fear the situation shall turn out similar. That would be too predictable. Anyway, there are few worse analogues for Chikane Himemiya than adulescens carnifex himself. Pompeius Magnus was rather a boor.

8. NOTE on the events in Asia - While the essentials of the history have been kept, some things have been changed, especially the timeline. It has been sped up a little, for instance, in the succession of rulers to Cappadocia.

9. NOTE on the Extended Rights and Fuukans - Another reminder for those who have forgotten: within this story, read the Himeans as Romans, the Extended Rights holders as Latin Rights citizens, and Fuukans as Italians. That also lists the citizenships in descending order of prestige. Even if Roma was surrounded by Italia, it was not Italia, and its people certainly not Italians. Romans- and frankly, even the Italians-believed that being Roman was better, for a very long time.

10. NOTE on geography - A reminder that only locations north of Hime/Rome have been altered. All other locations-like those in the east and Asia, e.g. Bithynia, Cilicia, Pontus, etc.-are as in the Roman Republican maps.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Bemys did perish, which should have finished that chapter of the Fujino Campaign. Yet the incident did not die with the mutineer: the rest of the army resurrected it doggedly. From the handicapped underdog's triumph over a hostile colossus to the winner's entreaties to her vengeful lover, the story had all the qualities of top-shelf chatter. Thus, for at least a fortnight afterwards, both legions and auxiliary continued to chatter about it.

"Which means," Shizuru's older cousin sighed, "that all of Hime will know the story come the next mail packet for home."

"Is that a problem?" Miyuki asked. "It's not a disgrace as far as army anecdotes go. It might even serve your cousin well, given how repeatable it is as a tale. Yet another reason for people to have her name in mind."

"I know, and I don't think she comes off badly," Shizuma replied. "She wanted to defend her lover, thwarted though she was. It's as justifiable as it's romantic, which makes of Shizuru a heroine in this story."

"But?"

"But I wonder if it's wise to let our polemarch come to certain senators' attention yet again."

"You mean... because she's a foreigner?"

"That ship sailed long ago, Miyuki," scoffed the senior legate. "It's more what she could drive my cousin to do-or to not do!-that would be of interest to some folk."

Through it all, the business of shaping Septentria went on. Shizuru even managed to hold the first civilian assizes since the empire's subjugation. It was a vital part of the changeover into a Himean domain.

Himean governors served as the judges of their provinces. They did not settle every dispute, as smaller cases went to the local magistrates. Nonetheless, a good many plaintiffs always believed their cases big enough to be in the gubernatorial docket. Even once a case had been decided at a lower judicial level, there was always a possibility of appeal to the governor if one party was determined-or affluent-enough.

Assizes could thus be a time-consuming part of a governor's duties. To lighten her burden, Shizuru assimilated some of the old empire's judiciary strata. She had explained it during the first Septentrian Conference. Ruling barons were allowed to hear cases as they had during the empire, as a fief's head magistrate. Provided they settled matters in a manner they could explain were she ever to question them, of course.

There would be some changes to the old procedures, such as when a case's penalty involved a pecuniary fine or property confiscation. She disallowed the nobles from pronouncing the decision in such cases: they had to make use of their town council or other local magistrates as a jury panel. That way, ruling barons had some checks on their powers-and could not arbitrarily levy fines or seize properties through the courts to enrich themselves.

There was also a different procedure for the gravest crimes, those meriting either exile or capital punishment. The same for cases that crossed two lords' areas of responsibility. For these, the magistrate presiding over the hearing had to be vested with gubernatorial authority. When Shizuru was within an area, that would be her. Otherwise, she was empowering her legates to hear such cases in her stead.

Naturally, there were special exceptions for Himeans and members of the army. Any case involving a soldier had to be dealt with at military assizes.

"As for Himean citizens, they must be granted a full trial," she told her legates. "Furthermore, it must be one conducted in the Himean manner."

That was no surprise, but the next statement was.

"This applies too to both Extended Rights citizens and Fuukans," said their general. "For all judicial purposes, I require that Septentrian authorities treat civilians of these citizenships as they would actual Himeans. That means referring the matter to a Himean magistrate in a Himean court of law."

Her legates exchanged glances until one finally said what all were thinking: "But that's odd, Fujino-san! I grant they deserve a little distinction too, especially those with the Extended Rights. But why make them legally equivalent to Himeans in formal procedure? They're not our equals, legally or otherwise."

She nodded but looked as though she thought the contention irrelevant.

"Nonetheless, in this matter and under my governorship in Septentria, they are," she said. "Oh, later governors can pick at the niceties of citizens' and non-citizens' judicial entitlements! For now, all I want is a working system."

Her sharp look caused all of them to stiffen. It was clear she thought the topic a waste of her time.

"Just to remind all of you," she said, "none of us know yet if I shall be prorogued. This and the next year may be all I have left to discharge the rest of my duties in this province. It gives me a tight timeframe for building the foundations later Septentrian governors will have to use. I cannot reconstruct an entire country's administrative framework and pick at all the minutiae too! And how do we know that conflict with the locals is entirely finished? Look at what happened in Durigala, which showed us how many arms are still abroad in spite of our efforts at disarmament."

Thus reminding them of the graver concerns at the moment, she added one more stinging note on the subject of Himeans and non-Himeans.

"I should remind you of something else," she said. "The fact is, most northerners still cannot tell the difference between a Himean, an Extended Rights citizen, and a Fuukan. Even the Otomeians cannot, and we have been fighting side by side with them for years! Granted, most of our own troops in this campaign have been Himean, so the distinctions have not been urgent. But the legions we levied later have had some Extended Rights and Fuukan citizens among them. The First and the Second, which are the legions we recruited last in spite of their names, are in fact almost entirely non-Himean! As you can see, however, I have treated them as equals of our other legions throughout the war. As have both our allies and enemies, who would not understand the particularities of 'southern' citizenship anyway. To them, we are all Himeans."

Her officers strove to look impassive, but still showed faint distaste or discomfort in many cases. She understood why this mattered to them, of course. In some ways, it also mattered to her, she who was a Himean of Himeans. But this was not the time for the topic to become a bottleneck for the rest of her activities.

"One day, even people in Septentria may understand enough to draw the difference," she finished. "Until then, you shall have to suffer being practically indistinguishable from the other peoples of Fuuka. Why should it matter anyway, when once a litigant has been granted a Himean trial, the judge will obviously be Himean himself and thus be capable of observing the judicial distinctions that you advocate?"

The short-lived revolt of Durigala gave her an opportunity to demonstrate how trials should work. She carried out a hearing for the rebelling aristocrats much the way it would have been done in an actual Himean court.

She did not empanel a jury, however. When asked about that, she replied with juristic erudition that it was unnecessary. The defendants were not Himeans and therefore not entitled to the exact trial procedure as conducted back home.

They would have been Extended Rights citizens had the revolt happened much later in her tenure. That was since Shizuru's peace terms with the locals would grant Extended Rights citizenship to all magistrates after a year of their faithful service in peacetime. Shizuru set the peacetime period to be counted from the year of the first Septentrian Conference. This put the Durigalans squarely out of the qualification period, and thus precluded them a fully Himean trial. The governor decided a single judge-herself, in this case-was sufficient.

"This is still a military trial conducted under the authority of this province's governor," she explained. "I only dressed it up a little, but there is still a mail shirt under the toga."

Prosecuting and defending advocates were selected from among her legates. She made a point of assigning the better speaker to the defence. This was because nothing the defending advocate had to say could affect the outcome.

Everyone knew that the Durigalan nobles were guilty of having broken a treaty with Hime, the new master of their domain. There was no getting around it being legally high treason. Hence, in spite of an outstanding defending speech by Miyuki Rokujou, the rebelling leaders were inevitably convicted and sentenced to the only penalty for their crime.

However, Shizuru also used her gubernatorial powers to reprieve them from execution afterwards. Using her supreme authority within the province, she commuted the sentence to flogging, the loss of status and property, and permanent exile from Septentria. Some justice, she thought furiously, knowing she could not lighten the sentence under any circumstances. It still rankled that they had been prodded into it by her legate, whom she wished she could horsewhip down a good Himean road for a kilometre.

"He will be gone at year's end anyway," her lover told her as she gnashed her teeth over it.

"Indeed, but that does not change the Durigalan nobles' fates," Shizuru murmured.

"It changes not their desecration of a treaty either," the younger woman said wisely. "Your legate was stupid, but still they should have tried to see you first. They could have gone higher than even their tribe's high barons when they sought help against him."

"If you mean they might have sought help from me, they could have thought Ushida -han was already acting on my orders, so I was also a lost cause."

"No. They were in an empire, so they know of, of, ahh... of levels of authority. They know officers do not act only on a superior's orders. Anyway, you were just to them even after their revolt. If they had done it to their old king he would have tortured and killed all of the Durigalans without a trial, no?"

"I do not think it fair to use that man's reign for comparison," Shizuru answered, jaw unclenching nevertheless.

"Still. You did what you must, and it is finished. Soon your legate will be the same."

Shizuru knew they were wise words. Seigo Ushida would be packing his bags come winter and she could take satisfaction then in his premature exit. She could not put down the truth of his embarrassing and barely-disguised booty raids in the dispatches, however. Her senatorial opponents would not spare a second on excoriating the man for provoking the first attempted revolt after Septentria's conquest. No matter how Shizuru told the story, it would be she the conservatives impugned, not her importunate legate. So no revealing the connection between the sudden, much-too-early revolt of Durigala and the rapaciousness of Seigo Ushida!

In August, she had concluded enough important cases for her to leave the assizes and capital. This time, her journey took her to the province's southeast corner for an engineering project. This was the construction of a better bridge replacing the old one on the River Atinu's south end.

The new structure would be as large as the one locals regarded as the main crossing. That was the bridge guarded by her twin-camped Atinu Base, further north up the waterway. It was therefore a statement as well as a significant upgrade to commerce for the south banks of the river. It proved that the Himean governor was intent on doing what she could for southern Septentria-despite Durigala.

The truth was, Shizuru's improvement of the province's southern region had to do with more than the natives. The bigger allotments she wanted to pension out to her veterans were situated there too. Her planned soldier colonies would fare better if the bridge she was building was finished. They would have easier congress with the nearby Himean provinces, whether for trade or security.

This was why the new bridge had to be a lasting one. That meant more work, proper tongue-and-groove carpentry. No makeshift bolting or ropework in this case! It also demanded good masonry: Shizuru wanted stone piers.

The way she designed it, the new bridge could still be torn down should military exigency ever demand demolition. Yet the stone piers would stay up long afterwards. This would make throwing up a new deck to reconnect the banks faster.

For a Himean army, she amended, having come to disdain the quality of Mentulaean army engineers-when they were even present.

While she oversaw the work on this latest project, other plans for Septentria's future happened elsewhere. At the same moment that she organised her bridge's pile drivers, the Chief of the Druids organised a dinner with two clandestine guests. Had Shizuru even the faintest rumour of this gathering, she would have abandoned her construction to race to Tasgetia in the northwest. But she had no inkling and thus was content to focus on her construction over the river.

"So she's in the south again?" one of Hiempnos's guests said of Septentria's governor. "What's she doing there this time?"

"Our man at the capital says she went to build another bridge on the Atinu," Hiempnos answered. "At the crossing by the lands of the Marianes and Cruteni tribes."

"Why? There's already a good bridge right there."

"I suspect she may be enlarging it, or something to that effect," was the older man's guess.

"That sounds like a waste of time."

But the chief druid was contrary to this dismissive opinion.

"If I have learned anything of the woman, it is that her efforts are never inconsequential," he cautioned sternly. "She must have found something inadequate about the old bridge if she decided to create a new one. By that, I mean she found something inadequate for her purposes. Remember that she troubled to construct roads even when the war was in its first stages. You too laughed at her then because you deemed our existing roads sufficient. Until she used her new roads to march her armies all over our own country faster than we could. This is not a woman whose least deeds should be discounted as mere whimsies, My Prince."

Prince Calchis took the reproach calmly, knowing Hiempnos was right in advocating wariness of this Himean's doings. What a force of nature she had proven to be!

"I hear she's been doing a lot of other things for the south," he said as a way of acknowledging his mistake.

"Yes, she has."

"I suppose it's smart of her to pay so much attention to that region," the prince determined. "It's always been our weakest, loyalty-wise. They're the ones who switched over to their side earliest. I think we'll have the most trouble convincing them to switch back to us too, aside from the Aexelli."

The third member of the group spoke up in agreement.

"The southeast peoples are almost certainly lost causes," came the words. "The Mariani, Cruteni, possibly even the Aequani. Most of them weren't even represented in the Royal Court, if you recall!"

"What if we promised to fix that?"

"Wouldn't work. Remember what they told our father's father when he offered them positions in Court?"

"To stuff his positions up his arse," Calchis grinned wolfishly. "He made them pay for that."

"So he did, but it didn't get him what he wanted. He only offered those positions because he wanted them to give him more soldiers in exchange. They refused, he lost his temper, then what actually happened? He didn't get soldiers and even lost more in waging war on the lords who'd given him cheek. He didn't get the lords' loyalty either, which was what really mattered. He made them pay, yes, but so did they make him."

Calchis nodded as his sister went on.

"Anyone north of them ever since, they tend to see as an enemy," Faris said. "If we're to have any luck in the south, Brother, it would probably be nearer the centre or centre-west."

"That's right next to Firens," Calchis said with a sharp look to his sibling. She met it without a flinch.

That was normal, really. Faris always looked straight in your eyes to convince you of her authenticity. It had been a good trick in the Royal Court and had served her well even outside of that cesspit of intrigue. He liked it himself, as he always felt more comfortable with people who stared him straight in the face.

But this time the face giving the stare was not the one it had always been. He felt again the small start she had given him only hours earlier, during their reunion. It was because his sister looked very different from her old self. Both of them did.

They had been dodging Himeans and their informants for over a twelvemonth already. Shizuru Fujino had put out word that there would be a reward for the person who turned them in. There were to be titles and land to the obliging traitor and even a Himean citizenship. Many former Mentulaeans had by now gained a notion of the power such citizenship held both in the north and beyond it. It would be very tempting for those with dreams of travelling elsewhere and those who had never been high up the social ladder to begin with.

Yet even with that bait, the siblings knew catching them would not be easy. Most of their peoples would not give them up, even outside of the famously-loyal Ganni. There were myriad reasons for this, including the fact that Calchis and Faris were among the most esteemed of their sire's offspring. This was because they did merit such esteem, given their abilities, but it was also because of their old machinations against the late king.

When Obsidian had still lived, their plan to oust him had included wooing the nobility. Once their father was killed, they would have needed the nobles' support against their rival siblings. The druids had contributed by building the pair's reputations even among the more remote peoples and aristocracy. That counted for a lot, despite the druids' relative loss of power over the years. These holy men and women might not command lords any more but they still went everywhere and had access to many ears. Add to this the power of blood: Calchis and Faris's lineage gave them links to many of the nobles who had survived the invasion of Hime.

To be sure, all this did not guarantee Calchis and Faris anything like instant allegiance. What it did guarantee was a kind of fidelity through kinship. They could safely expect most of the remaining high barons to help them stay hidden, even if those high barons had also pledged fealty to the foreigners hunting them down.

The real danger came from the lower classes. These always held ambitious elements ripe for disloyalty. Some among them would sell Calchis and his sister for less than a talent, hence the precautionary disguises the siblings had assumed after Terantrum.

That was the last time they had seen each other prior to this meeting. It was when they had decided too which peoples each would take in secretly canvassing support for their goal.

This was still as it had been before the death of the old king: to repel the invaders from the land as a united and imperial nation. The difference, Calchis and Faris told their auditors, was that the renewed empire would now be commanded by one worthy of the title.

The new king would be a man who had once given the empire its greatest military victories. It would be a man who would correct his ancestors' worst political mistakes. Under King Calchis, those formerly overlooked would finally be honoured. Under the new regime, prosperity would be shared with all the proud tribes of the land.

So did the two siblings promise dozens of high barons who listened thoughtfully. For that was all they needed to do, said the crafty speakers: listen and think on it. Let it sit in your mind for now. No need yet for big decisions! Think first if you prefer to live the ways of your people or the ways of the foreigners. Because at the end of the day, they still only see you as a barbarian to reshape in their image. Whereas we see you as our folk, share with you the same blood and bones under the skin.

Over a year had passed of them spreading these words in the most secret meetings. Over a year of skulking and conspiracy that let them grow accustomed to their new costumes. Costumes worn that long sank into the hide. So when they came to Tasgetia at Hiempnos's behest and beheld each other again, both were so comfortable in their new skins that each marvelled.

Calchis had grown his curling hair longer. Where he had once preferred to keep it militarily neat, he now allowed it to straggle over cheeks and shoulders. He also cultivated an unkempt beard that obscured much of his jaw. His clothes were not poor, but nor were they rich. They were not even soldierly. He dressed like any of the small farmers that tended modest plots in the land of the Ganni.

Even the way he moved was altered: he had less of his past swagger, having decided that it got him too much attention. He was still a big and fine figure of manhood, but his yearlong disguise had nonetheless imparted something new to him. Archdruid Hiempnos, seeing him again, realised that the year of being a wanted man might have actually granted the prince a tempering improvement. It had made him more comfortable with restraint than ever before.

As for Faris, she had eschewed her old vanities. Her once-luxuriant hair had been cropped to a mere thumb's length. She had lost all her sparkling jewellery. Without the elaborate face paint and rich clothing once favoured for members of the Court, she had become almost unrecognisable-even to the aristocrats with whom she had grown up. She had even taken to sunning herself at every opportunity to encourage her skin to darken.

And inside, she was changed too, Hiempnos mused. Hiempnos thought that it disturbed Calchis, who looked on his sister as the rock of his existence. Rocks changed slowly through the ages. When that pattern was broken, it was usually through violence, like the blow of a stone-cutter's chisel or the cataclysm of an earthquake. Did Calchis see in his sister's alteration the former or the latter? And could he make his peace with it?

"How can we convince people near Firens to throw in with us," the prince was asking, "when doing so means getting on their powerful neighbour's bad side in the process?"

"I've been thinking about that," said Faris. "What if we could remove Firens?"

"I don't see how," Calchis grunted. "But I suppose we can wish!"

The Kingdom of Firens gave him a headache because it could not exist if there was a Mentulaean Empire. This made the Firensii natural opponents to any re-establishment of imperial authority. True, Calchis could ostensibly get Firens on his side by promising them autonomy. But even if Calchis were to make that promise, not one Firensian would believe him. Nor would he believe himself-giving up Firens was not an option and would never be.

So much did Calchis remind his co-conspirators on the topic.

"The Firensii can't be swayed to our side, no matter what we're offering," he stated baldly. "The only thing they want from us, after all, is the very thing we can't offer! That makes coming over to us an unattractive option for the peoples right next to them. Tribes like the Roscii and Padurci would see allegiance to us as an instant liability. To their immediate west is Firens and to their immediate east are the southern peoples you yourself described as lost causes. They'd be sandwiched in between Himean allies!"

"Not if we get enough of them in on it," Faris countered. "You have to remember that Firens is surrounded by opponents too."

She proceeded to point out the fact that Firens still had to contend with the often-hostile Kingdom of the Nervii to its west. On its north side, it was neighboured by the Mentulaean tribes of the Ganni and Vanati, both of whom sympathised with Calchis. South, Firens was safe, as the most rugged of the Caledonian Alps lay there. But east?

East it might be weakened, at least if they could get some of the tribes there to defect from Himean allegiance.

"We need to remind people in the south of that," Faris concluded. "Because if the Roscii and Padurci tribes come over, Firens will then be surrounded entirely by hostiles! That will give us an opportunity to finish them off before going after the Himeans. A destroyed Firens would only make the throne that much closer. It would also be an attractive thought for some of the smaller tribes, I think, as they could stand a chance to inherit some Firensian territories afterwards."

The old bullish look in Calchis's eye: "I'm not giving up Firens."

"I'm not giving up Firens either!" Faris smiled at her brother. "I just think we can 'lend' a little part of it to our allies, like the Himeans did with that territory they peeled off the Carsinii. What are they calling it again, Hiempnos?"

"Pascera, I believe."

"That's it. Still a Himean property yet leased out to their allies indefinitely. It's a sly piece of work and I don't see why we can't copy it."

A snort: "Doing things the Himean way now, are we?"

"Only where it's of help," she replied. "Who says we can't learn from our enemies? I guarantee it will go over well. Besides, any new allies we make down south would be only too eager to expand into Firensian territory once they learn of our agreement with the Nervii."

There was a lift of the mouth under the dark beard. Hiempnos too was inspired to compliment her again for this particular achievement.

"It truly was an excellent move, Princess Faris," said the druid, "to broker a marriage between your brother and a daughter of the Eastern Nervii's foremost baron. I still regret I had not thought of it."

She acknowledged the encomium with a smile, knowing her achievement would serve them greatly. As of the moment it was still secret, as the Nervian baron had understood the siblings' need to stay hidden. Yet it was already as good as done, for it would be too beneficial to either party to be broken off.

It meant the Nervii on the border of Firens's territories would keep attacking Firensian lands for as long as Entei's "kingdom" existed. They would do it to oblige both Calchis and their own lasting feud with Firens. Only once Calchis returned Firens to the empire would they break off hostilities. That was because a Nervian baron's grandchildren-the eventual children of Calchis and his future bride-would then be in line to the throne of the restored Kingdom of the Mentulae... which would naturally include Firens.

There had actually been a previous marriage alliance brokered between the Mentulae and the Nervii. It had failed to secure peace because the woman Obsidian had married had been a niece of the Nervian king. High up the Nervian royal ladder, yes, but entirely unrelated-and thus, devoid of influence-to the warlords of Nervia's east. Since those were the barons constantly raiding Firens on their own initiative, the marriage proved ineffective at ceasing hostilities. Thanks to his sister, Calchis had made a better match than his father, politically.

"The trick," Faris told her auditors, "is to weaken Firens irreparably. I've an idea that will make use of more than the Nervii too. I just want to remind you first that the real hurdle isn't Firens anyway. What I keep telling you, Brother, is that it's that woman. Where Firens just offers a hedge, she's a citadel wall!"

Hiempnos said nothing but looked as though he agreed.

"She's also the harder target to go after first," Calchis rebutted, albeit without expectation of settling the argument.

"If you really want to better the odds," his sister maintained in hortative refrain, "we have to get rid of Shizuru Fujino."

"That is what we're trying to do here!" Calchis said.

"No, it isn't," she retorted. "We're trying to get rid of the Himeans. Shizuru Fujino is just one Himean. However, she's the one who's a real obstacle to all of our schemes. And I tell you, Brother, that we need her gone!"

"That is why we need to drum up support to raise more armies," Calchis said with the sort of patience he could not have granted anyone else. "The more of the tribes and lords we get under our banner, the better our odds of finishing off that woman when we take her on."

But Faris shook her head emphatically at him.

"You're missing my point," she said. "It doesn't need to be on the battlefield if it's just one person we're trying to finish, does it?"

The other two stared at her with sudden interest.

"You mean an assassination?" Hiempnos ventured.

"Why not? We're not strangers to that. The Tuatha know how many of our own forebears were finished by it!"

Calchis harrumphed softly, but his eyes were alive with thought.

"It's not a bad idea," he said with a glance at the chief druid. "The question is how to do it."

"Could we maybe employ some kind of poison?" Faris suggested, excited by his interest. "I'm sure we can get someone close enough to tamper with the woman's meals. She's made our capital her home. Surely that gives us a way in, since we know the people and place better."

Calchis spoke out in agreement, saying he knew just the right apothecary to supply the poison they needed. Before the two could continue their scheming, however, the chief druid arrested them.

"I'm not sure it would be a wise route," Hiempnos warned. "It would be harder than you think."

"I'm sure we could manage an assassination!" Calchis scoffed, having ordered them before.

"I'm sure you think you can," the older man retorted. "What I doubt is that it would work. The woman is surrounded by loyal people and probably has her own countermeasures against infiltration. I have it on authority, for instance, that they tested the food during their first banquet in the capital. Besides, there is another objection."

"Which is?"

"Her mistress may be a sorceress."

"What do you mean?" the siblings said in unison, with a choreographed lean forward. How like twins they were, thought their old tutor, who was very fond of them.

"This is the Otomeian princess, isn't it?" Calchis said, getting a nod. "What makes you think that of her, Hiempnos?"

"Several things," the other said. "Her command of that animal, the black lion I told you about, is one of them. Even our greatest forest druids have never tamed such a predator that way! Further proof of this power over faunae is her horsemanship. Remember, she rides though she only has half of one leg."

"So it's true?" Faris asked with huge interest. "Fujino's mistress is a cripple?"

"One of her feet is wooden, but you would not call her a cripple," Hiempnos said to that. "As I said, she can still ride, and even does it better than people with both limbs! I saw her myself, sitting on a beast with legs over one side and as relaxed as if she were on a bench. The animal bearing her moved perfectly, even galloped, and she never fell off. But when she dismounted, we saw she was not strapped down. Like the giant cat, the horse simply did what she wanted."

The siblings looked at each other, wondering if such sorcery could be feasible.

"Her title suggests her specialness as well," their old tutor continued. "Her people esteem her oddly for a nation that prefers warriors. Her handicap means she cannot fight, yet they grant her one of the highest offices of their people. In fact, only she bears that title, 'polemarch'. There must be something special to her for her to have been accorded such an honour. She even looks like a sorceress, if such a thing could be. I met her eyes once and her eyes were not human."

"Nor are Shizuru Fujino's, I hear," interjected Faris, having heard much on her journeys about the brightly crimson eyes of their enemy.

"And she conquered our land in just a handful of years. Does this not say something?" Their old tutor peeked out, reminded them of something in their people's lore: "It is said the Tuatha put some creatures in our forests to command the rest, and that these creatures could be told from the mundane ones by their eyes. Where you expect to see brown, for instance, you see a blue so pale it is nearly white. What if such is true of people as well? Shizuru Fujino's eyes are the colour of blood aflame. And her mistress has eyes the hard-yet-clear green of an emerald. Are both mere coincidences? Or are we overlooking some sort of warning? I do not know, I cannot be certain. And yet, it seems better to err on the side of wariness."

His auditors looked simultaneously dismayed and fascinated.

"If this is right," Hiempnos concluded, "poison is not a possibility. At least, it is not a smart one."

The siblings understood. If that mistress was truly a sorceress it would be better not to bring poison into the equation. Sorceresses had peculiar knowledge of arcane cures and antidotes. She might counter any toxin they got Shizuru Fujino to ingest, and a failed poisoning attempt would only harm their cause. Eliminating the obstruction to that attempt-the witch mistress herself-was not an option either. Hiempnos told them that character was heavily guarded. Their sources in the capital also claimed that she had felled a literal giant without needing to draw a sword. More sorcery at work!

"Regular assassinations are even harder to pull off than poisonings, though," Calchis said with a frown. "Or are they? What do you think, Hiempnos? Can we give Shizuru Fujino a little kiss on the throat?"

He drew a finger over his own neck. The chief druid sat and mulled that over for a moment, his lined old brow gaining a few more wrinkles.

"Do you remember what I told you about her being descended from their gods?" he asked abruptly.

Calchis frowned in confusion before gawking at the other man.

"Esus save us!" he cried at his old tutor, who somehow got even more wrinkled. "You believe it yourself, Hiempnos?"

Hiempnos's blue eyes seemed pained. Faris said nothing but looked interested.

"Even if it's true, she's not a god herself," Calchis said, unable to believe he was having this conversation. Hiempnos! Archdruid of their faith, yet he believed their enemy was some sort of divine being!

"Surely she can be cut!" he declared. "A blade can still bleed her."

"She can be cut," Hiempnos spoke up. "Indeed, My Prince, I myself saw that she had her share of scars. The woman is mortal."

Nevertheless, I do not believe an assassin could do her in."

"But why? Because you think she's truly descended from a god? Or because her witch mistress would prevent it?"

"Perhaps and perhaps," Hiempnos said gravely. "But if I were to answer that question honestly, I would simply tell you that every part of me says it. You would have to meet her to understand. She is not the sort of woman one imagines assassinating or being assassinated. How to put it... Do you recall your great-grandfather and the length of his reign?"

"I should think so. The man stayed king well into senility!"

"He was also one of the most intemperate of the empire's rulers. He ordered more beheadings and public slaughters than your father did. Indeed, even his family suffered. Your own grandfather despised him."

"We despised our own father," Faris interjected.

"And you killed him," Hiempnos told them. "But no one ever tried to kill your great-grandfather, or not that way. The chief druid of his time records no assassination attempts on him. Certainly the atmosphere of fear woven by his intemperate punishments could have contributed to it. Yet my mentor, one of the leading druids at the time, endorsed it as more a quality of the man himself. Not a man you thought of assassinating once you looked into his eyes, he said. I did not understand back then. I never did... until I met Shizuru Fujino."

The siblings' faces darkened as they listened to him.

"And even if you truly wish for a more practical opinion," Hiempnos went on, "I would still counsel against the course for other reasons. She has too many people surrounding her, including that witch mistress, and is also a famous warrior herself. They say she fought in the very front lines with her men against your brother Artaxi, at Argentum. She suffered no grave injuries even then! Your assassins would never get close enough to achieve their purpose... and if they do, would probably fail. Again we would have alerted her too early of our intentions then, which would only confound our cause."

Calchis blew out a loud and exasperated breath at this judgement.

"Which brings us back to the earlier plan," he said.

"To wait for her governorship to end," Faris stated.

"Or," Calchis offered, "to do it near the end of her governorship. By that time, she would have settled into thinking the empire peaceful already, giving us at least some preparatory advantages."

He could see she liked this option less. He knew why. It was the change in her: subtle but irrevocable, following the Battle of Terantrum. Not from killing their father! She had seen to that task without a worry, and even reported it with pleasure. But the battle itself had affected Faris deeply where the patricide had not.

"I'd still rather wait for her to be replaced by some other Himean governor," she said now, confirming his thoughts. He had known she would push for the option that avoided facing Shizuru Fujino. Whatever she had seen at Terantrum, it had loosened the foundation of her confidence. It was doubly alarming to him because it was not only confidence in herself that had been altered. He had seen it the moment they saw each other again after that battle; heard it when she said the deed was done but they should not celebrate.

"There's never been an army led that way," she had told him. "You don't know, Brother. You can't imagine it."

He supposed not, for it truly beggared his imagination. Even with his father's recklessness, how could an army of a hundred thousand led by five seasoned generals have lost so spectacularly? All he had expected was for the imperial army to take heavy losses, yet to prevail in the end. Well, they took heavy losses, all right! Oh, for a glimpse of what had taken place at Terantrum!

Ever since then his sister had insisted on avoiding a confrontation with that woman. When Shizuru Fujino had returned to the northwest for Tasgetia, Calchis had seen a chance. He had hatched a plan to raise a Gannian army to surround her unsuspecting forces. Not to be: Faris had sent him a druid with a shrieking objection.

Even if he managed to raise an army larger than the one Shizuru Fujino was carrying, it did not assure victory. It did not guarantee either the ability to carry the rest of the conquered empire with them. Besides, what of the rest of the Himean legions? There was no assurance their response would be to pack up and run away! Too many uncertainties, said Faris, whose message adjured him to wait another day.

Too many protests, thought Calchis. And for a battle that they could have waged on their home turf, against a surprised enemy. That was when he had seen the change in his sister unclouded.

Faris now doubted him. His loyalest adherent no longer trusted in his ability on the battlefield.

When he had spoken to their old tutor of this last winter, the chief druid had cautioned him not to take his sister's fears as cause for mistrust. In fact, Hiempnos had said, they were proof that Calchis should now trust her even more. This had shaken Calchis even further, for he had gathered what Hiempnos would not say: that the druid agreed, to some extent, with Faris's concerns.

Difficult at first to know that the two persons who believed in him most now doubted. Such was the hurt that he had sent no messages to either for a full month. He had not spent the month sulking, however: his clandestine journeys continued through the land that was his birth-right. This way he continued to gather adherents as well as information. It was a task begun even before his father's death, the moment he dissolved his little army near Tasgetia to save its warriors.

At the time, he had only thought to hasten the enemy's clash with his father by deferring his own resistance. After the king's army won, the arrangement was for Faris to assassinate their sire. It would have been the perfect time for such a coup, for the king's guard would have relaxed due to the victory celebrations. Their father feared that Fujino woman! So for her to be defeated would have occasioned such revelry that even the king's most earnest retainers would be drunk. That made Faris's task easier, after which Calchis could step in and take over what remained of the king's forces.

Well, Terantrum had changed the plan.

Throughout his journeys after that battle he had sounded out his people, from the smallest lords to the most powerful barons. Were they likely to side with him or the Himeans? Were they for restoration of their great empire or knuckling under to the invaders?

Had they enough grit left to fight for their nation, Calchis demanded, or were they content submitting to foreign powers?

It was during his investigations that he managed to make peace with Faris and Hiempnos's seeming defections. Every people he visited seemed to have been cowed into meekness by Terantrum. It all went back to that one battle! Where, he learned, the enemy had not even lost a tenth of its number. Implausible! But if so, truly cause to reassess his own talents.

Because Calchis was naturally brave, he did not spare himself the awful questions. Could he have won Terantrum in his enemy's shoes? No, he did not think he had it in him to work such a miracle. He lacked things she had, he mused, and those were things he had to consider.

He did not have her head for battle, which was nothing short of genius. He did not have her armies, whose discipline seemed inhuman. Though he had seen his share of challenges, he also did not have her uncanny equanimity against terrible odds. She dared battles even when abysmally outnumbered, something all his military learning had taught him never to try.

Though he had heard she was even younger than him-not even thirty yet, if one could credit that!-he suspected he also lacked her slipperiness. Hiempnos himself had warned that the woman was worryingly cunning even off the battleground. The archdruid said she ran rings around you in conversation as well as she did around your armies.

A quicksilver woman, Calchis thought, struggling to describe this daunting character. She would slip through your fingers when you thought you had her in hand. And she did not just slip away peacefully either, unlike that magical liquid metal: she turned in her escape and clawed you so fast you never even saw it. That was what she had done to his father and his hundred thousand. Terantrum again-it all went back to Terantrum!

Shizuru Fujino was an unnerving foe. Unnerving enough to make even him doubt himself, now that he was being awfully, painfully honest. That did not mean he was giving up. It only meant he had to change the way he fought the war against her.

The crucial point of doubt, as far as he could see, was whether or not they could defeat the woman in actual battle. Therefore, why not try to avoid meeting her thus? Why not seek out a method of fighting that limited her chances to outmanoeuvre and outstrategise him?

For instance, he had realised that one of her army's advantages was its speed. No Mentulaeen army could ever match up to that, but it did not need to, really. What they needed to figure out was how to stop her from marching in the first place. His father's generals had tried to do it by using small pinning armies. But what if what kept her pinned was less about her defence than her offence? What if what stopped her from marching was her own strategic need to take a place that could not be taken?

If you could pin her like that, you could win half the war. If there was no one in the empire to equal her generalship, the chances of there being anyone in Hime to do it were just as low. Even her own subordinates would fall short of her level. And if indeed she could be pinned, those subordinates would give him better odds: they could be defeated one by one.

This was only one possibility for his approach. He would continue to puzzle out the problem now that he had a better grasp of his opponent. The truth was, the prospect of taking on someone like Shizuru Fujino electrified him in some way. He was stretching himself and discovering new strengths, new ways of seeing war. Perhaps in facing someone of her calibre he would ensure a place for himself as the greatest of the land's emperors. Sometimes, the greatness of the enemy made the greatness of the champion.

"Well, there's only one more year to go after this one," he now told his sister and former tutor. "After that, Hime will send someone else to take over as governor, and our case will be better. Isn't that what you told us, Hiempnos?"

"Yes, that is how they work," said the chief druid. "But we do not know whom they would send. It might be someone skilled at generalling too, My Prince."

"But not like her," Faris said, before Calchis could say it. "They will never find another like her, Hiempnos. She's the one who makes the difference."

"Then," said Hiempnos, "perhaps we should plan for our muster that year, at the earliest?"

"It's possible," Calchis decided. "I still want to collect as many allies as possible. We can actually raise an army already, you know, and not even one made up only of Ganni. The problem is that it still won't be large enough to offset the foreigners' organisation. We want as many as Father had! Only, we'll be smarter about how we use them. That's why we need to work even harder to get people to pledge to us this winter. It's our good luck that our enemies have been strangely merciful. Provided a place surrenders, they don't purge it of its able-bodied. There are still so many soldiers left for our use! An oversight on their part, but we'll be sure to take advantage."

His companions issued agreement and he addressed his next words to his sibling: "Where do you plan to go next, Faris? Are you going to head to the Nervii again?"

"A little detour down south first, to get a feel for the sentiments of the tribes there," she told him. "Are you heading northeast again to the Arvetii?"

"Yes, Baroness Sedulia's been working on convincing their neighbours, the Carsinii. They've been very slow to join our coalition considering how many people they used to send to join the imperial armies."

"You can't blame them. The Himeans struck them hard."

"Which is why I gave the baroness's idea a hearing."

Hiempnos reminded the two to see the local lords too before they left the city again. The Baron Marlus and other Gannian nobles were the most loyal to the siblings' cause, but it never hurt to remind them why they gave that loyalty.

The two agreed to the suggestion.

"What about you, Hiempnos?" asked Calchis then. "How goes it with your druids and their mission?"

"Good," their chief ally said, face suddenly transformed by a smile. "My people tell me they've even managed to get at least the leaders of the Senonae and Aequani to start questioning whether the Himeans or you offer the better future. Nothing set yet. But they are asking questions."

That got his two auditors to smile back even more broadly. The nobles of the Senonae and Aequani controlled large territories in and near the empire's centre. Their high barons even lived within marching distance of the capital, which was itself filled with their people.

But Hiempnos had even more heartening news for the siblings.

"The Trocarii are also starting to split, by the way," he revealed. "The last word I had from there said half the Trocarian leaders are now in our camp. Perhaps we may tip the balance soon. That might work out for your scheme isolating Firens from its allies, Princess Faris."

The siblings were astounded. Calchis demanded to know how Hiempnos's druids had managed the feat. The Trocarii were not a numerous tribe and thus not a priority in terms of gaining manpower, yet they were important. They were among those to have gone over to the foreigners without fighting them. For them to defect would serve as excellent propaganda. It might make it easier to convince the other tribes in that area to join their pact, regardless of their treaties with the Himeans.

"It took less effort than you think," Hiempnos revealed. "The Trocarii were not pleased by what happened at Durigala. The fact that the legate responsible has not even been punished has many of them questioning the Himeans' promises. Do you know what I think has pushed matters in our favour? The fact that no one paid the Trocarii much attention during your father's reign!"

"Well," sighed Faris, with an upturn of the eyes that invoked her old Courtly manner, "they are bumpkins from a backwater. Beyond notice, in the usual way of things."

"Yes indeed, and fortunate it was for us. You see, even if they did not get the best of what was to offer in your father's reign, nor were they abused and stolen from the way that legate did under Shizuru Fujino's aegis. I told my druids to promise them justice by retrieving their exiled comrades and granting all their current high nobles positions in your future Court."

The two praised him for his handling of the situation.

"It was a good solution," Calchis said with a brisk nod. "Although I've no idea how we'll find the exiled Durigalan lords, I have to say. Even if we did know, getting them back seems impossible."

"It is impossible," Hiempnos replied, with a lift of his grey brows. "But the Trocarii need not know that, Your Highness. All they need to know is that you are willing to provide them true justice from a kinsman and Mentulaean, not some southern visitor."

---

In the meantime, the great obstacle to imperial restoration focused on her bridging project. Eager to complete it, she stayed onsite daily until the gloaming prevented further construction. A fortnight into the development, all that was left was half a day's work on the deck. The next afternoon would see the bridge ready for traffic.

She bid her officers a good evening and retired to her tent, where a pale woman waited.

"Reading still, My Polemarch?" she said, upon seeing her lover on a couch with a scroll and a five-flamed lamp on a stanchion beside her.

"Working still, My Commander?" was the Otomeian's response.

Shizuru came up for a kiss and said that she was done for the day.

"I would rather not risk work once the light is almost gone," she said. "Anyway, we are nearly finished. Have you spent all of the time reading since you left me?"

Natsuki smiled with sudden shyness.

"I had the troopers run drills too," she said. "And I walked."

She whipped something out from behind the pillows. It was a thick bouquet of flowers tied together by twine.

"I found earlier," she said, handing them to the older woman. "So I picked. Pretty, no?"

"Very pretty," Shizuru said, pleasantly surprised. "Where did you find them? I hope not too far from camp?"

"No... and I had some of the Lupines," the young woman said, heading off the query about an escort.

"That is good. And these really are beautiful. I like the colours."

There were mostly violet blooms in the bunch. Natsuki smiled again, less bashfully than before.

"I know," she said.

"Did you pick them just for me, Natsuki?"

A nod. Shizuru gazed affectionately at her.

"Thank you very much, mea vita," she said. "I adore them. See how they brighten up the place! Perhaps Hermias can put them in some water when he comes."

She had only just said this when her steward announced himself behind the curtained entrance. Shizuru bade him and the other slaves enter so they could set up her bath. She yielded the flowers to Hermias and slipped through the curtain herself.

This brought her to the section of the tent used as her study and headquarters. She glanced at her desk to see if her scribes had left any urgent notes for the day. On the way back she paused at another table, where resided a miniature model of the bridge they were constructing. Sculpted painstakingly out of clay and painted to realistic colour, it was so detailed that it even held a working miniscule crane and tiny pile drivers.

These small-scale reproductions were typical whenever her army had an engineering task that looked complicated. That included bridge building, big sieges, heavy fortification schemes, and more of the same. Three-dimensional models of these helped members of command better understand what the engineers had to deal with. It theoretically prevented them issuing orders that would contradict the engineering section's needs.

In Shizuru's case, she did not need the models. She had always ordered them done up anyway to help her officers. Later she had also discovered another reason for keeping up their use: Natsuki loved the things. Twice already Shizuru had found the Otomeian moving the functional pieces and taking them apart with dainty fingers. Interestingly, she always succeeded in putting them back together afterwards. Shizuru suspected her lover had a natural aptitude for mechanics. The girl had even figured out how to operate the legions' artillery without instruction.

She smiled when she saw that the miniature crane had already been placed by the last section of deck on the bridge model. She knew who had put it there.

When she returned to her private quarters, her flowers were already in a container of water. She moved them next to their bed. Then she sat on a stool by Natsuki's couch and waited for the washtub to be filled.

She sent her servants away for the actual bath. Natsuki too offered to help her with her ablutions, but was denied: Shizuru could see that the polemarch was already clean.

"I do not want to soil you," she said. "Please talk to me instead."

Natsuki came up to the tub anyway, and settled on a stool the servants had placed by it. Again Shizuru protested, conscious of the clean and cool scent so near her own unwashed one.

"Really, mea vita, you do not have to wash me," she reiterated.

The younger woman agreed and said she would not. She leaned her head to Shizuru's.

"I will touch only the mouth," she announced.

After a while Shizuru grumbled at the torment.

"Oh, run back to the couch!" she ordered. Even the hairs on the back of her neck were stirred by what the other had done to her lips and her tongue. "You only get more wicked over time, you know."

Her companion laughed and went off obediently, having already claimed the triumph. Shizuru imagined she would have skipped had she still been able.

"Is that Chikane's latest letter?" she asked, starting on her bath with fresh energy.

"Yes." Natsuki pointed to a desk with other scrolls. "Yours is there."

"From where is it this time, our friend's letter?"

"This is from buh-Bithynia," Natsuki replied, speaking the name of the place tentatively. Shizuru assured her she had pronounced it right. "You have ever been there, Shizuru?"

"Not yet. Do you know where it is?"

Natsuki did, as she had searched for it on one of the maps. It had become one of her favourite things to do: poring over Shizuru's charts of Mare Nostrum and tracking Chikane's progress.

It was possible because Chikane sent letters at nearly every harbour. Given the roving nature of the woman's command, the correspondence was currently one-sided. Even so Chikane kept it up, writing epistles for both Shizuru and Shizuru's lover whenever time afforded. Considering how much she had to do and all the other missives she had to write-she was writing to Senate too, for example, as well as her legates and certainly her wife-both her recipients in Septentria greatly valued her unstinting communications.

The letters for Shizuru were often about the other senators she met on her travels or about her campaign. The ones for Natsuki were about the sights and people of the latest locale where she found herself. Sometimes these were short, given how busy she was, but were nevertheless full of warmth and colour.

To make up for the shorter letters, she sent little packages for her best friend's lover and own would-be daughter. Thus far she had sent a copy of a rare book from Macedon, a large curved dagger from Thrace called a "sica", a snake-headed bracelet from Galatia, and most recently, a very eastern-looking necklace along with a pristine set of tetradrachms from Bithynia. The tetradrachms exhibited the finest Hellenic style in their portraits of Bithynia's rulers: the oldest coin had the face of the first Nicomedes on one side and the goddess Bendis on the other. It was very old, Chikane wrote, and now quite rare because the later rulers had replaced it entirely with their own currency issues. She thought Natsuki would like the coins as tokens, and she was right.

By the Galatian bracelet Shizuru was joking that she might suspect Chikane of stealing her lover were she a lesser woman. Natsuki had reminded her that she was the one who wanted them to get along.

"Not more than us!" had been Shizuru's shammed lamentation.

Her next stop, Chikane wrote to Natsuki, might be Cilicia, then Crete followed by Cyrenaica. Most of her legates had already begun organising their fleets, and had obtained promises of cooperation from the coastal provinces' governors. After her stop at Cyrenaica she thought she would be ready to commence with her grand strategy. This meant sailing all the way back west with her best armada to clean up the Mare Ibericum.

"I wonder," Natsuki mused after relating this to her lover, "what it is like, a sea battle."

"Wet," Shizuru proposed. "And probably very salty."

" Shizuru. "

"Well, I am not really the best source," Shizuru said, scrubbing busily. "Practically all of my battles have been on land thus far. What I do know, I get from uninvolved observation or others' accounts."

"But you ever want to?"

"Do a naval battle, you mean?"

"Yes."

"I do. It would be interesting to see how I fare in the water. I always wanted to give Hannibal's little trick with the snakes a try. Although that would only be an option if you had no intent of boarding the enemy ships, perhaps."

Natsuki plopped back to lie on the couch.

"Is it common to board, Shizuru?" she asked.

"I believe so, though you should ask Chikane that. For my part, I think boarding would be common because it would yield larger gains. You would have the chance to take the opponent's vessel as a prize, along with his cargo and crew."

Her supine companion said that made sense.

"I wish," she sighed afterwards, "I could see a sea battle. Someday."

Shizuru smiled, finishing her wash.

"You would like to see one?" she said. "Or do you want to participate in one?"

Natsuki said she thought she would prefer to see instead of participate in this case.

"Afraid you might fall into the waters and get wet after all?" Shizuru teased.

"What if the ships sail to me?" came the glower. "I cannot swim away fast anymore, with my leg!"

Shizuru laughed, squeezing out moisture from her hair. She got out of the tub and stood on a mat, letting her body drip the wet onto it. She could feel the green eyes running over her frame.

"Actually, Natsuki," she said as she dried and dressed herself, "even people with both legs would not be able to evade a ship. It would likely still hit them were they in its path."

She saw the haze of memory in the other's eyes and knew Natsuki was thinking of their journey to Ravenna the previous winter.

"Yes, it is very fast, a ship at full speed," mused the Otomeian. "What ships will Chikane use for her fleets, Shizuru? The big ones?"

Shizuru told her it depended on what she thought were "the big ones". Chikane would likely favour triremes. She could guess that from familiarity with her friend's own military exploits. Shizuru had once devoured the dispatches describing Chikane's naval engagements. She had been much younger then.

"She tends to agile naval tactics," she told Natsuki now, "but is also of the cautious type who wants marines aboard her ships. The trireme permits her both, so I think she would favour it. It is also common, so raising fleets of it would be easy."

It was indeed one of the most popular ships for states maintaining navies. The trireme had-as indicated by the name-three banks of oars on either side yet was still light enough for manoeuvrability. At over thirty-eight metres in length, it was also an impressive warmaking galley. A decked trireme could bear fifty marines comfortably.

The other common war galley, the smaller bireme, had no space for naval soldiers. Sometimes it was even left undecked and thus carried only professional oarsmen. Its attack was mostly restricted to ramming other ships using its broad beak. When handled by a good crew, it could be very effective at causing damage that way. Unfortunately, it was also a fair-weather vessel, prone to slewing out of control when the seas turned rough. Triremes tended to be wieldier.

"Although, of course, they cost more," Shizuru told her keenly listening lover. "Not that it should be a problem for Chikane's campaign, especially as she plans to deduct the cost of levied fleets from the provinces' tributes for the year instead of demanding money to be sent out by the Treasury. Typical of her good thinking."

"Yes, a good idea," Natsuki agreed, sitting up again. "But Shizuru! These ships."

Shizuru stifled a chuckle at the other's excitement.

"What of them?" she asked.

"There are bigger ones, no?" said Natsuki. "I think I read there are even bigger than, um, than triremes."

Shizuru sat next to her on the couch, having finished putting on a tunic.

"There are indeed," she agreed, and relinquished the towel in her hands to her mistress. Natsuki wanted to dry her hair for her.

"Tell me," the younger woman said. "These big ships... did we see any at the harbour in Argus last time?"

"We may have, but I cannot recall, mea vita. Most of the Argus war galleys are in fact triremes, however. That much I know."

"Tell. Tell of the bigger ships?"

Shizuru had a suspicion that her paramour was so enthusiastic because she was still thinking of ships as big toys that always cooperated. Little more than fast craft to ride for one's fancies, basically. That was probably because her only sea voyage thus far had been done at remarkable speed. Natsuki did not yet know how troublesome ships could be in either poor sailing conditions or when they suffered an unlocateable leak.

Shizuru humoured her anyway. She spoke of bigger ships like the quadriremes and quinqueremes, logically the next sizes in the series. They had a misunderstanding when Natsuki said she could only imagine how tall such ships' sides must be. Then Shizuru realised the girl's misconception and went to correct it.

"Those polyremes are not named like the bireme and trireme, though it seems like it," she told the Otomeian. "The bireme gets its name from having two banks of oars, yes, just as the trireme is named for its three banks. This is not the case for the bigger ones."

Once one passed the trireme, polyremes' names no longer depended on the number of oar banks. The fact was that no galley could hold more than three banks of oars per side. To put even just one more bank of oars beyond that number was physically impossible.

Hence ships bigger than triremes took their names from the number of men per oar instead. A quadrireme, for example, had four rowers per oar. Yet it still had only three oar banks per side.

The name still served to indicate overall ship size. Triremes-also called "threes"-were bigger than biremes or "twos". Quadriremes or "fours" were bigger than both. Quinqueremes or "fives" were bigger than all of those others.

Size in a ship did not necessarily mean warfaring improvement, however. The Rhodians, for instance, tended to stick to lightly-built triremes themselves. And they were still high-unbeatable on the water.

"So you can expect Chikane to levy a fleet complete with sailors and officers from them," Shizuru told her lover. "No Himean admiral bypasses Rhodes! Fortunately, it has learned enough by now to give us what we want when we demand it... most of the time, anyway."

To further illustrate the fallacy of ship size being equivalent to naval power, she told Natsuki of the great barges she had seen in Egypt. This was when she had visited that land briefly near the close of her Numidian campaign.

"The royal Egyptians use large, multi-hulled craft on the River Nile," she related. "They basically join two galleys together with a large deck spanning the gap between them."

She held Natsuki's hand palm up horizontally and ran a finger on either side, from little finger to wrist, then from thumb to wrist.

"Imagine your palm is the deck," she said. "The parts I just stroked are where the galleys go, connected by the deck. The result is a single vessel with more than one hull."

Natsuki's wondering murmur told her the image she had conjured up was exciting. She gladly answered the younger woman's next question, which was about the size of the largest barge she had ever seen.

"I had the good luck to see Ptolemy the Fourth's barge," she revealed, easily recalling her own astonishment at that vessel in spite of the years. How her whole company had stared when they had set eyes on that particular craft! It had been like seeing an insula moving down a stream.

"They called it a 'forty'," she said to her engrossed auditor. "And would you believe it actually looked like it deserved the name? It was only a little weathered by the time we saw it-the later Ptolemies had been fairly conscientious about its upkeep-but it remained the most impressive ship ever built, I think. A full hundred-and-thirty metres from bow to stern! You could have mounted more than a legion's complement of artillery on its deck and been left ample space for marines."

Natsuki was amazed and asked if it had ever been used for war.

"I do not think so, which brings me back to my original point," Shizuru told her. "Any admiral will tell you that the bigger ships actually tend to be worse in combat. The Egyptian barge I just described would have failed in a heartbeat in actual warfare. It could not have evaded or chased down smaller ships ramming its sides. And as for bringing it out into the open seas? An instant disaster.

No, Dear, the really large ships are just for display. Chikane herself will tell you that if you ask her."

Soon after, she summoned Hermias and the servants back to take away the washtub and serve a late dinner. Only after that did she settle down in bed with Natsuki curled up at her side.

Well-fed and comfortable, she decided to open Chikane's letter. It was rather longer than the one the woman had sent to the polemarch. She supposed her friend had a lot of political news from the east.

Greetings this time from Bithynia, my friend. I am here to acquire ships from King Nicomedes. Like most sovereigns, he claimed inability to accommodate my demands at first. Like most sovereigns, he also changed his tune after we had a little conversation.

Unlike most sovereigns, however, our dialogue was not of politics or state matters. King Nicomedes was far more interested in learning how I tended to my skin. The king laments that his own grows drier daily and blames it on the region's troubles-which could desiccate most hides at the moment, I shall admit.

I told His Highness that if he wore less face paint, it might benefit his skin by permitting it to breathe. In truth, however, I think no amount of respiration can make a difference. His Highness is already some sixty years old, although he dresses thirty years younger. I was mum on that fact throughout our dialogue, as indeed I was on the fact that he paints his lips the wrong colour.

After our lengthy and curiously enjoyable chat, I convinced him to grant me a fleet. He convinced me in turn to stay in the palace, having taken a fancy to my skincare expertise. I admit I am tended very considerably, and the company is rather good. The king may have his peculiarities but he is a truly warm person. As is his wife, who dons less face paint than her husband.

My campaign's preparations still go well and my tasks remain mostly logistical at the moment. Nonetheless, I learned here that one of my legates has already had a brush with the foe. Nagato Fune-san, specifically, whom I sent to Rhodes to levy a fleet of crewed ships.

She was supposed to deliver them to me for use in my personal fleet, and she ran into a pirate admiral shortly after setting out for this.

The pirate she met is one who has pillaged many of our ships over the past ten years. It was Eurybatus himself, one of the scourges of Our Sea. It speaks to the success of this outlaw on our waters that he did not even hesitate at the sight of a Rhodian fleet. Fune-san tells me he made straight for them, which was his first mistake. One does not attack a Rhodian navy head-on, unless one is certain of outmanoeuvring them.

Fune-san and the Rhodians whipped Eurybatus. I told you his first mistake was in taking on the Rhodians directly. His second was in taking on Fune-san. She commands on water as well as any Rhodian admiral-no question how her family got their name!

Now for a brief naval lesson that may or may not be needed. You told me to presume you knew little of naval warfare when I wrote of my campaign's battles. Even so, I am aware that you have more knowledge of naval combat than most who have never actually participated in it.

You have seen a Rhodian flotilla fight before. This tells me you know of their ships' and crews' agility. I know not, however, if you have ever seen them execute the manoeuvre they call "sailing through the enemy".

Assuming the opponent's fleet has the classic line formation, it necessitates each of your own ships sailing towards them as if to ram them head on. The true goal is to sail through the gaps between the enemy's ships, however. Once past, your vessels must turn swiftly and thus have the enemy's sterns at their mercy. Anything from boarding to ramming or even shearing off the enemy's oars with their beaks becomes child's play.

As you may imagine, this move requires the utmost skill and speed. There is a moment right before your ships enter the gaps when they are vulnerable to myriad perils. But the best of the Rhodian crews practise this manoeuvre hundreds of times before they use it in battle. For her engagement with Eurybatus, Fune-san had them demonstrate the fruit of all that practice.

Eurybatus limped his way home at sundown minus a sunken vessel and with nine others damaged. Fune-san also captured one of his quinqueremes as well as a quadrireme and their crews. As for my Rhodian fleet, my legate delivered it to me intact! I am keeping her in charge of them as my personal fleet's second-in-command. She has more than proven herself worthy of it.

I intend to exploit the Rhodians' abilities to the fullest once I start sweeping out Mare Nostrum's rubbish. I shall have to combine them with some of my other ships, of course. The Rhodian ones are only partially decked. Not ideal for bearing marines or boarding, and I still do want good soldiers sailing with my fleet.

As you guessed when we met in Argus, however, I am eschewing the corvus. This boarding bridge can be a boon, admittedly, when the enemy has inferior or no marines on its vessels. After all, it turns a sea battle into a land one by creating a bridge between galleys.

All one has to do is get close enough to the enemy ship and winch the corvus down until the free end hits the opponent's deck. The device's beak makes it impossible to dislodge once there, so you effectively get a gangplank wedding your ship to the enemy's. Marines can just run from your deck to theirs. A handy way to solve the problem if your infantry is stronger than your actual navy.

The difficulty is that the corvus is too heavy and destabilising. Its weight slows vessels too much, while the height and width of its plank in the vertical or unused position affect the ship's agility in a strong wind. Some of our previous admirals risked it because they were still uncomfortable with true naval warfare. I like to think I am not so handicapped. Anyway, I hardly used it myself when I was legating for Suzuhara-san, so my tactics have never been dependent on it.

Most of my ships are going to be triremes.

Shizuru paused to chuckle quietly at this confirmation of her guess to Natsuki. How well she did know her friend!

It means extra work every night for my crews-triremes have to be dragged out of the water regularly, to avoid them getting sodden-but it is manageable. I recently got twenty large and sturdy quinqueremes too, but not by asking. They were sent as a gift by none other than King Mithridates of Pontus! He sent them with a fulsome letter packed with rhetorical stylings that I misdoubt the king ever learned from his pedagogue. Someone certainly wrote that letter for him.

Why did I not succumb to the blandishments of our lovely and generous Pontic king? Oh, you would not either! Mithridates is the slaving wolf decked out as a lamb. I submit wolfishness would be necessary to hold on to kingship in a place like Pontus. The standard method of succession seems to be patricide or matricide in that realm. Even so, Mithridates is doubly dangerous compared to his forebears. That is since this particular wolf slavers over all he surveys... and standing in Pontus, you can survey nearly the whole region.

You recall how, before your second Mentulæan Campaign, the old king of Cappadocia suddenly died of what had seemed a trifling illness. No sooner had his last breath evanesced than there was suddenly a new king on the throne. It was a boy supposed to be a half-brother, sired by the late king's father in his dotage. Although if anyone counted the years right, the late king's father would have had to sire the boy beyond his death for it to be true!

Well, it was Mithridates of Pontus who gave that boy the crown of Cappadocia. He marched his army into the country, put the boy on the throne, and claimed he was the lad's protector. What else could the Cappadocians have done other than kneel to the boy-king he was forcing on them? Theirs is a poor land without a permanent army. They had to acquiesce.

Shortly after Mithridates and his army left, Cappadocia revolted. The natives knew the lad was a Mithridatic puppet! They said the boy-king had also a distinct look of Mithridates himself... who is rumoured to be his real father.

The Cappadocians deposed their puppet boy-king and installed a distant nephew to the old king instead. This distant nephew is the Ariobarzanes who has been staying in Fuuka.

Just to remind you of how he got there, Mithridates deposed him against the Cappadocian people's wishes. Our Pontic lord marched his army back to Cappadocia when he learned his son-oh dear, did I say "his son"? I meant "his charge", which makes little difference!- had been ejected.

That is how the boy-king ended up in Cappadocia again and the rightful king Ariobarzanes came to Senate for help. He knew Mithridates would kill him if he returned to his throne without our assistance. Which we obviously owe him, otherwise Mithridates of Pontus shall keep expanding and threaten not just our allies but our own province in Asia. For why else has our garrison in Asia Province been strengthened over the past years if not for the unrest this despot is raising?

So you comprehend why I am wary of this eastern tyrant in spite of his overtures of friendship. Before you ask it, I still took his gift of vessels. I might as well, especially before he learns of the Fuukan galley sailing this way. I just learned of it myself from one of my legates: it bears none other than King Ariobarzanes of Cappadocia. Senate has decided to reinstall him in his throne, escorted by one of the praetors. I wager King Mithridates might not be so keen to give me ships after that happens.

Now I come to what may be the most interesting news of this letter. I already had some bits of it before, but hesitated to write until I knew more. What has prodded me into revealing it now? It was the deputation King Mithridates sent to present me with the quinqueremes.

Most of the members of that delegation were high lords and ladies of Pontus. Therefore, they were unknown to me until then. But in the middle of them was a face that I recognised in spite of its owner's new oriental garb. It was your absconded cousin-by-law, Tomoe Marguerite!

Shizuru's head jerked in surprise. Now there was one name she had not expected!

I quizzed her on her presence, and she claimed to have struck up a friendship with the Pontic king during her travels. He asked her to accompany his deputation, as she would have better knowledge of Himeans than any member of his Court. She was there, in effect, as a sort of advisor-although the topics on which she advises Mithridates may not be as diplomatic as she asserts.

To explain why I say this, I must return to the "bits" I mentioned earlier. They came to me in my passage through Macedonia and Greece. During my stops in those areas, I saw some retired senators as well as former colleagues (exiles, that is). From them as well as some locals, I collected strange rumours about your cousin.

Shizuru gave a soft laugh that held no amusement. Strange rumours about Tomoe? Those had been around even when the woman had still lived in Hime! Inevitable, what with her deceitful nature and fondness for studying noxious substances. It was out of pure scientific curiosity, she had claimed, though her smarter auditors had found that poor reassurance. Scientific study presupposed some measure of testing and experimentation, after all, and one did hear such stories...

She would have massaged a temple but found the hand not on the scroll restrained. Natsuki had fallen asleep holding on to it.

She found her smile again at that and returned to Chikane's script.

It appears that, contrary to the usual style for senators abroad, she has spent the past years renting cottages in the Grecian countryside. An odd choice given how we senators always tend to gravitate to more civilised society. Yet she insisted on staying outside the urban areas, in spite of receiving invitations from other Himeans in such places.

As far as I can gather, she has been staying in or near small villages instead. I suppose one might argue that the rural quiet sets a more relaxing pace. What concerns me about this trend, however, is that most of the villages she has stayed in seem to have seen bizarre cases of sickness.

Three persons suffering prolonged attacks of hallucination at one place, two dying of sudden convulsions at another. In one village, wholly a quarter of the population succumbed to an enteric fever that only ceased when they changed their source of water.

A number of our overseas citizens know her interest in apothecary studies, which is why they marked the synchronicity later. Not even to ascribe culpability to her, by the way, which is understandable-one hesitates to think something so depraved of a fellow Himean, especially when on foreign soil. Most were only thinking of asking her for an opinion on what medicaments could have alleviated the locals' illnesses.

I hope you shall forgive me if I say the better question might have been to ask what substances would have achieved those illnesses. The stories paint a suspicious portrait of her, Shizuru, which is only worsened when one considers what she did to you in the past. And now, she has suddenly materialised in the East! As advisor to a king who is himself hugely suspect. How I wish I could stay long enough at one port to get a letter from you in response to this one! For I have a feeling you share my suspicions of both of these odd characters.

Chikane's feeling was correct, thought a disturbed Shizuru, especially when it came to Tomoe. Oh, she believed Chikane's suggestions! Tomoe had very likely played a part in all those inexplicable illnesses among the Greek provincials. The wretch must have been experimenting with her precious distillates and exotic powders again!

Shizuru had long thought Tomoe a little unbalanced. This was even before the woman had wronged her by conspiring to remove her from the first Northern Campaign. Now, however, she believed her earlier assessment had erred on mildness. Tomoe was very likely on the brink of lunacy. Especially after everything that had happened.

People getting sick, people dying in hideous circumstances. All because of one woman's malicious interests. A woman who, in spite of it all, was still legally family to her and Shizuma. Distasteful! It was such a repulsive connection on any level. One that she still felt transferred some of its taint on her. But what more could she have done to distance herself from it other than what she had done in the past?

A hard thought intruded at that question. Should she have finished Tomoe properly back then? In allowing Tomoe to go into a sort of voluntary exile, she had technically passed up a chance to prosecute the woman. Had Tomoe been prosecuted successfully, her exile from Fuuka would have been enforced by law. Since it was not, she still had the option to return at some point in the future, perhaps when enough persons had forgotten about her old crime. And perhaps if she accumulated sufficient fortune in her wanderings to exchange silver handshakes with some influential Himeans.

Shizuru shook her head and put Chikane's scroll down. She hoped her friend would steer clear of that woman. Especially after the stories from Greece, Shizuru would trust nothing she loved within a metre of Tomoe.

Amazing that she had only heard of the woman again now. Was that an indication of how preoccupied she had been with her governorship? Or of Tomoe's growing artfulness? Either way, she doubted Tomoe's own news of her was similarly sparse. The Septentrian Campaign ensured that Shizuru's name would have been the talk of senators even outside of Fuuka. Tomoe probably knew more about her doings than Shizuru knew of Tomoe's at the moment. That was a disadvantage.

The woman was an enemy now-of that, Shizuru was certain. But was she an enemy who would dare another confrontation? She hoped not: the woman's travels seemed to be taking her further east, fortunately. Pontus might as well be a world away from Hime.

Yet what was that she liked to say herself? That the world was getting smaller?

She inhaled sharply; a tug on her thumb. Natsuki had squeezed her hand, moved by a dream. There was a crease to the white brow and Shizuru reached over with her other hand to stroke it away. She kept it up until the young woman's face was peaceful again.

Shizuru's own was not. An uneasy question had come to mind: had Tomoe learned yet of Natsuki? If she had news of the Northern Campaign, that was probably included. Shizuru refrained from telling her inamorata this, but the girl was perhaps the most famous mistress of any Himean senator at present. And if she was talked about thus in Hime and Fuuka, she would be talked about thus too in other places with Himeans and Fuukans.

Oh yes, Tomoe Marguerite probably knew of Shizuru's lover. Not a good thing, especially if Tomoe Marguerite still cherished hopes of someday returning to Hime. That was because Chikane was right and Shizuru had her own suspicions. One of them-practically a certainty-was that Tomoe would despise the Princess Natsuki's existence.

Chapter 80

Vocabulaire:

1. Aedile - An office often occupied by senators in the early stages of their careers. Aediles are responsible for various things, from Rome's buildings to organisation of the public games.
2. Curia - In full, Curia Hostilia, or the place where the Roman Senate held its meetings. In relation to the Well of the Comitia (s.v.), the Curia was supposed to be close enough that people standing on the steps of its front entrance could see and hear whatever happened in the Well. As the Well was recessed (lower than the ground around it) and the Curia elevated (set on high foundations), the Curia's steps literally overlooked the Well.
3. Curule chair - A backless folding chair with crossed legs and an ivory veneer, used by Roman senators who were in curule offices, i.e. magistrates holding imperium.
4. Condemno (L.) - One of the standard options for jurors or voters in a trial: "I condemn."/"I find (him) guilty."
5. Corona obsidionalis, corona graminea - The 2 names for the highest military decoration awarded to an Ancient Roman. In this story, only 7 Himeans have ever merited it. In Rome's, the number goes up to 8: Augustus Caesar is excluded from the count because his crown was never won in battle. Like many other decorations given to Roman Emperors, it was purely honorary and granted by cronies/politicians, not the soldiers... which made it arguably worthless by comparison to the 8 crowns won by genuine military heroes.
6. Forum - The Forum Romanum, or the centre of public life in Rome. One found in/around it such buildings as the Curia (s.v.), Well of the Comitia (s.v.), Domus Publica, Regia, and the chief temples.
7. Himean Games - Hime's equivalent for the Roman Games, or the ## ludi romani.

8. Hispania Citerior (L.) - The nearer of the two Spains, with its more distant half being Hispania Ulterior.

9. Imperium (L.) - Essentially the degree of authority owned by a magistrate of Rome. Army generals and provincial governors also have imperium.

10. Knights - Also equites, equestrians, or members of the Ordo Equester. These are the businesspeople of Rome, often as wellborn as the senators and even related to them. A knight chose a commercial career, however, whereas a senator chose a political one.

11. Lictors - An Ancient Roman public servant removed almost entirely from use in this story. In this setting, they are available only to magistrates with imperium (s.v.) and can be called upon to help the magistrate discharge his or her duties.

12. Pascera - A location granted to the Otomeian auxiliaries under an indefinite lease, as gratitude for their efforts in the war. First mentioned in Chapter 71.

13. Plebeian Assembly - One of the main gatherings of the Romans when called together to deal with state and other matters. The Plebeian Assembly may be called into gathering only by a tribune of the plebs (s.v.) and is made up only of plebeians (see the note on plebeian vs. patrician). Voting in the Plebeian Assembly is done within tribes (s.v.).

14. Plebeian Tribunate - The other name for the office occupied by the tribunes of the plebs (s.v.).

15. Plebeian vs. patrician - The patricians descend from the original blue bloods/nobility from the time of kings. The plebeians are everyone else, regardless of wealth or social status.

16. Sumio Fujimoto - A character in the story. Last year's (as of this chapter) governor of Hispania Citerior (s.v.) and accused of a massive list of crimes by the province's inhabitants. See Chapter 77 for more details. Hit Ctrl+F and search for "The past year's governor of Hispania".

17. Shizuru's 'undercover' land bill or agrarian law - A bill Fumi Katou brought to the Plebeian Assembly; it claimed to "bank"/tuck aside some of the Septentrian territories for Hime's future. In reality, it was intended to save those territories from interested knights or senators so that Shizuru could legislate to pension them out to her legions after the war. Only Fumi and Shizuru know that. See Fumi and Shizuru's conversation in Chapter 77 . Hit Ctrl+F and search for "The land bill I want passed".

18. Tribes - A political category for the Romans, who divided all of their citizens into 35 tribes. Tribal membership is dependent on one's antecedents, e.g. the child of a family belonging to the tribe Stellatina would be a member of Stellatina as well. Note that this usage of the word tribe is exclusive to the Himeans in the story . Note too that when Himean tribes are voting, the winning side needs at least 18 tribes (the majority for a total of 35) voting for it.

19. Tribunes of the plebs - Members of the Plebeian Tribunate; ten are elected yearly. Only plebeians can be elected into this college and only plebeians can vote for election of these officials. A tribune of the plebs could veto virtually any decision of fellow government officials (except for the Dictator). As they could enact or veto laws, they were important when it came to legislative action. As seen in this chapter, they had other powers within the Plebeian Assembly (s.v.).

20. Well of the Comitia - A great sunken area in the Forum (s.v.) where the Plebeian Assembly (s.v.) held its meetings.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Come October, Shizuru had more on her mind than the sudden reappearance of Tomoe. Her correspondents in Hime wrote that Fumi Katou had arraigned Sumio Fujimoto in the Plebeian Assembly. According to her sources-who included Fumi Katou herself-the charges laid were for extortionate administration and gubernatorial corruption.

Fumi had spent a lot of time preparing for the case. Shortly after securing the passage of Shizuru's 'undercover' land bill in March, she had sailed for Hispania Citerior to do research. She went armed with two assistants and numerous letters of reference. These came courtesy of Shizuru's clients and agents in the Spains. Recent acquaintance Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki had contributed something as well. It was a letter of introduction to the present Hispania Citerior governor, a family friend.

Fumi herself obviously donated effort to the cause, but that was not the end of her investment. It cost money to do case investigation, especially at the pace that she set. The fastest gigs had to be hired for transport, numerous palms greased to speed up the release of documents. Some informants' tongues were unlocked by money and some witnesses even required financial assistance to journey to Hime.

Fortunately, Fumi was wealthy. The Katou-a knightly family-held goodly properties in their home territory of Picenum, and the rents from these sustained Fumi comfortably. It little troubled her to spend coin on cherished projects, and a trial that so clearly demanded justice was very much cherished. This combined with the other tools her allies had put at her disposal: when she returned to Hime in August, she bore masses of evidence.

She could have arraigned Sumio Fujimoto right then, and indeed had to fight her own impatience not to do it. She chose to wait instead for late September. It was a choice made in cognisance of the city's socio-political calendar.

September was the month of the Himean Games. Organised by the curule aediles, they featured lavish pageants of showmanship and sport. There would be chariot races, extravagant parades, musical presentations, and plays galore. If the aediles found the purse for it there were even gladiators' matches and novelties like contortionists and sword swallows. Generally speaking, the aediles found the purse for such exhibitions. In fact, the more money they spent on the games, the better for their careers.

This was because the aedileship was one of the ways young senators garnered public attention. The other way was to enter the Plebeian Tribune and stir up a ruckus, but that option was obviously open only to plebeians. Unless a patrician was lucky enough to earn a rare distinction very early-as a certain famous senator had by winning a corona obsidionalis -the only way to match the noisy tribunes of the plebs was to become an aedile and give great games for the people.

Hence the simple formula: the better the games given, the more popular the aediles. Superb games could get a young senator's career off to a fine start. Superb games cost, however, and certainly more than the public funds allocated. Which meant that many a young senator finished his aedileship up to his neck in debt, having borrowed heavily to plump his budget.

On the brighter side, the rest of Hime could enjoy the aediles' efforts for free. Watching the many entertainments of the Himean Games cost nothing, and many aediles even strove to offer free refreshment. Most of the money spent by the spectators was consumed by gambling.

The games lasted fifteen days from early to middle September. This month was therefore when the city was at its fullest. Rural Himeans flooded it then and joined the city's permanent inhabitants in clogging up the roads, eager to enjoy the extravaganza.

Thus when Fumi set Sumio Fujimoto's trial for late September, she did it to play before a Forum packed with more observers than usual. Much of the crowd from the games remained and thought it fun to stay a little longer for a final spectacle.

For a spectacle the Fujimoto Trial would be, Fumi had guaranteed everyone.

It was titillating from the start due to its being carried out in the Plebeian Assembly. It had been a long time since the assemblies had heard a trial, for the reasons Shizuru had detailed to her foreign mistress in Ravenna. The permanent or standing courts had taken over practically all juridical business since their establishment. Now Fumi was reminding Hime of the assemblies' judicial power.

To add to the titillation, it would be a magnified extortion trial. Extortion trials often got the most attention among Forum frequenters. This was because they offered a rare chance to punish the highest members of society. That they also rarely ended with convictions did not matter. There was always the hope, the tiny chance of seeing a hoity-toity senator slapped with a terrible punishment.

Other factors contributed to the excitement. Like the defendant's name, which belonged to one of Hime's most famous clans. Or the early rumours of his transgressions, supposedly so vile that they had caused near a dozen of Hispania's temples to curse him.

Finally, there was the penalty Sumio Fujimoto would face if convicted. Fumi Katou had declared at her arraignment that she would follow the Extortion Court's maximum penalty. That was two hundred and fifty percent of the amount extorted.

The total value had to be calculated to include the price of misappropriated objects. Because the charges against Sumio Fujimoto also included lasting and incapacitating harm to certain victims, the amount was padded by the estimated damages owed to some unfortunate locals of Hispania Citerior.

In the end, the base sum was set at an incredible thousand and five hundred talents. Which made the final penalty three thousand and seven hundred fifty talents. Even for a Fujimoto, absolutely unpayable! In sesterces, it totalled over ninety-three million!

"It's the trial of the year, if not the decade," pronounced Chie Harada to fellow senator and plebeian Mai Tokiha. The two were pushing their way into the Well of the Comitia with several burly attendants. Even with these slaves' help they found the going slow and difficult. There were so many attendees in the Well that they were jammed all together, a farrago of people from every social stratum.

"I know you're coming to vote as well," Chie said to her companion. She was practically shouting, but it still seemed a modest volume compared to the buzz of the crowd. "Are you leaning to any side in advance, Mai-san?"

"Honestly, I'd like to hear the trial first," Mai called back. "Although if the rumours I've heard are proven true, I'm going to be voting condemno. Did you hear the one that claims he sought to rape a girl within her father's house right after the father had thrown him a banquet?"

"Yes, by the gods! It makes the gorge rise, doesn't it?"

Chie stumbled into one of their escorts and flinched at his potent smell of garlic. All the bodybuilding professional bodyguards and gladiators smelled like that, so it was no surprise. They chewed garlic whenever they could get it because the raw herb was said to enhance one's musculature. But good heavens, how the odour made one wish there were muscle-enhancing olive oil instead!

She righted herself and leaned in to her companion, who was talking about the crowd they had entered.

"It seems nearly every plebeian senator's present," Mai observed. "There are faces here we never even see the rest of the year!"

"Most of them are here just to vote to absolve him, you know."

"Yes, but with this many people, nothing's for certain," the ginger senator said.

She knew most of the senators present would be voting to liberate Fujimoto regardless of what happened during the hearing. It did not matter if he was guilty, and indeed a good number of them believed him to be. All that mattered was that he was a fellow senator, and the Senate closed ranks when one of its members was endangered. Especially if said member was endangered by the common people!

"Reito-san says the Fujimoto actually dispatched people to drag even doddering and sick clients out of bed to help in the vote. Some even had to be helped to walk here."

"When did he tell you that?" Chie asked, so quickly that the other senator blushed. The question was innocent, however, as was made patent by the short-haired woman's next remark: "I suppose the Princeps has informants all over the place, so I shouldn't be surprised he heard of that before I did. Still, it tells you how concerned the Fujimoto are. Along with the rest of our fellows."

"There's a very real possibility they won't carry the day," Mai said, eyeing the anxious looks on their colleagues' faces. "They're afraid."

"They should be," Chie returned. "Even the knights are split on the issue. Those with alliances to the Fujimoto will obviously vote to absolve. Yet there are many knights indignant at Fujimoto's treatment of even some knights in his former province. He crossed a line many senators don't even dare to tiptoe."

" If the allegations are true."

"Oh, come, Mai-san! You know he did it," the other woman cried in exasperation. "It's no secret what sort of man Sumio Fujimoto is, not among our fellows. This is just the public airing of a bad character we've known about forever!"

"Still, Chie-san," the other said, twisting a little because she wanted to be just. "We have to give him a fair hearing. It's unfair to condemn a man before a trial."

"Tell that to the people Fujimoto condemned during his governorship. I hear he accused people of crimes just so they would pay him something to retract the accusation. Convenient when you're also the chief judge of a province, isn't it?"

The defendant's advocates were already on the rostra. All were of superb oratorical ability and impressive lineages. They were also of conservative backgrounds, for obvious reasons.

Unfortunately for Fujimoto, however, one of the best conservative speakers was unable to act as his advocate. Sergay Wang could not address the Plebeian Assembly, as Shizuru had told her mistress months earlier. A patrician, he had no choice save to watch the proceedings from the Curia's steps overlooking the Well of the Comitia.

When all participants were at their places, the trial got underway. It seemed to hit a snag early when two conservative tribunes of the plebs stepped forth to interpose their vetoes. That was resolved thanks to the audience, in no mood to be cheated of entertainment.

When the conservative tribunes opened their mouths to veto, they were drowned out by a roar. Before they could raise their voices again, angry hands hauled them down from the rostra. Hundreds of other hands passed them around until the shocked tribunes finally emerged at the very edge of the mass. There they were seized by a dozen rough fellows who would vanish like bubbles at the conclusion of the trial. These bore the tribunes off to the cliffs of the Capitol, still roaring all the while: again the noise prevented the manhandled pair from making their vetoes heard. Once far enough from the Well of the Comitia, the abductors ringed the two tribunes and detained them for the rest of the hearing.

Thus freed to commence her proceedings, Fumi Katou began her prosecution with a warning glance to her remaining fellows. Two others were on her side, including the tribune everyone knew to be Shizuru Fujino's. The rest of her tribunician colleagues were either conservative or middle-of-the-bench. These took heed of what had happened to two of their fellows and let Fumi go on with her trial.

It was as great a spectacle as the crowd could have wanted. Sumio Fujimoto's corruptions had been so flagrant that the prosecution's evidence appalled even his supporters. Witnesses of impeccable station were produced to relate stories of atrocious villainy. Devastated youths produced legal wills that Fujimoto had contravened by confiscating their inheritances. Farmers brought ledgers showing that their former governor had compelled them to sell produce to him at a quarter of the price. Then even more witnesses came to attest that he had resold that produce at a criminal profit. The friend of the father who had been executed for defending his daughter's virtue wept so piteously on the rostra that she fainted.

There were even two men and one woman who slipped off their tunics to display backs covered by crosshatched cicatrices. They had been scourged since they would not pay the arbitrary fines Fujimoto had demanded of their farmlands. It made matters worse when all three provided irrefutable proof of their status. All were Himean citizens! And no Himean citizen-save those in the army, or those convicted of the gravest crimes-could be subjected to the whip.

An especially interesting addition to the witness roster was an actual prince from Mauretania. Fumi introduced him by explaining that Mauretania was an African kingdom that had helped win the Himean-Numidian War years earlier. She left out the fact that Mauretania had initially sided with Numidia in that war. The upper classes and politically-informed already knew that: the lower classes did not, as they were always a little sketchy on international relations unless the subject was the chief antagonist in a Himean war. Hence the crowd, mostly made up of middle and lower classes, were predisposed to looking favourably on the prince up on the rostra.

His testimony shed further light on Fujimoto's avarice. The prince had recently visited Hime to convey Mauretania's latest tribute and remind the Senate of a request his father had made to it. In aid of getting that request granted, the prince had also brought on his ship a gigantic golden candelabra studded with gems. It was to be offered as a gift to the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus in Hime.

His vessel was driven to Hispania Citerior's ports shortly after setting out by squally weather. Hispania Citerior's Governor Fujimoto had invited him and his retinue to a feast, as indeed was customary when hosting royals from allied kingdoms. One of the prince's men let slip during the dinner that they were bearing a wondrous gift for one of the great temples of Hime. Fujimoto, instantly intrigued, requested a quick look at the treasure. In the manor, he argued, he could also help them keep it safe from pirates or bandits, thanks to his troops.

The prince acquiesced and brought the artwork to the governor's palace. When it came time to set sail again, however, he could not retrieve the candelabra. At first, his servants were merely delayed and dismissed by the governor. When he himself attempted to come for the treasure, Fujimoto responded by flat out requesting the object. The prince demurred, saying the candelabra was his father's gift to the god Jupiter, not to a provincial governor.

This was when the governor had the prince and his retinue ejected from the island. According to Fujimoto, who kept the candelabra, Mauretanian pirates had just attacked Hispania's ports. This meant the prince could be considered an enemy of Hime if he stayed.

"But there were no such pirates," the prince asserted loudly on the rostra, booming his voice so that the whole Well of the Comitia could hear his indignation. "We have been fighting pirates too all this time, so why would our kingdom be considered in league with them? We have even contributed a fleet to Commander Chikane Himemiya's campaign just recently! We were accused only so the governor could steal the artwork he wanted! He stole it not even from me but from Hime's great god, Jupiter Best and Brightest, to whom it had already been dedicated by our own religious! The man would tempt the wrath of the great god himself!"

The crowd was already flogged to outrage by the litany of excesses. At the tale of this fresh sacrilege, it experienced a shiver of superstitious fear. Even some of the senators in the Well exchanged appalled glances.

Come the time for Fujimoto's advocates to speak, they were barely audible above the hundreds of voices abusing the defendant. Only the consular lictors, dispatched to surround the accused man, prevented the spectators from going at him with their hands. It was clear by then where most of the watchers' sympathies were.

Fujimoto's supporters did not give up. They heckled the prosecuting tribune of the plebs so much that she could barely say a word towards the end. As it was during the moment when the prosecution was supposed to call for the voters to decide the case, the crowd itself was incensed by the deferment: they wanted to see this drama come to its conclusion. In their anger, they shouted at the hecklers on the Curia. After some senators shouted back, it turned into a fracas.

It only ended when the unrulier elements of the mob began pelting the senators on the steps. They used only clumps of earth and soft foodstuff, so no one got hurt at first. When the more hot-headed senators retaliated by lobbing back the items from their higher position, however, some ruffians actually had the nerve to launch hardier missiles.

This evacuated the steps of the Curia, especially when a turnip struck Natsuhiro Yoshinaka-not even a Fujimoto supporter-and nearly sent him tumbling off his perch. Some of the other senators bore the disoriented man off into the shady retreat of the interior Curia. His aghast wife, a plebeian, was trapped in the crowd within the Well of the Comitia.

Deprived of her noisiest hecklers, Fumi proceeded with the trial. The Fujimoto supporters within the Plebs were actually easier to manage. This was since they currently stood cheek to cheek with those most eager to convict the defendant. It made them easier to cow into silence, which Fumi did so she could call for the voting.

The ballot went very quickly and with a clear direction. Fujimoto's supporters lost hope with each successive tribe's announcement of its result. Most of the audience was so far against the defendant that all was concluded by the nineteenth tribe's decision. Sumio Fujimoto, former governor of Hispania Citerior, was convicted.

It was a great coup, Fumi wrote to Shizuru . Even greater as the arrogant boob actually thought he would get off! He didn't even salt away his misbegotten valuables, which demonstrates the degree of his delusion. It's perfectly normal for a defendant to send some precious possessions overseas, along with his bank account's contents. Most senators do it to ensure the State won't grab their wealth if they get convicted, especially if they think there's a chance of losing at court.

His own advocates told him to do it, some told me after. Fujimoto didn't listen because he thought I had no chance of winning. How he could have thought that is beyond me: with his record of evildoings and in the Plebeian Assembly? But then, many of the things the man did are beyond me. I don't think we'll ever know exactly what sort of madness gripped that one's mind.

We won't be able to get anything like the amount I stipulated for his penalty. That's why he's going into exile after all: there's no other choice now that he's been saddled with an impossible obligation. Near four thousand talents-it's a sum even the Treasury would cry over. Fujimoto's definitely crying about it! His house and everything in it won't even come to six hundred.

That's with the artworks we found all over his atrium and garden, by the way. We won't be including the artworks from Hispania Citerior in the auction. Those are going back home, where they belong; we're arranging their transport using the money we get from the sale of his property. We haven't recovered the candelabra for the Temple of Jupiter yet, but it might turn up in his country villa, they tell me.

This won't render him completely helpless, you know. My sources tell me he had a little money banked in Greece, so he'll still have some cash left over. He's not nearly as rich as he used to be, at least. It will also take a long time before anyone here forgets his misdeeds. I hope it's ruined him forever, politically... although we both know that's rarely a sure thing.

Still, I hope what we've achieved is some consolation to your clients and the people of Hispania. It's been a personal triumph too, as it turned out just as you said: I lit a conflagration under so many senatorial asses that no one will be likely to forget my name in the next few years. Some Traditionalists are going around actually wagging their fists in my face! It's great fun, especially when you count that those fists would have long connected did they only know my recent agrarian law was on your behalf.

"So on the whole, not too bad an outcome," Shizuru told Natsuki, having read out Fumi's account of the trial and its proceedings to the younger woman. "My clients from the Spains also wrote to me in thanks. It is a pity we cannot turn back the clock on the many depredations of that man. Nevertheless, this at least shows our provinces that we do not always ignore their complaints. It was high time, given that so many of the last extortion trials saw patently bad men and women being acquitted. We have had some rather bad provincial governors in the past decade."

"They should send more governors like you or the governor of Argus," Natsuki said, to her amusement.

"I am complimented, as Midori-han would certainly be," Shizuru said. "But you do realise that the moment I lay down my governorship, there shall be people trying to prosecute me? Not so Midori-han, who does not have many enemies."

Natsuki was astonished and barely registered the note about the Argus governor.

"Prosecute you!" she said, sounding offended. "For what? You have done nothing!"

"Nothing prosecutable, at any rate," the older woman said with a grin. "But that does not matter to people with an axe to grind against me. Recall what happened to poor Keigo Onishi. He was guilty of the main charge against him, yes, but that was insufficient for them to have levied the sentence they did. My fellows have no compunction about bringing enemies to trial and destroying lives on the slenderest of legal pretexts."

"No," Natsuki whispered. "They cannot do that to you."

"And they shall not, believe me. I would not let them."

Shizuru reached out to calm the disturbed young woman.

"I only meant that they would try," she explained, pressing the smaller hands. "Which is part of why I need at least one more year here in the North. Another year would allow me to shore up more safeguards against my enemies' machinations. But do not worry so, Natsuki. I promise I can take care of myself. Otherwise, I would never have asked for your hand in marriage. What would be the point of asking a woman to marry you as a Himean if you are about to be exiled from Hime, after all?"

The green eyes searched hers for assurance. Shizuru held still and laid herself bare to them.

"At any rate," she said, when it seemed Natsuki had found what she was seeking, "I am confident we shall not have to worry about such things for at least one more year past the next. Do you remember the senator with whom we dined at Ravenna? Banri Ueda, that is."

"Yes."

"He has been elected at the top of the poll for next year's Plebeian Tribune."

"He will be their president?" At Shizuru's nod: "He can do much for you in that office."

"Indeed he can," Shizuru agreed, pleased as always by her lover's ever-improving grasp of Himean politics. This pleasure was augmented by the Otomeian's next question.

"We shall go south again next year, Shizuru?" she asked. "To keep an eye on Hime?"

"We may have to," Shizuru told her. "Would it be an inconvenience?"

A slightly crooked smile peeked out.

"I want to see Ravenna again," Natsuki admitted.

"Then I am glad. It all depends on what happens in the next few months. Not only there but also here. We still have fires to put out in Septentria."

That was since tensions between the Carsinii and Aexelli had roared out again. They had been temporarily quieted by the Septentrian Conference, but were renewed by a summer of suspicion. It was all due to strange things that had happened soon after their nobles returned from the conference.

At first, it was only small movements in the boundary markers for some unfenced pastures. Marking stones and posts were found moved a foot from their original positions. The farmers and overseers of the affected lands scratched their heads over the changes, but merely moved them back in the morning. The next day, however, the stones would be moved again.

Then it was no longer just the unfenced areas. In one case a whole line of wooden fence was discovered torn out in the night. When the owner of the land erected a makeshift replacement, it was torn out too the following evening. And surprise, surprise-resituated a foot beyond the original border.

It worsened enough that farmers started waiting for the culprits in the dark. And then the first casualties came, for the culprits were apparently more dangerous than simple vandals. They were large bands who beat the farmers to within an inch of their lives. One farmer's son died.

It was noticed by then that all the cases involved Carsinian territories adjacent to Aexellian lands. It was also noticed that the markers were constantly moved into the Carsinian side. Which meant that the nightly movements always enlarged Aexellian landholdings at the expense of Carsinian ones. The popularly-drawn conclusion as to the culprits' identities was therefore inevitably accompanied by Carsinian indignation.

"Of course the perpetrators are Aexellian!" one of the leading barons of the Carsinii spat to Shizuru when she came to adjudicate. "Who else stands to benefit from diminishing our lands while increasing theirs? We have territories next to the Arvetii too, and even the Leucones. Notice that none of our people in those fiefs have suffered any of these night raids!"

"It's because," an Aexellian baron said, getting to his feet, "your people aren't interested in making the Arvetii or Leucones look like outlaws!"

"It's because only the Aexelli are outlaws!"

"You mean only the Aexelli are being incriminated by outlaws!"

Shizuru silenced both with a crisp call for order. She was in her curule chair on a small dais, the leading nobles of the Carsinii and Arvetii seated in rows on benches before her. They were meeting within a large hall put up inside the Legate Keigo Kurauchi's camp. Shizuru's own camp was currently in Pascera. She had ridden from there to hold the current assembly.

"Please maintain decorum," she said as the barons quieted. Both continued to shoot daggers at each other. "Now to return to what you were saying, Baron Epodorus, you believe it is the Aexelli by the affected lands who are responsible for these incidents. Correct?"

He affirmed it.

"Your contention is that they are the only ones who could benefit from the boundary movements, yes? It has been noted. Have you any other cause to accuse the Aexelli, however?"

"Only the fact that the cunni already did things like this during the war!"

That set off another round of outbursts from the Aexellian delegates, whom Shizuru again called to order. She levelled a cool look at the Baron Epodorus, however.

"When I called for decorum, that involved a request to retain propriety," she told him. "Since we all effectively speak the same language, please assume that I will understand most vulgarities you might spout. Another one of those and you shall be booted out of this hall, Baron. Now if I am understood, let us return to the topic. When you say the Aexelli did things like this before, could you be more specific?"

The man chewed on his lips first to avoid releasing another vulgarity; the red eyes were telling him not to test her.

"I mean what the Aexellian baron of Diomatrix did to the Carsinian baron of Asella," he ground out, bringing up the old dispute. It had been settled during the Septentrian Conference, but its resolution continued to have reverberations. Shizuru knew this was because of what some of the tribes thought it suggested.

The dispute began thus: Diomatrix's baron had expanded his fief into the baron of Asella's during the Himean-Mentulaean War. One of the very first to go pro-Himean, he claimed the expansion was done to improve his defensive position against his pro-Empire neighbour, the Carsinian Asella.

Asella later turned pro-Himean too and when the war was over, sought to restore the old boundary between it and its neighbour. Unfortunately, the latter refused to return to the old markers. Diomatrix's baron said his expanded land was his rightful reward given that he had been allied with the war's winning side much earlier.

When the quarrel had been brought to Shizuru in the capital, it had been the rallying point for animosity between the two tribes. It embodied all of the chief resentments between them.

The Carsinii were still sore about their neighbours' quick tergiversation in favour of the invaders. They were even sorer that their neighbours had used that choice to fare better than them in the war's aftermath.

The Aexelli, on the other hand, were angry with the Carsinii for their constant disparagement of them as traitors. It was easy for the Carsinii to say that, they argued, because the Carsinian lords had been favoured by the late king of the empire. The Aexelli themselves had been far less favoured: they had always intermarried and traded too much with the peoples on the other side of the Atinu boundary. This had made their lords a little too prone to arguing against conflict with those on the other side of the river. Not a good argument to make with the Mentulaeans kings, who generally favoured expansion. It had seen more and more Aexellian lords kicked out of the Royal Court over the years, their places filled by-among others-more nobles of the Carsinii.

The way in which the land's new governor would settle the Diomatrix-Asella dispute was therefore important. It would tell the former Mentulaeans how she would treat them under her tenure.

Did she decide in favour of Diomatrix, it said she would reward those who had been first and truest to her cause-to the detriment of the rest of the people now under her administration.

Did she decide in favour of Asella, it said she would preserve the order of the land-and ignore the fidelity of those natives who had aided her most.

It was a neat cleft stick for the governor, who appreciated the myriad significations her decision would have. In the end, Shizuru decided in favour of Diomatrix, saying its firmer and longer loyalty to her did merit a prize. However, she clarified that this was not the only reason for her judgement. She also explained that the new division of territory made far more sense for the province.

The former boundary, she said, was actually less practical in its placement. The new border was little more than four metres from the first, but it fell on a stream instead of on land. With it, both fiefs would be granted access to a single run of water from opposite banks.

This would allow Asella to retain usage of the watercourse it had long claimed as its property. Yet it would also give Diomatrix the same usage from now on. This would improve Diomatrix's yield given that it was a pastoral settlement. Its herders had previously been forced to either go to a water source farther away or pay Asella a tithe for using the nearer stream. Now they would be able to access the nearby water without incurring added costs. For a governor seeking to resurrect local economies, that was a desirable outcome.

Nevertheless, she did not grant Diomatrix its new water source free of cost. Asella was now as much under her protection as Diomatrix was. It was also not even one of the Carsinian towns that had broken their treaties in the war.

Hence did Shizuru demand that Diomatrix's baron deliver to Asella one herd of livestock in exchange. The herd had to number either three hundred sheep or two hundred cattle, all of good condition and to be delivered within three years.

She admitted it was not equal in value to what Diomatrix was gaining, for the stream whose ownership it now shared with Asella would double its farms' productivity. Nonetheless, the difference in value was to be considered the reward due to the people of Diomatrix for their loyalty.

After her decision, however, Shizuru took great pains to warn that this reward was unique to the situation. It should not inspire any more Septentrians to tinker with other borders, she cautioned, unless they wished her to pay them a visit with her legions.

It was as fair a resolution as one could make while still securing Himean strategic interests. Unfortunately, it did not please everyone.

The Carsinii in particular were disparaging about the verdict. In spite of their governor's words about it being a unique case, they saw it as an invitation to other Aexelli to test the waters. And now, here they were with proof that their fears had been accurate!

"When the baron of Diomatrix successfully claimed more land from Asella," said Baron Epodorus now, "he set an example for many other avaricious lords in the area! Mark my words, if we hadn't discovered the moved markers ourselves, you would be seeing a dozen Aexellian lords right now claiming the same privileges Diomatrix's baron did."

"I doubt it," Shizuru said. "Kurauchi-han tells me there have been no such petitions to him either."

"That's because we did discover and move the markers back!"

"Not necessarily," she answered. "It could just as easily be because they never intended to make such petitions. After all, their cases would be different. Both Diomatrix and Asella verified that the markers between them were moved during the war. The cases you mentioned are after it, as everyone agrees. Even the Aexelli we have here today say it. Furthermore, the border changes made by the perpetrators, whoever they are, make little practical sense. I would obviously have no reason to legitimise them as I did Diomatrix's case."

That calmed Baron Epodorus somewhat, as it did the other glowering Carsinii. Shizuru continued while she had them all quiet and thoughtful.

"The trouble is, Barons and Baronesses, we have no certainty of the culprits' purposes," she told them. "You allege it is the enlargement of Aexellian territory at the expense of the Carsinii. Yet as I have already pointed out, there is no way such enlargement could gain my approval! You recall that I expressly forbade unsanctioned tinkering with boundaries following the war. Had the Aexelli truly been the perpetrators, they should have known first suspicion would fall on them! Therefore, they should have known that they would be the ones courting my displeasure. I do not think they-or any of you-would be so foolish. None of this makes sense."

"Yet," said another of the Carsinian high barons, "there can be no other explanation, Governor."

"Of course there can," she said with a hint of exasperation. "We simply do not see it yet."

"Although I do wish we could see it already," she said later to the legate she had stationed in that area. "Have you had no luck yet with your investigations?"

Keigo shook his head and looked simultaneously annoyed and contrite.

"It's not even for want of informants," he groaned. "Just about everyone in the affected areas wants to inform us! The problem is that their information isn't worth a dented sestertius. All they really want to say is what they think happened, not what truly happened. And what they think is that each other did it."

"The Aexelli think the Carsinii are responsible, in spite of the injuries to the latter's farmers?"

"They say it's probably a scheme by the higher-ups, so the little folk wouldn't know. They're claiming the Carsinii are doing it to make them look bad and bring up Diomatrix and Asella all over again."

Shizuru rolled her eyes.

"I do wish they would make their peace with that already," she said.

Keigo grinned: "So do the Aexelli, being the winners in that quarrel."

"What intrigues me," she told him, "is that you have not caught anyone in your traps yet. You have been setting legionaries in wait along several of the affected lands since the first casualties among the Carsinians. Yet every single night your legionaries waited, no one showed up and no markers were moved."

He grimaced, having been disappointed by his own failure to catch culprits.

"It was odd that they chose to stop their night raids then," he said.

"But I promise we hid the legionaries well, Fujino-san! Even sent them in leather cuirasses so there'd be no glint off their mail shirts. As for their helmets, we took off the plumes and smeared them with tar and mud. We chose good hiding places too. The farms' owners helped us."

She eyed him interestedly, tapping a finger on the desk.

"The farms' owners," she repeated. "Only the Carsinii were aware that you would be there, then?"

"Yes, we had to tell them so they'd be sure not to post men of their own that night," he answered.

"Curious, is it not? The night you lay a trap that only the farms' owners know about, no culprits show up."

Her legate looked alert.

"Surely you don't think it truly is the Carsinian landowners doing it after all?" he asked. "I know they've been difficult throughout the war, but I'm not sure even the Carsinii would go to such lengths to get back at the Aexelli. Some of the people who were beaten up by the culprits were even related to the landowners, Fujino-san. In fact, our one casualty was the son of a landowner himself!"

"Even so, I would not discount it," she replied. "But no, truth be told, this does not have the feel of the Carsinian landowners about it. That does not absolve all the Carsinii, mind you, nor does it exclude the Aexelli themselves. If I had to be honest, it all reeks of some other malice, however."

He asked her what she meant.

"I mean that you should set up your traps again," she said. "But this time, tell absolutely no one about them. Contrive to have the landowners away or busy when you do it. Or simply let them be if you see them setting up their own guards for the evening. Just be sure they do not detect your legionaries."

"But who do you think we're looking for? Do you have a suspicion about the culprits?"

"Not their precise allegiances or identities," she told him. "Rather, I believe that we are being duped into thinking there are only two possibilities. For instance, we think now that it must be some of the Carsinii because they are the only ones who could have known of your clandestine operations. Yet that is a lie, is it not? The truth is, there may be a third party with agents among the Carsinii too. What if it is that third party, unknown to the two we have been focusing on, who is actually responsible?"

Keigo nodded slowly, studying the surface of the desk as he mulled this over.

"I'll set it up tonight," he said, only for her to tell him that was unnecessary.

"They shall not do it tonight," she said with a laugh and getting to her feet. He did the same and followed her to a window, where she looked out at his camp's streets.

"There are a good number of locals in here," she noted. "Mostly prostitutes and camp followers, am I right? Companions for the officers and legionaries?"

"Yes, that's what they are," he said, colouring a little because he himself had several 'companions'. They were not prostitutes, but neither were they acknowledged and exclusive mistresses the way her Otomeian was. Still, he enjoyed them and thought they enjoyed him as well-which they did, since Keigo was as generous with gifts to his women as he was nice-mannered to them. He was a quaint-if-foreign change from the big-headed lords some of them had used to serve, was their consensus.

"Should I ban them all from entering camp, General?" he asked with a measure of tension. He was anxious that she should not find anything to criticise in his conduct. Archconservative though his family was, he had come to realise that no general the archconservatives could offer was worth her thinnest bootstrap. No archconservative-rather, no other Himean!-could have pulled off Terantrum! And he had been part of that battle because of her. He would have that for the rest of his life because of her.

What could any of his brother's Traditionalist fellows offer to compare? The truth was that he did not even like most of the archconservatives, who liked to push and pull his poor older sibling to go whichever way they pleased. Well, he supposed Shizuru Fujino had her own technique for doing that. But she did it so much more smoothly. He relished legating for her and did not want the adventure to be over too early: as indeed some were whispering Seigo Ushida's would be soon, thanks to the part he had played in inflaming Durigala.

She turned to him again.

"No, that is fine," she decided. "However, I do think we should take a little more care in organising the trap for the 'boundary adjusters'. Tell nobody of the next one you set, Keigo-han. Do not even discuss it with your staff. Simply tell the officers and legionaries you are going to use that you need them for some other duty that evening. Then, when it is time for them to go, reveal the actual plan."

He nodded but flushed a little as he saw the direction of her thoughts.

"I don't tell the women warming my own bed about my orders, Fujino-san," he said humbly. "I swear it. I don't tell them anything about the army."

Her face showed astonishment; she moved to his side and placed a warm hand on his back.

"I never thought you had, Dear Fellow!" she said. "I confess I was thinking more of your officers themselves. Some of them talk, you know, especially when they are relaxed and have partaken of some wine. It means some of their bedfellows get to learn of things they should not be learning. Do you know, in my first spell in the army, there was a tribune whose favourite whore could recite the command's strategy better than the actual legates? Not all officers are as prudent as you are, and that was my concern. Believe me, it was not you I was thinking of just now."

He smiled a little, relieved that she had not been suspecting him of such carelessness. He let her lead him back to his seat.

"At any rate," she went on, "we should take further precautions. The camp followers are only one possible leak for this information. Do not tell the locals either when you organise your traps from now on."

"Even the landowners?"

"Even them. It matters not if they post their own guards on the night you set up your traps again. Try to avoid them then. Choose only those legionaries with a talent for stealth and you should still manage quite well."

"When should we do it?" he asked.

"When the incidents start up again-the landowners shall be certain to file reports when that happens. Until then, resume with your normal duties. You will actually have to trick the perpetrators into thinking you have relaxed your vigilance over the matter."

"So I should withdraw the soldiers I put at the borders to prevent more of the incidents?" Keigo asked her. He was referring to the visible security details he had posted, not the hidden units sent at night to lie in wait for the perpetrators. When the latter had failed, he had taken to stationing the former instead to assuage landowners' worries.

"Yes, but not immediately. Do it a week after my departure. I wager nothing shall happen in that time, so you can simply throw up your hands at the end of the week and say you are giving up because it is a waste of manpower. The incidents should start up again soon after that, I suspect."

"I'll be ready for them then, Fujino-san."

"Try to take them alive," she said. "Otherwise, we may never get to the bottom of this mischief."

From there she rode back to Pascera with her horsed escort. Along the way she admired the look of that region of her province. Farms were growing grain and foodstuff again, livestock ranging over the fields. And there were civilians on the roads once more! Proper civilian travellers and merchant trains, not the refugee caravans of before. The former empire was starting to regain its footing. How pleasing to see that after so much effort, Septentria was heading more or less where she wanted.

Absent little bumps on the road like Durigala or the Carsinian-Aexellian feuds, of course.

When she entered her own camp next to Pascera, one of the first things she saw was her mistress coming to greet her. The younger woman was smiling.

"At least one of us seems to have had good news," she said, kissing Natsuki on the cheek and getting kissed shyly back. "Shall you tell me what causes your smile, mea vita?"

"You," Natsuki said playfully.

"That is a good answer," Shizuru replied. "What else, besides me? Is it something to do with the auxiliary at Pascera?"

Another bright smile, which said Shizuru's guess was right.

"What is it, then?" she asked, letting her lover lead her to their tent. Legionaries and tribunes alike offered salutes as they passed near, and she smiled at her subordinates.

"I want to say," Natsuki told her. "But I also want to keep a secret."

Shizuru made a comical face at the odd declaration and asked if this was the girl's way of warning her to prepare for another Bemys. It made the latter laugh.

"If it were another Bemys," she said, "I think I would not smile."

"True, I think you would not. So what is it that pleases you so much and which you are tempted to both keep to yourself and divulge?"

"Something new with the horsed archers," Natsuki revealed. "I ordered it long ago, and today-today I saw it done. It was good."

"May I see it too?"

Here Natsuki hesitated again.

"It was good," she reiterated. "But I think, Shizuru, when you see it, I want it perfect."

"Ahh, I see now. You meant earlier that you wanted it to be a surprise once they had perfected it."

"Yes," said Natsuki. "That."

"Then how about you tell me a little about it but save the actual exhibition for when they come up to your standards?"

Natsuki thought it a good compromise. She explained that she had begun forming the idea a long time ago, when they had besieged Lasandre Citadel. The water convoys Shizuru had arranged to deliver refreshment to her troops then had made an impression on her.

"It was so, ah, so organised a way to supply soldiers in battle," she murmured with admiration. "I had never seen such before."

"Indeed. And this inspired you."

"Yes. I thought, why not do something like for other troops? Like archers."

"You wanted water convoys supplying your archers?" Shizuru asked, a little puzzled. "For... the summer heat in these flatlands?"

"No, no," said the other woman, amused. "I wanted convoys, yes. But not for water."

"Not for water. Then what-oh!" Shizuru said, and actually stopped walking for a second. Natsuki grabbed her hand and tugged at her so she would walk again. "Oh, I see, mea vita. Yes, I see. Very useful."

She squeezed the hand in hers and looked down at the girl with obvious awe, guessing aloud at Natsuki's scheme and getting confirmation.

"It is brilliant," she pronounced afterwards, speaking with such sincerity that the other blushed. "I do not say it just to please you. I even wish it had occurred to me. I mean it."

Natsuki thanked her and said she knew that. Another thought came to Shizuru and she aired it.

"Is that what you have been doing with the horses we seized from the enemy cavalry?" she asked. "Nearly all of them have been brought to Pascera, I know."

Natsuki said this was so and that the riders of the convoy were the Otomeians' own servants and non-combatants. Again Shizuru praised her, citing her use of such resources as further proof of wisdom.

"I cannot wait to see it when you deem them ready for viewing," she said. "I am sure it would prove enormously useful too in actual battle."

"I think this too," Natsuki said, sighing. "But here too I am, how do you say again... of two minds."

"How so?"

"I want a battle to prove my convoys work," she said. "But I do not want any more battles for us in your province."

Shizuru chuckled wryly.

"Well, I feel the same way," she said. "Although I do think that there are others here who seek to push us to the less peaceful of those options even now."

Natsuki asked her what she meant.

"I have some suspicions about what is going on between the Carsinii and the Aexelli," Shizuru answered. "But come, we are at my tent. Let me explain it to you inside."

They paused as the older woman addressed the duty officer outside the tent first. She asked if any visitors had come seeking her. He gave her a list he had taken down and also specified which ones had chosen to make do with the legate she had left in charge. Said legate was in the tent with her staff and updated her on all that happened during her brief absence. In return, she related to him and her mistress what had taken place at Keigo Kurauchi's camp. She left out her instructions about another trap, however. While she trusted Kenji enough to let him in on it, she preferred to do so without the rest of her staff there to hear.

"I'm inclined to believe it could be the Carsinii themselves," Kenji said after the story.

"Hmm. You do not think it nearly as obvious an answer as saying it was the Aexelli after all?"

"Do you?"

"The Carsinii were never happy with my decision to grant more land to Diomatrix," Shizuru said. "Everyone knows that because they were so public about it. This makes them easy scapegoats for the present situation."

"True. But then, they're also afraid you'll whip them even harder than Zanki-san and Shizuma-san did before the Battle of Terantrum. Making the Aexelli look like the criminals here does give them a better bargaining position than before, and without exposing themselves to your wrath."

"It could be," she said. "But it could also be someone else. Whoever it is, they seem to be encouraging dissension between the tribes. This does not bode well for our hopes of a peaceful province, does it?"

"It's still better than dissension between the tribes and us," he grinned.

"Given that we are administrating the province, it may very well come to that too," she replied, with a glance to her lover. "And you, Polemarch? Have you anything to add to this?"

The polemarch's eyes were narrow as she answered in Greek.

"Only that to speculate without evidence can prejudice an inquiry," she stated.

Her auditors exchanged looks quickly. Kenji was one of the few officers who dared to start conversations with Natsuki, so he did not find her academic response startling. Even so, it required him to stifle a chuckle the way his general was now doing.

"Well, I cannot put it better than that myself," Shizuru decided after a pretended cough. "So then. We shall wait and see what comes of Keigo-han's investigation. Until then, the polemarch is right and we should belay the speculation. I admit they have not been very trustworthy throughout our acquaintance, but it still would not serve for us to be so quick to demonise the Carsinii and presume them the source of every problem in the region."

Chapter 81

Vocabulaire:

1. Censor - The censor is a senior magistracy in Rome available only to consulars (people who have served as consul in the past). Two censors are elected every five years and they deal with such matters as the inspection of the Senate's list of members. Censors were supposed to ensure that senators followed the laws pertinent to their lifestyles, one of which said that senators could not be in debt. Many senators were, of course; most censors simply ignored that.
2. Equestrian - Or knightly, as in the Ordo Equester or Rome's mercantile class. One of the requirements for entry into the ranks of the knights was an income of four hundred thousand sesterces per year (as a minimum amount). The applicant had to go to the censors' (s.v.) tribunal and furnish proof of such an annual income in order to be accepted.
3. Jupiter Feretrius - The aspect of the great god that presided over the creation of various contracts, like treaties. Rome's treaties with foreign nations were regularly brought to its temple for storage.
4. Sagum (L., s.), sagi (L., pl.) - A thick woollen cloak that the legionaries used during wet weather, with a circular hole in the middle through which the wearer inserted his head. The oils in the wool helped it stay waterproof but contributed to the unpleasantness of its smell.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Keigo's net did catch some of the perpetrators, but not alive. The people they encountered the night they set their trap were not only numerous but armed. Some had even come wrapped in light armour. What should have been a seizure turned into a scuffle.

Even so, the better-prepared legionaries carried the day. It was their only misfortune that the opponents were determined not to be taken captive even if they could be bested. Most managed to slip away in the darkness and those who did not fought so hard that the legionaries ended up killing them in the contest.

"I should have sent Yuuki-han and her group," Shizuru lamented after getting the news. "She and her people are more used to such tasks. They might have captured some then."

"Or she could have killed them too," Natsuki said, wrapping her arms around the older woman's neck and speaking from above a shoulder.

"Yes, but I think they would have had a better chance at getting us someone to interrogate."

"Even then you would not be sure you could trust the captive," the polemarch said. "Even if you torture, people can lie. More here, when there are many possible suspects. So, many lies they tell can seem like truth."

"I suppose that is true," Shizuru sighed. She leaned against the back of her chair and into the embrace coming from behind it. "At any rate, no use repining now! We have lost our chance to grab any of the culprits. They shall not return any time soon after that incident. I can only wait on Keigo-han's investigations into the identities of the dead men. But I confess I am not optimistic."

Her legate had called in locals to look at the bodies, according to his dispatch. Unfortunately, no one yet had claimed to recognise the corpses, and there was little time for viewing before those started to blacken and putrefy. Shizuru initially considered sending a rushed order to her legate that he should preserve the heads in resin of cedar, but realised they did not have the aforementioned resin on hand. A great pity this time, she told her lover, that they were not campaigning in Egypt instead!

Attempting to trace the corpses' gear was a dead end too. The swords they had been using were common among the locals and even their armour-rough leather lamina stitched together-was plain and easy to come by.

"What's done is done," Shizuru decided. "At least I can give the culprits one more little scare before they get away with their trick, however. Our upcoming march through Carsinian territory and to the River Holmys should alarm them a little."

"So you do think they are from the Carsinii themselves, Shizuru?"

"No, meum mel, I am still uncertain. But they are definitely from the area. Whoever these people are, our march might give them added cause to rethink their little tricks for at least a couple of months. Everyone seems to behave better for a little while after they catch sight of me with my soldiers."

The march to the northernmost of the former empire's big rivers was a trek she had been planning for some time. Her goal was not actually the river itself. She merely wanted to go over that watercourse before fall's end.

In so doing, she would reach the former empire's so-called Northern Frontier. She had not yet had opportunity to see it, especially as it had been insulated from much of the war. This was thanks to her destruction of the bridges on the River Holmys when she had first pushed into Obsidian's lands.

Her intention then had been to separate the Prince Calchis's army-campaigning there at the time-from the rest of the imperial forces. The downing of the bridges had forced the prince to go the long way around to return to the empire's heartlands. In so doing he had pulled all imperial troops out of the Northern Frontier. This left the territory again to what the Mentulaeans had deemed "insurrectionist tribes", really the place's long-time inhabitants.

As the Himeans had maintained control of the River Holmys throughout the war, opportunity to take the fighting north of the waterway never presented. This had been in keeping with Shizuru's strategy both for the war and its aftermath. The peoples of the Northern Frontier were opposed to the empire, so she had considered it a friendly territory in her calculations. There was also the alliance its peoples had struck with the Otomeians: an alliance made at the instigation of the latter's polemarch.

Now that the war was over, she wanted to formalise Hime's own alliance with those communities. The accords between them had been informally struck by one of her legates the previous year. This was when she had sent him to rebuild the bridges on the Holmys. As a governor bearing proconsular imperium, it was her task to draw up the official treaties succeeding her legate's casual accords. It was her treaties that would be sent back to Hime and nailed to the walls of the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius.

For her march she brought the Third and First legions. The latter had been called up from the south and replaced with the Twelfth at that post. Her forces had gone down by a legion since the Second was no more. She had taken it apart to distribute its members to those legions that had suffered the most casualties in the war. That included the valiant Ninth, which had lost more than a cohort at Terantrum.

Even after the redistribution, most of her legions remained understrength. On the positive side, all of them were now heavily blooded. That included the troops of the First, who were nonetheless children compared to veterans like those of the Ninth and Seventh. Recruited later than the other soldiers, most of the First's rankers had only just turned nineteen. Shizuru herself teased them about it on the march to the Holmys boundary.

"They tell me you gave the Carsinii a beating last year!" she called. "You actually gave some of the empire's best fighters a run for their money! Is that true or have my legates been telling me tall tales? I swear most of the boys here must have only begun shaving, and your girls look like babies!"

They roared back that the story about the Carsinii was true and protested that they were not babies. She grinned along with them as she continued the ribbing.

"Really now?" she yelled. "You still look soft and pink to me! Can you prove you can keep pace with my veterans? Or would you like me to hold your hands first?"

Whereupon they would roar again in voices full of mirth, say they had already proven it in the war but would prove it again without her holding their hands for them.

"Excellent!" she cried out. "Because I'm going to wear your feet out until you can feel them no longer! You are babies yet until you have gone through one of my marches! Babies yet until you have covered as many leagues as my veterans! That's what you signed up for when you signed up with me-days on end of walking with just the occasional fight for excitement! Ah, but each occasional fight will be something like Terantrum! Now do any of you smooth babies have a problem with that and want to run home to your parents?"

They roared that they did not, and that they would prove themselves equal to anything she would ask of them. After a few more good-natured jests, she would move on to the next cohort.

"They are good troops, very willing and energetic," she told her lover later. This was when she had returned to her mount and rode next to the polemarch again. The latter had asked what she thought of the youths of the First, all of whom still stared starry-eyed at their commander. Shizuru knew it was because this was only their first time working directly under her. In time, their gazes would soften a little, but their regard for her would also be greater. That would be after they had the full measure of themselves as legionaries of Hime and of her as their general.

Until then, they would still be just a little prone to giddiness in her presence. Sometimes, when she talked to them, their voices would hit higher octaves than normal. She would see the polemarch smirk then, out of the corner of her eye. She knew Natsuki was amused by her effect on the soldiers.

She does not realise she unbalances them even more, she thought with her own smirk. They stare at her too when she passes. They know who she is to me-she is a princess-she is our northern auxiliary's highest officer. They know she has a giant shadowcat for a pet and can ride better than any Himean in spite of being wooden-legged. They know she killed a man who by our standards was a giant and did it despite her impediment. They know she does not talk to most people. If she spoke to one of them they would probably reply in gibberish and confound her.

The young woman of her thoughts was saying the First looked enthusiastic.

"It might be because this is their first time marching with me," Shizuru proposed. "They are still eager to prove themselves under my direct inspection, which is as it should be. I was right to let Zanki-han blood them against the tribes of the northeast. I worried about it a little, at first."

"Why?"

"Because I usually prefer to blood all of my recruits myself. That is the only way you can be assured of it being done right. But I am glad I trusted my legate. Zanki-han did it well enough to see that their first battles gave them a lot of confidence. That determines their future as soldiers, as you know."

Natsuki fixed onto the senior officer mentioned: "The troopers tell me she was good too with the cavalry, that legate."

"Which is why I let her have the rest of the horse back then," Shizuru responded. "Her previous general had praised her for her talent with cavalry, so I knew from the start that she would be getting much time with your people. It is not a common talent among us, you know-skill at commanding the horse."

"I know," said the Otomeian. " You are special."

Shizuru smiled.

"Thank you, although I truly was thinking only of Zanki-han just now." A sudden sobering. "The peoples north of the Holmys have no cavalry themselves. It is one of the reasons they fared so badly against Calchis when they first attempted to meet him in the battlefield, was it not? I recall you told me they were trounced by his troopers."

Natsuki said this was right, having gathered the information from her own agents years ago. That had been when she intrigued with those tribes on behalf of Otomeia and her lover's campaign.

"They were better later," she said. "When they saw they did not need to fight on the field."

"When they switched to guerrilla methods. It makes sense."

Shizuru gestured ahead of the marching column, to the land towards which they headed.

"A lot of copses spread out over the land," she said, "and wooded terrain as well as streams breaking up the greenswards. I am astonished they did not turn to such tactics immediately. Surely they should have known they would be overwhelmed on even ground, given the disparity in forces. What they faced was an imperial army."

"I think," her companion ventured, "they wanted first to defend their towns. So they tried first to fight plain battle."

"Generally not a good idea for people in their situation. They should have taken what they could from their own settlements and retreated into the woods at the first chance. Towns can be resurrected; human casualties cannot."

She let Natsuki murmur agreement before she spoke her next words: "I know that far to the north of this is the forest of your true people, mea vita. I refer of course to the Black Forest of the Ortygians. Before one reaches that, are there any other peoples of significance? Any great tribes or nations to look out for?"

Natsuki denied it, explaining that they were mostly just distributed over small towns like the ones on the northern banks of the Holmys. Woodland and wetland divided them, she said, which made large urban polities a little challenging to develop. Some of the peoples were part of tribal groups, like the Corosians with whom she had struck up an alliance for Otomeia. Even in such cases, however, they still lived in townships scattered over a largely unsettled area. This was the case even as one progressed north, all the way to the Black Forest.

"But," she qualified, "if you go far northwest around some mountains, there are-is a numerous people there too. A different people from these we see here. They even speak a different language."

"Where northwest?"

"Very far north. As, um, around as far north as Ortygia. So, west of the Black Forest."

"I see. Mountain people then, like the Otomeians?"

But Natsuki denied that.

"They live next to mountains too, yes," she said. "But not in them. Their mountains are south of them and separate them from here-from where we are now."

"How do you know of them, mea vita ?"

A sudden smile.

"I used to be of a different people, a very far northern people too," she reminded.

Shizuru chuckled and said that was so.

"Also, my true people, the Ortygians, knew them," Natsuki expanded. "I think we sometimes traded with them."

Shizuru asked her to go on.

"I do not know so much," confessed the younger woman. "Even my people did not see them so often. It was not often the westerners left their land, I think. The mountains were too difficult and the passes to their east, to our forest, were not easy. They sailed more than travelled overland, since my people said they lived by the coast. Also, the things they traded were mostly things from the sea. My father said-"

A sudden stop; Shizuru regarded her worriedly.

Natsuki forestalled the older woman's concern with a light smile. She continued what she had been about to say.

"My father gave me a charm with shark's teeth many years ago," she said. "He said he bought it from the westerners. That was the first time I saw shark's teeth, so I remember."

Shizuru said those fishes' choppers were indeed worthy of remembrance.

"But there," Natsuki said with a squint. "Those western people must have taken them from their sea travels."

"Do you remember what they called themselves?"

But her lover could not remember, and apologised. Her people had preferred to refer to them as "The Westerners", she said.

"Do not worry about it, the name matters little. Anyway, they must not be given to venturing south, as you say: I have heard nothing of them before this. Are they numerous? Organised?"

"Yes. And yes. They had chiefs, but not kings. I never knew what they called them too," Natsuki admitted, having only dredged up all this information from hazy childhood memories. "It is only what my people used to say that I tell you now. I do not think they are seen much out of their land. Their land is hard to reach."

"I see. At least that means Septentria will also be hard to reach for them."

The Otomeian's head came up at these words.

"You look for possible enemies of the province?" she asked Shizuru, who answered positively. "I do not think enemies will come from the north, Shizuru."

"Nor do I," Shizuru answered. "These peoples in what Obsidian called the Northern Frontier are too disparate and disorganised. You tell me the same goes for the tribes even further north, save those supposed seafarers northwest. No real threats to Septentria in this direction, if that is so."

"Your threats are south of here, to the west."

"The Kingdom of Celsor or the Kingdom of Nervia?" asked Shizuru, one neat eyebrow lifted.

"What if I say 'the Tribe of the Ganni'?" Natsuki teased.

"I would say you are suspicious as ever, mea vita," was the reply.

"Although I admit I share some of your suspicions."

At the first town they reached they found the magistrates of other nearby settlements. These had hastened to meet the Himean army at its first stop. It was to be expected, they explained to Shizuru later, because of what her conquest of the Mentulaean Empire had done for them. Finally they could live without fear of that monster they had once called neighbour!

"When you first started your invasion, we actually hoped to send you soldiers," said one of the leaders. All of them could speak what they called 'Mentulaean' (to the Himeans' amusement). "Prince Calchis made that impossible. The man devastated our population! We've lost maybe half of our fighting folk just fighting him and most of our towns and villages. We've rebuilt, as you can see, but things won't be the same for a while. They were comprehensive in their destruction."

That they were, Shizuru decided. It was true she had seen evidence of life springing back up throughout the march: obviously-new sheds and houses, freshly planted fields, budding gardens. Yet those had come hand in hand with other signs of recent desolation. The new structures stood atop ground that was still burnt black. Gutted ruins here and there, some reduced only to charred foundations.

But Shizuru knew that perhaps the most damaging effect had been on the population. Most of the people they had seen in the fields had been either very old or very young. The able-bodied, the true workers and crofters of the land, had been reduced sharply by the imperials. They had been killed as rebel soldiers, captured as slaves, drafted into imperial service, and so on.

In that respect the Mentulaeans had fared better. She had left all the soldiers of demobilised armies where they fetched up, and had not tampered with the populations of most places that surrendered. Most of the former empire's young adults and adolescents remained once they chose to be peaceable. Here in the north, what adolescents were present had clearly just entered pubescence in recent time. It would take some years yet before the young ones could grow up enough to take the missing adults' places. Until then those who remained would have to pull double their weight.

"You have been at war a long time," she said.

"Too long," said someone. "Obsidian always regarded us as part of his fief. We never did, and he knew that. There were a few years where he left us alone, probably when he was too busy dealing with his own challengers at home. But whenever we 'disobeyed' a royal edict or did something he thought contravened his supposed authority over us, he'd remember to send another army over to put us down."

"He could never finish us completely, since we'd retreat to the woods and even further north," one woman expanded. "They'd burn what they could and go home, calling it a win for them. We'd just come back and rebuild. As you can see, we know how to do that. But it's happened too much of late and it's taken a toll."

"Especially under the last of their leaders with whom you reckoned. What trade is recorded between your communities and the others in the region seems to go from sparse to non-existent in the last five years," Shizuru observed with interest. "The hostilities with the Mentulaeen Empire probably gave you little time to advance your communities and develop commerce, then?"

There were grumbles of agreement at this reminder of what the late Obsidian's empire had done to prevent them from flourishing as they should.

"Sometimes, it didn't even leave us time to plant a crop," one man with a heavily scarred cheek said bitterly. "The quietest our land has been in many years was during your invasion! When you cut them off from our lands by destroying the Holmys bridges, you forced their prince to march his army out of here and keep it in the empire. Your control of the river forced their commanders to deem this area outside of their manoeuvring space... and also an unlikely source of resources. It was a time of relief we sorely needed. We're deeply grateful, General."

"I am glad we could have helped you in some way, then," Shizuru said with a smile. "I had heard of some of the actions the imperials took against your people and been disturbed."

"You can say they were disturbing," said one man in a flat voice. "Our village wasn't part of the rebellion so we welcomed the imperials when they demanded hospitality. We thought friendliness would keep our skins safe. Better we had gone down fighting, turns out. That prince of theirs decided we were all potential rebels and our homes potential hiding places. So the day he left our village he had his soldiers herd the whole population into our biggest buildings. The meeting hall, some houses, even my house, the granary. They locked them up in there. Then they torched everything."

He nodded impassively to the man beside him, who had placed a hand on his arm. Shizuru doubted he felt the comfort all that strongly, given what he must have been reliving.

"My son and I survived because we were out hunting," he said. "My wife and my daughter..."

The man who had patted his arm spoke up when he trailed off into silence: "The empire dealt with us very harshly, even when we dealt with them peacefully. We've all lost people."

Shizuru nodded at this, knowing no commiseration she could speak would make a difference. Better she got to their business instead, to give them something else on which to think.

"We aim to be better neighbours," she announced. "All those of you here to represent their villages shall get treaties of friendship from me. That would make your peace with Hime official. Taken with the treaties most of you already have with the Otomeians through the polemarch-" A short bow to that young woman, beside her. "-I believe that should render your futures rather safer than before. For one thing, we now control the old imperial territories. For another, there are no other threats to your homes from elsewhere, I think. Not from the north, for instance?"

They denied it, just as she had expected.

"We trade with the other towns and settlements north, for the most part," said one magistrate. "And beyond that is land few here would venture into, and from which hardly anything ever ventures out. West are just impassable ranges and east is the Black Forest, where no one lives and which is said to be endless, running all the way to the land of the gods."

Shizuru was conscious of Natsuki's mute delight at hearing her old home described thus. She could practically feel the young woman smiling, although she knew that if she actually looked, the smile would only be in the green eyes.

"Is it endless?" she asked the man.

"Who knows?" he said with a shrug. "No one's ever gone in and tried to find out. Myself, I think it does end, but how far away that end is, no one knows."

Another of the northerners took up the topic.

"They say only the Ortygians used to know how far it went," he said, "because they lived inside it. Aside from them the only others who ever entered the forest were some old tribes that used to live north and east of us. They did it to kill the Ortygians, so the story goes."

"I know it," Shizuru said, with a sharp glance at Natsuki; the polemarch looked tranquil. "There is no need to recount the tale for me."

"Well, then you know even those other peoples died out anyway. The few who did come back weren't enough to restore their old tribes, and as they tell it, they never even found the northern limit of the forest either. All those people are long gone now. I don't think anyone's been in it in years since."

He shrugged and concluded: "It's not a forest for people anymore. Honestly, I don't think it ever was."

The others agreed, all murmuring that the forest had been empty of men for years and for good reason.

"Whatever lives there now, it's not mortal," one of them pronounced in suitably haunting tones.

From there Shizuru worked her way with the army as far north as she was able. She followed the upper Atinu so far she wondered if she would reach its headwaters. She worried at first whether or not she would be able to supply her army in a place that had been so damaged by her conquered foe. She did not know how much of their normal productivity the reconstructed settlements had regained.

Her worries were for naught. The peoples of the land, knowing the Himeans had freed them of a great menace, sold what grain they could offer to the southerners without needing to be pressed.

They were determined to recover from their ordeal, even if only just out of disdain for their old oppressors-whom they now delighted in seeing as oppressed themselves, even if the Himeans still treated them too kindly, in their opinion. It would not have troubled the Northern Frontier's population if Shizuru had chosen to rape and torture all the Mentulaeans she conquered instead of coolly governing them.

Still, a subjugated Mentulaean was one less invading Mentulaean. The Northern Frontier's peoples knew enough to show their gratitude to their Himean visitors. They also agreed to participate in the Himean governor's plans for regional development, although not without some objections.

"You want us to trade with the empire?" the elder of one town said. "With the Mentulaeans themselves?"

"It is no longer the empire," Shizuru said gently. "It is now a province of Hime, and called Septentria. Even its people are now called Septentrians."

"Changing their names doesn't make them less Mentulaean!" came the heated response. "These people burned our homes. Raped our families! Slew our children!"

"I understand," Shizuru said, holding up a hand to silence the others about to produce their own outcries of resentment. "I am not asking you to trade with them right now. I was asking that you consider reopening trade relations with the province in the future."

"What difference does it make to the past?" one woman growled. "Our people are dead and the people you want us to trade with still killed them."

"The Empire killed them," she replied. "Prince Calchis, to be precise."

"And where do you think he got most of the troops he brought here?" someone else answered. "The people the Mentulae call the Carsinii! Those horse-fuckers who live right across the river! Along with the goddamned Veromandae! And the Lenapii."

"And even the Arvetii, I know," Shizuru said, intrigued that even these peoples referred to the former Mentulaeans by their tribes. "Yet these are all your neighbours even now. If you are intent on hating them to the end of your days, that is understandable. It is also your prerogative. It would make life uncomfortable for you, however, given how close they are to your homes."

"We'll stand that discomfort," said the elder stonily.

Shizuru nodded, doing it with enough gravity to show she respected their sentiments and decision.

"As I said, that is both understandable and acceptable," she replied. "But in the future, your descendants may decide otherwise. Our own nation, Hime, was crafted out of resentment and strife. I only remind you that there are many ways of dealing with a noisome neighbour. In our case, we conquered it to add to our properties in the north. In your case, why not take advantage of it to enrich yourselves?"

Before they could hurl retorts again, she held up a hand: "Do not worry about it if you wish not to trade with any Septentrian at this time, as I have been saying. If any of you ever does change your mind, however, please seek me or the next governor for help. For my part I promise to give you such attractive terms that you shall find yourselves benefiting greatly from the commerce. I also promise to grant your convoys safe passage to another part of the province if you find the tribes nearest the Holmys truly offensive."

She listed some examples to illustrate: "The territories of the Aexelli and Leucones, for instance, are just south of the Carsinian ones. I know those two other tribes did not donate soldiers to the army of the Prince Calchis, for their soldiers were typically drafted for engagements east and south instead. Those peoples were also among the first of the locals to turn against the empire, and thus our first allies among the Septentrians. They fought the Carsinii too."

As they moved even more north the communities tended to get rougher and smaller. They were all still friendly, however. Shizuru continued to pick up treaties and learn more about the northernmost part of the Himean known world.

At some point, the legate marching with her asked why she had not charted the Northern Frontier as part of Septentria.

"Why don't we include it in the province, Fujino-san?" he asked in genuine curiosity. "I don't think the locals would complain, even. That's how grateful they are to you for ridding them of Obsidian and his brood. Even if they don't like being lumped in as part of Septentria with their old enemies, we could grant them some relative autonomy in exchange. Or even much lower taxes than the former Mentulaeans. It would set them apart from them and give them a nice sense of ascendancy over their old foes."

"Not bad ideas were I inclined to that action, Toshi-han," his commander replied with admiration. "I believe they would enjoy that."

"So why not offer it to them and enlarge Septentria? I think they'd buy it if we promised them lasting protection as Hime's provincials. They'd know too that we wouldn't allow internecine conflict in the province."

"So they would," she agreed. "But I do not think going further up is all that wise for us. Logistically speaking, the Holmys is a perfect natural border. We can supply any legion very easily south of it."

North of it, the challenges start to mount thanks to the lay of the land and the brokenness of the arable terrain. Not a lot of grain can be grown here, so armies larger than the one we now carry would struggle."

She breathed in the scent of wet grass as they talked, along with the malodorous aroma of over eight thousand wet sagi nearby. She flicked the tail of her own sagum to whip moisture off it; it had rained earlier and beads were still rolling down her face and cloak. Under the sagum, however, her body was dry.

"There do not seem to be any threats north," she said, still tasting the rainwater on her lips. "One of the biggest motivations behind our annexation of the empire was the threat it posed to both Upper Fuuka and our provinces Argus and Sosia. If there are no equivalent threats further up, I see no reason to tax Hime with yet another administrative burden. Perhaps the next governor will feel differently. Even so, I say let him have the worry about whether or not he wants to expand there. It shall be his decision."

"Whoever he is, he'll be an oil lamp to your Alexandrian Pharos, Fujino-san."

The metaphoric comparison provoked a gale of laughter.

"I thank you, Toshi-han," she said. "Although I do think that unkind to my future successor."

"Do you really think you won't be prorogued?" he asked, having worried about it ever since her remark on the possibility before the Durigalans' trial. Like the rest of her legates, he knew how he felt about that.

The Fujino Campaign had enriched not only his bank account but also his Self. He had experienced and done things as her legate that he had missed out on in his younger years within the Senate. He felt more alive and alert here than he ever had back home! Look at him marching on his feet now just like the rankers, for instance: even his grizzled old body felt stronger than ever. He feared that ending the campaign now-and seeing what had happened the last time they replaced her, he knew a new governor for Septentria would mean that-would end his revitalisation as well.

She studied him covertly and saw the worry he tried to conceal.

"I think it is a possibility, that is all," she told him. "I still do think I have a good chance of being prorogued, however, for I am not yet without my allies."

"Or schemes?" he said, grinning.

"Well," she grinned back. "I hope I am never without those!"

"Your opponents aren't ever without them either. I still can't believe the archconservatives tried to pass a law limiting prorogued governors to a cap of five years for their terms."

She chuckled a little and asked him what he thought of that attempt to curtail her plans.

"Desperate," the older man sighed. "It's not understated at all, is it? They should've known you'd have a tribune of the plebs ready to veto."

"Indeed, but I suppose they had to try. You know how it is-one never knows what Fortuna will grant on a lucky day! I also have a feeling they were only testing the waters when they had one of their tribunes of the plebs propose it. They wanted to see who would respond or cry foul to it, I mean. Perhaps they even hoped I would be desperate enough to respond with a bill seeking prorogation as early as that."

"More like you to unveil it all next year, if you do have your own plans." He eyed her keenly. "Who's your tribune of the plebs for next year, Fujino-san? I know you already have one, given how important next year is for your command. Yet I haven't heard anything from my own sources back home about you backing anyone. That means you've been keeping it very quiet."

"And shall keep it very quiet a bit longer," she smiled at him. "You shall find out soon enough, Toshi-han. I daresay it may prove interesting. In fact, I am certain it shall be that to some of my enemies, not least to dear Haruka Armitage... who has been revelling in her latest office, I hear."

"They say she's cracked down viciously on indebted senators," he said, although he was silently dying to know who her tribune might be. He knew better than to ask again once she had already declared an intention to keep it secret, however. "Chika Futaba wrote to me that Armitage-san has booted out some thirty Members of the House since being elected censor."

"Virtuous of her, is it not?"

He shifted a little. Toshi was loyal to his commander yet also unable to deny admiration for Armitage. The latter truly had her own share of greatness given that no other censor had dared examine the senatorial rolls for almost two decades. She could not be bribed or intimidated into letting unworthy names enter those or the equestrian rolls either. She might be the most discerning censor they would have elected in twenty years!

"It's not the easiest task, I imagine," he settled for saying to the woman that censor loathed.

"No, it is not," Shizuru agreed. "At any rate, I cannot complain of her purge of the Senate. It is true we have had too many unworthy names in the House for too long. Besides, she may be of help to my plans in some small way soon, with her activities. How that would vex her!"

They stopped talking at the splash and pound of hooves on wet grass. The polemarch of the Otomeians had ridden up with two of her people. Both of these hung back as their superior brought her horse carefully to the Himean general.

"Ave, Polemarch," Shizuru said to her.

The raven-haired woman reached out: there was a folded cloth in her hand. She gave it to Shizuru.

"Thank you, Natsuki," Shizuru said, patting her face with the dry towel. "Did the rain get you?"

The polemarch gestured to her grey cloak. Its furred hood had been pushed back yet remained visible. Her face and hair were silky dry.

"Good, but please take cover if it rains again or more heavily. You can still get wet then. Unless you would consider adding a sagum to your rain gear, to cover your legs."

The polemarch's face was disdainful.

"That!" she sneered. "It smells of dead sheep."

"But at least you would be dry top to bottom," Shizuru countered.

"Ah well, never mind if you cannot bear it. But mind what I said about going for cover if necessary."

A nod; the polemarch galloped off.

"It does smell of dead sheep," Shizuru admitted to Toshi, who was still chuckling.

"Mine does, that's for certain," he said. "Although yours doesn't seem to stink as much, General. How is that?"

"I have my people stuff it in a bag full of herbs," she revealed. "Besides, it is new. Yours looks to me as if it has been with you since the beginning of your military career. That is one sagum worthy of respect!"

He confirmed this proudly.

"The good ones last forever," he told her, before asking why she had needed a new one. "Did you lose the old one, Fujino-san? Or damage it? I know a good vendor whose sagi never tear apart if you need a name. Ligurian fellow, of course."

"All the best sagi come from them," she agreed. "No, the old one was actually intact. But I buy a new one as soon as the current cloak's stink begins to overcome my staff's packing herbs. As you can imagine, that means I go through a great many of them in a single campaign. Call it an eccentricity."

He laughed and asked what she did with the old sagi.

"I give them over to the army's supplies," she said. "Every now and then, a legionary either forgets his somewhere or sees it damaged beyond repair. They can give him one of my old cloaks as a replacement when that happens. So as you see, the spares are not entirely wasted."

He agreed and continued talking with her until their next stop. Later in the conversation he reminded her of their previous subject, which was Haruka Armitage's doings. Though he pressed her on how those could be of aid to her schemes, she would say no more of it, to his disappointment.

---

The Northern Frontier was a wet land, Shizuru mused as they progressed in their march. It was not merely the season responsible for it either. The further north her army went, the heftier the construction of the local houses. They tended to be rough and none-too-attractive, but were extremely thick-walled and thick-roofed. The natives too certified her suspicions: they said the land tended more to damp than to dry, especially with all the streams and patches of marsh running about. Rainfall was regular and could happen even during the warmer times of the year. Then it would usually snow in winter, which only added to the slush.

She guessed it contributed to the Northern Frontier's challenges for inhabitants. All that wetness made for agricultural trials. Moisture was good for growing grain, yes, but too much of it spelled problems.

She had heard the farmers on her own lands complain when Fuuka suffered from a surfeit of rainstorms. They said it degraded their crop to the point of it being near-unsuitable for baking, though none of them could tell her why. They had demonstrated the point, however, by showing her loaves baked from wheat that had been rained-on several times before the harvest. The loaves had been flattish and of poor quality. They had caved in on themselves even within the oven.

Yet grass in this land was abundant and apparently sweet: the auxiliary's beasts certainly never seemed to tire of it. The natives had their own livestock, but one could not really call them herds. They tended to be of only a few animals per group. Shizuru suspected their recent conflict with the Mentulaeans had severely abridged local herd numbers. That was if the locals had ever owned any great number of cattle in the first place. Natsuki told her this was such wet land it was a wonder if most hooved beasts did not eventually suffer from footrot.

When the last two villages with which they struck treaties were just a little more than nascent settlements, Shizuru knew her army would soon have to turn back. There were no more diplomatic gains to be had further north, she suspected... unless she actually dared something like trying to pass the alps that separated the sailing tribes' lands from the ones she had already traversed. Not a good idea, especially in winter. She would also have no real notion of what she was up against until she reached it.

Still she pressed on. She wanted to at least see the forest of Natsuki's ancestors before she had to return to her province. To do that she had to work her way even further up the Atinu and forded two of its northernmost tributaries. All the while, she marvelled at the land's increasingly dark greenness and isolation. The peoples they encountered now just lived as individual families or extended clans. They were a little wary of the Himean legionaries at first-most had heard of but not seen them before-but they regarded the Otomeians with rather more favour. They were fellow northern peoples, after all, and while not common, still familiar.

And then, seemingly out of nowhere, they had it in sight. This far north there was always a slight mist over the ground, but in the horizon before them was suddenly a fog that was a distinct body in itself. It stretched over the vista like a low and gigantic cloud dragged to the ground by its own weight. Within that cloud was a wall of tall shadow, so thick that each tree composing it was barely distinguishable from the others.

She called the column to a halt and told the officers to water the men and the animals. They had stopped by a stream and the usual order immediately set in. Buckets came out for the troopers and grooms to bring water for their beasts. The officers directed where and when each century could drink or wash hands and faces. The centurions watched the whole business like hawks: a single foolish man deciding to relieve himself in the water could ruin things for everyone else downstream.

Shizuru herself set about issuing the usual orders before she took her break. When she was done she paused for a moment to gaze out at the sight she had marked as her destination.

"So that," said the legate at her side breathlessly, "is the Black Forest."

"I daresay it is, Toshi-han," she replied.

"We're the first Himeans to have seen it in more than a generation. Just think of that."

She nodded. A quick clap on the back for her legate before she went off, walking down the line to try and find where the polemarch had stopped. She exchanged words with some of her officers as she went and listened to their jokes on the wetness of the march. She told them not to complain as they were all due for baths anyway, which had them laughing in response: everyone knew she always smelled sweetest in the command because of her own obsession with cleanliness.

Finally she saw her mistress: the polemarch had stopped near the rest of the auxiliary with her little band. She stood next to her two horses and was waiting for their grooms to return with buckets of water. The beasts she waited with were impatient. They whickered with lips held to her head.

She was appeasing them with honey cakes purloined from yesterday's dinner when Shizuru reached her.

"Here, you glutton," she was saying to the black stallion, which frapped its nostrils happily as she offered up the morsel. "You great pig on stilts."

The stallion devoured the cake down to the last crumb. When it finished, it blew to her, its huge head down so that it could push at her shoulder. It knew she had more, and Natsuki clucked at its wheedling.

"A great pig," she repeated, to Shizuru's amusement. She divided one of the two remaining cakes and let him munch it down. She handed the rest to the more patient horse, whose electrum head had been wagging gently as it waited.

"She is a good girl," she said to Shizuru, finally acknowledging the older woman's quiet presence. "She has better manners than Niger."

As if to prove it, Aurea rubbed her head more gently on Natsuki's than the stallion had. Shizuru chuckled at the difference between the two animals, both of whom were obviously smitten with their owner. Their heads stayed near hers, velvet lips occasionally nibbling at her pale skin as she hummed to them.

"Niger is a warhorse," Shizuru told the polemarch, smoothing a palm over the silvery gold flanks on the mare. "Whereas you raised Aurea here for parades and pleasure rides. Surely that accounts for the difference in etiquette."

Natsuki pointed out that Shizuru was a warhorse herself, yet never gave others cause to question her manners.

"I was raised for parades too, in a sense," Shizuru answered, withholding a jest about pleasure rides because Natsuki's grooms had returned. "While they are being watered, will you walk with me a little?"

They set off and of one accord moved nearer the tributary, both looking at the blackwood in the distance.

"Sometimes," Natsuki said while walking, "I think, 'it is good I go in battle no longer'. Because of my horses."

Shizuru's eyes went to her.

"Is it because," the older woman said, "you feared for them?"

Natsuki said she did and confessed it had long been one of her weaknesses. She knew cavalry warriors had to make their peace with the idea of their steeds being hurt from the start. She said she knew that, but had found it difficult.

"Back then, I used to wonder," she admitted. "How much longer will I have Niger? Or when Albinus was still mine, how long before an arrow finds him? When you raise a horse for war you know it will die one day in a battle. But after you raise the horse that knowledge does not come easy, I think. You wonder why you raised it only so it could fall. Sometimes I think we are the real animals. We take them away from their green fields, we force them to meet the blades and-and the blood."

Shizuru was a little moved by this speech, for whatever reason. She took her time replying.

"You love your horses, mea vita," she said.

Natsuki nodded.

"So now," she said, "it is one good thing from this. My horses will have better lives and maybe some peace. While it lasts."

Shizuru said nothing, still watching her.

"I am fine, Shizuru," the younger woman announced all of a sudden.

They stopped walking.

"Good," said Shizuru with a smile. "I wondered."

Natsuki simply smiled back.

"Do you..." Shizuru twitched her mouth a little ruefully but proceeded. "Do you actually want to see it?"

"I see it now," Natsuki pointed out, flicking her eyes briefly towards the forest.

"That is not what I meant," Shizuru chided her.

"I know," the other said. "And I think yes, but also no. You know how that is?"

"A little. I understand."

"So either way, I will not mind. Anyway, it does not matter."

Shizuru asked what made her say that. Natsuki laughed abruptly and tipped her head to one side in a jaunty movement that said they should look behind them. Shizuru did and laughed as well.

She supposed it was due to both her nature and her lover's history that she was so enthralled by the idea of entering that strange woodland before them. Shizuru loved terra nova, experienced few of the misgivings others did when facing alien landscapes, and possessed besides the unquenchable curiosity of a voracious intellect. The thought of seeing the Black Forest of Ortygia was thrilling to her, even if the looks of it stirred awe too. It was yet another campaign into foreign territory and just another challenge for her to master.

But her people were different. The legionaries looked at that prodigious expanse of forest and felt only hair-raising terror. It was understandable, for it was like no woodland they had ever before sighted. Even the dense breadth of Septentria's sacred forest, the Ruviccan of Tasgetia, looked friendlier by comparison.

This new forest was so thick no one questioned the origins of its name. Deep within that dark woodland it looked near night-time. How great were the trees shading that place! Shizuru had never seen trunks stab so far into the sky. For them to be so tall at this distance, she estimated most to be hundred-footers. And this was only for the parts they could actually see. Most of the forest melded into a blue-black gloom through which there were occasional obscurities, individual trees briefly separate from the many.

This is from where my girl comes, thought Shizuru, herself a little impressed by the odd darkness of it in the distance. It was high noon and the rest of the land showed green and sparkling under the sun. Not so the Black Forest. Fitting, in a way! Natsuki might as well have walked straight out of a legend to go from the looks of her old homeland; she might have been a creature spawned out of shadows and born of the bluish northern vapour.

She looked to her side and found the polemarch watching her with one of those enigmatic smiles.

"That was Ortygia, meum mel ?" she asked.

"It is the Black Forest," Natsuki corrected. "It is of Ortygia, yes. But if you mean Ortygia the City, it is much deeper in there, Shizuru. What you see is only the border of the forest."

"The border," Shizuru echoed. "Is the city itself so very far still?"

"Yes." And with a wider smile: "Farther than your legionaries would ever be willing to march."

Shizuru turned around and saw again the anxiety on the faces of her officers and rankers. It was clear they were praying to the gods that she would not take it in mind to lead them into that strange woodland.

She did not think they would refuse her if she insisted. But she was not in the habit of leading horrified soldiers to places even she had never yet seen or scouted in advance. She knew how to put enough sinew in a legionary to stiffen him against gigantic armies and unexpected battles. But to stiffen him up against inchoate creatures as much a product of that alien mist as of his nightmares?

"They do look anxious," she joked to her lover.

"They should be," Natsuki answered in earnest. "Dangers are in there. Even the beasts of the Black Forest are giants. Your men will not like to see such great bears and wolves and oxen."

"Ah, the aurochs."

"And harsh boars hungry for blood. There is also the mist, always, and the forest cover."

"It does look dense. Is it why they call it the Black Forest, mea vita ?"

"Mm. In there, always it is dusk."

Yes, the interior of that forest clearly saw little sun. Perhaps that explained Natsuki's striking colouring, thought the older woman. Had any of the Ortygians still been exposed to the sky with any regularity? Most of their congress back then would have been with the Otomeians too, and Otomeia itself had a shaded sky that seemed perpetually cloud-covered. A life spent under the cover of giant firs and spruces and pines, under greyish heavens. Even the darker-haired Ortygians would have been pale as ice.

Said her own ice-skinned Ortygian: "People would get lost fast. One cannot follow even the path of the sun within the Black Forest. The land too dips and rises. It only seems to be flat when you enter."

"A formidable set of natural barriers," Shizuru mused. "They must have helped to safeguard Ortygia."

"It was safe," her lover said. "For a while."

Shizuru reached out. Natsuki accepted the embrace, despite the people watching them.

"I think," Shizuru said a few seconds later, "I have never seen trees of such size. Are they as large as they seem from afar?"

She heard the smile in her lover's voice: "Larger."

"And I suppose they are as big-footed as I am?"

That got a laugh. Natsuki pulled back enough so they could look at each other.

"Yes, the roots are big too," said the younger woman. "And some of the trees around the city had trunks more than twice as wide as you are tall, Shizuru."

"They must be ancient!"

Natsuki looked contemplative.

"My people said they were there before us. Some said they were there before all people," she uttered, before looking up at Shizuru and fixing the older woman with emerald eyes. "I think... I think it could be so. The greatest trees there are not ones that grow fast. For them to be-to have become so wide and tall, I think maybe they must have been there before the gods made men."

Shizuru agreed that it was not implausible.

"I am glad I finally set eyes on the Black Forest, though," she said afterwards. "You have no idea how long I have wondered about it. Not merely because it is from where you hail, you know. Even before I met you I already wished to see it."

Natsuki nodded.

"At least you have seen it now," she said. "But you cannot enter. Your people will stop you because they have not your courage."

"What makes you think I am not quaking in my boots right now?"

One of those dark and husky laughs that elicited a shiver. Oh, how well even her voice fit her old homeland!

"If you do, it is in excitement," Natsuki said. "You have not your people's fear of the unknown, Shizuru."

"Oh, I would not say that. The prospect of the truly alien does sometimes awe me."

"But it never overawes you. That is the difference."

Shizuru looked around to see her people's apprehensive faces again. No, they truly could not press on. The legionaries would be too affected by their superstitions and fears to be of much use in there. What if they ran into enemies? Even just one of the giant beasts Natsuki had described would likely start a panic. Besides, she had to consider the supplies: there were no guarantees that they could support themselves in that forest.

She hailed a tribune nearby and sent a message to her legate. The officers would get the troops back in marching order so they could all return to the province.

"I am sorry, mea vita," she said to her mistress, who regarded her evenly. Her own eyes returned to the forest, as wistful as they were hungry. "Perhaps we can properly see your old home another day."

Natsuki smiled.

"Be not sorry, Shizuru," she said, and moved closer so she could tuck herself into Shizuru's smelly sagum .

Chapter 82

Vocabulaire:

1. The Eighteen - The most senior and influential members of the Ordo Equester, or the knights of Ancient Rome. Remember that the equestrians/knights made up Rome's business community.
2. Mare clausum (L.) - Literally "closed sea", or waters where navigation was forbidden. The winter months tended to be the most perilous when sailing the Mediterranean's waters, so the sea was considered "mare clausum" by the more risk-averse captains (such as those in commercial vessels) then. The Ancient Roman interdiction was neither formal nor truly enforced, having come into being only to protect seafarers themselves.
3. Mos maiorum (L.) Tradition, the way things are done, and the way things have always been done.
4. Quinquereme - A ship with five men per oar and three banks of oars.
5. Testudo - The "turtle" formation, wherein legionaries interlock shields closely so as to present a wall of defence to the foe. It is typically used to protect soldiers against archer fire.
6. Triclinium (L.) - The dining room of an Ancient Roman villa.
7. Trireme - A ship with three men per oar and three banks of oars.
8. NOTE on Iemasa Yamazaki's act and on heads of the family - The act ascribed to Iemasa Yamazaki was actually performed by one of the Fabii Maximii during the late Republic: as in Yamazaki's case, it horrified his countrymen. While the heads of the family did have many powers over their family members, there were nonetheless limits. In this text, heads of the family (who may be either male or female) are generally indicated by the surnames used by the family members. For example, since Chikane and Himeko both use Chikane's surname (Himemiya) instead of Himeko's, the materfamilias of their family is Chikane.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

Early January they were at Argus again to make their winter trip to Fuuka. Shizuru had led the First and Third's march back south after the excursion through the Northern Frontier, but she had left them in Toshi's command upon reaching the bridges at the Holmys. There she broke off with part of the cavalry to make her way to the Himean port province. She found it in a dither of preparation, stirred by the looming advent of Midori Sugiura's replacement.

"It seems strange to think of an Argus that does not have you as governor," Shizuru said. "Since my first mission here, you have been a fixture!"

"Which is why it's time to let someone else take over," Midori replied. "Seven years! Any longer and they'll accuse me of wanting to be made permanent. Or worse, setting myself up as a petty queen in one of our most prosperous provinces. Next thing you know, I'd be ousted only by death or some enterprising descendant. Since I have no descendants, that leaves only one unpleasant option, doesn't it?"

Shizuru chuckled at her levity.

"I do not think anyone would ever accuse you of regnal pretensions," she told the older woman, who sometimes cleaned her own bedroom and study because she thought it quicker than ordering the servants. Shizuru doubted Midori Sugiura had ever put on a queenly air in her life.

"Besides," she added, "you had the job so long because many wanted you to keep it. Everyone knows you served Argus well, Midori-han, so I cannot see you going back to Hime and finding anything but commendations and welcome."

"I won't be going back yet, actually."

"You have grown fond of this place, I suppose," Shizuru offered.

"I have. But it's also because my replacement will need a little assistance-as will the locals, who have to adjust to a new hand now."

Shizuru asked who the succeeding governor was.

"Mahiro Moto."

"Last year's urban praetor," Shizuru observed.

"That's the one."

An assessing look came to the older woman's face as she proceeded to deliver her impression of her successor.

"Polite and proper," she said. "Like all of his family-you know how they are. He wrote me a very flattering letter about my governorship, then asked me if I would be willing to advise him for the first months of his. It's part of why I'm not leaving for Hime just yet. That, and the fact that I really do regard Argus as my other home now. I've put down roots in this place, and they go deep."

"And Hime?"

"Hime has my heart. Always will."

Shizuru said she understood. Then she asked: "Do you think he will be good for Argus?"

"I wish I knew," the older woman sighed. "He seems to have had a good performance as urban praetor. Seems like an able man. Probably practical too, since he didn't scorn to ask me for help. He'd like to make me his gubernatorial legate, which would end in me doing the work I've always done while he gets all the credit, doesn't it?"

"Would you agree?" Shizuru asked, already knowing the answer.

"Definitely not. As I told you some time ago, what I look forward to the most after my governorship is the peace and relative freedom.

All I'll do is be a sort of consultant to him, but certainly nothing that binds me into even more administrative service. Still, it betrays good sense on his part to have asked in the first place."

Shizuru concurred.

"And on paper, everything holds up, doesn't it?" Midori continued. "Good family name, good political career-they say he acquitted himself well during both his quaestorship and aedileship too, I asked some people-he even has a good military record. He looks all right."

A shrug of the shoulders as she concluded: "But no one really knows how they'll perform as a governor until they do it."

"How are his finances?" Shizuru enquired.

The hazel eyes meeting hers gleamed with faint derision.

"Gods, but you like to hit the jugular," the older woman smirked. "Well, I won't deny I asked around myself! And the answer was fine, although he does have some debts. They say they're not unreasonable, however. His creditors aren't dunning him either, since he does look like a good prospect, all the more now he's been posted to Argus."

"That is well," Shizuru determined. "He would have less need to enlarge his purse drastically, if so. It lowers the risk of him raping the province."

The other nodded, but looked none too sanguine.

"Don't we all rape our provinces, with or without drastic need?" she asked in a brooding tone.

Shizuru's bisected eyebrow ticked up.

"You did not," she pointed out to her fellow senator, who responded with an ironic look.

"Nor did you!" Midori sighed. "I hear you're even waiving taxes to the end of your term?"

"Septentria needs some economic relief."

"So it does, but it's nonetheless admirable. Still, here's the truth: we may desist from corruption all we like but those after us will do it anyway. And when a province hasn't been raped by its governor for a long time, it becomes even more vulnerable. The next corrupt governor will milk it dry, down to the very bones! Don't get me wrong-I don't begrudge a governor making a little on the side. But to treat a province like one's personal larder? Our colleagues do it with impunity because they know the odds are against them getting punished. Extortion trials only work so often; cases like Sumio Fujimoto's are the exception. And with courts that are famously susceptible to politicking and bribery, can you blame the avaricious governors for being unafraid?"

Midori smiled weakly and looked into two curious red eyes.

"It will happen to Septentria too," she predicted. "Certainly, in fact! Whoever takes over after your term will be doing it chiefly in anticipation of sucking the old empire dry. There's only been one governor before them, after all! Given that it's been you too, there'll be even more chances for your successor to rape the place, since you'll have scorned to do it in your time. And he will rape the place, regardless of all your measures to protect it past your tenure, and ignoring the example you set. It makes you think about why we still try to set the example, aye?"

A faint crease appeared between Shizuru's brows.

"Because the knowledge that someone else shall commit a crime in the future is paltry reason to commit it in advance and in his stead, I think," she said.

"Oh, god's sake, I know that!" Midori said impatiently, frowning as well. "I just meant that it makes you wonder sometimes why we bother. I spent seven years making Argus the best port province it could be under my hand. I think I succeeded, and I even have the ledgers and witnesses to argue my case. Even with that, whenever I reflect that some governor after me can and probably will run the province to the ground again, it makes me wonder a little what it was all about. Things never last."

She shook her head as if to shake away the melancholy of those thoughts as well.

"I'm being maudlin," she said. "Excuse me for that! Even a scholar of history can get a little bogged down when thinking about its cycles. Let's talk about something else. Tell me what you saw on your march to the far north."

Shizuru acquiesced and described the journey, but privately ruminated on the older senator's words. She understood what Midori had been saying but disagreed. She herself would never wonder about the purpose of all her efforts for Septentria, although she saw why someone such as Midori would wonder it of her own achievements as a governor.

Midori Sugiura was a born mentor and caretaker, so she had approached her governorship much as a mentor did a new apprentice. Argus had been another youth in her guidance, ready to be steered gently down the path. She had enriched it the way a good mentor did, offering it all the benefits of her wisdom and experience. That she did not take advantage of it was because she was intrinsically honest and had come to love the place. No good mentor despoiled a child left in his care. And a good mentor always wondered what would become of the child once it passed from his authority.

Shizuru was not quite so benevolent. It was true she too wished to enhance those under her power, to better their lives. Yet the greater consideration for her was self-directed. Her dignitas forbade an avaricious governorship because such a governorship would tarnish her self-image. Even had she been impoverished, she would have desisted from raping her province simply because it would have been unworthy of her pride and abilities. What would it say, after all? That she could only make her fortune at the expense of those in her care? That she was so deficient of talent that there was no other way left than an elevated form of banditry? How beneath her that would be!

Midori Sugiura was right about something, however: things never last. Not that this still presented a problem to Shizuru. The good she herself had done for Septentria might not survive all the governors to follow her. But the knowledge of that good? That would endure, not only for others but for herself. She could look back on her work in years to come and know she had given her best. Anything less would make the remembrance a misery.

"Which it shall not be for Midori-han," she told Natsuki after informing the younger woman of the impending administrative changeover. "So well has she managed Argus these last years that the locals themselves are aghast at her 'retirement'. Moto-han has much to live up to. I myself hope he comes up to scratch, being that he shall be one of two other governors near us."

"But why is she even replaced?" Natsuki asked. "If you say she does so well still."

"Because it was high time, she said so herself. You know the standard is actually for our governors to have only one year of tenure. Perhaps two or three if they are prorogued."

"This is why sometimes, kings are better," said Natsuki.

"Do you think so?" Shizuru answered with a smile. She might have been descended from kings herself but she was born Himean. No part of her would espouse a view of monarchies as preferable to the Republic.

Still she softened her disagreement for her royal lover's sake: "I suppose it seems that way if you get a good king and he remains so throughout his lifetime. But that is not always so, is it? People change, sometimes get corrupted by power... and kingship tends to be absolute power. Besides, for every good king, you get nine mediocrities. Out of the nine, you might even get two or three horrors. Imagine if they all ruled as their characters dictated, throughout their lifetimes."

Natsuki pointed out that she had said "sometimes".

"Also," the girl said, "are not your magistrates this way too? A good consul comes and is followed by some who are forgettable. Or even stupid."

Shizuru said this was so.

"Yet the difference is that they last only a year each," she cautioned. "So though that shortens the amount of good each can do, so does it shorten the bad. And more importantly, they can be prosecuted after their terms. An important check on all powers of authority, the knowledge that they can be called to an accounting. The only exception is the Dictator, but we hardly ever create the office, and even it has an expiration date on its term."

Natsuki hummed, but had one last remark.

"You said to me before, Shizuru," she said, "that your checks on authority rarely work because the senators protect each other."

"Indeed," Shizuru replied. "But it is far better than having no checks whatsoever. Sometimes it works and sometimes it does not. I would still prefer a system that tried instead of giving up altogether."

A sentiment she repeated in another form to her northern intelligencer, Yamada. She had summoned the man to meet her at Argus before she made the seaward trip to Ravenna. Her question, as he had known it would be, had to do with the royal siblings they still hunted.

"You are telling me you still cannot find a trace of either of them?" she asked him.

"Not with reliability," Yamada replied. "We hear sometimes about this or that sighting, someone who looks like either the prince or princess, but when we follow it up, it just turns out to be that-a lookalike. It only makes sense, you know. If they're really still in the country, they'd be less likely to look themselves, wouldn't they?"

"They would be in disguise, you mean," she said, agreeing.

"Exactly that. We'll keep following up on what we hear, though. It's just that it's harder than it ever used to be. Ironically enough, it's even harder than it was during the war."

She asked him to explain.

"The Mentulae did suspect you might have spies about the land while the war was going on. However, their suspicions tended to fall on the obvious choices back then. Foreigners, you know, and people who were totally new. As if they thought you'd be so callow as to send in the obvious types. That's part of why the king ordered the lords to execute every 'southerner'-they use that word like a curse-they found in their fiefs right before your invasion. He said he was weeding out the spies and traitors early on."

Shizuru told him to continue.

"Well, during the war I think they came to see just how many spies they missed. Too many times of you getting the drop on them! So now they're treating more people with circumspection. That includes the itinerants, which means most of my people, given our work. Anyone who didn't live permanently in the old empire or anyone without perfectly solid, pure-blooded Mentulaean roots."

"Which leaves us empty," she smiled wryly, "given that you use only those with either mixed or non-Mentulaean blood in them."

"It's the best way to avoid the issue of loyalty to the Mentulaean people cropping up."

"I know." She quirked an eyebrow. "What about the local informants, however? Is our reward not adequate to tempt them?"

"Oh, it is!" he cried, himself a little envious at the inclusion of Himean citizenship in the reward. He had only procured his own citizenship from her by promising her cause priority in his services. A steeper price by far than the simple delivery of one of Obsidian's last fugitive whelps, in his opinion.

"The real problem is that the rabbits we're hunting are foxes," he told her. "I think they're not revealing themselves to just anyone, if they're revealing themselves at all. Safest way to keep a secret-

"Is to tell no one of it. Just so."

She considered the matter for a moment, then concluded with agreement: "Yes, the pair of them are foxes. Whoever knows their whereabouts at the moment is unlikely to be someone tempted by our offered reward. I would guess the chief of the druids, as well as some high barons-particularly those of the Ganni. What need would such people have of the lands and titles, or even the citizenship we would serve up as a prize?"

He had another suggestion: "Why don't we question one of the probable suspects? A little interrogation, perhaps?"

She knew what he was suggesting by "a little interrogation" and demurred.

"Certainly not," she said. "We are technically at peace now and to subject any of them to torture absent due cause would be savagery. Besides, any information we could get that way would be of little use. Whatever they could tell us would probably only say where and when they last saw our two runaways. As we have already agreed the pair are foxes, I doubt they would yield practical information about tracking them to others. As for descriptions of their appearances, who knows how long those descriptions would remain current? The two might very well change disguise every new moon!"

He asked what she wanted him to do.

"Only keep at it," she said. "Eventually, we might find a bit of gold in the gravel."

Although the chances of that were not too high, she admitted to herself as she strode back to her quarters. Calchis and Faris were being too careful to trust anyone questionable with their true identities. All she and her intelligencers could hope for now was that one of them would slip up by accident. Not a great strategy, but for lack of better alternatives, the only one she could employ at the moment.

She returned to the sitting room given over to her use and pondered a new question: was she placing too much stock in the missing prince and princess? They were of Obsidian's blood and therefore possible threats to the conversion of the province, yet they were also only uncrowned escapees now, devoid of even an army to support any claim they could present. Hime owned the old Mentulaean Empire already; Hime ran Septentria. Why then did that voice in her head tell her to keep looking for the siblings and not rest until she could pack them off into comfy incarceration?

She surfaced from her thoughts when lips settled on her nape.

"There you are, mea vita," she said, turning her head to find the other's mouth: Natsuki stood behind her. "I just got back myself. Come and sit with me."

"How was it?" Natsuki asked.

"About what we expected," was the answer. "Still nothing on the prince or princess. The prey is too smart and the locals are too wary."

Natsuki pointed out frankly, "Durigala did not help."

"No, it did not."

"What does it mean for you?"

Shizuru smiled.

"It means," she said, "that in addition to ensuring I keep my province for a little longer, I shall have to ensure I keep all of my current legions too."

An interested look from the girl.

"You think something will happen," she said.

"I would not say that. Let us say, rather, that I suspect it better to be safe."

Natsuki had an odd expression on her face. Shizuru asked her what it was.

"If you keep the governorship," said the younger woman, "do the legions not follow?"

"Not necessarily. They could reduce them by arguing the lack of exigency, for example, as they did before. Do you remember it? When they replaced me with Takeda Masashi."

"Yes, but I thought... because now you are a governor."

"No, that grants me no exception, especially after my initial five years are done. They can say the war is over, which it is, you know. And of course, they may cite the everlasting argument-to reduce the State's costs."

"You enriched 'the State' by thousands of talents, Shizuru," said Natsuki with palpable scorn. "It can afford to pay your legions."

"Indeed, but no matter. They shall say we need to save-which means hoard -that money for the future instead of spending it willy-nilly on soldiers that are unneeded. Besides, they can always use the recent drought as another reason. They would have had to buy grain from overseas and at greater cost to the Treasury than usual."

But the other was well aware of the effects of the past drought, and not just from Shizuru's talks with her either. Chikane too had filled her in on it during their brief week together.

"But they bought only little," she now said shrewdly. "The drought hit most lands around Your Sea, I know, so there was little for sale. Even without your spoils and the higher grain prices, Hime's Treasury is still full."

Shizuru grinned.

"Well, but you are better at reasoning than most people, Natsuki," she said.

"And you are better at scheming than everyone," was the returning compliment. "You are prepared?"

"I have plans in motion. I shall be strengthening my position in the Senate shortly, as you shall see when we go to Ravenna. Have you prepared your things and staff, yourself?"

Natsuki said her people would be ready to leave early on the morrow.

"Good," said Shizuru. "It is a pity we are only sailing as far as Ravenna, though, as I imagine you would love to see one of Chikane's fleets. The one stationed further south of the Adriatic is rather a large one too, and would impress you."

"I am impressed already, Shizuru," Natsuki said. "But more by Chikane than her ships."

Shizuru felt the same. It had taken her best friend the better part of a year to get all her fleets together, but following that, the campaign itself had proceeded at astonishing speed. Shizuru herself was renowned for her alacrity, yet had to applaud her friend's efforts as they bore fruit: the Himemiya Campaign was turning out an object lesson in military efficiency and organisation. Come January, Admiral Himemiya had already cleared the entire western half of Mare Nostrum.

One good thing about facing an opponent that has been given his head too long, she wrote to Shizuru, is that he has forgotten what to do when someone reins him in. These pirates have not faced an experienced, powerful foe in decades. They have made a career of boarding and capturing merchant ships and simple transports. But my triremes are too fast to board and the rest are packed with marines. I even told the captains of the latter to let the pirates board them, actually. The outlaws come to regret their audacity quickly.

Most of them now choose to flee. It troubles me not because, as you know, one of my legates is always waiting at all avenues of escape. It surprises the escapees, who have usually worn themselves out in flight by the time they meet those other armadas. We have taken many ships thus. A pity I cannot crew them to add to my forces, but then the Treasury would probably bleat again about the sailors' salaries if I did.

I took a most fascinating prize myself recently, when I met the pirate admiral Agatharcus. His pride and joy was his personal vessel, a quinquereme he had embellished to meet his ideas of a flagship. My people assured me that I would know it the moment I saw it. They were right.

It had timbers of brightest blue with a vivid yellow rail. The sail was adorned with the image of an azure horse rearing on the canvas. At the sides was a row of gilded shields, and at the bowsprit was a gilded horsehead. A proud vessel with all the flamboyance of the Ptolemies; how it flashed above the cerulean sea! I told my captain to make for it the moment the rest of our fleet had cleared a path.

The vessel's crew put up a miserable fight when we boarded. They were greatly distraught by the fact that they had to fight at all: it seems they had never been compelled to perform a defensive action on that ship before our assault. We also discovered then that the shields decorating the sides were purely ornamental. A single plank of plywood in gold foil, brittle as a wafer.

I simply did the usual when boarding large and decked vessels. This was to have the legionaries fight to occupy one end of the craft, then form a testudo facing the other end. From there all they need to do is advance with shields and spears held tightly in formation.

You can sweep a ship's worth of corsairs from bow to stern in this manner. If they try to fight back, the marines can simply do short charges at every third or fourth step. Done right, this battering attack can knock a surprisingly thick crowd off its feet. One officer is sufficient to time and call out the charges in between the paces.

It took only a few minutes for the pirate crew to discard arms and cry surrender. When we inspected the ship at our leisure, we found a surprise. Agatharcus had gone further in ornamenting it than we had first thought. To the stern end of the deck was even a canopied structure with a literal throne. Made of gold-inlaid ivory and carved wood, if you can credit it! Set upon a dais with fine marquetry that some kidnapped master artisan must have been compelled to lay! He even had a cedar-panelled and tapestry-swathed cabin at the stern. Not even my own flagship is so well appointed.

Agatharcus himself was swathed in Tyrian purple. It was not the genuine article, for no one would risk wearing that aboard a ship. The material would be ruined very swiftly by rain and seawater. Nonetheless, what our pirate admiral wore was a good imitation. He even conducted himself rather loftily in the surrender. A brigand prince, although his tongue betrays him: his Greek is of the common cant, and bears the burrs of the countryside even when he essays more refined diction. I appreciated his dignity, however, and treated him to a cordial dinner. Afterwards he was conveyed to Hime with the other pirate commanders we have already taken.

"They will be held like your own prisoners?" Natsuki asked after Shizuru read this out to her. She knew that Shizuru's prisoners of war were kept in separate locations to await the day of her return. "Are they to be executed afterwards too, Shizuru?"

"Yes, they will be held thus, and yes, the pirate captains and admirals will be," Shizuru said. "They shall probably meet their ends very soon, in fact, given how fast Chikane is working. She did say she wants to be home as soon as possible."

"Your prisoners are luckier that way, no?"

Shizuru considered that view of things.

"I suppose so," she said, "though some might say otherwise as they consider the anticipation of death worse than the event. Besides, some people dislike long confinement. Remember, people like the Princes Artaxi and Hanu have been sequestered to the villas where they are kept. They can walk the grounds, yes, but only under heavy guard, and they cannot address anyone outside of the villa. The day they finally leave those places is the day I return and send for them... and then they shall have to die."

"It is more comfortable than a dungeon," Natsuki insisted.

She knew that Shizuru had even troubled to ask both princes if they wanted to send for companions. Hanu had asked for two of his wives and their children. Artaxi had asked for a cousin and a friend. These had been conveyed to them.

So Shizuru's money now paid for the hosting of those people as well, and provided for nearly every comfort her hostage households requested. Natsuki knew the only request she had thus far turned down was from the Prince Artaxi, who wanted more slaves to serve him in his villa. As the man had requested "young and handsome" ones, Shizuru had known where that particular demand was headed. He and his cronies had already been caught in the act of tormenting one of the more attractive slaves serving them. Shizuru sent a warning that she could have him transferred to a hovel surrounded by guards and no servants.

A thought suddenly demanded to be spoken: "If you catch the Prince Calchis and Princess Faris, will they be executed at your triumph?"

"The prince, certainly, as he was one of the commanders in the war," Shizuru said. "The princess shall be spared, however. Unless we discover something that links her directly to the massacre of Himeans under her father's aegis, anyway."

"And then what will you do with her? After your triumph?"

"Continue to keep her in Fuuka until the magistrates in the town hosting her have decided she is no longer a threat to Hime. After that, she shall be free to go where she wishes."

Natsuki was puzzled and did not hide it. "She can just pretend that!"

"Pretend? Oh, that she is no longer a threat?"

"Yes."

"True," Shizuru said, in a voice that said it little mattered. "But her guardians shall be looking out for that too, of course. Well, it is fine even if they do not notice a deception on her part. Our former captives are typically none too keen on provoking us again."

"You do not think you should execute them, just in case?"

"No, Your Bloodthirsty Highness," Shizuru teased. "That is not how we do things, we Himeans."

"This I see," said the princess, unflustered. "Chikane too, with her pirates."

"Ahh," Shizuru exhaled. "So she did tell you of her transplantations."

"Yes, but only a little."

Natsuki urged her lover to lie back. Once that was done, she pulled the Himean's feet onto her lap. She knew Shizuru liked her massaging them and it was the least she could do for making the older woman read aloud to her yet again.

"You will tell me what she wrote to you, maybe?" she said as she pinched the fair heels.

"If you wish. Now let us see, it was around this part-here," Shizuru said, and proceeded to read out the relevant paragraphs in their friend's letter to her.

You may have heard by now of my relocations. I know the expectations are for me to either execute or sell the pirates I capture into slavery. Indeed, that was my original intention. However, I have been discovering things that caused me to change that sentence, at least for some of them. I am still performing the expected punishments, but I am also sparing others. These are being conveyed far inland into new and small settlements. All of these communities are distant from the waters. There they can start new lives, rough though it may be at the start.

Why such mercy, you wonder? You see, a number of the corsairs we found were formerly farmers, shepherds, town labourers, and tradesmen. In short, they used to be honest workers, some even of Himean or Fuukan stock.

It was poverty-and even more recently, famine-that drove them into their new and deplorable line of employment. They explained as much when they surrendered their vessels and even led us to their small coastal settlements. Most had families, which would have starved had they not exploited our own sloth in patrolling our waters.

One cannot but look at so many persons and see a waste of humanity and resources. We know that the poverty they describe is real. Many in the provinces have been on subsistence living for generations. There are not enough jobs to sustain our small folk because most businesses are now powered by slave labour. There is little land for them to try and farm because the best tracts have gone to the big estate owners. This is true not just of Hime but of nearly every other state around Mare Nostrum.

We have not led these people into piracy, so do not think me blaming their wrongdoing on the rest of society. People are responsible for their own choices, and the decision to be a pirate is a choice still. Even so, we have made the situation such that piracy was one of the few choices left for their survival. We cannot turn away from that truth, even if we cannot condone the crimes.

So wherever pirates surrendered themselves and their ships without a fight, I practised mercy. Several of the provincial governors have already agreed to go along with my resettlements. The important thing is to keep our captives far away from the sea, so only locations far inland have been selected. It shall be a struggle at first, no one doubts it. But given that the alternative is execution, many of them are eager to take on the challenge.

I have some going to the area north of Sosia, so you may have opportunity to see for yourself how my little resettlements come along. As you see, however, I spared your province the experiment. Septentria is yet too young for me to prevail upon its governor to introduce yet another foreign element to it.

"I think she was too kind," was Natsuki's view of the situation.

Shizuru was unsurprised: she knew her lover's disdain for thieves. The Princess Natsuki had a good nature and could display a startling ability for sympathy considering her lofty social status. Yet when it came to what she termed "the ignoble crimes", she showed nothing save steel.

"I wonder," Shizuru said. "Personally, I approve of her clemency, as I do agree that most of these people might never have become pirates had circumstance not pressed them into it. It is not as though one can watch one's loved ones starve with composure, Natsuki. These people too have families, as she mentioned. It could be they were only trying to support them."

"Could be," said the young woman. "But not all those with poor families become pirates. And not all pirates have families."

"Then what of those who do? Perhaps some people's circumstances narrow their choices."

"Yes," Natsuki said. "But it does not change that it is a choice, as Chikane said. And those who steal once will do it again."

Shizuru chuckled at the younger woman's hardness on the subject.

"I wonder what that says about the stickier fingers among our senators," she said. "At any rate, part of the reason she showed some such leniency was so that she could use it to bargain, mea vita. Chikane mentioned it in another part of this letter, which I have not read out to you yet. Several of them offered her crucial information that could help her capture the ones still at large. This is significant given how cleverly hidden some of the pirate towns and strongholds are in places like Cilicia. Half a dozen other admirals have tried to find some of those hideouts in the past, only to give up and proclaim them undiscoverable. Safe passage for informants who can reveal those locations seems reasonable."

"Then she must be merciful, I see," Natsuki said, somehow still communicating her opinion that their friend had been too lenient.

"Yet you still disapprove, hmm?"

"Of the bargain she made? No. It is practical."

"But?"

"But a thief shall be a thief," came the verdict, spoken suddenly in Greek for precision. "Sooner or later he will find another reason to justify stealing when opportunity tempts his avarice or sense of convenience. Each time he does it, the bar sinks lower. One day he will find there is no bar any more."

From that stance she would not be budged, to her lover's amusement. Perhaps to appeal to these condemnatory inclinations, Shizuru read out to her another excerpt from the Himemiya Naval Campaign. This tale was not from the chief admiral herself, however, but from Chie Harada, also following the antipiracy commission's dispatches back in Hime.

Chikane's personal fleet apparently encountered another of the big pirate admirals in late autumn. While she did sink many of his vessels, neither the enemy admiral's capture nor defeat fell into her hands in this case. According to Chie, the laurels were claimed instead by an unexpected third party.

It transpired thus: Chikane's ships had swiftly engaged and overcome the pirate vessels. The enemy admiral, losing all hope, had broken away from his fleet to escape. Bad luck pursued him, however. His sturdy quinquere me had gone no further than a cable's length when another ship collided with it. The culprit was one of his own ships, and it had struck his vessel on the stern in its haste to flee too. It rocked his flagship in a shower of splinters and knocked him off his deck, right into the water.

The pirate admiral was a veteran of naval warfare. The first thing he did after falling in was to kick arms and legs energetically so he could knife deeper into the sea. His burst propelled him both downwards and away from his own vessel, into safety. A blow from the oars could have killed him; contact with the hull would have scraped the flesh off his bones. It was only when his lungs could take no more that he swam up and broke the surface.

The nearest two ships narrowly missed him, but not the shark that had been cruising nearby. The grey monster was drawn unerringly in by the gash on his arm. That wound had been opened when he caught on a part of the ship's rail. The red ribbon it issued gave the grinning beast something to target: the animal seized the injured limb and shook the arm free to slide down its throat. That this did not sate it was made apparent when it grabbed the admiral's body and swam away with the man shrieking, a trail of blood and human excreta behind them.

One of Chikane's legates had been in the trireme pursuing the fleeing pirate admiral. Witnessing the unenviable conclusion for the enemy commander, he prepared his crew to ram the flagship again. Not that it was necessary, he reported to his own admiral later, because the pirate crew was too shocked by its leader's fate to escape.

The pleased legate was able to direct several of the triremes following him to board and capture the enemy flagship. Still, it was a pity they could not deliver the pirate admiral to Commander Himemiya, who wanted all of them taken captive. He wrote an account to his wife afterwards, including a line all Hime was quoting by December: Sometimes the shark steals from the eagle.

"There now," Shizuru concluded for the Otomeian. "I suppose that violent conclusion appeals to you, what with your dim view of these naval brigands. A shark is as bloody an executioner as even you could wish."

"Could be," the other grinned. "But the shark too was a thief. Chikane should have captured and sentenced it for cannibalism."

---

They spied no sharks on their own southbound voyage. This disappointed Natsuki, who had a fascination for the many denizens of the deep. Sharks in particular amazed her, because she said their design seemed devoted to a single imperative, which was to consume. She knew they often followed ships in hope of getting scraps, so she spent the journey scanning the ship's wake for their giveaway dorsals. When she lamented her failure to spy one to her lover, she was told it might be due to the season. Even the two-legged versions of those beasts tended to be absent at this time, Shizuru jested. That was because commercial vessels rarely voyaged in the cold months. Even the sharkiest merchantmen respected winter's mare clausum, fearful of losing goods to choppy waters.

"Although those who need to travel only a short distance still do sail," Shizuru explained to her companion. "But only if the wind is with them, as you might have seen from the few vessels that sailed with us. At this time of year, only north to south is possible. Heading the opposite direction on the Adriatic right now would be murderous on oarsmen. And kill those in our staff susceptible to seasickness, I wager."

Their own voyage was again short, thanks to these conditions. They arrived at a villa already prepared for their advent this time, as Shizuru had sent half of her staff ahead of them. These travelled days earlier and thus had time to settle everything before their domina came with the rest of the retinue.

It made for a much more comfortable welcome. Shizuru and her mistress were able to spend the day of their arrival and the day after that in lazy relaxation. The third day in Ravenna heralded a headlong plunge back into business, however. On that day, they were paid a visit by their Himean banker. He came saddled with news and ledgers for both of his clients.

"Fujino-san had her servants summon me from the city the day they arrived," he explained to the Otomeian polemarch. "So I set out for Ravenna even before your ship docked. I brought a copy of my ledgers for your account, Princess Natsuki. I think you'll be pleased by what you see."

Natsuki thanked him and took the documents.

"There were several big orders for mules recently," he said. "One of them was even for the latest Sicilian campaign. Your establishment filled a number of these orders. Please do ask me anything that requires clarification."

She nodded. But then she held the papers uncertainly until Shizuru assured her that it was perfectly proper to inspect them right there. They were having drinks and a light noonday meal in the villa's triclinium, and Sosius was their only guest. As he had come for the express purpose of seeing to his clients, it was not untoward that they conduct business as they supped.

While the princess read her ledgers, Shizuru addressed their banker again.

"I know you have both bad and good news for my own accounts," she told him. "Let us start with the bad. So the House actually had the temerity to issue a decree forbidding tribunes of the plebs from vetoing discussion of the provincial commands?"

Sosius's face fell and he confirmed it.

"So Katou-san's letter did reach you in time," he said.

"If you mean the one she sent north, no, it did not," she informed him. "However, she had the good sense to send a duplicate of it to this villa, just in case I missed the other one. At any rate, when exactly did this take place? All I know is that it was towards the end of the previous year."

"Just two weeks before the new magistrates took office," he answered. "They did it in an impromptu House session, called by last year's senior consul."

"Did they buy him?"

"Undoubtedly. The only senators given proper notice were those attached to their faction or those they had already inveigled into voting as they wished. The meeting was so poorly attended there were just enough to make a quorum!"

Shizuru shook her head.

"Fumi-han wrote that she and Kenichi-han dashed to get there," she said, "but they were obstructed by some bully boys from entering the Curia."

He heard the unspoken question: "Oh, they're both all right. Only a little scuffed... and I think both of them lost their togas."

"Good, but it was still a disgrace."

He agreed aloud. Trying to obstruct a tribune of the plebs from screeching his veto in the Well of the Comitia was one thing. Trying to obstruct a senator from simply exercising his right to attend a meeting of his peers was another. No senator could be deprived of his right to observe a normal House session! In fact, no citizen could be deprived of the right to observe such a session either. It took the game to a whole new low, as far as Sosius was concerned. But then, this new decree did that too.

"The only tribunes of the plebs in the meeting were conservatives, so naturally, no one vetoed the motion. And the ones who did vote against it during the division were in the minority."

"Which let them pass that ludicrous decree in the blink of an eye."

Sosius murmured an apology. He told her some other senators had been upset by the strange decree and questioned its authors in the following Senate session. As said session was already led by the new senior consul-herself an archconservative-the questioners got nowhere.

Shizuru took a deep breath and lifted her eyes to the ceiling.

"I wonder," she mused loudly, "at their desperation to put me down. This was no elegant bit of political magic. It was a blow with the thick end of a ham."

Sosius folded his hands together.

"I believe they felt that subtlety was no longer necessary," he ventured. "After all, everyone knows their battle with you will be the event of the year. This muzzling of the tribunes of the plebs is just an opening salvo, seen that way."

The crimson eyes swung down to meet his brown ones angrily.

"What it is," Shizuru snapped, "is grossly unconstitutional! How can they actually expect such a ridiculous decree to hold? The only exemption to the tribunate veto is the office of the Dictator, and we do not have a dictator right now! Or do the Traditionalists mean to say that the Senate currently exists under a dictatorship? Of whose, I'd like to know, as that bunch of baboons could never countenance anyone in that position!"

"Is there no possibility it will be deemed valid?"

"Certainly not! Their beloved mos maiorum itself contravenes their bizarre decree. Armitage herself should have seen that, the hypocrite! That decree's only purpose is to try to cow the tribunes of the plebs this year. It makes me wonder how even the conservative tribunes of the plebs agreed to it. What sort of fool allows a few small men and women to abrogate the rights of the Plebs by reducing the powers of their representatives?"

"The excuse they give is that it's only a concession on one unique topic," Sosius told her. "Most of the Plebs can't really be affected by a discussion of which senator gets to govern which province next, after all, so they say it doesn't make much of a difference."

"A soft answer for soft heads," his auditor sneered. "What is to prevent later senators from extracting further concessions on topics that may be of more moment to the welfare of the Plebs? Oh, but the stupidity of people astonishes me each time!"

She shook her head and exhaled slowly, trying to control the irritation. She asked her banker to move on to the good news already, to give her a reprieve from her foes' "moronic plotting".

Sosius acquiesced, relieved to be able to move on to better subjects: "Ah, on that front, it's very good news indeed. I'm happy to say your foresight has paid large dividends, Fujino-san-yet again."

"I could not have done it without the excellent people helping me," she said in tribute to him.

A grin lit up the banker's round face, whose unassuming looks masked a commercial insight and influence that even The Eighteen held in high esteem. Sosius was short and inclined to corpulence and dressed just like any other middle-class merchant in the Forum. But when the man snapped his fingers, thunder boomed over Hime's markets.

He came from a clan of formerly foreign bankers that had served Hime's upper class for generations. Shizuru's family was among their oldest clients-had been clients even before they attained their wealth, in fact. Sosius's predecessors had taken only respectable depositors, and depositors as respectable as the Fujino, paltry though their holdings used to be, had nevertheless represented a strong endorsement.

The association had truly served his family well, Sosius now reflected. Today the Fujino account was not only respectable but also fat with lucre and its owner had become his biggest depositor. Association with her had also brought his business other large accounts as more of Hime's rich saw how well he served her needs. All of which meant that he was heavily invested in Shizuru's continued success: this was why he put himself at her disposal in a way he did not for any other.

"Conditions were much as you predicted they would be, Fujino-san," he now told her. "It was indeed a buyer's market. Yet you were the only buyer truly taking advantage of it. I doubt anyone else saw it coming and thought to get ready."

"It helps when you know the quality of the person on whom you are staking things," she smiled back.

"Ah, Chikane Himemiya-san. Yes, she was an excellent wager from the beginning."

Pride in her friend swelled: "She always is."

She could see that her lover had ceased perusing her account books and now listened to them instead. The young woman had the cat's look of alert intrigue on her face, her green eyes cool and calculating.

"Well, leave us not keep the polemarch in suspense by speaking so vaguely," she told her banker, who glanced at the polemarch too once she said this. "How many senators has my money bought over the past year and were any of them difficult to attain?"

"I understand Harada-san will be coming over this week to fill in the non-fiscal details," Sosius responded. "But as of now, I'm pleased to tell you that we've already secured twelve senators, all chosen with the care you demanded. Our collection includes, as you had hoped, this year's junior consul, Osamu Himura. He was the most expensive of the lot, of course."

"Of course," Shizuru laughed dryly. "How much did Himura-han charge, then?"

"Fourteen million."

She looked pleased.

"I expected him to charge more," she said.

"As did I," Sosius smiled back. "I expected him to solicit as much as twice that amount, in fact, so I met him with every expectation of going into heavy negotiation. But he asked for only twenty, so I worked him down to fourteen."

"Is his purse so low at the moment, then? He was not even one of those I expected to be too deep in debt."

"What may have given us the advantage in his case was his anxiety to close on a purchase," Sosius told her. "He had his eye on a fine house just recently put on the market-Rieko Oshiro's old house, in the Carinae, if you know it."

As Shizuru knew the mansion in question, she nodded to show her understanding. The old Oshiro house was a grand edifice, besides being located in one of the more fashionable addresses of Hime. Osamu Himura, eager to upgrade from his old house now that he was consul, would have been anxious to grab it before other savvy house hunters put up their bids. That meant full payment in cash.

"He needed your fourteen million to replenish his coffers enough to buy comfortably," Sosius went on. "Not that his accounts were empty! It's just that he needed to defray some of the costs from his bribes, you see."

Shizuru asked if he had bribed a lot.

"I would say the usual amount for a consular candidate," was Sosius's reply. "The competition wasn't too stiff, especially since there were only two or three others among the candidates who also came from Famous Families. Of them, one was the archconservatives' bid, Ayano Utada."

"Whom they got elected as senior consul."

"They lobbied very heavily for her," said the banker. "It was clear from the start of the voting that she would be occupying the senior chair. Himura-san's relatively easy-going reputation might be what swung him into the junior seat after that. The rest of the 'serious' candidates were on the crotchety side, and deemed less attractive colleagues for Ayano Utada-san. One, Eimi Fukui, is just naturally contrary. As for the other-well, would anyone have seriously voted for Iemasa Yamazaki? The man would have been a consul beyond the pale, even for the archconservatives!"

Shizuru agreed, being familiar with the history of the senator in question. Of an enormously old family, Iemasa Yamazaki was also of enormous peculiarity. He had shocked all of Hime eight years past by condemning his son to death for supposed immorality. The rights of the paterfamilias were his justification for the act, which was nevertheless viewed with horror by the rest of the Republic. Even the stiffest conservatives no longer sanctioned the right of a head of the family to execute dependents! Even Haruka Armitage, staunchest of Traditionalists, had blanched bone white upon hearing of it.

Iemasa Yamazaki's wife had taken their remaining children and flown to her relatives for sanctuary. This had not prevented Yamazaki from publicly declaring that such lack of respect only showed the moral decay of society. His demeanour showed everyone the truth: that he genuinely believed himself in the right of it.

Pressure from his wife's family had forced him into voluntary exile for some years afterwards, but he had managed to return to Hime three years ago, thanks to his allies. In spite of all that, there was no scotching the record. No voter was ignorant of his story in the last elections. This explained why Iemasa Yamazaki, of an august name that should have guaranteed the consulship, was passed over for other candidates.

"By comparison, Osamu Himura was seen as much easier to deal with," Sosius went on. "The Traditionalists themselves supported his election. His family's conservative too, after all. I think they believed he would be easier for Ayano Utada to control."

"Yes, that makes sense. He was not even hard enough to try to strike a better bargain with you."

"Nor sharp enough to advance your cause as far as he could, if you'll pardon me saying."

Shizuru admitted the truth of that.

"But no matter," she said. "A consul in the pocket is always a help, even if it is a second-rate one. What a pity we did not slip someone stronger in his place! I wonder now if we should not have tried to get someone elected from the start."

But Sosius shook his head.

"It would never have worked, even with all your resources," he said apologetically but with candour. "Had the archconservatives known you to be backing someone as consul from the start, they would have thrown everything they had into lobbying against him. They know how important this year is to you and your command."

Shizuru sighed and confessed that he was right.

"I know that, of course," she said wearily. "Blame what I just said on wishful thinking! Well, then, away from wishes and to reality again. Who are the others we bought? Any other elected magistrates?"

"Yes, of course. Two of the praetors and two more tribunes of the plebs."

"Which gives me three in Banri-han's College, himself included. Very good. Has Chikane any this year?"

"Well, this is only conjecture, but I believe one of the tribunes is a friend to her young cousin."

"I should write to Urumi-han soon, then. Three are enough, of course, but it never hurts to have more instead of less in this case. Anyone else worth mentioning?"

He gave her a list of the other senators he had bought for her sake. While they were not elected officials, they were all nevertheless endowed with some desirable traits for a lobbying senator. Several were good orators with consular status, for instance, and therefore high in the House's speaking order. Some were political moderates with significant pull among their fellows. Others were not even accorded the right to speak within the House yet: but her agents had apparently deemed them good wagers for her team, anyway.

Shizuru and Sosius reviewed the personalities her money had bought, and when it was over, seemed suddenly to recall their quiet spectator. Shizuru had never really forgotten her, of course: she had even silently thrilled to the girl's patently growing amazement. Now she grinned at the foreigner, whose eyes said she was grappling with a puzzle.

"I can feel your mind galloping, Princess," she grinned at the girl. "What do you make of all this?"

Natsuki shook her head at the two Himeans.

"All this?" she said in wonder. "How did you do all this?"

"With the help of exceptional allies," Shizuru responded. "And even some obliging enemies, who not only gave Chikane her commission but also gave Haruka Armitage a censorship."

Chapter 83

Vocabulaire:

1. Censor (L.) - An office responsible for monitoring the list of senators as well as the public's "morality". They also had the power (technically the duty) to eject senators from the House if they failed to meet some legal requirement, e.g. if a senator was in arrears, which one law said no senator could be.
2. Eiichi Kiyosaki - A character in this story. He was a tribune of the plebs when Chikane's antipiracy commission was created, and it was due to his agitation of the people then that said commission even came to be. See Chikane's letter to Shizuru in Chapter 73 : hit Ctrl+F and search for "Eiichi Kiyosaki".
3. Lustrum (L.) - The five-year term to which censors (s.v.) were elected. For the historians: A lustrum can end prematurely if one censor dies or resigns in this story, since it takes place well after the 393 BCE lustrum that made censor replacement nefas (sacrilegious).
4. Mare nostrum (L.) - Literally Our Sea , the Ancient Roman term for the Mediterranean.
5. Talent (L.) - The amount of silver/gold a man can carry. The standard here is for each talent to be equal to 6,250 denarii or 25,000 sesterces.
6. Tuatha - The druidic gods/pantheon.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

---

When Haruka Armitage was elected a censor, it sent shivers throughout the Senate. Everyone knew she had powerful crotchets about the inappropriate and immoral. Since she also had the constricted perceptions of a true conservative, this spelled catastrophe for all the senators less than Platonic of character.

Most worrying of all was her stance on indebted senators. As many expected, the woman cracked down on these with a vengeance. High time, she announced at the start of her lustrum, that someone finally enforced the law banning senators from being in arrears. If she was aware how many of her own faction's allies broke that rule, she gave no indication. Only natural that her investigations should begin-and for the most part, proceed-with those who were not her associates.

"So you won't see any stout conservatives in the list of ejected senators," Chie Harada told Shizuru when she came to Ravenna. "She would've dearly loved to kick out people like you or Himemiya's cousin. You're the ones she thinks are the real dangers to public morality! But since you're both debt-free and scrupulous about your assets, she couldn't very well impeach either of you during her lustrum."

Shizuru suppressed a grin as she imagined her nemesis raging over being unable to strike at her.

"I imagine she conducted an investigation, nevertheless," she posited, "to ensure all our businesses were ones legally allowed for senators."

"I'm sure she did! As it is, mostly radicals or moderates've been getting stripped of their senatorial status. Oh, there've been one or two names from conservative families, but only disreputable members of those clans. You might say she picked out the black sheep of each herd, so she wasn't really going against her Traditionalist grain."

"Wonderful, is it not?" was Shizuru's reply. "For all her noisy insistence on legal fairness, Armitage still has a discretionary view of justice. I doubt she would ever eject your father-in-law for his debts, for instance, given that he and she are in the same faction."

"As I already paid off those debts, she wouldn't have reason to."

Shizuru stifled a grin at the wry reminder.

"Anyway, there's been plenty of other targets for her to light upon," continued the other senator. "For some reason or other, the number of senators deep in debt has gone up sharply in recent time. In fact, it's not even limited to the senators. A lot of people seem to have fallen into dramatic arrears in just the past three or four years!"

Shizuru withheld another chuckle at these words. "For some reason or other" indeed! The rising number of bankrupts in past years was far from a mystery.

It all began with the lasting drought. Its onset had driven up the cost of grain as merchants prepared for shorter supplies than usual. But then it had persisted through another harvest and yet another, turning into a full-blown famine. This sent already-escalated grain prices skyrocketing to over twenty times the normal price in some places.

These particular outcomes of the famine were not difficult to understand. Low supply married to unchanged demand birthed terrible grain prices. That in turn led to starvation in the lower classes. But that was not the end of the famine's devastation. To make matters worse, few of the people in charge understood that.

Shizuru's senatorial fellows were either members of the richest class or fiscal dunces. Thus they often failed to appreciate how far a food shortage went. They only saw the lower classes agitating about hunger and the rabble rousers like Eiichi Kiyosaki who stirred them up. They saw the poor complaining about having only turnips and millet, and thought that was the end of the matter.

A short-sighted view. Shizuru knew a famine was an economic disaster for the entirety of Hime.

It started with those most ubiquitous of vendors, the grain millers and the bakers. Many of the lower classes did not have their own ovens, so they asked bakers to bake their bread. They lacked mills too and relied on the millers to grind their grain. As payment for the trouble, the millers took a portion of what they ground and resold it for an income. The bakers did the same, taking a portion of the flour people asked them to bake. They took this payment of flour and used it to make loaves they could then sell for a profit.

When people could not afford to bring grain to them, the millers' grinders stilled. When there was no one bringing in flour, the bakers' ovens quieted. Even if the latter did manage to find enough flour to bake loaves, the bread would be so costly that no one could afford to buy them.

Few ate well during a famine; this had an impact on all the other tradesmen. The common labourers and porters started working less and less. Building foremen saw workers faint in the middle of construction. Manufactory workers slowed to a crawl from hunger.

Projects were delayed at great cost, as a result. Goods' prices shot up due to the increasing expense and inefficiency of production. Shops for inedible items closed because people saved what they had to spend on foodstuff. People sold their slaves because they could no longer afford to feed them. Wages went down as employers factored in both lowered profits and worker productivity. Apartment owners and estate landlords could no longer collect rents because tenants had no money.

And the crime rate went soaring, further upsetting what little commerce still proceeded.

With most of the population suddenly dealing with higher costs and thinner revenue streams, the moneylenders of the city made a killing. Many Himeans, including senators, did not cut back on their expenses even when flirting with bankruptcy. They solved the problem of money by borrowing it, simply trusting to the gods that they would find a way to pay it back in the future.

Thus the sharp increase in indebted senators recently. Shizuru knew that many of these debtors would even have borrowed from less-than-respectable creditors. That meant short payback terms on compound interest, which usually began a cycle that only worsened an account already on negative equity. It was debt of this sort that had driven Banri Ueda to her last year.

"Anyway, that's how it's been," Chie sighed about the situation. "It's worked out for you, as I said-and even me, given the terms of my marriage-but I do think it's been an ill wind for many others."

"I can see that," Shizuru agreed.

She would have said more, had it not been for the woman coming to join them. She put the conversation on hold to reintroduce Princess Natsuki to her old friend. Mere formality, of course: the two were not strangers, even if they had not clapped eyes on each other for years.

The appearance of the Otomeian was not a surprise to Chie: Shizuru had said beforehand that they would dine with her mistress. Chie knew too that said mistress had suffered certain bodily changes, including but not limited to an amputation.

So when the foreigner presented herself, Chie was able to react without shock or suspicion. In its place she had a hushed enthralment as she studied the changes of half a decade. What had she expected? Something like this, yes, but also something so much less. Even in a light but fine dress and leaning on an ivory-topped cane, Shizuru's mistress emanated more of her formidable austerity than ever.

When the foreigner had settled herself into the third couch-sitting up instead of reclining as Chie and Shizuru were-Chie addressed the young woman.

"How do you find Fuuka, Natsuki-san?" she ventured, striving to sound casual because she sensed Shizuru preferred that. Whether the foreigner would or not... Well, that was beyond her senses. "Do you like Ravenna, now you finally see it?"

The densely-fringed eyes lit up at the question.

"Yes," Natsuki said.

Then, because it was obvious she did not want to be considered impolite by being curt with her lover's friend, she added, "It is quiet, but I like that too."

"Well, it's a popular holiday place for that reason, although usually in the summers," Chie told her, silently cataloguing the changes even in this conversation. She had not spoken that much to the Otomeian in her time as senior legate to Shizuru, but she could still remember the foreigner's barely concealed anxiety during all those instances. Now she could discern no such apprehension. Oh, the girl was still closed up! A riddle locked away. But not an uncertain one, it seemed, or not any longer.

"Most people come here for peace and quiet," she told this more certain Natsuki. "As well as the cool northern weather."

A pause as all three of them thought the same thing.

"Well," Chie said with a laugh, "northern for us, you know."

"I know," Natsuki said. "As this is southern for me."

The Himeans grinned.

Then, because the only true northerner seemed to sense that she had interrupted their conversation, she drew them back into it: "You were talking of Shizuru's new senators?"

Chie said they were, if she was referring to the ones Shizuru had bought. More specifically, she explained, they had been speaking of the conditions that made it possible to buy them.

"It's worked out so well because the creditors have all been calling in debts," Chie told the room. She had been asked beforehand to conduct this discussion normally even after the Otomeian joined them. Further, Shizuru had even asked that Chie expect the foreigner's occasional participation. A change from their old situation, when the Otomeian had still been the woman's bodyguard: while privy to Shizuru's private talks then, the girl had not been expected to be a contributor in them. This was a whole new power for someone who was an alien paramour.

What Shizuru was granting her mistress here was the confidence one gave an esteemed partner of senatorial blood. Chie herself had just spent a year wedded to such a partner. Yet there were vital dissimilarities. Chie's partner was not only a wife, but also a senatorial and Himean one. How much could Shizuru truly expect her northern foreigner to understand, even given all their time together?

She did as her friend had requested anyway, and went on as though she faced two Himeans instead of her current hybrid audience.

"There's been a rash of usurers demanding full repayment of arrears in the last few months," she revealed. "At the same time, there's been a sudden difficulty in getting any more loans. I know, because some of our fellows have been trying that old trick-you know, borrowing money from someone else to pay off yet another someone else-but no such luck. Most people aren't lending anymore, just collecting. And doing it rabidly, of late!"

Shizuru smiled and said that was to be expected. Chie withheld the sigh.

"At the risk of sounding repetitive, Shizuru-san, I have to reiterate that most people don't see how you get your expectations," she said. "I don't know about Natsuki-san here, but I'd really appreciate a clarification of how you foresaw this state of affairs before it even came about."

"It has been coming about for a while now."

"So you keep saying! Now explain how and what led to it, I do beg you!"

The other held up her hands, laughing.

"Very well, if you insist on it," Shizuru said with a swift glance at her mistress.

The foreigner's eyes gleamed; Chie read excitement in them. But excitement over what? Over an explanation of fiscal movements? Stranger and stranger still!

"As you observed earlier, Chie-han, many persons fell into arrears very recently," Shizuru started. "This was because the drought and ensuing famine had caused an economic downturn. If people cannot afford to eat, they cannot afford much of anything else. Too little profit for everybody, too many expenses still going. This much is clear, is it not?"

"It is," Chie agreed.

"The usual recourse for most in such a situation is to sell what they can to supplement a suddenly thin income stream. The problem with that is-well, you know the problem with such a solution, do you not, Princess?"

Natsuki sounded to Chie like a youngster answering her pedagogue: "Few have money or interest to buy during a downturn."

Shizuru's pleasure in the answer was also just like a pedagogue's.

"Precisely that," she said, red eyes alight. "There are exceptions, of course, but these are usually only interested in large assets like houses. Even then, those buying such properties know they can bargain for lower prices since the sellers' needs are pressing. So, whatever is sold goes too cheap and many things are not sold at all. Just as an example, I know you will have noticed all the property being put up for sale in Hime last year. More than half of it remains unsold, my banker tells me."

"That's so."

"So selling off assets is not always useful. A lot of people take the other recourse then, which is to borrow money. That is how I knew a lot of people would be running up big debts over the past two years. Since the lenders have the upper hand in the transaction, by the way, they can also impose even worse terms than usual."

Chie snorted aloud as she remembered something at this statement.

"You can say that again!" she exclaimed. "Some of the really horrible cases rumoured recently had debts set at over forty percent compound interest!"

Shizuru was familiar with the way moneylenders worked, but was still disgusted.

"That is manifestly felonious!" she said to Chie, who concurred first, and then asked what all this had to do with Shizuru's forecast that the creditors would call in all of those debts aggressively this winter season.

"Is it because you thought the moneylenders would finally be running out of cash themselves?" she guessed, making no attempt to conceal her hesitation even as she spoke. She did not want to make too many conjectural sallies in this conversation because she was acutely aware of her deficiencies in the topic. Nor did it help that Shizuru's mistress was present: Chie was starting to suspect that the girl understood economics better than she did!

"Something like that, but not exactly," Shizuru told her, before expounding further.

She said the decisive factor on which she had gambled her predictions had been Chikane Himemiya's appointment to rid Mare Nostrum of pirates.

"This is especially since her command is a strong one," she detailed. "I doubt my predictions would have come true so dramatically had the Senate strapped Chikane with an underfunded and weak campaign. She would still have trounced whatever pirates she met, but she would not have cleared Our Sea the way she is currently doing, so exhaustively."

When Chikane had revealed to her the resources of the antipiracy command, Shizuru had seen the future immediately. She saw a Mare Nostrum safer than it had been in more than a hundred years. Ships would again be free to sail to and from every corner of it without fear of seizure. Sea travel as well as trade would undergo a revival.

All of which Shizuru and the other mercantile-minded Himeans saw as imminent opportunities. The Himemiya Campaign might not have completed its objective yet, but it was obvious to all, as early as last autumn, that it would do so presently.

The business community started preparations for it.

"The eradication of the pirates makes overseas investment possible again," Shizuru explained. "Do you realise that in the last hundred years, the presence of these seafaring thieves has prevented our businessmen from sending their money out of the country? This has kept Himean money concentrated in Fuuka and Hime for virtually a century! The only exceptions have been the nearer provinces with overland routes, like the Spains. Even then, businessmen have still been moderate, wary of sinking too much money into places far away."

"But now, thanks to Chikane, everything has changed," she continued. "Suddenly the sea routes are open again. Capital has other places it can now go. And like water, it shall go, believe me. Streams flow from a dam whenever you open a channel."

She met Chie's narrowed eyes and said, "This is what led to the economic crisis we are seeing, which is also the fulfilment of my predictions. I knew Chikane would have enough victories by this time to show everyone she would complete her undertaking to clear the seas. I knew many would see the opportunities that would present in the foreign markets as a consequence. I knew those who want to invest would have to gather up their capital. That includes capital many of them may have originally lent out to others at profitable rates during the famine."

Chie stared at her, brow wrinkled, and more than a little daunted by what Shizuru had just exposed.

"So you mean," she started slowly, "you started planning this as soon as Himemiya got her commission? That you knew, as early as then, that a lot of our peers would end up in hock up to their necks after the famine and her activities?"

"Not precisely," Shizuru said, with a look at the youngest woman in the room.

Chie looked that way too and noted the ruddy cheeks.

"I see you suspect the truth, Princess," Shizuru teased. "Out with it, if you care to hazard another of your suspicions."

Chie saw that whatever the foreigner thought was so exciting that she could barely keep it in. The Otomeian's next words came out very swiftly.

"You started planning as soon as you conquered Septentria, soon after Terantrum," she deduced.

Shizuru laughed, applauding. Chie gaped at both of them.

"That couldn't be!" Chie said. "How could you have known that early that something like this would happen? I mean, Himemiya's campaign hadn't even been thought up yet when you fought King Obsidian at Terantrum! And you'd not have heard of it until much later. Why should you think the creditors would be on a collections rush to shore up capital before that?"

"Because," Shizuru responded, "if the Himemiya Campaign had never happened, capital would still be flowing or preparing to flow out of Hime this moment. You see, I myself have played a part in changing the economic situation as I described it. By conquering the Mentulaean Empire, I opened up yet another playground for our many knight-businessmen."

The breath left Chie loudly as she realized what her friend was saying.

Shizuru forged on: "It might not be 'overseas' any longer, especially with the establishment of the via Fujino as an overland route, but Septentria remains a foreign playground with a lot of opportunities for the smart investor."

"Which means many 'smart investors' would have been dying to invest in it," Chie concluded with amazement. She was finally processing all this fiscal elucidation, all further proof of the oddity of her colleague. Who could predict things like this in the middle of taming a new province? How magical was the Fujino mind!

"There would still have been a lot of them calling in debts," she went on, still marvelling at her friend's foresight. "Yes, I see! That's why you'd still have been able to count on some of our fellows falling headlong into bankruptcy recently."

Shizuru said that was right.

"I am still pleased Chikane's command happened," she qualified. "Otherwise, I might never have had such a wide array of choices for buying senators. With both of our campaigns unlocking so many prospects abroad, the business community has been in a bigger panic than ever about settling accounts outstanding. The result has been scads of bankrupts in the House... all of whom, incidentally, are hugely afraid of being stripped of senatorial rank by Dear Censor Armitage. Thank goodness for her aggressiveness, as well as the knights' efficiency at collecting their capital."

Although they would have an unpleasant surprise waiting for them when they tried to use that capital to flood the Septentrian market, she told her lover later. This was when they were changing for the night in their bedroom; Chie herself had retired to the suite they had given her.

"Why?" Natsuki asked with interest. "You will stop them?"

"Well, I do not want them overwhelming all the local businesses."

Natsuki was at the foot of their bed: she had just removed her prosthetic and now worked on the bandages protecting the stump.

"But," she said, "I thought investment from outside would be good. Even for Septentria."

"It is," Shizuru agreed. "But only insofar as the investors would not try to edge out nearly all local competition. They would, you know. Hime's plutocrats are merciless about that sort of thing. Plutocrats are generally that, I suppose."

A speaking look from Natsuki. Shizuru smirked and put a finger beside her nose.

"Shh, most people think I am only a senator," she quipped.

Natsuki shook her head playfully: "But how can you stop them? The Himean plutocrats?"

Shizuru had finished donning her sleeping tunic. She now brought a wash basin to Natsuki and crouched before the young woman, offering to wash the exposed stump in her place. Natsuki accepted.

"I can impose regulations on new businesses, for one," Shizuru said as she ran a wet cloth over the stub's smooth skin. "I can also be careful about the concessions and grants I give. The problem with our other conqueror-governors, when they founded our provinces, is that they were more interested in enhancing their popularity or purses than with ensuring the Republic's future. This led to entirely free markets for Himean businessmen in the provinces. The natives had rather less leeway in their commercial activities."

Natsuki noted that the natives were the conquered. Therefore, they were naturally expected to have the shorter end of the stick after having lost their wars.

"Yes, of course," Shizuru agreed. "But not to the point that a province is mired in an economic morass. Most of its revenues are siphoned off to another country's private individuals ever after. A bad thing, Natsuki. The provinces have to be self-sufficient, not milked dry. They and Hime's dominance of them cannot last otherwise."

"Many of your people would disagree," Natsuki pointed out.

"Many of my people are certifiable cretins," Shizuru answered. "Look at our Senate, which is stuffed full of nincompoops. No, I long ago ceased paying attention to what The Many think or desire, at least insofar as my own opinions are made."

"What do you think of that Greek idea, 'democracy'?" the girl asked all of a sudden.

Shizuru looked up from her task, intrigued.

"I think it like many other things the Greeks came up with," she said honestly. "A dream, a beautiful fiction that works on paper and nowhere else. That is because, in the vast majority of gatherings, there will still be more fools or middling minds than actual intelligent persons. How can the rule of The Many be wise when wisdom is in scarce supply throughout humanity?"

"Yet your senators pass decisions based on the vote of The Many."

"Indeed, and they often pass stupid decisions. Even so, I still think our implementation of majority rule better than the Greek 'democracy'. Hime is government of The Many by The Few. Of course, I still wish The Few were more rational, but no system is perfect."

The polemarch laughingly told her she was "so Himean".

"I take it as a compliment," she replied.

She had finished washing the shortened limb and now dried it with another cloth. She put away the washbasin and rags after and headed to a table where more of her tools for personal hygiene waited.

There was a jug of water and a saucer of salt, as well as a twig that had been frayed at the end. She picked up the jug first and poured water into a cup to rinse her mouth. The fluid was spat into a small bowl she used for that purpose.

She took up the twig and began in earnest, picking between teeth and rinsing her mouth at regular intervals. After that there was the square of clean cloth waiting on the table. There was only one square because Natsuki had used the other earlier. Now Shizuru wrapped the remaining one around a finger and dipped it in the cup to dampen. Next it went into the saucer of salt. This was rubbed against her teeth.

Shizuru knew not everyone went through as meticulous a regime of dental hygiene as she did. Many Himeans made do with only a quick rinse, even, or an occasional tooth-picking. She herself was both vain and practical enough to do more: she wanted to keep all of her teeth for as long as fortune permitted.

This had actually led to another of the Fujino legions' quirks. Their officers were instructed to drill the basics of dental care into the legionaries. To those who accused her of imposing her personal eccentricities on the troops, Shizuru insisted that carious soldiers fought less efficiently.

"The pain can distract them in the middle of battle, if it gets bad enough," she would say. "More than that, it tends to make them weak, because they either eat less food or consume too much of addling substances like liquor in an effort to avoid the ache of it. Decayed teeth are a disease! I want my army to be healthy. So what if, in the process, they also happen to boast whiter smiles than the rest of Hime?"

To finish tending to her own white smile, she rinsed the salt out of her mouth again with more water. This accomplished, she settled down to sit at the foot of the bed with Natsuki.

"I do hope," she sighed, "that some enterprising apothecary shall eventually invent a substance for cleaning teeth that does not leave one so thirsty."

Her companion chuckled, busily running a comb through jet hair. It was a nightly ritual that Shizuru loved: the sight of the comb raking those black locks in ripples delighted her.

She leaned closer as she watched. This way she could enjoy too the pine-dusted, snow-on-skin scent of her mistress's body.

"But Shizuru," Natsuki said suddenly. "Tell me."

"Yes?"

"When you planned this, what you said earlier-to expect many of your people to be in debt."

"What of it?"

"Did you think of it too when you told Fumi Katou to prosecute Sumio Fujimoto in an Assembly?"

Shizuru's brightest smile came out at this.

"What makes you ask that?" she said, knowing it was as good as a confirmation.

Natsuki explained: if the people had been suffering so badly through an economic downturn that they could barely feed themselves, they would have been even more eager to see a rich man convicted. She said it was human nature to be inflamed by envy.

"You really would make a fine philosopher, Love," said the woman besotted with her, earning an unphilosophical snort.

"But this," Natsuki persisted. "You thought of all this? What if-if something went wrong? You did not fear it? With your intention to buy bankrupt senators for your cause?"

Shizuru said she had not.

"There was a constant in my favour," she answered. "No matter what obstacles could have arisen, one thing would not have changed: there would still have been senators in debt. There always are. There just happened to be a lot more this time. I also still have other allies. Banri-han, the President of the Plebeian Tribune, is obviously one of them. I would have pulled him, along with every other string I could find. And I think you know by now that I always find strings when I go looking for them."

"Yes, it-it is Ulyssean."

Shizuru heard the depth of her tone and noted her colour, recognising it all of a sudden.

"I think you must admire me a bit, Polemarch," she said quietly. "Did my schemes impress?"

Natsuki looked away. Still her skin telegraphed the answer. Shizuru studied the flagrant colour and knew she had read right. The success of her scheming had excited her lover.

It was no surprise, she considered. People in her occupation always had their triumphs-their power-woven into their attraction. She recognised when the stare given her held a fantasy of being subject to her strength. And there had long been many such stares, even before she came to North and put down an empire with her boot to its neck.

She took the comb from Natsuki and set it beside them.

"If I impressed you so much, grant me a reward," she coaxed, fingers describing the concave small of Natsuki's back. Even the girl's shift was hot from the skin beneath it and she called herself a fool for not noticing quicker.

She pressed down with her palm.

"A little incentive to continue being impressive, perhaps?" she asked, smiling at the other's gasp.

"But your friend..."

"Chie-han already went to bed."

"But-no, still."

"You saw how much wine she drank at dinner. I wager she is already asleep."

"She may wake!" Natsuki hissed.

She followed the hands guiding her onto the sheets, all the same.

"The sitting room is between her room and ours." Shizuru crept over her mistress. "Now lift your hips. Just so. And your arms?"

Again the other obeyed and they helped each other out of their clothes. The younger woman pushed at Shizuru when the latter tried to lie atop her, however.

"Wait," she panted. "Stay up?"

Shizuru stared. "I thought I was getting a reward."

"You will... if you stay so."

"An odd reward, to be denied your body," Shizuru pretended to grumble as she stilled. In truth, she was interested to see what her lover wanted. An examination, it turned out: her eyes widened as Natsuki's gaze roamed like a proprietor assessing territory. It was a surprisingly forthright visual caress from a girl who could still blush if the subject's eyes met hers. Not that the girl was pale of cheek even now.

Then it was not just the green eyes ogling but also the scarred fingers. From trim flanks to slender waist, raking to her hips and the tender flesh of her bottom. Shizuru fought down a shiver when they scraped the soft skin of her thighs. Then they found her and she inhaled, but mastered the urge and permitted herself no greater relief, even at the torture they started.

Her composure pulled black brows together, to her amusement.

"Do you know what you are doing?" she challenged.

The next touch wiped away her smugness. She blinked rapidly but got no reprieve, especially when a hand cupped her rear in encouragement.

"Tell, Shizuru," Natsuki told her, going so far as to smirk. "Do I?"

Shizuru glared as another splash of pleasure streaked her vision. She would have answered, but Natsuki's hands persisted. It did not take long before she sensed herself beaten.

"I will make you pay for this, you know," she still got out, arms shaking.

"Yes," Natsuki agreed.

She lipped Shizuru's ear when the latter finally fell, a toppled idol moaning into her hair and clutching at the sheets. She added a tongue and Shizuru lost all restraint, hips plunging uncontrollably. Soon the older woman was whimpering her finish against one of Natsuki's cheeks. Natsuki swiped her palms over the wetness on the strong shoulders and back afterwards; Shizuru twitched helplessly, huffing.

"Does it please you to have power over me?" the Himean asked after she recovered.

She had to lift herself again to see the answer in the flushed face. Yet Natsuki was not meeting her gaze: the green eyes were on the older woman's body again.

It seemed the Otomeian had not been satisfied by her earlier assessment. Now one of the hands on Shizuru's shoulders slipped its way to a bicep. Thumb and digits caught the swell of the muscle, dipped into the dint of the septum and over the slimmer swell at the back of the arm. Natsuki's eyes were on the inspection and Shizuru watched her in return.

Suddenly the girl withdrew her questing hand and tongued the tips of her fingers. Shizuru drew a breath at the sight and Natsuki's eyes darted up, as if in alarm. Shizuru wondered if the girl had actually forgotten her for an instant.

"I am, ah-" Natsuki began, looking strangely embarrassed. "Um, I..."

Shizuru said it for her: "You like my sweat."

Brilliant eyes shut away even in admission: "Yes."

Shizuru sighed. She turned Natsuki onto her stomach, to hold the girl captive in her turn. Especially after what she had just experienced, there was a gnawing desire to have it done: to see every knob of the princess's spine strained, scapulae flapping like the wings of a bird held down.

"Your sweat," Shizuru said while spreading her lover's legs. "I love yours."

She loved too that this creature kindled from her strength as much as her love. So she gave Natsuki both, branded a writ of ownership and adoration on the fevered nape. She trapped the smaller body with her shoulders so it could not flee; pinned the slender hips with hers so they could only follow her rhythm. And she exacted vengeance until the other was reduced to submission so fine it left Shizuru as breathless as the girl broken beneath her.

---

Back in Septentria, Calchis was a satisfied man. His allies among the Arvetii had performed a great deal of canvassing on his behalf. Not only could they now assure him of perfect loyalty from their own folk, but they also reported the addition of many Carsinian lords to their side.

This was of consequence because Calchis was banking on Carsinian support. Unlike many of the other tribes of the empire, the Carsinii could not be bullied into joining the imperial cause later. The imperial restoration needed their strength from the outset! They were one of the country's primary sources of cavalymen. Without the Carsinian troopers, the resumption of the Mentulaean-Himean War would have a poorer beginning.

Baron Epodorus was deputed by the Carsinii to attend the clandestine meeting with Calchis. They were joined by deputies from the other tribes of the land's northeast region.

"If you talk to them yourself again, Your Highness, we'll sway all the others too," Epodorus promised. "It's not lack of sympathy for your cause that's causing them to hesitate. It's fear."

"That won't stand them well on the battlefield," Calchis observed disapprovingly.

"They can be broken out of it! The Himeans walloped us heavily during your father's time, I ask you to remember. We took more beatings for longer than the others, thanks to our position near the river border and our fidelity to the king. That tells you we also held out longer than the others! My fellows just need encouragement again... something you can give. You're exactly the tonic they need, Prince Calchis. Our own great general to contend with the enemy's!"

So sharp was fear of their foe that not one protested the baron's indirect praise of her as a "great general". Not even, several noticed, their leader, who also let the "Prince" slip. Insisting on being called "King" could wait until he had gathered enough allied lords together and got Hiempnos to perform the rite before them.

"Very well," Calchis decided. "I'll meet the undecided Carsinian lords as soon as you can arrange it, Epodorus. Other than that, how go your preparations, Barons and Baronesses?"

A heavyset woman spoke up.

"They go well, Your Highness," said the woman, Baroness Sedulia of the Arvetii. "Among us we've been readying our people in secret. We meet only in small groups to avoid notice. Only community leaders and nobles, who manage getting word to their own people after it."

"The same for the allied Carsinii," said Epodorus.

"And the Veromandae," said another man. "The Himeans may have won the last war, but there's still too few of them to cover the land effectively. There are a lot of places we can go to avoid their suspicious eyes."

"The Lenapii and Bellones aren't here, but I saw them not long ago," said Calchis. "They're doing the same and doing well."

The Baroness Sedulia cleared her throat affectedly. Calchis almost dismissed it, as he was so used to people doing that around him—why was it that one man's hoarse voice made another's throat feel ticklish?—but she followed it up by leaning forward in her seat.

"Recruitment isn't our problem," she announced. "People are still eager to throw off the southerners' yoke! They'll rally to a leader who offers them a way to achieve that."

"And the problem is?" Calchis prompted, unintentionally forbidding in his dense-maned and dense-bearded guise.

"The problem is as it was last we met, Your Highness," said the baroness. "It's armaments. Things actually grow worse as our recruitment improves, which has been happening all this time. As things are going, we may indeed be successful in getting nearly all the tribes to resume our fight against the Himeans. Well, with the exception of traitorous rubbish like the Aexelli or the bumpkins of the southeast, anyway."

Someone growled out not to forget the Leucones, a tribe neighbouring the Aexelli and also among the first to go over to the southerners.

"Yes, them too, of course," Sedulia agreed, her broad face twisted by hatred. "I don't even need to mention Firens."

There was a chorus of snarls at that name.

"As I was saying, we'll have more than enough soldiers for our cause," the baroness went on. "We'll even have enough officers, thanks to all those armies that were demobilised instead of being captured at the end of King Obsidian's fight against Hime. The officers of those forces got to come back home. All valuable men and women we can use now! But since it's looking more and more like we'll have a great many of those men and women, we might not have enough gear to arm all of them! Nor all the people they'll be commanding! Tell me, Epodorus, if we got all the Carsinii on our side, how many soldiers could you field?"

"I would say thirty thousand at least," he said. "More if we can train the youngsters somehow. A lot of them are burning to avenge relatives who were in King Obsidian's armies."

"We're training our own youngsters now," Sedulia said. "Just do it in small groups again, wherever it's safe. Do it in basements or warehouses, and cover every window while using lookouts! The Himeans are too few to be able to see everything."

Epodorus revised the quote at this advice: "Forty or fifty thousand, thereabouts, then."

"We Arvetii may produce near forty thousand ourselves. Now let me ask you, if we asked you to muster in the next month, could you arm all of them?"

Here the Carsinian baron made a face.

"No," he told the group. "You're right, Sedulia, it's a problem. We don't have the gear! The first thirty thousand we probably can arm, or just about. Some will have to go with an old blade or patched-up armour, but better than going without. The other twenty, though, will be as naked as new-born babes! We'll be lucky to even find them all decent swords!"

The others in the gathering murmured, realising the same held true for their own peoples.

"We lost a lot of equipment to the Himeans," said a dour-looking man next to Sedulia. He was the baron representing the tribe of the Veromandae in this conference. "I know all of us held some back when we surrendered armaments to them. But even with those secret caches, the bulk of the empire's military paraphernalia is no longer in our hands."

"To make matters worse," someone added, "we no longer have a Comus to go to for mass manufacture of weapons and other equipment. Nor is Arvern available to us."

Calchis spoke up again.

"Actually," he said, "it's time you were told something."

From the outset, Calchis had known armaments would be a concern. Many had been lost during the war, often as a natural outcome of casualties. The victorious army usually stripped armour and weaponry from enemy corpses on the field. Himeans were especially methodical at it, actually: no scrap of salvageable materiel was typically left behind once they finished.

Other things had further attenuated the stockpile of arms the empire had accrued over the years. Decay, which was hardest on shields and composite gear. Cowardice (fleeing soldiers cast off their gear in order to run faster), of which there had been a lot in the empire's last engagements. Then there were the natural gestures of capitulation.

How fortunate that the barons had known to conceal some of their remaining war equipment! Calchis had initially feared that the druids would need to send them messages to do it, and that would have broken his cover early to too many people. But the lords had done it on their own.

So when the Himeans managed disarmament of the fiefdoms, it had been an incomplete job. Most barons hid away a third of what their armouries had left: a few of the more daring hid away half or more. None had really known when they might need those weapons and armour again, yet instinct drove them to risk their conqueror's wrath by keeping them. Instinct, or the Tuatha? Perhaps both were on Calchis's side.

In spite of that, the retained equipment would not be enough. Not when one considered how many feasible soldiers remained. And how many more Mentulaeans had come of age since the start of the war, since all those losses...

So he and Faris had puzzled out early on how they would solve the problem. Arvern was the best place for getting what they needed. Its sister-city Comus was little more than a scar on the ground now, a sore on which their own mother's tribe, the Ganni, focused blazing resentment. Arvern it had to be-if not for Shizuru Fujino's ban on its forges bulk-manufacturing weapons. To enforce her restriction, the woman had installed a garrison in the region, and even a small station within the city itself. The officers in the city station monitored the city's countless smithies and their production.

An insurmountable problem, it had seemed at first. Then Faris had pointed out the weakness of the Himean governor's arrangement. While clever in itself, it would rely nonetheless on people for its execution. People were the same in some ways, regardless of the land that raised them. Himeans could still be as lazy or half-hearted as the next Mentulaeen shirking orders.

So the siblings told Arvern to wait and observe the monitors. Which officers were thorough and which just flipped through logs without crosschecking against the warehouses? Which completed their rounds no matter the time and which went off after the first handful of smithies? Who kept their observations to themselves and who could be diverted by a chat with some charming locals?

In short, which officers were dangerous and which were susceptible to deception?

It took some time, but they eventually managed it. Soon they knew when which officers were on duty and which of them were feckless. Given the invaders' complacency, there were more of these than the careful ones. Most Himean officers found the task of monitoring smithies too tedious to do well.

This was how the smithies managed their illegal business. They even devised a system whereby they could warn each other if a break occurred in the officer rotation.

Sometimes other Himeans appeared in an area or a lazy officer bestirred himself for more thorough inspection. To guard against that, lookouts and messengers were stationed at the city's crossroads. An approaching problem saw the messengers run to all the smithies in the area. All said the same words: "My mother's soup ladle is broken." The smiths knew to conceal their contraband work at hearing that.

So only five months after Arvern's surrender, it had already begun its subversive work against its new masters. Still, the work had to be done with care, which slowed production. Even the process of hiding away the new weapons and armour had to be carried out in secret. This made the siblings antsy as it prevented arms from piling up as fast as they wanted. At the rate equipment was coming in, it could be another half-decade before they could get everything together!

The duo and their chief confederate concurred: they needed another source of gear.

When Faris went to the Kingdom of Celsor, it was with the knowledge that the Himeans had already visited. She had even stopped to view the impressive remnants of the bridge they had used to cross the River Flundanus. Talking to the river-folk confirmed the rumour about the construction having taken merely ten days. It gave her something to think about when the same folk conveyed her to the other side on one of their raft-barges. The engineering feat was not good for Faris's needs: she knew such a feat would have awed their brother-by-marriage.

The original intention had been to directly approach Celsor's King Leontes. He had lent soldiers to their father against the Himeans and the siblings hoped he would do the same for them. Faris revised her plans after three days in his kingdom. The Himeans had obviously impressed the Celsorians, who were still big with talk of the southerners. Who had come in peace and even been conscientious enough to avoid arable land in their marches. They had also bought a lot of foodstuff in passing, and paid for it at handsome prices!

The king too, she discovered, had scorned to assault them with his troops. From what Faris could tell, he seemed to be reconciled to their nearby presence. Again, not good for her needs: she suspected Leontes was not inclined to helping her or her brother. So the person she contrived to meet in secret changed from him to his wife: their half-sister, Amanea.

Amanea had never been a friend to Calchis and Faris, but nor was she a particular enemy. Her elevation to Queen of Celsor through marriage to Leontes had meant a lack of clashes between her and those of Obsidian's brood interested in the empire's kingship. Amanea already had her own kingdom, so to speak. Why would she need to tussle with her siblings for another?

So when Faris tapped her for a furtive reunion, she had no problem saying yes to one of her few siblings still at large in the north.

"I don't know what you want me to do," she told Faris. "Leontes won't give you any more of his soldiers, even if I ask for them. He says we've already lost the ones we sent to Father. He'll just see sending more against those southerners as a waste."

"I understand," Faris said. "He needs a reason to believe his men won't be wasted. What I'm asking is, can't you give him that reason? Have you no sway over your husband?"

Amanea's blue, beautifully-opened eyes snapped to Faris's dark ones.

"Sway enough," she said snidely, eyeing her sister with disdain. Faris knew it was because of her current appearance, which had caused Amanea gasp. Her peasant-robed, cropped-maned guise was an affront to someone as vain as the Queen of Celsor.

"I can't work miracles, Faris," Her Majesty now sniffed. "If you want me to convince my husband, you'll have to give me proof for the argument. Maybe Calchis can go and win some battles. Only then might Leontes be persuaded. Because I tell you, that Himean general who trounced Father was very good at persuading him that she'd trounce any and everything going against her."

"Is that what he said?"

"Not in those words, but that's the impression I get." Amanea sighed and rearranged herself in her seat. "I wish I could've seen that foreigner, myself, but I didn't go with him to meet her. Is she really as tall as Leontes? If so, she's a giant of a woman!"

"She's certainly a giant," Faris said. "In more ways than one."

"I can only imagine how mannishly ugly she must be."

Faris eyed her half-sister dryly. Trust Amanea to be concerned with the woman's looks when all that really mattered was her genius on the battlefield!

"Actually," she said, knowing Amanea would dislike to hear this, "those who've met her say she's one of the most beautiful women they've seen. You should ask your husband... although he probably won't want to admit thinking another woman beautiful to his wife. Or would he?"

The barb struck; Amanea's pretty face turned ugly. Leontes was not short of mistresses, which galled her conceit.

"Anyway, if you really think he can't be persuaded-

"He can't."

"Then we'll leave it be until things change. There's another thing you can do to help us anyway, and it doesn't need your husband's support."

"What makes you think I'll give you mine?"

"Because you'll get something out of it."

Faris explained that Calchis's armies would need equipment. Celsorian armour and blades would suffice in the absence of traditional Mentulaean ones; anyway, they were not that different. She could not buy them herself, however: nor indeed could she nominate an agent to do it on her behalf. There would still be questions going around about the destination of such an amount of arms as she intended to get. So she needed a local buyer, and one whose motives could not be questioned.

"If you use one of your people and tell him to make it seem like the purchases are for Leontes's own armouries, there'd be less curiosity about their purpose," she told Amanea. "Whatever agents may be sympathetic to the Himeans will also fail to see cause for alarm. Then, I can just have some of my people meet yours to take charge of the equipment."

"You still haven't said what I get from it."

"You get paid for the service. Say, a hundred talents? We'll pay for the equipment too, of course, but only at fair prices, so don't even think about adding a middleman's bonus-we know how much gear costs."

Amanea looked sly. "Interesting that you can afford to pay, Faris. Did some of Father's money find its way to your coffers?"

"Let's just say we preferred to spirit away the contents of some of the northwest Treasuries before the Himeans could. In addition to the hundred talents, let me throw in something else. I have a certain turquoise and jade necklace I'm sure you'd like-"

"How did you get that?!" Amanea cut in, spitting like a cat splashed with water. "That was stolen!"

"Yes, it was, and not by me, before you accuse me of that," Faris answered serenely. The necklace in question had belonged to Amanea's mother, from whose neck it had been taken prior to her interment. Amanea had long grieved its loss, having intended to take it as a keepsake of her parent.

"If you didn't steal it, how do you claim to own it?" the still-grieving daughter now hissed.

"I found it in an old courtier's jewellery chest," Faris said. "I wouldn't worry about it anymore-they're dead now. I made sure of it. You can have the necklace along with the silver I promised. As long as you help us and keep quiet about everything, at least until we need you to talk to Leontes in favour of our cause. The hundred talents buy that too: the promise of a word in our favour."

Thus did Faris secure more of the equipment her brother's armies needed. Calchis told his allies some of this now, promising the imminent arrival of gear from both Celsor and Arvern.

"This is welcome news!" Baroness Sedulia said, brightening. "We'll have to devise a way of getting them to the barons without being noticed, but since trade's started up again, that should be doable. It's not like the Himeans are inspecting carts any longer."

"I agree," said Epodorus. "It's manageable."

"Good. So just worry for now about getting more people on board," Calchis said to them. "The Chief Druid actually made an interesting suggestion on that last we met. The Himeans plan to hold another Septentrian Conference this spring, don't they?"

"The Septentrian Conferences," one of the barons echoed. "A preposterous name, Septentria!"

"And entirely foreign," Calchis agreed, again with a calm that had never been evinced by his father. Obsidian would have visited awful punishment on any man who interrupted him, even in private conference. But then, Obsidian had not been a fugitive prince who needed allies to claim his throne and title.

"Going back to the topic, these conferences could be useful. It makes it easier for the lords allied to us to meet and potentially convince others to throw in their lots with us."

"But... they can do that easily even now, Your Highness," Epodorus said. "Meet other lords to persuade them, that is."

"To some extent. At the moment, only lords from the same region can meet comfortably without arousing suspicion. One coming from a distant region to meet another would get more questions. For example, the Himeans' spies might be wary of a Gannian baron meeting a Trocarian one down south. But if those two met at that Septentrian Conference in Gorgo? Wouldn't lift an eyebrow! It would let our recruitment of people proceed so much faster if we could meet the other lords without worrying about being covert."

The others exchanged glances. What their future king was true, of course, in that it would make far more sense for a distant tribe's baron to meet with another's at that event. Yet it was also far more dangerous to do so, at least if the purpose of the meeting was to invite someone into sedition. One had to assume the Himeans' spies all over the capital city. Besides, what if they made a mistake and revealed too much to a contrary baron with no sense of kinship? There would be no time to correct the mistake! He could walk out of the meeting and head straight to the Himeans for a report!

So much did Baron Epodorus explain to Calchis now, only to have the prince shake his head.

"I don't want our meetings to happen during the conference itself," Calchis explained. "All that needs to happen during the conference is a sounding out, a test of which lords we might be able to tell more. Any we do think trustworthy, we can then invite to another interview. The barons would have to go incognito for that later interview, of course, but not necessarily before that."

That got the faces turned to him loosening as they saw the reason behind his plans. He and his accomplices continued their planning for another hour before they broke up, at which point the barons asked for his instructions on a final matter.

"Is there anything we should do during the Septentrian Conference?" they asked. "Any special grievance or issue we should bring to the Himeans, perhaps to keep them busy while we work?"

"None," he answered. "In fact, be as cooperative as you can! Let them think us as placid and biddable as oxen grown accustomed to the yoke! That way, when our forces rise up, they will be just like those oxen-surprised by the slaughter."